Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 370). Noting the Government's intention to raise the age of completion of compulsory schooling to 15 years, the Committee once again reminds the Government that pursuant to Article 2(3) of the Convention, the minimum age for admission to employment (currently 14 years) should not be lower than the age of completion of compulsory schooling. Therefore, the Committee urges once again the Government to intensify its efforts to raise the minimum age for admission to employment or work to 15 years, and to provide for compulsory education up until that age, within the framework of the adoption of the draft amendments to the Labour Code. The Committee requests that the Government provide a copy of the new provisions, once adopted.

Article 6. Vocational training and apprenticeship. In its earlier comments, the Committee noted that the Government had stated that the draft amendments to the Labour Code (section 16) had set the minimum age for vocational training under a contract at 14 years. The Committee expressed the firm hope that such a provision under the draft amendments would be adopted in the near future.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that section 16 will be adopted along with the draft amendments to the Labour Code. The Government also indicates that the National Centre for Vocational Training is in charge of carrying out vocational training and apprenticeships. The Committee once again expresses the firm hope that section 16 of the draft amendments to the Labour Code, setting a minimum age of 14 years for entry into an apprenticeship, in conformity with Article 6 of the Convention, will be adopted in the very near future.

Article 7. Light work. In its earlier comments, the Committee noted that under section 19 of the draft amendments to the Labour Code, employment or work of young persons in light work may be authorized when they complete 13 years of age under certain conditions (except in different types of industrial work in which the employment or work of young persons under the age of 15 years is not authorized). The Committee also noted that light work activities would be determined by virtue of an Order from the Ministry of Labour. The Committee requested that the Government provide information on any progress made in this regard.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that it has asked for light work to be included in the ongoing ILO–IPEC Project "Country level engagement and assistance to reduce child labour in Lebanon" (CLEAR Project) and that a few meetings have been held in this regard. The Government indicates that, once the CLEAR Project is launched, it will be able to prepare a statute on light work in accordance with the relevant international standards. The Committee once again requests that the Government take the necessary measures to ensure the formulation and adoption of a statute determining light work activities, including the number of hours during which, and the conditions in which, light work may be undertaken. It requests that the Government provide information on the progress achieved.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2001)

The Committee notes with concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments.

Articles 3, 7(1) and (2)(b) of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour, penalties and direct assistance for rehabilitation and social integration. Clause (a). All forms of slavery or practices similar to slavery. Trafficking. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the adoption of the Anti-Trafficking Act No. 164 (2011). The Committee requested the Government to provide information on the application of this Act, in practice.

The Committee notes the statistical information related to trafficking of children provided by the Government in its report. It notes that in 2014, five child victims of trafficking for labour exploitation (street begging), and one child victim of trafficking for sexual exploitation, were identified. According to the Government's indication, all the child victims identified were referred to social and rehabilitation centres, such as the "Beit al Aman" shelter in collaboration with Caritas. The Government also indicates that in 2014 the Higher Council for Childhood drafted a sectorial Action Plan on Trafficking of Children that is still under consultations with the relevant stakeholders.

The Committee also notes that in its 2015 concluding observations, the UN Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW) recommended the Government to provide mandatory gender-sensitive capacity-building for judges, prosecutors, the border police, the immigration authorities and other law enforcement officials to ensure the strict enforcement of Act No. 164 to combat trafficking by promptly prosecuting all cases of trafficking in women and girls (CEDAW/C/LBN/CO/4-5, paragraph 30(a)). The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the draft sectorial Action Plan on Trafficking of Children is adopted in the near future, and to provide information on any progress made in this regard. The Committee also requests the Government to continue to provide information on the application in practice of Act No. 164 of 2011, including statistical information on the number of investigations, prosecutions, convictions and penal sanctions applied for the offence of trafficking of children. Lastly, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on any measures adopted in order to prevent trafficking of children as well as measures taken to ensure that child victims of trafficking are provided with appropriate rehabilitation and reintegration services.

Clauses (b) and (c). Use, procuring or offering of a child for the production of pornography or for pornographic performances and for illicit activities, in particular for the production and trafficking of drugs. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that under section 33(b) and (c) of the draft amendments to the Labour Code, the use, procuring or offering of a child for the production of pornography or for pornographic performances and for illicit activities is punishable under the Penal Code, in addition to the penalties imposed by the Labour Code. It also noted that section 3 of Annex No. 1 of Decree No. 8987 of 2012 on hazardous work prohibits such illicit activities for minors under the age of 18. The Committee noted the statistical information (disaggregated by gender and age) provided by the Government on the number of children found engaged in prostitution from 2010 to 2012.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that the labour inspectorate is the body responsible for the supervision of the implementation of Decree No. 8987. The Committee notes with concern that according to the Government's indication no cases related to the application of the Decree have been detected so far. The Committee urges the Government to take immediate and effective measures to ensure the application in practice of the provisions of Decree No. 8987 of 2012 prohibiting the engagement of children for prostitution or pornographic purposes or for illicit activities. The Committee requests the Government to provide statistical information on any prosecutions and convictions made with regard to the use, procuring or offering of a child for prostitution, for the production of pornography or for pornographic performances.

As for the draft amendments to the Labour Code, the Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures without delay to ensure the adoption of the provisions prohibiting the use, procuring or offering of persons under the age of 18 for the production of pornography or for pornographic performances, and the use, procuring or offering of persons under the age of 18 for illicit activities, as well as of the provisions providing for the penalties imposed.

Article 7(2). Effective and time-bound measures. Clause (d). Identifying and reaching out to children at special risk. 1. Refugee children. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to provide information on the measures taken within the work programme of the National plan of action on the elimination of child labour (NAP–WFCL) for working Palestinian children to protect them from the worst forms of child labour.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that no new measures have been taken due to the political and security situation in the country. The Committee also notes that according to the 2016 United Nations High Commissioner Job Refugees (UNHCR) report entitled "Missing out: Refugee Education in Crisis", there are more than 380,000 refugee children between the ages of 5 and 17 registered in Lebanon. It is estimated that less than 50 per cent of primary school-age children have access to public primary schools and less than 4 per cent of young persons have access to public secondary schools. The report highlights that since 2013 the Government has introduced a two-shift system in public schools to encourage the enrolment of refugee children. About 150,000 children have entered this system. It also notes from the ILO report entitled "ILO response to the Syrian Refugee crisis in Jordan and Lebanon", of March 2014, that many refugee children are working in hazardous conditions in the agricultural and urban informal sector, street peddling or begging. While acknowledging the difficult situation prevailing in the country, the Committee urges the Government to take effective and time-bound measures to protect refugee children (in particular Syrian and Palestinian) from the worst forms of child labour and to provide the necessary and appropriate direct assistance for their removal and for their rehabilitation and social integration. It requests the Government to provide information on the number of refugee children who have benefited from any initiatives taken in this regard, to the extent possible disaggregated by age, gender and country of origin.

2. Children in street situations. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the Ministry of Social Affairs has taken a series of measures to address the situation of street children, including: (i) undertaking activities to raise awareness through education, media and advertisement campaigns; (ii) training of a certain number of social protection actors/players working in child protection institutions; (iii) providing rehabilitation activities for a certain number of street children and their reintegration in their families; (iv) within the framework of the Poverty Reduction Strategy (2011–13) 36,575 families have been chosen to benefit from free basic social services, such as access to free compulsory public education as well as medical facilities. The Government also indicates that the 2010 draft "Strategy for Protection, Rehabilitation and Integration of Street Children" has not been implemented yet, but is in the process of being revised.

The Committee notes the 2015 study "Children Living and Working on the Streets in Lebanon: Profile and Magnitude" (ILO–UNICEF–Save the Children International) which provides detailed statistical information on the phenomenon of street-based children across 18 districts of Lebanon. The Committee also notes that the report comprises a certain number of recommendations, including: (i) enforcing relevant legislation; (ii) reintegrating street-based children into education and providing basic services; and (iii) intervening at the household-level to conduct prevention activities. The Committee further observes that despite street work being one of the most hazardous forms of child labour under Decree No. 8987 on hazardous forms of child labour (2012), it is still prevalent with a total of 1,510 children found to be living or working on the streets. Moreover, the Committee notes that in its 2016 concluding observations, the UN Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights recommended that the Government raise resources so as to provide the necessary preventive and rehabilitative services to street children and enforce existing legislation aimed at combating child labour (E/C.12/LBN/CO/2, paragraph 45). Recalling that street children are particularly vulnerable to the worst forms of child labour, the Committee urges the Government to strengthen its efforts to protect these children, and to provide for their rehabilitation and social reintegration. The Committee also urges the Government to take the necessary measures to actively implement the 2010 draft strategy entitled "Strategy for Protection, Rehabilitation and Integration of Street Children", once revised and report on the results achieved. Finally, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the number of street children who have been provided with educational opportunities and social integration services.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request directly addressed to the Government.

Lesotho

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 2001)

Article 1 of the Convention. National policy designed to ensure the effective abolition of child labour. The Committee previously noted the adoption of the Action Plan for the Elimination of Child Labour (APEC) 2013–17/18 which aims to reduce the incidence of child labour and its worst forms to less than 1 per cent by 2016, while laying a strong policy and institutional foundation for eliminating all other forms of child labour in the longer term. The Committee requested the Government to provide detailed information on the concrete measures taken within the framework of the APEC for eliminating child labour as well as the results achieved.

The Committee notes from the Progress report on the implementation of the APEC (Progress Report) attached along with the Government report, that the APEC was endorsed by all districts and coordinated efforts to eliminate child labour were undertaken. Further achievements of the APEC as indicated in the Progress Report include: (i) revising the Labour Code to strengthen the child labour provisions, to extend its scope and labour inspection services to cover the informal economy; (ii) developing child labour awareness brochures in English and Sesotho and making it available for the public; (iii) conducting awareness raising campaigns on laws and regulations relevant to child labour covering 80 per cent of the districts between 2016 and 2018; (iv) conducting six awareness raising campaigns on the guidelines for the elimination of child labour in the agricultural sector with special attention to herd boys in the districts of Botha-Bothe and Qacha's Nek; (v) establishing Community Child Protection Teams in at least 20 communities to monitor child labour at community level; and (vi) adopting programmes for bringing out-of-school children and school drop-outs to formal education. Moreover, within the programmes to support the needy and the vulnerable families 28,000 children were provided with scholarships for secondary education while 33,000 households benefited from the Child Grants Programme. The Committee further notes from the APEC progress report that the lack of resources, in terms of financial and human resources, in simplifying child labour laws for trainings and producing and transporting training materials are all challenges experienced by the Ministry in delivering its responsibility under the APEC. The Committee requests the Government to continue taking effective measures, including through extending the APEC or by developing and adopting other national action plans or programmes for eliminating child labour in the country. It requests the Government to provide information on any measures taken or envisaged in this regard.

Article 2(1). Scope of application and labour inspectorate. Self-employment and work in the informal economy. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the provisions of the Labour Code excluded self-employment from its scope of application. It noted that a Child Labour Unit was established to assist in the protection of children working in the informal economy. The Committee further noted from the report of the Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights as well as from the List of Issues of the Committee on the Protection of the Rights of All Migrant Workers and Members of their Families that a high number of children continued to be engaged in animal herding, street trading and domestic work. The Committee requested the Government to provide information on the activities undertaken by the Child Labour Unit in protecting children working in the informal economy.

The Committee notes the Government's information that the Child Labour Unit conducted trainings and held public gatherings in the districts of Matsieng and Ha-Ramabanta to sensitize the people and government officials on child labour issues. Workshops focusing on sharing knowledge on child labour were also conducted in which representatives of people operating in the informal sector participated. The Committee also notes the Government's indication that the Labour Code Amendment Bill which contains provisions extending its scope as well as the labour inspection services to the informal economy is awaiting approval by the Parliament. The Committee notes however, from the Decent Work Country Programme III 2018–23 document that over 50 per cent of the labour force is employed in the informal sector. This document also indicates that regulating and preventing child labour is a major concern since the coverage of labour inspectorate does not include informal economy activities. In this regard the Committee notes that the Committee on the Rights of the Child, in its concluding observations of 25 June 2018, expressed concern that children are involved in herding and domestic work and that child labour negatively affects schooling of children in rural areas (CRC/C/LSO/CO/2, para. 55(a) and (c)). The Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the protection afforded by the Convention is granted to self-employed children and children working in the informal economy, including children engaged in herding and domestic work. In this regard, referring to its comments made under the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No.81), the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to strengthen the capacities and expand the reach of the labour inspectorate so that it can adequately monitor and detect cases of child labour in these sectors. It further requests the Government to provide detailed information on the measures taken in this regard as well as the measures taken by the Child Labour Unit in addressing child labour in the informal economy. The Committee finally expresses the firm hope that the Labour Code Amendment Bill which contains provisions protecting children working in the informal economy and extending labour inspection services to the informal economy, will be adopted and enforced in the near future.

Article 2(3). Age of completion of compulsory schooling. The Committee previously noted that, according to the Education Act of 2010, the age of completion of compulsory education is 13 years in Lesotho, two years before a child is legally eligible to work (15 years). It also noted the Government's indication that the Ministry of Education, in collaboration with the Ministry of Social Development, was working to make education free and compulsory at the secondary level. The Committee urged the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure compulsory education up to the minimum age of employment of 15 years.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that no legal measures have been taken to extend compulsory education up to 15 years. However, a non-formal education policy for out-of-school children has been adopted under the APEC. The Committee reminds the Government that compulsory schooling is one of the most effective means of combating child labour, and underlines the need to link the age for admission to employment or work to the age of completion of compulsory schooling, as established in Paragraph 4 of the Minimum Age Recommendation, 1973 (No. 146). If compulsory schooling comes to an end before children are legally entitled to work, there may arise a vacuum which regrettably opens the door for the economic exploitation of children (see 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, para. 371). The Committee therefore strongly urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure compulsory education up to the minimum age of employment or work of 15 years. It requests the Government to provide information on any progress made in this regard.

Application of the Convention in practice. The Committee notes the Government's information that the results of the Labour Force Survey, which includes a child labour module, are yet to be released. The Committee also notes from the APEC Progress Report that the preliminary report of the 2016 Housing and Population Census shows that 35.9 per cent of children aged 10 years and above are engaged in child labour, of which 21 per cent are engaged in agricultural activities. It further notes the Government's information that according to the findings of the Lesotho Violence against Children survey conducted by the Ministry of Social Development in 2019, 11.4 per cent of children who are between the ages of 13–17 years are engaged in child labour. Moreover, according to the Rapid Assessment of 2019 on vulnerable populations, it was found that 19.1 per cent of children are engaged in construction projects, 14.9 per cent in farm work, 2.1 per cent in transport, 0.9 per cent in herding and 0.4 per cent in domestic work. While taking due note of the measures taken by the Government to combat child labour, notably within the framework of the APEC, the Committee observes that a high percentage of children below the minimum age are engaged in child labour in Lesotho. The Committee encourages the Government to pursue its efforts to ensure the progressive elimination of child labour. It requests the Government to continue providing information on the situation of working children in Lesotho, including the number of children below the minimum age engaged in child labour and the nature, scope and trends of their work. It also requests the Government to provide a copy of the results of the Labour Force Survey, once completed.

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2001)

Articles 3(d) and 7(2)(b) of the Convention. Hazardous work and effective and time-bound measures to remove children from the worst forms of child labour and provide for their rehabilitation and social integration. Child domestic work. The Committee previously noted that girls performing domestic work face verbal, physical and, in some cases, sexual, abuse from their employers, and that these children generally did not attend school. It also noted the Government's statement that it would consider promulgating regulations on domestic work to prohibit hazardous work in this sector to children under 18 years of age. The Committee further noted from the compilation report prepared by the Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights for the Universal Periodic Review that children continued to work in domestic service. Moreover, the Committee on the Protection of the Rights of All Migrant Workers and Members of their Families (CMW), had also expressed concern about the high number of children engaged in domestic work. The Committee urged the Government to take immediate and effective measures to ensure that child domestic workers were protected from hazardous work, including by developing and adopting regulations prohibiting hazardous domestic work by children under 18 years of age.

The Committee notes the absence of information on this point in the Government's report. However, it notes from the Progress Report on the implementation of the Action Programme on the Elimination of Child Labour (APEC) 2013–2018 that the draft Labour Code Bill has integrated provisions promoting the fundamental principles and rights of all workers, including domestic workers. Furthermore, the National Advisory Committee on Labour has made a proposal on having special regulations for domestic workers. The Committee notes that the Committee on the Rights of the Child (CRC), in its concluding observations of June 2018 expressed concern that children in domestic work are exposed to the worst forms of child labour (CRC/C/LSO/CO/2, paragraph 55(a)). The Committee therefore once again urges the Government to take effective and time-bound measures to provide the necessary and appropriate direct assistance to remove children engaged in domestic work from hazardous working conditions and ensure their rehabilitation and social integration. In this regard, the Committee expresses the firm hope that the Government will take the necessary measures to ensure that the Labour Code Bill which guarantees protection to domestic workers, is adopted in the near future. It once again requests the Government to consider adopting special regulations which prohibit hazardous domestic work by children under 18 years of age. It requests the Government to provide information on any progress made in this regard.

Article 7(2). Effective and time-bound measures. Clause (d). Identify and reach out to children at special risk. 1. Children engaged in animal herding. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that children engaged in animal herding often worked under poor conditions for long hours and during the night, without adequate food and clothing, were exposed to extreme weather conditions in isolated areas, and did not attend school. It also noted that between 10 and 14 per cent of boys of school-going age were involved in herding, about 18 per cent of whom were not employed by their own family. The Committee noted that the Government had adopted guidelines for the agricultural sector, with special attention to herd boys. According to the guidelines, children under 13 years of age should not herd livestock, except under the supervision of parents, employers or an adult, while children under 15 years were prohibited from herding in remote areas. The guidelines also require that herd boys should be provided with adequate clothing to suit the extreme weather conditions, adequate food and medical assistance as well as safe and proper accommodation. Moreover, their working time should not exceed more than 21 hours during school weeks and not more than 30 hours during school holidays, and night work is prohibited. It requested the Government to provide information on the implementation of the guidelines for the agricultural sector and the results achieved.

While noting an absence of information in the Government's report on this point, the Committee notes from the APEC Progress Report that the Ministry of Labour and Employment conducted six awareness-raising campaigns on the guidelines in the districts of Botha-Bothe and Qacha's Nek. The Committee notes that according to the UNICEF Multiple Indicator Cluster Survey results of 2018, nearly one in three children aged 5–17 years were engaged in child labour, of which two thirds of children are involved in herding animals. The Committee notes in the concluding observations of the CRC of June 2018 that children involved in herding are still exposed to the worst forms of child labour (CRC/C/LSO/CO/2, paragraph 55(a)). The Committee therefore once again urges the Government to take effective and time-bound measures to ensure that children who are engaged in hazardous work in animal herding are removed from this worst form of child labour and are rehabilitated and socially integrated. In this regard, it requests the Government to continue providing information on the implementation of the guidelines for the agricultural sector and the results achieved.

2. Orphans of HIV/AIDS and other vulnerable children (OVCs). The Committee previously noted the various support and assistance measures taken by the Government for OVCs, including school bursaries, feeding scheme programmes, the Child Grants Programme (CGP), the Conditional Cash Transfer Programme and the National Strategic Plan on Vulnerable Children 2012–17, as well as the results achieved. Further, noting from the 2014 estimates from UNAIDS that about 74,000 children aged 0–17 are orphans due to HIV/AIDS in Lesotho, the Committee urged the Government to strengthen its efforts to ensure the protection of children orphaned by HIV/AIDS and other vulnerable children from the worst forms of child labour.

The Committee notes the Government's information that the Ministry of Social Development (MOSD) with the help of UNICEF and the European Union Lesotho have assisted in collecting data for the National Information System for Social Assistance. The Committee also notes from the APEC Progress Report that: (i) scholarship programmes for needy children for access to senior secondary schools have been adopted; (ii) District Child Protection Teams (DCPT) and Community Child Protection Teams (CCPT) were established as OVC coordinating mechanisms along with other stakeholders and labour inspectors; and (iii) a National Standards and Guidelines for Care of Vulnerable Children has been adopted for DCPTs, CCPTs, civil society organizations and other caregivers. This report further indicates that within the CGP, 33,000 households have benefitted in cash and 8,063 individuals benefited in kind. The Committee notes, however, that according to the 2019 estimates from UNAIDS, about 85,000 children aged 0–17 are orphans due to HIV/AIDS in Lesotho. While taking due note of the various measures taken by the Government for children orphaned by HIV/AIDS and other vulnerable children, the Committee requests the Government to continue its efforts to ensure that such children, who are at an increased risk of being engaged in the worst forms of child labour, are protected from these worst forms. It requests the Government to continue to provide information on specific measures taken in this regard, and on the results achieved, particularly the number of OVCs benefiting from these initiatives and the nature of the assistance provided.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Madagascar

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 2000)

The Committee notes with concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments.

The Committee notes the observations of the Christian Confederation of Malagasy Trade Unions (SEKRIMA), which were received on 17 September 2013.

Article 1 of the Convention. National policy and application of the Convention in practice. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, according to the last National Survey on Child Labour (ENTE), more than one in four children in Madagascar between 5 and 17 years of age (28 per cent) work, namely 1,870,000 children. Most working children are in agriculture and fishing, where most of them are employed as family helpers. As regards children between 5 and 14 years of age, 22 per cent are working and 70 per cent attend school. The Committee also noted the allegations of the General Confederation of Workers' Unions of Madagascar (CGSTM) that many underage children from rural areas are sent to large towns by their parents to work in the domestic sector under conditions that are often dangerous. Moreover, these children have not necessarily completed their compulsory schooling. The Committee previously noted that the National Plan of Action against Child Labour in Madagascar (PNA) was in its extension phase in terms of staffing, beneficiaries and coverage (2010–15). The Government indicated that the workplan of the National Council for Combating Child Labour (CNLTE) for 2012–13 had been adopted. The Government also reported on a number of projects, including the AMAV project against child domestic labour and the plan of action against child labour in vanilla plantations in the Sava region, which was implemented under the ILO–IPEC TACKLE project.

The Committee notes the observations of SEKRIMA stating that the practice of child labour persists in Madagascar. SEKRIMA also highlights a very high drop-out rate during the first five years of schooling.

The Committee notes the Government's indications that the PNA has partly been implemented by mobilization activities under the AMAV project, particularly in the Amoron'i Mania region, with the display of four "Red card against child labour" billboards, the distribution of flyers on combating child domestic labour and awareness-raising activities concerning revision of the dina (local convention) in order to incorporate the issue of child domestic labour. Moreover, a total of 125 children between 12 and 16 years of age were withdrawn from domestic labour and trained for the competition to obtain a diploma. The Government also indicates that each year it celebrates the World Day Against Child Labour as a means of mass awareness raising while continuing to display posters in working-class neighbourhoods and hold discussions with parents, local authorities and social partners. It also mentions that there are currently 12 Regional Councils for Combating Child Labour (CRLTEs). The Committee further notes that the capacities of various entities for combating child labour have been reinforced, namely 50 entities involved in vanilla production in the Sava region and 12 in the Antalaha region, 91 members of trade union organizations, 43 journalists and three technicians of the National Institute of Statistics. Lastly, the Committee notes the Government's indication that in 2014 the CNLTE revamped Decree No. 2007-263 of 27 February 2007 concerning child labour and Decree No. 2005-523 of 9 August 2005 establishing the CNLTE, its tasks and structure. Further to a study on hazardous work, 19 types of hazardous work were officially recognized in 2013 and incorporated into the Decree under adoption. While noting the measures taken by the Government, the Committee observes that the 2012 National Survey of Employment and the Informal Sector (ENEMPSI 2012) reveals that 27.8 per cent of children are working, namely 2,030,000 children. The survey also shows that 28.9 per cent of children between 5 and 9 years of age (83,000) and 50.5 per cent of children between 10 and 14 years of age (465,000) do not attend school. While welcoming the Government's efforts to improve the situation, the Committee urges the Government to intensify its efforts to ensure the progressive elimination of child labour. It requests it to provide information on the results achieved by the implementation of the PNA and also on the activities of the CNLTE and CRLTEs. It requests the Government to provide a copy of the revised version of Decree No. 2007-263, once it has been adopted.

Article 2(3). Age of completion of compulsory schooling. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, according to UNESCO, the age of completion of compulsory schooling is lower than the minimum age for admission to employment or work. The Committee observed that the official age of access to primary education is 6 years and the duration of compulsory schooling is five years, meaning that the age of completion of compulsory schooling is 11 years. The Committee noted the CGSTM's allegation that no changes had yet been made by the Government to resolve the problem of the difference between the age of completion of compulsory schooling (11 years) and the minimum age for admission to employment or work (15 years). The Committee noted the Government's indication that the Ministry of Education was pursuing its efforts so as to be able to take measures to resolve the gap between the minimum age for admission to employment or work and the age of completion of compulsory schooling.

The Committee notes the Government's indications that the Ministry of Education organized a "national education convention" in 2014 consisting of in-depth national consultations on the implementation of inclusive, accessible and high-quality education for all. However, the Committee notes with regret that the question of the age of completion of compulsory schooling has still not been settled and has remained under discussion for many years. It reminds the Government that compulsory schooling is one of the most effective means of combating child labour, and underlines the need to link the age for admission to employment or work to the age of completion of compulsory schooling, as established in Paragraph 4 of the Minimum Age Recommendation, 1973 (No. 146). The Committee observes once again that, as stated in the 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, if compulsory schooling comes to an end before children are legally entitled to work, there may arise a vacuum which regrettably opens the door for the economic exploitation of children (paragraph 371). Observing that the Government has been discussing this matter for ten years, the Committee urges the Government to take measures, as a matter of urgency, to raise the age of completion of compulsory schooling so that it coincides with the age of admission to employment or work in Madagascar. It requests the Government to provide information on the progress achieved in this respect.

Article 6. Vocational training and apprenticeships. Further to its previous comments, the Committee notes the Government's indication that the Ministry of Employment, Technical Education and Vocational Training has prepared a bill on the national employment and vocational training policy (PNEFP) in collaboration with the ILO and in consultation with the social partners. The Government indicates that the bill is awaiting approval before being submitted to Parliament for adoption. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to speed up the adoption of the bill concerning apprenticeships and vocational training. It requests the Government to provide a copy of this legislative text once it has been adopted.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2001)

The Committee notes with concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments.

The Committee notes the observations of the International Organisation of Employers (IOE) received on 30 August 2017 and requests the Government to provide its comments in this respect.

Follow-up to the conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards (International Labour Conference, 105th Session, May–June 2016)

The Committee notes the Government's report, received on 25 October 2016, and the in-depth discussion on the application of the Convention by Madagascar in the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 105th Session of the International Labour Conference in June 2016.

Articles 3(b) and 7(1) of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour and sanctions. Child prostitution. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that section 13 of Decree No. 2007-563 of 3 July 2007 respecting child labour categorically prohibits the procuring, use, offering or employment of children of either sex for prostitution and that section 261 of the Labour Code and sections 354–357 of the Penal Code, which are referred to in Decree No. 2007-563, establish effective and dissuasive sanctions. The Committee noted the observations of the Christian Confederation of Malagasy Trade Unions (SEKRIMA) indicating that the number of girls under the age of majority, some as young as 12 years old, who are engaged in prostitution is increasing especially in cities, that 50 per cent of prostitutes in the capital, Antananarivo, are minors, and 47 per cent engage in prostitution because of their precarious situation. For fear of reprisals, 80 per cent of them prefer not to turn to the authorities. Furthermore, the Government has strengthened the capacity of 120 actors engaged in tourism in Nosy-Be and 35 in Tuléar in relation to sexual exploitation for commercial purposes. However, the Committee noted the absence of information on the number of investigations, prosecutions and convictions of those engaged in commercial sexual exploitation. It also noted the increase in sex tourism involving children, the insufficient measures taken by the Government to combat this phenomenon and the low number of prosecutions and convictions, all of which fosters impunity.

The Committee notes that the Conference Committee recommended the Government to strengthen its efforts to ensure the elimination of the sexual exploitation of children for commercial purposes and sex tourism.

The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that the Ministry of Internal Security, through the Police for Morals and the Protection of Minors (PMPM), is one of the agencies responsible for the enforcement of penal laws on the sexual exploitation of children for commercial purposes, including prostitution. The PMPM centralizes criminal charges concerning children and is responsible for conducting investigations into alleged perpetrators. The Government adds that the PMPM regularly makes unannounced raids on establishments that are open at night to monitor the identity and age of the persons present, but that it is difficult to determine whether the minors who are found are prostitutes. Moreover, the Committee notes that a code of conduct for actors in the tourism industry was signed in 2013. The code of conduct seeks to raise awareness among all actors in tourism with a view to bringing an end to sexual tourism in the country. The Committee also notes the statistics provided by the Government on the cases handled by the courts of first instance in Betroka, Ambatolampy, Arivonimamo, Nosy-be, Taolagnaro, Vatomandry, Mampikony and Ankazobe. It notes that in 2015 no cases of the exploitation of minors or of sex tourism involving minors were brought before these courts. The Committee is therefore once again bound to note with deep concern the absence of prosecutions and convictions of perpetrators, which is resulting in the continuation of a situation of impunity which seems to persist in the country. The Committee therefore urges the Government to take immediate and effective measures to ensure that robust investigations and effective prosecutions are carried out on persons suspected of procuring, using, offering and employing children for prostitution, and that sufficiently effective and dissuasive penalties are imposed. It requests the Government to continue providing statistical information on the number and nature of the violations reported, investigations, prosecutions, convictions and criminal penalties imposed in this respect. Finally, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the results achieved as a result of the dissemination of the code of conduct among the various actors in the tourism sector.

Clause (d). Hazardous types of work. Children working in mines and quarries, and labour inspection. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that children work in the Ilakaka mines and in stone quarries under precarious and sometimes hazardous conditions, and that the worst forms of child labour are found in the informal economy and in rural areas, which the labour administration is unable to cover. The Committee also noted that the work carried out by children in mines and quarries is a contemporary form of slavery, as it involves debt bondage, forced labour and the economic exploitation of those concerned, particularly unaccompanied children working in small-scale mines and quarries. It noted that children work from five to ten hours a day, that they are engaged in transporting blocks of stone or water, and that some boys dig pits one metre in circumference and between 15 and 50 metres deep, while others go down the pits to remove the loose earth. Children between three and seven years of age, often working in family groups, break stones and carry baskets of stones or bricks on their heads, working an average of 47 hours a week when they are not enrolled in school. Moreover, the working conditions are unhealthy and hygiene is extremely poor. All of the children are also exposed to physical and sexual violence and to serious health hazards, particularly due to the contamination of the water, the instability of pits and the collapse of tunnels.

The Committee notes that the Conference Committee recommended the Government to take measures to improve the capacity of the labour inspectorate. It also notes the Government's indication that, in the context of the National Plan of Action to Combat Child Labour (PNA), the labour inspectorate envisages conducting inspections to take preventive and protective measures with a view to combating child labour in mines and quarries in the regions of Diana, Ihorombe and Haute Matsiatra. The Committee notes that the Government representative to the Conference Committee indicated that the lack of resources is a major obstacle to the adoption of rigorous measures. For example, labour inspectors do not have means of transport, even though the Government indicates in its report that one of the main obstacles to inspections by labour inspectors is the fact that mining sites, located on the outskirts of large cities, are often difficult to access. The Committee notes with deep concern the situation of children working in mines and quarries under particularly hazardous conditions. The Committee once again urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that no children under 18 years of age can be engaged in work which is likely to harm their health, safety or morals. It requests the Government to provide information on the progress made in this respect, particularly in the context of the PNA, and the results achieved in removing these children from this worst form of child labour. The Committee also requests the Government to improve the capacities of the labour inspectorate, in particular by providing the necessary resources, such as vehicles, to enable labour inspectors to have access to remote sites.

Article 7(2). Effective and time-bound measures. Clause (d). Children at special risk. Street children. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the Ministry of Labour and Social Legislation (MTLS) was continuing its programme of school enrolment and training for street children in the context of the Public Investment Programme for Social Action (PIP). It however noted that the number of street children has increased in recent years and that the action taken by the Government to help them is still minimal. The Government indicated that the programmes financed under the PIP have the objective of removing 40 children a year from the worst forms of child labour, or 120 children over three years. The Committee nevertheless noted that there are about 4,500 street children in the capital, Antananarivo, most of whom are boys (63 per cent) who live from begging or sorting through rubbish. Girls living on the streets are frequently victims of sexual exploitation to meet their subsistence needs, or under pressure from third parties. Others are engaged in domestic work, swelling the ranks of exploited child workers.

The Committee notes that the Conference Committee, in its conclusions, requested the Government to increase funding for the PIP with a view to removing children from the streets and for awareness-raising campaigns.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that the Ministry of the Population, Social Protection and the Promotion of Women has set up a census programme of children living and working on the streets and homeless families for the period 2015–16. The objective of this programme is to determine the number of children living and working on the streets, identify the needs of homeless families and develop a short-, medium- and long-term plan of action to deal with them. The Committee notes that studies have been carried out, data analysed and interpreted, and shelters set up. The next stages will consist of the provision of shelter, care, guidance, education, school enrolment and placement or repatriation of the persons concerned. The Committee requests the Government to continue taking effective and time-bound measures to ensure the targeted implementation of the PIP's programmes, and requests it to intensify its efforts to ensure that street children are protected from the worst forms of child labour and are rehabilitated and integrated in society. It requests the Government to provide information on the results achieved in this respect. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the data collected through the census programme on children living and working in the streets and homeless families, as well as the results achieved in removing them from this situation and preventing them from becoming engaged in the worst forms of child labour.

Application of the Convention in practice. The Committee previously noted that 27.5 per cent of children, or 2,030,000, are engaged in work, of whom 30 per cent live in rural areas and 18 per cent in urban areas. The Committee also noted that 81 per cent of child workers between 5 and 17 years of age, or 1,653,000 children, are engaged in hazardous types of work. Agriculture and fishing account for the majority of child labour (89 per cent), and more than six out of ten working children have reported health problems resulting from their work over the past 12 months. The Committee further noted that child domestic labour is often a feature of the lives of poor rural families who send their children to urban areas in response to their precarious situation. Child domestic workers may be forced to work up to 15 hours per day, and most of them receive no wages, which are paid directly to their parents. In some cases, they sleep on the floor, and many are victims of psychological, physical or sexual violence. The Committee expressed its deep concern at the situation and number of children under 18 years of age forced to perform hazardous types of work.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that it is intensifying its efforts to combat child labour through the Manjary Soa project. The Manjary Soa Centre, established in 2001, offers selected children second chance education. Once these children have been reinserted into the public education system, the Centre covers their school fees and provides them with the necessary school supplies. The Committee also notes the 2014–16 project to combat child labour in the regions of Diana and Atsimo Andrefana. The Government indicates that the objective of this project is to reinforce action in support of the socio-economic reintegration of 100 girls under 18 years of age, who have been removed from sexual exploitation for commercial purposes in Nosy-be, Toliara and Mangily. The Committee requests the Government to intensify its efforts to eliminate the worst forms of child labour, and particularly hazardous types of work, and to provide information on any progress made in this regard and the results achieved.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 2001)

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020). The Committee examined the application of the Convention on the basis of the supplementary information received from the Government this year (see Article 1 below) and also on the basis of the information at its disposal in 2019.

The Committee notes the observations of the Free Confederation of Mauritanian Workers (CLTM) received on 12 June 2019.

Article 1 of the Convention. National policy and application of the Convention in practice. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the indications of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), according to which the Ministry of Labour authorized work by 13-year-old children. It also noted the observations of the CLTM, to the effect that young children, including the children of slaves and former slaves, are working in hazardous conditions in agriculture, small-scale fishing, construction work and garbage removal. It also noted that, according to the "MICS4 – Multiple Indicator Cluster Survey" finalized by the National Statistics Office in 2014, 22 per cent of children between 5 and 14 years of age were involved in child labour. The Committee requested the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the effective abolition of child labour. The Committee also noted the adoption of the National Plan of Action on the Elimination of Child Labour 2015–20 (PANETE–RIM), and requested the Government to provide information on the activities and results achieved through the Plan of Action.

The Committee notes the information provided by the Government in its report, indicating that a National Council for Children has been set up, in order to assist the department responsible for children with the coordination, preparation, implementation and monitoring/evaluation of policies, strategies and programmes for children. The Government also indicates that ten regional childhood protection boards have been set up, which enabled the identification in 2017 of over 17,000 child victims of violence, exploitation, discrimination, abuse and negligence, including working children. It adds that awareness-raising events against child labour were organized during the year. The Committee further notes the Government's information in its supplementary report that virtual training was carried out in 2020 on child labour in agriculture and stockbreeding, in order to assist formal and non-formal education structures to raise the awareness of children from rural communities regarding the prohibition and dangers of child labour in agriculture and stockbreeding. Ten civil society organizations located in Guidimakha (in the south of the country) received this training.

Furthermore, the Committee notes the ILO information that, in the context of the "MAP 16" project launched in Nouakchott in March 2019, an agreement was established in the small-scale fishing sector to combat child labour in national supply chains. In addition, the Ministry for Children and the Family was due to launch an interactive guide in October 2019 for the prevention of child labour in Mauritania, designed, inter alia, for members of the PANETE-RIM steering committee and members of the national child protection system.

The Committee observes that the United Nations Committee on the Rights of the Child (CRC), in its concluding observations of November 2018, expressed deep concern at the high prevalence of child labour in the informal, agricultural, fishery and mining sectors, and at the lack of resources allocated for the implementation of the PANETE-RIM (CRC/C/MRT/CO/3-5, paragraph 40).

Furthermore, the Committee notes the observations of the CLTM, to the effect that children work in all sectors of activity, including hazardous work likely to jeopardize their health, safety or morals.

While noting the measures taken by the Government, the Committee expresses its concern at the situation of children working below the minimum age, often in hazardous conditions. The Committee urges the Government to continue its efforts to ensure the progressive elimination of child labour and to continue providing information on the activities and results of the National Plan of Action on the Elimination of Child Labour (PANETE–RIM). The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the activities of the National Council for Children and on the regional childhood protection boards for combating child labour.

Article 3(3). Admission of children to hazardous work from the age of 16 years. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that although section 1 of Order No. 239 of 17 September 1954, as amended by Order No. 10.300 of 2 June 1965 concerning child labour, prohibits the employment of children under 18 years of age in hazardous work, certain provisions, such as sections 15, 21, 24, 25, 26, 27 and 32 of Order No. 239 and section 1 of Order No. R-030 of 26 May 1992, set forth exceptions to this prohibition for young persons between 16 and 18 years of age. The Committee also noted the allegation made by the General Confederation of Workers of Mauritania (CGTM) that children are exploited in hazardous work in the major cities, and it asked the Government to ensure that the performance of hazardous work by young persons between 16 and 18 years of age is only authorized under strict conditions of protection and prior training, in accordance with Article 3(3) of the Convention. The Committee notes the Government's indication that it will take the necessary steps to bring the national legislation into line with the Convention, as part of the review of the Labour Code, and that it will ensure that the Orders in question are amended so as to provide that the performance of hazardous work by young persons between 16 and 18 years of age is only authorized in accordance with Article 3(3) of the Convention. The Committee expresses the firm hope that Orders Nos 239 and R-030 will be amended so that the performance of hazardous work by young persons between 16 and 18 years of age is only authorized in accordance with Article 3(3) of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the progress made in this respect.

Article 7(3). Determination of light work. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, under section 154 of the Labour Code, no child between 12 and 14 years of age may be employed without the express permission of the Minister of Labour, and only under certain conditions restricting the hours of such employment. Observing that a substantial number of children were working below the minimum age of 14 years for admission to employment or work, the Committee requested the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure that the competent authority determines the activities in which the employment of, or light work by, children between 12 and 14 years of age may be permitted.

The Committee notes the Government's indications that, as part of the review of the Labour Code, it will take the necessary measures to determine the activities in which the employment of, or light work by, children between 12 and 14 years of age may be permitted. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the Government will take account of the Committee's comments, so that the activities in which the employment or work of children between 12 and 14 years of age is permitted are determined by the competent authority. It requests the Government to provide information on progress made in this respect.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138)

The Committee notes with concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments.

Article 3(2) of the Convention. Determination of types of hazardous work. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the Government's indication that the proposal to allow the Director of the Labour Department to determine the types of hazardous work was with the Department of Legislation for technical evaluation and revision. The Committee urged the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that, following the approval of the Department of Legislation, the Director of the Labour Department determines the types of hazardous work at the earliest possible date.

The Committee notes with satisfaction that the Government adopted Ministerial Decree No. 78 of 2013 which contains a list of types of hazardous work prohibited to young persons under the age of 18 years. This list comprises work involving lifting or pulling heavy weights; working continuously in the same position; work involving contact with toxic, carcinogenic, mutagenic substances as well as explosives, irritants or corrosive substances; work with wild, poisonous or dangerous animals; slaughtering of animals; work in establishments providing alcohol; work with or near dangerous machines or equipment involving fire, explosion, electrocution, bottlenecks, harvesting, cutting; work under water; work with devices that have harmful non-ionizing electromagnetic radiation; work with compressed gases; work exposing children to high noise and vibration; work in environments causing a risk of collapse; work near power lines; and work in hospitals. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the implementation of Ministerial Decree No. 78, including the number and nature of violations regarding young persons engaged in hazardous work.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 2006)

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020). The Committee proceeded with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the supplementary information received from the Government this year (see Article 9(1)) as well as on the basis of the information at its disposal in 2019.

Article 2(1) of the Convention. Minimum age for admission to employment or work. The Committee previously noted the Government's statement that, following the 18th Constitutional Amendment, the power to legislate on labour matters had been transferred to the provinces. Accordingly, it noted that the Khyber Pakhtunkhwa Prohibition of Employment of Children Act, 2015 (KPK Act 2015) and the Punjab Restriction on Employment of Children Ordinance, 2016 (Punjab Ordinance 2016) contained provisions specifying a minimum age of 14 and 15 years for admission to employment or work, respectively. Noting that the Islamabad Capital Territory (ICT), as well as Balochistan and Sindh provinces had also drafted legislation containing similar provisions, the Committee requested the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the adoption of the draft laws in the near future.

The Committee notes with interest the Government's information in its report that the Sindh Prohibition of Employment of Children Act which was adopted in 2017 establishes a minimum age of 14 years for admission to employment or work (section 3(1)). The Government also indicates that the Balochistan Employment of Children (Prohibition and Regulation) Bill, 2019 is under the process of being presented to the Cabinet while the ICT administration is making efforts to revise the provisions of the Employment of Children Act, 1991 with the ILO's support. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the Government will take the necessary measures to ensure that the Balochistan Employment of Children (Prohibition and Regulation) Bill, 2019 and the revised Employment of Children Act, 1991 of ICT which establishes a minimum age of 14 years for admission to employment or work will be adopted without delay. It requests the Government to provide information on any progress made in this regard.

Article 3(1) and (2). Hazardous work and determination of types of hazardous work. In its previous comments the Committee noted that the KPK Act 2015 and the Punjab Ordinance 2016 provided for two lists of types of hazardous work prohibited to young persons under 18 years of age. It noted that the draft laws from ICT, Balochistan and Sindh also prohibit hazardous work for children below 18 years of age. The Committee requested the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the draft laws prohibiting the employment of persons under 18 years of age in hazardous types of work in ICT, Balochistan and Sindh provinces are adopted in the near future, after consultation with the organizations of employers and workers concerned.

The Committee notes with satisfaction that section 3(2) of the Sindh Prohibition of Employment of Children Act 2017, prohibits the employment of adolescents in 38 hazardous occupations and activities listed in its schedule. The Committee further notes the Government's indication that the Balochistan Employment of Children (Prohibition and Regulation) Bill, 2019 has also updated the list of hazardous occupations and processes prohibited to young persons and the ICT administration is in the process of adopting laws prohibiting hazardous types of work by young persons under the age of 18 years. The Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the Balochistan Employment of Children (Prohibition and Regulation) Bill of 2019 and the draft laws of ICT which contain provisions prohibiting the employment of young persons under the age of 18 years in hazardous types of work and occupations are adopted in the near future. It requests the Government to provide information on any progress made in this regard.

Article 9(1). Penalties and labour inspectorate. The Committee previously noted that the enforcement of child labour legislation was weak due to the lack of inspectors assigned to child labour, lack of training and resources, and corruption, and that the penalties imposed were often too minor to act as a deterrent. In this regard, the Committee noted the Government's information that the new laws in Khyber Pakhtunkhwa (KPK) and Punjab provinces on the prohibition of employment of children as well as the Punjab Prohibition of Child Labour at Brick Kilns Act 2016 increased the fines for the violation of their provisions. It further noted the Government's information that reforms of the labour inspection system were being carried out under the Strengthening Labour Inspection System Programme in Pakistan (SLISP) with the support from the ILO country office. The Committee requested the Government to continue its efforts to strengthen the capacity of the labour inspectorate, and to continue providing information on the number and nature of violations relating to the employment of children detected by the labour inspectorate.

The Committee notes the observations made by the Pakistan Workers Federation (PWF) in October 2017 that the incidence of child labour has increased even in the formal sector due to the abolition of the labour inspection system, the imposition of restrictions on inspections or due to the inspections being conditioned on the employer's permission.

The Committee notes the Government's information that the Balochistan Employment of Children (Prohibition and Regulation) Bill, 2019 and the ICT draft laws on child labour have increased the maximum fines for violations of the child labour provisions. It also notes the Government's information regarding the application of the KPK Act of 2015 that, in 2017, 3,367 inspections were conducted, 23 convictions were handed out, out of 36 prosecutions, involving 21,921 Pakistani rupees (PKR) in fines (approximately US$142); while in 2018, 8,367 inspections were conducted, and 95 convictions were handed out, out of 213 prosecutions, involving PKR134,000 in fines (approximately $863). The Committee further notes the Government's information in its supplementary report that in 2019, 9,538 inspections were conducted, 340 prosecutions were conducted and a total fine of PKR 0.56 million was imposed in the 254 cases decided by the courts.

With regard to the application of the Punjab Restriction of Employment of Children Act, 2016 the Committee notes the Government's information that in 2019, 30,676 inspections were conducted, 2673 child labour cases were detected, 25 establishments were sealed, and 1199 persons were arrested. The Government further indicates that in February 2020, the Department of Labour, Balochistan conducted 69 child labour inspections and of the six child labour cases which were prosecuted, in three cases a fine of PKR 14,000 (approximately US$86) were imposed on the violators. The Committee observes that the fines imposed are very low and do not appear to be sufficiently effective and dissuasive.

The Committee further notes from the Government's report under the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) on the various measures taken within the framework of SLISP to strengthen and improve the capacity of the provincial labour inspectors. According to this information, trainings were provided: to 121 labour inspectors in Punjab on effective monitoring; to 29 labour inspectors in Sindh on risk assessment and accident investigation; and to 40 labour inspectors in Sindh on occupational health and safety in the construction sector. Moreover, a labour inspection profile has been developed and will be finalized by the end of 2019. The Government also indicates that efforts are being made by the provincial governments to increase the annual budget for labour inspection services and for material resources and transport and travel allowances for labour inspectors. The Committee requests the Government to continue its efforts to strengthen the capacity of the labour inspectorate, and to continue providing information on the number and nature of violations detected and penalties imposed relating to the employment of children. It also requests the Government to continue to strengthen its measures to ensure that persons who violate the above-mentioned laws are prosecuted and that sufficiently effective and dissuasive penalties are imposed.

Application of the Convention in practice. The Committee previously noted the Government's indication that, with the assistance of UNICEF, the governments of Punjab, Sindh, KPK and Balochistan had initiated measures to carry out child labour surveys in their respective provinces. The Committee also noted from the report Understanding Children's Work in Pakistan: An Insight into Child Labour Data (2010–15) and Legal Framework that the number of children of 10–17 years of age engaged in child labour had decreased from 4.04 million in 2010–11 to 3.7 million in 2014–15, of which 2.067 million (55 per cent) were in the 10–14 years age group. The Committee urged the Government to strengthen its efforts to prevent and eliminate child labour, and to provide the results of the child labour surveys at the provincial levels once available.

The Committee notes the observations made by the PWF that in Pakistan no dedicated child labour survey has been carried out since 1996. However, all reliable evidence indicates that the incidence of child labour, though showing a decline in recent years, is still considerably high. Child labour is rampant in the agricultural sector, factories, textile, garments, carpet and industrial units, brick kilns, hotels and restaurants, auto workshops and in mines and quarries.

The Committee notes the Government's information that the government of KPK has paid special attention to prevent and eliminate child labour from the province. An exclusive unit on child labour has been established with the Directorate of Labour. It also notes the Government's statement that regular inspections at industrial establishments have gradually led to the complete elimination of child labour from this sector and efforts are being continued to do likewise in the commercial establishments. Furthermore, the Khyber Pakhtunkhwa Child Labour Policy 2018 and the KPK Act of 2015 are a milestone to eliminate child labour from the province. The Government also indicates that the implementation of the Sindh Labour Policy of 2017 and the new laws on child labour will result in the elimination of child labour in the province. The Government further indicates that the child labour survey is ongoing in the provinces of KPK, Sindh and ICT while the project is in the pipeline in Balochistan. The Committee finally notes the Government's statement in its report under the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182), that a comprehensive system is being formulated to eliminate child labour from the country through awareness-raising programmes in the society and the reshaping of the political, economic and social systems of the country and by taking such measures that make child labour a crime.

The Committee notes that according to the Punjab Multiple Indicator Cluster Survey (MICS) findings Report, 2017–18, 13.4 per cent of children aged between 5 and 17 years are engaged in child labour with 10.3 per cent of them involved in hazardous work. Furthermore, the MICS report of 2016–17 of the KPK indicates that over 14 per cent of children of 5–17 years are involved in child labour, of which 12.3 per cent are working in hazardous conditions. The Committee further notes that according to the UNICEF report on the Situation Analysis of Children in Pakistan, 2017, there is a high prevalence of child labour in Pakistan coupled with low rates of school participation. The persistence of child labour has multi layered roots such as poverty, lack of decent work for adults, need for strengthened social protection and the lack of a system that can ensure that all children attend school rather than engaging in economic activities. The Committee finally notes that the Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, in its concluding observations of July 2017, expressed concern that over 2 million children aged between 10 and 14 years are working and that 28 per cent of them are engaged in hazardous work, including in agriculture, brick kilns, coal mining, on the streets and in domestic settings (E/C.12/PAK/CO/1, paragraph 63). While taking note of the measures taken by the Government, the Committee must express its deep concern at the significant number of children under the minimum age who are engaged in child labour, including in hazardous work. The Committee therefore urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the progressive elimination of child labour, including through continued cooperation with the ILO, and to provide information on the results achieved. The Committee also once again requests the Government to provide the results of the child labour surveys at the provincial levels once available.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government, which reiterates the content of its previous request adopted in 2019.

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2001)

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020). The Committee proceeded with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the supplementary information received from the Government this year (see Articles 3(a) and 5), as well as on the basis of the information at its disposal in 2019.

Articles 3(a) and 5 of the Convention. Debt bondage and monitoring mechanisms. The Committee previously noted that the Bonded Labour System (Abolition) Act (BLSA) 1992 abolished bonded labour and that district vigilance committees (DVCs) were constituted to monitor the implementation of the BLSA. It noted that the BLSA was applicable in Islamabad Capital Territory (ICT), Balochistan and Punjab, while Khyber Pakhtunkhwa (KPK) and Sindh provinces enacted provincial legislation on bonded labour (KPK Bonded Labour System Abolition Act 2015 and Sindh Bonded Labour System Abolition Act 2015). The Committee requested the Government to continue its efforts to eliminate child debt bondage and to strengthen the capacity of DVCs and law enforcement officials responsible for the monitoring of bonded labour.

The Committee notes the Government's information in its supplementary report that the BLSA was adapted in all the provinces while the Punjab government passed the Punjab Bonded Labour System (Abolition) Amendment Act of 2018 which primarily aims at strengthening the ongoing system of inspections and reporting. The Government also indicates that the Provincial Cabinet of Balochistan approved the Elimination of Bonded Labour Bill 2020 which shall be submitted to the law department for vetting. The Bill provides for a punishment of one-year imprisonment and a fine of PKR 0.1 million (US$632.30) to people who are involved in hiring bonded labour. The Committee further notes the Government's information that the DVCs have been revitalized in all the 36 districts of Punjab and are working vigilantly to eradicate child bonded labour under the district administration, particularly in brick kilns and workshops. The Government indicates that 258 meetings of DVCs were held in 2019 during which no cases of child debt bondage were reported. The provinces of Sindh, KPK and Balochistan are in the process of establishing DVCs. Provincial child and bonded labour units have been established in Punjab and KPK while Sindh, Balochistan and ICT are making efforts in this respect. The Government also indicates that the Sindh administration has registered and brought 740 brick kilns all over the province within the ambit of various labour laws, including the Sindh Prohibition of Employment of Children Act, 2015, in order to combat the menace of bonded labour. The Committee further notes the Government's statement that the provinces are making efforts to strengthen institutional mechanisms for inspection and improvement in enforcement of labour laws on child and bonded labour, extension of coverage of such labour laws to the uncovered sectors and capacity development of inspection staff.

The Committee notes, however, from the National Commission for Human Rights Pakistan report entitled Towards Abolishing Bonded Labour in Pakistan, 2018 that over 1.3 million persons, including men, women and children in the brick kiln sector in Pakistan are working under conditions of debt bondage. This report further indicates that despite efforts by the Government and civil society, Pakistan remains a country with a large number of its workforce trapped in the systemic cycle of bondage. The Committee therefore encourages the Government to intensify its efforts to eliminate child debt bondage, including through the effective implementation of the laws abolishing bonded labour and by establishing DVCs in all the provinces and strengthening their capacity as well as the capacity of the law enforcement officials responsible for the monitoring of child bonded labour. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the measures taken in this regard and on the results achieved, including the number of child bonded labourers identified by the DVCs and other law enforcement officials, the number of violations reported, investigations conducted, prosecutions, convictions and penal sanctions imposed. The Committee finally requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the Balochistan Elimination of Bonded Labour Bill 2020 is enacted in the near future.

Articles 3(d) and 4(1). Hazardous work. With regard to the adoption of the list of hazardous work, the Committee refers to its detailed comments under the Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138).

Article 7(2). Effective and time-bound measures. Clauses (a) and (e). Preventing the engagement of children in the worst forms of child labour. Access to free basic education and the special situation of girls. The Committee previously noted that the United Nations Committee on the Rights of the Child (CRC), in its concluding observations of 11 July 2016, expressed concern at the large number of children (47.3 per cent of all children aged 5 to 16 years) who were not enrolled in formal education, of which the majority had never attended school and at the high dropout rate for girls, 50 per cent in Balochistan and KPK and 77 per cent in the Federal Administered Tribal Areas (CRC/C/PAK/CO/5, paragraph 61). The Committee urged the Government to redouble its efforts to improve access to free basic education for all children, taking into account the special situation of girls.

The Committee notes the Government's information that measures are being implemented to improve the enrolment of children in education, including the provision of monetary incentives through Khidmat ATM cards for vulnerable children and children involved in the worst forms of child labour. According to this scheme, 2,000 Pakistani rupees (PKR) (US$12.64) shall be paid to the family while enrolling a child and thereafter PKR1,000 (US$6.32) per month to each child enrolled after verification of their attendance at school. The Government indicates that more than 90,000 identified children working in brick kilns have benefited from this scheme. The Committee also notes the Government's indication that the school enrolment rates have currently reached 50.6 million compared to 48 million during 2016–17, an increase by 5.3 per cent while the gender disparity has also narrowed. The Committee notes from the UNICEF 2018 Annual Report, Pakistan that the provincial governments have been engaged in developing key policies with UNICEF such as the Punjab Non-Formal Education (NFE) Policy and the Sindh NFE Policy to enrol 600,000 out-of-school children in school in five years and the KPK NFE policy which will be endorsed shortly. These policies ensure that children excluded from education have opportunities to learn and develop skills through alternative learning pathways (ALP). In 2018, 550 ALP centres in all four provinces received direct UNICEF support, reaching 17,500 children (44 per cent girls). Moreover, UNICEF supported 2,784 early childhood education (ECE) centres across the four provinces enabling 99,400 children (58 per cent girls) to acquire ECE. The Committee, however, notes from the UNICEF report that over 5 million children are out of school, 60 per cent of whom are girls, while the number increases drastically after primary level with 17.7 million adolescents aged 10–16 years, of whom 51 per cent are girls, who are outside formal education. The Committee further notes that according to UNESCO statistics, the net enrolment rate in primary education in 2018 was 67.7 per cent (61.6 per cent female and 73.37 per cent male) and at the secondary level was 38.53 per cent (36.38 per cent female and 40.51 per cent male). While noting the measures taken by the Government, the Committee must express its deep concern at the low enrolment rates at the primary and secondary education levels and at the high number of out-of-school children. Considering that education is key in preventing the engagement of children in the worst forms of child labour, the Committee urges the Government to strengthen its efforts to improve access to free basic education for all children, taking into account the special situation of girls. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the concrete measures taken in this regard, and to provide statistical information on the results achieved, particularly with regard to increasing school enrolment rates and reducing school drop-out rates and the number of out-of-school children. To the extent possible, this information should be disaggregated by age and gender.

Clause (d). Identifying and reaching out to children at special risk. Street children. The Committee previously noted the increasing number of street children and the lack of a systematic and comprehensive strategy to protect them. It also noted the establishment of centres for the rehabilitation of street children and other vulnerable groups in the provinces of Punjab, Sindh and KPK. It further noted the Government's information that the KPK Government had established a special centre for street children which provides street children with education, health, recreation, sports, boarding, food, career and psychological counselling, and other necessary facilities. However, the Committee noted, from the concluding observations of the CRC of 11 July 2016, that children living or working on the streets, or whose parents were in conflict with the law, were often dealt with by the police rather than trained staff in child protection centres (CRC/C/PAK/CO/5, paragraph 73). The Committee requested the Government to strengthen its efforts to protect street children and to provide information on the measures taken in this regard.

The Committee notes an absence of information in the Government's report on this issue. The Committee observes that according to information available in a 2019 report of the United Nations, entitled Pakistan's street children, somewhere between 1.2 and 1.5 million children are thought to be on the streets of Pakistan's major cities. These children, who often have little or no contact with their families, form one of the most vulnerable strata of society and are denied basic rights such as access to shelter, education and healthcare. These children are highly exposed to the risk of being drawn into abusive situations including engagement in child labour and subjection to sexual exploitation, trafficking and arbitrary arrest and detention. Recalling that street children are particularly vulnerable to the worst forms of child labour, the Committee urges the Government to take effective and time-bound measures to protect and withdraw these children from engaging in the worst forms of child labour and provide for their rehabilitation and social integration. It requests the Government to provide information on the specific measures undertaken and the results achieved in this regard, particularly the number, age and gender of street children benefiting from shelter and other rehabilitative services.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Papua New Guinea

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 2000)

The Committee notes with deep concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments. The Committee informs the Government that, if it has not supplied replies to the points raised by 1 September 2021, then it may proceed with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the information at its disposal at its next session.

Article 1 of the Convention. National plan of action and application of the Convention in practice. The Committee previously noted the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) that child labour occurred in rural areas, usually in subsistence agriculture, and in urban areas in street vending, tourism and entertainment. It noted that Papua New Guinea was one of the 11 countries that participated in the 2008–12 ILO–IPEC Time-bound Programme entitled "Tackling child labour through education" (TACKLE project) which aimed at contributing to the fight against child labour.

The Committee notes from the Government's report under the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182), that within the framework of the TACKLE project, a rapid assessment was carried out in Port Moresby targeting children working on the streets and those involved in commercial sexual exploitation. The Committee notes the Government's statement that the findings of the rapid assessment conducted in Port Moresby were alarming and that it is believed that a similar child labour situation is occurring in other regions of the country. The rapid assessment findings indicate that children as young as 5 and 6 years of age are working on the streets and about 68 per cent of them worked under hazardous conditions. About 47 per cent of the street children between 12 and 14 years of age have never been to school and a further 34 per cent had dropped out of school. The Committee expresses its deep concern at the situation of children under 16 years of age who are compelled to work in Papua New Guinea. The Committee, therefore, urges the Government to strengthen its efforts to improve the situation of children working under the age of 16 years and to ensure the effective elimination of child labour. Noting that there is no concrete or reliable data reflecting the real situation of children in the rest of the country, the Committee urges the Government to undertake a national child labour survey to ensure that sufficient up-to-date data on the situation of working children in Papua New Guinea is available.

Article 2(1). Minimum age for admission to employment. The Committee had previously noted that, although the Government of Papua New Guinea had declared 16 years to be the minimum age for admission to employment or work, section 103(4) of the Employment Act permits a child of 14 or 15 years to be employed during school hours if the employer is satisfied that the child is no longer attending school. It also noted that, by virtue of sections 6 and 7 of the Minimum Age (Sea) Act, 1972, the minimum age to perform work on board ships is 15 years and 14 years, respectively.

The Committee notes the Government's information that the Australian Assistance for International Development through its Facilities and Advisory Services in close consultation with the ILO–IPEC and the Department of Labour and Industrial Relations has undertaken a review of the Employment Act and that the amendment process is ongoing. It also notes the Government's indication that this process will also address the issue related to the minimum age stipulated under the Minimum Age (Sea) Act, 1972. Noting that the Government has been referring to the review of the Employment Act and the Minimum Age (Sea) Act for a number of years, the Committee once again urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the proposed amendments are adopted in the near future. In this regard, it expresses the hope that the amended provisions will be in conformity with Article 2(1) of the Convention.

Article 2(3). Age of completion of compulsory education. The Committee previously noted that education is neither universal nor compulsory in Papua New Guinea, and that the law does not specify a legal age for entering school or an age at which children are permitted to leave school. It noted that the Education Department has developed a ten-year National Education Plan for 2005–15 (NEP) to enable more children to be in school. However, the Committee observed that the NEP seemed intended to make only three years of basic education compulsory up to the age of 9. Moreover, the Committee noted that according to the ITUC, the gross primary enrolment rate was 55.2 per cent, and only 68 per cent of these children remain at school up to the age of 10, while only less than 20 per cent of the country's children attend secondary school.

The Committee notes from the Government's report under Convention No. 182 that the NEP is being supported by donor agencies to implement programmes focusing on formal education and non-formal education (NFE), including assistance from the Asian Development Bank and the European Union in order to extend the NFE to the needy and the disadvantaged. The Committee notes, however, that according to the findings of the rapid assessment conducted in Port Moresby during 2010–11, although educational reforms are in place, 92.2 per cent of those children who enrolled in grade 3 would drop out along the way. The Committee expresses its deep concern at the significant number of children under the minimum age of admission to work who are not attending school. In this regard, the Committee must emphasize the desirability of linking the age of completion of compulsory schooling with the minimum age for admission to work, as provided under Paragraph 4 of the Minimum Age Recommendation, 1973 (No. 146). If compulsory schooling comes to an end before young persons are legally entitled to work, there may arise a vacuum which opens the door to the economic exploitation of children (see 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions concerning rights at work, paragraph 371). Therefore, considering that compulsory education is one of the most effective means of combating child labour, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures, particularly within the framework of the NEP, to provide for compulsory education for boys and girls up to the minimum age for admission to employment of 16 years. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the progress made in this regard.

Article 3(1) and (2). Minimum age for admission to, and determination of, hazardous work. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that while certain provisions of the national legislation prohibit hazardous work for children under the age of 16 years, there exist no provisions protecting children between the ages of 16–18 years from hazardous work. The Committee also noted the absence of any list of types of hazardous work prohibited to children under the age of 18 years.

The Committee notes from the Government's report that the ongoing legislative review of the Employment Act will ensure the compliance of the provisions of the Convention related to hazardous work. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the amendments to the Employment Act, which will include a prohibition on hazardous work for children under the age of 18 years as well as a determination of types of hazardous work prohibited to such children, will be adopted in the near future. It requests the Government to provide information on any progress made in this regard.

Article 3(3). Admission to types of hazardous work from the age of 16 years. The Committee previously noted that the conditions of work for young people would be examined through the ongoing Employment Act review and that the legislation relating to occupational safety and health shall also be reviewed in a way to ensure that hazardous work does not affect the health and safety of young workers. The Committee once again expresses the strong hope that the review of the Employment Act and of the legislation pertaining to occupational safety and health will be completed as soon as possible. It also hopes that the amendments made to the legislation will include provisions requiring that young persons between 16 and 18 years of age who are authorized to perform hazardous types of work receive adequate specific instruction or vocational training in the relevant branch of activity. It requests the Government to provide information on the progress made in this regard in its next report.

Article 9(3). Registers of employment. The Committee previously noted that the Employment Act does not contain any provision requiring the employer to keep registers and documents of people under the age of 18 working for them. It also noted that section 5 of the Minimum Age (Sea) Act provides for registers to be kept by people having command or charge of a vessel, which contains particulars such as the full name, date of birth, and the terms and conditions of service of each person under 16 years of age employed on board the vessel. The Committee requested the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that, in conformity with Article 9(3) of the Convention, employers are obliged to keep registers that shall contain the names and ages or dates of birth, duly certified wherever possible, of persons whom they employ or who work for them and who are less than 18 years of age.

The Committee once again notes the Government's information that this issue will be addressed within the review of the Employment Act. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the Government will take the necessary measures, without delay, to ensure that employers are obliged to keep register of all persons below the age of 18 years who work for them and to provide information with regard to the progress made in ensuring that the Employment Act and the Minimum Age (Sea) Act are in conformity with Article 9(3) of the Convention.

The Committee urges the Government to strengthen its efforts to ensure that, during its review of the Employment Act and the Minimum Age (Sea) Act, due consideration is given to the Committee's detailed comments on the discrepancies between national legislation and the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any progress made in the review of these Acts in its next report and invites the Government to consider seeking technical assistance from the ILO.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee expects that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2002)

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020). The Committee proceeded with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the supplementary information received from the Government and the social partners this year, as well as on the basis of the information at its disposal in 2019.

Articles 3(a) and (b), and 7(2)(a) and (b) of the Convention. Sale, trafficking and commercial sexual exploitation of children and effective and time-bound measures to prevent the engagement of children in the worst forms of child labour, to remove them from these forms of child labour and to ensure their rehabilitation and social integration. The Committee previously requested the Government to take immediate and effective measures to ensure the rehabilitation and social integration of child victims of trafficking and commercial sexual exploitation. The Committee also once again requested the Government to ensure that thorough investigations are conducted and robust prosecutions undertaken of persons who employ children in the worst forms of child labour and that sufficiently effective and dissuasive penalties are imposed upon them in practice.

The Committee notes with interest that, in its supplementary information, the Government refers to the adoption of Act No. 30963 of 18 June 2019 which introduces new sections in the Penal Code in order to strengthen the protection afforded to children against sexual exploitation, providing for prison sentences from 10 years to perpetuity (sections 153-H, 153-I and 153-J). It further notes the adoption of Supreme Decree No. 009-2019-MIMP of 10 April 2019 on the guidelines for the elaboration of an individual reintegration plan for victims of trafficking which provides guidance on the procedures that should be followed by the different stakeholders involved, in order to strengthen the assistance provided to victims of trafficking, including child victims. The Committee takes due note of the Government's indication of the adoption of Act No. 30925 of 5 April 2019, which reinforces the establishment of temporary shelters for victims of trafficking in persons and sexual exploitation. It also notes the adoption of Act No. 3082 of 26 June 2018, which sets out the conditions for the entry of girls, boys and young people into shelters to guarantee their protection and safety. The Act also penalizes providers of tourist services in cases where they facilitate or permit the sexual exploitation of children in their establishments or do not report to the competent authority acts related to the sexual exploitation of children. The Committee also notes the two decisions adopted by the Ministry of Foreign Trade and Tourism: the first decision (No. 430-2018-MINCETUR) approves a code of conduct to combat the sexual exploitation of girls, boys and young people in the field of tourism, intended for providers of tourist services; the second decision (No. 299-2018-MINCETUR) concerns the content of posters to be placed in tourist establishments which shall contain information relating to sexual exploitation, as well as the legal provisions establishing criminal penalties for offences related to the sexual exploitation in the tourism sector of girls, boys and young persons.

The Committee notes the executive report of the Information Department of judicial authorities specializing in organized crime and in the crime of trafficking in persons. This report indicates that 42 per cent of the victims of trafficking are children and that exploitation through labour and sexual exploitation were the main types of trafficking between 2016 and 2019. During this period, there were 77 child victims of trafficking, aged between 0 and 5 years, 256 child victims of trafficking aged between 6 and 11 years and 1,435 child victims of trafficking aged between 12 and 17 years. The Committee also notes that, according to the information systems of the Office of the Public Prosecutor, a total of 163 complaints were registered in 2018 by the judicial authorities in the various provinces of the country concerning crimes relating to the sexual exploitation of children. In its supplementary information, the Government adds that in, 2019, the Directorate for the Investigation of Trafficking in Persons and Smuggling of Migrants of the National Police (DIRCTPTIM PNP) identified 222 child victims of trafficking (146 girls and 76 boys).

The Committee notes the action taken for the psychosocial support of victims of trafficking for sexual exploitation in emergency centres for women, within the framework of the National Programme to Combat Family and Sexual Violence of the Ministry of Women and Vulnerable Peoples. The emergency centres for women also provide support for legal procedures to facilitate access to justice, the imposition of penalties on aggressors and the compensation of victims. Between January and April 2019, a total of 23 girls under 18 years of age who were victims of sexual exploitation benefited from the emergency centres for women. The Protection Department of the General Directorate for Girls, Boys and Young People also offers immediate support for child victims of trafficking through the establishment of 17 special protection units throughout the country. The Committee notes that, in its supplementary information, the Government indicates that in 2019, the specialized teams of the special protection units provided support for 219 child victims of trafficking (167 girls and 52 boys) and, between January and May 2020, the special protection units have supported 34 child victims of trafficking (30 girls and four boys). The regions of Lima and Madre de Dios also have residential centres for girls and young persons who are victims of trafficking in persons. These centres provide individual and adapted care according to the needs of the victims and have multidisciplinary teams which take action with a view to family reintegration when that contributes to the welfare of the victim. Between January and March 2019, the centres provided support for 84 young victims of trafficking in persons. Finally, the Committee notes that the Government has trained 607 operators for the residential centres from areas with high rates of sexual exploitation, and 153 operators in referral hospitals in Lima specializing in the issue of the sexual exploitation of girls, boys and young people. The Committee notes that, in their observations, the Autonomous Workers' Confederation of Peru (CATP), the Confederation of Workers of Peru (CTP), the General Confederation of Workers of Peru (CGTP), and the Single Confederation of Workers of Peru (CUT-Perú) express concern about the lack of measures implemented by the Government to ensure the social integration of child victims of trafficking and commercial sexual exploitation. While noting the efforts made by the Government to ensure that support is provided for child victims of trafficking and commercial sexual exploitation, the Committee once again requests the Government to ensure that thorough investigations and prosecutions are carried out on persons engaging in such acts and that sufficiently effective and dissuasive sanctions are imposed in practice. It once again requests the Government to provide information on the number of convictions and penalties imposed against such persons. It also requests the Government to continue to take measures to remove and provide assistance to child victims of trafficking and to continue to provide information on the number of child victims who have benefitted from such assistance.

Articles 3(d) and 7(2)(a) and (b). Hazardous types of work and effective and time-bound measures to prevent the engagement of children in the worst forms of child labour, to remove them from these forms of child labour and to ensure their rehabilitation and social integration. 1. Child labour in artisanal mines. The Committee previously requested the Government to intensify its efforts to protect children involved in hazardous work in mines. It also requested the Government to provide information on the measures adopted and the results achieved in the context of the implementation of the National Strategy for the Prevention and Eradication of Child Labour 2012–21 (ENPETI) for the withdrawal of children under 18 years of age from hazardous work in artisanal mines and for their rehabilitation and social integration.

The Committee notes from the Government's report the approval of the second version, of 7 May 2019, of the action protocol for the group of labour inspectors specializing in forced labour and child labour. The new version of the protocol gives priority to strengthening the capacities of inspectors in relation to the worst forms of child labour and also promotes collaboration between the National Supervisory Authority of Labour Inspection (SUNAFIL), the national police, the Offices of the Public Prosecutor and of the Attorney-General, and the Office of the Defender of the People, in accordance with their specific areas of competence. In that regard, the Committee notes that, in their observations, the CATP, CTP, CGTP and CUT-Perú express concern about the lack of inspection activities carried out by the SUNAFIL in the mining and quarrying sector in order to prevent child labour.

As regards the authorization of work by young people, the Committee notes that, in its supplementary information, the Government refers to the adoption of Supreme Decree No. 18-2020-TR of 25 August 2020 which establishes the administrative procedure for prior authorization of young persons to work as employees or under a dependency relationship. Regional labour departments will have to carry out an evaluation of the activities involved and the arrangements for work by young people before granting an authorization. This evaluation will also serve as a basic register for the labour inspection activities of the SUNAFIL in relation to employers who engage young persons in work. However, the Committee notes with concern that the Government has not provided information on the protection of children engaged in hazardous work in mines. In this respect, the Committee once again requests the Government to provide information on the measures adopted and the results achieved, in the context of the implementation of the ENPETI and multisectoral action to remove children under 18 years of age from hazardous work in artisanal mines and to ensure their rehabilitation and social integration. It also requests the Government to provide information on the number and outcome of inspections carried out by the SUNAFIL in the mining and quarrying sector, including as a result of the action protocol of 2019.

2. Child domestic labour. The Committee previously requested the Government to take the necessary measures to strengthen the capacity for action of the labour inspection services to prevent children engaged in domestic work from being involved in hazardous types of work, to remove them from such work and ensure their rehabilitation and social integration. It also once again requested the Government to provide information on the results achieved.

The Committee notes that the Government is currently engaged in reinforcing the capacity for action of labour inspection services through the new version of the action protocol for the group of labour inspectors specializing in forced labour and child labour.

The Committee also notes that, since the beginning of 2019, only one labour inspection compliance order was issued to verify compliance with the regulations on child labour in the household work sector. In its supplementary information, the Government indicates that such order resulted in the elaboration of a labour inspection report, resulting in the case being closed. In that regard, the Committee notes that, in their observations, the CATP, CTP, CGTP and CUT-Perú express concern at the low number of labour inspection orders issued regarding child labour in the household work sector, and highlight that the actions of labour inspectors should focus on awareness-raising and capacity-building of all stakeholders involved. The Committee once again urges the Government to take the necessary measures to strengthen the capacity for action of the labour inspection services to prevent children engaged in domestic work from being involved in hazardous types of work, to remove them from such types of work and ensure their rehabilitation and social integration. It also requests the Government to provide information on the results achieved.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Philippines

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 1998)

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020). The Committee proceeded with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the supplementary information received from the Government (see paragraph concerning the application of the Convention in practice) as well as on the basis of the information at its disposal in 2019.

Article 2(1) of the Convention. Scope of application. Children working on their own account or in the informal economy. The Committee previously noted the results achieved following the implementation of the Campaign for Child Labor-Free Barangays, such as bringing the total number of child labour free barangays (villages) to 213 and removing a total of 7,584 children from child labour and placing them in schools. The Committee however, noted from the country report "Understanding child labour and youth employment outcomes in the Philippines, December 2015", (UCW 2015 report), that child labour in the Philippines continues to affect an estimated 2.1 million children aged 5–17 years of which 62 per cent work in agriculture, about 6 per cent are self-employed and an additional 3 per cent work in private households, most likely as domestic workers. The Committee requested to pursue its efforts to ensure that children working in the informal economy or on a self-employed basis benefit from the protection of the Convention.

The Committee notes the Government's information in its report that as of December 2018, a total of 348 barangays have been declared as child labour-free by the Department of Labour and Employment (DOLE), while in June 2016, the Municipality of Angono was recognized as the first child labour-free municipality. The Committee also notes the Government's information regarding the various orders issued through DOLE to combat child labour, such as: (i) the Department Order No. 173 of 2017 on the Revised Guidelines in the implementation of DOLE Integrated Livelihood and Emergency Employment Programmes (DILEEP) which provides that the beneficiaries of livelihood programs shall not be engaged in child labour; (ii) the Department Order No. 175 of 2017 on the Implementing Rules and Regulations of Republic Act No. 10917 which provides that the beneficiaries of the Special Progam for Employment of Students shall not be engaged in hazardous work; (iii) the Department Order No. 159 of 2016 which contains provisions prohibiting child labour in the sugar cane industry; and (iv) the Department Order No. 156 of 2016 on the Rules and Regulations Governing the Working and Living conditions of fishers on board fishing vessels in Commercial Fishing Operations which provides for penalties for engaging child labour in this sector. The Committee further notes from the Government's report that one of the aims of the proposed amendments to the Republic Act of 9231 is to address child labour in the informal sector. Noting that a high number of children are involved in child labour in the informal sector, the Committee requests the Government to intensify its efforts to ensure that children working in the informal economy or on a self-employed basis benefit from the protection afforded by the Convention. It requests the Government to continue to provide information on the measures taken in this regard as well as the results achieved, in terms of the number of these children who are effectively protected and provided with the appropriate services, in particular following the adoption of the above-mentioned ordinance.

Application of the Convention in practice. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the Government developed the HELP ME Convergence Program as a sustainable and responsive convergence programme to address child labour. It also noted that the ABK3 LEAP project (implemented by World Vision to combat exploitative child labour in the sugar cane sector through education) had achieved significant results in eliminating child labour through providing assistance and educational and livelihood support to children. The Committee requested the Government to strengthen its efforts, including through the effective implementation of the HELP ME Convergence Program, to progressively eliminate child labour.

The Committee notes the Government's information that in 2017, the Government, in collaboration with the ILO, launched several programmes to eliminate child labour, such as the Convening Actors to Reduce Child Labour and Improve Working Conditions in Artisanal and Small-Scale Gold Mining (ASGM), the CARING Gold Mining project and the SHIELD Against Child Labour project. According to the Government's report, the CARING Gold Mining project which seeks to address the problem of poverty in ASGM is piloted in Camarines Norte and South Cotabato. As of July 2019, 66 children were removed from child labour through this project. Moreover, the SHIELD Against Child Labour project which aims to eliminate child labour and its worst forms, particularly in small-scale gold mining, deep sea fishing and sugar cane industry is being implemented in four regions. In 2018, with the support of ILO, a Child Labour Local Registry (CLLR) was developed which will be used at the barangay level to serve as a repository of data of child labourers. The Committee notes the Government's information that within the framework of this project, a total of 596 children were identified as child labourers, of which 380 children were removed from child labour and provided with the necessary assistance. The Committee further notes the Government's information in its supplementary report that following the implementation of the Administrative Order No. 142 of 2018 on Guidelines on the Profiling of Child Labourers and Provisions of Services to Remove them from Child Labour, the DOLE, through its 16 regional offices, conducted the profiling of child labourers by tapping Government Internship Program (GIP) beneficiaries to locate, identify and remove children from child labour and to provide them with necessary services. In this regard, the Committee notes that from 2018-2019, a total of 275,614 child labourers were identified, of which 18,151 children were provided with necessary services and 202,236 children were referred for the provision of necessary services. In order to fast track the referral of identified child labourers and assess their needs, the DOLE hired 301 project-based community facilitators who were assigned to its 16 regional offices and 92 field offices. Moreover, a Revised Guideline which superseded the Order No 142 was issued through Administrative Order No. 579 of 2019, according to which child labourers identified shall be monitored at least once every six months to track their progress. The Government further indicates that for 2020, the DOLE aimed to identify and remove 175,000 children from child labour and hire 2,500 GIP beneficiaries. However, due to the declaration of state of National Emergency in the country due to the COVID-19 pandemic, the identification of children has been suspended for a year.

The Government further indicates that within the Livelihood Assistance to Parents of Child Labourers Program, up to 2018, a total of 32,507 parents of child labourers and in 2019, 3,533 parents of child labourers were provided with livelihood assistance. Furthermore, the Sagip Batang Manggagawa Quick Action Teams (SBM QATS), an inter-agency mechanism to monitor and rescue children from child labour, conducted a total of 955 rescue operations until 2018, wherein a total of 3,565 child labourers were removed from hazardous and exploitative working conditions. In 2019, the SBM QATS conducted 19 rescue operations and removed 44 children from hazardous and exploitative conditions. The Project Angel Tree provided assistance, including school supplies, to a total of 72,440 children involved in child labour or children who are at risk of engaging in child labour.

The Committee also notes from the Government's report under the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) that the National Child Labour Committee which is the central policy and coordinating mechanism for the implementation of the Philippine Program Against Child Labor agreed to target one million children to be withdrawn from child labour by 2025. The Committee further notes the detailed information provided by the Government on the progress made in the implementation of the Philippine Program Against Child Labour Strategic Framework for 2017-2022. Accordingly within the framework of this strategy: (i) a National Council Against Child Labour, which replaced the National Child Labour Committee was established to coordinate the prevention and elimination of child labour in the Philippines; (ii) financial support was strengthened for programs supporting withdrawal of children from hazardous work; (iii) anti-child labour laws were improved and enforced at the national and local levels; (iv) access of child labourers and their families to social protection, health, education and decent work was expanded; (v) generation, dissemination and use of knowledge on child labour among stakeholders, policy makers and program implementers was improved; and (vi) a national child labour monitoring and evaluation system was established and maintained.

The Committee, however, notes that the United Nations Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, in its concluding observations of October 2016, reiterated its concern that an estimated 1.5 million children between the ages of 5 and 14 are engaged in child labour and that half of them are working in hazardous or dangerous conditions and are exposed to various forms of exploitation (E/C.12/PHL/CO/5–6, paragraph 37). While taking note of the measures taken by the Government to combat child labour, the Committee must express its concern that there remains a significant number of children engaged in child labour, particularly in hazardous conditions in the country. The Committee therefore urges the Government to strengthen its efforts to progressively eliminate child labour. It requests the Government to continue to provide information on the measures taken in this regard, including within the framework of the Philippine Program Against Child Labor and on the results achieved.

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2000)

Articles 3 and 7(1) of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour and penalties. Clause (a). All forms of slavery or practices similar to slavery. 1. Sale and trafficking of children. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the measures taken by the various Government departments and the Inter-Agency Council Against Trafficking (IACAT) to address cases related to trafficking of children. It requested the Government to continue its efforts to strengthen the capacity of law enforcement agencies in identifying and combating the sale and trafficking of children under 18 years of age.

The Committee notes the Government's information in its report that the Department of Labor and Employment (DOLE) issued Administrative Order No. 551 of 2018 for the Creation of the DOLE Task Force Against Illegal Recruitment, Recruitment of Minor Workers, and Trafficking in Persons to have more focused, concerted, coordinated and effective programmes of action to combat the illegal recruitment and trafficking of children. It also notes the Government's information on the number of orientation and awareness-raising activities undertaken by the DOLE concerning the worst forms of child labour. Moreover, in October 2017, DOLE participated in a workshop conducted by the IACAT and the Australia–Asia Program to Combat Trafficking in Persons on identifying, investigating and prosecuting cases of trafficking of persons for labour exploitation. In April 2017, a Child Protection Compact Partnership (CPC Partnership) was signed by the IACAT and the US Embassy to support Philippines' campaign against trafficking of children. The Committee notes the Government's information in its supplementary report that a total of 123 law enforcement officials were trained under the CPC partnership on various topics including Anti-trafficking in Persons Special Investigations Field Training. According to the Government's report, from September 2017 to September 2019, a total of 44 rescue operations were conducted under the CPC partnership, during which 125 minors were rescued.

The Committee further notes from the Government's report that Republic Act No. 10821 which was adopted in May 2016, provides that upon declaration of a national and local state of calamity, the Philippine National Police, the Department of Social Welfare and Development, with the assistance from the Armed Forces shall immediately heighten comprehensive measures and monitoring to prevent trafficking of children and their exploitation in the areas declared under a state of calamity. Furthermore, the Anti-Trafficking in Persons Act of 2012 was expanded through Republic Act No 10364 entitled "Expanded Anti-Trafficking in Persons Act of 2012", to institute policies to eliminate trafficking in persons especially, women and children, establishing the necessary institutional mechanisms for the protection and support of trafficked persons, and providing penalties for its violation. The Committee notes that according to section 4A of the Expanded Anti-trafficking in Persons Act of 2012, attempted trafficking of persons, where there are acts to initiate the commission of a trafficking offence but the offender failed or did not execute all the elements of the crime, shall be punished. In the case of a child, attempted trafficking involves various acts including facilitating the travel of a child who travels alone to a foreign country without valid reason; required clearance or permit, or a permit from the parents; executing an affidavit of consent or a written consent for adoption; as well as acts to solicit or acquire a child for the purpose of selling.

The Committee, however, notes from the UNICEF 2016 Summary Report on Situation Analysis of Children in the Philippines that domestic and cross-border trafficking of women and children for sexual exploitation continues, with 1,465 victims of trafficking identified and assisted in 2015, and that sex tourism is reportedly on the rise. Furthermore, the Committee notes that the United Nations Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, in its concluding observations of October 2016, expressed concern at the persistently high incidence of trafficking in women and children; the very small number of prosecutions and convictions of traffickers; the insufficient level of understanding of the issues relating to trafficking and the anti-trafficking legal framework among law enforcement officials; and the allegations of complicity of law enforcement officials in the cases related to trafficking of persons (E/C.12/PHL/CO/5–6, paragraph 41). While noting the measures taken by the Government, the Committee urges it to intensify its efforts to eliminate in practice the trafficking of children by ensuring that thorough investigations and prosecutions are carried out for persons who engage in the trafficking of children, including state officials suspected of complicity, and that sufficiently effective and dissuasive sanctions are imposed. It requests the Government to pursue its efforts to strengthen the capacity of law enforcement agencies in identifying and combating the sale and trafficking of children under 18 years of age. The Committee further requests the Government to provide information on the number of reported violations, investigations, prosecutions, convictions and penal sanctions imposed in cases related to the trafficking of children as well as for the offences related to attempted trafficking in children under the Extended Anti-trafficking Act of 2012.

2. Compulsory recruitment of children for use in armed conflict. The Committee previously noted the adoption of Executive Order No. 138 on a Comprehensive Programme Framework for Children in Armed Conflict, which calls on the national agencies and local government units affected by armed conflict to integrate the implementation of the Children in Armed Conflict (CIAC) programme framework. The CIAC programme includes developing, strengthening and enhancing policies to promote the protection and prevention of children in armed conflict. It also noted from a report of the United Nations Office of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General for Children and Armed Conflict of 2016 that the majority of the benchmarks established in the action plan aimed at ending the recruitment and use of child soldiers, which was signed between the United Nations and the Moro Islamic Liberation Front (MILF) in 2009, had been reached and that the Moro Islamic Liberation Front was implementing a four-step process to identify and release all children associated with the military. However, noting from the Report of the Secretary-General on Children and Armed Conflict of April 2016 that children continued to be recruited by armed forces and groups, the Committee urged the Government to intensify its efforts to put an end, in practice, to the forced or compulsory recruitment of children for use in armed conflict, and proceed with the full and immediate demobilization of all children.

The Committee notes the Government's information that in January 2018, the President signed Republic Act No. 11188 on the Special Protection of Children in Situations of Armed Conflict and Providing Penalties for Violations Thereof. This Act requires the State to take all feasible measures to prevent the recruitment, re- recruitment, use, displacement of, or grave violations of the rights of children involved in armed conflict. It notes the Government's information that in order to effectively implement the provisions of Act No. 11188, an Inter-Agency Committee on Children in Situations of Armed Conflict (IAC-CSAC), chaired by the Council for the Welfare of Children (CWC) and comprising representatives from various government organisations, has been created. The functions of the IAC-CSAC include, formulating guidelines and developing programmes in coordination with concerned agencies, for dealing with children involved in armed conflict and monitoring and documenting cases of capture, surrender, arrest, rescue or recovery by government forces. In this regard, the Committee notes the Government's information that the CWC and the IAC-CSAC, in consultation with the UNICEF Philippines and the Philippine Legislators' Committee adopted in June 2019, the Implementing Rules and Regulations (IRR) for the Republic Act No.11188.

The Committee also notes from the 2017 UNICEF report Children in Armed Conflict: Philippines that the implementation of the UN–MILF Action Plan ended in July 2017 with the disengagement of nearly 2,000 children from the ranks of the MILF–Bangsamoro Islamic Armed Forces (BIAF). However, the Committee notes that the report of the Secretary-General on children and armed conflict of June 2019, referred to the recruitment and use of 19 children (ten boys and nine girls); 18 by armed groups and one by the armed forces. The United Nations also received additional allegations of recruitment and use of 13 children by the armed groups, such as the New People's Army, Maute Group and the Abu Sayyaf Group. While taking note of the measures taken by the Government, the Committee must express its concern at the continued use and recruitment of children by armed forces and groups. The Committee therefore urges the Government to continue to take the necessary measures to ensure the full and immediate demobilization of all children and to put a stop, in practice, to the forced recruitment of children under 18 years of age into the armed forces and armed groups, including through the effective implementation of Republic Act No. 11188 and its Implementing Rules and Regulations. The Committee also urges the Government to take immediate and effective measures to ensure that thorough investigations and prosecutions of all persons who forcibly recruit children under 18 years of age for use in armed conflict are carried out, and that sufficiently effective and dissuasive penalties are imposed in practice.

Articles 3(b) and 7(2)(a) and (b). Use, procuring or offering of children for the production of pornography or for pornographic performances. Preventing children from being engaged in the worst forms of child labour, removing them from these forms of labour and ensuring their rehabilitation and reintegration. Commercial sexual exploitation of children. The Committee notes that the Anti-Child Pornography Act of 2009 provides for the protection of children under 18 years of age from all forms of exploitation and abuse including the use of a child in pornographic performances and materials and the inducement or coercion of a child to engage or be involved in pornography through whatever means (section 2). Section 4 of the Act further prohibits a wide range of offences related to using, hiring, inducing or coercing children for the production of child pornography, and its publication, possession, distribution, and accessing of child pornography while providing for penalties of maximum imprisonment and fines to the perpetrators of such offences (section 14). The Committee noted that according to the UNICEF Summary Report of 2016 on Situation Analysis of Children in the Philippines, cyber violence has emerged as a serious threat and that the new technologies put children at risk of online sexual solicitation and grooming. The number of children coerced, often by relatives, to perform sex acts for live streaming on the internet has increased making online child abuse the leading cybercrime in the country. This report further states that the Philippines is one of the top ten countries globally producing sexual content using children.

The Committee notes the Government's information that an initiative entitled SaferKidsPH, spearheaded by the Australian Government and delivered through Save the Children, the Asia Foundation and the UNICEF was launched in October 2019. This initiative aims to create a safer environment for children where the Government and other stakeholders play an active role in: (i) adopting positive behaviour towards protection of children from online abuse and exploitation; (ii) strengthening investigation, prosecution and adjudication of Online Sexual Abuse and Exploitation of Children (OSAEC) cases consistent with national legislation; and (iii) improving service delivery for prevention and protection of children against online sexual abuse and exploitation in OSAEC hotspots. Moreover, a study on online sexual exploitation of children in the Philippines was conducted by the Government in partnership with the International Justice Mission and its findings were presented to the public. The Government report further indicates that in 2018, the Philippine National Police-Anti Cybercrime Group recorded 59 cases of child pornography in 2018 and 11 cases in the first quarter of 2019. In 2018, the Department of Justice Office of Cybercrime recorded 579,006 cyber tips for the online sharing, re-sharing and selling of child sexual images and videos and in 2019, 418,422 such cyber tips were recorded. Moreover, from January to August 2020, a total of seven cases were filed against syndicated crime groups and individual offenders of child pornography who have been arrested and brought to the jurisdiction of the courts.

The Committee further notes that according to a document by the International Organization for Migration, entitled Human Trafficking Snapshot, Philippines, September 2018, indicates that there are tens of thousands of children being exploited and abused in cybersex dens across the Philippines. The Committee notes with deep concern at the significant number of children who are subject to commercial sexual exploitation in the Philippines and the low number of prosecutions and convictions in this regard. The Committee therefore urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the effective enforcement of the Anti-Child Pornography Act, by ensuring that thorough investigations and prosecutions of persons who use children in the production of pornography and in pornographic performances are carried out and that sufficiently effective and dissuasive sanctions are imposed in practice. It also urges the Government to take immediate and effective time-bound measures to prevent the engagement of children in commercial sexual exploitation as well as to remove those who are victims of such forms of child labour and to provide for their rehabilitation and social reintegration. It requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken in this regard and on the results achieved.

Articles 3(d), 4(1) and 7(2)(b). Hazardous work and time-bound measures to provide direct assistance for their removal and rehabilitation and social integration. Child domestic workers. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the International Trade Union Confederation's (ITUC) allegations that there were at least 1 million children under the age of 18 years in domestic work, some of whom were subject to slavery-like practices or working in harmful and hazardous conditions, while some of them, especially girls, suffered physical, psychological and sexual abuses and injuries. In this regard, the Committee noted the adoption of Republic Act No. 10361 which provides for instituting policies for the protection and welfare of domestic workers as well as setting the minimum age for employment in domestic work at 15 years. It also noted that a road map for the elimination of child labour in domestic work and the provision of adequate protection for young domestic workers of legal working age was adopted and a Joint Memorandum Circular (JMC) on the Protocol on the Rescue and Rehabilitation of Abused Kasambahay (domestic workers) was signed by the DOLE, the Department of Social Welfare and Development, the National Bureau of Investigation and the Philippine National Police. The Committee urged the Government to strengthen its efforts to ensure the effective implementation of Republic Act No. 10361, to provide information on the implementation of the road map for the elimination of child labour in domestic work as well as the measures taken to rescue and rehabilitate abused domestic workers following the JMC on the Protocol on the Rescue and Rehabilitation of Abused Kasambahay.

The Committee notes the Government's information that in July 2017, the DOLE issued an Administrative Order which provides for guidelines for the effective enforcement of the rights of domestic workers under Republic Act No.10361 as well as on the terms and conditions of employment of children under Republic Act No.9231. It also notes the Government's information that DOLE, with support from ILO, conducted training for 35 DOLE personnel to enhance their capacity in detecting and assessing child labour incidents. In 2017, the Bureau of Workers with Special Concerns (BWSC) conducted capacity enhancement training for regional kasambahay focal persons in addressing the vulnerability of domestic workers. However, the Committee notes from the 2018 ILO document on Social Dialogue to Achieve Sustainable Development Goals: Formalising the Informal Economy, Country Brief, Philippines that domestic work is the largest single source of wage employment for women as well as for young workers. The Committee therefore strongly encourages the Government to strengthen its efforts to prevent children under 18 years from engaging in hazardous working conditions in domestic work, including through the effective implementation of the road map for the elimination of child labour. It requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken in this regard as well as on the results achieved in terms of the number of child domestic workers who have been protected or withdrawn from child labour and rehabilitated. It also urges the Government to strengthen its efforts to ensure that Republic Act No. 10361 is effectively applied and that sufficiently effective and dissuasive penalties are imposed in practice on persons who subject children under 18 years of age to domestic work in hazardous or exploitative conditions.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 1979)

Article 2(1) of the Convention. Scope of application and labour inspectorate. Children working in the informal economy. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that section 63(1) of the Labour Code prohibits children under 16 years of age from signing an employment contract. It also noted the Government's statement that the illegal employment of minors and the violation of their labour rights were frequent occurrences in the informal economy. Following its repeated requests since 2003, the Committee urged the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that all children under 16 years of age, including those who work on their own account or in the informal economy, benefit from the protection afforded by the Convention.

The Committee notes with concern that, according to the Government's indication in its report, no information is available on measures taken regarding the protection of children under 16 years old in the informal economy. The Committee also notes that the Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights expressed its concern at widespread informal employment in the Russian Federation in its concluding observations of 2017 (E/C.12/RUS/CO/6, paragraph 32). The Committee recalls that the Convention applies to all branches of economic activity and covers all types of employment or work, whether or not there is a contractual employment relationship, and whether or not the employment or work is paid. In this regard, the Committee is of the view that the expansion of the relevant monitoring mechanisms to the informal economy can be an important manner in which to ensure that the Convention is applied in practice, particularly in countries where expanding the scope of the implementing legislation to address children working in this sector does not seem a practicable solution (2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 345). The Committee once again urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that all children under 16 years of age, including those who work on their own account or in the informal economy, benefit from the protection afforded by the Convention. In this regard, the Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to strengthen the capacity and expand the reach of the labour inspectorate to better monitor children carrying out economic activities without an employment relationship or in the informal economy. It once again requests the Government to provide information on the specific measures taken in this regard as well as on their implementation.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2003)

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (a). Sale and trafficking of children. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that while child trafficking is prohibited by law (section 127.1 of the Criminal Code), it remains a source of serious concern in practice. In this regard, the Committee requested the Government to pursue its efforts to ensure the elimination of the sale and trafficking of children and young persons under 18 years of age in practice, and requested the Government to provide information on the number of reported violations, investigations, prosecutions, convictions and penalties imposed related to the sale and trafficking of children.

The Committee notes the repeated indication in the Government's report on the criminalization of trafficking in persons by the Criminal Code and the administrative responsibility of legal entities provided by the Code of Administrative offences, as introduced by Federal Act No. 58-FZ of 2013. It also notes the statistical information provided by the Government regarding the cases of trafficking in persons, slave labour and prostitution, which, however, does not reflect the situation of cases involving child victims. The Committee also notes that, according to the information provided in the Government's report under the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29), in March 2018, two members of an organized group were detained at Domodedovo International Airport while transferring money in the amount of 1.5 million Russian rubles (approximately US$19,650) for the sale of a minor for the purpose of further prostitution in the Republic of Turkey. Criminal proceedings were instituted against the participants on the grounds of an offence under article 127.1, paragraph 1, of the Criminal Code. Moreover, in 2018, measures were also taken to combat illegal migration and crimes related to the exploitation of women and children, among others. As a result, 76 cases of exploitation of women and children were detected. The Committee thus requests the Government to provide concrete information on specific measures taken in practice by the law enforcement authorities, to ensure that thorough investigations and prosecutions of persons who engage in the sale and trafficking of children are carried out and that sufficiently effective and dissuasive penalties are imposed. It once again requests the Government to provide information on the number of reported violations, investigations, prosecutions, convictions and penalties imposed related to the sale and trafficking of children.

Article 7(2). Effective and time-bound measures. Clause (b). Direct assistance for the removal of children from the worst forms of child labour and for their rehabilitation and social integration. The Committee previously noted that the Programme of Cooperation for 2014–18 among the member States of the Commonwealth of Independent States (CIS) contains a set of measures to combat human trafficking and assist victims. The Committee requested the Government to strengthen its efforts to provide for the removal, rehabilitation and social reintegration of child victims of trafficking. It also requested the Government to provide information on the concrete measures taken to provide assistance to child victims of trafficking and the results achieved in terms of the number of children who have been provided with assistance, particularly within the framework of the Programme of Cooperation of the CIS.

The Committee notes the Government's information that Government Decision No. 1272 of 25 October 2018 approved the State Programme to Ensure the Safety of Victims, Witnesses and Other Participants in Criminal Proceedings 2019–23, aimed at ensuring the safety of persons participating in criminal proceedings. The Government also indicates that Act No. 119-FZ of 20 August 2004 on the State Protection of Victims, Witnesses and Other Participants in Criminal Proceedings provides the legislative basis in this regard. However, there is no information on concrete measures to provide direct assistance to victims of worst forms of child labour. The Committee once again requests the Government to strengthen its efforts to provide for the removal, rehabilitation and social reintegration of child victims of trafficking. It also requests the Government to provide detailed information on the concrete measures taken to provide assistance to child victims of trafficking and the results achieved in terms of the number of children who have been provided with such assistance

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Saint Vincent and the Grenadines

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2001)

The Committee notes with deep concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments. The Committee informs the Government that, if it has not supplied replies to the points raised by 1 September 2021, then it may proceed with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the information at its disposal at its next session.

Articles 3(d) and 4(1). Hazardous work. The Committee previously noted that the Employment of Women, Young Persons and Children Act (EWYPC Act), did not contain a general prohibition on the employment of children below 18 years of age in hazardous work, other than the prohibition on night work in any industrial undertaking (section 3(2)) nor a determination of hazardous types of work prohibited to children under 18 years of age.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that consultation with stakeholders to address the issues related to hazardous work by children will be commenced shortly and a draft report will be prepared by the end of 2013. The Committee expresses the firm hope that consultations with the stakeholders including the social partners will be held in the near future and legislation relating to the prohibition on hazardous work by children under 18 years of age as well as a regulation determining the types of hazardous work prohibited to children under the age of 18 years will be adopted soon. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any developments made in this regard.

Article 7(1). Penalties. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the application in practice of the sanctions established in the Trafficking Act of 2011 for the offences related to the sale and trafficking of children and for the use, procuring and offering of children for prostitution and child pornography.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee expects that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Samoa

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 2008)

Article 2(3) of the Convention. Age of completion of compulsory education. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that section 20 of the Education Act 2009 prohibits arranging for a compulsory school-aged child to engage in street trading or to carry out other work of any kind during school hours. However, the Committee noted that pursuant to section 2 of the Education Act 2009, a compulsory school-aged child is defined as a person between 5 years and 14 years of age, who has not completed the eighth year of school. The Committee noted the Government's statement that the Ministry of Education, Sports and Culture had started consulting with the Office of the Attorney General on the drafting of the revised Education Amendment Bill 2016 in order to raise the age of completion of compulsory schooling to 15 years.

The Committee notes with satisfaction the adoption of the Education Amendment Act of 2019, which in its section 2, has raised the age of completion of compulsory schooling from 14 years to 16 years of age. The Committee further notes that the minimum age for admission to employment remains 15 years according to section 51(1) of the Labour and Employment Relations Act of 2013 (LER Act of 2013). In this regard, in its 2012 General Survey on fundamental conventions paragraph 370, the Committee indicates that "if the minimum age for admission to work or employment is lower than the school-leaving age, children may be encouraged to leave school as children required to attend school may also be legally authorized to work." The Committee therefore encourages the Government to take the necessary measures to raise to 16 the minimum age for admission to employment in order to link it with the age of completion of compulsory schooling in conformity with Article 2(3) of the Convention.

Article 3(2). Determination of types of hazardous work. With regard to the list of hazardous types of work prohibited to children under the age of 18 years, the Committee refers to its detailed comments under the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182).

Article 7(1) and (3). Minimum age for admission to light work and determination of types of light work activities. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that under section 51(1) of the LER Act of 2013, "a person must not employ a child under the age of 15 years in a place of employment except in safe and light work suited to his or her capacity and subject to such conditions as may be determined by the Chief Executive Officer of the Ministry of Labour". The Committee observed, however, that there appeared to be no lower minimum age for engagement in such light work activities. It further noted the Government's statement that a list of light work was being reviewed for children under the age of 15 in accordance with section 51 of the LER Act of 2013 and would be submitted to the Samoa National Tripartite Forum for endorsement.

The Committee notes the Government's indication concerning the revision of the list of light work under the on-going review of the LER Act of 2013. The Committee, however, observes that section 22 of the Labour and Employment Relations Regulations of 2016 (LER Regulations of 2016) sets out limited working hours for children between 12 and 14 years of age. The Committee recalls that Article 7(1) of the Convention provides that national laws or regulations may permit children only from the age of 13 to engage in light work. The Committee therefore strongly urges the Government to take the necessary measures to bring section 22 of the Labour and Employment Relations Regulations of 2016 in line with the Convention by permitting employment in light work only by young people who have reached the age of 13 years. The Committee once again expresses the firm hope that the Government will take the necessary measures to regulate light work activities in compliance with Article 7(3) of the Convention. It further requests the Government to provide information on any progress made in this regard.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2008)

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (b). Use, procuring or offering of a child for the production of pornography or for pornographic performances. The Committee previously noted that section 82 of the Crimes Act 2013, makes it an offence to sell, deliver, exhibit, print, publish, create, produce or distribute any indecent material that depicts a child engaged in sexually explicit conduct. It observed, however, that for the purposes of this section a child is defined as a person under the age of 16 years. The Committee further noted the Government's information that the Ministry of Commerce, Industry and Labour (MCIL), with the technical assistance from the Samoa Technical Facility Project, was carrying out a revision of the national legislation, including the Crimes Act 2013 in order to align the definition of a child with the provisions of the Convention. The Committee requested the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the use, procuring or offering of children between the ages of 16 and 18 years for the production of indecent materials is also effectively prohibited.

The Committee notes with interest the development of the Crimes Amendment Bill 2020, which has revised section 82 of the Crimes Act 2013. The Committee takes note of the Government's indication in its report that the Crimes Amendment Bill will be submitted to the Cabinet for its approval before consideration by the Parliament. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the Government will take the necessary measures to ensure that the Crimes Amendment Bill 2020 is adopted, without delay, so that the prohibition under section 82 of the Crimes Act 2013 on the production and distribution of indecent materials depicting children will include children between 16 and 18 years of age. It further requests the Government to provide information on any progress made in this regard.

Article 4(1). Determination of hazardous types of work. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the Hazardous Work List, which contains a list of types of hazardous work prohibited to children under 18 years, had been approved by the Cabinet in May 2018 and was in the process of being incorporated into the Labour and Employment Relations Regulations. The Committee further noted the Government's information that the list had been reviewed by the National Occupational Safety and Health Task Force and supported by the Samoa National Tripartite Forum. The Government also indicated that the MCIL had included this list in its first National Occupational Safety and Health Framework 2018 to ensure that all stakeholders take ownership in monitoring and reporting of any activities that are in breach of this list.

The Committee takes note of the Government's information that the revised Hazardous Work List is currently pending vetting from the Office of the Attorney General before its submission to the Parliament. The Government also indicates that no cases of hazardous work by children under 18 years have been reported through the National Occupational Safety and Health Framework 2018. The Committee once again expresses the firm hope that the Government will take the necessary measures to ensure that the Hazardous Work List will be enacted and enforced, without further delay. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any progress made in this regard. It also requests the Government to continue to provide information on any cases of hazardous work by children under 18 years that have been reported through the National Occupational Safety and Health Framework.

Article 7(2). Effective and time-bound measures. Clause (d). Reaching out to children at special risk. Children working as street vendors. In its previous comments, the Committee noted various measures taken by the Government to identify and protect children engaged in street vending, including: (i) establishment of a Child Vending Task Force (CVTF), comprised of representatives from the Ministry of Education, Sports and Culture (MESC), the Ministry of Police (MoP), the MCIL, the Office of the Attorney General and the Council of Churches, within the Ministry of Women, Community and Social Development (MWCSD) to address the issues pertaining to children working as street vendors; (ii) initiation of collaborative efforts by the MWCSD and the MoP to monitor and identify exploitation of children in the formal and informal economy, including through regular inspections in the streets of Apia and rural areas; (iii) conducting awareness-raising programmes on the use of children in street vending by the MCIL for employers in Upolu and Savaii, in order to prevent them from employing children under the age of 18 to sell goods and products during school hours; (iv) introduction of the Supporting Children Initiative by the MWCSD in March 2016 for children from vulnerable families, in order to ensure their safety through positive parenting support and providing training and financial assistance to parents for income generation projects; and (v) the initiation of Small Business Youth Incubator for Economic Development which aims to instigate programmes for small businesses and income generation projects for youth, women and vulnerable families. The Committee, however, noted that during the discussion which took place at the 107th Session of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2018, concerning the application by Samoa of the Convention, the Employer members expressed their concern about the prevalence of under 15-year olds exploited as street vendors. Moreover, the Worker members indicated that around 38 per cent of child labour in Samoa was performed by under 15-year olds, which called into question the Government's capacity and commitment to address the worst forms of child labour.

The Committee takes note of the Government's indication that various services, such as counselling, school placement, and financial assistance, are provided to vulnerable families under the Supporting Children Initiative. In particular, 68 children working as street vendors from 18 families are covered under the Supporting Children Initiative and 11 out of these 18 families have been removed from the situation of having children with high to low risk of engagement in the worst forms of child labour. The Government further indicates that in 2018-2019, labour inspectors of the MCIL carried out inspections of 171 business entities and detected no cases violating section 51 of the Labour and Employment Relations Act of 2013, which regulates the employment of children. In addition, the MESC has developed the School Governance Framework, according to which school committees will monitor children engaged in street trading. The Committee further notes from the latest Government's report on the Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) that particular protection can be provided to child street vendors by the MWCSD through its Care Plan and Child Vending Scheme. The Government further indicates that the draft Interagency Guidelines elaborated by the MWCSD address the issues of child street vending. The Committee also takes note of the information provided by the Government that under the SWEEPS Program, inspectors of the MWCSD, in collaboration with the MoP, conduct monthly inspections to prevent child vending in Apia Town Area during school hours. However, the Government indicates that there are issues regarding the implementation of this Program due to challenges of multi-agency coordination. The Committee once again strongly encourages the Government to continue its efforts to identify and protect children engaged in street trading from the worst forms of child labour. It further requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken and the results achieved in this regard, particularly on the number of child street vendors who have been removed from the worst forms of child labour and provided with assistance.

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 2014)

The Committee notes the supplementary information provided by the Government on matters raised in the Direct Request addressed to it, and otherwise reiterates the content of its observation adopted in 2019 and reproduced below.

Article 2(3) of the Convention. Age of completion of compulsory schooling. The Committee previously noted that section 162 of the Labour Law and section 34 of its implementing regulation establish that the minimum age for admission to employment or work is 15 years. However, noting that children entered school at the age of 6 and completed the compulsory education at the age of 12, the Committee requested the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure compulsory education up to the minimum age for admission to employment or work of 15 years.

The Committee notes with satisfaction the adoption of Ministerial Decision No. 14 of 2014 which, read jointly with Ministerial Decision No. 139 of 2004, establishes the age of compulsory education up to 15 years, in line with the minimum age for admission to employment. The Committee also notes that according to the UNESCO Institute for Statistics the net enrolment rate in primary school reached 99.77 per cent in 2018 in comparison to 96.42 per cent in 2014. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the application in practice of Ministerial Decision No. 14 of 2014, including statistical information on the school enrolment and attendance rates in both primary and secondary education.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2000)

The Committee notes that the Government's report contains no reply to its previous comments. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments.

The Committee notes the observations of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), received on 1 September 2019, and the Government's reply to these observations.

Article 3(a) of the Convention. Sale and trafficking of children for economic exploitation and forced labour. Begging. Legislation. In its previous comments, the Committee noted with concern that, although section 3 of Act No. 2005-06 of 29 April 2005 to combat trafficking in persons and similar practices and to protect victims prohibits the organization for economic gain of begging by others, or the employment, procuring or deception of any person with a view to causing that person to engage in begging, or the exertion of pressure so that the person engages in begging or continues to beg, section 245 of the Penal Code provides that "the act of seeking alms on days, in places and under conditions established by religious traditions does not constitute the act of begging". The Committee observed that a joint reading of these two provisions made it appear that the act of organizing begging by talibé children cannot be criminalized, as it does not constitute an act of begging under section 245 of the Penal Code. It therefore urged the Government to intensify its efforts to ensure the adoption of the various draft legal texts intended to prohibit and eliminate begging by talibé children, to protect them against sale, trafficking and forced or compulsory labour and to ensure their rehabilitation and social integration. The Committee also took due note of the draft Children's Code and draft regulations of daaras (Koranic schools), but observed that they had been under preparation and consultation for several years. It therefore requested the Government to intensify its efforts to ensure the adoption of the various draft legal texts intended to prohibit and eliminate begging by talibé children.

The Committee notes with deep concern the Government's indication that the legislative reform that has been announced is still under way. While reaffirming its commitment to combat any form of forced labour and trafficking in persons, particularly involving children, the Government indicates that the Bill establishing the status of daaras was adopted by the Council of Ministers on 6 June 2018 and is waiting to be passed by the National Assembly. Moreover, the Unit to Combat Trafficking in Persons (CNLTP), following its evaluation of Act No. 2005-06 of 10 May 2005 to combat trafficking in persons and protect victims, has prepared a draft reform which has been submitted for adoption and takes into account technical conformity and effective enforcement. In light of the above, the Committee expects that the Government will be able to report without delay on the adoption of the various draft texts intended to prohibit and eliminate begging by talibé children and to protect them against sale and trafficking or forced or compulsory labour. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the progress achieved in this regard.

Article 7(1). Penalties and application in practice. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the number of talibé children compelled to engage in begging, most of whom are boys aged between 4 and 12 years, was estimated at 50,000. It expressed its deep concern at the persistence of the phenomenon of the economic exploitation of talibé children and the low number of prosecutions under section 3 of Act No. 2005-06 and urged the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the enforcement of this provision in practice. Furthermore, it noted with regret the absence of data on the number of prosecutions, convictions and penalties imposed under the terms of Act No. 2005-06 and requested the Government to provide such data.

The Committee notes the indication by the ITUC that in 2019 it is estimated that in Senegal over 100,000 talibé children are compelled to engage in begging. In Dakar alone, almost 30,000 children are compelled to engage in begging. A study undertaken in 2017 identified over 14,800 child victims of forced begging in Saint-Louis and revealed that 187 of the 197 daaras in the city send children to beg for at least part of the day. A total of 1,547 children, of whom 1,089 were talibé, were removed from the streets of Dakar between June 2016 and March 2017 during the first phase of the "removal" programme. However, of the children reported to have been "removed", 1,006 were returned to the supervision of their Koranic masters, who had themselves subjected them to forced begging, and who in turn sent them back to the daaras. The number of children engaged in begging in Dakar only decreased during the first month of the programme, as the Koranic masters feared possible sanctions. After a few months, faced with the failure of the investigation and the prosecution of the offending masters, the situation returned to the status quo. Although the second phase of the programme is not repeating certain of the errors of the first phase and guarantees the return of the children to their parents, the programme is not managing to ensure that justice is applied against the Koranic masters who forced the children to beg. The ITUC indicates that, despite the generalized and visible nature of the abuses, investigations and prosecutions are extremely rare. No Koranic master has been subjected to the investigation by the police of his daara, had his case referred to the judicial system, been arrested or prosecuted for having forced talibé children to engage in begging during the first year of the "removal" programme. The police still frequently fail to investigate cases of forced begging. Another persistent practice is to prosecute Koranic masters for less serious offences envisaged by other laws, instead of prosecuting them for the exploitation of talibé children under the terms of Act No. 2005-06 or the Penal Code. According to the ITUC's observations, in 2018 and 2019, three Koranic masters were convicted of forcing children to beg under Act No. 2005-06. The three masters were convicted, respectively, to a suspended sentence of two years of imprisonment, two years of imprisonment and three years of imprisonment. When the authorities have identified a potential case of forced begging, they have often issued administrative sanctions for those presumed responsible, instead of conducting an investigation and taking criminal action.

In its reply to the ITUC's comments, the Government states that, to face the challenge of law enforcement, the ministry in charge of child protection has incorporated advocacy activities for judicial chain actors into its communication activities for the repression of perpetrators of crimes against children.

The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that an operation entitled "Epervier", in which national actors participated, was organized from 6 to 10 November 2017 by Interpol in several countries in the subregion, including Senegal. According to the Government, several prosecutions and convictions were noted in the annual report of the Unit to Combat Trafficking in Persons (CNLTP) and in the study evaluating the implementation of the Act. Two judicial investigations against four persons, opened in March 2017, and a procedure against another person are currently ongoing. Nevertheless, the Committee notes that, according to the report submitted by the Government to the Human Rights Committee in August 2018, during the period 2009–16, only one case resulted in 2011 in a conviction for incitement to begging, violence and assault, as envisaged and penalized by section 3 of Act No. 2005-06 (CCPR/C/SEN/5, paragraphs 110–113). It also notes that, in its concluding observations of 30 January 2019, the United Nations Committee Against Torture expressed concern that, despite the efforts announced by the Government to remove from the streets talibé children who attend Koranic schools (daaras), there are still reports that the exploitation of children by Koranic teachers for forced begging is a phenomenon that, far from declining, actually increased over the reporting period and that these children continue to be subjected to trafficking, forced begging and extreme forms of abuse and neglect by the persons responsible for their care (marabouts). The Committee Against Torture also expressed concern at reports of the connivance of the authorities in relation to this phenomenon and their failure to prosecute abusive marabouts, except in cases of deaths or extreme abuse of children. It encouraged the State to enhance the application of national laws and conduct impartial and thorough investigations into acts of trafficking, ill-treatment and sexual abuse of children in Koranic schools and other schools, and ensure that those responsible, including state agents who do not investigate such allegations, are prosecuted and, if convicted, punished with appropriate sanctions (CAT/C/SEN/CO/4, paragraphs 31–32). The Committee deeply deplores the persistence of the phenomenon of the economic exploitation of talibé children and the low number of prosecutions under section 3 of Act No. 2005-06. It recalls once again that, under the terms of Article 7(1) of the Convention, the Government shall take all necessary measures to ensure the effective implementation and enforcement of the provisions giving effect to the Convention, including the application of sufficiently effective and dissuasive penal sanctions. The Committee therefore urges the Government to take the necessary measures without delay to ensure the enforcement in practice of section 3 of Act No. 2005-06 to persons who make use of begging by talibé children under 18 years of age for the purposes of economic exploitation. Noting the weak impact of the measures adopted, the Committee once again requests the Government to intensify its efforts for the effective reinforcement of the capacities of the officials responsible for the enforcement of the legislation and to ensure that those responsible for these acts, as well as complicit state officials who fail to investigate such allegations, are prosecuted and that sufficiently dissuasive penalties are imposed in practice on those convicted. Noting with deep regret the absence of data on this subject, the Committee once again requests the Government to provide statistics on the number of prosecutions initiated, convictions handed down and penalties imposed under Act No. 2005-06.

Article 7(2). Effective and time-bound measures. Clauses (a) and (b). Preventing children from being engaged in the worst forms of child labour and the provision of assistance to remove them from these forms of child labour. Talibé children. The Committee previously noted the various programmes for the modernization of daaras and the training of teachers, as well as the various framework plans for the elimination of the worst forms of child labour. It requested the Government to take measures to protect talibé children against sale and trafficking and forced or compulsory labour; to ensure their rehabilitation and social integration; to provide information on the measures taken for this purpose within the framework of the support project to modernize daaras (PAMOD), and to provide statistics on the number of talibé children who have been removed from the worst forms of child labour and who have benefited from rehabilitation and social integration measures in the Care, Information and Counselling Centre for Children in Difficulties (the GINDDI Centre).

The Committee notes the ITUC's observation that the implementation of the PAMOD has been extremely slow. The national system for the regulation of daaras cannot be established until the Act regulating daaras has been adopted. In the meantime, the Inspectorate of daaras appears to be without clear directives and instructions concerning its role and does not appear to be preparing plans to combat begging and ill-treatment of children in daaras. It is also difficult to know whether the Inspectorate intends to inspect all daaras, or only those registered as "modern" daaras, thereby creating a risk that unregistered daaras may continue to operate without any controls. The Committee notes that, according to the ITUC, the number of talibé children who are victims of forced begging and other serious forms of abuse by their Koranic masters in 2017 and 2018 continued to be alarming. The reported forms of abuse include murder, beatings, sexual abuse, the children being chained up and imprisoned, as well as many forms of negligence and dangerous situations, which occurred in at least eight of the 14 administrative regions of Senegal. One report documents the death of 16 talibé children who were victims of abuse, negligence and dangerous situations in which they were placed by Koranic teachers and their assistants in the regions of Saint-Louis, Diourbel and Thiès between 2017 and 2018. Moreover, there were 61 cases of the beating or physical ill-treatment of talibé children by Koranic masters or their assistants and 14 cases of children who were imprisoned, bound up or chained in daaras in 2017 and 2018. Many daaras enclose between tens and hundreds of talibé children under conditions of dirt and extreme poverty, often in incomplete buildings without walls, floors or windows. The air and ground are full of rubbish, sewage and flies and the children sleep in a single room in their dozens, or outside, often without mosquito nets. Up to now, the programme for the modernization of daaras appears to have focused more on the construction of new "modern" daaras than on the improvement of the infrastructure and practices in existing daaras.

In this connection, the Committee notes the Government's indication that several initiatives have been undertaken with development partners for the construction and equipment of 64 modern daaras, of which 32 are not public, and the provision of subsidies to 100 owners of daaras. An amount of 3,750 billion CFA francs had been mobilized for the financing of a pilot initiative for the modernization of daaras, including training in administrative management and education of 32 directors of non-public daaras under the PAMOD in March 2016, as well as the training of 224 Koranic masters, 160 Arab language teachers and 160 French language teachers for non-public daaras, starting on 14 July 2016. Furthermore, in response to the ITUC's observations, the Government indicates that the implementation of the PAMOD, which is due in December 2019, led to the construction of 15 modern daaras and the recruitment of their directors. Steps are also being taken to enrol talibé in the Universal Health Coverage Programme (CMU/Talibés). In addition, with a view to ending the exploitation of child begging, the Ministry for the Protection of Children has initiated consultations with all stakeholders to strengthen the partnership framework for the implementation of a national action plan for the eradication of child begging.

However, the Committee notes that, in its concluding observations of 13 November 2019, the United Nations Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights expresses deep concern at the persistence of the current practice in certain Koranic schools directed by marabouts of using children for economic purposes, which also prevents them from having access to health, education and good living conditions (E/C.12/SEN/CO/3, paragraph 26). The Committee notes with deep concern the situation of talibé children who are victims of forced begging and other serious forms of abuse by their Koranic masters. In this context, the Committee urges the Government to intensify its efforts and to take the necessary measures without delay to protect talibé children against sale and trafficking and forced or compulsory labour and to ensure their rehabilitation and social integration. Please provide information on the measures adopted, including within the context of the Programme to Improve Quality, Equity and Transparency in Education and Training (PAQUET) and the PAMOD with a view to the modernization to the system of daaras. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the Government will be in a position to provide statistics in its next report on the number of talibé children who have been removed from the worst forms of child labour and who have benefited from rehabilitation and social integration measures.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Seychelles

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 2000)

The Committee notes the observations made by the General Employer Trade Union of Seychelles (GETUS) received on 5 September 2019.

Article 3(1) and (2) of the Convention. Minimum age for admission to, and determination of, types of hazardous work. With regard to the adoption of the list of hazardous work, the Committee refers to its comments under Articles 3(d) and 4(1) of the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182).

Article 3(3). Hazardous work as from 16 years. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that pursuant to section 22(4) of the Conditions of Employment Regulations, the competent officer may, exceptionally, grant special written permission for the employment of children aged 15 to 17 years in the circumstances listed in section 22(1) and (2), and requested the Government to amend the legislation to bring it into conformity with the requirements of Article 3 of the Convention.

The Committee notes the Government's reiterated reference to proposed legislative amendments to authorize only children from 16 years and above to take up hazardous work on condition that the health, safety and morals of such children are protected. It also notes the Government's indication that the necessary measures to have these proposals adopted are expected in the near future. In this respect, the Committee notes the observations made by the GETUS according to which hazardous types of work should be prohibited for children under 18 years in all circumstances. The Committee recalls that, by virtue of Article 3(3) of the Convention, only persons from the age of 16 years may be authorized to take up employment or to perform work referred to under Article 3(1), after consultation with the organizations of employers and workers concerned, and on condition that the health, safety and morals of the young persons concerned are fully protected and that they have received adequate specific instruction or vocational training in the relevant branch of activity. In light of the fact that the Committee has been raising this issue since 2004, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the necessary legislative amendments are adopted in the very near future.

Article 7(1) and (3). Minimum age for light work and determination of light work activities. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that under section 21 of the Conditions of Employment Regulations, children under 15 years of age are prohibited from engaging in any kind of work, including in light work. It further noted that proposals to include provisions permitting the employment of children between 13 and 15 years of age in light work would be considered upon further discussion. In this respect, the Committee recalled that, by virtue of Article 7(3) of the Convention, the competent authority shall determine the activities in which employment or work may be permitted for children 13–15 years of age. In addition, the number of hours during which, and the conditions in which, light work activities may be undertaken must be prescribed.

The Committee notes the Government's indication, in response to its request, that the introduction of light work for children aged 13 and 14 years will be subject to the conditions as approved by the competent officer, will only be permitted during school holidays and that a list of accepted light work activities will be developed. In this respect, the Committee also notes the Government's reference to relevant provisions in the 2017 Employment Bill. In light of the fact that the Committee has been raising this issue since 2004, the Committee expresses the firm hope that the draft Bill containing provisions permitting the employment of children between 13 and 15 years of age in light work will be adopted in the near future. It also requests the Government to ensure that the draft Bill contains provisions regulating light work in conformity with Article 7(3) of the Convention.

The Committee notes the observations made by the Seychelles Federation of Workers' Unions (SFWU) received on 6 September 2019.

Articles 3 and 7(1) of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour, penalties and application in practice. Clause (b). Use, procuring or offering of a child for prostitution. The Committee previously expressed its deep concern at children under 18 years of age being potentially engaged in prostitution, particularly sex tourism, based on the indications in the 2014 mission report of the United Nations Special Rapporteur on trafficking in persons, especially women and children (A/HRC/26/37/Add.7, paragraphs 10 and 11). That report also referred to a number of factors hampering the effective and swift investigation and prosecution of trafficking cases, including the lack of comprehensive understanding of the relevant penal provisions by police officials (paragraphs 46 and 47).

The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report, in response to the Committee's request that four alleged cases of child prostitution were reported, one of which is under examination and three of which were transmitted for prosecution and subsequently brought to the Supreme Court. The Government adds that in some alleged cases of child prostitution, the supposed victims refuse to have the police investigate the matter. In this respect, the Committee also notes that the 2018 concluding observations of the United Nations Committee on the Rights of the Child (CRC) refer to the vulnerability of children to commercial sexual exploitation, internal sexual trafficking in the context of the flourishing tourism industry, and reported cases of forced prostitution by family members to sustain the family income (CRC/C/SYC/CO/5-6, paragraph 24). It further notes that the CRC recommends, among other things, that: (i) research be undertaken on the nature and extent of the commercial sexual exploitation of children; (ii) specific training be provided to judiciary and law enforcement officials; and (iii) accessible, confidential and child-friendly channels for the reporting of such violations be provided (paragraph 25). The Committee notes that the Government has not provided the requested information in its report on the progress made with the data collection on children involved in the worst forms of child labour. In light of the above, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that persons suspected of using, procuring, or offering children for prostitution are identified, and that thorough investigations and prosecutions are carried out in this respect, and to provide statistical information on the number and nature of violations reported, investigations and prosecutions undertaken. In this respect, the Committee asks the Government to provide information on the outcome of the four reported cases of child prostitution, three of which have been transmitted for prosecution and brought to the Supreme Court, including convictions and criminal penalties imposed. The Committee also once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that sufficient data on the involvement of children in the worst forms of child labour, particularly in commercial sexual exploitation, are available.

Articles 3(d) and 4(1). Worst forms of child labour. Hazardous work and determination of hazardous work. Following up on its previous requests made in this respect, the Committee notes the Government's reiterated indication that proposals to include the draft list of hazardous types of work in the Conditions of Employment Regulations have been made and that the necessary measures to have them adopted are expected in the very near future. In this respect, the Committee also notes the observations made by the SFWU that there is a need for the Government to continue with its commitment to reviewing certain provisions of national laws to bring it into conformity with the provisions of the child labour Conventions. In light of the fact that the Committee has been raising this issue since 2004, the Committee urges the Government to follow up on its reiterated commitment and take the necessary measures to ensure that the Conditions of Employment Regulations are amended and that the draft list of hazardous types of work as prohibited for children under 18 years of age is adopted in the very near future.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Sierra Leone

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 2011)

The Committee notes with concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments.

Article 2(1) of the Convention. Scope of application. The Committee previously noted that, according to section 129 of the Child Rights Act of 2007 (Child Rights Act), the provisions related to the employment of children apply to employment in the formal and informal economies. However, according to sections 52 and 53 of the Employers and Employed Act of 1960, children under the age of 15 years shall not be employed or work in any public or private industrial undertaking, or in any branch thereof or on any vessel, other than an undertaking or vessel in which only members of the same family are employed.

The Committee notes the absence of information in the Government's report in this regard. Noting the discrepancies on the application of the minimum age provisions, the Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to harmonize the provisions of the Employers and Employed Act with the Child Rights Act, so as to ensure that children working in all branches of economic activity, including family undertakings, also benefit from the protection laid down in the Convention.

Article 3(2). Determination of the types of hazardous work. The Committee previously noted that, according to section 128(3) of the Child Rights Act, hazardous types of work prohibited to children under 18 years of age include: going to sea; mining and quarrying; porterage of heavy loads; manufacturing industries where chemicals are produced or used; work in places where machines are used; and work in places such as bars, hotels and places of entertainment where a person may be exposed to immoral behaviour. It also noted that section 126 of the Child Rights Act and section 48 of the Employers and Employed Act prohibit night work of persons under the age of 18 years. The Committee further noted the Government's indication that the Ministry of Labour and Social Security (MLSS) had developed a list of types of hazardous work prohibited to children under 18 years of age after consultations with the social partners, child protection agencies and civil society organizations. This list of hazardous types of work had been validated and was awaiting Cabinet approval as a Statutory Supplementary Instrument.

The Committee notes the Government's information in its report that the list of hazardous types of work is still awaiting Cabinet approval. The Committee once again expresses the firm hope that the Government will take the necessary measures to ensure that the list of types of hazardous work prohibited to children under the age of 18 years is adopted in the near future. It requests that the Government provide information on any progress made in this regard.

Article 3(3). Admission to hazardous types of work from the age of 16 years. The Committee previously noted that section 54(2) of the Employers and Employed Act permits underground work in mines of male persons who have attained the age of 16 years with a medical certificate attesting fitness for such work. However, there appear to be no provisions which establish the requirement to ascertain that young persons between the ages of 16 and 18 years engaged in hazardous work receive adequate specific instruction or vocational training in the relevant branch of activity as required by Article 3(3) of the Convention.

The Committee notes the absence of information on this point. The Committee once again reminds the Government that according to Article 3(3) of the Convention, national laws or regulations or the competent authority may, after consultation with the organizations of employers and workers concerned, where such exist, authorize employment or work as from the age of 16 years, on condition that the young persons receive adequate specific instruction or vocational training in the relevant branch of activity. The Committee therefore once again requests that the Government take the necessary measures to ensure compliance with the conditions set out in Article 3(3) of the Convention.

Labour inspectorate. The Committee previously noted that according to the provisions of section 132 of the Child Rights Act, a district labour officer shall carry out an inquiry he may consider necessary in order to satisfy himself that the provisions of Part VIII of the Act dealing with the employment of children and young persons in the formal economy are being strictly observed. For the purposes of this section, any person may be interrogated by the district labour officer. Furthermore, if a district labour officer is reasonably satisfied that the provisions of this Part are not being complied with, they shall report the matter to the police who shall investigate the matter and take the appropriate steps to prosecute the offender. The Committee also noted that similar provisions are laid down under section 133 of the Child Rights Act with regard to the enforcement of the provisions related to the employment of children in the informal economy by the District Council. The Committee also noted the Government's information that the Child Labour Unit established within the MLSS was also mandated to monitor child labour in workplaces. The Government's report further indicated that the inspections carried out in the formal sector revealed the non-existence of child labour; however, only limited inspections were carried out in the informal economy and therefore no relevant data on child labour in this sector was available. Moreover, the Government stated in its report that the labour inspectors, investigators and other key enforcement agencies were still operating on old legislation and that they lacked proper training on child labour monitoring.

The Committee notes that, in its comments of 2013 under the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), the Committee had noted that the labour inspectorate in Sierra Leone was practically inoperative. The Committee therefore once again requests that the Government take the necessary measures to strengthen the functioning of the labour inspectorate to ensure the effective monitoring of children working in the formal and informal economy. The Committee also once again requests the Government to provide information on the functioning of the Child Labour Units with regard to the child labour inspections carried out and on the number and nature of violations detected.

Application of the Convention in practice. The Committee previously noted that the data released by the ILO on 12 June 2008 indicated that more than half of all the children between the ages of 7 and 14 years were child labourers. While noting the measures taken by the Government, the Committee expressed its concern at the high number of children below the legal minimum age who were engaged in child labour in Sierra Leone. The Committee also noted from the project report of the ILO–IPEC project entitled "Tackle Child Labour through Education" (TACKLE project) that the TACKLE project and the Statistical Information and Monitoring Programme on Child Labour (SIMPOC) conducted a National Child Labour Survey in 2010–11 in Sierra Leone, the report of which had not yet been published.

The Committee notes that the Government provided results of the National Child Labour Survey 2011 in its written replies to the list of issues in relation to the combined third to fifth periodic reports to the Committee on the Rights of the Child (CRC) of September 2016 (CRC/C/SLE/Q/3-5/Add.1, Annex II), according to which, 45.9 per cent of children aged 5–17 year of age were involved in child labour. Particularly, 31 per cent of children between 5 and 14 years of age were engaged in child labour, while 22 per cent of children between 5 and 17 years of age were involved in hazardous work. The Committee further notes that, according to the State of the World's Children 2014 (UNICEF), more than a quarter (26 per cent) of children aged 5–17 years were involved in hazardous work. The Committee expresses its deep concern at the large number of children involved in child labour and hazardous work. It urges the Government to pursue its efforts to prevent and eliminate child labour within the country. It also requests the Government to provide information on the manner in which the Convention is applied in practice, including statistical data on the employment of children and young persons.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2014)

The Committee notes the Government's first report and the observations of the Federation of Somali Trade Unions (FESTU) received on 1 September 2018.

Articles 3 and 7(1) of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour and penalties. Clause (a). All forms of slavery or practices similar to slavery. Forced or compulsory recruitment of children for use in armed conflict. The Government indicates in its report that article 29 of the Provisional Constitution of 2012 provides for the right of children to be protected from armed conflict and not to be used in armed conflict (paragraph 6). In addition, it indicates that the Somali National Army issued a general staff Order (No. 1), stating that children under 18 years of age may not enlist in the army.

The Committee notes that the draft Labour Code of 2019 provides, in its section 7 entitled "Slavery and forced labour and recruitment of children into the armed forces", for the prohibition of forced or compulsory recruitment of children for use in armed conflict, which is considered as a form of forced or compulsory labour. The penalty for offenders under this provision is a fine or imprisonment for a term of not less than three years and not exceeding ten years, or to both a fine and imprisonment.

According to the Government, the Somali National Army has benefited from human rights training and continuous sensitization to combat the use of children in armed conflict. However, the Government states that gaps exist in law enforcement areas to adequately protect children from the worst forms of child labour, especially in parts of the country that the Government does not control. It indicates the detection of cases of recruitment of children by non-state armed groups, including for use as spies, when opening and closing checkpoints, and to join their armed groups. In 2017, Al-Shabaab extremists intensified its campaign of forced recruitment of children as young as 8 years old. According to the Social Protection Policy of 2019, the recruitment of children by armed groups has included the threatening of elders, teachers in Islamic religious schools, and communities in rural areas with attacks if they did not provide thousands of children as young as 8 years old for use in armed conflict. The observations of the Federation of Somali Trade Unions (FESTU) received on 1 September 2018 also stated that children were forcibly recruited and used by militias and Al-Shabaab extremists as soldiers.

The Committee notes that, according to the Report of the UN Secretary-General on Children and armed conflict of June 2020, the recruitment and use in armed conflict of 1,442 boys and 53 girls were verified in 2019, with some children as young as 8 years old. Al-Shabaab remained the main perpetrator but government security forces, regional forces and clan militias also recruited and used children. A total of 1,158 cases of abduction of children were verified, mainly for the purpose of recruitment and use in armed conflict, as well as 703 cases of children killed or maimed, and more than 200 cases of girls being raped and are victims of sexual violence. The Secretary General underlined the growing number of violations attributed to government security forces (A/74/845-S/2020/525, paragraphs 137, 139, 140, 142 and 145). Moreover, the Committee notes that, in her report of 24 December 2019, the Special Representative of the Secretary-General for Children and Armed Conflict specified that in Somalia, where the highest figures for sexual violence were verified in 2019, girls were sexually abused during their association with armed forces and groups, and forcibly married to combatants. She also stated that abduction was the primary way for Al-Shabaab to forcibly recruit children for use as combatants in Somalia (A/HRC/43/38, paragraphs 27 and 32). The Committee must deplore the continued recruitment and use of children in armed conflict in Somalia, especially as it entails other violations of children's rights, such as abductions, killings and sexual violence. While recognizing the complexity of the situation prevailing on the ground and the existence of an armed conflict and armed groups in the country, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures as a matter of urgency to ensure the full and immediate demobilization of all children and to put a stop, in practice, to the forced recruitment of children under 18 years of age by armed forces and armed groups in Somalia. The Committee also urges the Government to take immediate and effective measures to ensure the thorough investigation and prosecution of all persons found guilty of recruiting children under 18 years of age for use in armed conflict and to ensure that sufficiently effective and dissuasive penalties are imposed in practice. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the number and nature of investigations carried out against the perpetrators of these crimes, as well as on the number of prosecutions conducted, and the number and nature of penalties imposed.

Articles 6 and 7(2)(a) and (b). Programmes of action and effective time-bound measures for prevention, assistance and removal. Children forcibly recruited for use in armed conflict. The Government indicates that it signed a roadmap to end recruitment and use of children in conflict, in 2019.

The Committee notes that, in its report of March 2020 on Children and armed conflict in Somalia, the UN Secretary-General specified that this roadmap, aiming at accelerating the implementation of the action plans of 2012 on preventing and combating the recruitment and use and the killing and maiming of children, includes renewed commitments to strengthening the legislative framework, to capacity-building and awareness-raising for security forces, and to the screening of troops. The roadmap also provides for the creation of regional working groups on children and armed conflict, in order to implement the action plans at the Federal member State-level (S/2020/174, paragraphs 65 and 69). The Committee notes that the United Nations Assistance Mission in Somalia (UNSOM) specified that the roadmap to end recruitment and use of children in conflict details measures to release children associated with armed forces, and reintegrate them into their communities.

The Committee further notes that the UN Secretary-General indicated in its report of March 2020 that the Government was drafting a national strategy aimed at preventing child recruitment and facilitating the release and reintegration of children associated with armed groups, and a national strategy on assistance to victims aiming at supporting survivors of armed conflict, including children affected by conflict (S/2020/174, paragraph 67).

According to the report of the Government to the Committee on the Rights of the Child of October 2019, the National Programme for the Treatment and Handling of Disengaged Fighters focuses on outreach, reception, screening, rehabilitation and reintegration of children previously engaged in conflict (CRC/C/SOM/1, paragraph 362). However, according to the Report of the Secretary-General on Children and armed conflict of June 2020, 236 children were detained in 2019 for alleged association with armed groups by national and regional security forces (A/74/845-S/2020/525, paragraph 138). The Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that children removed from armed forces or groups are treated as victims rather than offenders. It also requests the Government to provide information on the adoption and implementation of the above-mentioned national strategies to prevent child recruitment, facilitate the release and social reintegration of children associated with armed groups, and assist them, including any special attention that has been paid to the removal, rehabilitation and social integration of girls. Furthermore, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the manner in which the National Programme for the Treatment and Handling of Disengaged Fighters has been applied to children recruited in armed groups and the armed forces.

Article 7(2). Clause (a). Prevent the engagement of children in the worst forms of child labour. Access to free basic education. The Government indicates that the restoration of free education is one of its priorities. It has provided opportunities for free schooling in some regions, adding that 22 free schools have been established in the country. The Government wishes to implement programmes to enable more children to return to school.

The Committee notes that, according to the Social Protection Policy, there are low school enrolment rates throughout the country, and girls' enrolment rates are significantly lower. Almost 47 per cent of children from 6 to 17 years of age are not enrolled in school. In 2015, the primary school net attendance rate was estimated at 21 per cent for girls and 30 per cent for boys (page 7). The Federal Government of Somalia, together with the World Food Programme, is implementing a school feeding programme covering more than 20 per cent of primary schools across the country. In the Federal member States, school feeding is carried out in partnership with the Ministry of Education (page 15). It improves children's school attendance and food security (page 34).

The Committee also notes that the National Employment Policy of 2019 states that the National Education Policy and the National Education Sector Strategy Plan are essential in revising the education system, which was completely destroyed by the conflict (page 7). The National Employment Policy indicates that the private sector is the largest provider for education (page 10).

The Committee further notes that the report of the World Bank Group of August 2019 underlines that Somalia's allocations to education as share of the national budget are about 1 per cent. The Federal member States also spend little of their own resources on education (page 32).

In its report on Children and armed conflict of June 2020, the UN Secretary-General stated that, with 64 attacks on school in 2019, Somalia has one of the highest numbers of attacks of school. Incidents included the abduction of teachers and pupils, the killing of and threats against teachers, and the destruction and looting of facilities (A/74/845-S/2020/525, paragraph 141). Considering that education is key in preventing children from the worst forms of child labour, the Committee strongly encourages the Government to continue to take the necessary measures to improve access to free basic education of all children, including girls. It requests the Government to continue to provide information on the progress made regarding access to free basic education, including on the implementation of the National Education Policy and the National Education Sector Strategy Plan. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the school enrolment, attendance and completion rates at primary and secondary level, as well as on the school drop-out rates.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 2000)

Article 1 of the Convention. National policy designed to ensure the effective abolition of child labour and application of the Convention in practice. The Committee previously noted from the Government's replies to the list of issues raised by the Committee on the Rights of the Child (CRC) of 15 August 2016 that data from the Department of Labour indicated that 784,000 children were involved in economic activities between 2013–16. The CRC expressed its concern in its concluding observations of 30 September 2016 that the activities of some business enterprises, in particular, those of extractive industries, had a negative impact on the enjoyment of the rights of the child, including through the exploitation of child labour (paragraph 17). It also expressed its concern at the persistent wide engagement of children in child labour, in particular in agriculture (paragraph 65). The Committee requested the Government to strengthen its efforts to ensure the progressive elimination of child labour, and to take the necessary measures to ensure that sufficient up-to-date data on the situation of working children is made available.

The Committee notes the Government's information in its report that the National Day Against Child Labour has been commemorated in eight of the nine provinces in order to raise awareness against child labour. It also notes the Government's information in its report under the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No.182) that the National Child Labour Programme of Action which is aimed at addressing child labour in the country is being implemented and is now on Phase IV covering 2017-2021. The Committee further notes the Government's information that according to the Survey of Activities of Young People, 2015, (SAYP 2015) of the 11.2 million children between the ages of 7 and 17 years, 577,000 children are involved in child labour, a decrease from 779,000 in 2010. The province of KwaZulu-Natal has the highest rate with about one out of ten children engaged in child labour. Children were mainly involved in production and trade of goods and services, including in private households (52.6 per cent), followed by agriculture (46.9 per cent) and transport services (25.3 per cent). While noting the measures taken and positive results achieved in terms of the reduction of child labour, the Committee requests the Government to pursue its efforts to ensure the progressive elimination of child labour in the country. It further requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken in this regard, including the concrete measures taken within the framework of the Child Labour Action Programme 2017-2021, and the results achieved in terms of the number of children withdrawn from child labour.

Article 5 of the Convention. Monitoring mechanisms and application of the Convention in practice. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, according to the Survey of Activities of Young People 2010 (SAYP 2010), exposure to hazardous work was common among children aged 7 to 17 who were engaged in economic activities, which indicated 42.3 per cent among children aged 7–10, 41.8 per cent among children aged 11–14 and 41.3 among children aged 15–17. Moreover, a total of 90,000 children were reported to have been injured in the 12 months preceding SAYP 2010 while doing an economic work activity. The Committee urged the Government to intensify its efforts to eliminate the worst forms of child labour, in particular hazardous work, including information on the number and nature of infringements reported by the labour inspectorate.

The Committee notes that the Government's report does not provide any information on this point. However, the Committee notes the information provided by the Government under the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), that the restructuring and professionalization of the labour inspectorate is on-going. This report also indicates that the labour inspectors are provided with extensive trainings on various programmes to develop their competencies and access to a motor vehicle scheme and to a motor vehicle pool has been established. Moreover, various innovative initiatives are being piloted and implemented for an able functioning of the inspectorate, including measures to improve the collection of information and data relating to labour inspection activities.

The Committee notes that according to the findings of the SAYP 2015, 34.2 per cent of the total number of 577,000 children aged 7–17 years who are involved in child labour, work in hazardous conditions, including working in dusty conditions, extreme temperatures or humidity and work in water, lake, river and sea. It also notes that the proportion of children exposed to at least one hazardous working condition decreased from 41.8 per cent in 2010 to 34.2 per cent in 2015. The SAYP report further indicates that 84,000 children were injured in the 12 months preceding the survey indicating a decline from 91,000 in 2010. While noting a reduction in the number of children involved in hazardous work, the Committee encourages the Government to continue its efforts, including by strengthening the capacities of the labour inspectorate to ensure that children under the age of 18 years are not engaged in hazardous work. In this regard, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to promote collaboration between the labour inspectorate and other relevant stakeholders and to provide training to the labour inspectors to detect cases of children engaged in hazardous work. It requests the Government to continue providing information on the measures taken in this regard and on the results achieved.

Article 7(2). Effective and time-bound measures. Clause (d). Identify and reach out to children at special risk. Child orphans of HIV/AIDS and other vulnerable children (OVCs). In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the Department of Social Development (DSD) provides support to OVCs through a basket of services, including food support, home care, drop-in centres and psychosocial support through Home and Community-Based Care (HCBC) workers. However, noting that the number of OVCs due to AIDS aged 0–17 remained high at approximately 2.1 million children (2015 UNAIDS estimates), the Committee urged the Government to strengthen its efforts to ensure the protection of OVCs from the worst forms of child labour and to provide information on the time-bound measures taken in this regard.

The Committee notes the Government's information that in response to the growing number of orphans and vulnerable children due to the HIV/AIDS epidemic, the DSD has partnered with the National Association of Child Care Workers (NACCW) to roll out a five-year intervention programme known as Isibindi, which means bravery or courage in isiZulu. Isibindi is a community-based child and youth care prevention and early intervention service that provides support to vulnerable children, including through improving the well-being and educational outcomes for children, skills development and creation of job opportunities for young persons which benefitted over one million children. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the Isibindi, which is being implemented in 367 sites, has been successful in ensuring that vulnerable children remain in school, particularly children in child-headed families. Furthermore, the Department of Basic Education together with the National Student Financial Aid Scheme is providing financial assistance to vulnerable children for their higher studies and technical and vocational education and training. However, according to the UNAIDS estimates of 2019 for South Africa, the number of child orphans due to AIDS aged under 17 has reached approximately 1.4 million. While noting the measures taken by the Government, the Committee must express its concern at the high number of children orphaned by HIV/AIDS who are at an increased risk of being engaged in the worst forms of child labour. The Committee therefore strongly encourages the Government to pursue its efforts to ensure that those children are prevented from being engaged in the worst forms of child labour, in particular by continuing to ensure their access to education and vocational training and providing appropriate assistance and support. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the concrete measures taken particularly within the framework of the Isibindi initiative, and the results achieved in terms of the number of orphans and vulnerable children withdrawn from the worst forms of child labour and rehabilitated into education or vocational training. To the extent possible, please disaggregate the data provided by gender and age.

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2001)

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020). The Committee proceeded with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the supplementary information received from the Government this year (see Article 7(2)(a) and (b) below), as well as on the basis of the information at its disposal in 2019.

The Committee notes the observations made by the General Union of Workers (UGT) in the Government's report, and the Government's reply. The Committee also notes the observations of the Spanish Confederation of Employers' Organizations (CEOE), received on 6 September 2019, and the Government's response.

Article 7(2) of the Convention. Effective and time-bound measures. Clauses (a) and (b). Preventing the engagement of children in the worst forms of child labour, removing them from these types of labour and ensuring their rehabilitation and social integration. Trafficking for sexual and labour exploitation. The Committee previously encouraged the Government to pursue its efforts to protect young persons under 18 years of age, particularly girls and migrant children, against trafficking for sexual exploitation. It also asked the Government to supply information on the number of migrant children registered in the context of the Protocol on unaccompanied foreign minors.

The Committee notes the observations of the UGT indicating that the Comprehensive Plan to Combat the Trafficking of Women and Girls for Sexual Exploitation does not take account of the situation of male victims or of other forms of labour exploitation. The UGT emphasizes that the immediate consequences are insufficient protection of boys who are victims of trafficking for sexual exploitation, and inadequate protection for women and girls who are victims of other forms of human trafficking. In this regard, the Committee notes the Government's indication that the appendix to the Framework Protocol for the protection of victims of human trafficking concerning action to detect and provide care for child victims of trafficking applies to both girls and boys.

The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that the information on unaccompanied foreign minors (MENA) and the information on child victims of trafficking and sexual exploitation comes from two different registers. Accordingly, the information from the MENA register includes all unaccompanied migrant children identified in Spain. In April 2019, a total of 12,303 migrant children (11,367 boys and 936 girls) were registered. The data concerning trafficking victims is from the Ministry of the Interior. In 2016, the 148 registered victims included six children; in 2017, nine children were recorded among 155 victims; and in 2018, the 128 trafficking victims included six children. With regard to sexual exploitation, in 2016 three children were registered among 433 cases; in 2017, six children in 422 cases; and in 2018, two children were recorded among 391 cases.

The Committee also notes the statistics provided by the Government relating to children who are victims of trafficking for labour exploitation, begging and criminal activities. In 2016, no cases of trafficking of children for labour exploitation were recorded. In 2017 and 2018, four cases of trafficking of children for labour exploitation were recorded each year. In 2019, the Government indicates that 16 child victims of trafficking for labour exploitation were removed from this worst form of child labour. Between 2016 and 2018, the Government recorded ten cases of children involved in criminal activities and four cases of children used for begging.

The Committee takes due note of the inclusion of a specific provision on persons working with minors, in order to check that there is no previous history of sexual offences against children or trafficking offences for sexual exploitation, in the Bill for the comprehensive protection of children and young persons from violence. The Committee also notes the Government's supplementary information, according to which the Bill amends the reformed text of the Act respecting social offences and penalties (approved by Legislative Decree No. 5/2000 of 4 August) through the introduction of a new offence of employment of persons who have committed sexual crimes against children. In addition, the Government refers to several measures envisaged in the Bill, including: (i) the general obligation to report to the competent authority any situation of violence towards children or young persons; (ii) the establishment of specialized units for awareness raising and the prevention of situations of violence against minors in the national security forces and institutions; and (iii) the preparation of specific action protocols covering trafficking in persons, and the abuse and sexual exploitation of minors living in protection centres. The Bill is being drawn up by the Ministry of Health, Consumer Affairs and Social Welfare, the Ministry of Justice and the Ministry of the Interior. It is intended to achieve Goal 16.2 of the 2030 Sustainable Development Agenda, that is to end abuse, exploitation, trafficking and all forms of violence and torture against children. The Committee notes that in its observations the CEOE emphasizes the importance of the participation of trade unions and occupational associations in this process to ensure progress and substantive changes to the draft legislation, in view of their knowledge of the social and economic situation in Spain.

The Committee also notes the amendments to sections 177bis(6) and 192(3) of the Penal Code prohibiting any person who has committed sexual crimes against children or the trafficking of persons for sexual exploitation from exercising an occupation or conducting a business, whether or not it is remunerated, which involves regular and direct contact with minors.

The Committee further notes that the appendix to the Framework Protocol for the protection of victims of human trafficking concerning action for the identification and provision of care for child victims of trafficking entered into force on 1 December 2017. The Committee notes the CEOE's indication that the network of Spanish enterprises is mainly composed of small and medium-sized enterprises (SMEs) and microenterprises and that it is once again calling on the Government to take the social partners into consideration in the context of the training initiatives under the Framework Protocol. The Committee notes the Government's indication that, in the context of the plans of action of the labour inspectorate, the participation of occupational associations and trade unions has been ensured through a general council, in accordance with section 11 of the regulations governing the work of the National Labour and Social Security Inspectorate (Royal Decree No. 192/2018). The Committee requests the Government to continue its efforts to protect children under 18 years of age against trafficking in persons, and to involve the social partners in the measures and action taken. The Committee also requests the Government to provide detailed information on the procedure followed and the results achieved in the context of the Protocol on unaccompanied foreign minors and the appendix to the Framework Protocol for the protection of victims of human trafficking. Finally, it requests the Government to provide information on the adoption of the Bill for the comprehensive protection of children and young persons from violence, and a copy once it has been adopted.

Clause (d). Children at special risk. Migrant children and unaccompanied minors. The Committee previously reminded the Government that migrant children are particularly exposed to the worst forms of child labour and requested the Government to intensify its efforts to protect these children from the worst forms of child labour, particularly by ensuring their integration into the school system. It also requested the Government to provide information on the measures taken and the results achieved in this respect.

The Committee notes the UGT's indications that the Council of Ministers has established a working group on migrant children in conjunction with the Office of the Public Prosecutor, the autonomous communities and non-governmental organizations (NGOs) to analyse proposals for a template for the care of unaccompanied foreign minors. However, the UGT emphasizes that the most representative trade unions in the country have not been invited to join this working group, even though they represent people working at reception centres for minors. The UGT also expresses concern at the care template, which involves public contracts or subsidies in which economic criteria take precedence over quality of service. The Committee notes the Government's indications in this regard that an Inter-territorial Coordination Council has been set up to deal with the situation of unaccompanied foreign minors by facilitating the interaction and coordination of all institutions and administrations connected with the provision of care for them. It held its first meeting in September 2018.

The Committee also notes the information on the Programme of guidance and reinforcement for progress and support in education. The total credits allocated to this programme in 2018 were over €81 million, distributed between the autonomous communities. The objective of the programme is to establish support mechanisms to ensure the quality of education through equitable education policies aimed at reducing the drop-out rates from school and vocational training. Guidance and psycho-pedagogical teams located in the region or the school district have information on the socio-economic and family profiles of at-risk groups of pupils. Support is provided by these teams in schools with the involvement of families. The Committee requests the Government to continue its efforts to protect migrant children and unaccompanied foreign minors from the worst forms of child labour and to ensure their integration into the school system. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the results achieved in the context of the Programme of guidance and reinforcement for progress and support in education, and on the measures taken by the Inter-territorial Coordination Council to facilitate the provision of care for unaccompanied foreign minors.

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 2000)

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020). The Committee proceeded with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the supplementary information received from the Government (see paragraph concerning the application of the Convention in practice and labour inspection) as well as on the basis of the information at its disposal in 2019.

Article 2(2) of the Convention. Raising the minimum age for admission to employment or work. The Committee previously noted the Government's information that the Ministry of Labour and Trade Union Relations (MoLTUR) was currently in the process of amending relevant labour laws such as the Employment of Women, Young Persons and Children Act No. 47 of 1956, in order to raise the minimum age for admission to work or employment from 14 to 16 years. It trusted that the amendments raising the minimum age for employment to 16 years would be adopted in the near future.

The Committee notes with interest the Government's indication in its report that it has obtained the approval of the Cabinet of Ministers to increase the minimum age for employment from 14 to 16 years. The Government indicates that the revised draft labour laws and regulations, namely the Employment of Women, Young Persons and Children Act No. 47 of 1956, the Shop and Office Employees Act No. 19 of 1954, the Factory Ordinance No. 45 of 1942, and the Employees' Provident Fund Act No. 15 of 1958, which contain provisions raising the minimum age from 14 to 16 years, would enter into force in 2020. The Committee welcomes the measures taken by the Government to raise the minimum age for admission to employment or work from 14 to 16 years, and hopes in this regard that the above-mentioned draft labour laws and regulations will be adopted in the near future. The Committee reminds the Government of the provisions of Article 2(2) of the Convention, which provide that any Member having ratified this Convention may subsequently notify the Director-General of the International Labour Office, by a new declaration, that it has raised the minimum age that it had previously specified. The Committee would be grateful if the Government would consider sending a declaration of this nature to the Office, once the minimum age fixed by the national legislation is raised to 16 years.

Article 2(3). Compulsory education. The Committee previously noted with interest the adoption of the Compulsory Attendance of Children at School Regulation No. 1 of 2015, which provides for compulsory education from 5 to 16 years of age. It noted however that the minimum age for admission to work or employment was therefore lower than the school-leaving age, and accordingly urged the Government to continue its efforts to raise the general minimum age. Noting that the Government is in the process of raising the minimum age for admission to employment or work to 16 years, the Committee once again requests the Government to continue its efforts in this respect, in order to link the minimum age with the age of completion of compulsory schooling, in conformity with the Convention.

Application of the Convention in practice and the labour inspectorate. The Committee previously encouraged the Government to pursue its efforts to ensure the progressive abolition of child labour and to take effective measures to strengthen the capacity and expand the reach of the labour inspectorate to better monitor children working in the informal sector, including domestic workers.

The Committee notes the Government's information that a special inspection group is in charge of inspecting workplaces specifically for child labour, both in the formal and informal sector. In 2018, it inspected 472 workplaces. Moreover, there is a mechanism to inspect workplaces, including households, where underage children are suspected to be employed, in which interdepartmental teams comprising members of the police and of the Department of Probations and Child Care conduct the inspection together. Accordingly, 129 interdepartmental investigations were conducted following complaints on child labour in 2018, resulting in two instances of child labour. The Committee further notes the Government's information in its supplementary report that in 2019, 169 investigations were initiated following complaints on child labour and 12 cases of child labour were detected. The Government also indicates that investigations on complaints of child labour continued even during the COVID-19 lock down period to ensure the safety and well-being of children. Accordingly, until 31 August 2020, three cases of child labour were detected following investigations conducted in 74 complaints. Moreover, penalties were imposed on four employers in 2019 and one employer in 2020, while compensation was paid to two victims of child labour in 2019.

The Committee further notes the Government's information that it has increased awareness-raising measures on child labour for multiple stakeholders, including the members of the Child Development Committees instituted by the Ministry of Women and Child Affairs in the 25 districts, field officers of the Department of Manpower and Employment, who come into direct contact with school students, teachers and parents, of the five districts in which child labour is estimated to be most prevalent, and the general public. Moreover, in 2019, the field staff of the Department of Labour and the Department of Manpower and Employment were provided trainings on the labour law applicable to children and on the importance of eliminating child labour. In addition, in June 2020 the official YouTube channel of the Department of Labour released five videos on the importance of prevention of child labour. The Government also states that the National Policy on Elimination of Child Labour was adopted in 2017, and that a national action plan is being prepared in this regard. The Committee notes in this regard that the National Steering Committee within the Ministry of Labour is in charge of the coordination and the monitoring of the implementation of the Policy.

The Committee notes that, according to the 2015–16 Child Activity Survey, the total child population aged between 5 and 17 years involved in child labour was 43,714 children (1 per cent). It also notes that the National Policy on Elimination of Child Labour of 2017 indicates that child labour is particularly prevalent in fisheries, tourism, small private estates and domestic labour. The Committee further observes that both the Committee on the Rights of the Child and the Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights of the United Nations expressed concern that, despite significant progress made, children remain employed as street vendors, in domestic service, in agriculture, mining, construction, manufacturing, transport and fishing (CRC/C/LKA/CO/5-6, paragraph 41 and E/C.12/LKA/CO/5, paragraph 43). Welcoming the measures taken by the Government, the Committee requests it to continue its efforts to ensure the progressive elimination of child labour in the country, with a focus on the informal economy. It requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken and the results achieved in this regard, including within the framework of the National Policy on Elimination of Child Labour of 2017. It also requests the Government to continue to provide information on the measures taken to strengthen the capacity and expand the reach of the labour inspectorate regarding children working in the informal sector and on the number of children engaged in child labour identified.

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2001)

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020). The Committee proceeded with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the supplementary information received from the Government this year (see Articles 6 and 7(2)(a) and (b) on commercial sexual exploitation of children) as well as on the basis of the information at its disposal in 2019.

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (a) and Article 7(2)(a) and (b). Sale and trafficking of children and effective time-bound measures for prevention, assistance and removal from the worst forms of child labour. The Committee previously noted that there are four safe houses, four certified schools and two national training and counselling centres in the country, which provide medical, legal and psychological services to child victims of trafficking. The Government also stated that 11 "places of safety" for child victims of trafficking were maintained at the provincial level, and that the Ministry of Justice established a National Anti-Human Trafficking Task Force. Moreover, it indicated that in 2016–17, prosecutors have been able to secure six convictions for trafficking of children. The Committee requested the Government to indicate the number of child victims of trafficking who have benefited from the services provided by the safe houses, certified schools and national training and counselling centres. It also requested the Government to continue to prove information on the number of persons prosecuted, convicted and sentenced with regard to cases involving trafficking of children.

The Government indicates in its report that it has taken various measures to prevent trafficking in persons, including the development of training and awareness raising programmes and campaigns for government officials and the general public. The Government further indicates the adoption of the National Strategy Plan to Monitor and Combat Human Trafficking 2015–19. The implementation of this Strategy Plan is a key responsibility of the National Anti-Human Trafficking Task Force led by the Ministry of Justice. The Government further states that the task force is in charge of monitoring and strengthening the coordination among state actors, increasing victim identification and prosecutions, and improving the protection accorded to victims. The Government also indicates that during the reporting period, two suspected cases of trafficking in children for labour or commercial sexual exploitation were reported to the Sri Lanka Police. The Committee notes that, according to the statistics of the National Child Protection Authority, in 2018, 125 cases of trafficking were reported to it. It notes the Government's indication, in its report to the United Nations Committee on the Rights of the Child (CRC) under the Optional Protocol to the Convention on the Rights of the Child on the sale of children, child prostitution and child pornography (OPSC) of April 2019, that there is a special unit in the Sri Lanka Police to investigate complaints relating to trafficking of children (CRC/C/OPSC/LKA/Q/1/Add.1, paragraph 4). While taking due note of the measures taken by the Government to prevent trafficking in children, the Committee requests it to take the necessary measures to ensure that perpetrators of trafficking of children are effectively prosecuted and that sufficiently effective and dissuasive penalties are imposed on them in practice, and to supply information in this respect. It also requests the Government to provide information on the number of child victims of trafficking identified by the special unit in the Police established for this purpose. Noting the absence of information from the Government on this point, the Committee once again requests it to indicate the number of these children who have benefited from the services provided by the safe houses, certified schools and national training and counselling centres.

Clause (b). Use, procuring or offering of a child for prostitution, the production of pornography or pornographic performances. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that sections 286A, 288A, 360A and 360B of the Penal Code, as amended, prohibited the use, procuring or offering of children for prostitution, and for pornographic performances. It noted the high incidence of children in prostitution. The Committee therefore urged the Government to strengthen its efforts to ensure that perpetrators were brought to justice, thorough investigations and prosecutions of perpetrators were carried out, and sufficiently effective and dissuasive penalties were imposed in practice.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that although there is a prevalence of child prostitution in certain areas of the country, there is an absence of accurate statistics in this regard. It indicates, in its Policy on Elimination of Child Labour in Sri Lanka (2017), that the sexual exploitation of children among young boys (the "beach boy" phenomenon) in tourism is of high concern because of the rapid increase in tourism and the willingness to expand it further. The Government also states, in its report to the CRC under the OPSC of October 2018, that issues pertaining to child prostitution and child pornography are critical, with increasing access to information and communication technologies which have brought with them the concern that children will be exposed to harm through these platforms (CRC/C/OPSC/LKA/1, paragraph 2). In this report, it further indicates that a national database on complaints received by the police desks, containing a special segment on complaints relating to sexual exploitation and pornography, has been established (paragraph 59).

The Committee further notes that, in its report to the CRC under the OPSC of April 2019, the Government indicates that the Sri Lanka Police identified in 2018 nine cases of child pornography and seven cases of procuration of children (CRC/C/OPSC/LKA/Q/1/Add.1, paragraph 2). It observes that, in its concluding observations under the OPSC of July 2019, the CRC expressed concern at the low prosecution rates and a high number of pending cases, and reports of official complicity in relation to cases of child prostitution and child pornography (CRC/C/OPSC/LKA/CO/1, paragraph 29). The Committee therefore urges the Government to take the necessary measures to combat child prostitution and child pornography, by ensuring that sections 286A, 288A, 360A and 360B of the Penal Code are effectively applied through investigations and prosecutions of persons suspected of using, procuring or offering children for prostitution, the production of pornography or pornographic performances, including State officials suspected of complicity. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the application of these sections in practice, indicating in particular the information from the database on complaints relating to prostitution and pornography involving children, the number of investigations, prosecutions and convictions, as well as the specific penalties applied.

Clause (d) and Article 4(3). Hazardous work and revision of the list of hazardous types of work. The Committee previously noted that, according to the 2015–16 Child Activity Survey, 0.9 per cent of children aged 5–17 years (39,007 children) are engaged in hazardous work. The Government stated however that no incidents of hazardous work by children had been detected in the formal economy. The Committee further noted the Government's information that a committee had been appointed by the Commissioner General of Labour to revise the list of hazardous work according to international standards. It requested the Government to pursue its efforts to ensure the protection of children from hazardous types of work, including in the informal economy, and to provide information on the adoption of the new list of hazardous types of work.

The Committee notes the Government's information that, in 2018, 472 workplaces were inspected specifically for hazardous work performed by children and for child labour, through a special group inspection programme, following which one instance of hazardous work by children was identified. The Government indicates that awareness-raising activities were conducted, targeting inter alia all the district child development committees, and the field staff of the Department of Manpower and Employment in the five most child labour prevalent districts, to eliminate hazardous work by children. The Committee takes due note of the Government's indication that the new draft regulation for hazardous occupations, consisting of 77 types of hazardous work, has been finalized in 2018 and approved by the Cabinet of Ministers. The Government also indicates that it will supply a copy of the regulation, once adopted.

The Committee takes note of the National Action Plan for the Protection and Promotion of Human Rights 2017–21, which includes activities to eliminate effectively the hazardous forms of child labour. The Committee encourages the Government to pursue its efforts to ensure that children under 18 years of age are not engaged in work that is harmful to their health, safety or morals, and to continue to provide information on the measures taken in this regard. It requests the Government to ensure that the new draft regulation for hazardous occupations will be adopted in the near future, and to provide a copy of the list once it has been adopted.

Articles 6 and 7(2)(a) and (b). Programmes of action and effective time bound measures for prevention, assistance and removal of children from the worst forms of child labour. Commercial sexual exploitation of children. The Committee previously noted the Government's statement that awareness-raising programmes were delivered to the public and tourists to promote child-safe tourism and that 360 hotel staff members had received child protection awareness training in this regard. The Committee accordingly encouraged the Government to strengthen its efforts to combat child sex tourism.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that, in 2016, the National Child Protection Authority has initiated targeted programmes related to the zero tolerance policy of the Government regarding child-sex tourism for foreigners in Bentota and Kalutara, two coastal cities of the country. The Government also states that programmes to combat child labour and child-sex tourism have been conducted for 1,893 beneficiaries in the plantation sector and for education and health staff.

The Committee observes that one of the objectives of the National Plan of Action for Children in Sri Lanka 2016–20 is to protect children from all forms of sexual exploitation in relation to trafficking, sale and commercial sex networks, and to respond to the needs of such children for rehabilitation. It also takes note of the Policy Framework and National Plan of Action to address Sexual and Gender based Violence in Sri Lanka 2016–20, which focuses, inter alia, on preventing the commercial sexual exploitation of children, by raising awareness against this phenomenon, strengthening the existing mechanism of detection and responding to complaints. The Committee notes the Government's information, in its report to the CRC under the OPSC of October 2018, that with regard to the online safety of children including from pornography, it is developing programmes to raise awareness among children (CRC/C/OPSC/LKA/1, paragraph 58). However, the Committee notes that, in its concluding observations under the OPSC of July 2019, the CRC expressed concern about reported cases of parents encouraging children, particularly girls, to enter the sex industry (CRC/C/OPSC/LKA/CO/1, paragraph 19). In this regard, the Committee notes the Government's information in its supplementary report that in 2018, four legal actions were initiated for the offences related to the commercial sexual exploitation of children and in 2019 and from January to 31 August 2020, seven legal actions each were initiated. Taking due note of the measures taken by the Government, the Committee requests it to pursue its efforts to eliminate the commercial sexual exploitation of children, as well as to prevent the engagement of children in commercial sexual exploitation and to provide direct assistance for the removal, rehabilitation and social integration of child victims of commercial sexual exploitation. It also requests the Government to provide information on the number of children who have been removed from commercial sexual exploitation and who have been rehabilitated and socially integrated.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Sudan

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 2003)

Article 2(1) of the Convention. Scope of application, labour inspectorate and application of the Convention in practice. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the Government's indication that efforts by the State bodies in collaboration with civil society organizations were ongoing to tackle the phenomenon of child labour. It also noted the establishment of Family and Child Police Protection Units to monitor child labour as well as the development of special labour inspection programmes in the informal and the agricultural economy. The Committee requested the Government to provide information on the measures taken in collaboration with the civil society organizations to ensure the elimination of child labour; the actions taken by the labour inspection to investigate and monitor child labour, particularly in the informal economy; and on the measures taken by the Family and Child Police Protection Units to monitor child labour.

The Committee notes the Government's information in its report that the civil society organizations are actively involved in celebrating the International day for Protection of Children, annually. The Government also indicates that the Family and Child Police Protection Units are entrusted to adopt programmes and activities for the protection of family and children from all forms of violations which are in accordance with the existing legislation and obligations under the international and regional conventions. The Government further indicates that an action plan for the management of inspections relating to the monitoring of child labour has been formulated and is awaiting implementation.

The Committee notes the statistical information provided by the Government concerning the percentage of children between the ages of 5–17 years involved in child labour in each of the states. Accordingly, the state of East Darfur indicates the highest percentage with 49.4 per cent, followed by South Darfur, Central Darfur, South Kordofan and Blue Nile with 48.2 per cent, 45.1 per cent, 41.4 per cent and 38.1 per cent, respectively as compared to the state of Khartum with 7.5 per cent. In this regard, the Committee notes from the ILO publication of 2019 entitled, Child Labour in the Arab Region: A Quantitative and Qualitative Analysis that Sudan is one of the countries across the Arab region showing the highest rates of child labour with 12.6 per cent among children aged 5-14 years. Among children aged 5–14 years, 18.1 per cent are involved in paid non-family work, 19.9 per cent in self-employment and 62 per cent in unpaid family work with agriculture being the predominant sector of activity (67.5 per cent), followed by the service sector (23.4 per cent) and the industrial sector (9.1 per cent). While noting the measures taken by the Government, the Committee must express its concern at the significant number of children below the minimum age who are involved in child labour in Sudan. The Committee urges the Government to intensify its efforts to ensure the progressive elimination of child labour, with particular focus on the States of South Darfur, Central Darfur, South Kordofan and Blue Nile. It requests the Government to provide information on the specific measures taken in this regard, including the measures taken in collaboration with the civil society organizations, and the programmes adopted by the Family and Child Police and Protection units. It also requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the implementation of the action plan for the management of inspections monitoring child labour, including measures to strengthen the capacities and expand the reach of the labour inspectorate to the agricultural and informal economy where child labour is more prevalent. It requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken in this regard and the results achieved.

Article 2(3) of the Convention. Compulsory schooling. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to pursue and strengthen its efforts to reduce the number of out-of-school children under 14 years of age and to provide statistical information on the results achieved.

The Committee notes the Government's information that the European Union (EU) has been funding several programmes to improve the quality of education in eastern Sudan and the southern states and for the displaced populations, including funding for the education and vocational training projects in the states of Khartoum, Gedaref and Kassala. The Committee notes from a UNICEF report "New Horizons for Education in Sudan" of 2020 that Sudan has one of the largest numbers of out-of-school children in the Middle East and North Africa Region. An estimated over three million children, aged 5–13 years are not in school. Noting with concern that a high number of children under 14 years are out-of-school in Sudan, the Committee urges the Government to strengthen its efforts to improve the functioning of the education system thereby reducing the number of out-of-school children. It also requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken in this regard, including information on the EU funded programmes, and the statistical information on the results achieved, particularly with respect to increasing the school enrolment rates and reducing the drop-out rates.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request directly addressed to the Government.

Articles 3 and 7(1) of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour and penalties. Clause (a). Slavery and practices similar to slavery. 1. Abductions and the exaction of forced labour. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the various legal provisions in Sudan which prohibit the forced labour of children (and abductions for that purpose), including article 30(1) of the Constitution of 2005, section 32 of the Child Act of 2004, and section 312 of the Penal Code. However, the Committee noted under several reports of the United Nations bodies, such as the report of the Secretary-General on Children and Armed Conflict, that cases of abduction of children for labour exploitation had been reported including in Abyei, Blue Nile and South Kordofan. In this regard, it noted the Government's indication that special courts were set up to eliminate the practice of abduction and that psychological and social support, education, work opportunities, and skills training were also provided to children who had been abducted. The Committee urged the Government to continue to strengthen its efforts to eradicate abductions and the exaction of forced labour from children under 18 years of age, and to provide information on the effective and time-bound measures taken to this end.

The Committee notes the Government's information in its report that the National Committee for Combating Human Trafficking (NCCT) continues its efforts to eliminate the practice of abduction. It also notes that the NCCT developed a National Action Plan to Combat Human Trafficking 2018-2019 which includes abduction as one of the means of trafficking in persons. Moreover, the Transitional Constitution of 2019, under article 47 prohibits all forms of slavery and states that no person shall be subject to forced labour.

The Committee, however, notes from the Report of the Secretary General on Children and Armed Conflict (A/74/845-S/2020/525, of 9 June 2020) that in Darfur, 18 children (15 boys and three girls) were reported to have been abducted for ransom or forced to work as cattle herders by the Sudan Liberation Army-Abdul Wahid faction (SLA-AW) and other unidentified armed elements (paragraph 162). It further notes from the Report of the Secretary General on the situation in the Sudan and the activities of the United Nations Integrated Transition Assistance Mission in the Sudan (S/2020/912) of 17 September 2020 that the African Union-United Nations Hybrid Operation in Darfur verified 364 incidents of grave violations, including rape, sexual exploitation and abduction affecting 77 children (37 boys and 40 girls). This report further states that owing to the lack of resources and capacities on the ground, access to justice and accountability responses for child victims of grave violations remains limited (Annex I, paragraph 20). Noting with concern the high incidence of grave violations involving children, including abductions for forced labour, the Committee urges the Government to take immediate measures to ensure that thorough investigations and prosecutions of offenders abducting children under 18 years for forced labour are carried out and that sufficiently effective and dissuasive sanctions are imposed in practice. It requests the Government to provide information on the activities undertaken by the NCCT in eliminating the practice of abduction of children for forced labour and the results achieved.

2. Forced recruitment of children for use in armed conflict. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the Government's indication that the legislation, including the Child Labour Law, the Police Law, and the Civil Service Law specify that no child under 18 years of age shall be recruited in the army, and that penalties are imposed in cases of recruitment. It also noted the Government's statement that various measures had been taken to prevent child recruitment in the armed forces including the signing by the Government with the UN in March 2016, of an Action Plan to end and prevent the recruitment and use of children by its security forces. The Committee, however, noted with deep concern the persistence of the practice of recruiting and using children under the age of 18 years by armed forces and groups. It urged the Government to take immediate and effective measures to put a stop in practice to the compulsory recruitment of children for use in armed conflict by armed forces and groups as well as to take the necessary measures to implement the action plan to end and prevent the recruitment and use of children in the armed forces.

The Committee notes the Government's information that the action plan is being implemented and mechanisms for its implementation have been established at the ministerial and technical levels as well as in many of the states affected by armed conflict. The Government also indicates that command orders prohibiting the recruitment of children were issued by the Sudanese Armed Forces and the Rapid Support Forces (RSF). In this regard, the Committee notes from the Report of the Secretary General on Children and Armed Conflict of 9 June 2020 that in Darfur, the United Nations verified the recruitment and use of three boys by the Sudan Liberation Army-Abdul Wahid (SLA-AW) and is in the process of verifying 14 alleged cases of recruitment and use of children by the RSF. The Committee further notes the Secretary General's statement welcoming the engagement by the Government with the United Nations for the screening of 1,346 RSF soldiers in South and West Darfur, during which no child was identified (A/74/845-S/2020/525, paragraphs 158 and 169).

The Committee notes the information contained in the Report of 17 September 2020 of the Secretary General on the situation in the Sudan and the activities of the United Nations Integrated Transition Assistance Mission in the Sudan that the transitional Government of Sudan signed a peace agreement with the SRF alliance and the Sudan Liberation Army (SLA)-Minni Minawi faction, and a joint agreement on principles was signed with the SPLM-N Abdelaziz Al-Hilu faction (S/2020/912, paragraphs 8 and 9). In this regard, the Committee notes the statement made by the UN Secretary General in a press release on the formal signing of the peace agreement on 3 October 2020 that the signing of the Juba Peace Agreement signals the dawn of a new era for the people of Sudan. It is a milestone on the road to achieving sustainable peace and inclusive development. While welcoming the peace agreement concluded by the transitional Government and the rebel groups, the Committee requests the Government to continue its efforts to ensure that no child under the age of 18 years shall be used or recruited for armed conflict. In this regard, the Committee urges the Government to continue to take effective measures, in collaboration with the UN bodies operating in the country, to effectively implement the Action Plan to end and prevent the recruitment and use of children in the armed forces. It also requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that thorough investigations and prosecutions are carried out against persons who have recruited or used children under 18 years for armed conflict or persons who continue to do so and that sufficiently effective and dissuasive penalties are imposed on them. It requests the Government to supply information in this regard.

Article 7(2). Effective and time-bound measures. Clause (a). Measures to prevent the engagement of children in the worst forms of child labour. Access to free basic education. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the Government's information concerning the various measures adopted by the Ministry of Education to facilitate access to education. Moreover, it noted from the statistical information provided by the Ministry of Public Education, an increase in the primary school enrolment rates from 57.5 per cent in 2000 to 73 per cent in 2015 and secondary school enrolment rates from 24.1 per cent to 37.1 per cent during the same period. The Committee encouraged the Government to intensify its efforts to improve the functioning of the education system in the country.

The Committee notes that according to the statistics provided by the Government, in 2018, the gross enrolment rate in grade 1 was 86.9 per cent and in basic education and secondary education, it was 73.5 per cent and 39.9 per cent, respectively. An estimated 71,301 children (34,255 girls and 37,046 boys) dropped out of basic education in 2018. The Committee also notes that the Government adopted the Education Sector Strategic Plan (ESSP) 2018-2023 which covers interventions aimed at increasing access to pre-school and quality deliver; increasing access to equity in formal basic and secondary education; improving quality and enhancing retention in basic education; and improving learning and skills development in secondary education. The Committee notes from the ESSP document that though more children are accessing school today, the system is slowed down by high drop-out rates rendering the achievement of universal basic education a big challenge for Sudan. The retention rate dropped from 67 per cent in 2009 to 62 per cent in 2017. The ESSP document further states that according to the 2017 Humanitarian Needs Overview, 1.7 million children and adolescents out of the 4.8 million people in need of humanitarian assistance need basic education services, including 56 per cent internally displaced people (IDPs), 7 per cent refugees, 5 per cent returnees and 32 per cent vulnerable residents. The Committee notes that the ESSP interventions are expected to increase the enrolment rates in basic education by 16 per cent and in secondary education by 7 per cent between 2018 and 2023. The Committee notes with concern the low enrolment rates and the high drop-out rates at the primary and secondary education levels. Considering that education is key in preventing the engagement of children in the worst forms of child labour, the Committee urges the Government to intensify its efforts to improve the functioning of the education system in the country by improving access to basic education for all children, including the IDPs, refugees and vulnerable children. In this regard, it requests the Government to provide information on the specific measures taken within the framework of the ESSP and the results achieved, particularly with regard to increasing school enrolment rates and reducing school drop-out rates. To the extent possible, this information should be disaggregated by age and gender.

Clause (b). Removing children from the worst forms of child labour and providing for their rehabilitation and social integration. Child soldiers. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to supply information on the number of child soldiers removed from armed forces and groups and reintegrated through the actions undertaken by the Disarmament and Demobilization Commission.

The Committee notes the Government's information that the Disarmament, Demobilization and Reintegration (DDR) Commission has developed programmes and measures that enable demobilized children to make the transition from life in a military environment to civilian life and play a key role, as civilians, through their acceptance by their families and communities. The Committee also notes from a report of the United Nations Development Programme that the DDR Programme in Sudan aims at creating conducive environments for the peaceful reintegration of ex-combatants and associated groups. Since its launch, more than 25,000 individuals were demobilized, 31,000 reintegrated and 85 projects were established to help community stabilization. The Committee requests the Government to continue to take effective and time-bound measures to remove children from armed conflict and ensure their rehabilitation and social integration. It also requests the Government to continue providing information on the measures taken within the framework of the DDR Programme to remove children from armed conflict and reintegrate them as well as the number of such children removed and reintegrated.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request directly addressed to the Government.

Syrian Arab Republic

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 2001)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments.

Application of the Convention in practice. The Committee previously noted that the ongoing conflict in the Syrian Arab Republic has had an alarming impact on children. It noted that the number of children affected by armed conflict in the Syrian Arab Republic has more than doubled, going from 2.3 million to 5.5 million, and the number of children displaced inside the Syrian Arab Republic has exceeded 3 million.

The Committee takes note of the Government's information in its report on the provisions of national legislation that give effect to the provisions of the Convention. However, the Committee notes that, according to the 2015 UNICEF report entitled "Small Hands, Heavy Burden: How the Syria Conflict is Driving More Children into the Workforce", four and a half years into the crisis, as a result of the war, many children are involved in economic activities that are mentally, physically or socially dangerous and which limit or deny their basic right to education. The report indicates that there is no shortage of evidence that the crisis is pushing an ever-increasing number of children towards exploitation in the labour market. Some 2.7 million Syrian children are currently out of school, a figure swollen by children who are forced to work instead. Children in the Syrian Arab Republic were contributing to the family income in more than three quarters of households surveyed. According to the report, the Syria crisis has created obstacles to the enforcement of national laws and policies to protect children from child labour, one of the reasons being that there are too few labour inspectors. In addition, there is often a lack of coherence between national authorities, international agencies and civil society organizations over the role of each, leading to a failure in national mechanisms to address child labour.

The Committee notes the Government's information in its 5th periodic report submitted to the Committee on the Rights of the Child published on 10 August 2017 (CRC/C/SYR/5, para. 203), that the Ministry of Social Affairs and Labour (MoSAL), in collaboration with the Syrian Authority for Family and Population Affairs (SAFPA) and in cooperation with other stakeholders, developed a National Plan of Action for the Elimination of the Worst Forms of Child Labour (NPA-WFCL). The Government also indicates that, in collaboration with UNICEF, the SAFPA conducted a survey on the worst forms of child labour in two industrial towns, Hassia in Homs and Haouch el Blas in Damascus.

While acknowledging the complexity of the situation prevailing on the ground and the presence of armed groups and armed conflict in the country, the Committee must once again express its deep concern at the situation of children in the Syrian Arab Republic who are affected by the armed conflict and driven into child labour, including its worst forms. The Committee urges the Government to take immediate and effective measures in the framework of the implementation of the NPA-WFCL to improve the situation of children in the Syrian Arab Republic and to protect and prevent them from child labour. It requests the Government to provide information on the results achieved, as well as the results of the surveys conducted in Hassia and Haouch el Blas.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2003)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments.

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (a). All forms of slavery or similar practices. Forced recruitment of children for use in armed conflict. The Committee previously noted that the Syrian Arab Republic had adopted a series of legislative reforms such as Law No. 11/2013 which criminalizes all forms of recruitment and the use of children under the age of 18 years by armed forces and armed groups. It noted, however, that numerous armed groups in the Syrian Arab Republic, including the Free Syrian Army affiliated groups (FSA), the Kurdish People Protection Units (YPG), Ahrar al-Sham, Islamic State in Iraq and Sham/the Levant (ISIS/ISIL) and other armed groups were reportedly recruiting and using children for logistics, handling ammunition, manning checkpoints and as combatants.

The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that armed terrorist groups recruit children and involve them in violence and exploit them sexually. The Committee notes that, according to the report of the Secretary-General on the situation of human rights in the Syrian Arab Republic of 9 June 2016 (A/70/919, paragraphs 50–52), from early 2015, UNICEF verified 46 cases of recruitment (43 boys, one girl, two unknown): 21 were attributed to ISIL, 16 to non-state armed opposition groups, five to armed groups affiliated with the Government, two (including a girl) to YPG, and two to government forces. UNICEF reported that children were increasingly recruited at younger ages (some as young as 7 years old) by non-state armed groups. Children's participation in combat was widespread and some armed opposition groups forced children to carry out grave human rights abuses, including executions and torture, while government forces allegedly submitted children to forced labour or used them as human shields. The Secretary-General also refers to reports from the OHCHR, according to which ISIL publicly announced, on 11 December 2015, the already known existence of a children's section among its ranks, the "Cubs of the Caliphate". The OHCHR also received allegations that ISIL was encouraging children between 10 and 14 years of age to join, and that they were training children in military combat.

The Committee further notes that, according to the report of the Secretary-General on children and armed conflict of 20 April 2016 (2016 report of the Secretary-General on children and armed conflict, A/70/836-S/2016/360, paragraphs 148–163), a total of 362 cases of recruitment and use of children were verified (the Secretary-General indicates that the figures do not reflect the full scale of grave violations committed by all parties to the conflict), and attributed to ISIL (274), the Free Syrian Army and affiliated groups (62), Liwa' al-Tawhid (11), popular committees (five), YPG (four), Ahrar al-Sham (three), the Nusrah Front (two) and the Army of Islam (one). Of the verified cases, 56 per cent involved children under 15 years of age, which represents a significant increase compared with 2014. The Secretary-General further indicates that the massive recruitment of children by ISIL continued, and that centres in rural Aleppo, Dayr al-Zawr and rural Raqqah existed that provided military training to at least 124 boys between 10 and 15 years of age. Verification of the use of child foreign fighters increased as well, with 18 cases of children as young as 7 years of age. In addition, the recruitment and use of children as young as 9 years of age by the Free Syrian Army was also verified, as well as the recruitment of 11 Syrian refugee children from neighbouring countries by Liwa' al-Tawhid, and the YPG continued to recruit boys and girls as young as 14 years of age for combat roles. Recruitment and use by pro-government groups was also verified, with five cases of boys being recruited by the Popular Committee of Tallkalah (Homs) to work as guards and conduct patrols. In addition, there were allegations of the use of children by government forces to man checkpoints.

The Committee must once again deeply deplore the use of children in armed conflict in the Syrian Arab Republic, especially as it entails other violations of the rights of the child, such as abductions, murders and sexual violence. It once again recalls that, under Article 3(a) of the Convention, the forced or compulsory recruitment of children under 18 years of age for use in armed conflict is considered to be one of the worst forms of child labour and that, under Article 1 of the Convention, member States must take immediate and effective measures to secure the elimination of the worst forms of child labour as a matter of urgency. While acknowledging the complexity of the situation prevailing on the ground and the presence of armed groups and armed conflict in the country, the Committee once again strongly urges the Government to take measures, using all available means, to ensure the full and immediate demobilization of all children and to put a stop, in practice, to the forced recruitment of children under 18 years of age into armed forces and groups. The Committee once again urges the Government to take immediate and effective measures to ensure that thorough investigations and robust prosecutions of all persons who forcibly recruit children under 18 years of age for use in armed conflict are carried out, and that sufficiently effective and dissuasive penalties are imposed in practice, pursuant to Law No. 11 of 2013. It requests the Government to provide information on the number of investigations conducted, prosecutions brought and convictions handed down against such persons.

Article 7(2). Effective and time-bound measures. Clause (a). Preventing the engagement of children in the worst forms of child labour. Access to free basic education. The Committee previously noted that, with approximately 5,000 schools destroyed in the Syrian Arab Republic, the resulting sharp decline in children's education continued to be a matter of great concern among the population. This report also indicated that more than half of Syrian school-age children, up to 2.4 million, were out of school as a consequence of the occupation, destruction and insecurity of schools.

The Committee notes that, according to the 2016 report of the Secretary-General on children and armed conflict (paragraph 157), the number of schools destroyed, partially damaged, used as shelters for internally displaced persons or rendered otherwise inaccessible has reached 6,500. The report refers to information from the Ministry of Education, according to which 571 students and 419 teachers had been killed in 2015, and from the United Nations that 69 attacks on educational facilities and personnel were verified and attributed to all fronts, which killed and maimed 174 children. The Committee further notes that, according to the report of the Special Rapporteur on the human rights of internally displaced persons on his mission to the Syrian Arab Republic of 5 April 2016 (A/HRC/32/35/Add.2, paragraphs 50–53), a further 400,000 children were at risk of dropping out of school as a direct result of conflict, violence and displacement. While basic education facilities were in place in the displacement centres visited by the Special Rapporteur, such centres, often using school buildings, offer only limited educational facilities.

According to the same report, UNICEF is working with local partners to reach some 3 million children and has implemented an informal education programme to reduce the number of children out of school. The inter-agency initiative "No Lost Generation" is a self-learning programme aimed at reaching 500,000 children who missed out on years of schooling. In areas hosting high numbers of displaced children, UNICEF is also rehabilitating 600 damaged schools and creating 300 prefabricated classrooms to accommodate 300,000 additional children. The Committee further notes that, according to UNICEF's 2016 Annual Report on the Syrian Arab Republic, UNICEF's interventions in education, focusing on quality, access and institutional strengthening, contributed to an increase in school enrolment from 3.24 million children (60 per cent of school-age population) to 3.66 million (68 per cent) between 2014–15 and 2015–16. These efforts also resulted in a decrease in the number of out-of-school children from 2.12 million (40 per cent) in 2014–15 to 1.75 million (32 per cent) in 2015–16.

Nevertheless, the Committee notes that, in his report, the Special Rapporteur on the human rights of internally displaced persons declares that the challenge of providing even basic education access to many internally displaced children is immense and many thousands of children are likely to remain out of education in the foreseeable future (A/HRC/32/35/Add.2, paragraph 53). The Committee is, therefore, once again bound to express its deep concern at the large number of children who are deprived of education because of the climate of insecurity prevailing in the country. While acknowledging the difficult situation prevailing in the country, the Committee urges the Government to strengthen its efforts and take effective and time-bound measures to improve the functioning of the educational system in the country and to facilitate access to free basic education for all Syrian children, especially in areas affected by armed conflict, and giving particular attention to the situation of girls. It requests the Government to provide information on concrete measures taken in this regard.

Clauses (a) and (b). Preventing the engagement of children in the worst forms of child labour, removing them from such work and ensuring their rehabilitation and social integration. 1. Children affected by armed conflict. The Committee previously noted that the recruitment and use of children in armed conflict in the Syrian Arab Republic had become common and that a great majority of the children recruited are trained, armed and used in combat.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that the competent authorities in the Syrian Arab Republic seek to care for children recruited in armed conflict and to help them return to ordinary life. However, the Committee notes with deep concern that the situation in the Syrian Arab Republic has not changed and that not only are there no reports of children having been withdrawn from armed forces and groups in the 2016 report of the Secretary-General on children and armed conflict but that, according to this report, children continue to be recruited and used in armed conflict. The Committee, therefore, strongly urges the Government to take effective and time-bound measures to prevent the engagement of children in armed conflict and to rehabilitate and integrate former child combatants. It once again requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken in this regard and on the number of children rehabilitated and socially integrated.

2. Sexual slavery. The Committee previously noted that ISIS abducted hundreds of Yazidi women and girls, most of whom were sold as "war booty" or given as "concubines" to ISIS fighters, and that dozens of girls and women were transported to various locations in the Syrian Arab Republic, including Al Raqqah, Al Hasakah and Dayr az Zawr, where they were kept in sexual slavery.

The Committee notes with regret the absence of information in the Government's report on this issue. It notes that, according to the report of the Independent International Commission of Inquiry on the Syrian Arab Republic of 15 June 2016 entitled "They came to destroy: ISIS Crimes Against the Yazidis" (A/HRC/32/CRP.2), ISIS has sought to destroy the Yazidis through such egregious human rights violations as killings, sexual slavery, enslavement, torture and mental harm. The report indicates that over 3,200 women and children are still held by ISIS. Most are in the Syrian Arab Republic where Yazidi girls continue to be sexually enslaved and Yazidi boys indoctrinated, trained and used in hostilities. The report reveals that captured Yazidi women and girls over the age of 9 years are deemed the property of ISIS and are sold in slave markets or, more recently through online auctions, to ISIS fighters. While held by ISIS fighters, these Yazidi women and girls are subjected to brutal sexual violence and regularly forced to work in their houses, in many instances forced to work as domestic servants of the fighter and his family. The Committee deeply deplores the fact that Yazidi children continue to be victims of sexual slavery and forced labour. While acknowledging the difficult situation prevailing in the country, the Committee strongly urges the Government to take effective and time-bound measures to remove Yazidi children under 18 years of age who are victims of forced labour and sexual exploitation and to ensure their rehabilitation and social integration. It once again requests the Government to provide information on specific measures taken in this regard, and the number of children removed from sexual exploitation and rehabilitated.

Clause (d). Identifying and reaching out to children at special risk. Internally displaced children. The Committee previously noted that, by early 2013, there were 3 million children displaced and in need of assistance inside the Syrian Arab Republic.

The Committee notes that, according to the report of the Special Rapporteur on the human rights of internally displaced persons on his mission to the Syrian Arab Republic of 5 April 2016 (A/HRC/32/35/Add.2, paragraph 67), the extent of the conflict and displacement has had a massive impact on children, many of whom have experienced violence first-hand and/or witnessed extreme violence, including the killing of family members and/or separation from family members. The Special Rapporteur indicates that child protection concerns and issues, including child labour resulting from parents' loss of livelihood, trafficking, sexual and gender-based violence and early and forced marriage, continue to be reported. Children have also been recruited and used by different parties to the conflict, both in combat and support roles. Observing with concern that internally displaced children are at an increased risk of being engaged in the worst forms of child labour, the Committee once again strongly urges the Government to take effective and time-bound measures to protect these children from the worst forms of child labour. It requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken in this regard and on the results achieved.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 1993)

Article 2(1) of the Convention. 1. Minimum age for admission to employment or work. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that despite its reiterated comments for many years, the Labour Code of 2016, in its section 21, prohibits the employment of children under 15 years, which is lower than the minimum age of 16 years specified by the Government at the time of ratification. The Committee further emphasized that the objective of the Convention is to eliminate child labour and that it allows and encourages the raising of the minimum age but does not permit the lowering of the minimum age once specified.

The Committee notes with deep regret that the Government does not provide information on any progress made in the amendment of section 21 of the Labour Code of 2016. The Committee therefore once again strongly urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that section 21 of the Labour Code of 2016 is amended in order to align this age to the one specified at the time of ratification, namely a minimum age of 16 years, and bring it into conformity with the provisions of the Convention. It further requests the Government to provide information on any progress made in this regard.

2. Scope of application and labour inspection. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the Labour Code does not seem to apply to work done outside employment contracts. It further noted that the State Supervisory Service for Labour, Migration and Employment under the Ministry of Labour supervises and monitors compliance with labour legislation, including monitoring of child labour in the formal and informal economy as well as children working on a self-employed basis. The Committee requested the Government to provide information on the number of inspections carried out and the number of violations related to child labour detected by the State Supervisory Service in the informal economy.

The Committee notes an absence of information on this point in the Government's report. Referring to its comments made under the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), the Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to strengthen the capacity and expand the reach of the State Supervisory Service to ensure appropriate monitoring of child labour in the informal economy and to guarantee the protection afforded by the Convention to children under the age of 16 years who are working in the informal economy. It also once again requests the Government to provide information on the number of inspections conducted by the State Supervisory Service in the informal economy as well as on the number and nature of violations detected with regard to the employment of children in this sector, and on the penalties applied.

Article 3(2). Determination of types of hazardous work. With regard to the list of hazardous types of work prohibited to children under the age of 18 years, the Committee requests the Government to refer to its detailed comments under the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182).

Application of the Convention in practice. The Committee previously noted from the Working children in the Republic of Tajikistan: The results of the child labour survey 2012-2013 (CLS report), issued on 17 February 2016, conducted in cooperation with ILO–IPEC, that of the 2.2 million children aged between 5 to 17 years in Tajikistan, 522,000 (26.9 per cent) were working, with an employment prevalence rate of 10.7 per cent among 5 to 11 year-olds and 30.2 per cent among 12 to 14 year olds. About 82.8 per cent of working children were employed in the agricultural sector, 4.4 per cent in wholesale and retail trade, and 3 per cent in manufacturing and construction. Of the total number of working children, 21.7 per cent were involved in hazardous work, including in agriculture, fishery and related works, forestry and related works, construction and street work. The Committee also noted various activities undertaken by the Child Labour Monitoring Unit (CLMU) in combating child labour and that child labour monitoring committees had been established in the hukumats (local councils) of Kulob and Khorugh with the aim of eliminating child labour and to provide assistance to children working in these areas.

The Committee notes from the latest report provided by the Government on the application of the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) that with support from the ILO-IPEC, the national trade unions have carried out a number of activities aimed at the elimination of child labour, including various trainings for trade union labour inspectors, schoolteachers, children, and their parents. The Government also indicates that, under the programme "Trade union capacity building to tackle forced and child labour" for 2017-2018, the work on identification of cases of forced and child labour was carried out in 11 districts of the country. The results of the programme were discussed by representatives of trade unions, public organizations, and the ILO. In addition, a Trade Union Federation action plan for preventing and tackling forced labour was devised for the period 2019-2021 based on the outcome of the programme. The Government further indicates that the child labour monitoring committees carried out 10 monitoring exercises in the first half of 2020 at the central market in Rudaki and found three cases of child labour in which young people 14 to 16 years of age were being put to work for a wheelwright ("arobakash"). The Committee also notes from the 2019 ILO publication "Some best practices employed in the project "Combating Child Labour and Human Trafficking in Central Asia – Commitment Becomes Action" implemented in Tajikistan in 2017 and 2018" that the child labour monitoring committees were established in 12 administrative subdivisions covering all districts of the country.

The Committee however notes that the UN Committee on the Rights of the Child (CRC) in its 2017 concluding observations expressed serious concern that approximately a quarter of all children aged between 5 and 17 from families facing social and economic hardships are engaged in economic activity. The CRC further recommended to reinforce the capacity of the ministerial CLMU and the local level child monitoring committees (CRC/C/TJK/CO/3-5, paragraph 43). The Committee requests the Government to continue its efforts to ensure the progressive elimination of child labour, in particularly, in hazardous work, in the country. The Committee further requests the Government to provide information on the impact of the activities undertaken by the CLMU and the child labour monitoring committees in terms of the number of children identified, removed and assistance provided.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Article 4(1) of the Convention. Determination of hazardous work. Following its previous comments, the Committee notes with satisfaction the adoption of the Government Decree No. 169 of 2014, which sets out the hazardous types of work prohibited to children under 18 years of age. In particular, the Government Decree No. 169 of 2014 contains an extensive list of the hazardous types of work in the different sectors of economy, such as mining, construction, agriculture, transport, metallurgical and chemical industries. It also sets out the maximum admissible weights that should be carried or lifted by young persons. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the application in practice of the Government Decree No. 169 of 2014, including the violations reported and penalties imposed to perpetrators.

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 1984)

Article 1 of the Convention. National policy and application of the Convention in practice. The Committee previously noted with concern the number of children under the minimum age who worked in Togo and urged the Government to intensify its efforts to combat child labour, particularly in agriculture and in the informal economy.

The Government indicates in its report that in 2016, the dashboard on child protection in Togo indicated that 1,424 children under 15 years of age were working; 860 of them were removed with the support of social welfare and non-governmental organizations. The Committee notes the lack of information provided by the Government on the steps taken to eliminate child labour. It also notes that the 2019-2022 Decent Work Country Programme (DWCP) provides for the implementation of a plan to combat unacceptable forms of work, including child labour and its worst forms.

The Committee notes that, according to the Multiple Indicator Cluster Survey (MICS) conducted in 2017 by the National Institute of Statistics and Economic and Demographic Studies (INSEED), in collaboration with the Ministry of Health and UNICEF, 43.2 per cent of children between 5 and 11 years of age are engaged in child labour and 25.2 per cent work in hazardous conditions (page 319). With regard to children between 12 and 14 years of age, 54.9 per cent are engaged in child labour and 39.4 per cent work in hazardous conditions (page 319). The Committee also notes the observations of the Special Rapporteur on contemporary forms of slavery, including its causes and consequences, in the report on her visit to Togo in May 2019, that children continue to work in markets in Lomé as porters and vendors. She emphasized that child labour was a socially acceptable practice. The Committee is bound to express its deep concern with regard to the persistent and considerable number of children who work in Togo, including in hazardous conditions. The Committee therefore urges the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure the effective abolition of child labour, including in hazardous work, particularly through the adoption and implementation of a national policy for the eradication of child labour. The Committee also asks the Government to take steps, without delay, to raise awareness of child labour among communities, and to provide information in this respect.

Article 2(1). Scope of application and labour inspection. The Committee previously noted that section 150 of the Labour Code of 2006 provides that children under 15 years of age may not be employed in any enterprise nor perform any type of work, even on their own account. It requested the Government to continue taking the necessary steps to strengthen the capacity of the labour inspection services to ensure that all children under 15 years of age, including those working on their own account or in the informal economy, benefit from the protection afforded by the Convention.

The Government indicates that the "Governance Project", which aims to strengthen inspectors' capacity with regard to fundamental principles and rights at work, has enabled labour inspectors to receive training on inspection in the informal economy. The Government also indicates that in 2017, a manual information-gathering system on the labour inspection services' activities was introduced. In addition, the Committee notes, in its 2019 comment on the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), and the Labour Inspection (Agriculture) Convention, 1969 (No. 129), that the Directorate General of Labour (DGT) envisages drawing up a lifelong training plan for labour inspectors. The Committee requests the Government to continue its efforts to strengthen the capacity of the labour inspection services, including in the informal economy, to identify children working below the minimum age for admission to employment, and asks the Government to provide information in this respect, as well as on the inclusion in the training plan for training on child labour. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the data gathered using the labour inspection services' data-gathering system concerning child labour, including statistical information on the number and nature of reported violations, and the penalties imposed in the event of violations.

Article 3(3). Admission to hazardous work from the age of 16 years. The Committee previously noted that Order No. 1464/MTEFP/DGTLS of 12 November 2007 authorizes the employment of children from the age of 16 years in hazardous work. It also noted that the Order authorizes children over 15 years of age to handle heavy loads, weighing up to 140 kilograms for boys using hand carts. Furthermore, it observed the lack of protection measures for the performance of this work. The Committee asked the Government to take the necessary steps to amend Order No. 1464/MTEFP/DGTLS to bring it into conformity with the provisions of Article 3(3) of the Convention.

The Government indicates that new Order No. 1556/MPFTRAPS of 22 May 2020, determining the hazardous types of work that children are prohibited from performing, has been adopted and has replaced the previous Order No. 1464. With regard to boys employed to carry loads of up to 140 kilograms using hand carts, the Committee takes due note of the increase in the minimum age from 15 to 16 years of age. For this type of work, provision has also been made for children to be given vocational training, or adequate specific instruction, and for adequate hygiene, safety and health measures to be observed. In addition, the employer must pay for the child to undergo a medical examination every six months in order to assess his ability to continue with the work. Labour inspectors are responsible for ensuring compliance with these requirements, including in the informal economy.

However, the Committee notes that, under the provisions of Order No. 1556/MPFTRAPS, activities included among hazardous types of work are still authorized for children from 15 years of age, including carrying, pulling or pushing loads within the weight limit established in section 11. Other activities are authorized from 16 years of age, including turning vertical wheels, winches and pulleys (section 9 of the Order) and carrying, pulling or pushing certain loads within the weight limit established in section 11 of the Order. The Committee observes, on the one hand, that the provisions allow for certain types of hazardous work to be performed by persons under 16 years of age. It notes, on the other hand, that the types of hazardous work authorized for children from 16 years of age, not including the transport of loads using hand carts, do not appear to comply with the strict conditions regarding protection and prior training set out in Article 3(3) of the Convention. The Committee reminds the Government that, under Article 3(3) of the Convention, the competent authority may, after consultation with the organizations of employers and workers concerned, where such exist, authorize employment or work as from the age of 16 years on condition that: (i) the health, safety and morals of the young persons concerned are fully protected, and (ii) they have received adequate specific training in the relevant branch of activity. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary steps to amend section 11 of Order No. 1556/MPFTRAPS of 22 May 2020, determining the hazardous types of work that children are prohibited from performing in order to guarantee that the hazardous work provided for under this Order can only be performed by children of at least 16 years of age. It also asks the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure that the health, safety and morals of children between 16 and 18 years of age performing certain types of hazardous work (under Order No. 1556/MPFTRAPS) are fully guaranteed and that these children have received adequate specific training in the relevant branch of activity. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the progress made in this regard.

Article 6. Apprenticeship. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that a draft code on apprenticeship had been prepared, specifying the conditions to be observed in apprenticeship contracts and stipulating that no such contracts may start before the completion of compulsory schooling and, under no circumstances, before 15 years of age. The Committee requested the Government to provide information on the adoption of this code.

The Government indicates that the process of adopting the code on apprenticeship is still under way. The Committee also notes the preparation of the bill amending Act No. 2006-010 of 13 December 2006 issuing the Labour Code. It notes that, according to the reasoning given for the bill, it will, inter alia, improve the regulation of apprenticeship. The Committee notes that section 123 of the amended draft Labour Code provides that an apprenticeship contract may not be concluded with a person under 15 years of age. Section 124 provides that the conditions relating to the conclusion and performance of the apprenticeship contract shall be determined by the legislation in force. The Committee takes due note of the bill amending the Labour Code of 2006, which sets the minimum age for the conclusion of an apprenticeship contract at 15 years, and trusts that this bill, as well as the draft code on apprenticeship, will be adopted without delay, in conformity with Article 6 of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the progress made in this respect, as well as a copy of the texts, once they have been adopted.

Article 8. Artistic performances. The Committee previously noted that, under section 150 of the Labour Code, which provides for exceptions to the minimum age for admission to employment or work of 15 years, a draft order (establishing exceptions to the minimum age for admission to employment) had been prepared. The draft order provided that the labour inspector may grant individual permits to children under 15 years of age to allow them to appear in public performances and to participate as actors or extras in films. The Government indicated that these exceptions would specify the authorized number of hours of work and working conditions. The Committee therefore asked the Government to take the necessary steps to adopt the draft order with a view to bringing the legislation into conformity with Article 8 of the Convention.

The Government indicates that the draft order is now outdated due to the ongoing revision of the Labour Code of 2006. However, the Committee notes that none of the provisions of the bill amending Act No. 2006-010 of 13 December 2006 issuing the Labour Code regulate the participation of children under 15 years of age in artistic performances. Section 191 of the bill reproduces section 150 of the current Labour Code of 2006, establishing that exceptions to the minimum age for admission to employment of 15 years shall be determined by ministerial order. The Committee therefore expresses the firm hope that the bill amending the Labour Code will be revised, or that an order will soon be adopted, in order to establish, after consultation with the organizations of employers and workers concerned, a system of individual permits for the participation of children aged under 15 years in artistic performances, which limit the number of hours during which and prescribe the conditions in which employment or work is allowed, in conformity with Article 8 of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide full information on the progress made in this regard.

Trinidad and Tobago

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2003)

The Committee takes note of the Government's report and the supplementary information provided in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020).

Articles 3(d) and 4(1) of the Convention. Determination of hazardous work. The Committee previously noted the Government's indication that work in the country would continue on the list of hazardous types of work for children in consultation with the social partners, but urged the Government to ensure that the list would be adopted in the near future, as work in this respect had been ongoing since 2004.

The Committee notes the Government's reiterated reference in its report, in response to the Committee's request, to the Occupational Safety and Health Act, which defines a "young person" as a child of the age of 16 and under the age of 18 years (section 4) and provides for limitations as to the hours of work of young persons (section 54). However, the Committee also notes the Government's indication that the list of occupations deemed hazardous to children has not yet been completed. In this respect, the Committee also notes that Outcome 3 entitled "Children are Protected" of the National Child Policy for 2018–28 (available on the website of the Gender and Child Affairs Division of the Office of the Prime Minister) provides for the prevention of child labour and the involvement of children in hazardous work, including through the definition of hazardous occupations and activities prohibited for children. Recalling that, pursuant to Article 1 of the Convention, each Member that ratifies the Convention shall take immediate measures to ensure the prohibition of the worst forms of child labour as a matter of urgency, the Committee once again urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the adoption of the list of hazardous types of work for children in the very near future. It once again requests the Government to provide a copy of that list once it has been adopted.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 1998)

The Committee takes note of the Government's report and the supplementary information provided in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020).

The Committee notes the observations of the Turkish Confederation of Employers' Associations (TİSK) communicated with the Government's report.

Article 1 of the Convention. National Policy designed to ensure the effective abolition of child labour and application of the Convention in practice. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the Time Bound National Policy and Programme Framework for Prevention of Child Labour (2005-2015) was in the process of being updated, and therefore requested the Government to provide information in this regard, as well as to strengthen its efforts to ensure the elimination of child labour.

The Government indicates in its report that the Time Bound National Policy and Programme Framework for Prevention of Child Labour 2005-2015 was renewed in 2016 under the name "National Programme on the Elimination of Child Labour", which has been implemented since March 2017, for the period 2017-2023. The main objective of this Programme is to prevent and eliminate child labour, especially the worst forms of child labour. It includes comprehensive measures such as measures to eradicate poverty, to improve the quality and accessibility of education, and to enhance awareness. The Government further indicates that the Monitoring and Evaluation Board for Eliminating Child Labour, which meets twice a year, is responsible for monitoring and evaluating the National Programme and its Action Plan.

The Committee notes the statement in the communication of TISK that the Action Plan associated with the National Programme on the Elimination of Child Labour 2017-2023 contains, in addition to the above measures, measures aimed at implementing and updating legislation; strengthening existing institutional structures and creating new ones; and widening the social protection and social security net. TISK also indicates that a Joint Declaration to Combat Child Labour has been signed by six ministries including the Ministry of Family, Labour and Social Services, seven social partners, and the ILO, in order to ensure that all children are protected from child labour and its worst forms, through access to education, employment of adult family members, and the extension of social protection. In addition, TISK indicates that in the framework of the National Employment Strategy Action Plans (2014-2023), it is provided, inter alia, that (i) annual plans will be developed to combat child labour; (ii) activities will be organised to raise awareness on child labour at the national and local levels, including among families; and (iii) a monitoring system on child labour will be set up to ensure coordination.

In its report formulated under the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182), the Government indicates that units for combating child labour were established in 81 provinces under the Provincial Directorates of Labour and Employment Agency.

The Government states in its supplementary information that a survey on child labour has been conducted by the Turkish Statistical Institute and was published on 31 March 2020. The Committee notes from this survey (Statistics on Child 2019 of the Turkish Statistical Institute) that 146 000 children aged 5-14 years, representing 1.1 per cent of this age group, were engaged in economic activities and that 28 per cent of these children (41 000) did not attend school. In addition, the Committee notes that 32 000 children aged 5-11 years, representing 0.4 per cent of this age group, were engaged in economic activities. Children worked in sectors including services and industry (pages 113, 114 and 116). While duly noting the Government's efforts, the Committee requests it to continue to take measures to ensure the progressive elimination of child labour in all sectors. It also requests the Government to provide information on the implementation of the National Programme on the Elimination of Child Labour 2017-2023 and its Action Plan, as well as of the National Employment Strategy Actions Plans 2014-2023. Lastly, it requests the Government to provide information on the activities of the units to combat child labour as well as the results achieved.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2001)

The Committee takes note of the Government's report and the supplementary information provided in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020).

The Committee notes the observations of the Turkish Confederation of Employers' Associations (TİSK) communicated with the Government's report.

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (a). All forms of slavery or practices similar to slavery. Sale and trafficking of children. The Committee previously urged the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the perpetrators of trafficking of children under 18 years of age were prosecuted, and that sufficiently effective and dissuasive penalties were applied in practice. It requested the Government to provide information on the number of prosecutions, convictions, and penalties imposed.

The Government indicates in its report that it introduced numerous administrative and legal measures to combat the trafficking of children under 18 years of age. It states that in the framework of a project to increase the organisational capacity of the women and children sections of the Gendarmerie General Command (2016-2020), training on child abuse and modern slavery were provided to the Gendarmerie staff. The Committee however observes the absence of information in the Government's report regarding the number of prosecutions, convictions and penalties imposed on perpetrators of trafficking of children.

The Committee notes the indication of the Group of Experts on Action against Trafficking in Human Beings of the Council of Europe (GRETA), in its report adopted on 10 July 2019 concerning the implementation of the Council of Europe Convention on Action against Trafficking in Human Beings in Turkey, that there are reports of refugee and migrant children, including Syrian children, sometimes unaccompanied, being trafficked or at risk of being trafficked for the purposes of sexual and labour exploitation, including begging, in the agricultural sector and in forced criminality (paragraphs 13 and 124). The Committee requests the Government to pursue its efforts to combat the trafficking of children under 18 years of age, including of migrant and refugee children, and to provide further information on the measures that have been taken in this respect. It once again requests the Government to provide information on the specific number of cases of trafficking of children identified, investigated, prosecuted and convicted, as well as the penalties imposed in this regard.

Clause (d) and Article 4(1). Hazardous work and excluded categories of work. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the Labour Law and the Child Employment Regulation excluded from their scope of application workers in businesses with less than 50 employees in the agricultural and forestry sector, construction work related to agriculture within the framework of the family economy, and domestic service. It noted that the Occupation Health and Safety Law (OSH Law) applied to all workers, including those excluded from the Labour Act, with the exception, inter alia, of domestic workers and self-employed workers. The Government indicated that the Code of Obligations No. 6098 covered domestic service and provided for the obligation of the employers to ensure occupational health and safety at the workplace. The Committee pointed out that children working in the informal economy and the domestic and agricultural sectors constituted high-risk groups who were usually outside the normal reach of labour controls and vulnerable to hazardous working conditions. It urged the Government to ensure that all children under 18 years of age were protected from hazardous work, including those working outside a labour relationship or out of the normal reach of labour controls.

The Government indicates that children working in heavy and hazardous work in Small and Medium-Sized Enterprises were determined as one of the primary target groups of the National Programme on the Elimination of Child Labour (2017-2023) (National Programme). The Committee notes the statement in the communication of TISK that children working on the streets, as well as in agricultural work other than family work and itinerant and temporary agricultural jobs were also determined as priority target groups by the National Programme. This National Programme provides for the modification of the scope of provisions of the Labour Law and the Regulation on Working Conditions in Works Counted as Agriculture and Forestry to cover children working in seasonal agricultural works and enterprises in which the number of workers is 50 or below. The Committee notes that the National Programme also provides for the modification of the Child Employment Regulation in this regard. The National Programme has determined work on the streets, heavy and hazardous work in Small and Medium-Sized Enterprises, and mobile and temporary agricultural work, except for family business, as worst forms of child labour in the country. The National Programme underlines that child labour in seasonal mobile and temporary agricultural labour is one of the most hazardous sectors in terms of occupational diseases and work accidents (page 21). Most children work on a seasonal basis, for four to seven months, leaving their homes to work notably in plant production work such as weeding, cleaning, harvesting, in extreme hot and humid environments. They are exposed to dangers caused by chemical substances, bug bites, back pain, hazards of machinery and equipment, long working hours, and heavy load lifting. In addition, a child's vulnerability to violence, neglect and abuse can be increased by agricultural work and seasonal agricultural migration (pages 33 and 34).

The Committee also notes, from the Government's supplementary information, that according to the Statistics on Child 2019 of the Turkish Statistical Institute, published on 31 March 2020, 720 000 children aged 5–17 years were engaged in economic activities, including 30.8 per cent in agriculture. The survey indicates that the risk of accident concerns 6.4 per cent of children engaged in economic activities. On average, 9.1 per cent of children aged 5–17 years engaged in economic activities were exposed to factors negatively affecting their physical health, such as: working in extremely hot/cold weather or in an excessively humid environment for 12.9 per cent of these children; exposure to chemicals, dust, fumes, smoke or gases for 10.8 per cent of these children; as well as working in difficult work postures or work movements and handling heavy loads for 10.1 per cent of these children (page 119). The Committee therefore once again urges the Government to ensure that all children under 18 years of age are protected from hazardous work, including in the agricultural sector, and to provide information on any progress made in this regard. It also requests the Government to provide information on any eventual modification provided for by the National Programme on the Elimination of Child Labour of the scope of the provisions of the Labour Law and related Regulations to cover children working in seasonal agricultural works and enterprises in which the number of workers is 50 or below.

Articles 5 and 7(2). Monitoring mechanisms and effective and time-bound measures. Children working in seasonal hazelnut agriculture. The Committee previously took note of a Pilot Project on the Prevention of the Worst Forms of Child Labour in Seasonal Hazelnut Agriculture until 2018, as well as a Pilot Project on "Testing United States Department of Agriculture's Application Proposals in Hazelnut Supply in Turkey", carried out in collaboration with the ILO. It further took note of the Circular "Access to education for the children of seasonal agricultural workers, migrants and semi-migrant families" of 2016, providing for concrete measures regarding the provision of education to the children of migrant workers and semi-migrant families engaged in seasonal agricultural work, in order to protect them from child labour. The Committee however noted the absence of labour inspection activities covering seasonal agricultural work, in particular the activity of hazelnut picking, between 2013 and 2016, and requested the Government to strengthen the capacity and expand the reach of the labour inspectorate in agriculture. It also requested the Government to continue its efforts to ensure that children under 18 years of age are not engaged in hazardous work in the agricultural sector, particularly in seasonal agricultural work and the nut harvest.

The Government indicates that a project entitled "Seasonal Agricultural Workers Project" (METIP) has been developed to eliminate the problems faced by seasonal agricultural workers and their families, including directing their children to education instead of work, and is being carried out successfully. In the framework of this project, a Seasonal Agricultural Information System (e-METIP) has been established within the Ministry of Family, Labour and Social Services in cooperation with the Ministries of Interior, Health and National Education, in order to monitor seasonal agricultural workers, their children, and their children's school attendance when they are of compulsory school age. As a result of this monitoring, absenteeism has decreased significantly. The Government further indicates in its supplementary information that the children of families working in seasonal agriculture were 21,023 attending school in the academic year 2017–18, 16,247 in 2018–19, and 15,581 in 2019–20 (in the latter academic year, the COVID-19 Pandemic should be taken into account).

The Government also indicates that the project carried out in cooperation with the ILO, entitled "Integrated Model for the Elimination of the Worst Forms of Child Labour in Seasonal Agriculture in Hazelnut Harvesting in Turkey" and implemented in the provinces of Ordu, Düzce, Sakarya and Şanlıurfa, was extended until 2020. It states that training and awareness-raising activities were carried out for families, garden owners and employers, and that many children working in seasonal agriculture were withdrawn from work and directed to education.

The Committee notes the ILO's information that, in the framework of the "Integrated Model for the Elimination of the Worst Forms of Child Labour in Seasonal Agriculture in Hazelnut Harvesting in Turkey", 1,022 children were withdrawn or prevented from work through provision of education services during the hazelnut harvesting season of 2018. In addition, children in the seasonal agriculture were provided with on-site education, guidance, counselling and rehabilitation services within social support centres during the hazelnut harvesting seasons in 2018 and 2019 in target provinces of Ordu, Düzce and Sakarya. Taking due note of the measures taken by the Government to reduce child labour in seasonal hazelnut agriculture, the Committee requests it to continue to provide information on the activities and results of the various projects implemented to reduce child labour in seasonal hazelnut agriculture, including information on the activities and results of the social support centres. Noting the absence of information regarding the activities of the labour inspectorate in agriculture, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to enable labour inspectors to have access to the sites where seasonal agricultural work is carried out, particularly hazelnut harvesting, in order to ensure that children under 18 years of age are not engaged in hazardous work in seasonal hazelnut agriculture.

Article 7(2). Effective and time-bound measures. Clause (b). Provide the necessary and appropriate assistance for the removal of children from the worst forms of child labour and for their rehabilitation and social integration. Child victims of trafficking. The Committee previously noted that the 2016 Regulation on Combatting Human Trafficking and Protection of Victims provided for measures to protect and assist child victims of trafficking. In particular, it provided for the presence of psychologists or social workers during interviews with child victims, for the handling of these children by the relevant units of the Ministry of Family, Labour and Social Services, and for access to education services as well as a voluntary and safe return programme for these children. The Committee requested the Government to continue its efforts to provide the necessary and appropriate direct assistance to child victims of trafficking, including their rehabilitation and social integration, and to provide information on the results achieved.

The Government indicates that it closely works with civil society to assist and protect child victims of trafficking. It specifies that in 2016, 33 victims of trafficking under the age of 18 were identified, 36 in 2017 and 56 in 2018. In addition, the Government indicates in its supplementary information that between January and June 2019, 37 child victims of trafficking were identified. It states that victim identification procedures, which are provided for in the Regulation on Combating Human Trafficking and Protection of Victims, are carried out by the Provincial Directorates of Migration Management. The Government further indicates measures that is has taken to protect unaccompanied minors, such as the establishment of Child Support Centres of the Ministry of Family, Labour and Social Services, which provide support and assistance to unaccompanied children aged 13–18 years of age. The Government also indicates, in its supplementary information, that it has established a Department of Legal Support and Victim Rights as one of the main units of the Ministry of Justice, which aims to support all victims of crime, including victims of trafficking, especially children, as well as to provide them with guidance and to prevent repeated victimization. In this framework, Forensic Support and Victim Services Directorates have been set up and are currently operating in 99 courthouses. The Government indicates that "forensic interview rooms" are in place in 72 courthouses, to ensure that child victims are interviewed in an appropriate environment. The Government adds that, in the framework of various projects carried out in partnership with international organisations in the field of trafficking in persons, two field studies on child trafficking are envisaged.

The Committee takes note of TISK's statement under the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29), according to which the Coordination Commission on Combatting Human Trafficking has been established under the Regulation on Combatting Human Trafficking and Protection of Victims, and has decided to create a working group on children. The Committee further notes the indication of the GRETA, in its above-mentioned report adopted on 10 July 2019, that according to the Turkish authorities, the working group on children met in September 2018 and decided that staff dealing with child victims should be provided with awareness-raising activities and training (paragraph 29). The GRETA also indicated that pursuant to the above-mentioned Regulation, child victims of trafficking were referred to the relevant units of the Ministry of Family, Labour and Social Services (paragraph 33). The Committee requests the Government to continue its efforts to ensure that child victims of trafficking are removed from this worst form of child labour, rehabilitated and socially integrated. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the concrete activities of the units of the Ministry of Family, Labour and Social Services responsible for the care of child victims of trafficking, as well as the measures that have been taken by the working group on children of the Coordination Commission on Combatting Human Trafficking. Lastly, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the activities of the Department of Legal Support and Victim Rights and its Directorates to support child victims of trafficking, and to provide copies of any studies that have been carried out on child trafficking.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2010)

The Committee proceeded with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the observations received from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) on 21 September 2020, as well as on the basis of the information at its disposal in 2019. The Committee requests the Government to reply to the observations of the ITUC.

The Committee notes the observations made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) received on 1 September 2019.

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (d). Hazardous work. 1. Cotton sector. In its previous comments the Committee noted the Government's information that the provisions under the Education Act of 2013 and the Rights of the Child (State Guarantees) Act of 2014, require children to attend school until the age of 18 and not to be involved in any work, including agricultural work that stops them from attending school. It also noted from the report of the ILO Technical Advisory Mission that took place in Ashgabat in September 2016, the statement made by the Minister of Education that children under the age of 18 years are fully engaged in education in Turkmenistan. Moreover, the statements made by the international organizations and foreign embassies that the mission met with, indicated that there were no reports of child labour in the cotton harvest, although access to the cotton fields was difficult.

The Committee notes the observations made by the ITUC that there were numerous cases of child labour reported during the 2017 cotton harvest season. According to the ITUC, during this period, in the Ruhabat and Baharly districts, there were secret orders that mobilized children into the fields during their fall break and there were "truckloads" of children sent to pick cotton. Massive use of child labour in the Mary, Lebap and Dashoguz regions were reported. The ITUC is of the view that, due to the centrally imposed quotas, local officials feel immense pressure and resort to forced labour and child labour. However, the Committee also notes the ITUC's statement that there were efforts by the Turkmen Government to keep children out of the fields in 2018. According to ITUC, while Turkmen.news' (an independent news and human rights organization) monitors witnessed some children in the cotton fields, these seemed to be isolated cases instead of the previous systematic use of child labour.

In this regard the Committee notes the Government's information in its report of 26 February 2018, submitted to the United Nations Human Rights Council that it has adopted national measures to prohibit child labour, particularly in the cotton sector and that during school year, children may not be hired to perform agricultural work that hinders their studies. Furthermore, officials of educational institutions are subject to disciplinary action under labour law for the use of child labour in educational institutions in any activity, including agriculture (A/HRC/WG.6/30/TKM/1, paragraphs 209–212). The Committee therefore strongly encourages the Government to continue taking effective measures to ensure that children under 18 years are not engaged in hazardous work or subject to forced labour in the cotton sector, including during the school holidays or their time out of school. It requests the Government to provide specific information on the steps taken in this regard, including measures to enforce the relevant legislation prohibiting children's involvement in the cotton harvest, and on any offences reported, investigations conducted, violations found and penalties imposed.

2. State-owned farms and bazaars. The Committee notes from the recent observations of the ITUC that during the 2019 summer, children in the summer camps, were sent by school authorities into harvesting potatoes on state-owned farms. These children between the ages of 9 and 17 were forced to work all day, sometimes in extreme temperatures without proper meals or drinking water. The ITUC further states that Turkmen News has documented in 2019 and 2020 the widespread exploitation of children in bazaars where they were forced to engage in hard labour, including carrying heavy loads in extreme weather conditions. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that children under 18 are not engaged in hazardous work, including measures to enforce all relevant legislation prohibiting children's involvement in such work and to keep the Committee informed on any offences reported, investigations conducted, violations found and penalties imposed under all such legislation.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government, which reiterates the content of its previous request adopted in 2019.

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 2003)

The Committee notes with concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments.

Article 1 of the Convention. National policy designed to ensure the effective abolition of child labour and application of the Convention in practice. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, according to the National Labour Force and Child Activities Survey 2011–12 of July 2013, a total of 2.009 million children aged 5–17 years were in child labour (approximately 16 per cent of all children). Moreover, a total of 507,000 children aged 5–17 years were found in hazardous work (25 per cent of the children in child labour). The Committee also noted that the Government acknowledged the problem of child labour in the country and recognized its dangers. It took due note of the Government's indication that the National Action Plan for the elimination of the worst forms of child labour in Uganda (NAP) was launched in June 2012. This NAP is a strategic framework that will set the stage for the mobilization of policy-makers and for awareness raising at all levels, as well as provide a basis for resource mobilization, reporting, monitoring, and evaluation of performance and progress of the interventions aimed at combating child labour. The Committee requested that the Government provide detailed information on the implementation of the NAP and its impact on the elimination of child labour.

The Committee notes the Government's information in its report that the NAP is in the process of being reviewed by the Government with support from the ILO. It also notes, from the ILO–IPEC field office, that a total of 335 children (156 girls and 179 boys) have been withdrawn from child labour and were given skills and livelihood training. Moreover, the child labour agenda has been promoted through the Education Development Partners Forum, Stop Child Labour Partners Forum and other national forums within the education and social development sectors. The Committee finally notes from the 2016 UNICEF Annual Report on Uganda that 7,226 children aged 5–17 years were withdrawn from child labour (page 28). While noting the measures taken by the Government, the Committee must express its concern at the number of children involved in child labour in the country, including in hazardous work. The Committee once again urges the Government to strengthen its efforts to ensure the effective elimination of child labour, especially in hazardous work. In this regard, it requests that the Government provide detailed information on the implementation of the reviewed NAP, once adopted. It also requests that the Government supply information on the application of the Convention in practice, particularly statistics on the employment of children under 14 years of age.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2001)

The Committee notes with concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments.

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (b). Use, procuring or offering of a child for prostitution. The Committee previously requested the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the procuring or offering of boys under 18 years of age for prostitution is prohibited, to impose criminal responsibility on clients who use boys and girls under 18 years of age for prostitution, and to ensure that boys and girls under 18 years of age who are used, procured or offered for prostitution are treated as victims rather than offenders. The Committee noted that the Director of the Directorate of Public Prosecutions had indicated that efforts were being made to amend the Children's Act of 2000 to fully comply with the Convention on the prohibition of the use, procuring or offering of children for prostitution.

The Committee notes with satisfaction that section 8A of the Children's (Amendment) Act of 2016 provides that a person shall not engage a child in any work or trade that exposes the child to activities of a sexual nature, whether remunerated or not. It notes that the perpetrator is liable to a fine not exceeding one hundred currency points or to a term of imprisonment not exceeding five years.

Clause (d). Hazardous types of work. Children working in mines. The Committee observes that, according to the UNICEF Situation analysis of 2015, the Karamoja region has a high incidence of child labour in hazardous mining conditions (page 13). The Committee also observes, from the UNICEF Annual Report of 2016, that 344 girls and 720 boys were removed from the worst forms of child labour, such as mining, as a result of the support of the Ministry of Gender, Labour and Social Development to the strategic plan for the national child helpline. Moreover, the Committee notes that section 8 of the Children's (Amendment) Act of 2016 prohibits hazardous work, and that the list of hazardous occupations and activities in which the employment of children is not permitted (first schedule of the Employment of Children Regulations of 2012) includes the prohibition of children working in mining. The Committee notes with concern the situation of children working in mines under particularly hazardous conditions. The Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the effective application of the Children's (Amendment) Act of 2016 and of the Employment of Children Regulations of 2012, so as to prevent children under 18 years of age from working in mines, and to provide the necessary and appropriate direct assistance for their removal.

Article 7(2). Effective and time-bound measures. Clause (d). Identifying and reaching out to children at special risk. 1. Orphans and vulnerable children. The Committee previously noted the Government's information that a range of factors has contributed to the problem of child labour, such as orphanhood arising from the HIV/AIDS pandemic. The Committee noted that orphans and vulnerable children (OVCs) in Uganda were recognized in both the Policy on orphans and other vulnerable children and the National Strategic Plan on OVCs. The Committee also noted that the policies and activities of the National Action Plan on Elimination of the Worst Forms of Child Labour in Uganda 2013–17 (NAP) include orphans and HIV/AIDS affected persons in its target groups. However, noting with concern the large number of children orphaned as a result of HIV/AIDS, the Committee urged the Government to intensify its efforts to ensure that such children are protected from the worst forms of child labour.

The Committee notes the absence of information on this point in the Government's report. The Committee however notes that, according to a report by the Uganda AIDS Commission, entitled: "The Uganda HIV and AIDS country progress report: July 2015–June 2016", approximately 160,000 OVCs received social support services and a mapping of OVC actors was conducted, among other achievements. The Committee also notes that the Second National Development Plan 2015/16–2019/20 outlines two programmes to support OVCs: the SUNRISE–OVC (Strengthening the Ugandan National Response for Implementation of Services for OVCs), and the SCORE (Strengthening Community OVC Response). While taking due note of the strategic plans developed by the Government and the decrease in the number of OVCs, the Committee notes with concern that there are still approximately 660,000 HIV/AIDS orphans in Uganda, according to UNAIDS estimates for 2015. Recalling that children orphaned as a result of HIV/AIDS and other vulnerable children are at particular risk of becoming involved in the worst forms of child labour, the Committee urges the Government to strengthen its efforts to protect these children from the worst forms of child labour. It requests the Government once again to provide information on specific measures taken in this respect, particularly in the framework of the Policy on orphans and other vulnerable children, the National Strategic Plan on OVCs, the SUNRISE–OVC and the SCORE, and the results achieved.

2. Child domestic workers. The Committee previously noted that the list of hazardous occupations and activities prohibits the engagement of children under 18 years of age in several activities and hazardous tasks in the sector of domestic work. However, the Committee noted that, according to the National Labour Force and Child Activities Survey 2011–12 of July 2013, approximately 51,063 children, that is 10.07 per cent of the number of children aged 5–17 years engaged in hazardous work in Uganda, are domestic housekeepers, cleaners and helpers. In this regard, the Committee observed that domestic workers form a group targeted by the NAP, and requested the Government to provide information on the impact of the NAP on the protection of child domestic workers.

The Committee notes the absence of information from the Government in this regard. Recalling that children in domestic work are particularly vulnerable to the worst forms of child labour, including hazardous work, the Committee once again requests the Government to provide information on the impact of the NAP on the protection of child domestic workers, particularly the number of child domestic workers engaged in hazardous work who have benefited from initiatives taken in this regard.

3. Refugee children. The Committee observes that, according to the UNICEF Uganda situation report of 31 May 2017, there are over 730,000 refugee children in Uganda, among more than 1.2 million refugees. The Committee also observes from the joint Updated regional framework for the protection of South Sudanese and Sudanese refugee children (July 2015–June 2017), developed by UNHCR, UNICEF and NGOs, that South Sudanese and Sudanese refugee children are subjected to child labour in Uganda (page 5). The Committee finally notes that a Uganda Solidarity Summit on Refugees took place in Kampala in June 2017 to showcase the Uganda model of refugee protection and management, to highlight the emergency and long-term needs of the refugees and to mobilize resources. While acknowledging the difficult refugee situation prevailing in the country and the efforts provided by the Government, the Committee strongly urges the Government to take effective and time-bound measures as a matter of urgency to specifically protect refugee children from the worst forms of child labour and to provide the necessary and appropriate direct assistance for their removal and for their rehabilitation and social integration. It requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken in this regard.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 1979)

Article 2(1) of the Convention. 1. Scope of application and labour inspection. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the Committee on the Rights of the Child (CRC), in its concluding observations (CRC/C/UKR/CO/3-4, para. 74), expressed concern at the high number of children below the age of 15 years working in the informal economy. In this respect, it also noted the Government's statement that the supervision of the use of child labour in the informal economy remained an outstanding issue which concerned, above all, the right of access to workplaces.

The Committee notes from the statistics provided by the Government, in its report, in response to the Committee's request for labour inspection statistics (in the formal and informal sector), that there appears to be a decrease in the activities of the labour inspection services as regards child labour, from 163 workplace visits in 2014 (with 334 minors found working), to 90 workplace visits in 2017 (with 177 minors found working). The Government adds that in 2018, 241 minors were found working during inspections. In this respect, the Committee refers to its comments adopted in 2019 under the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) in which it noted that the number of labour inspectors had significantly increased since 2018, but in which it also noted with deep concern that several restrictions and limitations on labour inspections remained in force in the country. The Committee also notes from the 2019 conclusions of the European Committee of Social Rights, under the European Social Charter, that in view of the available statistics of that Committee on the number of children aged 5 to 14 years involved in child labour or hazardous work, the prohibition of employment under the age of 15 was not guaranteed in practice. The Committee requests the Government to take all necessary measures to ensure that effective labour inspections in the area of child labour are conducted in practice. It also requests the Government to continue to provide information on the activities undertaken by the labour inspection services in this respect, including the number of labour inspections carried out, the number and nature of cases detected, and any follow-up measures taken.

2. Minimum age for admission to employment or work. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that under section 188(2) of the Labour Code, children of 15 years of age are exceptionally authorized to work with the consent of their parents or guardians. In this respect, the Committee observed that section 188(2) of the Labour Code allows young people to carry out an economic activity at an age lower than the minimum age for admission to employment or work specified by Ukraine upon ratifying the Convention, namely 16 years, and that an exception to the minimum age under the Convention is only permissible as regards light work, in line with the conditions as defined in Article 7(1) of the Convention.

The Committee notes, from the Government's indication in its report, and the website of the Parliament, that initiatives to amend the Labour Code are ongoing, but that no amendments have been made to the Labour Code so far, and that section 19(3) of the current draft Labour Code continues to contain similar provisions to the ones in section 188(2). The Committee once again expresses the firm hope that the Government will take the necessary measures, during the revision of the draft Labour Code, to ensure that no person under the age of 16 years may be admitted to employment or work in any occupation, in conformity with Article 2(1) of the Convention, except for light work as authorized under Article 7(1) of the Convention. It also once again expresses the hope that the revised draft Labour Code will be adopted in the near future.

Articles 3(3) and 6. Authorization to perform hazardous work from the age of 16 years and vocational training. The Committee previously noted that by virtue of section 2(3) of the Order of the Ministry of Health of Ukraine No. 46 of March 1994, persons under the age of 18 years pursuing vocational training may perform hazardous types of work for not more than four hours a day on condition that existing sanitary and health norms on labour protection are strictly observed, without specifying a minimum age. In this respect, the Committee observed that the legislation in force did not explicitly prohibit children between 14 (the age of admission to vocational training) and 16 years to perform hazardous work during vocational training. In this regard, it emphasized that the necessary measures should be taken to ensure that young persons below 16 years of age engaged in apprenticeship do not undertake hazardous work and that measures should be taken to raise the minimum age for admission to hazardous work to 16 years, even if the required protective conditions are adequately provided (2012 General Survey on Fundamental Conventions, paras 380 and 385).

The Committee notes that the Government's report does not contain specific information on this point, but that pursuant to section 299(4) of the draft Labour Code published on the website of the Parliament, hazardous work during vocational training shall only be permitted if children reach the age of 18 upon the end of their vocational training. The Committee once again urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that children who follow vocational training programmes or apprenticeships are allowed to perform hazardous work only from the age of 16 years, in conformity with Article 3(3) of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any progress made in this regard.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Articles 3 and 5 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour and monitoring mechanisms. Clause (a). Sale and trafficking of children. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the Committee on the Rights of the Child (CRC) in its concluding observations remained concerned that Ukraine continued to be one of the largest source countries of trafficking in Europe. It also noted the Government's information on the training and capacity-building activities in 2016 for the national police on trafficking in persons, and the investigations undertaken in 2015 regarding the application of section 149 of the Criminal Code on trafficking in persons, including six minors. The Committee requested the Government to provide specific information on the number of convictions and the penalties imposed on persons found guilty of trafficking children under 18 years of age.

The Committee notes an absence of information in the Government's report on this issue. In this respect, the Committee refers to its comments on the application of the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) in which it notes with concern the low number of convictions regarding trafficking in persons, despite the significant number of cases brought to justice (in 2018, there were 291 investigations, 168 cases were brought to the courts, and 15 convictions were issued, with five prison sentences). The Committee notes, from the website of the State Judicial Administration, that these convictions concerned trafficking of five children. Referring to its comments on the application of Convention No. 29, the Committee strongly urges the Government to ensure that thorough investigations and prosecutions of persons who engage in the sale and trafficking of children are carried out and that sufficiently effective and dissuasive penalties are imposed in practice. It also once again requests the Government to provide specific information on the number of prosecutions, convictions and specific penalties applied pursuant to section 149 of the Criminal Code on persons found guilty of trafficking children under 18 years of age.

Clause (b). Use, procuring or offering of a child for prostitution, production of pornography or for pornographic performances. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the grave concern expressed by the CRC in its concluding observations at the increase in the number of cases of sexual abuse, exploitation and involvement of children in prostitution and pornographic materials, and the alarmingly high number of internet users of child pornography (5 million users per month).

The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report in response to the Committee's request that, to strengthen the protection of children from sexual exploitation, amendments were made to the Criminal Code in 2018, including to section 302(4), which now provides for a penalty of between five and ten years for maintenance of brothels or procurement in cases involving children. The Committee also notes that the Government refers to cases concerning the investigation of sexual acts involving children, but that the Government does not provide specific information as regards the use, procuring or offering of children for prostitution, production of pornography or for pornographic performances. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the effective application of section 301 (import, manufacture, sale and dissemination of pornographic material), section 302 (maintenance of brothels and procurement) and section 303 (pimping or involvement of another in prostitution) of the Criminal Code as regards cases involving children, including the imposition of penalties constituting an effective deterrent. It once again requests the Government to provide statistical information on the number and nature of violations reported in this respect, investigations and prosecutions carried out, and convictions and criminal penalties imposed.

Article 7(2). Effective and time-bound measures. Clause (a). Preventing the engagement of children in the worst forms of child labour. Access to free basic education. In its previous comment, the Committee noted from the report of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR) on the situation of human rights in Ukraine (A/HRC/27/75) the suspension of school education in several towns of the Donetsk region due to the armed conflict in the country, and variations in school attendance where schools had remained opened. It further noted from that report that 35 per cent of the 155,800 internally displaced persons from the Donbas region and the Crimea, had been children who needed to be enrolled in school, and that an estimated 450,000 internally displaced persons, including children had been identified from the cities of Donetsk and Luhansk. The Committee had expressed its concern at the situation of children deprived of education in the climate of insecurity prevailing in the country.

The Committee notes the Government's indication, in response to the Committee's request, that between 2016 and 2019, the number of schools in rural areas increased significantly, and that much was done to enrol a number of children with disabilities in inclusive classes. The Committee also notes the Government's reference, to Order No. 367 of 2018, which according to the Government provides for improved access of education to internally displaced children, including: (i) simplified school enrolment; (ii) distance and individual learning; (iii) the possibility to sit the final school examination without enrolment; (iv) access to a higher or professional (vocational) education institution following an independent evaluation; and (v) the possibility to obtain a secondary-education certificate in one year. In this context, the Committee also notes that the Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (CESCR) in its 2020 concluding observations remains concerned at the regional disparities in access to quality education, with remaining problems in the Donetsk and Luhansk regions. The Committee also notes that the CESCR expresses concern at the persistently high rate of illiteracy among the Roma population, the high dropout rates among Roma children in secondary education, and the under-representation of Roma children in secondary and tertiary education (E/C.12/UKR/CO/7, paragraph 44). While noting the measures already taken and the difficult situation prevailing in the country, the Committee strongly encourages the Government to continue to take measures to facilitate access to free basic education for all children, particularly children in areas of armed conflict and internally displaced children, as well as children from the Roma population. It requests the Government to provide information on the concrete results achieved in this respect.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 1998)

Article 6 of the Convention. Minimum age for admission to apprenticeship. The Committee previously urged the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the draft amended section 42 of the Labour Code was adopted in the very near future to raise the minimum age for admission to apprenticeship from 12 to 15 years as required under the Convention.

The Committee notes with satisfaction the adoption of Ministerial Decree No. 519 of 2018 concerning the Regulations and Conditions of Training and Employment of Students enclosed with the Government's report which provides that "Any establishment is permitted to recruit students aged 15 years and above during their annual academic holidays, for a period that does not exceed three consecutive months each time" (section 1). Section 3 also provides that training shall not affect children's health or attendance at school and that the employer shall obtain a written consent from the student's parent or legal guardian and that the student shall provide a copy of his/her Emirates identity card as verification of his age, accompanied by a certificate of physical fitness or a declaration from the student's parent to this effect. Lastly, section 4 stipulates that the student shall obtain a no-objection certificate from the educational institute in which he/she is enrolled and that the employer shall conclude a training contract with the trainee clarifying the nature of work, its duration, the student's wage, weekly holiday and the number of daily working hours, which shall not exceed more than six hours per day, interspersed with one hour of rest.

United Republic of Tanzania

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 1998)

Article 1 of the Convention. National policy and application of the Convention in practice. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the various measures taken within the framework of the National Action Plan (NAP) for the Elimination of Child Labour, including providing trainings to government officials and other stakeholders and the establishment and reactivation of district child labour committees. The Committee further noted from the findings of the third National Child Labour Survey (NCLS) – the Analytical Report released in January 2016 – that 34.5 per cent of children aged between 5 and 17 are engaged in child labour with agriculture, forestry and fishing industry employing more than 92 per cent of all working children. The Committee observed that 22.1 per cent of children aged 5 to11 years and 36 per cent of children aged 12 to13 were involved in child labour, which amounts to about 2.76 million children in total. Noting with concern that a significant number of children below the minimum age were involved in child labour, the Committee urged the Government to strengthen its efforts to ensure the progressive elimination of child labour, and to continue taking measures to ensure that the NAP was effectively implemented.

The Committee notes the Government's information in its report that the NAP for the Elimination of Child Labour was merged with the NAP on Violence against Women and Children (VAWC). In December 2017, the Government endorsed the National Strategy on Elimination of Child Labour (2018–22) to strengthen the implementation of measures eliminating child labour through the NAP VAWC. According to the Government's information, this strategy has identified issues and interventions that would address child labour at all levels. The Government indicates that the ILO, with the Japan Tobacco International funding, is successfully implementing the Achieving Reduction of Child Labour in Support of Education (ARISE) project to support the Government in implementing the NAP VAWC 2017/18–2021/22.

The Committee also notes the information provided by the Government in its report under the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182), that within the framework of the Promoting Sustainable Practices to Eradicate Child Labour in Tobacco (PROSPER+) project 2016–17, several child labour awareness events in targeted communities involving 9,725 participants were carried out in collaboration with the Tanzania Leaf Tobacco Companies and Alliance One International. Moreover, the Tanzania Social Action Fund Conditional Cash Transfer Program (TASAF CCT) Phase III (2012–2018) which aims to provide financial assistance to vulnerable populations, including children, led to an increase in school enrolment and reduced child labour.

The Committee further notes from the Government's report to the Human Rights Council of February 2016 that the State's collaboration with Plan International and WEKEZA (Supporting Livelihoods and Developing Quality Education to Stop Child Labour) had succeeded in preventing 3,016 children between the ages of 5 and 13 from becoming child labourers, rescuing about 2,232 children from child labour, providing them with school facilities and bringing them back to schools and technical schools. This report also indicates that the State has collaborated with small–scale miners associations and raised awareness on the effects of child labour and the legal prohibitions. This campaign led some villages in the Geita Region to adopt by-laws, which prohibit child employment in mines and agricultural activities (A/HRC/WG.6/25/TZA/1, paragraph 63).

The Committee, however, notes from the ILO report entitled Child Labour and the Youth Decent Work Deficit in Tanzania, 2018, that child labour in Tanzania continues to affect an estimated 4.2 million children aged 5 to17 years. Around one in four children aged 5 to 13 years, almost 2.8 million children, are engaged in child labour. Nearly 95 per cent of child labourers are in the agricultural sector, often working for long hours and in hazardous conditions. The Committee finally notes the Government's statement that child labour remains a major challenge to socio-economic development and constitutes a major obstacle to achieving education for all and other developmental goals. The Committee once again expresses its concern that a significant number of children below the minimum age are still engaged in child labour in Tanzania. While noting the measures taken by the Government, the Committee once again urges the Government to strengthen its efforts to ensure the progressive elimination of child labour, including by taking effective and specific measures within the framework of the NAP VAWC as well as through collaborating with PROSPER, Plan International and WEKEZA. It requests the Government to continue to provide information on the measures taken in this regard and the results achieved in terms of progressively eliminating child labour.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Articles 3(d) and 5 of the Convention. Hazardous work and labour inspection. In its previous comments, the Committee noted from the analytical report of the National Child Labour Survey (NCLS) of 2014 that children in hazardous work amount to about 3.16 million, which constitutes 62.4 per cent of working children and 21.5 per cent of children aged 5–17 years. The highest proportion of children classified in hazardous work corresponds to those working under hazardous working conditions (87.2 per cent) followed by those working long hours (29 per cent). Carrying of heavy loads is the most common hazard, which involved 65.1 per cent of children in hazardous work. In addition, 46.8 per cent of total children in hazardous work experienced injuries, illness or poor health, which occurred as a result of work. The Committee urged the Government to intensify its efforts to eliminate this worst form of child labour.

The Committee notes that the Government, in its report, refers to various projects on child labour implemented in the country but provides no particular information on the trainings provided to or activities undertaken by the labour inspectors in monitoring hazardous work by children. It notes the Government's statement that children in Tanzania engage in the worst forms of child labour, including in mining, quarrying and domestic work. The Committee notes from the ILO report entitled Child Labour and the Youth Decent Work Deficit in Tanzania, 2018 that about 41 per cent of children (1,467,000 children) in the age group of 14 to 17 years are involved in hazardous work. This report states that monitoring the implementation of legislation is a major challenge owing to limited resources for inspection. The Committee must once again express its deep concern at the significant number of children working in hazardous work and conditions. The Committee strongly urges the Government to take the necessary measures to strengthen and adapt the capacities of the labour inspectorate to ensure that children under the age of 18 years are not engaged in hazardous work, particularly in mining, quarrying and domestic work. In this regard, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to promote collaboration between the labour inspectorate and other relevant stakeholders and to provide adequate training to the labour inspectors to detect cases of children engaged in hazardous work and remove them from this worst form of child labour. It requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken in this regard and on the results achieved.

Article 6. Programmes of action for the elimination of the worst forms of child labour and application of the Convention in practice. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that in collaboration with the ILO, the Government was implementing a number of programmes, including the National Action Plan for the Elimination of Child Labour (NAP); Achieving Reduction of Child Labour in Support of Education (ARISE) programme with the support of Japan Tobacco International (JTI); and the Promoting Sustainable Practices to Eradicate Child Labour in Tobacco (PROSPER) programme with the support of Winrock International in the tobacco sector. The Committee requested the Government to continue providing information on the implementation of these programmes, and the results achieved in terms of eliminating the worst forms of child labour.

The Committee notes the Government's information on the various awareness raising events, trainings and sensitization events on combating child labour and its worst forms conducted within the framework of the PROSPER project. The Government report also states that it is implementing the Eradicating the Worst Forms of Child Labour (EWFCL) in the Eight Mining Wards of Geita District- Phase 2 (2015–19) project and the ILO Project on Global Research on Child Labour Measurement and Policy Development (MAP) which aims to build critical knowledge and capacity for accelerating progress against child labour by supporting data collection and analysis on child labour and children in hazardous work. The Committee encourages the Government to continue taking effective measures to eliminate the worst forms of child labour, in particular hazardous work and to provide information on the results achieved. It requests the Government to provide information on the specific measures taken within the framework of the EWFCL and MAP projects to combat hazardous child labour. It also requests the Government to continue providing statistical information on the nature, extent and trends of the worst forms of child labour, and the number of children covered by the measures giving effect to the Convention.

Article 7(2). Effective and time-bound measures. Clause (a). Prevent the engagement of children in the worst forms of child labour. Access to free basic education. The Committee notes from the joint report by the Ministry of Education, Science and Technology and the UNICEF entitled Global Initiative of Out-of-School children-Tanzania Country report, 2018 that a total of 3.9 million children between the ages of 7 and 17 are out of school in Tanzania. Of these, 1.7 million children of primary school age and about 400,000 children of the lower secondary school age never attended any school. The transition rate from primary school to secondary school is 56.3 per cent. The Committee also notes from the UNESCO statistics that the net enrolment rate at the primary level in 2018 is 81.33 per cent while at the secondary level it is 26.55 per cent. The Committee expresses its concern at the low enrolment rates at the primary and secondary education levels. Considering that education is key in preventing the engagement of children in the worst forms of child labour, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to improve the functioning of the educational system, so as to ensure that all children have access to quality education. In this regard, it requests the Government to strengthen its measures to increase the primary and secondary school enrolment and attendance rates and decrease the drop-out rates and the number of out-of-school children. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the measures taken in this regard and on the results achieved.

Clause (d). Identify and reach out to children at special risk. Children orphaned by HIV/AIDS and other vulnerable children. The Committee previously noted the Government's information that the Free Education Programme for Primary and Secondary Level Education, which was being implemented, would increase access to educational opportunities for children orphaned by HIV/AIDS. It also noted that the second National Costed Plan of Action for Most Vulnerable Children (NCPA MVC II, 2013–17) called for a government-led and community-driven response to facilitate access of MVCs to adequate care, support, protection and basic social services. In addition, a National MVC Monitoring and Evaluation Plan was adopted in January 2015 to ensure an effective and efficient coordination of MVC programme interventions. Noting from the 2015 UNAIDS estimates on HIV and AIDS, that there remained approximately 790,000 child orphans of HIV/AIDS in Tanzania, the Committee urged the Government to strengthen its efforts to ensure that children orphaned by HIV/AIDS are prevented from being engaged in the worst forms of child labour and are provided with appropriate support and access to education.

The Committee notes that the Government refers to the National Strategy on the Elimination of Child Labour 2018-22, the National Action Plan on Violence against Women and Children (NAP VAWC) 2017-2022 and the Decent Work Country Programme as having measures to address the issues of vulnerable children and the worst forms of child labour. The Committee also notes from the ILO publication entitled Child Labour and the Youth Decent Work Deficit in Tanzania, 2018 that one of the objectives of the National Strategy on Elimination of Child Labour 2018-22 is to improve access of all vulnerable children to alternative forms of education. Moreover, the NCPA MVC contains a number of intervention strategies designed to positively impact the lives and welfare of the country's most vulnerable children. The Committee, however, notes from the UNAIDS estimates of 2019 for Tanzania that the number of child orphans due to AIDS aged under 17 has reached 860,000. Considering that children orphaned by HIV/AIDS are at an increased risk of being engaged in the worst forms of child labour, the Committee urges the Government to continue its efforts to ensure that those children are prevented from being engaged in the worst forms of child labour, in particular by increasing their access to education and vocational training and providing appropriate assistance and support. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the concrete measures taken within the NAP-VAWC, the NCPA MVC and the DWCP in this regard and the results achieved in terms of the number of orphans and vulnerable children withdrawn from the worst forms of child labour and rehabilitated.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

United States of America

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 1999)

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020). The Committee proceeded with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the supplementary information received from the Government this year as well as on the basis of the information at its disposal in 2019.

The Committee notes the observations of the American Federation of Labour and Congress of Industrial Organizations (AFL–CIO) received on 18 September 2019.

Articles 4(1), 5 and 7(1) of the Convention. Determination of types of hazardous work, monitoring mechanisms and penalties. Hazardous work in agriculture from 16 years of age. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that section 213 of the Fair Labour Standards Act (FLSA) permits children aged 16 years and above to undertake, in the agricultural sector, occupations declared to be hazardous or detrimental to their health or well-being by the Secretary of Labour. The Government, referring to Paragraph 4 of the Worst Forms of Child Labour Recommendation, 1999 (No. 190), stated that Congress considered it as safe and appropriate for children from the age of 16 years to perform work in the agricultural sector. However, the Committee noted that work in agriculture was found to be "particularly hazardous for the employment of children" by the Secretary of Labour. According to the website of the Occupational Safety and Health Administration (OSHA), agriculture ranked among the most dangerous industries.

The Committee also noted the Government's detailed information concerning the intensification of its efforts to protect young agricultural workers' occupational safety and health. For example, the Wage and Hour Division (WHD) of the Department of Labour (DOL) developed strategy to use education and outreach to promote understanding of agricultural employers' and workers' rights and responsibilities alike. The WHD also strengthened the protection of young workers by making full use of the regulatory tools available to it, including the new "hot goods" provision and the Child Labour Enhanced Penalty Program, which enabled it to impose increased penalties on violators of child labour law. The Committee further noted the Government's statement that the Environmental Protection Agency's Worker Protection Standard (WPS) (40 C.F.R. Part 170) was revised to prohibit children under 18 from handling agricultural pesticides. The Committee encouraged the Government to continue taking measures to ensure that children under 18 years of age only be permitted to perform work in agriculture on the condition that their health and safety are protected and that they receive adequate specific instruction.

The Committee notes that the AFL–CIO indicates in its observations that there have not been significant improvements to the laws, related work rules or their enforcement. According to the report entitled "Working Children: Federal Injury Data and Compliance Strategies Could be Strengthened" published by the US Government Accountability Office in November 2018, while 5.5 per cent of working children toiled on farms, agriculture was responsible for more than half of child occupational deaths. Between 2003 and 2016, 237 children died in farm-related work accidents, representing four times the number of deaths of any other sector. The AFL–CIO also states that the DOL found only 34 violations per year over a several year period and that the extremely low number of violations detected shows the weak enforcement. The AFL–CIO further indicates that, according to the Farm Labour Organizing Committee (FLOC) reports, there are still children under 16 years of age doing hazardous work in the tobacco fields. The failure to update the Agricultural Hazardous Occupations Orders means that the DOL plays no role in enforcing minimum work ages (except for the age of 12 which is still legally the minimum age across agriculture).

The Committee notes the Government's information in its report that the amendment of the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA)'s Worker Protection Standard (WPS), which prohibits pesticide usage by young workers under 18 years of age (except for those in the immediate family of the farmer), came into effect in January 2017. The Government indicates that OSHA and the WHD continue to conduct extensive outreach and education campaigns to ensure that young workers are aware of their rights, have accurate safety information and know where to find helpful resources. The WHD also conducts numerous investigations during the reporting period. When violations occur, the WHD pursues effective penalties and resolutions to protect young workers. The Committee also notes the supplementary information provided by the Government in 2020, according to which, in 2019, the WHD found child labour violations in 858 concluded cases. In those cases, WHD found that 3,073 minors were working in violation of the Fair Labour Standards Act. In 240 of the cases, violations of Hazardous Occupation Orders (HOs) were found, with a total of 544 minors employed in violation of HOs. The most common violations often involve the failure to comply with the hours standards for 14- and 15-year-olds in non-agricultural industries, and the failure to comply with HOs in non-agricultural industries for 16- and 17-year-olds. The Committee observes that the above information only concerns violations of HOs in non-agricultural industries.

The Committee also notes the Government's reference to the surveys related to children working in agriculture carried out by the National Institute for Occupational Safety and Health (NIOSH). According to the report "Young Worker Injury Deaths: A Historical Summary of Surveillance and Investigative Findings" published in 2017, agriculture production is ranked as the sector with both the highest fatality number (389 deaths) for all youth under 18 and the highest fatality rate (19.7 per cent) for youth aged 15–17 from 1994 to 2013 (page 16). Between 1982 and 2010, there were 31 investigations conducted by the State Fatality Assessment and Control Evaluation (FACE) for youth fatalities that occurred in the agriculture production industry. In almost half of the 31 investigations, the youth was working in a business owned by a family member; and in 14 investigations, the employer was reported to be the youth's parent or guardian. Documentation of formal training was rare, with two of the 31 investigated fatalities reporting that the youth received formal training. Moreover, most of the 31 investigated fatalities occurred on operations not covered by child labour regulations or on operations where coverage could not be determined (pages 57–58). In addition, according to the 2019 Fact Sheet on Childhood Agricultural Injuries in the US, from 2001 to 2015, 48 per cent of all fatal injuries to young workers occurred in agriculture. Since 2009, the number of youth worker fatalities in agriculture has been higher than in all other industries combined. In 2016, young workers were 7.8 times more likely to be fatally injured in agriculture when compared to all other industries combined. Transportation incidents were the most common fatal event, with tractors and all-terrain vehicles (ATVs) as the primary vehicle sources.

While taking note of the measures taken by the Government to protect the health and safety of young persons working in agriculture, the Committee must note with concern that a significant number of children under 18 years still suffer injuries, some serious, while engaged in farm work. Moreover, the statistical information shows that agriculture production remains the most dangerous sector for children, with the highest number of fatal injuries, especially for those who work for family-owned businesses or perform operations not covered by child labour regulations. In this regard, the Committee once again recalls that work which, by its nature or the circumstances in which it is carried out was likely to harm the health, safety or morals of children, constitutes one of the worst forms of child labour and, therefore, Member States are required to take immediate and effective measures to secure the prohibition and elimination of the worst forms of child labour as a matter of urgency. While Article 4(1) of the Convention allows the types of hazardous work to be determined by national laws or regulations or the competent authority, after consultation with the social partners, the Committee notes that in practice, the agricultural sector, which is not on the list of hazardous types of work, remains an industry that is particularly hazardous to young persons. The Committee therefore urges the Government to strengthen its efforts to ensure that children under 18 years of age only be permitted to perform work in agriculture on the condition that their health and safety are protected and that they receive adequate specific instruction. It also requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the child labour regulations apply to all children working in agriculture, and to strengthen the capacity of the institutions responsible for the monitoring of child labour in agriculture, to protect child agricultural workers from hazardous work. The Committee further requests the Government to continue providing detailed statistical information on child labour in agriculture, including the number of work-related injuries of children working in agriculture, as well as the extent and nature of child labour violations detected, investigations carried out, prosecutions, convictions and penalties applied.

Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 1987)

The Committee proceeded with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the observations received from the Confederation of Workers of Venezuela (CTV) on 11 December 2019; the Federation of University Teachers' Associations of Venezuela (FAPUV) and the Independent Trade Union Alliance Confederation of Workers (CTASI) on 15 September 2020; and the FAPUV on 30 September 2020, as well as on the basis of the information at its disposal in 2019. The Committee requests the Government to reply to these observations.

Article 1 of the Convention. National policy, labour inspection and application of the Convention in practice. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to provide information on the penalties imposed for infringements recorded by labour inspectors. It once again requested it to take the necessary steps as soon as possible to ensure that up-to-date statistics on the situation of children and young persons who are working in the country, particularly in hazardous work and the informal economy, are made available. The Committee also requested the Government to provide information on the national measures and policies adopted or contemplated to ensure that all children and young persons, including in the informal economy, benefit from the protection granted by the provisions of the Convention.

The Committee notes in the Government's report that the supervisory units monitor the application of section 32 of the Basic Act on labour and workers, which lays down the prohibition of the engagement in labour of children under 14 years. Of a total of 18,141 inspections conducted between 2016 and 2018, two cases of child labour were detected, regarding adolescents working with their parents in agriculture. Given that corrective measures were implemented by the employers on those occasions, the Government did not initiate a procedure to impose penalties against them. In that regard, the Committee notes that, in its observations, the CTV expresses concern at the low number of cases of child labour detected which, in its views, does not reflect an appropriate enforcement of section 32 of the Basic Act on labour and workers by the Government.

The Committee notes that the national system of guidance for the comprehensive protection of children and young persons is made up of several action programmes in coordination with the national education system and the national health system, and also notes the national systems entitled "Missions" and "Great Missions". It notes the inter-ministerial cooperation agreement signed in 2018, between the People's Ministry for the Social Process of Labour and the Independent Institute of the National Committee for the Rights of Children and Adolescents, aimed at strengthening the monitoring of working conditions of adolescents under the age of 18. This agreement establishes a system of coordination among institutions based on a digital platform, in order to record data related on labour performed by young persons under 18 years.

The Committee notes the number of young persons registered during labour inspections between 2016 and 2018. In 2016, of the 10,076 inspections led, 2,139 cases of adolescents at work were detected (950 girls and 1,189 boys); in 2017, of the 14,691 inspections conducted, 1,879 cases of adolescents at work were detected (887 girls and 992 boys) and in 2018, of the 24,465 inspections conducted, 1,684 cases of adolescents at work were detected (721 girls and 963 boys). The Government underlines in its report that during inspections, no cases were identified of child or adolescent victims of the worst forms of child labour.

The Committee notes that, according to the Government, the children subjected to labour in the informal economy, specifically hawking in open-air markets, popular markets or other places of informal trade activities, are monitored through different programmes led by the Municipal Councils for Children's and Young Persons' Rights and by the Children's and Young Persons' Protection Councils. In addition, checks on the working conditions of self-employed workers have been incorporated by the People's Ministry for the Social Process of Labour into the Comprehensive Programme for Agricultural Inspection. This Programme monitors the participation of children and young persons in the informal economy, including their working hours and the consequences of this type of work on their school attendance. According to the Government's information, of the 446 inspections carried out in family agriculture, child labour does not exceed ten hours and does not interfere with their school attendance. The Committee however notes that, in their observations, the CTV, FAPUV and CTASI express concern about the lack of statistical information available on the number of children engaged in child labour in the informal economy, thus impeding an appropriate assessment of the magnitude of this phenomenon which is increasing, as well as of the implementation of the Convention. Furthermore, in FAPUV and CTASI's views, child labour seriously interferes with the school attendance of children and young persons. In that regard, the Committee notes that, in its observations, the CTV highlights that, in 2018, the drop-out rate from school was estimated at 58 per cent and is still increasing. The Committee requests the Government to provide updated statistical information on the number of children and adolescents working in the country, including in hazardous work and the informal economy, and information on the number and nature of the infringements detected by labour inspectors, and the penalties imposed in this regard. The Committee also requests the Government to provide detailed information on the actions undertaken and results obtained within the framework of the various programmes, such as the programmes led by the Municipal Councils for Children's and Young Persons' Rights and the Children's and Young Persons' Protection Councils, which monitor the children involved in informal economy activities, and the action programmes in coordination with the national education system and the national health system, and the national systems entitled "Missions" and "Great Missions", as well as on their impact on the school attendance and completion rates of children and young persons.

Article 3(3). Admission to hazardous work from the age of 16 years. In its previous comments, the Committee once again requested the Government to take the necessary measures as soon as possible to bring its national legislation into conformity with the Convention, ensuring that any exceptions to the prohibition on hazardous work authorized by the Act of 1998 concerning the protection of children and young persons, only apply to young persons between 16 and 18 years of age and only under the conditions laid down in Article 3(3) of the Convention.

The Committee notes that the Government once again highlights that its legislation prohibits all forms of hazardous work to children under 18 years. It also indicates that sections 78 and 89 of the 1999 Constitution of Venezuela and sections 18 and 96 of the Act of 1998 concerning the protection of children and young persons are in line with the 2012 Basic Act on labour and workers. In that regard, the Committee notes that, in CTV's views, such provisions are not implemented in practice.

Furthermore, even though the Regulations on Occupational Health and Safety of 1973 prohibit hazardous or unhealthy activities to young persons under 18 years, the Committee once again emphasizes that under the terms of section 96 of the Act of 1998 concerning the protection of children and young persons, the national executive authority may determine minimum ages higher than 14 years for types of work that are hazardous or harmful to the health of young persons. Further, the Committee once again recalls that the employment of young persons between 16 and 18 years in hazardous work is only authorized subject to the application of strict conditions which ensure their protection and the provision of prior training and is never authorized for young persons under 16 years of age. The Committee once again requests that the Government take the necessary measures as soon as possible to bring its national legislation into conformity with the Convention, ensuring that any exceptions to the prohibition on hazardous work authorized by the Act of 1998 concerning the protection of children and young persons, only apply to young persons between 16 and 18 years of age and only under the conditions laid down in Article 3(3) of the Convention.

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2005)

The Committee proceeded with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the observations received from the Federation of University Teachers' Associations of Venezuela (FAPUV) and the Independent Trade Union Alliance Confederation of Workers (CTASI) on 15 September 2020; the CTASI on 30 September 2020; and the FAPUV on 30 September 2020, as well as on the basis of the information at its disposal in 2019. The Committee requests the Government to reply to these observations.

Articles 3(a) and 7(1) of the Convention. Sale and trafficking of children; and penalties. In its previous comments, the Committee noted with concern the impunity which appeared to exist in Venezuela for the perpetrators of the crime of child trafficking. The Committee requested the Government to intensify its efforts to combat such impunity. It requested the Government to supply information on the number of convictions handed down and penalties imposed against the perpetrators of these crimes. It also requested it to provide information on the progress made regarding the adoption of the draft bill against trafficking in persons.

The Committee notes in the Government's report the activities carried out by the National Office against Organized Crime and the Funding of Terrorism (ONCDOFT) relating to the prevention of trafficking in persons and smuggling of migrants. Several awareness-raising activities have been carried out in communities and public education institutions at the national level, as well as activities to disseminate information on organized crime and its risks.

The Committee notes that the draft bill against trafficking in persons has not yet been adopted. However, the Government states that sections 41 and 42 of the Act of 2012 against organized crime and the funding of terrorism strengthened the penalties for violations related to the sale and trafficking of children and young persons for forced labour or sexual exploitation, and the illegal transport of persons within and outside the country.

In addition, the Committee takes note of the statistics provided by ONCDOFT on judicial proceedings brought against the perpetrators of trafficking in persons between 2015 and 2018. In 2015, 24 persons were prosecuted (13 men and 11 women); in 2016, 46 persons were prosecuted (22 men and 24 women); in 2017, 32 persons were prosecuted (12 men and 20 women) and lastly, in 2018, 131 persons were prosecuted (63 men and 68 women). The Committee notes that the data provided does not indicate whether any of these prosecutions concern children under 18 years of age. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the adoption process of the draft bill against trafficking in persons. The Committee once again requests the Government to supply detailed information on the complaints filed, convictions handed down and penalties imposed under sections 41 and 42 of the Act against organized crime, indicating those cases involving victims below 18 years of age. As far as possible, this information should be disaggregated by age and gender.

Articles 3 and 7(2). Worst forms of child labour and effective and time-bound measures. Clauses (a) and (b). Preventing the engagement of children in, and removing children from, the worst forms of child labour, and ensuring their rehabilitation and social integration. Trafficking and commercial sexual exploitation. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to take effective measures to remove children from trafficking and sexual exploitation and ensure their rehabilitation and social integration. It requested the Government to provide information on the results achieved through the various plans which had been implemented and on the number of child victims of trafficking and sexual exploitation who had been the beneficiaries of these measures.

The Committee takes note, according to the Government's report, that public servants have participated in a workshop on criminal investigations into cases of trafficking in persons, focused on the prevention of migrant trafficking and smuggling, early detection of potential victims, identification of traffickers, recording of information gathered, an appropriate criminal investigation process and the distinction between trafficking in persons and smuggling of migrants. A national network against organized crime and funding of terrorism has been developed by the Government, represented in each province of the country. This network is organized into 24 coordination units which carry out prevention activities and coordinate the various national competent entities regarding operations for the monitoring, repression and follow-up of crimes of trafficking in persons and migrant smuggling. In 2018, the Government also provided training and capacity-building for public servants at key border control locations. This training course, entitled "Border Trafficking Route", focuses on preventive measures and the implementation of control mechanisms to combat trafficking in persons and smuggling of migrants, and on the identification of potential victims and support measures for them.

The Committee also notes that the Office of the Ombudsman, together with UNICEF, has renewed the national training plan on the rights of trafficking victims, especially women, children and young persons. The implementation of this plan falls within the mandate of the Office of the Ombudsman to promote, defend and monitor human rights, and involves the participation of all institutional bodies in the country devoted to the issue of trafficking in persons and smuggling of migrants.

Further, the Committee notes that under the national system of guidance for the comprehensive protection of children and young persons, within the framework of the 2015 Act on the protection of children and young persons (section 117), programmes are implemented for the rehabilitation of children and young persons who are victims of exploitation or abuse. Prevention programmes are also in place to prevent children and young persons from being subjected to such exploitive situations.

The Committee notes, from the Government's report, the current revision by ONCDOFT of the protocol for assistance to victims of trafficking. While noting the various actions undertaken by the Government to combat trafficking and sexual exploitation for commercial purposes, the Committee once again expresses its regret at the lack of information provided by the Government on the results achieved by these programmes. The Committee once again requests the Government to provide information on the results achieved through the various plans that have been implemented and on the number of child victims of trafficking and sexual exploitation who have been the beneficiaries of these measures. The Committee also requests the government to supply information on the ONCDOFT protocol for assistance to victims of trafficking, once it has been revised.

Article 3(d). Children engaged in hazardous mining activities. The Committee notes that, in their observations, the FAPUV and CTASI express specific concerns about cases of children engaged in illegal mining activities in the state of Bolívar, in particular in "Arco Minero del Orinoco" (AMO), to which children from indigenous communities are particularly exposed. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the effective and time-bound measures taken to prevent children from engaging in hazardous mining activities, to remove them from these activities and to provide them with rehabilitation services.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government, which reiterates the content of its previous request adopted in 2019.

Viet Nam

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 2003)

Article 9(1) of the Convention. Penalties, labour inspectorate and application of the Convention in practice. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that administrative sanctions for child labour are provided for by several decrees. Moreover, section 296 of the Penal Code of 2015 provides for criminal liability for violations of the law on the employment of children. However, the Committee noted that a significant number of children were engaged in child labour in Viet Nam, and that the results of the labour inspection activities did not reflect the magnitude of child labour in Viet Nam, as indicated in the report of the Viet Nam National Child Labour Survey of 2012. The Committee also noted that the Government was in the process of preparing the second National Survey on Child Labour. The Committee urged the Government to strengthen the capacity and expand the reach of the labour inspectorate in its action to prevent and combat child labour. It also requested the Government to continue to provide information on the manner in which the Convention was applied in practice.

The Committee notes the Government's information in its report that there are no cases of child labour detected during the labour inspection activities. However, according to information provided by 30 authorities at provincial and city level, 83 children who perform work illegally were detected. The Government also indicates that 120 labour inspectors from 63 Department of Labour, Invalids and Social Affairs our have participated in capacity building activities on child labour. Training contents included relevant laws, inspection process and skills in inspecting the use of child labour. In addition, 286 inspectors at the local level received training on the detection, inspection and examination of child labour. The Committee also notes that, according to the National Child Labour Survey 2018, 1,031,944 working children were classified as involved in "child labour", accounting for 5.4 per cent of the 5-17 year-old population and 58.8 per cent of working children. Among these, 519,805 children worked in heavy, dangerous and hazardous work with a rate of nearly 50.4 per cent of the total number of children in child labour. The Committee takes due note that, the total number of children involved in child labour has decreased compared with the results of the National Child Labour Survey 2012 (1.75 million). However, it notes with concern that there is still a significant number of children engaged in child labour, particularly in hazardous work. Moreover, the Committee observes that the results of the labour inspection activities do not reflect the magnitude of child labour in Viet Nam, as indicated in the report of the Viet Nam National Child Labour Survey of 2018. The Committee therefore urges the Government to intensify its efforts to ensure the effective elimination of child labour. It once again urges the Government to strengthen the capacity and expand the reach of the labour inspectorate in its action to detect, monitor, prevent and combat child labour, and to provide detailed information on the measures taken in this regard. The Committee also requests the Government to continue to provide information on the manner in which the Convention is applied in practice, including extracts from the reports of the inspection services and court decisions, as well as information on the number and nature of the violations reported and the sanctions imposed.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Article 3(b) of the Convention. Use, procuring or offering of a child for prostitution, for the production of pornography or for pornographic performances. The Committee previously noted the Government's information on the implementation of the Programme of Action to Combat Prostitution (PACP) 2011–2015. However, no concrete information on specific measures targeting child prostitution was provided in the Government's report. The Committee also noted that, according to section 147 of the 2015 Criminal Code, persuading, enticing and forcing a person under 16 years of age to participate in a pornographic performance constituted an offence. However, the provisions of the 2015 Criminal Code did not appear to prohibit the use, procuring or offering of a child aged 16–18 for the production of pornography or for pornographic performances. The Committee therefore urged the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the use, procuring or offering of a child under 18 years for the production of pornography or for pornographic performances was prohibited. It also requested the Government to provide information on the targeted measures undertaken to combat the commercial sexual exploitation of children under 18 years of age, as well as on the results achieved.

The Committee notes the Government's information in its report that the PACP 2016–2020 has been adopted and implemented with measures to eliminate prostitution, including prostitution of children under 18 years of age. The Government also indicates that Viet Nam signed up to the statements of actions against the use of the internet for the sexual exploitation of children at the 2014 Summit in London, aimed at tackling online child sexual exploitation. The Committee also notes that, according to the statistical information provided by the Government, from 2016 to 2018, the authorities detected and prosecuted a large number of persons violating regulations on prostitution, including six persons who were punished under the criminal law for buying sex from children. During the first six months of 2019, four cases involving the purchase of sex from persons under 18 years of age were recorded, of which two were referred to the People's Prosecutor's Office. The Government also refers to the arrest and extradition of a US citizen to the US authorities, who was prosecuted for the crime of "receipt and distribution of child pornography" and "keeping child pornography".

While taking note of the measures undertaken by the Government, the Committee once again reminds the Government that, by virtue of Article 3(b) of the Convention, the use, procuring or offering of a child under 18 years for the production of pornography or for pornographic performances, is considered as one of the worst forms of child labour, while section 147 of the Criminal Code only punishes persuading, enticing and forcing a person under 16 years to participate in a pornographic performance. The Committee therefore strongly urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the use, procuring or offering of a child under 18 years for the production of pornography or for pornographic performances is prohibited, by amending section 147 of the 2015 Criminal Code, and to provide information on any progress made in this regard. The Committee also requests the Government to continue to provide information on the targeted measures undertaken to combat the commercial sexual exploitation of children under 18 years of age, as well as on the results achieved, including the number of persons arrested, prosecuted and sentenced for the commercial sexual exploitation of children, as well as the penalties imposed.

Article 7(2)(b). Effective and time-bound measures to provide assistance for the removal of children in the worst forms of child labour and for their rehabilitation and social integration. Child victims of commercial sexual exploitation. The Committee previously noted that the Committee on the Rights of the Child (CRC) expressed its concern about the increasing number of children involved in commercial sexual activity. The CRC also expressed its concern that children who were sexually exploited were likely to be treated as criminals by the police, and that there was a lack of specific child-friendly reporting procedures. The Committee requested the Government to provide concrete information on the effective and time-bound measures taken to remove children from commercial sexual exploitation and to provide them with the appropriate assistance for their social integration.

The Committee notes the Government's information that, from 2016 to 2018, there were 113 persons under 18 years of age among 13,341 documented persons engaged in prostitution. The Government also indicates that three persons under 18 years of age who were engaged in prostitution were detected during police activities, of which one received punishment. In the first six months of 2019, four persons under 18 years of age were found engaged in prostitution, of which three received administrative penalties. The Government further indicates that, as reported by the Supreme People's Prosecutor's Office, the number of children engaged in prostitution increased during the first six months of 2019, with many children of ethnic minorities, living in remote areas or in difficult circumstances. The Committee also notes that Decree No. 56/2017/ND-CP was adopted in September 2017 to implement some provisions of the 2016 Child Law regarding child abuse, including sexual abuse. The Decree also provides that children in special circumstances, including sexually abused children, are entitled to healthcare, social assistance, education and vocational training assistance, legal assistance, psychological counselling, and other child protection services. In 2017–18, 48.28 per cent of the sexually abused children were provided with psychological assistance; 15.96 per cent of the children were provided with social assistance; 9.41 per cent of the children were provided with healthcare; 6.27 per cent were provided with legal assistance; 1.57 per cent were provided with assistance in education and vocational training; and 3.53 per cent were provided with other child protection services. However, the Committee observes that it is not clear whether the sexually abused children are victims of commercial sexual exploitation.

Noting that several persons under 18 years received administrative penalties for their engagement in prostitution, the Committee must emphasize that children who are used, procured or offered for prostitution should be treated as victims, and not as offenders (see the 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 510). The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that children engaged in prostitution are treated as victims rather than offenders and therefore are not punished for their engagement in prostitution, and that they receive the services necessary for their rehabilitation and social integration. It also requests the Government to provide information on any progress made or results achieved in this regard, including the training provided to relevant authorities dealing with prostitution, as well as the number of children identified as victims of commercial sexual exploitation and provided with assistance for their rehabilitation and social integration, through education, vocational training or jobs. The Committee finally requests the Government to clarify the definition of sexual abuse under the 2016 Child Law and to ensure that the information provided reflects the situation of child victims of commercial sexual exploitation, including prostitution.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Zimbabwe

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 2000)

The Committee takes note of the Government's report and the supplementary information provided in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020).

The Committee notes the observations of the Zimbabwe Congress of Trade Unions (ZCTU) received on 31 August 2019 and 29 September 2020, respectively.

Articles 1 and 2(1) of the Convention. 1. National policy, scope of application and application of the Convention in practice. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the Government's statement that it continued to pursue its efforts to reintegrate children through the National Action Plan for Orphans and other Vulnerable Children (NAP-OVC) and the Basic Education Assistance Module (BEAM). However, it noted from the 2014 Child Labour Report of the Zimbabwe National Statistics Agency that 1.6 million children in the age group of 5–14 years were involved in some form of economic activity. More than 2.7 million children of this age group were engaged in non-economic activities or unpaid work. This report also indicated that paid child labour was more prevalent in the agricultural, forestry and fishing sectors. The Committee also noted that the Committee on the Rights of the Child (CRC), in its concluding observations of March 2016, expressed concern at the persistence of child labour, including hazardous work, and at the exploitation of children, particularly from low-income households, in the informal economy, including low payment of wages and long working hours (CRC/C/ZWE/CO/2, paragraph 72). The Committee urged the Government to strengthen its efforts to ensure the progressive elimination of child labour in all sectors.

The Committee notes the observations of the ZCTU that child labour, including hazardous work, is still high particularly in the informal economy, domestic service, mining, agriculture and tobacco farms. Children as young as 12 years are employed in farming. The ZCTU states that the child labour situation has been worsened due to the poor socio-economic conditions and that the Government has failed in implementing its previous plan of action developed in this regard.

The Committee notes the Government's information in its report that BEAM, one of the numerous forms of social protection measures, is being implemented to reach out to children who have never been to school due to social and economic constraints. The Committee notes the Government's information in its supplementary report that in 2018, 415,000 and in 2019 583,547 orphans and vulnerable children have been supported with educational assistance through BEAM, respectively. This project aims to support a targeted 1,200,000 orphans and vulnerable children in 2020 for which the Government has increased the budgetary allocation to 450 million Zimbabwean dollars. The Government also indicates that the Ministry of Public Service, Labour and Social Welfare undertook a country-wide labour inspection initiative from April to July 2018. This initiative enabled all labour inspectors to visit workplaces and check compliance with the Labour Act, including child labour. The Government also indicates that it is in the process of formalizing the informal sector which would assist in reducing decent work deficits as well as child labour in the informal sector. The Committee further notes the information provided by the Government in its joint report of 2019 on the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No.81) and the Labour Inspection (Agriculture) Convention, 1969 (No.129) that apart from the 120 Government labour inspectors that conduct inspections in the agricultural industry, the National Employment Council (NEC) for the Agricultural Industry also conducts inspections throughout the country. The NEC for Agriculture which has eight designated agents spread across the country, has carried out 301 labour inspections for the period from January to June 2019.

The Committee further notes from the National Action Plan for Orphans and Vulnerable Children Phase III, 2016–2020 (NAP-OVC) document that this framework will guide the activities of all stakeholders who are engaged in implementing coordinated interventions aimed at assisting children to meet their needs, fulfil their rights and ensure their protection from exploitation. The Committee, however, notes from the Government's report that according to the findings of the Labour Force and Child Labour Survey of 2019, out of the 4.2 million children aged between 5-14 years, about one per cent of children are estimated to be in child labour with more boys engaged in child labour than girls. The survey report published in 2020 indicates that a greater proportion of children involved in child labour were in agriculture, forestry and fishing industry and the retail trade industry. The report also indicates that child labour is more prevalent among children aged between 10-14 years and that about three per cent of the children had never been to school while a quarter had dropped out-of-school. Noting that a significant number of children are engaged in child labour, the Committee once again urges the Government to strengthen its efforts to ensure the progressive elimination of child labour, including through the effective implementation of BEAM and the NAP-OVC. It requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken in this regard and on their impact in eliminating child labour. The Committee also requests the Government to continue to provide information on the labour inspection services undertaken by the labour inspectors and the NEC for Agriculture with regard to child labour and the number and nature of violations detected, including in the agricultural sector. In this regard, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to reinforce the capacities of the labour inspection services of the labour inspectorate and the NEC for Agriculture so as to enable them to adequately monitor and detect cases of child labour, including in the informal economy.

2. Minimum age. The Committee notes the Government's information that the minimum age for entry into employment has been raised from 15 to 16 years. The Committee accordingly notes that section 11(a)(ii) of the Labour Act as amended by section 3 of the Labour Amendment Act of 2015 stipulates that no employer shall employ any person who is under the age of 16 years in any occupation. The Committee encourages the Government to take the necessary measures to raise the minimum age for admission to employment or work from 14 years (initially specified) to 16 years. In this regard, the Committee requests the Government to consider the possibility of sending a new declaration under Article 2(2) of the Convention thereby notifying the Director-General of the ILO that it has raised the minimum age that it had previously specified.

Article 2(3). Age of completion of compulsory schooling. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the Government's information that primary education, which extends up to nine years, shall be completed at the age of 12 years. It also noted the Government's information that various measures have been implemented, including: (i)the school feeding programme; (ii) non-formal education for school drop-outs; and (iii) a reduction in the cost of education which ensured school enrolment of children, their retention and completion of education and which addressed the issue of school drop-outs at all levels. However, noting that the age of completion of compulsory schooling was less than the minimum age for admission to employment, the Committee requested the Government to consider raising the age of completion of compulsory education so as to link it with the minimum age of 14 years for admission to employment or work.

The Committee notes with regret that the Government has not taken any legal measures in this regard. It notes the Government's information that the Ministry of Primary and Secondary Education has not fixed any age for the completion of compulsory schooling. The Committee once again draws the Government's attention to the necessity of linking the age of completion of compulsory schooling with the minimum age for admission to work, as provided for under Paragraph 4 of the Minimum Age Recommendation, 1973 (No. 146). If compulsory schooling comes to an end before children are legally entitled to work, there may arise a vacuum which regrettably opens the door for the economic exploitation of children (see General Survey of 2012 on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 371). The Committee therefore urges the Government to take the necessary measures to raise the age of completion of compulsory education so as to link it with the minimum age for admission to employment or work which is 16 years in accordance with the Labour Amendment Act of 2015. It requests the Government to provide information on any measures taken in this regard.

Article 7(3). Determination of light work. The Committee previously noted that according to section 3(4) of the Labour Relations Regulations, children over 13 years of age may perform light work where such work is an integral part of a course of education or training and does not prejudice their education, health and safety. The Government stated that the Statutory Instrument 155 of 1999 giving the schedule of light work would be revised during the process of the labour law reform. The Committee requested the Government to provide information on any progress made in this regard.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that the labour law reform is ongoing and once the amendments have been enacted, the process of revising the provisions of the Statutory Instrument 155 of 1999 on the types of light work activities, will be undertaken. The Committee therefore once again expresses the firm hope that the list of types of light work that may be performed by children from the age of 13 years will be revised and adopted in the near future. It requests the Government to provide information on any progress made in this regard.

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2000)

The Committee takes note of the Government's report and the supplementary information provided in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020).

The Committee notes the observations of the Zimbabwe Congress of Trade Unions (ZCTU) received on 31 August 2019 and 29 September 2020, respectively.

Article 4(3) of the Convention. Periodic examination of the list of hazardous work. The Committee previously noted the Government's indication that following the adoption of the Labour Amendment Act of 2015, focus would be given to the revision of its supporting regulations, including the list of the types of hazardous work.

The Committee notes the Government's information in its report that the amendments to the Labour Act are still ongoing and that once the draft Bill is adopted, the Ministry of Public Service, Labour and Social Welfare will proceed to revise the list of types of hazardous work. Observing that the Government has been referring to the revision of the list of types of hazardous work since 2003, the Committee once again urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the list of types of hazardous work prohibited to children under the age of 18 years is revised, adopted and enforced, in the near future. It requests the Government to provide information on any progress made in this regard.

Article 7(2). Effective and time-bound measures. Clause (a). Preventing the engagement of children in the worst forms of child labour. Access to free basic education. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the Government's information that it had been implementing the Basic Education Assistance Module (BEAM) as well as the School Feeding Programme in order to ensure that vulnerable children are able to go to school and to ensure their attendance and retention in schools. The Committee noted, however, from the UNESCO Education For All National Review 2015, Zimbabwe, that while school enrolments remained relatively high, about 30 per cent of the approximately 3 million children enrolled in primary school did not complete the seven-year primary cycle. This report also indicated that the Government efforts were far from meeting the needs of about 1 million children who belonged to poor and disadvantaged families. The Committee urged the Government to strengthen its efforts to ensure access to free basic education to all children, particularly children from poor and disadvantaged families.

The Committee notes the Government's information that it continues to strengthen the School Feeding Programme (SFP) which is currently being implemented in more than 70 per cent of the total number of registered schools in the country. The Government also indicates that the SFP has been linked with the Food Deficit Mitigation Programme as a sustainable support measure towards food provision to children in primary schools. It further notes the Government's information that in 2019, the Government allocated 63 million dollars for the implementation of the BEAM. According to the Government's report, the BEAM programme targets in particular, school-going children from poor households, child-headed households, orphans and children neglected by parents, children who have never been to school, and children who have dropped out of school or have failed to pay fees and levies due to poverty. The Committee, however, notes the Government's statement that although numerous efforts are being made towards ensuring children's access to education and enhancing the completion of basic education, financial resources remain a gap due to the economic challenges facing the Zimbabwean State as a whole.

The Committee notes that according to the findings of the UNICEF 2019 Multiple Indicator Cluster Survey of Zimbabwe, the percentage of children of school-going age who enter the first grade of primary education is 67.6 per cent and their net attendance ratio is 90.5 per cent. The percentage of children of primary school age, lower secondary school age and upper secondary school age not attending any school is 4.7 per cent, 23.6 per cent and 70.3 per cent respectively. The Committee also notes that the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination Against Women (CEDAW), in its concluding observations of 10 March 2020 expressed its concern at the high school-dropout rates among girls (CEDAW/C/ZWE/CO/6, paragraph 35). While noting the measures taken by the Government, the Committee must express its concern at the high number of children who are not attending any school. Considering that education is key in preventing the engagement of children in the worst forms of child labour, the Committee once again urges the Government to strengthen its efforts to ensure access to free basic education to all children, particularly girls and children from poor and disadvantaged families, including through the BEAM project, the School Feeding Programme or otherwise. It also requests the Government to provide information on the concrete measures taken in this regard, particularly with respect to addressing the financial barriers to education, with a view to increasing school attendance rates and reducing drop-out rates.

Clauses (a) and (b). Preventing children from engaging in and removing them from the worst forms of child labour, and ensuring their rehabilitation and social integration. 1. Children engaged in hazardous work in tobacco farms. The Committee notes the observations of the ZCTU that children working in tobacco farms are involved in hazardous work and exposed to hazardous conditions which affects their health and disrupts their education. The Committee also notes a report provided by the ZCTU on a tripartite study conducted in June 2020 on child labour in the tobacco industry by the Ministry of Labour with the participation of the General Agriculture and Plantation Workers Union of Zimbabwe (GAPWUZ), ZCTU and the Employers Confederation. According to the findings of this study, children working in tobacco farms work for long hours, carry heavy weights and are exposed to extreme weather conditions and harmful chemicals such as nicotine and pesticides. The Committee also notes the Government's information in its supplementary report that the report on the survey on Child Labour in Tobacco Sector conducted in March 2019 is being validated by the stakeholders which will be followed by dissemination and post survey interventions in the four provinces where the survey was conducted. The Government further indicates that this report is also intended to educate the general public of the dangers associated with child labour in these areas as well as to provide targeted interventions and strategies in the eradication of child labour in this sector. The Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that children under 18 years of age are not engaged in hazardous work in tobacco farms and to take effective and time-bound measures to remove them from such work and to provide for their rehabilitation and reintegration. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken in this regard and on the results achieved. It further requests the Government to supply a copy of the findings of the survey on child labour in the tobacco sector, once available.

2. Children engaged in hazardous work in the mining sector. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the ZCTU's statement that one of the worst forms of child labour most common in Zimbabwe was work in the mining sector, where children scavenge for minerals to survive. It also noted that 67 per cent of children working in this sector use chemicals (including mercury, cyanide and explosives), and approximately 24 per cent of these children work for more than nine hours a day. The Government indicated that the Ministry of Mines and Mining Development was working together with the law enforcement bodies to remove children from illegal mining activities.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that the statistics of children removed from illegal mining are currently not available and that they shall be provided once they are obtained. In this regard, the Committee notes the observations made by the ZCTU that hazardous child labour is still high in the mining sector. The Committee therefore urges the Government to take effective and time bound measures to prevent the engagement of children in hazardous work in the mining sector, and to provide for their removal and subsequent rehabilitation and social integration. It also requests the Government to provide information on the number of children removed from illegal mining activities by the Ministry of Mines and Mining Development and provided assistance for rehabilitation and reintegration.

Clause (d). Identify and reach out to children at special risk. Orphans of HIV/AIDS and other vulnerable children (OVC). In its previous comments the Committee noted the Government's statement that it was committed to implementing the National Action Plan for Orphans and other Vulnerable Children (NAP for OVC) and was actively funding its programmes targeting all vulnerable children. It also noted the impact of the Harmonized Social Cash Transfers schemes (HSCT) and the BEAM project, which contained components aimed at protecting and supporting orphans and vulnerable children as well as the National Case Management System Project which addresses the needs of OVC. The Committee noted, however, that according to the 2015 UNAIDS estimates, an average of 790,000 children aged 0 to 17 years were orphans due to HIV/AIDS. The Committee therefore urged the Government to strengthen its efforts in order to prevent the engagement of these children in the worst forms of child labour.

The Committee notes the Government's information that the coordinated efforts between the BEAM Community Selection Committee and the National Case Management System for the Care and Protection of Children which is responsible for the identification and referral of eligible children has remarkably increased the Government's reach to vulnerable children. In addition, initiatives to harmonize the social protection programmes have been taken so that children benefitting from BEAM can also benefit from other programmes such as the HSCT programme.

The Committee further notes the Government's information that the NAP for OVC which has embarked on its phase III from 2016 to 2020, has a multi-sectoral approach to comprehensively assist and support children and families in the country and there are defined coordination mechanisms and referral pathways for efficiency and programme effectiveness. The Government also indicates that within the framework of this action plan, a total of 91,391 children (42,315 males and 49,076 females), including 508 children involved in child labour and its worst forms, were assisted during the year 2018. The Committee further notes that according to the 2019 UNAIDS estimates, the average number of children aged 0 to 17 that are orphaned due to HIV/AIDS is 500,000, indicating a reduction from the 2015 estimates. While noting the measures taken by the Government, the Committee urges it to continue its efforts to prevent the engagement of orphans and OVCs in the worst forms of child labour, including through the NAP for

OVC, the HSCT, the BEAM project and the National Case Management System. It requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken and the results achieved in this regard.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1969)

The Committee notes with concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments next session.

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Equal remuneration for work of equal value. Legislation. The Committee previously noted that while some of the provisions of the Labour Law (namely sections 8, 9(1), 59(4) and 93) read together provided some protection against discrimination based on sex with respect to remuneration, they did not reflect fully the principle of the Convention. The Committee takes note of the Government's indication, in its report, that the Tripartite Consultative Committee is still engaged in the revision process of the Labour Law with a view to ensuring greater conformity with the provisions of the Convention. The Committee wishes to point out that the concept of "work of equal value" lies at the heart of the fundamental right of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value as it permits a broad scope of comparison, including, but going beyond equal remuneration for "equal", "the same" or "similar" work, and also encompasses work that is of an entirely different nature, which is nevertheless of equal value (see 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 673). The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the activities and recommendations of the Tripartite Consultative Committee concerning the revision of the Labour Law, and trusts that in the near future its national legislation will explicitly give full legislative expression and effect to the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value set out in the Convention.

Gender pay gap. The Committee welcomes the statistics provided by the Government and notes that, according to the Afghanistan Living Conditions Survey (ALCS) for 2013–14, women's average monthly wages were lower than those of men in all job categories, except in the public sector. Men were earning on average 30 per cent more than women in the same occupation and up to three and a half times more than women in the agriculture and forestry sector, where women represented two-thirds of the workforce. The Committee notes that, according to the ALCS for 2016–17, the situation of women has deteriorated as the labour force participation rate of women decreased from 29 per cent in 2014 to 26.8 per cent in 2017, and remained far lower than the labour force participation of men (80.6 per cent in 2017). Moreover, more women than men were in a vulnerable employment situation (89.9 per cent of women compared to 77.5 per cent of men). The Committee regrets that the ALCS for 2016–17 does not contain any more information on the gender pay gap. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken to reduce the gender pay gap and identify and address its underlying causes, as well as on the results achieved in this regard. Recalling the importance of the regular collection of statistics in order to undertake an assessment of the nature, extent and evolution of the gender pay gap, the Committee requests the Government to provide updated information on the earnings of men and women disaggregated by economic activity and occupation, both in the private and public sectors, as well as any available statistics or analysis on the gender pay gap.

Article 3. Objective appraisal of jobs. Civil service. Referring to its previous comments, the Committee takes note of the salary scale annexed to the Civil Servants Law, 2008, according to which salaries are determined by reference to grades and steps. It notes that section 8 of the Law refers to the criteria used to determine employment grades according to diploma, skills and work experience. The Committee notes from the data of the national Central Statistics Organization that in 2016 women represented 22.5 per cent of all public sector employees, but only 7.5 per cent of those were placed in the third grade or higher position. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the practical application of section 8 of the Civil Servants Law, 2008, including on the methods and factors used to classify jobs under the different grades in order to ensure that tasks mainly performed by women are not being undervalued in comparison to the tasks traditionally performed by men. The Committee further requests the Government to provide information on the distribution of men and women in the various categories and positions of the civil service with their corresponding levels of earnings.

Article 4. Awareness-raising activities. Cooperation with employers' and workers' organizations. The Committee notes the Government's indication that public information campaigns and activities to raise awareness about the principle of the Convention, particularly among employers' and workers' organizations, have been continued, some of which with the assistance of the ILO. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on awareness-raising activities carried out to promote the principle of the Convention, and to indicate whether any cooperation or joint activities have been undertaken together with the employers' and workers' organizations. The Committee also requests the Government to specify whether, as a result of the awareness-raising activities already implemented, the principle of the Convention has been effectively addressed by the social partners in collective agreements and, if so, to provide information in this respect, including copies of the relevant provisions.

Enforcement. The Committee notes that, in the National Labour Policy for 2017–20, the Government recognizes laxity in the enforcement of labour-related legislation and indicates that periodic inspections will be conducted to reveal quality of compliance, as well as gaps in compliance for which appropriate actions would be taken against defaulting employers. The Committee further notes that, in its last concluding observations, the United Nations Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW) expressed concern at the fact that decisions of informal justice mechanisms are discriminatory against women and undermine the implementation of existing legislation, and recommended that women's accessibility to the formal justice system be enhanced (CEDAW/C/AFG/CO/1-2, 30 July 2013, paragraphs 14 and 15). The Committee requests the Government to provide information as to the steps taken to ensure stricter enforcement of labour legislation as regards the application of the Convention. In particular, the Committee requests information regarding compliance with the requirements of the Convention, including the level of compliance and the identification of gaps in compliance, as well as any actions taken against defaulting employers. The Committee further requests the Government to provide information on any measures taken or envisaged to enhance women's accessibility to the formal justice system, as well as on any complaints made with regard to the principle of the Convention dealt with by the courts or any other competent authorities, including information on sanctions and remedies provided.

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1969)

The Committee notes with concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments.

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Legislation. The Committee previously noted that the prohibition of discrimination in section 9 of the Labour Law is very general and urged the Government to take the opportunity of the Labour Law reform process, in the context of the Decent Work Country Programme and the National Action Plan for Women of Afghanistan (NAPWA) 2007–17, to amend its legislation to explicitly prohibit direct and indirect discrimination covering all the grounds listed in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention, as well as any other grounds determined in consultation with employers' and workers' organizations, in accordance with Article 1(1)(b) of the Convention. The Committee notes the Government's indication, in its reports, that the Tripartite Consultative Committee is still engaged in the revision process of the Labour Law. Referring to its previous comments on section 10(2) of the Civil Servants Law, 2008, which only prohibits discrimination in recruitment based on the grounds of sex, ethnicity, religion, disability and "physical deformity", the Committee notes the Government's general statement that provisions of the Labour Law are also applicable to civil servants. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the activities and recommendations of the Tripartite Consultative Committee concerning the revision of the Labour Law, and trusts that in a near future its national legislation will explicitly prohibit, both in the private and public sectors, direct and indirect discrimination covering all the grounds listed in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention, as well as any other grounds determined in consultation with employers' and workers' organizations, in accordance with Article 1(1)(b) of the Convention, covering all aspects of employment and occupation. In the meantime, the Committee requests the Government to clarify the relationship between section 9 of the Labour Law and section 10(2) of the Civil Servants Law and, more generally, to indicate whether all the provisions of the Labour Law shall apply to civil servants or whether this is limited to provisions of the Labour Law which are expressly referred to by the Civil Servants Law.

Article 1(1)(a). Discrimination on the ground of sex. Work-related violence and sexual harassment. The Committee takes note of the Law on the Prohibition of Harassment against Women and Children, adopted in December 2016 and approved by the President on April 2018, which defines and criminalizes physical, verbal and non-verbal harassment, and provides that harassment is punishable with a fine. On the other hand, it notes that section 30 of the Law on the Elimination of Violence against Women (EVAW), 2009, which provides that harassment is punishable by up to six months of imprisonment, was firstly incorporated into the revised Penal Code in March 2017 and then removed on the instruction of the Government in August 2017, as a result of pressure exerted by some members of the Parliament, which left the status of the EVAW Law in a state of uncertainty. The Committee also notes that several United Nations (UN) bodies expressed concern at the escalating level of targeted attacks, including killings, against high profile women, particularly those in the public sector, as well as at the prevalence of sexual harassment against women in the workplace (Report of the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights, A/HRC/37/45, 21 February 2018, paragraph 55 and Report of the UN Special Rapporteur on violence against women, its causes and consequences, A/HRC/29/27/Add.3, 12 May 2015, paragraphs 21 and 26). It notes that, according to a survey carried out in 2015 by the Women and Children's Legal Research Foundation, based in Afghanistan, 87 per cent of the women interviewed experienced harassment in the workplace. It further notes that the Afghanistan Independent Human Rights Commission (AIHRC) recently indicated that women police officers are particularly affected and that the Ministry of the Interior is currently finalizing an internal complaints mechanism to this end (Report of the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights, A/HRC/37/45, 21 February 2018, paragraph 53). The Committee notes that, pursuant to the 2015 Regulations on the Elimination of Harassment Against Women (11/07/1394), commissions aimed at addressing complaints have been established in several provinces, but that the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights recently highlighted that the mechanisms to combat sexual harassment against women in the workplace remained largely ineffective owing to underreporting, which is mainly due to the social stigma attached to the issue (Report of the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights, A/HRC/37/45, 21 February 2018, paragraph 54). The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any concrete measures (such as, for example, campaigns addressed to the general public to promote gender equality) and specific programmes taken or envisaged to combat violence against women (and more particularly high-profile women), and sexual harassment at the workplace, both in the private and public sectors, including any social stigma attached to this issue. It further requests the Government to provide information on the number, nature and outcome of any complaints or cases of work-related violence or sexual harassment in the workplace handled by the commissions established under the 2015 Regulations, the labour inspectorate and the courts. The Committee also requests the Government to clarify the relationship between the Law on the Elimination of Violence against Women, 2009, and the Law on the Prohibition of Harassment against Women and Children, 2016, as well as the current status of both legislations. Please provide a copy of the Law on the Prohibition of Harassment against Women and Children, 2016, and of the 2015 Regulations on the Elimination of Harassment Against Women (11/07/1394).

Article 2. Equal access of men and women to vocational training and education. The Committee notes the Government's indication that girls represent 45 per cent of total school enrolment. Referring to the discussion held at the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards at its 106th Session (June 2017) on the application of the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182), the Committee notes that non-state groups deliberately restricted the access of girls to education, including attacks and closure of girls' schools, and that 35 schools were used for military purposes in 2015. It further notes the low enrolment rate of girls, in particular at the secondary school level, high dropout rates especially in rural areas owing to a lack of security in the journey to and from school, and the written threats warning girls to stop going to school by non-state armed groups. The Committee notes that, in the Afghanistan Living Conditions Survey (ALCS) for 2016–17, the Central Statistics Organization indicates that, in 2016, girls' access to primary education was in decline, and female gross attendance rates in primary, secondary and tertiary education represented only 0.71, 0.51 and 0.39 per cent of the corresponding male rates, respectively. Furthermore, it is estimated that only 37 per cent of adolescent girls are literate, compared to 66 per cent of adolescent boys and that 19 per cent of adult women are literate compared to 49 per cent of adult men. While acknowledging the difficult situation prevailing in the country, the Committee requests the Government to step up its efforts to encourage girls' and women's access and completion of education at all levels, and to enhance their participation in a wide range of training programmes, including those in which men have traditionally predominated. It requests the Government to provide updated statistics disaggregated by sex, on participation and completion rates of the different levels of education, as well as in the various vocational training programmes. The Committee again requests the Government to provide information on any measures taken as a result of the affirmative action policy in education envisaged by the NAPWA 2007–17.

Article 5(1). Special measures of protection. Work prohibited for women. The Committee previously noted that the list of physically arduous or harmful work prohibited for women to be established under section 120 of the Labour Law was still under preparation. Noting the absence of updated information provided by the Government in that respect, the Committee again urges the Government to ensure that, in the process of the Labour Law reform, any restrictions on the work that can be done by women are strictly limited to maternity protection and are not based on stereotyped assumptions regarding their capacity and role in society that would be contrary to the Convention. It requests the Government to provide a copy of the list of work that is prohibited for women, once adopted.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Barbados

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1974)

The Committee notes with concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments.

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Equal remuneration for work of equal value. Legislation. In previous comments, the Committee noted the absence of a legislative framework supporting the right to equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value. Having noted also that the existing mechanisms for collective bargaining and wage councils for wage determination did not seem to promote and ensure effectively this right, the Committee requested the Government to take measures to give full legislative expression to the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value. The Committee notes from the Government's report on Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) that the draft National Gender Policy, which includes a section on employment, is currently being reviewed by the relevant ministries but that the Employment (Prevention of Discrimination) Bill is yet to be adopted. The Committee once again recalls the particular importance of capturing in legislation the concept of "work of equal value" in order to address the segregation of men and women in certain sectors and occupations due to gender stereotypes. In light of the ongoing legislative and policy developments on gender equality and non-discrimination, the Committee asks the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value will be fully reflected in the National Gender Policy and in the Employment (Prevention of Discrimination) Bill, and to provide a copy of the policy and the new legislation, once adopted.

Gender earnings gap and occupational segregation. The Committee notes from the statistics published by the Barbados Statistical Service (Labour Force Survey) that of all women employed in 2015, 52.4 per cent earned less than 500 Barbadian dollars (BBD) per week compared to 41.8 per cent of all men employed in that same year. Among those earning between BBD500 and BBD999 per week, men represented almost 56 per cent and women only 44 per cent. Among those earning between BBD1,000 and BBD1,300, women represented 46.6 per cent and men 53.1 per cent. Men also account for a little more than half of the workers (52.5 per cent) in the highest earnings group (over BBD1,300). The Committee further notes from the Labour Force Survey data for 2015 the persistent occupational gender segregation of the economy with women mostly employed as service workers and clerks while men are mostly employed as craft and related workers or plant and machine operators. When looking at economic sectors, women workers are highly represented in "Accommodation and Food Services", and their numbers sometimes more than doubles or triples the number of male workers in "Finance and Insurance", "Education" and "Human Health and Social Work". Women are also over-represented among household employees. In contrast, men largely predominate in the "Construction" and "Transportation and Storage" sectors. The Committee further refers to its comments on Convention No. 111. The Committee asks the Government to take measures to reduce the earnings gap between men and women and to increase the employment of women in jobs with career opportunities and higher pay. Recalling that wage inequalities may arise due to the segregation of men and women into certain sectors and occupations, the Committee also asks the Government to provide information on the results achieved under the National Employment Policy and the National Gender Policy, once adopted, to address occupational gender segregation and to increase the employment of women and men in sectors and occupations in which they are under-represented.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request directly addressed to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1974)

The Committee notes with concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments

Articles 1–3 of the Convention. Legislative protection against discrimination. The Committee had previously noted that the Employment Rights Act 2012, while protecting workers against unfair dismissal on all the grounds enumerated in Article 1(1)(a) and certain additional grounds under Article 1(1)(b) of the Convention, did not ensure full legislative protection against both direct and indirect discrimination for all workers in all aspects of employment and occupation. The Committee previously asked the Government to address the protection gaps in the legislation. The Committee notes that the Government in its report merely restates the constitutional provisions on equality, and the protections afforded by the Employment Rights Act 2012. The Government also maintains that no distinctions, exclusions, or preferences based on the prohibited grounds set out in Article 1(1)(a) or on any additional grounds determined in accordance with Article 1(1)(b) exist in the country, and that no discrimination cases have been reported. Regarding the presumed absence of discrimination, the Committee considers that it is essential to acknowledge that no society is free from discrimination, and that continuous action is required to address discrimination in employment and occupation, which is both universal and constantly evolving (see 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraphs 731 and 845). Noting that the Employment (Prevention of Discrimination) Bill 2016 is still in draft form, the Committee urges the Government to take steps, without further delay, to address the protection gaps in the legislation, and to ensure that the anti-discrimination legislation expressly defines and prohibits direct and indirect discrimination in all aspects of employment and occupation, for all workers, and on all the grounds set out in the Convention. The Committee also repeats its request to the Government to provide information on the steps taken to ensure that all workers are being protected in practice against discrimination not only with respect to dismissal but with respect to all aspects of employment and occupation, on the grounds set out in the Convention. Such measures could include public awareness raising aimed at, or in cooperation with, workers and employers and their organizations, or the development of codes of practice or equal employment opportunities guidelines to generate broader understanding on the principles enshrined in the Convention. Noting with regret that for several years the Government has not provided any information on the action taken to promote and ensure equality of opportunity and treatment with respect to race, colour and national extraction, and to eliminate discrimination in employment and occupation on these grounds, the Committee urges the Government to provide such information without delay, including any studies or surveys on the labour market situation of the different groups protected under the Convention.

Article 1(1)(a). Discrimination on the grounds of sex. Sexual harassment. The Committee previously noted the absence in the Employment Rights Act 2012 of provisions protecting workers against sexual harassment. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the proposed Sexual Harassment in the Workplace Bill will define and prohibit both quid pro quo and hostile environment sexual harassment and provide for a tribunal to hear complaints and determine matters related to sexual harassment. The Committee urges the Government to take steps to ensure that the draft Sexual Harassment in the Workplace Bill is adopted speedily and that it will define and prohibit sexual harassment (both quid pro quo and hostile environment harassment) in all aspects of employment and occupation, and asks that the Government provide a copy of the latest version of the Bill, or as enacted, with its next report.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1993)

Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention. Discrimination on the basis of sex or gender. Gender-based violence. In its previous comment, the Committee asked the Government to provide information on the following points: (1) the implementation and application in practice of Act No. 1/13 of 22 September 2016 concerning the prevention and suppression of gender-based violence and victim protection (hereinafter "the Act of 2016"), which defines and punishes, inter alia, gender-based violence (GBV), including sexual violence, sexual harassment, traditional gender-hostile practices and economic violence, which is defined as denying a spouse access to family resources or forbidding a spouse to work, indicating the number and type of cases of gender-based violence dealt with by the labour inspectorate and the courts, as well as the penalties imposed; (2) the steps taken or contemplated to inform and raise the awareness of employers, workers and their respective organizations, labour inspectors, judges and also the general public with regard to action against gender-based violence, including the steps taken to publicize the content of the Act of 2016; and (3) the activities of the Independent National Human Rights Commission (CNIDH) against gender-based violence in employment. The Committee notes from the Government's report that: (1) the labour inspectorate has not identified any cases of gender-based violence in employment and occupation, but the courts dealt with 4,004 cases of gender-based violence between 2016 and September 2018, with penal servitude being imposed as a penalty; (2) the measures taken by the Government to raise awareness of the Act of 2016 include training of trainers at the Training Centre for Legal Personnel; the launching, by the Second Vice-President of the Republic, of an outreach campaign; the translation of the Act into the national language (Kirundi); raising the awareness of the different State services; broadcasting; community awareness-raising through community leaders and the Women's National Forum; and (3) the CNIDH undertook a number of activities aimed at combating gender-based violence in employment. The Government adds that the CNIDH took part in activities led by various partners in the GBV field to hold exchanges with them, review their achievements and provide legal support. Finally, the Committee notes the Government's intention to compile an inventory of laws that discriminate against women with a view to amending them in accordance with the Constitution and ratified international instruments, following the recommendations of the CNIDH. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the progress achieved and to provide copies of the amended texts while conducting the inventory.

Sexual harassment. In its previous comment, the Committee requested the Government to: (1) examine the possibility of expanding the definition of sexual harassment by adding the notion of a hostile, offensive or humiliating work environment, and to specify the procedure to be followed and the penalties that apply in cases of sexual harassment, in the absence of any specific provision in that regard in the Act of 2016; and (2) provide information on the practical steps taken to prevent and eliminate sexual harassment in the public and private sectors, including measures designed to raise the awareness of employers, workers and their respective organizations with regard to the prevention and treatment of sexual harassment. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the Gender Commission of the National Assembly, meeting to review progress in raising awareness of the Act of 2016 and to make recommendations, has suggested amending the Act in view of its lack of compliance with the new Penal Code and with the Gender Commission's definition of sexual harassment. Regarding the procedure to be followed and penalties applied in cases of sexual harassment, the Government indicates that those are provided under section 586 of the Penal Code. Finally, in its Beijing+25 report, the Government adds that sexual harassment is included in the list of offences established in the Act of 2016, under section 61 of which all GBV offences cannot be amnestied and are imprescriptible with regard to both public action and the penalty imposed, which is irreducible and cannot be pardoned. The Committee hopes that the Government will take the opportunity provided by the revision of the Act of 2016 to complete the definition of sexual harassment by including the notion of a hostile, offensive or humiliating work environment and will provide information on the progress made in this regard. The Committee once again requests the Government to provide information on the practical steps taken to prevent and eliminate sexual harassment in the public and private sectors, including measures designed to raise the awareness of employers, workers and their respective organizations.

Article 2. Equality of opportunity and treatment for men and women. In its previous comment, the Committee asked the Government to provide information on: (1) the increase in the rate of school enrolment and vocational training of girls, (2) women's access to productive resources and to employment, including to managerial posts in the public and private sectors; and (3) the adoption of a new national gender policy, replacing the one adopted in 2012, and to provide details on those sections relating to gender equality in employment and occupation.

With regard to the increase in the rate of school enrolment and vocational training of girls and women's access to productive resources and employment, the Committee notes from the Government's report, as well as from its Beijing+25 report, that the steps taken to increase the access of girls to primary and secondary school include: integrating the gender equity dimension in education into the National Development Plan 2018–27; the formulation of the Sectoral Plan for the Development of Education and Training (PSDEF) 2012–20; and the Transitional Plan for Education 2018–20 (PTE 2018–20), which was primarily aimed at basic education. The Committee also notes: the creation of a unit for inclusive education to take all vulnerable groups into account, such as persons with disabilities; the return to school of adolescent mothers; the 2018 launching of the "aunt/school and father/school" project to combat school drop-outs and unwanted pregnancies; the renewal of curricula and the eradication of gender stereotypes from text books and other scholastic tools; and the annual holding of the "Back to School" campaign. The school enrolment rate for girls stood at 87 per cent in 2018. Moreover, to encourage women and girls to take up sciences, engineering, technology and other disciplines, certificates were awarded to certain women and girls who excelled in the field of science during the celebration in February 2019 of International Day of Women and Girls in Science. With regard to women's access to productive resources and employment, the Committee notes an empowerment project for women which sets up guarantee funds to help women obtain microcredits. The project is already operating in eight provinces (Cibitoke, Bubanza, Bururi, Makamba, Rutana, Karusi, Bujumbura Marie and Bujumbura).

The Committee also notes the adoption of the National Development Plan (PND) 2018–27, the new frame of reference for planning, which also takes account of different social policies, such as the National Gender Policy (PNG) and the 2017–2021 action plans for the PNG and for United Nations Security Council resolution No. 1325, which seek to encourage sectoral ministries to create gender units and to involve them in their sectoral planning and budgets to ensure effective ministerial programming and budgetary allocation for gender equity and equality. However, the Government indicates that it faces numerous challenges, including insufficient funds to implement the plans of action and the absence of coordination institutions. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged to implement the action plans and the National Gender Policy.

Indigenous peoples. In its previous comment, the Committee urged the Government to take the necessary steps to: (1) ensure equal access for the Batwa people to education, vocational training and employment, including to enable them to exercise their traditional activities; (2) combat stereotypes and prejudice against this indigenous community; and (3) to promote tolerance among all sections of the population. The Committee also asked the Government to provide information on: (1) the impact of Act No. 1/07 of 15 July 2016 revising the Forestry Code, which provides that the rational and balanced management of forests is based, inter alia, on the principle of participation by the grassroots communities; and (2) the exercise of traditional activities by the Batwa on the land where they live. The Committee notes the Government's indication that: (1) the cost of the schooling of Batwa pupils has been financed and that awareness-raising activities to encourage young Batwa to take up schooling have been carried out by various associations including Unite to Promote the Batwa (UNIPROBA); and (2) a secondary-level boarding school has been reserved exclusively for young Batwa (Gitega Province) and young Batwa have been helped to enter secondary education and university. The Government indicates that the measures taken to encourage adolescent mothers to return to school after pregnancy have not been welcomed by them. The Committee notes the information that young Batwa have received vocational training in car mechanics, carpentry, sewing, information technology, construction, etc. According to the Government, Act No. 1/07 of 15 July 2016 revising the Forestry Code has had a negative impact on the economic life of the Batwa people. They have lost an economic resource that enabled them to sell basketwork and traditional medicines based on wood and medicinal plants from the forest. Act No. 1/21 of 15 October 2013 issuing the Mining Code has also deprived the Batwa of access to clay to produce pottery to use or sell. To counter this problem, the Government has undertaken to mount forestry management projects in association with the Batwa people for the use of the forest under their control and subject to their permission. The Committee also notes that in its Beijing+25 report, the Government recognizes the Batwa community as the most marginalized group. It is for this reason that many legal, statutory and institutional mechanisms have been put in place so that the Batwa can participate fully in political, economic, social and cultural life and draw attention to their concerns. The Government refers, among the positive steps taken, to the distribution of land to the Batwa so that they can settle, and the training provided to Batwa community women from the Vyegwa locality, who are now able to build their own houses, or be employed on other construction sites. These training activities for Batwa women have also contributed to gender, social and sustainable development, by changing mentalities and improving social relations between the Batwa and other population groups, and by encouraging reflection on prejudice against the Batwa people. Taking into account the Government's assessment of the impact of the Forestry and Mining Codes on the ability of the Batwa to continue to practice their traditional occupations, the Committee requests the Government to: (i) intensify its efforts to ensure that indigenous peoples have the right to practice their traditional activities and retain their means of subsistence without discrimination; and (ii) provide detailed information on the forestry management projects developed in association with the indigenous peoples concerned and on the lands attributed to the Batwa.

General observation of 2018. With regard to the above issues, and in more general terms, the Committee would like to draw the Government's attention to its general observation on discrimination based on race, colour and national extraction which was adopted in 2018. In the general observation, the Committee notes with concern that discriminatory attitudes and stereotypes based on the race, colour or national extraction of men and women workers continue to hinder their participation in education, vocational training programmes and access to a wider range of employment opportunities, resulting in persisting occupational segregation and lower remuneration received for work of equal value. Furthermore, the Committee considers that it is necessary to adopt a comprehensive and coordinated approach to tackling the obstacles and barriers faced by persons in employment and occupation because of their race, colour or national extraction, and to promote equality of opportunity and treatment for all. Such an approach should include the adoption of interlocking measures aimed at addressing gaps in education, training and skills, providing unbiased vocational guidance, recognizing and validating the qualifications obtained abroad, and valuing and recognizing traditional knowledge and skills that may be relevant both to accessing and advancing in employment and to engaging in an occupation. The Committee also recalls that, in order to be effective, these measures must include concrete steps, such as laws, policies, programmes, mechanisms and participatory processes, remedies designed to address prejudices and stereotypes and to promote mutual understanding and tolerance among all sections of the population.

The Committee draws the Government's attention to its general observation of 2018 and requests the Government to provide information in response to the questions raised in that observation.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1966)

Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention. Grounds of discrimination. The Committee notes with concern that the Labour Code has been awaiting adoption for many years. The Committee can only hope that the Government will soon be in a position to report on the adoption of the new Labour Code and requests it to ensure that it contains provisions explicitly prohibiting any direct or indirect discrimination based, as a minimum, on all the grounds enumerated in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention, including race, colour, national extraction and social origin, at all stages of employment and occupation. The Committee requests the Government to provide a copy of the Labour Code as soon as it has been adopted, and of any implementing texts with respect to non-discrimination and equality in employment and occupation.

Discrimination based on sex and equality of treatment between men and women. The Committee recalls that, in a previous comment, the Government acknowledged that section 9 of Ordinance No. 006/PR/84 of 1984, which gives the husband the right to object to his spouse's activities, is completely outdated and that it would take measures to repeal this provision, which no longer corresponds to the current situation. The Government also specified that occupational segregation between men and women is due, inter alia, to the high levels of illiteracy and social factors. The Committee previously requested the Government to take the necessary measures in this regard. However, it notes that the Government has confined itself to referring once again to articles 13, 14, 33, 38, 39 and 42 of the Constitution and section 369 of the Penal Code. The Committee therefore urges the Government to take the necessary measures to formally repeal section 9 of the Ordinance of 1984 and to combat actively stereotypes and prejudices concerning the vocational capacities and aspirations of men and women. The Committee also requests the Government to take measures to raise awareness among parents and the population as a whole about the importance of girls and boys attending and remaining in school, and to promote the access of girls and women to a broader range of training courses and occupations, particularly those that are traditionally occupied by men. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any measures taken in this regard.

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1999)

The Committee notes with concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments.

Articles 1 and 2(a) of the Convention. Principle of equal remuneration for men and women workers for work of equal value. Laws and regulations. The Committee recalls that, since 2005, it has been drawing the Government's attention to the need to amend sections 80(1) and 56(7) of the Labour Code, which limit the application of the principle of equal remuneration to the existence of "equal working conditions, qualifications and output" (section 80(1)) or to "equal work" (section 56(7)), and do not reflect the notion of "work of equal value". The Committee notes that the Government reaffirms that amendments to sections 80(1) and 56(7) of the Labour Code are envisaged to ensure that the concept of "work of equal value" is binding. Noting the Government's commitment, the Committee requests it to ensure, within the framework of the ongoing revision of the Labour Code, that the principle of equal remuneration for men and women workers for work of equal value set out in the Convention is set out in the Labour Code.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1999)

The Committee notes with concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments.

Articles 1–3 of the Convention. Protection against discrimination. Legislation. For many years the Committee has been emphasizing the shortcomings in the Labour Code and the General Civil Service Regulations regarding the protection of workers against discrimination, since these texts do not cover all of the grounds of discrimination or all the aspects of employment and occupation set out in the Convention. The Committee recalls that the Labour Code only covers the grounds of "origin", gender, age and status in relation to wage discrimination (section 80) and the grounds of opinion, trade union activity, membership or not of a political, religious or philosophical group or a specific trade union in relation to dismissal (section 42). The General Civil Service Regulations prohibit any distinction between men and women in relation to their general application and any discrimination on the basis of family situation in relation to access to employment (sections 200 and 201). The Committee notes the Government's indication that a preliminary draft of a new Bill amending and supplementing certain provisions of the Labour Code will take into account the grounds of discrimination set out in Article 1(1)(a). The Committee asks the Government to ensure that, within the framework of the ongoing revision of the Labour Code, discrimination on all of the grounds set out in the Convention is explicitly prohibited, as well as discrimination on any other grounds which it considers appropriate to include in the Code, at all stages of employment and occupation, including recruitment. The Committee also asks the Government to take the necessary measures to amend the provisions of the General Civil Service Regulations in order to ensure that civil servants are protected as a minimum in relation to the grounds set out in Article 1(1)(a) in respect of all aspects of employment, including recruitment and promotion. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on any legislative developments in this respect.

Article 1(1)(a). Discrimination based on sex. Sexual harassment. The Committee notes that the United Nations Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW) expressed deep concern at the high prevalence of violence against women and girls, especially sexual harassment at school and at work, the delay in adopting a comprehensive law to combat all forms of violence against women and the lack of awareness regarding this issue and of reporting of gender-based violence (CEDAW/C/COG/CO/6, 23 March 2012, paragraph 23). The Committee notes the Government's indication that, since 2011, the new draft Bill amending and supplementing certain provisions of the Labour Code has contained provisions against sexual harassment. The Committee once again asks the Government to ensure that provisions covering both quid pro quo harassment and sexual harassment which creates a hostile, intimidating or offensive environment are adopted and that they protect the victims of sexual harassment and establish penalties for the perpetrators. The Committee also asks the Government to take steps, in collaboration with employers' and workers' organizations, to prevent and combat sexual harassment, such as awareness-raising measures for employers, workers and educators as well as for labour inspectors, lawyers and judges, and to establish information systems and complaints procedures which take into account the sensitive nature of this issue in order to bring an end to these practices and allow victims to exercise their rights without losing their jobs.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Democratic Republic of the Congo

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1969)

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Equal remuneration for work of equal value. Definition of remuneration. Legislation. In its previous comment, the Committee noted with regret that section 86 of the Labour Code restricted application of the principle of equal remuneration to "conditions of work, qualifications and output". The Committee also noted that section 7.8 of the Labour Code, which defines the concept of "remuneration", excludes benefits to which the principle enshrined in the Convention applies. The Committee notes the Government's indication that no steps have been taken to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention, but that this question is to be addressed shortly. The Committee urgently requests the Government to take the necessary steps to revise the provisions of the Labour Code in order to ensure that the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value is explicitly included in the Code and that it applies to all components of remuneration as defined in Article 1(a) of the Convention.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 2001)

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Protection of workers against discrimination on all grounds covered by the Convention in all aspects of employment and occupation. Legislation. Public and private sectors. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that the provisions relating to discrimination included in Act No. 16/013 of 15 July 2016 issuing the staff regulations for state civil servants (hereinafter, Act No. 16/013), and the Labour Code (sections 62, 128 and 234), neither defined nor prohibited all the forms of discrimination in employment and occupation on the basis of all the grounds set out in the Convention. The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that the question of defining discrimination in the legislation will be placed before the National Labour Council for discussion. The Committee again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that a definition of direct and indirect discrimination, based as a minimum on all the grounds set out in the Convention and covering all aspects of employment and occupation, is included in the legislation applicable to the public and private sectors.

Article 1(1)(a) and 3(d). Discrimination based on sex. Leave in the civil service. The Committee notes with regret that, since 2007, it has been requesting the Government to take the necessary measures to modify section 30 of Act No. 16/013, under which women public officials who have taken maternity leave cannot claim their right to full paid annual leave during the same year. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the issue will be discussed with the trade unions in a joint committee. The Committee requests the Government to indicate whether: (i) the question of the incompatibility of section 30 of Act No. 16/013 with the Convention has been discussed by the joint committee; and (ii) measures were adopted to modify the section.

Discrimination based on race or ethnic origin. Indigenous peoples. Having highlighted on numerous occasions the marginalization of indigenous "pygmy" peoples, the Committee requested the Government to take measures without delay to bring an end to the discrimination that they face in employment and occupation. The Committee notes that the Government has not provided information on possible measures adopted in this regard. The Government indicates, as it has in previous reports, that a Bill to promote and protect the rights of indigenous pygmy peoples is passing through Parliament. The Committee notes in that respect that the United Nations Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW) recently observed that the Bill for the protection of indigenous peoples had been pending before Parliament since 2014 and that women members of the pygmy peoples continued to face multiple forms of discrimination (CEDAW/C/COD/CO/8, 6 August 2019, paragraph 44). The Committee once again requests the Government to take measures as quickly as possible to bring an end to discrimination against men and women workers belonging to the indigenous pygmy peoples. In more precise terms, the Committee requests the Government to take measures, such as training for labour inspectors and employers, the provision of education materials for the public and other awareness-raising measures to: (i) combat prejudices and stereotypes of which indigenous peoples are victims; (ii) combat discrimination relating to their working conditions (including remuneration); and (iii) allow indigenous peoples access to all levels of education and vocational training, employment and other resources which enable them to carry out their traditional and subsistence activities, including land. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on any developments in respect of the Bill for the protection of indigenous peoples.

General observation of 2018. More generally, with regard to the points raised above, the Committee would like to draw the Government's attention to its general observation on discrimination based on race, colour and national extraction which was adopted in 2018. In the general observation, the Committee notes with concern that discriminatory attitudes and stereotypes based on the race, colour or national extraction of men and women workers continue to hinder their participation in education, vocational training programmes and access to a wider range of employment opportunities, resulting in persisting occupational segregation and lower remuneration received for work of equal value. Furthermore, the Committee considers that it is necessary to adopt a comprehensive and coordinated approach to tackling the obstacles and barriers faced by persons in employment and occupation because of their race, colour or national extraction, and to promote equality of opportunity and treatment for all. Such an approach should include the adoption of interlocking measures aimed at addressing gaps in education, training and skills, providing unbiased vocational guidance, recognizing and validating the qualifications obtained abroad, and valuing and recognizing traditional knowledge and skills that may be relevant both to accessing and advancing in employment and to engaging in an occupation. The Committee also recalls that, in order to be effective, these measures must include concrete steps, such as laws, policies, programmes, mechanisms and participatory processes, remedies designed to address prejudices and stereotypes and to promote mutual understanding and tolerance among all sections of the population.

The Committee draws the Government's attention to its general observation of 2018 and requests it to provide information in response to the questions raised in that observation.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Equatorial Guinea

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 2001)

The Committee notes with deep concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments. The Committee informs the Government that, if it has not supplied replies to the points raised by 1 September 2021, then it may proceed with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the information at its disposal at its next session.

The Committee notes that the Government did not take the opportunity provided by the enactment of the Fundamental Act of Equatorial Guinea, on 16 February 2012, and of the General Labour Reforms Act (No. 10/2012), on 24 December 2012, to address the matters raised by the Committee.

Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention. Prohibited grounds of discrimination. The Committee notes that section 15 of the Fundamental Act of 2012 (previously section 15 of the Fundamental Act of 1995) provides that any bias or discrimination on tribal, ethnic, gender-related, religious, social, political or any other similar grounds, when duly ascertained, is punishable by law. Further, under section 1(3)(d) of the General Labour (Reforms) Act of 2012 (previously section 1(4) of the General Labour Act, 1990) the State guarantees equality of opportunity and treatment in employment and occupation and provides that no one may be subjected to discrimination, that is, to any distinction, exclusion or preference on grounds of race, colour, sex, political opinion, national extraction, social origin or trade union affiliation. The Committee notes that while section 1(3)(d) of the General Labour (Reforms) Act of 2012, continues to omit reference to religion as one of the prohibited grounds of discrimination, that ground is included in section 15 of the Fundamental Act of 2012. The Committee recalls that where provisions are adopted in order to give effect to the principles in the Convention, they should include at least all of the grounds of discrimination laid down in Article 1(1)(a) (see 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 853). The Committee therefore urges the Government to take steps to add the ground of "religion" to the list of prohibited grounds of discrimination at the earliest opportunity. The Committee once again asks the Government to provide information on the practical application of section 15 of the Fundamental Act of 2012, and of section 1(3)(d) of the General Labour (Reforms) Act of 2012, and to indicate whether any administrative or judicial decisions have been handed down concerning these provisions, and if so, to provide details thereof.

Articles 1(1)(b) and 5. Other grounds. Special measures. The Committee notes that section 1(4) of the General Labour Act of 1990 (now section 1(3)(d) of the General Labour (Reforms) Act of 2012) makes provision for facilitating the recruitment of older workers and those with reduced working capacity. The Committee had previously requested a copy of the National Employment Policy (Reforms) Act No. 6/1999 of 6 December 1999. It notes that section 62 of the National Employment Policy Act No. 6/1992 of 3 January 1992, as amended by the National Employment Policy (Reforms) Act of 1999, provides for the adoption of governmental programmes aimed at promoting employment among workers facing obstacles to entering the labour market, especially young first-time jobseekers, women, men older than 45 years of age and persons with disabilities. The Government is asked to supply information on the practical application of the above-mentioned provisions as it relates to older workers, young first-time jobseekers, and persons with disabilities.

Articles 2 and 3. National policy to promote equality of opportunity and treatment. The Committee recalls that discrimination in employment and occupation is a universal phenomenon that is constantly evolving, and that some manifestations of discrimination have acquired more subtle and less visible forms. It is therefore essential to acknowledge that no society is free from discrimination and that continuous action is required to address it. Moreover, the results achieved in the implementation of the national equality policy and programmes must be periodically assessed so that they can be adapted to the population's needs, particularly for those groups that are most vulnerable to discrimination (see 2012 General Survey, paragraphs 731 and 847). The Committee asks the Government to indicate whether it has a national policy designed to promote equality of opportunity and treatment in respect of employment and occupation, and describe how it is implemented (legal procedures, practical measures, etc.) in each of the following spheres: (i) access to vocational training; (ii) access to employment and to particular occupations; (iii) terms and conditions of employment. The Committee asks the Government to take specific steps with a view to assessing the results of the implementation of the national equality policy and to provide information on its impact on the different sections of the population and to supply statistical data disaggregated by sex, race, ethnic origin and religion on employment and vocational training and any other information which would enable the Committee to evaluate more fully the manner in which the Convention is applied in practice.

Article 4. Measures affecting individuals suspected of activities prejudicial to the security of the State. The Committee once again asks the Government to provide information concerning the practical application of Article 4 of the Convention, as well as specific information on the procedures establishing the right to appeal to a competent and independent body.

The Committee expects that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 2002)

Article 1(b) of the Convention. Work of equal value. Legislation. The Committee previously urged the Government to amend section 78 of the Employment Relations Promulgation (ERP) of 2007, which does not comply with the principle of the Convention as it restricts the comparison of remuneration to men and women holding the "same or substantially similar qualifications" employed in the "same or substantially similar circumstances". The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that section 78 of the Employment Relations Act 2007 was amended in 2015 as follows: "An employer must not refuse or omit to offer or afford a person the same rate of remuneration as are made available for persons of the same or substantially similar qualifications employed in the same or substantially similar circumstances on work of that description for any reason [...]". The Committee notes with deep regret that these amendments to section 78 continue to restrict equal remuneration to "persons of the same or substantially similar qualifications employed in the same or substantially similar circumstances". The Committee recalls once again that equal pay legislation should not only provide for equal remuneration for equal, the same or similar work, but should also address situations where men and women perform different work, requiring different qualifications and involving different circumstances, that is nevertheless work of equal value (see 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 673). The Committee once again urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value is duly reflected in section 78 of the Employment Relations Act.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 2002)

Article 1(1) of the Convention. Protection against discrimination. Public service. Legislation. The Committee recalls that the Public Service Act of 1999 does not contain any provision linked to discrimination. In its previous comment, it noted that, following the adoption of the Public Service (Amendment) Decree, No. 36 of 2011, section 10B(2) and section 10C prohibit discrimination in all aspects of employment, based on ethnicity, colour, gender, religion, national extraction and social origin, but omitting political opinion. The Committee asked the Government to: (1) take the necessary measures to include political opinion among the prohibited grounds of discrimination listed in the Public Service (Amendment) Decree; and (2) indicate how public service employees and applicants for public service employment are protected against discrimination based on political opinion in practice. The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that Decree No. 36 of 2011 was amended by the Employment Relations (Amendment) Act, 2016, and that Parts 2A and 2B, including sections 10B and 10C of the Public Service (Amendment) Decree, have been repealed. The Amendment Act also amended the definition of "workers" to include contractual civil servants under the Employment Relations Act 2007 (ERA).

The Committee recalls that section 6(2) of the ERA prohibits discrimination on the grounds listed in the Convention, including the ground of political opinion. It also notes that Part I (interpretation), section 4, of the ERA provides that a worker is employed under contract of service, and that the concept of employer includes the Government, other Government entities or local authorities and a statutory authority. The Committee observes that the Public Service Act, 1999, as well as Decree No. 36 of 2011, cover employees in the public sector who are civil servants (career public servants) and that workers in the public sector who are employed under a contract of service are covered by the ERA. In that regard, it stresses once again that sections 10B(2) and 10C of Decree No. 36 of 2011 do not prohibit discrimination on the ground of political opinion. It recalls once again that, where legal provisions are adopted to give effect to the principle of the Convention, they should include at least all the grounds of discrimination specified in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention. The Committee once again asks the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that political opinion is included among the prohibited grounds of discrimination listed in the Public Service Act 1999. The Committee also requests the Government to indicate how in the meantime public service employees and applicants to public service employment are protected against discrimination based on political opinion in practice.

Enforcement and access to justice. The Committee recalls that the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards (CAS) (International Labour Conference, 100th Session, 2011) noted that section 266 of Decree No. 21 of 2011 prohibits any action, proceeding, claim or grievance "which purports to or purported to challenge or involves the Government (…) any Minister or the Public Service Commission (…) which has been brought by virtue of or under the [Employment Relations Act]". The CAS urged the Government to ensure that government employees have access to competent judicial bodies to claim their rights and adequate remedies. Consequently, the Committee asked the Government to provide detailed information on the procedure and means of redress available to workers excluded from the scope of the ERA alleging discrimination in employment and occupation which purport to challenge or involve public authorities. The Government indicates that the Employment Relations (Amendment) Act 2016 repealed the Essential National Industries Decree 2011 (ENI) to allow civil servants and workers in statutory authorities and commercial banks to lodge their claims either through their trade unions as a trade dispute or as individual grievances. The Government adds that any worker, including civil servants, may file or lodge their employment grievance with the Mediation Services of the Ministry of Employment, Productivity and Industrial Relations, including for any matters pertaining to being discriminated against by their employer. According to the Government, in 2019, the Mediation Services received 22 grievances relating to discrimination, of which 13 were individual grievances reported by workers themselves and nine were reported by unions.

The Committee notes that, with regard to workers in the private sector, the ERA provides for a range of avenues of redress, such as the mediation services, the employment relations tribunal and the employment relations court. Regarding civil servants, the Public Service Regulations (L.N. 48 of 1999) provide in paragraph 28 that a chief executive must put in place, in his or her Ministry or department, appropriate procedures for employees to seek review of action that they consider adversely affects their employment. The Committee notes that section 266 of Decree No. 21 of 2011 may apply to both workers in the private and public sectors, as it prohibits any action, proceeding, claim or grievance "which purports to or purported to challenge or involves the Government (…) any Minister or the Public Service Commission".

The Committee further notes that the National Commission on Human Rights and Anti-Discrimination (CHRAD), established in 2009 under article 45 of the Constitution, can receive and investigate complaints of discrimination and seek to resolve them through conciliation. Where complaints remain unresolved, the CHRAD can refer these to a legal process. The Committee asks the Government to: (i) take the necessary measures to ensure that workers who purport to challenge the public authorities, in case of discrimination in employment or occupation have a formal avenue of redress; (ii) provide information on the application in practice of section 266 of the ERA; and to provide information on the anti-discrimination activities of the National Commission on Human Rights and Anti-Discrimination in employment and occupation; and (iii) report any cases brought before it and their outcome.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111)

Article 1 of the Convention. Protection against discrimination. Private sector. Legislative developments. The Committee previously requested the Government to provide information on any measures taken to include "social origin" in the list of grounds of discrimination prohibited by the Labour Code of French Polynesia so as to cover all the grounds of discrimination enumerated in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention, and to indicate the measures adopted to ensure that workers are protected in practice against discrimination based on this ground. In order to extend workers' protection against discrimination and align it with the anti-discrimination provisions applicable in metropolitan France, the Committee also invited the Government to examine the possibility of adding "place of residence" and "particular vulnerability resulting from the economic situation [of the person] which is apparent to or known by the person committing the discrimination" to the list of grounds of discrimination prohibited by the Labour Code of French Polynesia. The Committee notes with satisfaction that Territorial Act No. 2019-28 of 26 August 2019 has amended section Lp. 1121-1 of the Labour Code by adding the phrase "including social origin" after the ground "origin". With regard to place of residence, the Government indicates that section 18 of amended Basic Act No. 2004-192 of 27 February 2004 on the Statute of Autonomy of French Polynesia, provides that "French Polynesia may adopt measures favouring access to waged employment in the private sector for any person having a sufficient period of residence on the territory or any person who is married, cohabiting or in a civil union with the latter [...]". The Government emphasizes its willingness to implement these provisions by submitting a territorial bill in the near future. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the status of the territorial bill implementing section 18 of Basic Act No. 2004-192 and its impact on protection from discrimination based on "place of residence". Lastly, in view of the absence of response on this point and in order to extend workers' protection against discrimination and align it with the anti-discrimination provisions applicable in metropolitan France, the Committee once again invites the Government to examine the possibility of adding particular vulnerability resulting from the economic situation of the person apparent to or known by the person committing the discrimination to the list of grounds of discrimination prohibited by the Labour Code of French Polynesia, and requests that the Government provide information on any measures adopted in this regard.

Public sector. The Committee previously requested the Government to provide information on any steps taken to include "social origin" in the list of grounds of discrimination prohibited by section 5 of the General Public Service Regulations of French Polynesia and to indicate the measures adopted to ensure that public officials are protected in practice against discrimination based on social origin. It also invited the Government to examine the possibility of adding "family situation" to the list of grounds of discrimination prohibited by this section. In addition, it requested the Government to indicate the reasons why, in French Polynesia, the list of grounds of discrimination prohibited in the public service is more limited than the list applicable in the private sector and invited the Government to harmonize the protection of public officials and workers in the private sector against discrimination in employment and occupation. With regard to social origin, the Committee notes the Government's indication that section 5 of the General Public Service Regulations of French Polynesia prohibits discrimination based on "origin", which necessarily includes "social origin". The Government also indicates that, in practice, because the rights and obligations of public officials are established through regulations, they are of a general and impersonal nature and therefore identical for all public officials in the same employment category, both at the time of their entry into employment (via competitive examination) and throughout their career. In this regard, the Committee recalls that social origin is one of the seven prohibited grounds of discrimination enumerated in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention and that, when legal provisions are adopted to give effect to the principle of the Convention, they must include as a minimum all the grounds of discrimination enumerated in this Article. It also recalls that: (1) as it noted in the 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions (paragraphs 802–804), in some countries, persons from certain geographic areas or socially disadvantaged segments of the population (other than persons from ethnic minority groups) face exclusions with respect to recruitment, without any consideration of their individual merits; and (2) given the persistent patterns of discrimination on the grounds set out in the Convention, in most cases there is a need for a comprehensive legislation containing explicit provisions defining and prohibiting direct and indirect discrimination on at least all of the grounds set out in the Convention, and in all aspects of employment and occupation, in order to ensure the full application of the Convention (see 2012 General Survey, paragraph 854). Indications of rising social inequalities in some countries have highlighted the continuing relevance of addressing discrimination based on class and socio-occupational categories. In this respect, the Committee recalls that discrimination and lack of equal opportunity based on social origin refers to situations in which an individual's membership in a class, socio-occupational category or caste determines his or her occupational future, either because he or she is denied access to certain jobs or activities, or is assigned only certain jobs. Lastly, the Committee notes that, as indicated in the previous paragraph, the Labour Code of French Polynesia was amended in 2019 to state that the term "origin" included "social origin".

With regard to "family situation", the Government states that it is not formally opposed to adding this to the list of grounds of discrimination prohibited by section 5 of the General Public Service Regulations of French Polynesia if it were necessary to do so. However, referring to the Committee's 1996 General Survey on equality in employment and occupation, it notes that the prohibition of discrimination on the ground of sex, provided for in section 5, paragraph 1, of the Regulations, also includes discrimination based on family situation. Lastly, the Committee welcomes the Government's statement that it is not opposed to reviewing the list of prohibited grounds of discrimination established in section 5 of the General Public Service Regulations, based on the grounds provided for in the Labour Code of French Polynesia. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the steps taken to review the list of prohibited grounds of discrimination established in section 5 of the General Public Service Regulations of French Polynesia with a view to harmonizing its content with the list of grounds enumerated in the Labour Code, including with respect to "social origin".

Sexual harassment and "moral" harassment. Private and public sectors. In its previous comment, the Committee requested the Government to provide information on the application in practice of the relevant provisions of the Labour Code and the General Public Service Regulations of French Polynesia on sexual or "moral" harassment. It notes the information provided by the Government.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1961)

Article 1(b) of the Convention. Equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value. Legislation. The Committee recalls that for very many years it has been emphasizing the need to amend section 140 of the Labour Code, the provisions of which are too restrictive in relation to those of the Convention and do not allow the comparison of work that is of a different nature and performed under different conditions (skills/qualifications, responsibilities, effort, conditions of work), but which could be of equal value overall. The Committee recalls that section 140 makes the application of equal remuneration conditional on the existence of "equal conditions of work, skills and output", on the one hand, and work "of equal value and of the same nature", on the other. The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that the Labour Code is currently being updated, which is a priority project for the Government. It indicates that section 140 will be modified and become section 171 of the draft Labour Code, which provides that: "For work of equal value, remuneration shall be equal for all workers, irrespective of their origin, opinion, sex and age. Equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value and of the same nature refers to the remuneration rates set without discrimination on the basis of sex." The Committee notes with regret that this wording still does not provide for equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value as set out in the Convention, as it retains the concept of "the same nature". It also emphasizes that the wording in the draft text of section 171 "of equal value of vocational skills and output" limits the application of equal remuneration to a comparison of the value of vocational skills and output. In this regard, the Committee recalls that in order to eliminate discrimination in relation to remuneration, which inevitably arises if the value of the work performed by men and women is not recognized free from any sexist bias, it is essential to compare the value of work in occupations in which the work may require different types of skills and also involve different levels of responsibility and conditions of work, but which are nevertheless of equal value overall. It emphasizes in this respect that the concept of equal "value" as set out in the Convention permits a broad scope of comparison, including "equal", "the same" or "similar" work, and also encompasses work that is of an entirely different nature, but which is nevertheless of equal value. This is crucial for the full application of the Convention as, in practice, men and women are often not engaged in the same jobs. Furthermore, the Committee recalls that, as effective application of the principle of the Convention is needed, where women are more heavily concentrated in certain sectors or occupations, there is a risk that the possibilities for comparison at the enterprise or establishment level will be insufficient (see the 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraphs 673, 675 and 698). The Committee therefore urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the future Labour Code gives full expression and full effect to the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value, without limitations that are contrary to the Convention, and to provide information on any progress achieved in this regard.

Articles 2 and 3. Determination of rates of remuneration. Public service. Objective job evaluation. In its previous comment, the Committee requested the Government to explain in detail the methods and criteria used to determine pay levels following the introduction in 2015 of a new pay system in the public service, in order to ensure that jobs principally occupied by women have not been undervalued in relation to those mainly occupied by men. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government to the effect that the calculation of the pay of a State official takes into account the following elements: the basic pay, the reference indicative pay scale and the indicative scale of bonuses. These elements are uniform, calculated and paid pro rata based on the days worked, although the final remuneration may vary as it is based on collective results, the individual performance of the official and the payment of different bonuses and additional allowances. Noting that, according to the detailed explanations provided by the Government, one of the important components of final remuneration is based on the individual performance of officials, the Committee recalls that there is a significant difference between the concept of the evaluation of professional performance, which aims to evaluate the manner in which a particular worker carries out the job (output), and the concept of objective job evaluation, which evaluates the job (and not the worker) with a view to measuring the relative value of jobs that do not have the same content. The Committee also recalls that Article 3 of the Convention presupposes the use of appropriate methods for the objective evaluation of jobs. As women are very often engaged in different jobs to men, it is necessary to have a method of comparison through which it is possible to measure and compare the relative value of different jobs on the basis of objective and non-discriminatory factors (such as the required skills/qualifications, effort, responsibilities and working conditions) to prevent any sexist bias in their evaluation. Experience shows that skills that are often considered to be "female", such as manual dexterity and those required in the caring professions, are frequently undervalued or even overlooked, in comparison with traditionally "male" skills, such as heavy lifting, which contributes to perpetuating the undervaluation of women's jobs and to the widening of the pay gap between men and women (see the 2012 General Survey, paragraphs 695 to 701). The Committee requests the Government to indicate the measures adopted to ensure that the pay system for employees of the public service established in 2015 is free of gender bias. Noting the Government's indication that the jobs predominantly held by women have not been undervalued in relation to those occupied by men, the Committee requests it to provide information on the methods used to evaluate and establish the classification of the various jobs in the public service and to provide the corresponding salary scales, disaggregated by sex.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1961)

Article 1(1) of the Convention. Definition of discrimination. Legislation. The Committee welcomes the inclusion in the draft new Labour Code of a definition of the concept of "discrimination" that is identical to that of the Convention. The Committee hopes that the draft text of the new Labour Code will soon be adopted and promulgated and requests the Government to provide information on the progress achieved in this respect. It also requests the Government to take the necessary measures to disseminate these new provisions, once they have been adopted, to employers, workers and their respective organizations and to those responsible for the enforcement of the legislation and to provide a copy of the text.

Articles 1(1)(a) and 3. Discrimination on the basis of sex. Legislation. Further to its previous comment concerning the lack of conformity of certain provisions of the Civil Code that are in force (sections 253, 254 and 261) with the provisions of the Convention, the Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that the Civil Code is still under revision and that the Committee's comments will be examined. The Committee recalls that laws governing personal and family relations which do not yet provide for equal rights of men and women also continue to have an impact on the enjoyment of equality with respect to work and employment (2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 787). The Committee once again urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the provisions of the Civil Code that have a discriminatory impact on women's employment, namely sections 253, 254 and 261, are repealed and to provide a copy of the new Civil Code once it has been adopted and promulgated.

With regard to night work by women, as regulated by sections 167 and 169 of the Labour Code, the Committee notes that, in the draft new Labour Code, the provisions prohibiting night work by women in general have been removed, and that the protection measures only concern pregnant women, which is not incompatible with the Convention, insofar as they are strictly limited to the protection of maternity and not based on stereotypes concerning their capacities and role in society. While welcoming the withdrawal of the provisions prohibiting the principle of night work of women in the draft Labour Code, the Committee requests the Government to examine the possibility of the adoption in parallel of accompanying measures to assure the safety of workers, both men and women, during night work and measures for the development of adequate means of transport.

Article 2. Equality of opportunity and treatment of men and women in employment and occupation. Constitution. The Committee welcomes Act No. 001/2018 of 12 January 2018 revising the Constitution of the Republic of Gabon, which amends several articles of the Constitution in support of gender equality, principally in relation to elections, and provides that "the State shall promote equal access by women and men to electoral office and to political and professional responsibilities" (article 24). Welcoming the will of the Government to promote gender equality at the highest level, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the implementation of article 24 of the Constitution, which promotes the equal access of women and men to professional responsibilities, as well as equal access to political responsibilities, in law and practice, and on any specific measures adopted for this purpose.

National policy on equality. The Committee previously requested the Government to adopt measures to: (1) take effective action to combat stereotypes regarding women's aspirations, preferences and occupational capacities; and (2) resolve the difficulties faced by women in gaining access to resources and means of production, and particularly credit and land, and to encourage women's entrepreneurship. The Committee notes that the Government refers once again to the creation of a platform wholly dedicated to women entrepreneurs, the "Women's Business Centre", in order to provide support to women wishing to start up their own enterprises. The Committee also notes the Government's indication that it has introduced a Women's Day on 17 April each year and that it has decreed that 2015–25 shall be the Decade of the Women of Gabon. According to the information provided by the Government in its 2020 report to UNESCO on the application of the 2005 Convention on the Protection and Promotion of the Diversity of Cultural Expressions, ratified in 2007, the objective of the Decade of the Women of Gabon is the autonomy of women, and the expected results are training, improvement and the deep-rooted transformation of the condition of women at all levels (legal, political, economic and social). The Government adds in the report that the National Advisory Commission of the Decade of the Women of Gabon has been created in this context and that it is engaged in the collection of data on the ground throughout the national territory with a view to improving understanding of the situation of women. The Committee notes these initiatives and requests the Government to provide the results of the national data collection exercise on the condition of the women of Gabon undertaken by the National Advisory Commission of the Decade of the Women of Gabon. It also requests the Government to provide information on: (i) the measures adopted or envisaged to promote equality of opportunity and treatment for men and women, including in relation to employment and occupation; and (ii) information (including statistics) on the activities of the platform for women entrepreneurs since its establishment. In the absence of a response on the following points raised in its previous comments, the Committee reiterates its request concerning the measures adopted to: (i) combat effectively stereotypes regarding women's aspirations, preferences and professional capacities and their role in society and to enable them to gain access to a broader range of jobs and occupations (through vocational guidance and training free from gender bias); and (ii) resolve the difficulties faced by women in gaining access to resources and means of production, and particularly credit and land. The Government is also requested to provide information on the activities of the Ministry of Equality of Opportunity in relation to the promotion of equality of opportunity and treatment for men and women in employment and occupation.

Promotion of equality of opportunity and treatment without distinction on grounds other than sex. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to formulate and implement a national policy on equality of opportunity and treatment without distinction on grounds of race, colour, religion, political opinion, national extraction or social origin. The Committee notes the Government's indication that since 2016 it has been developing its policy of equality of opportunity and that many seminars have been organized since then to reinforce capacities to combat more effectively undue privilege and social inequality. In this regard, the Committee recalls that the primary obligation of ratifying States is to declare and pursue a national policy designed to promote equality of opportunity and treatment in respect of employment and occupation with a view to eliminating any discrimination in this respect. It also wishes to emphasize that the implementation of a national equality policy in relation to employment and occupation presupposes the adoption of a range of specific measures, which generally consist of a combination of legislative and administrative measures, collective agreements, public policies, affirmative action measures, dispute resolution and enforcement mechanisms, specialized bodies, practical programmes and awareness-raising (2012 General Survey, paragraphs 841 and 848). In light of the above, the Committee urges the Government to indicate any obstacles encountered in completing the formulation of a policy of equality of opportunity, which it indicates that it has been developing since 2016. It also requests the Government to indicate whether it is planned that the national equality policy will also cover the other grounds of discrimination prohibited by the Convention, with an indication of the specific strategies and measures envisaged or adopted with a view to: (i) combating all forms of discrimination on the basis of race, colour, religion, political opinion, national extraction and social origin; (ii) promoting equality of opportunity and treatment in employment and occupation; and (iii) monitoring and evaluating regularly the results achieved as a basis for reviewing and adapting existing measures and strategies, where necessary.

Articles 2, 3(d) and 5. Equality of opportunity for men and women in the public service. Special affirmative measures. Quotas. With reference to the under-representation of women at the higher categories (A1 and A2) of the public service, the Committee notes with interest the adoption of Act No. 09/2016 of 5 September 2016 establishing quotas in favour of women and young persons, and particularly a quota under which 30 per cent of higher level State positions are reserved for women. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the measures taken in practice for the implementation of this quota and to provide statistical data on personnel in the public service disaggregated by gender and category, with a view to measuring the impact of this measure on the representation of women in the higher categories of the public service. In the absence of information on this point, the Committee once again requests the Government to provide the conclusions of the audit of the public service carried out in 2016.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1993)

The Committee takes note of the observations of the Georgian Trade Union Confederation (GTUC) received on 6 October 2020, reiterating its observations received on 30 September 2019, which address issues related to the application of the Convention.

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Legislation. Recalling that the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value is not properly reflected in the legislation, the Committee previously welcomed the Government's indication that the Ministry of Labour, Health and Social Affairs was working on amending the labour legislation to implement Directive 2006/54/EC of 5 July 2006, which provides that, for the same work or for work of equal value, direct and indirect discrimination on the grounds of sex with regard to all aspects and conditions of remuneration must be eliminated. It encouraged the Government to ensure that labour legislation give full legislative expression to the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value, with a view to ensuring the full and effective implementation of the Convention without delay. It also urged the Government to take the necessary steps to amend section 57(1) of the Law on the Public Service (2015) to capture the concept of "work of equal value" so as to ensure that public officials covered by the Law are entitled not only to equal remuneration for equal work, but also for work that is entirely different but nonetheless of equal value. The Committee notes, from the Government's report, the adoption of amendments to the labour legislation in 2019 and in September 2020. It notes with regret that the Government did not use these opportunities to include a provision giving full legislative expression to the principle of the Convention. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the new National Strategy of Labour Market and Employment Policy 2019-2023 contains an action plan to ensure that both, at the legislative and practical levels, employees receive equal remuneration for "equally valuable work". Recalling that section 57(1) of the Law on the Public Service provides that the system of remuneration for public officials is based on the "principles of transparency and fairness, which means the implementation of equal pay for equal work", the Committee notes that the Government considers this provision to be in line with the principle of the Convention as coefficients are determined not only on the similarity of functions but also on responsibility, complexity, relevant competencies, qualifications and work experience which, according to the Government, implies the evaluation of the value of the work. Despite the Government's reassurance, the Committee recalls that when legal provisions are narrower than the principle laid down in the Convention and do not expressly include the concept of "work of equal value", such provisions hinder progress in eradicating gender-based pay discrimination (see General Survey on the Fundamental Conventions, 2012, paragraphs 676-679). Recalling that the Convention has been ratified in 1993, the Committee once again urges the Government to amend the labour legislation, in cooperation with the social partners and the Council for Gender Equality, in order to give full legislative expression to the principle of "equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value", with a view to ensuring the full and effective implementation of the Convention without delay. Noting the Government's reiterated statement that it intends to submit legislative proposals to the Parliament implementing Directive 2006/54/EC of 5 July 2006, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on any progress made in this regard. Furthermore, regarding the public sector, the Committee once again urges the Government to take the necessary steps to amend section 57(1) of the Law on the Public Service (2015) to capture the concept of "work of equal value" so as to ensure that public officials covered by the Law are entitled not only to equal remuneration for equal work, but also for work that is entirely different but nonetheless of equal value. The Government is requested to provide information on the progress achieved in this regard.

Article 2. Measures to address the gender pay gap and promote equal remuneration. In its previous comment, the Committee requested the Government to provide information on: (1) the measures taken or envisaged directly aimed at reducing the gender pay gap (encouraging the Government to continue its efforts in identifying and addressing the underlying causes of inequalities in remuneration and to promote women's access to a wider range of job opportunities at all levels); (2) the awareness-raising activities undertaken to promote equal remuneration for work of equal value; and (3) statistical data on men's and women's monthly and hourly wages and additional allowances, by economic sector, as well as data on the number of men and women employed in these sectors. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the Gender Equality Council is working on the elaboration of a methodology to calculate the gender pay gap and decrease inequality. It also notes the data provided by the Government on the average monthly earnings by occupation for 2017 and by sector of activity for 2016, 2017 and 2018. From this information, the Committee notes that in most sectors of activity, there has been no improvement in reducing the gender pay gap between 2016 and 2018, and that it remains high in nearly all sectors of activity. In particular, it notes that in 2018, in financial and insurance activities, men earned on average significantly more than women (men earned 3,461 Georgian lari (GEL) while women earned GEL1,498). The Committee notes, from the GTUC's observations, that the gender pay gap can be explained by horizontal and vertical gender segregation, as well as by the strong gender stereotypes, the unequal division of unpaid agricultural and domestic work, and the lack of gender-responsive services and programmes. The GTUC alleges that although there is almost no gap between male and female educational attainment, only 52.9 per cent of women are reportedly employed compared to 67.1 per cent of men. The Committee also notes the GTUC's observation that, according to a survey conducted by the Centre for Social Studies, gender disparities also exist in the receipt of benefits and other wage components: 66 per cent of men (eligible for bonuses/compensations) got bonuses, compared to 34 per cent of women; and 60 per cent of men got premiums, compared to 41 per cent of women. Given the persisting horizontal and vertical segregation prevailing in the country, the Committee asks the Government to step up its efforts to identify and properly address the underlying causes of inequalities in remuneration, such as gender discrimination, gender stereotypes, and occupational segregation and to promote women's access to a wider range of job opportunities at all levels, including top management positions and higher paying jobs. Noting the lack of information provided in this regard, the Committee reiterates its request that the Government provide information on the specific measures taken or envisaged in the framework of the State Concept on Gender Equality and the Gender Equality Council Action Plan 2018–20 directly aimed at reducing the gender pay gap. Such measures may include, for example, undertaking sensitization programmes and awareness-raising activities to overcome traditional stereotypes regarding the role of women in society or adopting measures on shared parental leave, and affordable and available childcare services. The Committee further requests the Government to provide information on any awareness-raising activities undertaken to promote equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value, including with respect to bonuses, premiums and other additional wage allowances. Finally, the Government is requested to continue to provide statistical data on men's and women's monthly and hourly wages and additional allowances, according to economic sector, as well as data on the number of men and women employed in these sectors.

Enforcement. The Committee previously requested the Government: (1) to enhance the capacity of the competent authorities to identify and address cases of pay inequalities between men and women for work of equal value; (2) to examine whether the applicable substantive and procedural provisions, in practice, allowed claims to be brought successfully; (3) to provide information on the effective enforcement of the principle of the Convention in practice; and (4) to provide information on relevant decisions handed down by the courts or other competent bodies, as well as any cases regarding unequal remuneration handled by the Office of the Public Defender. It notes the Government's commitment to re-establishing a fully-fledged labour inspectorate. In this regard, it notes with interest the adoption, in September 2020, of a new Labour Inspection Law. The Committee also notes the Government's statement that in February 2019, a new law was adopted on occupational safety and health and that the law extends the mandate of labour inspectors, enabling them to conduct unannounced inspections in enterprises in all economic sectors and to impose sanctions on identified violations. The Committee further notes the Government's indication that the number of labour inspectors was brought to 40 and would be increased to 100 during 2019-2020. The Government indicates that three trainings were provided to a total of 47 judges on the topic of "International labour standards and the Labour Code", and one training on the same topic was held for 15 court officials. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the activities of the labour inspectorate and its findings with regard to the application in practice of equal remuneration for men and women. The Committee also asks the Government to examine whether the applicable substantive and procedural provisions, in practice, allow claims to be brought successfully. The Committee further asks the Government to take concrete steps to ensure the effective enforcement of the principle of the Convention in practice, for example through training activities of the labour inspectorate, as well as of judges and other public officials, related specifically to the principle of equal remuneration between men and women for work of equal value. The Committee also asks the Government to provide information on: (i) the content and duration of any training for the 47 judges that addressed the language and application in practice of the principle of equal remuneration for men and women; (ii) decisions handed down by the courts or other competent bodies with regard to the application of the principle of the Convention; and (iii) any cases regarding unequal remuneration handled by the Office of the Public Defender.

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1993)

The Committee takes note of the observations of the Georgian Trade Union Confederation (GTUC) received on 6 October 2020, reiterating its observations received on 30 September 2019, which address issues related to the application of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments in this respect.

Article 1(1)(a). Discrimination based on sex. Sexual harassment. In its previous comment, the Committee asked the Government to take steps to: (1) prevent, together with workers' and employers' organizations, sexual harassment in the workplace; and (2) ensure that section 6(1)(b) of the Law on Gender Equality is effectively enforced (and to provide information on any cases of sexual harassment and their outcomes). It also asked the Government to consider including in the Labour Code a provision explicitly defining and prohibiting sexual harassment in the workplace. In this regard, the Committee notes the GTUC's repeated observation that sexual harassment remains one of the most under-reported forms of discrimination at work. It notes the Government's indication concerning the adoption in 2017 of Ordinance No. 200 defining general rules of ethics and conduct in the public service, which prohibits sexual harassment and establishes the requirement for public officials to be aware of this phenomenon and the prohibition of such practices, both in the workplace and in the public domain, and to remain informed of internal and general reporting procedures. The Committee also notes the Government's reference to the 2019 legislative amendments introducing a definition and prohibition of sexual harassment in the Law on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination, as "any unwanted verbal, non-verbal or physical behaviour of a sexual nature with the purpose of violating the dignity of a person or creating an intimidating, hostile, degrading, humiliating or offensive environment for that person". The Committee further notes that the Labour Code was amended in September 2020 to define sexual harassment as "the direct or indirect harassment of a person aimed at or resulting in impairing the dignity of that person, or at creating an intimidating, hostile, humiliating, degrading or abusive environment for him/her, and/or creating the circumstances for a person directly or indirectly causing their condition to deteriorate as compared to other persons in similar circumstances". The Committee notes with interest the introduction of a definition and prohibition of sexual harassment in the Labour Code, but notes that this definition does not cover the full range of forms of behaviour that constitute sexual harassment in employment and occupation (2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraphs 789 and 792). The Government also indicates that, between 2014 and 2018, the Public Defender reviewed 15 cases of sexual harassment and issued recommendations in four cases, and that the courts only dealt with two cases. In light of the limited number of infringements identified by the courts and the Public Defender, the Committee recalls that the absence or a low number of complaints regarding sexual harassment does not necessarily indicate that this form of sex discrimination does not exist; rather, it is likely to reflect the lack of an appropriate legal framework, the lack of awareness, understanding and recognition of this form of sex discrimination among government officials, and workers and employers and their organizations, as well as the lack of access to or the inadequacy of complaints mechanisms and means of redress, or fear of reprisals (see 2012 General Survey, paragraph 790). The Committee therefore asks the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure that the prohibition of sexual harassment is effectively enforced by the courts and the Public Defender, and to continue providing information on any cases of sexual harassment dealt with by the courts or any other competent authorities, including information on the sanctions imposed and remedies granted. It also asks the Government to take steps to include in the labour legislation a complete definition of sexual harassment, including both quid pro quo and hostile work environment, and to provide information on any progress made in this regard. Noting that the Government's report is silent on the subject, the Committee again asks the Government to take practical measures, together with workers' and employers' organizations, to prevent sexual harassment at work, including through the development of workplace policies and awareness-raising among workers and employers, and to report on the progress made in this regard.

Discrimination based on sexual orientation and gender identity. The Committee recalls that section 2 of the Labour Code prohibits discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation and gender identity and expression. In this regard, it notes from the 2019 report of the United Nations Independent Expert on protection against violence and discrimination based on sexual orientation and gender identity, that discrimination based on sexual orientation and gender identity is pervasive in Georgia: beatings are commonplace, harassment and bullying constant, and exclusion from education, work and health settings appear to be the norm. According to the findings of the Independent Expert, discrimination based on sexual orientation remains common in the workplace and a study has found that, in the lesbian, gay, bisexual, trans and gender diverse community, one person out of four has been denied employment due to their sexual orientation or gender identity (A/HRC/41/45/Add.1, 15 May 2019, paragraphs 31 and 72). The Committee asks the Government to provide information on: (i) any steps taken or envisaged to prevent and address discrimination based on sexual orientation and gender identity in employment and occupation, including statutory and awareness-raising measures; and (ii) prosecutions brought and penalties imposed for violations of section 2 of the Labour Code.

Article 1(3) of the Convention. Discrimination in recruitment. The Committee recalls that, according to the GTUC's observations, although section 2(3) of the Labour Code prohibits discrimination in recruitment, such cases of discrimination remain common practice and are often under-reported because the employer is not legally required to give reasons for a decision not to hire a candidate (section 5(8) of the Labour Code). The Committee notes from the Special Report of the Public Defender on the Fight Against Discrimination, its Prevention and the Situation of Equality (2018), that there is no express prohibition of discriminatory criteria in job advertisements and that such criteria are commonly used. The Public Defender proposes the introduction of legislative regulations expressly prohibiting discriminatory requirements in pre-contractual relations. The Committee notes the Government's statement in its report that amendments were made to the Labour Code in February 2019 and notes with interest that an employer can no longer ask a candidate for information that is not related to the performance of the job or to the evaluation of the candidate's ability to perform specific work, such as his/her religion, faith, disability, sexual orientation, ethnic affiliation or pregnancy status (section 5(1) of the Labour Code). The Committee also notes the Government's indication that the Gender Equality Council is drafting further amendments to the Labour Code to improve women's rights in relation to employment and occupation. In the framework of this legislative review, it is proposed that an employer should be required to substantiate his/her decision not to hire when there is an assumption of discrimination. The Committee notes the Government's statement that eight cases have been investigated by the Public Defender's Office on the basis of alleged discrimination in pre-contractual relations during the period 2015–18, but no indication is given as to the outcomes of these cases. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on any developments regarding the adoption of the draft legislative amendments proposed by the Gender Equality Council. The Committee also asks the Government to: (i) provide information on the application of new section 5(1) of the Labour Code in practice; (ii) continue taking steps to eliminate discriminatory practices in recruitment, including in job advertisements; and (iii) provide information on the number and nature of cases handled by the courts or the Office of the Public Defender regarding discrimination in pre-contractual relations, including the sanctions imposed and remedies granted.

Article 2. Equality of opportunity and treatment for men and women. The Committee previously asked the Government to step up its efforts to promote gender equality specifically in the field of employment and occupation and to take steps to address the barriers to women's access to the broadest possible range of sectors and industries and to promote a more equitable sharing of family responsibilities between men and women. It requested information on the implementation of the outstanding activities of the 2014–16 National Action Plan on Gender Equality, as well as on any specific activities carried out by the Gender Equality Council in the field of employment and occupation. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the Ministry of Economy and Sustainable Development, in partnership with the public agencies Enterprise Georgia and the Georgian Innovation and Technology Agency, is implementing projects to promote women's entrepreneurship and their role in managerial positions by: (1) financially supporting start-ups and/or helping the expansion of existing businesses; and (2) providing training courses and individual consultancy on business management. The Government states that the Gender Equality Council identified the "economic empowerment of women" as a priority for 2019 and initiated two thematic enquiries focusing on the barriers women face when participating in state economic programmes and in access to vocational education. The Committee also takes note of the Gender Equality Council's Action Plan for 2018–2020. However, the Committee notes from the GTUC's observations that, despite positive steps to improve the labour regulations, the issues of women's promotion (occupational gender segregation), women's economic empowerment and equal participation in economic development, as well as proper pay, remain problematic. The GTUC alleges that gender inequalities are most challenging in rural areas and that gender stereotypes, the unequal division of unpaid agricultural and domestic work and a lack of gender-responsive services and programmes limit women's abilities to acquire new skills, develop agricultural or other businesses and earn a sustainable income. In addition, the GTUC states that women entrepreneurs continue to face challenges in access to finance, information, training, access to business networks, as well as the reconciliation of work and family responsibilities. Referring to the official statistical data, the GTUC indicates that women comprise only 29 per cent of public service employees and only 21.8 per cent of managerial positions in the public sector. The Committee asks the Government to pursue its efforts to promote gender equality in employment and occupation, including through measures to address directly stereotypes regarding women's professional aspirations, preferences and capabilities, and their role in the family. The Committee again urges the Government to take steps to address the legal and practical barriers to women's access to the broadest possible range of sectors and industries, at all levels of responsibility, and to promote a more equitable sharing of family responsibilities between men and women, and to report on the results achieved in this regard. The Committee further asks the Government to provide information on the conclusions and recommendations of the Gender Equality Council following its 2019 thematic enquiries, as well as on the results of its Action Plan 2018–2020 in the field of gender equality in employment and occupation. The Committee asks the Government to provide statistics on the situation of men and women in different occupations, including at the decision-making level, and in all sectors of the economy.

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1956)

The Committee takes note of the Government's report and the supplementary information provided in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020).

The Committee also notes the observations of the German Confederation of Trade Unions (DGB) received on 21 November 2019. It further notes the additional observations of the DGB received on 10 November 2020. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments with respect to the additional observations.

Article 2 of the Convention. Wage transparency. The Committee previously noted the adoption of the Act promoting remuneration transparency between women and men (Transparency of Remuneration Act), 2017, which introduces: (1) an individual entitlement for employees in establishments with more than 200 employees to obtain information on the median monthly gross salary of at least six employees of the other gender who perform the same work or work of equal value, as well as on the criteria and procedure used for determining the remuneration; and (2) regular reporting about the measures taken to promote gender equality and create equal pay for women and men for private sector employers with more than 500 employees, which are also encouraged to use internal company evaluation procedures to assess their remuneration system. It requested the Government to provide information on: (1) the implementation of the Transparency of Remuneration Act; and (2) the proportion of companies and employees covered by these provisions. The Committee notes the Government's statement, in its report, that several guides, leaflets and sample forms were disseminated to raise awareness of the provisions of the Transparency of Remuneration Act, and advice were provided to specific target groups, including workers and employers. The Government indicates that, as a result of an assessment carried out on the implementation of the Act in 2019, it appears that: (1) only 4 per cent of employees in enterprises with over 200 employees have made an information request; (2) 45 per cent of companies surveyed have voluntarily reviewed their in-house pay structures; and (3) 44 per cent of companies with reporting obligations indicated they were complying with the reporting obligation and 40 per cent were planning to do so. The Committee notes that, in its observations, the DGB considers that the assessment reveals that further amendments should be introduced in the Transparency of Remuneration Act, more particularly in order to: (1) ensure the right to information to all workers irrespective of the size of the company; (2) introduce an obligation to carry out certified evaluation procedures even for companies with less than 500 employees; (3) standardize the content and form of reporting obligations; (4) provide for sanctions in case of non-compliance of these requirements; and (5) introduce a right to bring a collective action so that the burden of enforcing their rights does not fall on individual workers. In that regard, the Committee notes the Government's indication that, in a 2019 ruling (No. 16 Sa 983/18), the Berlin-Brandenburg State Labour Court decided that a woman journalist alleging pay discrimination was not able to exercise the individual right of information under the Transparency of Remuneration Act as, being a freelance worker, she was only a "quasi-employee" and not a "regular employee". It however notes that, in its supplementary information, the Government indicates that following the claimant's appeal to the Federal Labour Court, it was finally decided that the claimant was able to request information from the defendant on the criteria and procedures for wage-setting as she was, as a freelance employee, a "worker" within the meaning of section 5(2)(1) of the Act. The Committee asks the Government to continue to provide information on the implementation of the Transparency of Remuneration Act, including any assessment made of the level of compliance with the statutory reporting requirements on gender equality and equal pay at the company level, and any actions taken to address gender wage gaps revealed, and the impact thereof. It also asks the Government to provide information on: (i) any measures taken to enhance the implementation of the Act, including by raising awareness of workers, employers and their respective organizations about its provisions and remedies available; (ii) any measures envisaged to overcome obstacles to its effectiveness that may have been identified by the assessments carried out or the social partners; as well as (iii) the number of companies of more than 200 employees and of more than 500 employees in the country, as well as the proportion of the workforce covered by these undertakings.

Articles 2 and 3. Assessing and addressing the gender pay gap. The Committee previously noted the measures implemented by the Government to combat vertical and horizontal occupational gender segregation of the labour market, but expressed concern at the persistent high level of the gender pay gap. It requested the Government to strengthen its efforts in order to reduce the gender pay gap both in the public and private sectors, and address its underlying causes. The Committee notes, from the statistical information provided by the Government, that the unadjusted wage differentials between men and women slightly decreased from 21 per cent in 2017 to 20 per cent in 2019, while the gender pay gap remained unchanged in the public sector, being still estimated at 9 per cent in 2019. Clear variations still persist between the regions (21 per cent in the western part of the country, compared to 7 per cent in the eastern part of the country). The Committee notes that, in 2019, pay differentials between women and men were still particularly wide in scientific and technical activities (29 per cent); financial and insurance services (28 per cent); as well as information and communication (24 per cent) and manufacturing (23 per cent). It further notes the Government's statement that a number of causes of pay inequality have been identified among which: different choices of occupations, working hours, low representation of women in leadership positions and family-related career breaks and unpaid care work. In that regard, the Government refers to its comments made on the application of the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) on occupational gender segregation and reconciliation of work and family responsibilities. It notes that, in its observations, the DGB expresses concern at persistent stereotyped assumptions that the main responsibility for family care lies with women, which results in financial losses, career breaks and higher levels of women's participation in part-time work and "mini-jobs", thus adversely affecting their remuneration and pension levels. The Committee notes that, in its supplementary information, the Government indicates that a three-year programme "Strengthen enterprises, promote pay equality" was launched in July 2020 to embed the implementation of the pay equality requirement in enterprises as the core of a comprehensive company personnel policy. The Government adds that it will be supporting regular company discussions on the topic of pay equality, developing and awarding a label denoting fair employers and providing specific assistance on the subject of equal treatment and equality at work, including by providing examples of best practices. The Committee welcomes the initiatives implemented by the Government which contributed to the slight decrease in the gender pay gap. It however notes that: (1) the gender pay gap still remains as high as 21 per cent, being still one of the highest in the European Union (6 percentage points above the European Union average) ; and (2) according to the 2019 Structures of Earnings Survey, when women have the same formal qualifications and otherwise identical qualities as men, the pay gap between women and men is still 6 per cent in 2019, which was considered as an indication of latent discrimination against women in the labour market. The Committee urges the Government to strengthen its efforts to eliminate the gender pay gap, including by addressing the differences in remuneration that may be due to gender discrimination. It further asks the Government to provide: (i) information on the proactive measures implemented to that end, both in the public and private sectors, including by enhancing women's access to jobs with career prospects and higher pay; (ii) information on any assessment made of the impact of such measures, including of the results of the "Strengthen enterprises, promote pay equality" programme; as well as (iii) statistical information on the earnings of men and women, disaggregated by economic activity and occupation, both in the public and private sectors.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1961)

The Committee takes note of the Government's report and the supplementary information provided in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020).

The Committee also notes the observations of the German Confederation of Trade Unions (DGB) received on 21 November 2019. It further notes the additional observations of the DGB received on 10 November 2020. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments with respect to the additional observations.

Articles 1(1)(a). 2 and 3 of the Convention. Non-discrimination, equality of opportunity and treatment irrespective of race, colour or national extraction. The Committee previously noted the persistent segregation and discrimination faced by minorities, including the Sinti, Roma and people of African descent, in education and employment and requested the Government to provide information on the measures taken to address them. The Committee notes the Government's statement, in its report, that the situation of persons with a migration background has improved slightly, but remains difficult. The Government indicates that the difficult situation of persons with a migration background in the labour market is due to several causes, including the lack of German language skills, low education, little or outdated work experience, lack of knowledge about the German labour market and discrimination. The Committee welcomes the Government's indication that, in the framework of the National Action Plan on Integration (NAP-I), several programmes focusing on the labour market integration of persons with a migration background continue to be implemented. As a result, numerous large enterprises have already made diversity issues an essential part of their human resource development strategies and many small and medium-sized enterprises have recognized the benefits of diversity in their workforce. The Committee also welcomes the various initiatives taken to improve qualifications and skills for persons with a migration background, including the establishment of regional skilled worker networks. Furthermore, the Committee notes that the Government indicates that: (1) the Federal Government's Integration Commissioner and the Federal Ministry for Economic Affairs and Energy are working together with various actors, within the "Diversity in the Economy" Forum, to support enterprises with intercultural openness and diversity management, the results of which will be presented at the 13th Integration Summit in early 2021; and (2) work was launched in May 2019 to develop the Integration in the Labour Market Forum, which focuses inter alia on the promotion of vocational training, protection against precarious and exploitative employment, the involvement of women migrants and women refugees in paid work and support for career promotion. The Committee also notes, more particularly, the implementation of the "Strong in the workplace – Mothers with a migration background get on board" (2015–2022) programme (funded by the European Social Fund), which aims to promote access to paid work, in particular through coaching, qualifications or language courses. To date, the federal programme has been able to reach over 10,000 participants. In that regard, the Committee notes that, in its observations, the DGB welcomes the programmes implemented by the Government to enhance the integration of persons with a migration background, but highlights that the gender perspective would need to be more strongly reflected.

With regard to the public service, the Committee notes the Government's statement that it is aware of its responsibility as an employer and intends to increase the percentage of staff members with a migration background. In that regard, the Committee notes that, according to a study carried out in 2016, the average number of employees with a migration background in the federal administration was estimated at 14.8 per cent. The Government adds that additional employee surveys were conducted within the federal administration in 2019 in order to provide more in-depth data on equality of opportunity and diversity. Based on the results of these surveys, the Government indicates that it will develop new ways for further increasing the participation of people with a migration background and overcoming any obstacles to their access to the labour market.

With reference to education, the Committee welcomes the following initiatives to which the Government refers in its report: (1) the elaboration by the Federal Anti-Discrimination Agency (ADS) in 2018 of Comprehensive Practice Guidelines to combat discrimination against minorities in schools; and (2) the "fair@school" (Schools against Discrimination) competition, a joint initiative launched in collaboration with the ADS, for which the award-winning projects are intended to provide examples of how schools can work for diversity. The Committee however notes the Government's statement that more measures are needed to address discrimination in education.

The Committee notes that, according to a micro-census conducted by the Federal Statistical Office, in 2017: (1) persons with a migration background represented 23.6 per cent of the total population (representing a 3.6 percentage points increase compared to 2015); (2) their employment rate was estimated at 65 per cent, compared to 77.3 per cent of persons of German origin; and (3) 6.6 per cent of them were not in paid employment, compared to 3.0 per cent of persons of German origin. In 2018, the average unemployment rate of persons with a migration background was estimated at 12.9 per cent, compared to 5.2 per cent of persons of German origin. The Committee further notes that, according to the 2019 Annual Report of the ADS, the number of people contacting the agency to report racial discrimination has more than doubled since 2015 and that 33 per cent of cases concerned racial discrimination, accounting for the highest proportion of all cases.

With regard specifically to the situation of the Sinti and Roma people, the Committee notes that the Government has not provided any information. It notes however that, in its 2019 report, the European Commission against Racism and Intolerance (ECRI) expressed concern at the lack of official statistical data on the number of Sinti and Roma and the fact that the latest qualitative study on their situation in the country dates back to 2011 and showed a high level of discrimination and segregation at school and low levels of education. The ECRI also highlighted as a good practice the nomination in a number of Länder of Sinti and Roma mediators to improve interaction and cooperation between Sinti and Roma pupils, their parents and schools (ECRI report on Germany, sixth monitoring cycle, 10 December 2019, paragraphs 95–101).

In light of the high number of persons with a minority or migration background living in the country and the persistent disparities in their access to education, training, employment and occupation, the Committee urges the Government to: (i) strengthen its efforts to prevent segregation and discrimination, in particular to effectively tackle racial stereotypes and prejudices, in the fields of education, training and employment, including with respect to the Sinti, Roma and people of African descent; (ii) provide information on the proactive measures taken to that end in the context of the NAP-I or otherwise as well as on the results of the measures and programmes already implemented, including the Programme "Strong in the workplace – Mothers with a migration background get on board"; and (iii) provide specific information on the results of the "Diversity in the Economy" Forum and the "Integration in the Labour Market" Forum, including any follow-up measures taken or envisaged in this framework.

General observation of 2018. With regard to the above issues, and in more general terms, the Committee would like to draw the Government's attention to its general observation on discrimination based on race, colour and national extraction which was adopted in 2018. In the general observation, the Committee notes with concern that discriminatory attitudes and stereotypes based on the race, colour or national extraction of men and women workers continue to hinder their participation in education, vocational training programmes and access to a wider range of employment opportunities, resulting in persisting occupational segregation and lower remuneration received for work of equal value. Furthermore, the Committee considers that it is necessary to adopt a comprehensive and coordinated approach to tackling the obstacles and barriers faced by persons in employment and occupation because of their race, colour or national extraction, and to promote equality of opportunity and treatment for all.

Such an approach should include the adoption of interlocking measures aimed at addressing gaps in education, training and skills, providing unbiased vocational guidance, recognizing and validating the qualifications obtained abroad, and valuing and recognizing traditional knowledge and skills that may be relevant both to accessing and advancing in employment and to engaging in an occupation. The Committee also recalls that, in order to be effective, these measures must include concrete steps, such as laws, policies, programmes, mechanisms and participatory processes, remedies designed to address prejudices and stereotypes and to promote mutual understanding and tolerance among all sections of the population.

The Committee draws the Government's attention to its general observation of 2018 and requests the Government to provide information in response to the questions raised in that observation.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1968)

The Committee notes that the Government's report contains no reply to its previous comments. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments.

The Committee notes with regret that, again, the Government's report contains no information regarding a number of its previous comments. The Committee wishes to reiterate that without the necessary information, it is not in a position to assess the effective implementation of the Convention, including the progress achieved since its ratification. The Committee hopes that the Government's next report will contain full information on the matters raised below.

Article 1(b) of the Convention. Equal remuneration for work of equal value. Legislation. The Committee recalls that since the adoption of the Labour Act in 2003, it has been raising concerns regarding sections 10(b) and 68 of the Act, which are set out in terms that are more restrictive than the principle of the Convention, providing for equal remuneration for "equal work". The Committee notes with concern that the Government's report merely repeats its previous indication that "equal pay for equal work without distinction of any kind" under sections 10(b) and 68 of the Labour Act is synonymous with the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value, but provides no details in support of this assertion and gave no indication that jobs of a completely different nature can be compared under the Act. The Committee emphasizes once more that the concept of "work of equal value" lies at the heart of the fundamental right of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value, and the promotion of equality. Due to historical attitudes and stereotypes regarding women's aspirations, preferences and capabilities, certain jobs are held predominantly or exclusively by women (such as in caring professions) and others by men (such as in construction). Often "female jobs" are undervalued in comparison with work of equal value performed by men when determining wage rates. The concept of "work of equal value" is fundamental to tackling occupational sex segregation in the labour market, which exists in almost every country, as it permits a broad scope of comparison, including, but going beyond equal remuneration for "equal" work, and also encompasses work that is of an entirely different nature, which is nevertheless of equal value (see 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraphs 672–679). Consequently, the Committee once again urges the Government to take the necessary measures to amend sections 10(b) and 68 of the Labour Act of 2003, in order to give full legislative expression to the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value set out in the Convention, and to provide information on any progress made in this regard.

Equal remuneration for work of equal value in the public service. The Committee recalls that a public service pay policy setting out a single spine salary structure was previously adopted and that all public service employees were to be brought under this structure by the end of 2012. The Committee also recalls that the evaluation had been made on the basis of four main job factors (knowledge and skill, responsibility, working conditions and effort) which had been subdivided into 13 subfactors. The Committee notes the documentation provided by the Government in its report, including a table entitled "Single spine salary structure", a memorandum of understanding between the Fair Wages and Salaries Commission and the social partners, and a White Paper on the single spine pay policy. It notes however that the table "Single spine salary structure" provided does not contain information on the types of jobs that fall within each level of pay and thus does not allow the Committee to assess whether the method of evaluation of jobs used is effectively free from gender bias. The Committee therefore requests the Government to provide information on how it has classified jobs within the single spine salary structure, in order to allow it to assess the factors used to compare jobs and ensure that they are free from gender bias. Noting the absence of information provided in this regard, the Committee requests once more the Government to provide information on the progress made in covering all public service employees by the single spine salary structure, and how this has impacted on the relative pay of women and men in the public service. It also reiterates its request for specific information on the number of men and women at each level of the pay structure. Finally, the Committee reiterates its request to the Government to provide information on the practical application of this single spine salary structure, including on the issues dealt with by the Fair Wages and Salaries Commission and the steps taken by this Commission to ensure full application of the principle of the Convention in the public service.

Article 2(2)(c). Collective agreements. For a number of years, the Committee has been commenting on collective agreements that contained provisions discriminating against women, in particular concerning the allocation of certain fringe benefits. The Committee notes that, once more, the Government's report does not contain any specific information in response to the Committee's requests in this regard. Therefore, once again, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary steps, in cooperation with employers' and workers' organizations, to ensure that provisions of collective agreements do not discriminate on the ground of sex. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any measures taken or envisaged, in cooperation with employers' and workers' organizations, to promote the principle of equal remuneration between men and women for work of equal value, including objective job evaluation methods, through collective agreements. It also requests the Government to provide examples of collective agreements reflecting the principle enshrined in the Convention.

Article 3. Objective job evaluation in the private sector. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to take steps to promote objective job evaluation methods in the private sector to eliminate unequal pay between men and women. The Committee notes that the Government's report is silent on this point. However, its notes from the sixth round of the Ghana Living Standards Survey, published in 2014, that the hourly earnings of men in the various occupational groups remain higher than those of women except for clerical support workers. The Committee recalls that the concept of "equal value" requires some method of measuring and comparing the relative value of different jobs. There needs to be an examination of the respective tasks involved, undertaken on the basis of entirely objective and non-discriminatory criteria to avoid the assessment being tainted by gender bias. While the Convention does not prescribe any specific method for such an examination, Article 3 presupposes the use of appropriate techniques for objective job evaluation, comparing factors such as skill, effort, responsibilities and working conditions (see 2012 General Survey, paragraphs 695–703). Consequently, the Committee once again requests the Government to take steps to promote objective job evaluation methods in the private sector to eliminate unequal pay, and to provide information on the progress made in this regard. Once more, it requests the Government to provide updated information on the gender pay gap in the private sector, including statistical information based on the results of the recent Ghana Living Standards Survey.

Article 4. Tripartite cooperation. Noting the lack of new information provided in this regard, the Committee once again recalls the important role of the employers' and workers' organizations in promoting the principle of the Convention. The Committee therefore requests the Government to provide specific information on the concrete steps and action undertaken to promote the principle of the Convention, and the results of such initiatives. The Committee also requests the Government to indicate whether equal remuneration between men and women has been discussed specifically within the National Tripartite Committee, and how the principle has been taken into consideration in the establishment of the minimum wage.

Enforcement. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the National Labour Commission and the Fair Wages and Salaries Commission deal with issues pertaining to grievances of workers, particularly those regarding equal remuneration and that an Alternative Dispute Resolution Centre, pursuant to the Alternative Dispute Resolution Act of 2010, serves as an additional forum to deal with complaints regarding remuneration. The Committee notes the Government's repeated indication that there have been no cases brought forward on the issue of equal remuneration between men and women workers for work of equal value. In this regard, the Committee recalls that, where no cases or complaints, or very few, are being lodged, this is likely to indicate a lack of an appropriate legal framework, lack of awareness of rights, lack of confidence in or absence of practical access to procedures, or fear of reprisals (see 2012 General Survey, paragraph 870). Therefore, the Committee requests the Government to take steps to raise awareness of the relevant legislation, to enhance the capacity of the competent authorities, including judges, labour inspectors and other public officials, to identify and address cases of discrimination and unequal pay, and also to examine whether the applicable substantive and procedural provisions, in practice, allow claims to be brought successfully. In addition, the Government is asked to provide information on any decisions by the courts, the National Labour Commission, the Fair Wages and Salaries Commission and the Alternative Dispute Resolution Centre or any other competent body, as well as on any violations identified by, or reported to, labour inspectors, relating to equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1961)

Article 1 of the Convention. Prohibited grounds of discrimination. In its previous observation, the Committee urged the Government to take concrete steps to amend the Labour Act of 2003 so as to include at least all the grounds of discrimination specified in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention, and to provide information on any progress made in this regard. The Committee notes that, in its report, the Government indicates firstly, that: the 1992 Constitution prohibits discrimination in article 17(2) and (3), which provides that: "A person shall not be discriminated against on grounds of gender, race, colour, ethnic origin, religion, creed or social or economic status", and that, for the purpose of this article, "'discriminate' means to give different treatment to different persons attributable only or mainly to their respective descriptions by race, place of origin, political opinions, colour, gender, occupation, religion, or creed". The Government adds that the Labour Act 2003 prohibits discrimination throughout the employment cycle (recruitment, career development and termination). The Committee stresses once again that the expressions "social status", "politics" and "political status" set out as prohibited grounds of discrimination in sections 14 and 63 of the Labour Act appear to be narrower than the terms "social origin" and "political opinion" enumerated in the Convention. It recalls that the prohibition of discrimination on the basis of "political opinion", as set out in the Convention, should cover a worker's activities to express or demonstrate political views and that this protection is not exclusively limited to an individual's activities or position within a political party. Further, discrimination on the basis of "social origin" arises when an individual's membership of a class, a socio-occupational category or a caste determines his or her occupational future either by denying him or her access to certain jobs or activities or, conversely, by assigning him or her to certain jobs. Finally, it wishes to reiterate that, where legal provisions are adopted to give effect to the principle of the Convention, they should include all the grounds of discrimination specified in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention (2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraphs 802, 805 and 853). Noting that the Government mentions ongoing consultations to review the Labour Act 2003, the Committee asks the Government to seize this opportunity to ensure that the new Labour Act includes as a minimum the seven prohibited grounds of discrimination listed in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on any developments in this regard.

Article 1(1)(a). Discrimination based on sex. Sexual harassment. In its previous comment, the Committee urged the Government to: (1) expand the definition of sexual harassment to explicitly cover hostile environment sexual harassment; and (2) take concrete steps to achieve better knowledge and understanding of the existence of sexual harassment and the means of preventing and addressing it among labour inspectors, judges and other relevant public officials, as well as employers, workers and their organizations, and to provide information on the progress achieved. The Government indicates that: (1) the definition of sexual harassment will be expanded during the on-going review of the Labour Act; (2) it is committed to combating sexual harassment through labour inspection and the enforcement of the law by public institutions and competent courts; and (3) that more sensitization programmes, such as seminars, training, advocacy and other stakeholder consultations will be embarked upon to create awareness of sexual harassment at work as a serious manifestation of sex discrimination to be addressed within the context of the Convention. The Committee asks the Government to provide information: (i) on any developments concerning the expansion of the definition of sexual harassment in the Labour Act; and, in the meantime, (ii) on the number, nature and outcome of any complaints or cases of violence or sexual harassment at work handled by the labour inspectorate and the courts.

Article 2. Equality of opportunity and treatment irrespective of race, colour, religion or national extraction. The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report is once again silent on the issue of discrimination on the grounds of race, colour, religion and national extraction. It recalls that, while the relative importance of the problems relating to each of the grounds may differ for each country, when reviewing the situation and deciding on the measures to be taken, it is essential that attention be given to all the grounds in implementing the national policy (2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraphs 848 and 849).

General observation of 2018. Regarding the above issues, and in more general terms, the Committee would like to draw the Government's attention to its general observation on discrimination based on race, colour and national extraction adopted in 2018. In the general observation, the Committee notes with concern that discriminatory attitudes and stereotypes based on the race, colour or national extraction of men and women workers continue to hinder their participation in education, vocational training programmes and access to a wider range of employment opportunities, resulting in persisting occupational segregation and lower remuneration received for work of equal value. Furthermore, the Committee considers that it is necessary to adopt a comprehensive and coordinated approach to tackling the obstacles and barriers faced by persons in employment and occupation because of their race, colour or national extraction, and to promote equality of opportunity and treatment for all. Such an approach should include the adoption of interlocking measures aimed at addressing gaps in education, training and skills, providing unbiased vocational guidance, recognizing and validating the qualifications obtained abroad, and valuing and recognizing traditional knowledge and skills that may be relevant both to accessing and advancing in employment and to engaging in an occupation. The Committee also recalls that, in order to be effective, these measures must include concrete steps, such as laws, policies, programmes, mechanisms and participatory processes, and remedies designed to address prejudices and stereotypes and to promote mutual understanding and tolerance among all sections of the population.

The Committee draws the Government's attention to its general observation of 2018 and requests the Government to provide information in response to the questions raised in that observation.

Article 5. Special measures. Persons with disabilities. In its previous comment, the Committee once again requested the Government to provide the data on persons with disabilities collected by the National Council on Persons with Disability (NCPD) established by the Persons with Disability Act, 2006, and on the implementation of the special incentive scheme for employing persons with disabilities. The Committee notes that, according to the statistical information provided by the Government (Ghana Statistical Service Survey): in 2010, persons with disabilities represented 3 per cent (737,743 persons) of Ghana's population (24,658,823). In general, there were more women with disabilities than men, and they mostly lived in rural rather than urban localities. It also notes that over half of all the persons with disabilities aged 15 and over were employed, and among those employed the percentage was higher for men (52 per cent) than women (47 per cent), and higher in the rural areas (58 per cent) than urban localities (49 per cent). The Committee recalls that the Persons with Disability Act, 2006, provides: (1) for rights such as unrestricted access to public places and buildings, employment, education and transport and a 10-year moratorium, within which all public buildings have to be made accessible to people with disabilities; and (2) that the State shall set up rehabilitation centres in each of the 10 administrative regions in the country to train persons with disabilities and facilitate their employment. The Committee therefore asks the Government to provide information on: (i) the implementation of the Persons with Disability Act, 2006, and particularly on the obstacles encountered in practice in providing job training and employment opportunities for persons with disabilities; (ii) the functioning and activities of the NCPD in the field of employment and occupation; and (iii) updated statistical information on the employment rate of persons with disabilities, disaggregated by sex, sector and age.

Enforcement. In its previous comment, the Committee requested the Government to: (1) take steps to enhance the capacity of law enforcement officials to identify and address discrimination in employment and occupation; (2) provide information on any decisions of the courts, the National Labour Commission, the Commission on Human Rights and Administrative Justice, or any other competent body, as well as on any violations identified by, or reported to, labour inspectors and the manner in which such cases were addressed; and (3) take concrete steps to revise the labour inspection form to include a specific reference to discrimination on all the grounds listed in the Convention, including sexual harassment. The Committee notes the Government's commitment to continue enhancing the capacity of law enforcement agencies and institutions to identify and address discrimination in employment. The Government adds that there have been no decisions of the courts, the National Labour Commission, the Commission on Human Rights and Administrative Justice or any other competent body relating to discrimination in employment, nor cases referred to labour inspectors. Moreover, the Committee notes that the labour inspection form is being reviewed and that it will address all the grounds of discrimination listed in the Convention, including sexual harassment. The Committee asks the Government to provide: (i) concrete examples of measures taken to enhance the capacity of law enforcement agencies and institutions to identify and address discrimination in employment and occupation; (ii) a copy of the new labour inspection form when it has been adopted; (iii) copies of any decisions by the courts, the National Labour Commission, the Commission on Human Rights and Administrative Justice or any other competent body, and information on any cases of discrimination in employment and occupation identified by, or reported to, labour inspectors, and the manner in which such cases were addressed.

Greece

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1975)

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020). The Committee proceeded with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the observations received from the Hellenic Federation of Enterprises (SEV) and the International Organization for Employers received on 1 October 2020, as well as on the basis of the information at its disposal in 2019. The Committee notes the observations of the Greek General Confederation of Labour (GSEE) received on 31 August 2017 and 30 August 2019.

Legislative developments. The Committee refers to its comments on the application of the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) regarding the application of Law No. 4604/2019 on Substantive Gender Equality Preventing and Combating Gender-Based Violence of 12 June 2019 which encourages public and private enterprises to draft and implement "Equality Plans" with specific strategies and targets to prevent all forms of discrimination against women and provides that the General Secretariat for Family Policy and Gender Equality (GSFPGE) can award "Equality Labels" to them as a reward for their engagement in favour of equal treatment, including equal pay for equal work, and balanced participation of women and men in managerial positions or in professional and scientific groups set up in the enterprise (section 21).

Article 2 of the Convention. Gender pay gap. Referring to its previous comments on the gender pay gap and the occupational gender segregation of the labour market, the Committee notes, from the statistical information forwarded by the Government, that while the gender pay gap decreased from 15 per cent in 2010 to 12.5 per cent in 2014, the average monthly salary of women remained substantially lower than that of men in almost all economic sectors, even when men and women workers are employed in the same occupational category. It observes that, in 2018, the Hellenic Statistical Authority (ELSTAT) carried out a Labour Force Survey (LFS), but regrets that no updated information on the gender pay gap has been included in this survey nor has such information been published since 2014. The Committee notes that the GSEE highlights that the gender pay gap may be higher if data was properly collected, which demonstrates that there is an urgent need to establish an independent mechanism that will monitor this phenomenon, record and process targeted data already stored in existing information systems for employment and social security purposes. The Committee notes, from the 2018 LFS, that the employment rates for women slightly increased from 46.8 per cent in 2016 to 49.1 per cent in 2018, but remained 21 percentage points below that of men (70.1 per cent in 2018), being still one of the lowest employment rates for women among the European Union (EU average of 66.5 per cent), as highlighted by the GSEE. It further notes that women are still mostly concentrated in low-paid jobs, representing 61.2 per cent of clerical support workers but only 26.8 per cent of senior officials and managers and 9.1 per cent of board members of the largest publicly listed companies in the EU (Labour Force Survey of ELSTAT and European Commission, 2019 Report on equality between men and women in the EU, page 27). In this regard, the Government refers in its supplementary information to Law No. 4706/2020 on Corporate Governance, Capital Market Modernization, which is a transposition into the Greek legislation of Directive 2017/828 of the European Parliament and European Council, and measures for the implementation of Regulation (EU) 2017/1131 and other provisions, adopted on 17 July 2020, which provide that the eligibility criteria for the appointment of members of Boards of Directors shall include at least the adequate representation by gender indicated as not less than 25 per cent of the total number of members. The Committee also notes that, as highlighted by the European Commission and Eurostat, the gender gap in unpaid working time is one of the highest in the EU which is reflected in the labour market by the fact that more than twice as many women as men are in part-time employment (13.2 per cent and 6 per cent, respectively in 2018). It welcomes the Government's indication of the establishment of the SHARE Project (3.2.2020-2.2.2022), which aims to challenge traditional stereotypes and roles within the family and promote work and life balance, focusing on companies' workplaces and their involvement in the promotion of gender equality and work-life balance. The Committee takes note of the adoption of the National Action Plan for Gender Equality (NAPGE) for 2016–20 and more particularly of the Government's acknowledgement that: (1) the gender pay gap and pension gap persist, and that this matter will be a priority in the new National Action Plan for Gender Equality 2021-2025, which is being elaborated; (2) employed women have low-paid and precarious jobs, with little room for promotion and are unable to develop professionally and educationally; and (3) women still undertake the bulk of domestic work and spend periods away from the labour market more frequently than men, which also impact their future earnings and pensions. It notes that, as a result, the NAPGE sets specific actions to examine the transferability of good practices to tackle the gender pay gap, such as an annual report on the gender pay structure, and the design of a "salary and wage calculator" which provides up-to-date and easily accessible information on the usual wages in different industries and regions. The Committee also notes SEV's observation that with a view to changing the culture of stereotypes and gender segregation to tackle the gender pay gap, measures need to address gender stereotypes including through pre-school education and special educational programs on career orientation, as well as promoting young women's access to science, technology, engineering and mathematics (STEM). While welcoming the adoption of the NAPGE, the Committee notes that, in April 2019, the United Nations (UN) Working Group on Discrimination Against Women in Law and in Practice highlighted the need for women's equal access to the labour market and improved pay and conditions at work, and expressed specific concern at the persistence of the gender pay gap and the absence of women in leadership roles (OHCHR, Press statement of 12 April 2019). In light of the persistent gender pay gap and occupational gender segregation of the labour market, the Committee asks the Government to provide information on: (i) the application of Law No. 4706/2020 and its impact on the presence of women on Boards of Directors; and (ii) any other measures taken, including in collaboration with employers' and workers' organizations, to raise awareness, make assessments, and promote and enforce the application of the Convention. It asks the Government to provide information on the proactive measures implemented, including in the framework of the National Action Plan for Gender Equality for 2016–20 and for 2021-2025, to address the gender pay gap by identifying and addressing its underlying causes, such as vertical and horizontal occupational gender segregation and stereotypes regarding women's professional aspirations, preferences and capabilities, and their role in the family, and by promoting women's access to a wider range of jobs with career prospects and higher pay. Recalling that regularly collecting, analysing and disseminating information is important for addressing appropriately unequal pay, determining if measures taken are having a positive impact on the actual situation and the underlying causes of the gender pay gap, the Committee requests the Government to take all necessary measures to provide updated statistical information on the gender pay gaps, both in the public and private sectors.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government which reiterates the content of its previous request adopted in 2019.

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1984)

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020). The Committee proceeded with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the observations received from the Hellenic Federation of Enterprises (SEV) and the International Organization of Employers (IOE) received on 1 October 2020, as well as on the basis of the information at its disposal in 2019. The Committee notes the observations of the Greek General Confederation of Labour (GSEE) received on 31 August 2017 and 30 August 2019.

Articles 1, 2 and 3 of the Convention. Legislative developments. In its last observation, the Committee noted with interest the adoption of Law No. 4604/2019 on Substantive Gender Equality, Preventing and Combating Gender-Based Violence of 12 June 2019, which encourages public and private enterprises to draft and implement equality plans and provides that the General Secretariat for Family Policy and Gender Equality (GSFPGE) can award equality labels to public and private enterprises as a reward for achievements in the promotion of equality. It asked the Government to provide information on the application of this Law in practice, and particularly on sections 6, 7, 9, 17 and 21. In its supplementary information, the Government indicates that, in application of sections 6, 7 and 9 of Law No. 4604/2019 and its implementing circular: (1) two regional committees and 98 municipal committees for gender equality have been established to promote women's rights at the local level; and (2) the appointment process of members of the National Council for Gender Equality (ESIF) has started. The Government adds that the adoption of equality plans by ministries is not yet compulsory, but that a programme is in place to ensure that the necessary expertise can be gradually acquired. The Committee notes the scope of the Act, which applies to persons who are employed or applicants for employment in both the public and private sectors, irrespective of the form of employment and nature of the services provided, as well as freelance professional persons and persons in vocational training or candidates for vocational training (section 17). The Committee asks the Government to continue providing information on the steps taken for the application in practice of Law No. 4604/2019, and particularly on: (i) the establishment, functioning, activities and impact of municipal and regional committees for gender equality and the National Council for Gender Equality; and (ii) the elaboration and implementation of equality plans by employers in both the public and private sectors, and the number of equality labels awarded by sector.

The Committee also noted with interest the adoption of Equal Treatment Law No. 4443/2016, transposing Directive 2000/43/EC implementing the principle of equal treatment between persons irrespective of race or ethnic origin, and Directive 2000/78/EC establishing a general framework for equal treatment in employment and occupation, which replaces Law No. 3304/2005 and expands the list of prohibited grounds of discrimination with the addition of the following new grounds: chronic illness, ascendance, family or social status, and gender identity or characteristics (sections 2(2) and 3). However, the Committee also noted that section 4(1) of Law No. 4443/2016 provides that "a difference of treatment which is based on a characteristic related to any of the grounds of discrimination shall not constitute discrimination where, by reason of the nature of the particular occupational activities concerned or of the context in which they are carried out, such a characteristic constitutes an essential and decisive occupational requirement, provided that the objective is legitimate and the requirement is proportionate". Consequently, the Committee asked the Government to provide: (1) information on the application of section 4(1) in practice, with examples of cases in which the provision has been used; and (2) copies of any relevant court decisions, and particularly any interpretation made of the terms "essential and decisive occupational requirement", "legitimate objective" and "proportionate requirement". In its supplementary information, the Government clarifies that a difference in treatment is justified through three criteria: (1) the reasons why the established characteristic constitutes an essential qualification; (2) the purpose of the specific characteristic; and (3) adequacy to the principle of proportionality. The Government also refers to two Ombudsman cases, according to which an age limit of 32 years for an expert vacancy post in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs was considered discriminatory (Case No. 20180328-2018) and the absence of an exception for persons with disabilities regarding physical tests for staff vacancies in detention facilities was considered justified (Case No. 267553-2019). The Committee takes note of this information.

Article 1(1)(b) of the Convention. Additional grounds. Disability. Recalling that the national legislation prohibits discrimination on the ground of disability in employment and occupation, the Committee notes that Law No. 4488/2017 of 13 September 2017 on improving the protection of employees and on the rights of persons with disabilities provides that any natural person or public organization in the wider public or private sector, is required to facilitate the equal exercise of the rights of persons with disabilities in their respective fields of competence or activity by taking all appropriate measures and refraining from any action which may discriminate against persons with disabilities. The Committee notes, from the statistical information provided by the Government, in its report and supplementary information, that twelve cases of discrimination on the ground of disability or chronic disease were reported between 2018 and 2019 by the labour inspectorate and that the Ombudsperson's 2018 report further indicates that 14 per cent of cases received concerned discrimination on grounds of disability or chronic disease. The GSEE indicates that specific steps should be taken to raise awareness of the fact that the treatment of an employee with a disability may conceal discrimination. The Committee notes that in its 2019 concluding observations, the United Nations Committee on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities expressed concern at the high level of unemployment among persons with disabilities and the insufficient efforts to ensure their inclusion in the open labour market, particularly with regard to women with disabilities (CRPD/C/GRC/CO/1, 29 October 2019, paragraph 38(a)). The Committee asks the Government: (i) to adopt proactive measures in order to promote equal opportunity and treatment for persons with disabilities in education, vocational training and employment, including by enhancing their access to a wider range of jobs in the open labour market; and (ii) to provide statistical information on the employment rate of persons with disabilities, disaggregated by sex, age and work environment (segregated work environment or the open labour market).

Age. In its supplementary information, the Government reports the abolition of the age limit for the postgraduate education of civil servants by Law No. 4590/2019 and the abolition of the age limit for specialists in the National Health System by Law No. 4528/2018. The Committee also recalls that the national legislation prohibits direct and indirect discrimination in employment and occupation on the ground of age (section 2(2)(a) of Law No. 4443/2016). Referring to its 2019 direct request on the application of the Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100), the Committee welcomes the removal, as of February 2019, of the lower minimum wage rate, which has been set since 2012 for young workers under the age of 25. In its supplementary information, the Government explains that most cases of age discrimination concern a maximum age criterion for access to work and employment, and refers to the Ombudsman's 2019 Report, which indicates that in most cases age is associated, often stereotypically, with physical characteristics and special physical abilities that only younger people have without even indicating that such skills are necessary for the performance of the posts in question. The Government further adds that in 2019 the labour inspectorate investigated two cases of discrimination based on age, and refers to Cases Nos 20180328-2018 and 259702-2019, in which the Ombudsperson called for the reconsideration of job vacancies limited to candidates of a maximum of 32 or between 20 and 35 years of age, respectively. The Committee notes with concern that, in its 2018 special report on equal treatment, the Office of the Ombudsperson indicates that discrimination on the ground of age is constantly the subject of investigations by the Office and refers to several cases of maximum and/or minimum age limits unjustifiably imposed in the case of job vacancies, both in the public and private sectors. The Committee notes, however, that the European Commission recently observed that, while the national legislation allows for exceptions based on age for specific reasons, there is relevant case law, particularly on the introduction of age limits, that has found that such exceptions constitute discrimination based on age (European Commission, European Network of Legal Experts in Gender Equality and Non-discrimination, Country Report, Greece, 2018, page 49). The Committee recalls that age is considered a physical condition in respect of which social measures of protection and assistance may be necessary, as provided for in Article 5(2) of the Convention (2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 813). Noting that job vacancies frequently impose restrictions based on age, the Committee asks the Government to: (i) take steps to prevent and address cases of direct or indirect discrimination based on age in employment and occupation, including through the development of public information campaigns and awareness-raising activities for workers, employers and their respective organizations; (ii) provide information on the steps taken and the measures adopted to tackle discrimination on the ground of age, as well as on the number and nature of cases concerning discrimination on this ground in employment and occupation that have been dealt with by the labour inspectorate, the Office of the Ombudsperson and the courts, as well as the sanctions imposed and remedies granted; and (iii) provide detailed information on the specific cases in which it was considered that age limits set in job vacancies were covered by the exceptions provided for in the national legislation.

Articles 2 and 3. Equality of opportunity and treatment for men and women. Referring to its previous comments on occupational gender segregation, the Committee notes from the Labour Force Survey (LFS) of the Hellenic Statistical Authority (ELSTAT) that in 2019, the employment rate for women slightly increased from 46.8 per cent in 2016 to 51.3 per cent, but remained 20 percentage points below that of men (71.3 per cent in 2019). The Committee notes that the GSEE's indication that the 2018 employment rate of women of 49.1 per cent is one of the lowest in the European Union. It notes that in 2019 the unemployment rate of women was still substantially higher than that of men (21.5 per cent and 14 per cent, respectively). The Committee further notes that, according to ELSTAT 2018 data, women are still mainly concentrated in traditionally female-dominated sectors, such as education (74.4 per cent women) and health and social services (71.6 per cent women), as well as in low-paid jobs, representing 61.2 per cent of clerical support workers, but in 2018 only 26.8 per cent of senior officials and managers and 9.8 per cent of board members of the largest publicly listed companies (ELSTAT Labour Force Survey and European Commission, 2019 Report on equality between men and women in the EU, paragraph 27). The Committee also notes the indication by the SEV that gender stereotypes have a strong influence on the existing division of labour between men and women, both in the family, the workplace and society, and that these factors can limit women's career prospects and contribute to inequalities in society. It further notes that, as highlighted by the European Commission and Eurostat, the gender gap in unpaid working time (the fact that women do most household chores, care of family members and other unpaid work, which means they have less time to devote to paid employment) is one of the highest in the European Union, which is reflected in the labour market by the fact that more than twice as many women as men are in part-time employment (13.2 per cent and 6 per cent, respectively, in 2018). The Committee takes note of the adoption of the National Action Plan for Gender Equality (NAPGE) 2016–20. In particular, it notes the indication in the NAPGE that: (1) women are still under-represented in specific sectors of the economy; (2) employed women have low-paid and precarious jobs, with little room for promotion and are unable to develop professionally and educationally; and (3) women still undertake the bulk of domestic work and spend periods away from the labour market more frequently than men. It notes that, as a result, the NAPGE includes specific actions aimed at, inter alia: (1) the enhancement of women's employment and in particular women's entrepreneurship; (2) the promotion of gender equality in education and vocational training; (3) ensuring the participation of women in decision-making; and (4) the reconciliation of work and family responsibilities. The Committee also notes the Government's indication, in its supplementary information, that occupational gender segregation will be one of the priorities of the labour component of the new NAPGE 2021–25. The Committee further notes that the United Nations Working Group on Discrimination Against Women in Law and in Practice highlights the need for equal access for women to the labour market and improved conditions at work, and expresses specific concern at the absence of women in leadership roles (A/HRC/44/51/Add.1, 16 April 2020, paragraph 90(c) and (i)). The Committee further notes that, in its 2018 report, the Office of the Ombudsperson indicated that the number of complaints on gender-based discrimination increased, especially at the workplace, representing 57 per cent of the total number of the complaints received in 2018, and referred to several cases of discriminatory job vacancies seeking only men or women. In light of the persistent occupational gender segregation, the Committee asks the Government to take steps, including in collaboration with employers' and workers' organizations, to raise awareness, make assessments and promote and enforce the rights guaranteed by the Convention. It asks the Government to include proactive measures in the NAPGE 2021–25, and to provide information on the impact of measures taken under the NAPGE 2016–20 to improve equality of opportunity and treatment for men and women in employment and occupation by effectively enhancing women's economic empowerment and access to the labour market, including to decision-making positions.

Equality of opportunity and treatment irrespective of race, colour or national extraction. Roma people. Referring to its previous comments on the measures envisaged in the framework of the Action Plan for the implementation of the National Strategy for the Social Integration of Roma 2012–2020, the Committee notes the Government's indication that 12 strategies were implemented at the regional level for the social integration of the Roma. The Government adds that, between 2013 and 2015, 883 Roma people benefited from local employment projects and 2,232 benefited from the services of the 27 support centres for the Roma and vulnerable groups. The Committee notes the adoption in May 2016 of a project to develop the National Centre for Social Solidarity as a national platform for consultation and dialogue for the formulation and implementation of policies for the integration of the Roma. However, the Committee notes that the United Nations Working Group on Discrimination against Women in Law and Practice and the Human Rights Council in the framework of the Universal Periodic Review, several United Nations bodies have expressed concern at the persistent stereotypes and discrimination affecting the Roma in access to employment and education, despite the efforts made by the Government, and have explicitly recommended the Government to fully implement the National Strategy for the Integration of the Roma 2012–20 (A/HRC/44/51/Add.1, 16 April 2020, paragraph 90(j) and (k), A/HRC/33/7, 8 July 2016, paragraph 135, and A/HRC/WG.6/25/GRC/2, 7 March 2016, paragraphs 16 and 76). The Committee asks the Government to strengthen its efforts to ensure that acts of discrimination against the Roma in employment and occupation is effectively prevented and addressed and to provide information on the impact of the plans and programmes implemented to enhance the equal access of the Roma to education, training and employment, including within the framework of the Strategy for the Integration of the Roma up to 2020. It asks the Government to provide information on the activities undertaken to that end in collaboration with the National Centre for Social Solidarity, as well as statistical data disaggregated by sex, on the labour market situation of the Roma.

Migrant workers. Taking into consideration the high number of migrants and refugees received by the country since 2015, the Committee notes that according to ELSTAT, for the first quarter of 2019, the unemployment rate of migrant workers was almost twice as high as that of national workers (32.3 per cent and 18.3 per cent, respectively). In its supplementary information, the Government recalls that Law No. 4251/2014 provides for a series of sanctions for employers employing third country nationals without a legal document giving them access to work. The Government adds that the labour inspection services deal with anonymous and whistle-blowing complaints regarding the employment of illegally resident third country nationals, that they use a risk analysis system to perform targeted audits and that they also take precautionary action through the provision of information. It further indicates that in 2019, the labour inspectorate identified 41 cases of the employment of illegally resident foreign nationals. In relation to the agricultural sector, the Committee further notes the Government's indication in its supplementary information that: (1) the agricultural sector has a high rate of migrant workers, including irregular immigrant workers; (2) pursuant to Law No. 4554/2018 and Law No. 4052/2012, inspections in enterprises are carried out and sanctions (including high administrative sanctions) are imposed where undeclared work and the illegal employment of illegally resident third country nationals is detected; (3) 33 inspections were undertaken at agricultural product packaging companies and strawberry cultivation greenhouses; and (4) regarding the case involving a complaint of 164 foreign agricultural workers, the Prosecutor of the Court of First Instance issued a document describing them as being employed under particularly abusive working conditions and that they were therefore entitled to obtain a residence permit for humanitarian reasons. While taking note of this information, the Committee notes with deep concern that in its 2018 annual report published in April 2019, the Racist Violence Recording Network (RVRN, a network of non-governmental organizations established at the initiative of the Greek National Commission for Human Rights and the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees) refers to acts by employers against migrants and refugees, with victims suffering extreme labour exploitation and physical violence when they ask for their pay. The Committee further observes that, in its 2018 report, the Office of the Ombudsperson highlights the unsatisfactory results of its numerous interventions since 2008 in relation to the inadequate inspection of the working conditions of migrant agricultural workers. The Committee also notes that several United Nations treaty bodies have expressed concern at reported cases of migrants working in slavery-like conditions in the agricultural sector and that the Human Rights Council has recommended, in the context of the Universal Periodic Review (UPR), that the Government supervise the working conditions of migrant workers effectively (A/HRC/33/7, paragraph 135, and A/HRC/WG.6/25/GRC/2, paragraph 35). The Committee notes in this regard the indication by the GSEE in March 2017 that the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) handed down a decision in which it considered that Bangladeshi workers were victims of trafficking for the purposes of labour exploitation in the agricultural sector (ECtHR Application No. 21884/15, Chowdury and others v. Greece, 30 March 2017). The Committee notes that the Office of the Ombudsperson also refers to several cases of discrimination on the ground of national origin as a result of job vacancies expressly requesting Greek citizens or, in other cases, non-citizens. The Committee recalls that all migrant workers, including those in an irregular situation, must be protected against discrimination in employment on the basis of the grounds set out in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention (2012 General Survey, paragraph 778). The Committee urges the Government to take all the necessary measures without delay to address effectively any cases of discrimination against men and women migrant workers in terms and conditions of employment, particularly with regard to labour exploitation in the agricultural sector. It asks the Government to provide information on the concrete steps taken or envisaged to foster equality of opportunity and treatment in employment and occupation, irrespective of race, colour or national extraction, as well as on their impact. The Committee asks the Government to continue providing information on the number and nature of any complaints or cases of discrimination against migrant workers dealt with by the labour inspectorate, the Office of the Ombudsperson or the courts, the sanctions imposed and remedies granted, as well as statistical data, disaggregated by sex and national extraction, on the participation of migrant workers in the labour market.

General observation of 2018. Regarding the above issues, and in more general terms, the Committee would like to draw the Government's attention to its general observation on discrimination based on race, colour and national extraction which was adopted in 2018. In the general observation, the Committee notes with concern that discriminatory attitudes and stereotypes based on the race, colour or national extraction of men and women workers continue to hinder their participation in education, vocational training programmes and access to a wider range of employment opportunities, resulting in persisting occupational segregation and lower remuneration received for work of equal value. Furthermore, the Committee considers that it is necessary to adopt a comprehensive and coordinated approach to tackling the obstacles and barriers faced by persons in employment and occupation because of their race, colour or national extraction, and to promote equality of opportunity and treatment for all. Such an approach should include the adoption of interlocking measures aimed at addressing gaps in education, training and skills, providing unbiased vocational guidance, recognizing and validating the qualifications obtained abroad, and valuing and recognizing traditional knowledge and skills that may be relevant both to accessing and advancing in employment and to engaging in an occupation. The Committee also recalls that, in order to be effective, these measures must include concrete steps, such as laws, policies, programmes, mechanisms and participatory processes, remedies designed to address prejudices and stereotypes and to promote mutual understanding and tolerance among all sections of the population.

The Committee draws the Government's attention to its general observation of 2018 and requests the Government to provide information in response to the questions raised in that observation.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Workers with Family Responsibilities Convention, 1981 (No. 156) (ratification: 1988)

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020). The Committee proceeded with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the supplementary information received from the Government this year, as well as on the basis of the information at its disposal in 2019. The Committee notes the observations of the Greek General Confederation of Labour (GSEE) received on 31 August 2017 and 30 October 2019.

Measures addressing family responsibilities during the COVID-19 pandemic. The Committee notes that the Government refers to the adoption of the Emergency Law of 13 March 2020 (O.G.A'/55) and Emergency Law of 20 March 2020, which provide for two alternative measures for workers from the public sector, irrespective of sex, whose children attended kindergartens, nurseries and schools up to the third grade of Junior High Schools that had suspended operations, or whose children were aged up to four years old and did not attend kindergartens and nurseries: 1) a "special purpose leave" conceived in successive 4-days cycles (three of them being registered as paid leave days, and one of them being registered as annual leave); and 2) a reduction of up to 25 per cent of working hours on a daily basis without reduction in wages, with the requirement to compensate them with work beyond normal working hours once school units reopen. The Government adds that provision was made to exclude workers from the scope of the above-mentioned measures taking into account the full and effective functioning of specific services within the framework of addressing the pandemic (including employees who serve at the Ministry of Health, health service provider bodies, the Ministry of Immigration and Asylum and the personnel of all uniformed services). The Government also indicates that Emergency Law of 13 April 2020 (O.G.A'/84) provided for similar leave arrangements for workers in the private sector, in which case the 4-days cycle 'special purpose leave' would be recorded as leave granted by the employer (2 days), leave subsidized by the State (1 day) and annual leave (1 day). The Committee observes the Government's indication that 'special purpose leave' applies to both parents as an alternative or complementary option if they are both employed in the public or private sector, but that they cannot take it simultaneously, and that it is also granted to a working parent where the other parent is not employed but is in hospital suffering from any disease or coronavirus, or is a person with disabilities. While such measures were adopted for the closure period of school units and childcare facilities, the Government explains that they continued to apply after their reopening and until the end of the 2019-20 school year in case children-pupils or immediate family members were among the group of people at high risk of illness from COVID-19 or were already suffering from it. The Government also refers to Law 4722/2020 which provides for the use of the special leave for children's sickness for 14 days or more by working parents in case their children are affected by the virus. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the application and results of the specific leave measures adopted in the context of the Covid-19 pandemic.

Legislative developments. The Committee refers to its comments on the application of the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) regarding the application of Law No. 4604/2019 on Substantive Gender Equality Preventing and Combating Gender-Based Violence of 12 June 2019. The Committee also notes with interest the Government indication in its report and supplementary information that Law 4590/2019 increases the number of days of leave of civil servants due to sickness of their children and provides parental leave for both parents in the event of the adoption of children; while Law 4674/2020 introduces new provisions on family-related leave in the public sector, such as, for example: (1) for the upbringing of an adopted or foster child or a child born through a surrogacy arrangement, for child sickness and children school monitoring; (2) for workers who have a spouse or children (including the guardianship of a child) who suffers from certain diseases or with disabilities; and (3) for civil servants who need mobility arrangements (due to health reasons from the worker, a spouse or partner, or a first degree relative, or to join the civil servant spouse who works in a different region or country). The Government adds that, according to Law 4674/2020, certain types of leave were also granted to public sector employees bound by a fixed-term contract under private law. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the application, scope and impact of leave and mobility measures provided for in Law No. 4590/2019 and Law No.4674/2020.

Article 3 of the Convention. National policy. Protection from discrimination on the ground of family responsibilities. Referring to its previous comments where it noted that working mothers returning from maternity leave have been offered part-time and rotation work, the Committee notes the Government's reference to the prohibition of discrimination on the grounds of gender or family status through Law 3895/2010 and Law 3896/2010. The Committee also takes note of the National Action Plan on Gender Equality (NAPGE) for 2016–2020, which sets as a priority the reconciliation of work and family life as well as a number of targeted actions concerning, inter alia, protection against discrimination on the grounds of pregnancy and maternity and the monitoring of complaints concerning discrimination on the ground of family responsibilities against men and women, as well as that the Labour Inspectorate, in cooperation with the Ombudsperson, is the relevant body to monitor and implement access of workers with family responsibilities to employment, and to address complaints on violations of worker's rights. The Committee nevertheless notes that according to statistical information provided by the Government in its report on the application of the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111), since 2014 the number of women workers whose working arrangements have been converted to part-time and rotation employment, with or without their consent, has increased, and that, in its 2018 special report on equal treatment, the Ombudsperson highlighted the substantial number of reports relating to detrimental changes in working conditions imposed on women returning from maternity leave. In April 2019, the United Nations (UN) Working Group on Discrimination Against Women in Law and Practice expressed concern about ongoing discrimination based on pregnancy and family responsibilities, indicating that while women who return to work following maternity leave are legally entitled to return to the same job or an equivalent one, in practice, a serious deficiency is observed in the application of the law relating to these matters, particularly in relation to women in high-ranking positions (OHCHR, Press statement of 12 April 2019). The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the measures adopted, in the framework of Law 3896/2010 and the National Action Plan on Gender Equality or otherwise, to facilitate the reconciliation between work and family life both for men and women workers with family responsibilities, including by ensuring that workers with family responsibilities receive adequate protection against discrimination in practice. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on any measures taken to ensure the effective implementation of the relevant legislative provisions, including awareness-raising activities for employers, as well as their impact. It also asks the Government to provide information on any cases of discrimination in employment and occupation based on family responsibilities dealt with by the labour inspectors, the Ombudsperson, or the courts, as well as on the sanctions imposed and remedies provided.

Article 5. Childcare and family services and facilities. The Committee previously noted that, as a result of the action "Reconciliation of work and family life" (implemented in the framework of the Operational Programme "Human Resources Development" 2007/2013), women workers received a voucher providing care services for babies, children and persons with disabilities, and requested the Government to consider providing such vouchers to men and women workers with family responsibilities on an equal footing. The Committee notes the Government's indication that such measures benefited almost 210,000 persons and that, as a result, the action will be continued for the period 2014–20, targeting women with low income. The Government adds that the beneficiaries of such action are mothers, as well as men or women who are granted the custody of children by court ruling. The Committee notes that, in its supplementary information, the Government indicates that, according to Joint Ministerial Decision (JMD) 71383 (O.G. B'/2774/08.07.2020), provision was made for vouchers for child care and care for persons with disabilities, with a view to increasing the employability of low income beneficiary men and women. Concerning the number of childcare facilities, the Committee notes that in its report and supplementary information the Government indicates that: (1) according to 2020 data, there are a total of 2489 public and 1437 private childcare facilities, benefiting 65376 and 71976 children respectively; and (2) pursuant to article 12 of Law No.1483/1984, when constructing their buildings, industrial undertakings or holdings with a staff of more than three hundred persons, are required to foresee the provision of adequate and appropriate accommodation for a nursery school covering the needs of workers (in this context, the Manpower Employment Organization has the responsibility for the operation of 25 nurseries nationwide, hosting 1.061 toddlers and infants). The Committee however notes that the GSEE expresses concern at the continuous reduction of the available day-care facilities for children and dependent persons and refers in this regard to the 2016 Annual report of the National Commission for Human Rights which highlighted the continuous reduction of the already insufficient day-care facilities for children and dependent persons limiting women's ability to take up employment or keeping them in jobs with reduced rights (NCHR, Annual report, 2016). The Committee also notes that, in its observations presented on the implementation of the ILO Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) and Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111), the Hellenic Federation of Enterprises and Industries (SEV) highlights that it is essential to increase and ensure better availability, accessibility and quality of formal care facilities, especially for infants and preschool children, to increase the active participation of women in the labour market. It further notes that the European Commission recently indicated that, as regards the availability of childcare facilities, the situation in Greece, which has a participation rate lower than 10 per cent, hardly improved at all (European Commission, 2019 Report on equality between men and women in the EU). Furthermore, it notes that, in December 2018, the GSFPGE highlighted the need for additional measures for the participation of children in preschool education, which will contribute to the reconciliation of family, personal and professional life of their parents, especially women (GSFPGE, E-bulletin No. 18, 17 December 2018). The Committee notes that, in April 2019, the UN Working Group on Discrimination Against Women in Law and Practice also considered that a major issue of concern for gender equality is the severe reduction of state-provided care services for children and dependent persons which intensifies women's unpaid care work, limiting their ability to access or remain into the labour market, Greece having very low rates of childcare and childcare being costly. The Committee asks the Government to continue taking appropriate steps in order to effectively ensure adequate, affordable and accessible childcare services and facilities, with a view to assisting men and women workers to reconcile work and family responsibilities. It further asks the Government to provide information on: (i) the extent of childcare, and family services available for men and women workers with family responsibilities; and (ii) the number of workers with family responsibilities making use of the existing childcare and family services and facilities.

Article 8. Protection against dismissal. The Committee previously noted the rapid increase in the number of complaints relating to the dismissal of pregnant women, despite Act No. 3896/2010 (sections 16 and 20) and Act No. 3996/2011 which provide specific protection against unfair dismissal and extend to 18 months the period of time during which working mothers cannot be dismissed after their return from maternity leave. The Government indicates that, pursuant to section 52 of Law No. 4075/2012, dismissal on the ground of an application for granting parental leave is null and void. The Committee notes that NAPGE 2016–2020 sets, among its specific actions: (1) the protection of pregnant women, including through the elimination of abuse of dismissal for a "significant reason"; (2) the protection of women against discrimination on the grounds of pregnancy or maternity; and (3) the monitoring of complaints concerning discrimination on the ground of family responsibilities against men and women. It further notes the Government's indication that the Labour Inspectorate, in cooperation with the Ombudsperson, is the relevant body to address complaints on violations of worker's rights and that, in 2018, Labour Inspectorate Regional Directorates handled 15 cases regarding women who were forced to resign or dismissed during maternity protection period. The Committee notes that, in its 2018 special report on equal treatment, the Ombudsperson indicated that the substantial number of reports relating to the dismissal of pregnant women in the private sector demonstrates that despite enhanced legislative protection, the relevant prohibition has not been fully understood. The Committee asks the Government: (i) to take appropriate steps to ensure effective protection of men and women workers against dismissal on the ground of family responsibilities, including by ensuring that effect is given in practice to sections 16 and 20 of Act No. 3896/2010 and Act No. 3996/2011; and (ii) to provide information on any cases of dismissal of workers on the ground of family responsibilities dealt with by the labour inspectors, the Ombudsman, or the courts as well as the sanctions imposed and remedies granted.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1960)

Article 1(1)(a) and (b) of the Convention. Anti-discrimination legislation. Civil service. In its previous comment, the Committee underlined that Act No. L/2014/072/CNT issuing the Labour Code of 2014 excludes public officials from its scope of application (section 2) and that section 11 of Act No. L/2001/028/AN of 31 December 2001 issuing the Civil Servants Regulations only prohibits discrimination between officials on the basis of political, trade union, philosophical or religious views, and on the basis of sex or ethnic origin. The Committee has been underlining in its comments since 1990 that the legal protection of public officials is inadequate both regarding the grounds of discrimination, since it does not cover discrimination based on race, colour, national extraction and social origin, and regarding the scope of application, as recruitment is not covered. The Committee notes that the Government's report contains no information concerning the protection of public officials from discrimination, and requests the Government to take the necessary steps, in the very near future, to amend section 11 of Act No. L/2001/028/AN issuing the Civil Servants Regulations, so as to ensure that civil servants and applicants to a post in the public service are effectively protected against any direct or indirect discrimination on the basis of at least the seven grounds of discrimination listed in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention. The Government is requested to provide information on any measures taken in this regard and on any complaint mechanism enabling applicants for employment in the civil service to lodge an appeal if they consider that they have suffered discrimination during recruitment.

Discrimination on the basis of sex. Sexual harassment. The Committee notes that the Government's report contains no information on sexual harassment. In that regard, it notes the concluding observations of the United Nations Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, which emphasize that "the number of cases of violence against women, particularly [...] sexual violence, remains very high" (E/C.12/GIN/CO/1, 30 March 2020, paragraph 20). The Committee again requests the Government to take measures to: (i) prevent sexual harassment in employment and occupation, such as awareness-raising campaigns (for example, by radio or through other media) or reinforcing prevention activities by the labour inspectorate in this area; and (ii) inform workers, employers and their respective organizations of their rights and obligations in this area. It requests the Government to provide information on any measures adopted for this purpose. The Government is once again requested to consider whether complaint and appeal mechanisms established at the national and enterprise levels are sufficiently accessible to complainants and whether they allow perpetrators of sexual harassment to be sanctioned. The Government is requested to provide information, as the case may be, on results obtained and the follow-up measures envisaged.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Workers with Family Responsibilities Convention, 1981 (No. 156) (ratification: 1995)

The Committee notes with concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments.

Articles 3 and 6 of the Convention. National policy. Information and education. The Committee recalls that, according to Article 3 of the Convention, "with a view to creating effective equality of opportunity and treatment for men and women workers, each Member shall make it an aim of national policy to enable persons with family responsibilities who are engaged or wish to engage in employment to exercise their right to do so without being subject to discrimination and, to the extent possible, without conflict between their employment and family responsibilities". Such measures belong in the context of the broader issue of gender equality. It is essential, therefore, that the policy be designed not only to eliminate all discrimination against workers with family responsibilities in law and practice, but that active measures should be taken to promote the principle of equality of opportunity and treatment for workers with family responsibilities in all areas of employment and occupation (see General Survey of 1993 on workers with family responsibilities, paragraphs 54–59). For almost 20 years, the Committee has been emphasizing that "family responsibilities" are not among the grounds of discrimination expressly prohibited by the Labour Code. The Committee notes the Government's indication, in its report, that it will take steps to enable men and women with family responsibilities to enjoy their rights. Recalling that there is still no national policy concerning workers with family responsibilities, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures, in law and practice, to ensure that men and women workers with family responsibilities who so wish are able to access employment or be engaged in employment without discrimination and, if possible, without conflict between their employment and family responsibilities, including: (i) by expressly prohibiting in the Labour Code any discrimination on the basis of family responsibilities in all forms of employment and occupation, including at the recruitment level; (ii) by allowing workers with family responsibilities to be informed of their rights and to assert them; and (iii) by adopting a combination of support measures and public information and awareness-raising measures on the problems that workers with family responsibilities face, as well as measures to promote mutual respect and tolerance within the population.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Guinea-Bissau

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1977)

The Committee takes note of the Government's report.

Article 1 of the Convention. Equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value. Legislation. The Committee previously noted that, while section 156(3) of the General Labour Act provides for the right to equal pay for equal work, the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value set out in the Convention had been included in the draft new Labour Act, as well as in the draft Uniform Labour Act of the Organization for the Harmonization of Business Law in Africa (OHADA), which is intended to have direct force of law in Guinea-Bissau once it is adopted. The Committee notes the Government's indication, in its reports, that: (1) a request was made to place the draft new Labour Act on the agenda of the People's National Assembly; and (2) the draft Uniform Labour Act of OHADA has not been adopted yet as a result of disagreements expressed by OHADA Members States, some provisions of the draft Uniform Labour Act being incompatible with their national legislation. It further notes that in July 2019, the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) Ministers adopted a draft Directive of Minimum Standards towards Harmonization of Labour Laws in ECOWAS Members States, elaborated in collaboration with the ILO. While aware of the difficulties facing the country, the Committee urges the Government to take concrete legislative steps in the near future so as to ensure that any new legislation will fully reflect the principle of the Convention of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value, in order to cover not only situations where men and women are performing the same or similar work but also situations where they carry out work that is of an entirely different nature but is nevertheless of equal value. It asks the Government to report on any progress made in this regard, in particular concerning the adoption of the draft new Labour Act, the draft Uniform Labour Act of OHADA, and the draft Directive of Minimum Standards towards Harmonization of Labour Laws of ECOWAS. The Committee again asks the Government to forward a copy of the new Public Servants Statute which was awaiting promulgation according to the Government's previous report.

Article 2. Promotion of gender equality. Addressing the gender pay gap. Referring to its previous comments where it asked the Government to take proactive steps to promote and facilitate the application of the provisions of the Convention in practice, including through public information campaigns and awareness-raising initiatives, the Committee notes the Government's statement that the Convention is awaiting implementation and that more actions will be needed in practice to really implement the principle of the Convention, including with the assistance of the ILO. The Committee notes that, according to the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP), the participation rate of women in the labour market has slightly increased since 2013 (67.3 per cent in 2019 compared to 66.5 per cent in 2013), but still remains substantially lower than that of men (78.9 per cent in 2019). It takes note of the adoption of the Second National Policy for the Promotion of Gender Equality and Equity (PNIEG II) in 2016, which acknowledges the lack of access of women to higher education and vocational training, and women tending to be concentrated in areas performing specific duties that do not involve decision-making nor good remuneration, such as in the tourism and hotel sector. It notes that the PNIEG II provides for combating gender-based stereotypes by ensuring greater access of women to decision-making positions and entrepreneurship (pp. 54 and 57). The Committee notes that, as recently highlighted in the context of the Universal Periodic Review, compared with men, women have reduced incomes, higher rates of unemployment, and greater difficulties in overcoming poverty (A/HRC/WG.6/35/GNB/2, 4 November 2019, paragraph 60 and A/HRC/29/31/Add.1, 1 April 2015, paragraphs 30 and 37). While acknowledging the financial constraints faced by the country and in light of the persistent gender stereotypes that shape the roles and responsibilities of women and men in all spheres of life, the Committee urges the Government to ensure the effective implementation of the Second National Policy for the Promotion of Gender Equality and Equity, in order to address the gender pay gap by identifying and addressing its underlying causes (such as stereotypes regarding women's professional aspirations, preferences and capabilities, and their role in the family) and by promoting women's access to a wider range of jobs with career prospects and higher pay. It asks the Government to report on the concrete actions and programmes implemented to raise awareness, make assessments, and promote and enforce the application of the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value. The Committee recalls that the Government can avail itself of the technical assistance of the Office in this regard.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1977)

The Committee takes note of the Government's report.

Article 1 of the Convention. Legislative protection against discrimination. The Committee recalls that article 24 of the Constitution and sections 24(d) and 155 of the General Labour Act No.2/86 do not prohibit discrimination on the grounds of colour, social origin and national extraction, which are listed in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention, and that domestic workers are explicitly excluded from the scope of application of the General Labour Act (section 1(2)). The Committee previously noted that the Government was in the process of elaborating a new Labour Act, and that the draft Uniform Labour Act of the Organization for the Harmonization of Business Law in Africa (OHADA), which will have direct force of law in Guinea-Bissau once it is adopted, includes provisions prohibiting discrimination in employment and occupation in accordance with the Convention. The Committee notes the Government's indication in its reports that: (1) a request was made to place the new Labour Act on the agenda of the People's National Assembly; and (2) the draft Uniform Labour Act of OHADA has not been adopted yet as a result of disagreements expressed by the Member States of OHADA (which has 17 Member States), as some provisions of the draft Uniform Labour Act are incompatible with their national legislation. It further notes that in July 2019, Ministers of the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) adopted a draft Directive of Minimum Standards towards Harmonization of Labour Laws in ECOWAS Member States, elaborated in collaboration with the ILO. While aware of the difficulties facing the country, the Committee urges the Government to take measures in the near future to ensure that any new legislation: (i) prohibits direct and indirect discrimination on at least all the grounds enumerated in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention, including colour, national extraction and social origin, with respect to all aspects of employment and occupation; and (ii) covers all categories of workers, in both the formal and informal economy, including domestic workers. It asks the Government to provide information on: (i) any progress made in this regard, in particular concerning the adoption of the draft new Labour Act, the draft Uniform Labour Act of OHADA, and the draft Directive of Minimum Standards towards Harmonization of Labour Laws of ECOWAS; and (ii) the specific measures implemented to ensure that the protection of men and women workers against discrimination in employment and occupation is ensured in practice, in particular for domestic workers who are excluded from the scope of the General Labour Act.

General observation of 2018. The Committee would like to draw the Government's attention to its general observation on discrimination based on race, colour and national extraction which was adopted in 2018. In the general observation, the Committee notes with concern that discriminatory attitudes and stereotypes based on the race, colour or national extraction of men and women workers continue to hinder their participation in education, vocational training programmes and access to a wider range of employment opportunities, resulting in persisting occupational segregation and lower remuneration received for work of equal value. Furthermore, the Committee considers that it is necessary to adopt a comprehensive and coordinated approach to tackling the obstacles and barriers faced by persons in employment and occupation because of their race, colour or national extraction, and to promote equality of opportunity and treatment for all. Such an approach should include the adoption of interlocking measures aimed at addressing gaps in education, training and skills, providing unbiased vocational guidance, recognizing and validating the qualifications obtained abroad, and valuing and recognizing traditional knowledge and skills that may be relevant both to accessing and advancing in employment and to engaging in an occupation. The Committee also recalls that, in order to be effective, these measures must include concrete steps, such as laws, policies, programmes, mechanisms and participatory processes, remedies designed to address prejudices and stereotypes and to promote mutual understanding and tolerance among all sections of the population.

The Committee draws the Government's attention to its general observation of 2018 and asks the Government to provide information in response to the questions raised in that observation.

Articles 2 and 3. Equality of opportunity and treatment for men and women. The Committee notes with interest: (1) the adoption of the Gender Parity Act No. 4/2018, promulgated in December 2018, which provides for a minimum representation of 36 per cent of women candidates on party lists for legislative and local elections or appointments to the National Assembly and local governments; as well as (2) the adoption of the Second National Policy for the Promotion of Gender Equality and Equity (PNIEG II) in 2016 as well as of its Action Plan 2016–25. It notes that, according to the PNIEG II, the situation of women in education and employment is characterized, inter alia, by: (1) a high illiteracy rate (56 per cent), a low school enrolment rate (67 per cent) and a significant school drop-out rate (18 per cent); (2) a lack of specialized training in different technical and occupational areas; (3) discrimination on the basis of sex; (4) a lack of knowledge of their rights and a traditional culture of silence; and (5) the lack of strategy to promote entrepreneurship, which all limit their economic independence. It further notes that the PNIEG II sets as specific objectives and actions: (1) the adoption of an agenda on gender equality and equity in education; (2) the enhancement of women's access to higher education and vocational training, particularly in the sciences, as well as the access of women and men to equal productive and economic opportunities; (3) the enhancement of women's empowerment and entrepreneurship, including by ensuring access to credit for 35 per cent of women; (4) the promotion of women's participation in public and political life and decision-making; and (5) the implementation of awareness-raising activities on gender equality instruments adopted at national and international levels. Furthermore, the Committee notes that the Strategic and Operational Plan "Terra Ranka" 2015–20 provides for the implementation of projects promoting women's entrepreneurship. The Committee welcomes these initiatives and notes that, according to the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP), while the participation rate of women in the labour market has increased slightly since 2013 (67.3 per cent in 2019 compared to 66.5 per cent in 2013), it still remains substantially lower than that of men (78.9 per cent in 2019). Furthermore, according to the 2019 report of the United Nations Secretary-General on developments in Guinea-Bissau and the activities of the United Nations Integrated Peacebuilding Office in Guinea-Bissau, despite the adoption of the Gender Parity Act, in the March 2019 legislative elections only 13 women secured parliamentary seats, the same number as in the previous legislature before the enactment of the Act (S/2019/664, 7 February 2019, paragraphs 10 and 68). While acknowledging the financial constraints faced by the country, the Committee notes that, as recently highlighted in the context of the Universal Periodic Review (UPR): (1) the low human development indicators in Guinea-Bissau particularly affect women and the gender inequality gap is still very wide; and (2) there is a great need to reinforce positive social norms to prevent cultural and traditional practices that discriminate against women, particularly with regard to women's access to land and economic resources, which remains very limited in practice (A/HRC/WG.6/35/GNB/2, 4 November 2019, paragraphs 11, 41 and 62; and A/HRC/29/31/Add.1, 1 April 2015, paragraphs 27 and 38). Concerning education, the Committee notes that, according to the 2019 UNICEF Country Office Annual Report, almost half of girls who were enrolled in primary school dropped out before completing, mainly because of early pregnancy or early marriage. It refers, in that regard, to its 2019 direct requests on the application of the Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138), and the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182), in which it expresses concern at the gender and geographical disparities with regard to access to and the quality of education, particularly regarding the situation of girls in foster families, who are exposed to various forms of exploitation and are denied education. In light of the persistent gender stereotypes that shape the roles and responsibilities of women and men in all spheres of life, the Committee asks the Government to take proactive measures to ensure the effective implementation of the Second National Policy for the Promotion of Gender Equality and Equity and its Action Plan 2016–25, as well as of the Strategic and Operational Plan "Terra Ranka" 2015–20, to improve equality of opportunity and treatment between men and women in all aspects of employment and occupation through the adoption of effective measures to: (i) enhance women's entrepreneurship and access to vocational training, the labour market, land and credit; and (ii) improve the net school attendance rate for girls, while reducing their early drop-out from school. It asks the Government to provide information on the results of the actions and programmes implemented to that end and on any activities undertaken, including in collaboration with employers' and workers' organizations, to raise public awareness and understanding of the Convention among workers, employers and their representative organizations, as well as among law enforcement officials.

Article 5. Restrictions on the employment of women. Prohibition of night work by women. The Committee recalls that the General Labour Act provides for: (1) the adoption of supplementary legislation to prevent women from being employed in hazardous occupations (section 155(4)); and (2) the prohibition of night work by women, except in managerial posts or posts of a technical nature involving responsibility, in hygiene, health or social welfare services, in the event of unforeseeable situations of force majeure, and in posts which by their nature can only be performed at night (section 160). The Committee wishes to recall that protective measures for women may be broadly categorized into those aimed at protecting maternity in the strict sense, which come within the scope of Article 5, and those aimed at protecting women generally because of their sex or gender, based on stereotypical perceptions about their capabilities and appropriate role in society, which are contrary to the Convention and constitute obstacles to the recruitment and employment of women. In addition, provisions relating to the protection of persons working under hazardous or difficult conditions should be aimed at protecting the health and safety of both men and women at work, while taking account of gender differences with regard to specific risks to their health (2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraphs 839 and 840). In light of the prevailing gender stereotypes, the Committee urges the Government to review the prohibition of night work by women and its approach regarding restrictions on women's employment. It asks the Government to take the necessary measures to amend sections 155(4) and 160 of the General Labour Act, in particular in the context of the ongoing legislative developments, to ensure that any restrictions on the work that can be performed by women are limited to maternity protection in the strict sense, and are not based on stereotypical perceptions about their capabilities and role in society which would be contrary to the Convention. It asks the Government to provide information on any progress made in this regard.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1975)

The Committee notes with concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments.

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Legislation. Since 1998, the Committee has been referring to the need to amend section 2(3) of the Equal Rights Act No. 19 of 1990 which provides for "equal remuneration for the same work or work of the same nature" in order to bring it into conformity with the provisions of the Convention and align it with the Prevention of Discrimination Act No. 26 of 1997 (section 9(1)), therefore reflecting the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value. The Committee notes once again with regret that no progress has been reported by the Government in its report. The Committee recalls that it considers that the coexistence of the two different concepts in the current legislation has the potential to lead to misunderstanding in the application of the principle of the Convention. The Committee urges the Government to take steps to amend section 2(3) of the Equal Rights Act No. 19 of 1990 with a view to bringing it into conformity with the principle of the Convention and aligning it with the Prevention of Discrimination Act No. 26 of 1997 so as to remove any legal ambiguities.

Article 2. Minimum wage. The Committee notes that the Government indicates that the National Minimum Wage Order which was adopted in July 2013 does not provide for a distinction of rates of pay on the basis of sex or gender. The Committee notes the adoption in October 2016 of a new Labour (National Minimum Wage) Order which raised the minimum wage in the private sector from 35,000 to 44,000 Guyanese dollars (GYD) per month (around US$210.50). The Committee also notes from the speech on the budget made by the Minister of Finance in November 2018 that "the Government has also raised the minimum basic salary for each public servant to GYD64,200 per month" (paragraph 3.30). The Committee wishes to point out that as women predominate in low-wage employment, and that a uniform national minimum wage system helps to raise the earnings of the lowest paid, it has an influence on the relationship between men and women's wages and on reducing the gender pay gap (see General Survey of 2012 on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 683). The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the proportion of men and women workers, disaggregated by sex, to which the new national minimum wage in the private sector and the minimum basic salary in the public sector apply. The Committee asks the Government to provide any information available, including studies, showing the impact of the introduction and increase of the national minimum wage and the increase of the minimum basic salary on the earnings of women in both the public and the private sectors and the gender pay gap.

Articles 2(2)(c), 3 and 4. Collective agreements and cooperation with employers' and workers' organizations. Objective job evaluation and wage determination. In its previous comments, in order to facilitate the application of the principle of the Convention and to ascertain whether jobs done traditionally by women are undervalued in comparison with jobs done traditionally by men, the Committee asked the Government to indicate whether objective job evaluations were undertaken or envisaged in the public and private sectors and, if so, to specify the method and the evaluation criteria used. The Committee notes the Government's indication that rates of remuneration are fixed through the collective bargaining and negotiation process, without due regard to the differences in sex or gender. While noting this information, the Committee recalls that men and women tend to perform different work using different skills. Therefore, for the purpose of ensuring equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value and avoiding an undervaluation of work traditionally performed by women, the Committee wishes to emphasize the importance of evaluating each job concerned on the basis of criteria free from gender bias, such as skills/qualifications, effort, responsibilities and working conditions, when determining rates of remuneration. The Committee asks the Government to take concrete steps to raise awareness among workers' and employers' organizations about the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value and the need to use objective job evaluation methods and criteria to avoid undervaluation of jobs traditionally performed by women when fixing rates of remuneration. The Committee asks the Government to provide detailed information on the manner in which rates of remuneration are determined by the social partners, including on the method and criteria used. The Committee further asks the Government to indicate whether rates of remuneration are determined by collective bargaining in the public sector.

Statistics. The Committee recalls that appropriate data and statistics are crucial for determining the nature, extent and causes of unequal remuneration, to set priorities and design appropriate measures, to monitor and evaluate the impact of such measures and make any necessary adjustments in order to better promote the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value. Therefore, the Committee asks the Government to provide any statistical data available, disaggregated by sex, on the distribution of men and women in the various economic sectors and occupations, and on their corresponding earnings, in both the public and private sectors.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1975)

The Committee notes with concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments.

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Equality of opportunity and treatment for men and women. In its previous comments, the Committee asked the Government to provide information on the specific measures taken in the framework of the five-year Strategic Plan of the Women and Gender Equality Commission of the National Assembly to promote gender equality in employment and occupation, including vocational training, and to enhance women's access to all jobs, including those in non-traditional areas and decision-making positions in both the private and public sectors. The Committee notes that, in its ninth periodic report to the United Nations Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW) (2018), the Government provided detailed information on the situation of women, but the information provided did not contain answers to the questions raised by the Committee of Experts. According to the Government's report to the CEDAW, "it is estimated that women's share of the workforce is 34.6 per cent and that 65.4 per cent of these women are not engaged in the formal economy. The national census (2012) noted that the majority of these women (48.6 per cent) are engaged in unpaid work (home duties), while others pursue educational advancement (8.0 per cent) and the remainder (7.1 per cent) are women retirees. The Government adds that, according to the World Bank's Enterprise Survey (2010), mentioned in the Government's report to the CEDAW, women are under-represented in the top management of private sector firms with a mere 17 per cent as managers. However, female participation in ownership of private firms is significantly higher with 58 per cent (CEDAW/C/GUY/9, 10 July 2018, paragraph 89). The Government's report to the CEDAW further indicates that women in unionized agricultural production comprise 20 per cent of the workforce. It adds that temporary special measures have been implemented to address discrimination against women in the fields of microcredit, as well as education and training. The Committee welcomes the Government's indication in the above report that "gender parity has been achieved in primary education at the national level". However, the report adds that, despite significant progress in the promotion of women in traditionally male-dominated sectors (engineering, electrical and construction), the overall enrolment in technical and vocational education and training in 2011–14 for women was 38 per cent compared to 62 per cent for males. The Committee notes that, according to the report to the CEDAW, "consistent efforts have been made to reverse and eliminate the persistence of gender stereotyping, negative cultural attitudes and other discriminatory practices" (CEDAW/C/GUY/9, paragraphs 48, 78 and 91). The Committee further notes from the ILO 2018 Country Report on Guyana (Gender at work in the Caribbean) that the Ministry of Social Protection also collaborates with international agencies to execute projects that can assist women in vulnerable situations to address systematic barriers to their participation and performance in the labour force and their ability to carry out caring work, particularly in relation to poverty and HIV stigma and discrimination. The Government also has instituted several training programmes with job skills for women, with a focus on single parents, who often face special difficulties in accessing the labour market and finding jobs. The Committee asks the Government to continue taking active steps to remove obstacles that hinder women's access to, and advancement in, employment and occupation, including awareness-raising measures to combat any gender stereotypes and patriarchal attitudes that assume that the burden of domestic and caring responsibilities must be borne by women. The Committee asks the Government to clarify the status of the National Gender and Social Inclusion Policy and, if adopted, to provide specific information on the steps taken in practice to implement it, and particularly details on the results achieved in employment and occupation. The Government is also asked to provide information on the activities of the Women and Gender Equality Commission (WGEC), including the results achieved in the framework of the above-mentioned five-year Strategic Plan, and on the activities of the Gender Affairs Bureau (GAB).

Article 1(1)(a). Multiple discrimination, including discrimination based on race. Persons of African descent, in particular women. The Committee notes from the Report of the United Nations Working Group of Experts on People of African Descent following its mission to Guyana (from 2 to 6 October 2017) that the Government has not developed a specific national action plan to combat racism, racial discrimination, xenophobia or other forms of intolerance. It further notes the indication that "Afro-Guyanese women often face inequalities and multiple forms of discrimination on the grounds of their race, colour, gender and religious belief" and that, although the participation of women in the labour force is rising, women are also increasingly concentrated in low-paying jobs. The Committee notes the concern expressed by the Working Group at the high drop-out rates of girls (A/HRC/39/69/Add.1, 13 August 2018, paragraphs 30-31). The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the steps taken in practice to address discrimination faced by persons of African Descent, in particular women and girls, with respect to access to and advancement in education and employment and occupation. The Government is also asked to provide any available information on the situation of men and women of African descent in employment and occupation, in particular in rural areas.

Indigenous peoples. The Committee notes from the ILO 2018 Country Report mentioned above that the original peoples (Amerindians) represent 10.5 per cent of the population. The Committee notes from the website of the Ministry of Indigenous Peoples' Affairs that, over the past three years, 2.3 billion Guyanese dollars (GYD) have been devoted to hinterland youth empowerment, which has resulted in the establishment of 2,054 successful businesses. The youths were trained under the Hinterland Employment and Youth Service (HEYS) programme, which succeeded the Youth Entrepreneurship and Apprenticeship Programme (YEAP), that targeted approximately 4,000 youths in the 215 indigenous villages and communities across the country. The Committee asks the Government to continue taking steps promoting a wide range of training and employment opportunities for members of indigenous peoples and to provide information on the development and results of the HEYS programme. The Committee also asks the Government to provide any available information, disaggregated by sex, on the situation of persons from indigenous peoples in employment and occupation, including in entrepreneurship and traditional activities. The Government is asked once again to provide detailed information on the activities carried out by the Ethnic Relations Commission and the Indigenous Peoples Commission and their impact in the fields of education, training, employment and occupation.

General observation of 2018. With regard to the above issues, and in more general terms, the Committee would like to draw the Government's attention to its general observation on discrimination based on race, colour and national extraction which was adopted in 2018. In the general observation, the Committee noted with concern that discriminatory attitudes and stereotypes based on the race, colour or national extraction of men and women workers continues to hinder their participation in education, vocational training programmes and access to a wider range of employment opportunities, resulting in persisting occupational segregation and lower remuneration received for work of equal value. Furthermore, the Committee considered that it is necessary to adopt a comprehensive and coordinated approach to tackling the obstacles and barriers faced by persons in employment and occupation because of their race, colour or national extraction, and to promote equality of opportunity and treatment for all. Such an approach should include the adoption of interlocking measures aimed at addressing gaps in education, training and skills, providing unbiased vocational guidance, recognizing and validating the qualifications obtained abroad, and valuing and recognizing traditional knowledge and skills that may be relevant both to accessing and advancing in employment and to engaging in an occupation. The Committee also recalls that, in order to be effective, these measures must include concrete steps, such as laws, policies, programmes, mechanisms and participatory processes, remedies designed to address prejudices and stereotypes and to promote mutual understanding and tolerance among all sections of the population. The Committee draws the Government's attention to its general observation of 2018 and requests the Government to provide information in response to the questions raised in that observation.

Discrimination based on sexual orientation and gender identity. The Committee also notes from the ILO 2018 Country Report that "there are no laws relating to gender identity" although "there are substantial reports of discrimination against transgender persons and other members of the LGBTI community with regard to accessing employment opportunities". In this regard, the Committee further notes from the report of the United Nations Working Group of Experts on People of African Descent that "civil society entities reported that discrimination against lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender persons and sex workers was widely prevalent". Transgender Guyanese persons in particular are criminalized and stigmatized, and subjected to discrimination because they are more visible than other members of the lesbian, gay and bisexual community (A/HRC/39/69/Add.1, 13 August 2018, paragraph 33). The Committee asks the Government to provide information on any steps taken or envisaged to prevent and address discrimination based on sexual orientation and gender identity in employment and occupation, including legislative and awareness-raising measures.

Enforcement and statistics. The Committee notes from the ILO 2018 Country Report that "it has been reported that the laws to prevent discrimination are not effectively enforced". The Committee notes the Government's indication that the data requested are not available. The Committee once again asks the Government to provide information on the enforcement of the legislation prohibiting discrimination on the grounds set out in the Convention and to take active steps to ensure effective access to and the functioning of the enforcement mechanisms dealing with complaints of discrimination. The Government is also asked to take the necessary steps to ensure that it is in a position to collect and compile statistical data, disaggregated by sex, on the participation of men and women, as well as the different ethnic groups, in the various sectors and occupations.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1956)

The Committee notes the observations of the Honduran National Business Council (COHEP), received on 1 October 2020 concerning the compilation of statistics and consultations with the social partners and the Government's reply received on 6 November 2020.

The Committee notes the supplementary information provided by the Government on the matters raised in the direct request addressed to it, and reiterates the content of its observation adopted in 2019, which is repeated as follows.

The Committee notes the observations of the General Confederation of Workers (CGT), the Workers' Confederation of Honduras (CTH) and COHEP, sent with the Government's report, as well as the observations of the COHEP, received on 2 September 2019 and the response of the Government received on 9 October 2019.

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Gender pay gap. Statistics. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to provide information on the progress it had made to reduce the gender pay gap. The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that since 2018, the pay gap has been more favourable to women in the private and public sectors, given that women have higher levels of schooling and work more in urban areas. In this regard, the Government provides a set of data disaggregated by sex, including statistics on: average income by branch of activity, minimum wages by branch of activity, and minimum wages by occupation (levels of responsibility). The Committee notes the Government's indication that it lacks information to be able to conduct an analysis, explaining that the only source of information on the labour market is the permanent household survey of National Institute of Statistics (INE). The Committee notes that, in their observations, the CGT and CTH indicate that, in practice, significant gender pay gaps do exist, particularly in the public sector, and that it would be important to make a comparison by position. The Committee also notes that, in its observations, the COHEP indicates that the statistical data provided by the Government needs to be reviewed and refers to a series of surveys conducted by businesses on the participation of women in the workplace (the report on women in business management "Mujeres en la gestión empresarial" and the Market Systems Survey Analysis "Encuesta de diagnóstico sistemas de mercado" and the projects on Human Rights Due Diligence of Companies in relation to the Supply Chain "La debida diligencia empresarial en materia de derechos humanos en relación con la cadena de suministros"). COHEP notes that 98 per cent of companies consulted as part of the project on Human Rights Due Diligence of Companies in relation to the Supply Chain provide equal pay to men and women for the performance of the same work. While noting this information, the Committee observes that the data provided do not allow the comparison of the pay of men and women in different positions and at levels of responsibility by which may nonetheless be of equal value. In so doing, the Committee draws to the attention of the Government that the principle of equal pay for work of equal value not only requires equal pay for the same work but also equal remuneration for jobs that may be entirely different but nevertheless of equal value (see 2012 General Survey on fundamental Conventions, paragraphs 667 and 679). In order to be able to conduct a detailed analysis and with full knowledge of the facts on the gender pay gap, the Committee requests the Government to make every effort to compile the most comprehensive statistics possible on the level of pay for men and women in the private and public sectors. In this regard, the Committee refers in particular to its general observation concerning the application of the Convention adopted in 1998.

Article 1(b). Work of equal value. Legislation. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that section 367 of the Labour Code and section 44 of the Equal Opportunities for Women Act (LIOM), as well as Decree No. 27-2015, do not ensure the application of the principle of equal remuneration for work of equal value, and requested the Government to report on any legislative amendments. The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that: (1) labour law reform begins with the submission to the Economic and Social Council (CES) of the intention to reform or amend the Labour Code; and (2) the National Institute for Women (INAM) has initiated a proposal to reform the LIOM and a number of meetings between representatives of the various state institutions and of civil society have been held on that matter; and (3) the highest-ranking authorities have been informed so that they can begin taking the necessary measures to bring the labour legislation into line with international Conventions. The Committee also notes that, in its observations, the COHEP indicates that no employers' association has been convened to analyse the LIOM reform, and that it has not been submitted to the CES. The Committee trusts that the necessary measures will be taken to ensure that the legislation duly reflects the principle of equal pay for men and women for jobs that are of a different nature, but are of equal value, and requests the Government to provide information in this regard.

The Committee also recalls the importance of consultations with the social partners in the process of labour law reform, and trusts that the Government will ensure this occurs in relation to any measures implementing the principle of the Convention.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1961)

Article 1 of the Convention. Discrimination in employment and occupation. Legislation. The Committee recalls its previous comments on the Labour Code 2012, in which it noted that the Labour Code, although providing for the principle of equal treatment (section 12), does not explicitly prohibit discrimination nor does it enumerate any prohibited grounds of discrimination or refer to the prohibited grounds enumerated in the Equal Treatment Act 2003. The Committee notes with regret the Government's indication that there have been no legislative amendments made in this regard as it considers that the current laws provide sufficient guarantees against discrimination for all employees. Recalling that the implementation of the Convention presupposes a clear and comprehensive legislative framework, as well as measures to ensure that the right to equality and non-discrimination is effective in practice, the Committee asks the Government to take measures, in collaboration with workers' and employers' organizations, to amend the Labour Code to include provisions defining and prohibiting direct and indirect discrimination in all aspects of employment and occupation, on at least all the grounds listed in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention.

Enforcement. Labour inspection. The Committee recalls that, following a 2012 amendment to the Labour Inspection Act of 1996, the competence of the labour inspectorate no longer covers compliance with equal treatment provisions, which is now entirely a matter for the Equal Treatment Authority (ETA). The Committee notes the Government's indication that the amendment was made because labour inspectors did not have a sufficient level of expertise to address cases of discrimination, but that they remain able to detect such cases and refer them to the competent authority. In this regard, the Committee recalls the importance of training labour inspectors to increase their capacity to prevent, detect and remedy such instances. It also recalls that labour inspectors, who have regular access to workplaces and to workers and employers, have a crucial role to play in preventing, detecting and addressing discrimination and promoting equality in employment and occupation. The Committee observes that this role is different from, but complementary to the role played by the ETA. The Committee therefore requests the Government to implement adequate training programmes to allow labour inspectors to effectively prevent, detect and remedy cases of discrimination in employment and occupation. It further requests the Government to consider reviewing the labour inspectorate's competences with a view to extending them to cover the legislation addressing equal treatment, and to provide information in this respect. It also requests the Government to provide information on: (i) the manner in which the labour inspectorate and the Equal Treatment Authority cooperate; and (ii) the number and nature of cases of discrimination in employment and occupation referred to the ETA by the labour inspectorate, as well as the grounds of discrimination invoked, and their outcome.

Article 1 of the Convention. Prohibited grounds of discrimination. For a number of years, the Committee has been requesting the Government to take the necessary measures for the adoption of anti-discrimination legislation addressing all aspects of employment and occupation and covering at least all the grounds enumerated in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention. The Committee notes the adoption in 2018 of two laws covering equal treatment and non-discrimination: (1) Act No. 85 on Equal Treatment irrespective of Racial and Ethnic Origin, which requires equal treatment of persons irrespective of their race and ethnic origin in all fields of society, with the exception of the labour market; and (2) Act No. 86 on Equal Treatment in the Labour Market. The Committee notes that section 1 of Act No. 86 provides for equal treatment of individuals on the labour market, irrespective of their race, ethnic origin, religion, life stance, disability, reduced working capacity, age, sexual orientation, gender identity, sexual characteristics or gender expression. The Act applies, inter alia, to: (a) access to jobs, self-employment or occupational sectors, including with regard to engagement and promotion; (b) access to educational and vocational counselling, vocational education and vocational training; (c) decisions in connection with wages, other terms of service and notice of termination; and (d) participation in workers' and employers' organizations, including the services that they provide for their members. The Committee welcomes the inclusion of a range of prohibited grounds of discrimination in Act No. 86, but observes that it does not cover all the grounds of discrimination listed in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention, namely the grounds of colour, political opinion, national extraction and social origin. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary steps to amend Act No. 86 to ensure the inclusion of all the prohibited grounds of discrimination enumerated in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention, and particularly colour, political opinion, national extraction, and social origin.

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1958)

Article 1(a) of the Convention. Definition of remuneration. The Committee notes, from the Government's report, that the Code on Wages was adopted and enacted in 2019, and replaced the Equal Remuneration Act (ERA), 1976, the Payment of Wages Act, 1936, the Minimum Wages Act, 1948 and the Payment of Bonus Act, 1965. The Committee notes that under section 2(y) of the Code, the term "wages" is defined as "all remuneration whether by way of salaries, allowances or otherwise, expressed in terms of money or capable of being so expressed which would be, if the terms of employment, express or implied, were fulfilled, payable to a person employed in respect of his employment or of work done in such employment, and includes his basic pay, dearness allowances, and retaining allowance, if any". The Committee further notes that for the application of the principle of equal wages between men and women contained in section 3 of the Code, the term "wages" also includes: the conveyance allowances or the value of any travelling concession, house rent allowance, remuneration payable under any award or settlement between the parties or order of a court or Tribunal, and any overtime allowance (section 2(y) sub-section (d), (f), (g) and (h)). However, the Code explicitly excludes from the definition of "wages" other emoluments such as bonuses, contribution paid by the employer to any pension fund, or any gratuity payable on the termination of employment. The Committee recalls that Article 1(a) of the Convention sets out a very broad definition of "remuneration" which includes not only "the ordinary, basic or minimum wage or salary" but also "any additional emoluments whatsoever payable directly or indirectly, whether in cash or in kind, by the employer to the worker and arising out of the worker's employment". "Remuneration" under the Convention includes wage differentials or increments, cost-of-living allowances, dependency allowances, travel allowances or expenses, housing and residential allowances. It also includes benefits in kind such as the provision of accommodation or food, and it includes all allowances paid under social security schemes financed by the undertaking or industry concerned (see General Survey of 2012 on the fundamental Conventions, paragraphs 686–692). The Committee therefore asks the Government to consider amending the definition of "wages" contained in section 2(y) of the Code on Wages, in order to allow for a broad definition, including any additional emoluments whatsoever, as provided for in Article 1(a) of the Convention.

Article 1(b). Equal remuneration for work of equal value. Legislation. For a number of years, the Committee has been pointing out the more limited nature of the provisions of the Constitution of India (Article 39(d)) and the ERA (sections 2(h) and 4), when compared to the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value as set out in the Convention. In particular, under the above legislative provisions. the principle of equal remuneration is applied to ''work of a similar nature" rather than ''work of equal value". In its previous comment, the Committee noted that the Government was in the process of consolidating its labour legislation in four codes, including a Wages Code, which would cover some of the matters addressed in the ERA, and it asked the Government to make use of this opportunity to ensure that the principle of the Convention was fully reflected in the legislation. The Committee notes that section 3(1) of the Code on Wages prohibits "discrimination in an establishment or any unit thereof among employees on the ground of gender in matters relating to wages by the same employer, in respect of the same work or work of a similar nature done by any employee". Under section 4, any dispute as to whether a work is of the same or a similar nature will be decided by such authority as the Government designates. The Committee notes, with concern, that section 2(v) defines "same work or work of a similar nature", in the same limited wording as the ERA did, as "work in respect of which the skill, effort, experience and responsibility required are the same, when performed under similar working conditions by employees and the difference if any, between the skill, effort, experience and responsibility required for employees of any gender, are not of practical importance in relation to the terms and conditions of employment". It notes that the Government considers this definition to be equivalent to the concept of "work of equal value". However, the Committee is of the view that this definition is more limited than the concept of "work of equal value" enshrined in the Convention. Indeed, when determining whether two jobs are of equal value, the overall value of the jobs is to be considered. In this regard, the Committee recalls that the definition should permit a broad scope of comparison, including, but going beyond equal remuneration for "equal", "the same" or "similar" work, and also encompassing work that is of an entirely different nature, which is nevertheless of equal value. Comparing the relative value of jobs in occupations which may involve different types of skills, responsibilities or working conditions, but which are nevertheless of equal value overall, is essential in order to eliminate pay discrimination resulting from the failure to recognize the value of work performed by women and men free from gender bias (see the General Survey of 2012, paragraph 673-675). The Committee also draws the Government's attention to the fact that the Convention includes, but does not limit application of the principle of equal remuneration for work of equal value to men and women "in the same workplace", and provides that this principle should be applied across different enterprises to allow for a much broader comparison to be made between jobs performed by women and men. The Convention thus calls for the reach of comparison between jobs performed by men and women to be as wide as possible in the context of the level at which wage policies, systems and structures are coordinated (General Survey of 2012, paragraphs 697 and 698). Recalling that it has been raising this issue since 2002, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure that: (i) the Code on Wages is amended to give full expression to the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value as enshrined in the Convention; and (ii) it is not restricted to workers within the same workplace but applies across different enterprises and sectors. It also asks the Government to provide information on the application in practice of section 3 of the Code on Wages and to indicate the authority which is competent to handle disputes under section 4.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1958)

Article 1(b) of the Convention. Equal remuneration for work of equal value. Legislation. The Committee recalls that for a number of years it has been asking the Government to improve the application of the Convention, including by reviewing Law No. 13/2003 concerning Manpower (Manpower Act), with a view to giving legal expression to the principle of equal remuneration between men and women for work of equal value, because the Manpower Act, read together with the Explanatory Notes on the Law, only provides, in general terms, for equal opportunity (section 5) and equal treatment (section 6) without discrimination based on sex. The Committee considered that such general provisions, while important, were not sufficient to give effect to the Convention, as they do not include the concept of "work of equal value". The Committee also recalls that in its previous observation, it welcomed section 11 of the Regulation No. 78 of 2015 on Wages, which provides that "every worker is entitled to equal wage for work of equal value". It however noted that the provision is formulated in general terms and no longer refers to non-discrimination between men and women. The Committee therefore asked the Government to provide information on: (1) the manner in which sections 5 and 6 of the Law No. 13/2003 on Manpower and section 11 of Regulation No. 78 of 2015 are being applied in practice, including any violations specifically concerning the principle of equal remuneration between men and women for work of equal value detected by, or brought to the attention of, the labour inspection services, and any action taken to remedy those violations; and (2) any administrative or judicial decisions applying the principle of the Convention. The Committee also encouraged the Government to consider, as soon as the opportunity arises, reviewing and amending the Manpower Act to give explicit legislative expression to the principle of the Convention, and to provide information on any consultations held with the social partners to this end.

The Committee notes that in its report the Government indicates that there have been no cases of wage discrimination based on gender. The Government also indicates that the application of the principle of the Convention is ensured in practice through: (1) the obligation of companies to set up wage structures and scales applying to their employees and inform them about such structures and scales; and (2) the provision of administrative sanctions in case of non-compliance. The Government reports that, as of 2019, 9,602 companies were preparing the wage structure and scale and that no difference was found between men and women in the wage structures and scales examined. The Committee also notes that the Government, in collaboration with the social partners and the ILO, is promoting the implementation of international labour standards by export-oriented companies in the garment sector

While noting the Government's indication that no wage discrimination between men and women was found in the wage structure and scale of the companies it examined, the Committee notes that no information is provided on how the principle of equal remuneration for "work of equal value" between men and women is ensured in the design of the wage structure and scale. The Committee recalls that the concept of "work of equal value" requires going beyond ensuring equal remuneration for "equal", "the same" or "similar" work and also encompasses equal remuneration for work that is of an entirely different nature but is nevertheless of "equal value". This is fundamental given the occupational sex segregation in the labour market due to historical attitudes and stereotypes regarding women's aspirations, preferences and capabilities, which has resulted in women holding predominantly certain jobs, such as in caring professions. Often these "female jobs" are undervalued in comparison with work of equal value performed by men when determining wage rates (See General survey on the fundamental conventions, 2012, para. 673). In light of the above, the Committee asks the Government: (i) to indicate how it is ensured that the procedures adopted in determining wages (including wage increases) are free from gender bias, and that the work performed by women is not being undervalued in comparison to that of men who are performing different work and using different skills while charged with different responsibilities under different working conditions; (ii) to provide information on measures adopted or envisaged in order to ensure the application of the principle of the Convention in the design of wage structures and scales; and (iii) to supply information on any specific measures adopted to raise awareness about the principle of the Convention among government officials, employers and workers and their organizations, in particular in the garment sector. The Committee also encourages the Government to consider reviewing and amending the Manpower Act to give explicit legislative expression to the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value, in consultation with the social partners, and asks the Government to provide information on any developments in this regard.

Article 2(2)(a). Discriminatory provisions with respect to benefits and allowances. For more than ten years, the Committee has been drawing the Government's attention to the fact that section 31(3) of Law No. 1/1974 concerning Marriage, which identifies the husband as the head of the family, may have a discriminatory impact on women's employment-related benefits and allowances due to the fact that women in the workforce are assumed to be either single or seeking a supplementary income and are often not entitled to family allowances. The Committee notes that the Government refers to section 6 of the Manpower Act and section 11 of the Regulation No. 78 of 2015 on Wages, which have been mentioned above, and explains that more detailed provisions regarding wage components can be arranged through employment agreements, company regulations or collective labour agreements. The Committee also notes the Government's statement that it "continues to strive to ensure that work agreements, company regulations or collective labour agreements do not contain regulations with lower standards than stipulated in laws and regulations". The Committee further notes the Government's explanation that the Marriage Act is not used as a reference when regulating work relations. The Committee recalls that differential treatment in respect of remuneration is often linked to the express and implied assumption that the man is the "breadwinner" or the "head of the household" for the purpose of receiving certain allowances or benefits and notes the possibility of allowing both spouses to choose who would benefit from such allowances, rather than starting from the point that they should systematically be paid to the man (2012 General survey para. 693). In light of all the above, the Committee encourages the Government to gather information, in collaboration with the social partners, on women's access in practice to family allowances and employment-related benefits, and to provide information in this regard. In the meanwhile, the Committee asks the Government to inform about any measures taken to ensure that women do not face direct or indirect discrimination with respect to family allowances and employment-related benefits.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1999)

Articles 2 and 3 of the Convention. Equality of opportunity for men and women. In its previous observation, the Committee asked the Government to continue taking specific measures, in cooperation with the social partners, to address the significant level of occupational gender segregation and to provide information on the results achieved, including with respect to the implementation of the Strategic Action Plan 2013–19 formulated by the National Task Force on Equal Employment Opportunities (EEO). In addition, the Committee asked the Government to: (1) provide detailed information on the measures taken to promote gender equality in the public sector, including measures to improve the representation of women among regular staff; and (2) continue providing detailed statistical information on the distribution of men and women in the various posts and occupations in the public service. The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that it has carried out various awareness-raising and capacity-building activities on equality and non-discrimination under the National Strategic Action Plan. However, it notes that the Government has not provided details of the action taken and the results achieved in addressing occupational gender segregation. Concerning the promotion of gender equality in the public sector, the Committee notes that the Government refers to Regulation No. 14 of 2018 on the recruitment process and indicates that it is based on the candidates' competencies. The Government adds that women represent 51 per cent of the total of 4.1 million civil servants.

The Committee notes that, according to the ILO Database of Labour Statistics (ILOSTAT), 51 per cent of working age women participate in the workforce, compared with 78 per cent of working age men. It also notes from the ILO research brief "Leading to success: The business case for women in business and management in Indonesia", June 2020 (ILO Women in Science, Technology, Engineering and Mathematics (STEM) project), that women are over-represented in temporary and part-time employment and comprise the majority of employees in the services sector. Concerning women in agriculture, the Committee notes from the report of the United Nations Special Rapporteur on the right to food on her visit to Indonesia that women working in agriculture receive lower pay compared with men and that many of them work informally under precarious conditions (A/HRC/40/56/Add.2, 28 December 2018, paragraph 54). The Committee also notes from the same source that the Laws on Food (No. 18/2012), Farmers' Protection and Empowerment (No. 19/2013) and Protection and Empowerment of Fisherfolk, Fish Farmers and Salt Farmers (No. 7/2016) do not explicitly recognize women as stakeholders. The Special Rapporteur emphasizes in this regard that "laws that do recognize women consider their role as part of a household, rather than as an integral part of food production. This lack of adequate recognition further undermines the rights of women to social security and welfare programmes and delegitimizes women as agricultural workers" (paragraph 55). In light of the above, the Committee encourages the Government to undertake, in cooperation with the social partners, an assessment of the measures adopted so far to promote equality of opportunity and treatment for men and women in employment and occupation, in both the private and public sectors, including the measures adopted under the Strategic Action Plan 2013–19 of the EEO, and to provide information on the results achieved, the obstacles identified and any follow-up action envisaged and implemented, including with regard to occupational gender segregation. The Committee also asks the Government to: (i) indicate whether a new Action Plan has been prepared by the EEO Task Force; (ii) provide information on the measures adopted to promote the application of the principle of the Convention to men and women rural workers; and (iii) provide updated statistical information on the distribution of men and women in the various sectors, occupations and positions, in the formal and informal economies.

Article 3(e). Access to vocational training and guidance. In its previous observation, the Committee asked the Government to: (1) take further measures to promote women's access to a wider range of vocational training courses and occupations, including those in which men traditionally participate and those leading to opportunities for advancement, and provide information on the results achieve; and (2) continue providing detailed statistical information, disaggregated by sex, on the labour force participation rates in the various sectors and occupations in the formal and informal economies, and on the number of men and women participating in vocational training, specifying the type of courses attended. The Committee notes the Government's indication that it has made efforts to increase the population's access to training centres. The Committee also notes from the statistical information provided by the Government that women represented 37.7 per cent of all trainees in 2018 and that the largest number of women participated in training on business and management, garment, apparel, processing and beauty. The Committee further notes from the ILO research brief "Leading to success: The business case for women in business and management in Indonesia" that: (1) more women graduate from tertiary education than men and, more particularly, that women accounted for 16 per cent of those graduating from tertiary education in 1993, and that this figure rose to 59 per cent in 2018; and (2) although the majority (63 per cent) of tertiary graduates in STEM disciplines continue be men, more women are taking up STEM fields and occupations.. The Committee notes that, although some progress has been made in this regard, gender segregation in skills training appears to persist. The Committee asks the Government to step up its efforts to promote women's access to a wider range of vocational training courses and occupations, including those in which men traditionally participate and those leading to opportunities for advancement, and to provide information on the results achieved and statistical information on the number of men and women participating in vocational training, with an indication of the types of courses attended.

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1964)

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government following the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020). The Committee proceeded with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the supplementary information received from the Government this year, as well as the information at its disposal in 2019.

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Discrimination based on sex. Legal restrictions on women's employment. The Committee recalls that for a number of years it has been asking the Government to repeal or amend section 1117 of the Civil Code, which allows a husband to prevent his wife from engaging in an occupation or technical profession which, in his view, is incompatible with the family's interests or the dignity of him or his wife. The Government stated in its last report that the request for an amendment to section 1117 was before the Parliamentary Legal and Judiciary Committee for review. The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that section 1117 of the Civil Code dates back to 1935 and that now judges give it a strict interpretation and apply it in restricted circumstances. The Government considers that the application of section 1117 does not give the husband "absolute control over his wife's right to work". To corroborate this statement, the Government provides summaries of several judgements where the courts quashed husbands' motions, when they did not consider the wife's occupation to be inconsistent with "family dignity and honour or disturbing the couple's daily life". The Committee notes that the Government once again explains that there is a certain reciprocity in the law and refers to section 18 of the Family Protection Law which provides for a wife's right to prohibit her husband from participating in an occupation in limited circumstances. The Committee notes that giving both spouses the right to restrict the others' choice of work, particularly where a husband has greater opportunity to do so, does not mean that those provisions are not discriminatory. The Committee further notes, from the Report of the Special Rapporteur on the situation of human rights in Iran, 2017, that several female athletes have been restricted from participation in international tournaments either by State sporting agencies or by their husbands (A/72/322, 14 August 2017, paragraph 92). Noting that it has been raising this issue since 1996, the Committee strongly urges the Government to take the necessary measures to repeal section 1117 of the Civil Code to ensure that women have the right in law and practice to freely pursue any job or occupation of their own choosing.

Draft Comprehensive Population and Family Excellence Plan and other measures. In its previous comment, the Committee noted that the draft Comprehensive Population and Family Excellence Plan (Bill No. 315), which established a hierarchy in hiring practices by both public and private institutions (employment was to be given first to men with children, then to married men without children and then to women with children) had been revised by a new draft of the Comprehensive Population and Family Excellence Plan (Bill No. 264) with the same objective as the former Bill, that is to achieve a fertility rate of 2.5 children per woman by 2025. The Committee noted that, while many provisions in the former Bill had been modified, Bill No. 264 maintained some of the hiring priorities: section 10 provides that governmental and non-governmental departments shall give priority in employment to married men with children and to married men without children and that the employment of single persons is permitted only in the absence of qualified married applicants. However, Bill No. 264 provides that in occupations such as medicine and teaching, due to gender segregation, women will be given priority, as an exception to this section, and where there is a need to consider women, priority will be given to women with children and married women without children. Bill No. 264 also maintains most of the provisions concerning support to women in relation to maternity protection and family responsibilities, such as extended paid maternity leave for nine months with a right to return.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that Bill No. 264 is still under review and that its concerns are being considered for the finalization of the draft Bill. The Government reports that it has called upon different agencies and reference groups to provide their opinion on the draft Bill. The Committee notes the Government's statement that alternative incentives to promote population policies are being considered. While it understands the importance of a population policy, it remains concerned about the approach taken to restrict women's access to employment in Bill No. 264, and particularly single women and women without children, in contravention of the protection against discrimination set out in the Convention. The Committee once again asks the Government to ensure that the measures taken to promote population policies and maternity protection do not constitute obstacles to the employment of women in practice. More specifically, the Committee firmly hopes that measures will be taken to remove all of the restrictions on women's employment in the draft Bill No. 264 and to review the prioritization of men's employment. It once again urges the Government to ensure that in practice restrictive measures are not taken through the introduction of quotas which serve to limit women's employment in the public sector.

Sexual harassment. The Committee notes with regret that no measures have been taken to amend the Labour Code to explicitly define and prohibit all forms of sexual harassment at work, both quid pro quo and hostile work environment and that no information has been provided on any action taken in this respect. It notes the Government's view that there is sufficient protection considering: (1) the general status that women have in society due to the cultural and religious rules prevailing in the country; (2) the protection against sexual assault and harassment in criminal law; and (3) the general disciplinary regulations contained in labour law, including the regulations on determining cases of failure and violation of labour disciplinary circulars and regulations in workshops adopted under section 27(2) of Labour Code and the respective disciplinary regulations. The Committee further recalls that, in the Bill on Women's Security Against Violence, it is proposed to criminalize sexual harassment at work. It notes, according to the supplementary information provided by the Government, that the Bill was returned to the Government Committee of Legal Bills in late August 2020 with some amendments made by the judiciary, and is currently under final review. In this regard, the Committee recalls that addressing sexual harassment only through criminal proceedings is normally not sufficient, due to the sensitivity of the issue, the higher burden of proof, which is harder to meet, especially if there are no witnesses (which is often the case), and the fact that criminal law generally focuses on sexual assault or "immoral acts", and not the full range of behaviour that constitutes sexual harassment in employment and occupation (2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 792). Furthermore, the Committee notes the Government's information on the establishment in 2015 of the National Committee for Prevention of Violence, which is responsible for dealing with all aspects of violence, including violence against women. In its supplementary information, the Government indicates that it has established a special taskforce on the security of women at the workplace, composed of academics in the field of sociology and psychology, with the aim of identifying women's issues, challenges and concerns at workplaces. The Committee takes note of this information. Recalling the Government's previous acceptance that clear legislation is required for effective protection against sexual harassment, the Committee once again urges the Government to amend the Labour Code to explicitly define and prohibit all forms of sexual harassment at work, both quid pro quo and hostile work environment, and to provide information on any action taken. In the meantime, the Government is asked to provide a copy of the sample disciplinary by-laws that have been developed to provide examples for workplace disciplinary committees. The Committee also asks the Government to provide information on the progress made with regard to the adoption and implementation of the Bill on Women's Security Against Violence and to provide a copy of the text once it has been adopted. Finally, the Committee asks the Government to undertake specific activities to prevent sexual harassment at work, through the Committee for Prevention of Violence and the special taskforce on the security of women at the workplace, including awareness-raising campaigns at both the national and workplace levels in respect of the public and private sectors.

Equality of opportunity and treatment for men and women. With the aim of improving equal access to opportunities for women, the Government indicates that it undertook a review of the cultural barriers to equal opportunities and treatment of women and organized conferences and workshops at the national and regional levels. However, the Committee notes that the results of this review have not been communicated. The Committee welcomes the adoption of the Citizen's Charter for Human Rights, 2016, section 11 of which provides that "women have the right to take an active and effective part in policy-making, legislation, management, enforcement and supervision, and to enjoy equal social opportunities according to Islamic standards". Moreover, the Committee notes from the 2017 report of the Special Rapporteur on the situation of human rights, that the Charter is not legally binding and that it offers almost no new protection for women and minority groups (A/72/322, 14 August 2017, paragraphs 7 and 8). With regard to its previous comment, the Committee takes note of the Government's statement that numerous initiatives were undertaken to encourage women's participation in the labour market and increase their representation in management positions. Among the measures taken, the Government reports on the adoption of an executive order aiming to increase women's managerial positions to 30 per cent. The Government also indicates there has been an increase in the number of women in rural management, governors' offices, deputies and advisors in governors' general offices. The Government further refers to the preparation and implementation of the National Plan 2015–16 to Support Empowerment of Women Managers and Governors General through training and empowerment workshops, delivered to more than 1,900 women middle managers in 31 provinces. In its supplementary information, the Government indicates that the number of women managers in the country rose by 36 per cent between 2017 and 2019. The Committee welcomes the Government's indication that in 2019 there were a total of 12,850 women managers in the country, compared to 9,444 in 2017. However, it also observes that in 2019 women represented only 5.5 per cent of top managers, 9.3 per cent of middle managers and 23 per cent of basic managers.

The Committee notes the Government's information on the number of women judges in office. In reply to the Committee's previous request, the Government indicates that the exact number of women judges with the right to issue judgments cannot be provided because such data is not collected. In this regard, the Committee notes, from the 2017 report of the Special Rapporteur on the situation of human rights, that women remain excluded from certain occupations, including from serving as judges who issue rulings, although they may be appointed as assistant judges (A/72/322, paragraph 87). The Committee also notes, from the Government's report on the application of the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122), that women's economic participation increased from 12.7 per cent in 2014 to 17.3 per cent in 2016 and an Inclusive Employment Plan under which women are being provided with assistance and support to work from home is being implemented. In this regard, the Committee notes that women account for more than 80 per cent of homeworkers. The Government further indicates that it has provided support for the creation of employment for female rural cooperatives by creating micro-credit units, and it has encouraged rural organizations and cooperatives for economic empowerment and income generation of rural women by facilitating access to production resources, land, capital and ownership rights. The Committee also notes, from the Government's supplementary information, that due to the exceptional economic conditions caused by COVID-19 in 2020, an economic working group has been set up to provide women heads of households with support for production and livelihoods, including by supporting their employment in workshops to produce face masks and gowns. Finally, the Committee notes that the Special Rapporteur regrets that discrimination on the basis of gender pervades society and that the pace of change concerning the protection of women from discrimination is slow (A/75/213, 21 July 2020, paragraph 46), and that discrimination in the job market continues to prohibit women from working in certain professions (A/HRC/37/68, 5 March 2018, paragraph 63). In light of the above, the Committee asks the Government to: (i) step up its efforts to examine and address the obstacles that exist in practice, including cultural and stereotypical barriers, to women's equality of opportunity and treatment; (ii) promote and encourage the participation of women in the labour market and decision-making positions on an equal basis with men; and (iii) provide up-to-date statistics disaggregated by sex and occupation in both the public and private sectors, including the number of women judges with the right to issue judgments. Recalling the importance of women's access to the labour market not being restricted to a limited number of jobs and occupations or to being housebound, the Committee asks the Government to: (i) take measures to ensure that women have access to equal opportunities, and provide information on the concrete steps taken or envisaged to this end; (ii) continue providing information on the steps taken to support women's entrepreneurship, including those aimed at disadvantaged groups, rural and nomadic women, and women heads of households; (iii) provide information on the results achieved; and (iv) continue providing information, including statistics, on the number of women and men enrolled as students in universities and vocational and technical training institutions and their fields of study.

Discrimination based on religion and ethnicity. With regard to its previous comments, the Committee notes the Government's statement that recognized minorities are represented by five members of Parliament and are also present in urban and rural councils. The Government indicates that, just like any other citizens, members of religious minorities have access to university. However, the Committee recalls that the practical impact of the Selection Law. which requires prospective state officials and employees to demonstrate allegiance to the state religion (gozinesh) remains an issue of concern. It notes, from the 2019 report of the Special Rapporteur on the situation of human rights that, as a result of this practice, religious minorities, in particular non-recognized religious groups, face serious hurdles in obtaining public sector employment, and that private employers have also reportedly followed the guidelines of the gozinesh requirements, thereby discriminating against potential non-Muslim employees (A/74/188, 18 July 2019, paragraphs 41 and 42). The Committee recalls that for a number of years it has been raising the issue of the situation of the non-recognized minorities, in particular the Baha'i, and notes that, according to the above report, the Baha'i continue to be excluded from schools and employment (paragraph 50). The Committee urges the Government to take the necessary steps to eliminate discrimination in law and practice against members of religious minorities, especially non-recognized religious groups, in education, employment and occupation, and to adopt measures to foster respect and tolerance in society of all religious groups. Once again noting with regret that no information has been provided on the role or action of the Special Adviser to the President for religious and ethnic minority affairs, the Committee asks the Government to provide such information in its next report. The Committee also asks the Government to consider amending or repealing the Selection Law in order to ensure that people from all religions and ethnic backgrounds have equal access to employment and opportunities in both the public and private sectors, as well as to training and educational institutions. Noting the lack of information provided in this regard, the Committee once again asks the Government to provide information on the labour market participation rates of men and women from religious minorities.

General observation of 2018. With regard to the above issues, and in more general terms, the Committee would like to draw the Government's attention to its general observation on discrimination based on race, colour and national extraction which was adopted in 2018. In the general observation, the Committee notes with concern that discriminatory attitudes and stereotypes based on the race, colour or national extraction of men and women workers continue to hinder their participation in education, vocational training programmes and access to a wider range of employment opportunities, resulting in persisting occupational segregation and lower remuneration received for work of equal value.

Furthermore, the Committee considers that it is necessary to adopt a comprehensive and coordinated approach to tackling the obstacles and barriers faced by persons in employment and occupation because of their race, colour or national extraction, and to promote equality of opportunity and treatment for all. Such an approach should include the adoption of interlocking measures aimed at addressing gaps in education, training and skills, providing unbiased vocational guidance, recognizing and validating the qualifications obtained abroad, and valuing and recognizing traditional knowledge and skills that may be relevant both to accessing and advancing in employment and to engaging in an occupation. The Committee also recalls that, in order to be effective, these measures must include concrete steps, such as laws, policies, programmes, mechanisms and participatory processes, remedies designed to address prejudices and stereotypes and to promote mutual understanding and tolerance among all sections of the population.

The Committee draws the Government's attention to its general observation of 2018 and requests the Government to provide information in response to the questions raised in that observation.

Article 3(a). Social dialogue. The Committee notes that, between 2017 and 2019, the Government organized six tripartite advisory meetings to discuss labour issues. It also notes the adoption and notification in 2019 of Circular No. 46532, based on which all executive departments shall be obliged to take into consideration the opinions of workers' and employers' groups and other non-governmental organizations when adopting or amending circulars and procedures related to business, and invite their representatives to attend the respective meetings. In its supplementary information, the Government indicates that consultative assemblies of women experts and political, social, economic and cultural elites, with a view to direct, transparent and practical dialogue for women, have been held in four provinces. The Committee welcomes these initiatives and asks the Government to continue providing information on activities and efforts for cooperation with employers' and workers' organizations to promote the application of the Convention, including through the various tripartite committees.

Enforcement. Noting that the Government reiterates its willingness to organize training on international labour standards in conjunction with the International Training Centre in Turin, the Committee trusts that this cooperation will take place in the near future. The Committee once again asks the Government to provide information on the number and nature of the claims and disputes filed relating to employment discrimination, and to indicate the number of these cases based on sex discrimination. It further repeats its request to the Government to provide information on the activities of the Islamic Human Rights Commission, and any complaints submitted to it or to the courts or any other administrative body concerning discrimination in employment and occupation. The Committee once again asks the Government to provide information on awareness-raising, education and capacity-building measures aimed at employers and workers in order to ensure a better understanding of how to identify and address discrimination and to better promote equality in employment and occupation.

[The Government is asked to reply in full to the present comments in 2021.]

Iraq

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1959)

Articles 2 and 3. Equality of opportunity and treatment irrespective of race, colour, religious or national extraction. The Committee previously noted from the report of the United Nations Special Rapporteur on minority issues on her mission to Iraq (27 February–7 March 2016) that ethnic and religious "minorities have long faced discrimination and exclusion from certain labour markets, including employment in government and public sector posts" and that "such exclusion must be addressed, including through implementation of affirmative action policies where necessary, to ensure that Iraqi institutions better reflect the diversity within society". The Committee also noted from this report that a draft diversity protection and anti-discrimination bill and a draft bill on the protection of the rights of religious and ethnic minority groups were under consideration by the Government (A/HRC/34/53/Add.1, 9 January 2017, paragraphs 18 and 75). The Committee asked the Government to provide information on any measures taken to address discrimination faced by ethnic and religious minorities in employment and occupation. The Committee notes that the Government has not provided information on this point in its report. The Committee nevertheless notes that, in its 2019 concluding observations, the United Nations Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination (CERD), expresses concern at the persistence of structural racial discrimination, marginalization and stigmatization against people of African descent, who are "disproportionately affected by poverty and social exclusion and face discrimination in the enjoyment of their rights to an adequate living, education, health, housing and employment". The CERD also expresses concern at the situation of Roma citizens, who "do not hold unified national identity documents, which reportedly exposes them to discrimination, including in access to employment". The Committee further observes that the CERD regrets "the lack of information on the complaints received by the Iraqi High Commission for Human Rights and the domestic courts regarding racial discrimination (CERD/C/IRQ/CO/22-25, 11 January 2019, paragraphs 27 and 29). In this regard, the Committee wishes to point out that the absence of complaints and legal actions for racial discrimination may reveal a lack of suitable legislation, poor awareness of the legal remedies available, a lack of trust in the judicial system, a fear of reprisals or a lack of will on the part of the authorities to prosecute the perpetrators of such acts" (2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 870). While recognizing the difficult situation prevailing in the country, the Committee asks the Government to: (i) provide information on the progress made in the adoption of the draft diversity protection and anti-discrimination bill and the draft law on the protection of the rights of religious and ethnic minority groups; (ii) strengthen its efforts and adopt proactive measures to address discrimination against ethnic and religious minority groups; (iii) report on the impact of these measures on increasing these groups' access to employment and occupation; and (iv) provide statistical information, disaggregated by sex, on the employment of ethnic minority groups and the sectors and occupations in which they are employed. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the number and the nature of complaints, as well as on the grounds relied upon, filed with the courts and other competent bodies, such as the Iraqi High Commission for Human Rights that relate to discrimination based on race, colour, religion and national extraction.

General observation of 2018. Regarding the above issues, and in more general terms, the Committee would like to draw the Government's attention to its general observation on discrimination based on race, colour and national extraction which was adopted in 2018. In the general observation, the Committee notes with concern that discriminatory attitudes and stereotypes based on the race, colour or national extraction of men and women workers continue to hinder their participation in education, vocational training programmes and access to a wider range of employment opportunities, resulting in persisting occupational segregation and lower remuneration received for work of equal value. Furthermore, the Committee considers that it is necessary to adopt a comprehensive and coordinated approach to tackling the obstacles and barriers faced by persons in employment and occupation because of their race, colour or national extraction, and to promote equality of opportunity and treatment for all. Such an approach should include the adoption of interlocking measures aimed at addressing gaps in education, training and skills, providing unbiased vocational guidance, recognizing and validating the qualifications obtained abroad, and valuing and recognizing traditional knowledge and skills that may be relevant both to accessing and advancing in employment and to engaging in an occupation. The Committee also recalls that, in order to be effective, these measures must include concrete steps, such as laws, policies, programmes, mechanisms and participatory processes, remedies designed to address prejudices and stereotypes and to promote mutual understanding and tolerance among all sections of the population.

The Committee draws the Government's attention to its general observation of 2018 and requests the Government to provide information in response to the questions raised in that observation.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1999)

The Committee takes note of the Government's report and the supplementary information provided in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020).

The Committee notes the observations of the Irish Congress of Trade Unions (ICTU), received on 31 August 2019.

Articles 1(1)(a) and 2 of the Convention. Gender discrimination and equality of opportunity and treatment for men and women. The Committee recalls that article 41(2) of the Constitution provides that "the State recognises that by her life within the home, woman gives to the State a support without which the common good cannot be achieved" and that "The State shall, therefore, endeavour to ensure that mothers shall not be obliged by economic necessity to engage in labour to the neglect of their duties in the home." In its previous comment, the Committee noted the policy statement of the Irish Human Rights and Equality Commission (IHREC) of June 2018, in which it called for article 41(2) of the Constitution to be rendered gender neutral, refer to "family life" (understood as including a wide range of family relationships and situations in which family members do not live in the same house) and recognize and support care work, including by parents and other persons providing family care. Noting the ongoing constitutional review process, the Committee urged the Government to provide information on the steps taken to ensure that article 41(2) of the Constitution does not encourage, directly or indirectly, stereotypical treatment of women in the context of employment and occupation. It notes the Government's statement in its report that the referendum foreseen on the question was postponed and the matter was referred to a Citizens Assembly, composed of a Chairperson and 99 citizens randomly selected to be broadly representative of the Irish electorate. The Committee welcomes the fact that in February 2020 a large majority of the Citizens Assembly was in favour of the deletion and/or replacement of article 41(2) of the Constitution. It also notes the supplementary information provided by the Government, indicating that subsequent meetings of the Citizens Assembly have been postponed due to the COVID-19 pandemic, but that it met on-line in July 2020 to consider public submissions. The Government indicates that the situation is being kept under ongoing review and that it is expected that the Assembly will issue a series of recommendations. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the steps taken to implement the recommendations of the Irish Human Rights and Equality Commission, as well as the Citizens Assembly initiative, and to ensure that article 41(2) of the Constitution does not in any way encourage, directly or indirectly, the stereotypical treatment of women in the context of employment and occupation.

Article 1(1)(a). Discrimination based on political opinion or social origin. In its previous comment, the Committee once again urged the Government to take steps to ensure legislative protection against discrimination in employment and occupation based on political opinion and social origin, and to provide information on the measures adopted or envisaged to ensure protection in practice. The Committee once again recalls that, where legal provisions are adopted to give effect to the Convention, they should include at least all of the grounds of discrimination set out in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention. The Committee welcomes the Government's statement that the Department of Justice and Equality has commissioned research on the addition of socio-economic status as a prohibited ground of discrimination in the equality legislation and that the findings of the research are due in the autumn of 2020. The Committee however notes with concern that, with regard to discrimination based on political opinion, the Government states that there are no further developments envisaged. In this regard, the Committee also notes the ICTU's observations emphasizing that Chapter 6 of the Belfast Agreement (signed on 10 April 1998, also known as "the Good Friday Agreement"), entitled "Rights, Safeguards and Equality of Opportunity", commits the Government of Ireland to take measures to ensure that there is at least equivalent protection of human rights in Ireland as in Northern Ireland. In this regard, the Committee further notes the indication by the ICTU that the anti-discrimination legislation in Northern Ireland includes political opinion as a prohibited ground of discrimination. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the findings of the research commissioned on including socio-economic status as an additional prohibited ground of discrimination in the equality legislation and on the measures taken or envisaged as a result. It once again urges the Government to take steps to ensure formal legislative protection against discrimination in employment and occupation based on political opinion and social origin and to provide information on how protection against discrimination on these two grounds is ensured in practice.

Article 1(2). Inherent requirements of the job. In order to ensure that any exception to the principle of non-discrimination enshrined in the Convention is restricted to the inherent requirements of a particular job, in previous comments the Committee urged the Government to take steps to amend the relevant provisions of section 2 of the Employment Equality Act 1998, as revised, which excludes from the scope of the Act "persons employed in another person's home for the provision of personal services for persons residing in that home where the services affect the private or family life of such persons" (section 2 thereby permits employers of domestic workers to make recruitment decisions on discriminatory grounds). The Committee notes the Government's statement that there have been no further developments in this regard. It is therefore bound to recall once again what may be considered "inherent requirements of the job" and that overly broad exceptions in equality legislation excluding domestic workers from the protection of discrimination in respect of access to employment may lead to discriminatory practices by employers against these workers, contrary to the Convention. The Committee considers that the right to respect for private and family life should not be construed as protecting conduct that infringes the fundamental right to equality of opportunity and treatment in employment and occupation, including conduct consisting of differential treatment of candidates for employment on the basis of any of the grounds covered by Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention where this is not justified by the inherent requirements of the particular job (2012 General Survey on fundamental Conventions, paragraph 830). In this regard, the Committee once again wishes to draw the Government's attention to the fact that: (1) no provision in the Convention limits its scope with regard to individuals or branches of activity; and (2) the protection afforded by the Convention includes all aspects of employment and occupation, including access to employment and to particular occupations. The Committee once again urges the Government to take steps to amend the relevant parts of section 2 of the Employment Equality Act so as to ensure that any limitations on the right to non-discrimination in all aspects of employment and occupation are restricted to the inherent requirements of the particular job, as strictly defined.

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1965)

The Committee takes note of the Government's report and the supplementary information provided in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020).

Article 2 of the Convention. Application of the principle of the Convention to live-in caregivers. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that live-in caregivers were excluded from the applicability of the Hours of Work and Rest Law, 1951, including the provisions on overtime pay, and requested the Government: (1) to continue its efforts in finding the appropriate solution to ensure that the remuneration of live-in care-work, a female-dominated sector, is not under-evaluated based on gender stereotypes; (2) to identify benchmarks or milestones to mark progress towards achieving the objectives of the Convention in a time-bound manner; and (3) to provide information on any measures taken to raise awareness among the users and beneficiaries of care services of the need to recognize the value of care work. The Committee concluded in reminding the Government of the possibility to avail itself of ILO technical assistance in this regard. The Committee notes the Government's reiteration that there is no discrimination in payment between national and foreign caregivers and lack of information on the issue of the low level of remuneration of this female-dominated sector and its efforts to improve the situation. It also refers to its comments on the application of the Migration for Employment Convention (Revised), 1949 (No. 97) and the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111). The Committee again asks the Government : (i) to report on its efforts to ensure that the remuneration of live-in care-work, a female-dominated sector, is not under-evaluated based on gender stereotypes; (ii) to identify benchmarks or milestones to mark progress towards achieving the objectives of the Convention in a time-bound manner; and (iii) to provide information on any measures taken to raise awareness among the users and beneficiaries of care services, and the general public as a whole, of the need to recognize the value of care work. The Committee reminds the Government of the possibility to avail itself of ILO technical assistance in this regard.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1959)

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020). The Committee proceeded with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the supplementary information received from the Government this year, as well as the information at its disposal in 2019.

Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention. Discrimination on the basis of sex, race, colour or national extraction. Foreign live-in caregivers. The Committee recalls that in its previous comments it noted that, although the decision of the High Court of Justice in Yolanda Gloten v. the National Labour Court, HCJ 1678/07, of 29 November 2009, confirmed the exclusion of live-in caregivers, nationals and non-nationals from the applicability of the Hours of Work and Rest Law, 1951, it also concluded that the current legal framework did not offer a proper mechanism suitable for the unique situation of caregivers, as the Court did not consider that the round-the-clock live-in employment of caregivers corresponded to the general framework of protective labour law. The Committee noted that the Gloten Judgment acknowledged that only a small number of local citizens are willing to work as caregivers and that female Israeli care workers in the long-term caregiving sector were mostly employed in part-time jobs through nursing care companies, while foreign caregivers, 80 per cent of whom are women, are required to reside in the homes of their employers and are excluded from live-out arrangements or part-time employment. It further noted that the Government Staff Committee had submitted recommendations to the Ministry of the Economy, which included a proposal to amend the Hours of Work and Rest Law and its regulations concerning overtime pay in order to clarify that live-in caregivers are not excluded from the scope of the Law, with some adaptation to take into consideration the difficulty of supervising their working hours. Consequently, the Committee requested the Government to provide information on: (1) the concrete measures adopted or envisaged within the framework of the gradual approach to the implementation of the recommendations made to the Ministry of the Economy with a view to ensuring that foreign women workers are effectively protected against direct and indirect discrimination on the basis of sex, race, colour or national extraction, in line with the Convention; and (2) any complaints submitted by caregivers to the various authorities, indicating the nature of the complaints and the outcomes. The Committee notes that in its report the Government reiterates that there is no discrimination between national and foreign caregivers, but does not provide information on the measures taken or envisaged to implement progressively the recommendations made by the Government Staff Committee to the Ministry of the Economy, nor on any complaints submitted by women foreign and national caregivers to the various authorities. Noting that a large number of live-in caregivers are foreign women workers, the Committee stresses that the current situation may open the door to segregation in the labour market on the basis of sex, race and colour against migrant women, who are likely to be exposed to both indirect and direct discrimination. With regard to indirect discrimination, the Committee asks the Government to: (i) assess whether the exclusion of live-in caregivers from the applicability of the Hours of Work and Rest Law, 1951, disproportionately affects groups sharing protected characteristics, such as sex, race, colour or national extraction; and (ii) provide information on any measures adopted or envisaged to improve the working conditions of live-in caregivers in practice. The Committee reiterates its request for information on any complaints submitted by caregivers that relate to cases of discrimination (including information on the number of complaints, their nature and outcomes). The Committee also refers to its comments on the application of the Migration for Employment Convention (Revised), 1949 (No. 97), and the Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100).

Articles 1 and 2. Equality of opportunity and treatment irrespective of race, national extraction or religion. In its previous comment, the Committee requested the Government to provide information on the measures adopted to promote equality of opportunity and treatment in employment and occupation of the Arab, Druze and Circassian population. The Committee also requested the Government to monitor the impact on the employment of workers from these communities of the provisions of the Basic Law on the Nation State, 2018, regarding the official language and days of rest. The Committee notes that the Government has provided a detailed report on the labour market in Israel in 2019, indicating among other information that: (1) the groups of Arab men and ultra-orthodox Jewish women have joined the labour market in great numbers and their rates of employment are currently close to the average (an employment rate of 76 per cent in 2018 for both groups); (2) improvements are still needed for a better integration in the labour market of Arab women (employment rate 38.2 per cent in 2018); (3) other groups still face low employment rates (including ultra-orthodox Jewish men, immigrants from Ethiopia, people with disabilities, single parents and workers aged 45 and above); and (4) Arab and ultra-orthodox workers are over-represented in lower income employment categories. The Committee also notes that, according to the same report, the Minister of Labour, Social Affairs and Social Services established a public committee for the promotion of employment towards 2030 that set target employment rates for the different population groups for the next decade. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the measures adopted to promote and ensure in practice the integration of Arab, Druze and Circassian workers, men and women, into the labour market, including in higher income categories, and to continue providing statistical data on employment rates disaggregated by sex and population group.

With regard to the impact of the Basic Law on the Nation State, 2018, the Committee notes the Government's indication that it is a general law aimed at regulating the symbols of the State and is not related to employment. The Government also specifies that the status given to the Arabic language remains unchanged by the Law. The Committee notes that, according to the report provided by the Government on the labour market in Israel in 2019, only around 41 per cent of Arab women consider their command of Hebrew to be good, very good or at native language level, and specifies that their employment rate improves drastically with a higher command of Hebrew. The Committee recalls that discrimination based on national extraction may occur when legislation imposing a State language for employment in public and private sector activities is interpreted and implemented too broadly, and as such disproportionately and adversely affects the employment and occupational opportunities of minority language groups (General Survey of 2012 on fundamental Conventions, paragraph 764). The Committee therefore requests the Government to assess whether the implementation in practice of the provisions of the Basic Law on the Nation State, 2018, and particularly section 3 setting Hebrew as the State language and section 11 establishing the Sabbath and Jewish holidays as days of rest in the State, adversely affect the employment and occupational opportunities of certain population groups.

The Committee notes the observations of the Italian Confederation of Managers and High-level Professionals (CIDA) communicated with the Government's report.

Article 1 of the Convention. Discrimination on the basis of sex. Pregnancy and maternity. In its previous observation, referring to the practice of having workers sign an undated letter of resignation at the time of hiring for future use by employers (licenziamento in bianco) and its disproportionate impact on women with children under three years of age, the Committee asked the Government to: (1) step up its efforts to prevent and eliminate all discrimination against women based on pregnancy and maternity; (2) provide information on the implementation of the specific measures adopted under Legislative Decree No. 80/2015 (for the reconciliation of care, work and family life) and under Act No. 81/2017 (for the promotion of flexible new working arrangements for employees in the public and private sectors), and their impact on reducing the incidence of resignations among working women; and (3) provide information on the impact in this respect of the measures implemented under the three-year plan on affirmative action by the public administration. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government in its report on the measures adopted with the aim of facilitating the reconciliation of family and work responsibilities, including the introduction of allowances for nurseries and a special bonus for the birth or the adoption of a child, as well as updated information on the number of resignations and consensual terminations validated by the labour inspectorate in 2017 and 2018, which concerned working mothers in more than 70 per cent of cases. The Committee also notes the Government's indication that over the same period there was an increase in cases of resignations and consensual terminations concerning working fathers (15 per cent more in 2017 than in 2016, and 49 per cent more in 2018 than in 2017). The Committee notes that, according to the information provided by the Government, the most frequently stated reason for resignation given by workers continues to be the difficulty of reconciling their work and family responsibilities (36 per cent of the cases validated by the labour inspectorate), with workers mentioning, among other obstacles, the costs of child-care support (babysitters or nurseries), lack of access to kindergartens (that is, the unavailability of child-care facilities in numbers sufficient to meet demand) and the absence of grandparents or other family members who could provide help. In this connection, the Committee notes from the 2018 report of the labour inspectorate on the validation of resignations and consensual terminations that, of 2,062 requests for part-time work or other flexible working arrangements made by the workers concerned, only 423 were accepted by the employer. The same report indicates that the vast majority of cases of resignation and consensual termination (76 per cent) are in the tertiary sector, where women are over-represented.

Noting that family responsibilities continue to represent a major barrier for workers, especially women, to engage in the employment of their choice, the Committee wishes to emphasize that measures assisting workers with family responsibilities are essential to the promotion of gender equality in employment and occupation (2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 785). In this regard, the Committee notes from the 2017 report on the investigation of national gender equality policies conducted by the Italian Institute of Statistics (INSTAT), that women face greater difficulties in accessing the labour market because of the burden of family responsibilities and the difficulty of reconciling them with their professional life. The INSTAT report indicates that the employment rate of single women is 81.1 per cent, compared with 70.8 per cent for women living with a partner and 56.4 per cent for women with children. The Committee further notes CIDA's indication that reconciling family and work responsibilities remains an obstacle particularly for women managers. It also notes from the website of the National Agency for Active Labour Policies (ANPAL) that an international comparative analysis of national policy development for life–work balance was completed in 2019. The Committee therefore once again asks the Government to step up its efforts to prevent and address all discrimination against women based on pregnancy and maternity, in both the private and public sectors, including by adopting measures to promote the reconciliation of work and family responsibilities, ensuring that such measures are available to men and women on an equal footing and encouraging their use by both, and to provide information on the impact of the measures adopted. Noting the adoption on 20 June 2019 of Directive (EU) 2019/1158 of the European Parliament and the Council on work–life balance for parents and carers, the Committee also asks the Government to provide information on the measures taken pursuant to this Directive.

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1975)

Articles 1(b) and 2(2)(a) of the Convention. Equal remuneration for work of equal value. Legislation. The Committee recalls that it has been pointing out since 1997 that the Employment (Equal Pay for Men and Women) Act of 1975 does not include the concept of "work of equal value" as required by the Convention and only requires the payment of equal remuneration for equal work. It further recalls that in section 2(1) of the Act, "equal work" is defined as "work performed for one employer by male and female employees alike in which: (a) the duties, responsibilities or services to be performed are similar or substantially similar in kind, quality and amount; (b) the conditions under which such work is performed are similar or substantially similar; (c) similar or substantially similar qualifications, degrees of skill, effort and responsibility are required; and (d) the differences (if any) between the duties of male and female employees are not of practical importance in relation to terms and conditions of employment or do not occur frequently". The Committee emphasizes that "work of equal value" is different from "similar or substantially similar work". Women and men tend to perform different work or are occupationally segregated in the labour market and, frequently, work performed by women (or mainly by women) is undervalued in comparison to work performed by men (or mainly by men). In this regard, the Committee recalls that the concept of "work of equal value" is fundamental to tackling occupational sex segregation in the labour market, which exists in almost every country, as it permits a broad scope of comparison, including, but going beyond equal remuneration for "equal", "the same" or "similar" work, and also encompasses work that is of an entirely different nature, which is nevertheless of equal value (General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, 2012, paragraphs 673 and following). The Committee notes the Government's indication that, regardless of gender, under the Act of 1975, all categories of workers receive equal pay for equal work. The Committee also notes from the Government's report to the United Nations Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination Against Women (CEDAW) that the Employment (Equal Pay for Men and Women) Act of 1975 is currently under review to ensure that it fulfils its objective of guaranteeing equal remuneration for men and women (CEDAW/C/JAM/8, 5 March 2020, paragraph 94).

Welcoming this information, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure that, as part of the review of the Employment (Equal Pay for Men and Women) Act of 1975 its equal pay provisions are amended and brought in line with the Convention: (i) by giving full legislative expression to the principle of equal pay for men and women for work of equal value and (ii) by extending the application of this principle beyond the same employer. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the steps taken to this end.

Japan

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1967)

The Committee notes the observations of the Japanese Trade Union Confederation (JTUC–RENGO) communicated with the Government's report. It further notes the observations of the Japan Business Federation (NIPPON KEIDANREN) received on 29 August 2019.

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Work of equal value. Legislation. The Committee recalls that the tripartite committee set up by the Governing Body to examine the representation alleging non-observance of the Convention by the Government of Japan concluded that further measures were needed, in cooperation with workers' and employers' organizations, to promote and ensure equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value in law and practice in accordance with Article 2 of the Convention. Thus, in its previous comments, the Committee, while welcoming the adoption of the new Law on the Promotion of Women's Participation and Advancement in the Workplace (Law No. 64 of 2015) which entered into force on 1 April 2016, urged the Government: (1) to take immediate and concrete action to ensure the existence of a legislative framework clearly establishing the right to equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value; and (2) to consider requiring additional data on "the ratio of women's pay to men's pay" to be collected under Law No. 64 of 2015 on the Promotion of Women's Participation and Advancement in the Workplace.

As regards the legislative framework, the Committee notes once again the Government's reference in its report to section 4 of the Labour Standards Act, which provides that "an employer shall not engage in discriminatory treatment of a woman as compared to a man with respect to wages by reason of the worker being a woman" and section 119 which provides for penalties in case of violations. Discriminatory treatment with respect to wages is therefore prohibited when it is based solely on the worker being a woman and also on the general assumption that women's average length of continuous employment is shorter than that of men. According to the Government, as long as the payroll system does not allow discrimination in wages between men and women based only on the sex of the worker, it meets the requirements of the Convention. The Government states in addition that this interpretation has been retained since the ratification of the Convention by Japan in 1967. Once again, the Government refers to the following laws: (1) the Equal Employment Opportunity Law No.113 of 1972 (EEOL), as last amended by Law No. 92 of June 1997, which prohibits discrimination on the basis of sex in terms of the assignment, promotion, and training of workers, loans for housing and other such fringe benefits, change in job type and employment status of workers, mandatory retirement age, dismissal and renewal of the labour contract (sections 6, 7 and 8); and (2) Law No. 64 of 2015 on the Promotion of Women's Participation and Advancement in the Workplace under which employers with 301 or more employees have the obligation, among others, to collect and analyse data on the ratio of women and men within the enterprise in areas such as new hires, hours worked, years of service and classification levels. Following the 2019 amendments, Law No. 64 expanded the obligation to employers with over 101 or more employees. The Government further indicates that, as of the end of December 2018, 99.3 per cent of employers with 301 or more full-time employees have developed action plans to foster the full participation of women in the workplace. The Government provides statistics indicating that the ratio of female employees who occupy management positions above the chief class in private enterprises was 8.7 per cent in 2015 and increased to 9.9 per cent in 2018. According to the Government, the wage disparity between men and women has also been narrowing steadily. The ratio of wages of female workers compared to those of men was 73.6 per cent in 2015 and 74.7 per cent in 2017.

The Committee notes that in its observations the NIPPON KEIDANREN indicates that the difference of remuneration between men and women results mainly from the difference of their rank and their length of service. Therefore, it is important to take into consideration that the number of female managers has increased and the disparity based on the length of service has shortened. The Committee also notes that in its observations, the JTUC–RENGO states that the law provides no response in relation to wage disparities between male and female workers based on career track-related management categories, which is a system that permits a gender-based classification system of employment management in which men are viewed as belonging to a main career track and women to a non-career track. It also fails to provide any remedy when an employer is unable to establish rational grounds for occupational gender segregation after prohibiting discrimination based on gender alone. According to the JTUC-RENGO Survey on Gender Equality in Employment, undertaken in 2017, approximately 40 per cent of both male and female respondents answered that they were doing the same jobs but on different career tracks, and approximately 40 per cent of women working in positions restricted to specific regions indicated that there should be no difference in treatment for the same job despite a different career track. JTUC-RENGO reiterates that, in order to ensure the conformity of the national legislation framework with the core principle of the Convention, section 4 of the Labour Standards Act should clearly state the principle of the Convention.

With regard to the Committee's request to consider adding "the ratio of women's pay to men's pay" as additional data required to be included in the action plans under Law No. 64, the Government indicates that while employers are not required to examine the status of gender disparities in remuneration, they are obliged to examine the level of active participation of women in the workplace, including the differences between men and women in the ratio of management-level employees and length of service, as these elements are considered to be the principal factors of the wage disparity between men and women. According to the Government, such measures will contribute with time to the elimination of horizontal and vertical occupational gender segregation. Regarding the 2019 amendments of Law No. 64, expanding the obligation to collect and analyse data on the ratio of women and men within the enterprise in areas such as new hires, hours worked, years of service and classification levels to employers with 101 or more employees, the JTUC-RENGO considers that the obligation to report on the ratio of female workers should be expanded to small and medium enterprises (SMEs), given that more than 99 per cent of Japanese companies are SMEs, and that the employees of these companies account for approximately 70 per cent of all Japanese workers.

The Committee is bound once again to repeat that the protection against wage discrimination in section 4 of the Labour Standards Act is too limited because it does not capture fully the principle of the Convention, as it does not refer to the element of equal remuneration between men and women for work of equal value which is crucial for an effective application of the Convention. The Committee also recalls that the Equal Employment Opportunity Act, prohibits discrimination in a number of areas such as recruitment, appointment and promotion, but does not directly deal with equal remuneration between men and women for work of equal value. The Committee wishes to highlight once again that the concept of work of equal value lies at the heart of the Convention. It permits a broad scope of comparison, including but going beyond equal remuneration for "equal", "the same" or "similar" work, and also encompasses work that is of an entirely different nature which is nevertheless of equal v*alue* (see General Survey on fundamental Conventions, 2012, para. 673). It follows that the jobs to be compared on the basis of objective factors (such as skills, efforts, responsibilities, conditions of work, etc.) may involve different types of skills, responsibilities or conditions of work that can nevertheless be of equal value in its totality. As such, the principle of the Convention is not equivalent to the principle of non-discrimination as enshrined in section 4 of the Labour Standards Act, which does not encompass the concept of "work of equal value". The Committee therefore once again urges the Government to take the necessary measures to amend the current legislation with a view to giving full expression to the principle of equal remuneration between men and women for work of equal value enshrined in the Convention. It also reiterates its request to the Government to consider adding the ratio of women's level of remuneration to men's as additional data required to be collected by enterprises under the Act on Promotion of Women's Participation and Advancement in the Workplace, as this information could be used as a warning tool by employers to investigate potential wage discrimination. Please provide detailed information on the activities of the labour inspectorate relating to the promotion and application of the principle of equal pay for men and women, as well as on any court decisions regarding wage discrimination under section 4 of the Labour Standards Act that give effect to the Convention's principle.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Workers with Family Responsibilities Convention, 1981 (No. 156) (ratification: 1995)

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020). The Committee proceeded with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the supplementary information received from the Government this year, as well as on the basis of the information at its disposal in 2019.

Special measures to address the impact of COVID-19. In its supplementary information, the Government indicates that a special financial subsidy was put in place to support work and family-life balance in response to COVID-19, particularly applicable to workers affected by school closures. The subsidy is provided when employers allow workers who are guardians of children to take paid leave (excluding statutory annual paid leave) during the temporary closure of elementary schools or other facilities. According to the Government, from April 2020 onwards, an amount equivalent to the regular wages paid to the workers, up to 15,000 Yen (US$ 142) a day, is provided to small and medium enterprises SMEs. Moreover, workers in SMEs are also entitled to paid leave for family care. According to the Government if the total number of days of leave taken by a worker - who needs to take care of his/her family - is of 5 or more but less than 10, an amount of 200,000 Yen (US$ 1890) will be provided, while 350,000 Yen (US$ 3310) will be provided if the total number of days of leave taken per worker is 10 or more. The Committee notes that this measure is applicable for leave taken between April 1, 2020 and December 31, 2020.

The Committee notes the observations of the Japanese Trade Union Confederation (JTUC–RENGO) communicated with the Government's report. It also notes the observations of the Japan Business Federation (NIPPON KEIDANREN) received on 29 August 2019.

Article 2 of the Convention. Application to all categories of workers. Non-regular employees. In its previous comments, the Committee asked the Government to step up its efforts to ensure the effective application of the Convention to non-regular employees, such as fixed-term contract, part-time and dispatched workers in both the private and public sectors. The Government indicates in its report that, the Childcare Leave, Caregiver Leave, and Other Measures for the Welfare of Workers Caring for Children or Other Family Members Act (Childcare and Family Care Leave Act) was amended by Law No.14 of 2017. The amendments allow fixed-term employees to take childcare leave, provided that: (1) the employee has been employed by the same employer continuously for a year or longer at the time of submitting the request for child care leave; and (2) it is unclear whether the employment contract (or the renewed employment contract) will end/expire before the child reaches one year and six months of age. The amendments also allow fixed-term employees to take family care leave, on condition that: (1) the employee has been employed by the same employer continuously for a year or longer, at the time of submitting the request for family care leave; and (2) it is unclear whether the employment contract (or the renewed employment contract) will end/expire six months after the expiration of 93 days from the starting date of the caregiver leave.

According to the Government, a leaflet entitled "Fixed-term Employees who are Eligible for Childcare and Family Care Leave" has been prepared in 2018, as part of the awareness raising campaign on the 2017 amendments. As regards statistical information, the Government indicates that: (1) there is no statistical information on the rate of family leave taken by fixed term workers; (2) the rate of childcare leave taken in 2017 by fixed-term workers was 7.5 per cent for male and 93 per cent for female workers; (3) in 2017, 242 part-time public service workers at the national level took childcare leave, including seven male and 234 female workers; (4) in the same year, 36 part-time public service workers took family leave (4 male and 32 female employees).

The Committee notes the observations of JTUC-RENGO stating that: (1) among women who were in a regular employment relationship prior to pregnancy, only 62.2 per cent are still in a regular employment relationship by the time their first child has reached the age of one and that the proportion of these women who took childcare was 54.7 per cent; and that (2) during the debate leading up to the 2017 amendments, JTUC-RENGO submitted that the conditions placed on taking leave for workers on fixed-term contracts should be abolished, and as a result, some of them (such as the need to show the probability of renewing the employment contract) were relaxed.

The Committee welcomes the legislative efforts undertaken by the Government to enhance the application of the Convention to all workers irrespective of their contractual status. However, it notes from the above statistical information that the rate at which childcare leave taken in 2017 by fixed-term workers is significantly disproportionate between men and women and between regular and non-regular workers. Recalling that the Convention applies to all categories of workers and all branches of economic activity, the Committee urges the Government to ensure that the Convention applies in practice to all categories of workers, in particular to non-regular employees and to provide information on the measures taken in this regard and their impact. The Committee also asks the Government to take the necessary measures to raise awareness among fixed-term workers about the 2017 amendments of the Childcare and Family Leave Act. Lastly, it asks the Government to continue to provide statistical information disaggregated by sex on the number of non-regular workers requesting and receiving childcare and family care leave in the private and public sectors.

Article 4(a). Organization of work. Long working hours. The Committee previously asked the Government to step up its efforts to reduce annual working hours in order to enable men and women with family responsibilities to enter and remain in the labour market. The Committee notes with interest the adoption in 2018 of the "Work Style Reform legislation" which bundles together amendments to eight laws, including the Employment Measures Act No.132 of 1966, the Labour Standards Act No.49 of 1947, and the Working Hours Arrangements Improvement Act No. 90 of 1992 to tackle inter alia the "karoshi" (death by overwork) phenomenon. The Act requires employers to implement specific measures to limit employees' working hours, to ensure that employees take annual leave, and thus create a healthier and more flexible work environment. Concerning overtime, the new law contains among other measures, two rules that set maximum limits on overtime hours: (1) the Basic Limit Rule, which says that overtime hours cannot exceed 45 hours per month or 360 hours per year; and (2) the Extended Limit Rule, which allows employers to extend the basic limit under special circumstances (e.g. an exceptionally busy period, and an unexpected volume of customer complaints or a sudden change in product expectations). The extended limit cannot exceed 100 hours per month and 720 hours per year; and employees may not work, on average, more than 80 hours of overtime per month. The number of months in which the worker works over the Basic Limit cannot exceed six months in a year. Firms that violate these limits face a penalty of up to JPY300 000 (US$2 660) per worker. The Committee notes that highly skilled professional workers may be exempt from the new overtime provisions, and that, because labour shortage in Japan is more severe in certain sectors than in others, the following occupations will be exempt from this law for five years: car drivers, construction workers, doctors, and employees engaged in the research and development of new technology. The Ministry of Health, Labour and Welfare (MHLW) has set different compliance deadlines ranging from April 1, 2019 to April 1, 2023 for different requirements of the Act to give employers sufficient time to amend their work rules and put compliance mechanisms in place depending on the size of the company. In addition to overtime work limits, the Act requires workers who are entitled to at least 10 days of annual leave to take at least five of these days each year. If an employee does not voluntarily choose to use these days, it becomes the employer's responsibility to designate the timing in which the leave must be taken. Moreover, the Guidelines for Review of Working Hours (Guidelines for Improvement of Working Hours Arrangement) were revised to encourage the introduction of the interval system between shifts in response to enforcement of the "Work Style Reform Legislation".

The Committee notes the observations of NIPPON KEIDANREN indicating that the limit of overtime work has been agreed with the trade unions and awareness measures have been taken to promote the take up of paid leave and compliance with the revised laws on working hours. The Government further indicates that in 2017, inspections were carried out to 25,676 workplaces, and among them 11,592 workplaces received guidance for correction and improvement of illegal overtime work.

The Committee welcomes the Government's efforts to change Japan's long working-hour culture, which is a major obstacle to the effective implementation of the Convention. The Committee asks the Government to take proactive measures to ensure the effective application of the "Work Style Reform Legislation" to all workers. The Committee also asks the Government to provide information on the measures taken or envisaged to: (i) strictly enforce overtime work limits introduced in 2019-20; (ii) closely monitor the scheme that exempts skilled professional workers from overtime regulation to avoid excessive working hours; and (iii) introduce a minimum limit on the interval of time between the end of one work day and the beginning of the next work day. The Committee asks the Government to provide statistical information on the number of cases where penalties have been imposed on companies that do not comply with the maximum limits on overtime hours as well as the number of workers affected by the violations, and the amount of penalties imposed.

Articles 4(b) and 5. Childcare and Family leave and facilities. The Committee notes that the 2017 legislative amendments to the Childcare and Family Care Leave Act have also introduced a set of new leave entitlements for both regular and non-regular workers. The latter are now entitled to request an extension of the period of childcare leave until the child reaches two years of age, if the child cannot attend kindergarten. In this regard, a series of initiatives to improve the childcare leave take-up by male workers have been taken, including: (1) the development of a system in which male workers are able to take childcare leave again in cases where they had taken it within eight weeks from the childbirth; (2) the possibility of using the family care leave in a whole or up to three different periods, and (3) the provision of subsidies for companies that encourage male workers to take childcare leave. The Government indicates that, in 2017 the percentage rate of workers who took childcare leave reached 5.14 per cent for male workers, and 83.2 per cent for female workers; whereas, in 2014, this rate was 5.2 per cent and 25.3 per cent respectively. In 2014, the rate of workers who used family care leave reached 1.2 per cent for female workers and 1.1 per cent for male workers; whereas this rate was 2.4 per cent and 3.1 per cent respectively in 2017. Moreover, the number of local public service employees in full-time work who took childcare leave in 2017 was 46,207 (2,750 male and 43,457 female employees), while the number of those who took family care leave in the same year was 2,816 (819 male and 1,997 female employees). The Committee notes that in its observations, JTUC–RENGO expressed concern about the fact that the vast majority of workers who take childcare leave are women and that, such a situation will lead to a reversal of promotion of women's participation. It adds that there is still only a small proportion of men taking childcare leave compared to women, with a rate of 82.2 per cent for women compared to 6.16 per cent for men. This is mainly due to the issue of the number of children waiting to enter authorized day care facilities. JTUC–RENGO indicates that despite the government's plans to expand childcare facilities: in April 2018, 19,895 children were on waiting lists for nursery centres [....]. The major cause of such a situation is the shortage of childcare and nursing workers and their level of remuneration which is lower than the average remuneration for workers in other sectors (around 110,000 yen (900 $US) per month). Although an increase to 3,000 yen (2000 $US) per month was decided in April 2019 following the adoption of the New Economic Policy Package ("the Package"), such a measure is not going to be sufficient to eliminate disparity in wages. JTUC-RENGO recalls that, the Government is required to implement effective policies to quickly resolve the issue of children on day care waiting lists and promote the use of childcare leave by men by providing sufficient quality nursery centres. Referring to the 2017 Ministry of Internal Affairs and Communications' Employment Status Survey, JTUC-RENGO states that 3 million out of the 59.21 million employees in Japan engage in nursing care while working. Of those people, men account for 1.27 million, whereas women account for 1.73 million. Regarding family leave services, JTUC–RENGO expresses the view that, to respond to the needs of an extremely aging population, it is important to balance both work and nursing care and expand leave and time off for nursing care.

In its reply, the Government indicates that it has adopted a number of measures to enhance the establishment of childcare facilities, among them the adoption of: (1) the "New Economic Policy Package" aiming at encouraging people who are engaging in nursing care activities through a pay rise equivalent to 3,000 yen per month; (2) the implementation of the "Acceleration Plan for Elimination of Waiting Children" under which 535,000 childcare facilities were created in 2017; (3) the "Plan for Raising Children with Peace of Mind" adopted in June 2017, under which 320,000 childcare facilities are going to be created by the end of 2020; and (4) the "Comprehensive After-school Plan for Children" which aims at creating additional capacity for about 250,000 children for the period of 2019 to 2021. According to the Government, as of April 2018, 27,916 childcare places were created, and 2,505 children were enrolled. Moreover, in order to enhance the after-school facilities, additional capacity for about 300,000 children spaces will be secured by the end of 2023.

In light of the above, the Committee welcomes the Government's effort to promote greater work-life balance by expanding the leave entitlements to both regular and non-regular workers and enabling a better share of parental leave and family leave, particularly for men. However, it notes that, in practice: (i) women end up taking the majority of these leaves; (ii) a majority of women withdraw from the labour market after the birth of their first child; and (iii) women only enter the labour market once their children have grown up and the burden of bringing up children is reduced, and often then only as non-regular workers in order to be able to take care of ageing parents. Further, the Committee notes that, although the Government had promised to eliminate the lengthy waiting lists for authorized day care centres by 2018, it had to postpone the achievement of this goal to March 2021, and notes that it is a phenomenon compounded by the shortage of childcare workers and the cost of such services. In this regard, it recalls that the lack of quality, affordable care services has been identified by both men and women as one of the biggest challenges for women with family responsibilities who are in paid work, as well as the inflexibility of the hours of care of these services. Referring to its 2019 general observation, the Committee wishes to highlight that it is essential that workers with family responsibilities have access to child and family care facilities meeting the needs of children of different ages, after school care, care for the disabled, and elderly care, that are affordable, accessible to their home and work, responsive to working hours, and provide quality care. The Committee therefore urges the Government to continue to take proactive measures to address effectively: (i) issues that discourage the employment of women; (ii) gender stereotypes, so that more men are encouraged to effectively avail themselves of the new childcare and family care leaves; and (iii) the lack of opportunities/incentives for women to join and remain in the labour market. It also requests the Government to report on the progress made towards reaching the objective of the elimination of waiting lists to facilitate the enrolment of children in day care centres by March 2021 and the measures taken to extend coverage of care services and facilities for other dependent members of the family, as well as the results achieved. The Committee asks the Government to provide statistical information, disaggregated by sex and categories of workers (regular, non-regular) on the extent to which men and women workers make use of the leave entitlements following the amendments of the relevant provisions of the Childcare and Family Care Leave Act No.14.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1966)

Article 1(a) of the Convention. Additional allowances in the public service. The Committee recalls that section 25(b) of Regulation No. 82 of 2013 concerning the Civil Service provides that a family allowance is granted to a married man and in exceptional cases to a woman (if her husband is incapacitated, or if she supports her children or is divorced and does not receive a child allowance for her children below 18 years of age), which constitutes direct discrimination with respect to remuneration contrary to the Convention (see the General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, 2012, paragraph 693). The Committee notes the Government's indication, in its report, that the family allowance does not discriminate on the basis of sex but is paid to the "breadwinner" of the family, whether male or female. In that regard, it wishes to point out to the possibility of allowing both spouses to choose who would benefit from such allowances, rather than starting from the principle that they should systematically be paid to the main "breadwinner", and only in exceptional situations to the other spouse. The Committee recalls that it has been raising this issue since 2001, and it asks the Government to clarify whether the wording of section 25(b) of Regulation No. 82 of 2013, expressly grants the family allowance to the main "breadwinner", whether male or female. If the provision presumes that the man is the "breadwinner" and that women are entitled to the family allowance in exceptional circumstances only, the Committee urges the Government to take steps without delay to amend the Regulation and to ensure that women and men are entitled to all allowances, including the family allowance, on an equal basis. The Government is asked to provide a copy of Regulation No. 82 of 2013.

Article 1(b). Equal remuneration for work of equal value. Legislation. Since 2001, the Committee has been drawing the Government's attention to the need to give full legislative expression to the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value. It previously welcomed the recommendations of the legal review undertaken by the National Steering Committee for Pay Equity (NSCPE) and the July 2013 workshop to amend the provisions of the Labour Code of 1996, and its related Interim Act of 2010, recommending equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value - "including work of a different type", and made reference to the use of objective job evaluation methods to determine whether jobs are of equal value. The Committee notes the Government's statement that section 2 of the Labour Code has been amended to include the concept of wage discrimination based on sex. The Government indicates that a penalty of up to 1,500 Jordanian dinars (JOD) can be imposed for violations of the provision. The Committee notes with satisfaction that section 2 of the Labour Code (Amendments) Act No. 14, 2019, defines non-discrimination in relation to wages as the application of the principle of equal remuneration for work of equal value regardless of gender. The Committee requests the government: (i) to provide information on the application of section 2 of the Labour Code (Amendments) Act No. 14, 2019, in practice, including on the number and nature of violations found by the labour inspectors; and (ii) to indicate how it is ensured that it permits a broad comparison, including, but going beyond equal remuneration for "equal", "the same" or "similar" work, and also encompasses work that is of an entirely different nature, which is nevertheless of equal value.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1963)

Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention. Protection of workers against discrimination. Legislation. The Committee previously asked the Government to provide information on the steps taken to implement the recommendations of the legal review of the National Steering Committee for Pay Equity (NSCPE) as they relate to the Convention with a view to explicitly defining and prohibiting direct and indirect discrimination based on at least all the grounds enumerated in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention in all areas of employment and occupation, and covering all workers. The Committee recalls that there is no provision in Labour Law No. 8 of 1996 explicitly defining and prohibiting direct and indirect discrimination based on all the grounds enumerated in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention. Noting that the report does not provide information in this regard, the Committee wishes to recall that, when legal provisions are adopted to give effect to the principle of the Convention they must include, as a minimum, all the grounds of discrimination listed in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention (2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 853). The Committee therefore urges the Government to take the necessary measures without delay to amend the Labour Law No. 8, 1996, in order to: (i) prohibit direct and indirect discrimination on at least all of the grounds enumerated in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention with respect to all aspects of employment and occupation; and (ii) cover all categories of workers, in both the formal and informal economies, including domestic workers. The Committee also asks the Government to provide information on any progress made in this regard.

Article 1(1)(a). Discrimination based on sex. Sexual harassment. Regarding the adoption of a definition and prohibition of both quid pro quo and hostile environment sexual harassment, the Committees notes the Government's indication in its report that in 2019 a guide to raise awareness of sexual harassment in the workplace was developed by the social partners and the labour inspectorate. The guide includes a definition of violence and sexual harassment in the workplace, indicates the forms that they can take and the mechanisms for dealing with them, in particular by employers, with emphasis on the employer's responsibility to provide a safe and adequate work environment. The Government also refers to: (1) the preparation and adoption of a guiding policy relating to protection against violence and harassment in the world of work under which employers undertake to provide a safe and healthy work environment that is free from all forms of violence, threats of violence, discrimination, harassment, intimidation and any other abusive behaviour; and (2) the introduction of a special clause into enterprise rules requiring them to adopt a policy on protection against violence and harassment in the world of work, in the absence of which the internal rules will not be validated by the labour inspectorate. The Committee notes that section 28(i) of the Labour Law provides that the employer may discharge the employee without notice if the employee physically assaults or humiliates the employer, the manager in charge, one of his superiors, any employees or any other person during work. Section 29(f) also provides that the employee may leave work without notice and still retain "his" legal rights for the termination of service as well as damage compensation if the employer or his or her representative physically or verbally assaults him or her during work. The Committee wishes to draw the Government's attention to the importance of using gender-neutral terminology to avoid perpetuating stereotypes. It further notes that sections 296 to 299 of the Penal Code (Law No. 16 of 1960) establish a penalty of imprisonment in the event of "sexual assault", "indecent flirting or behaviour" offences, "immoral conduct" and "immoral conduct in public places", but do not provide a clear definition of sexual harassment. The Committee further notes the Government's indication that the National Committee on Women's Affairs is working on a number of amendments to the Labour Law aiming to introduce an obligation on employers to develop an anti-harassment policy at the workplace. In the absence of a comprehensive definition and prohibition of sexual harassment in the Labour Law, the Committee recalls the importance of taking effective measures to prevent and prohibit sexual harassment in employment and occupation (2012 General Survey, paragraph 789). The Committee therefore asks the Government to: (i) step up its efforts to ensure that a comprehensive definition and a clear prohibition of both forms of sexual harassment in employment and occupation (quid pro quo and hostile work environment) is included in the Labour Law and to ensure the use of gender-neutral language; (ii) continue taking preventive measures, including awareness-raising initiatives on sexual harassment in employment and occupation and on the social stigma attached to the issue, for workers, employers and their respective organizations, as well as law enforcement officials, specifying the procedures and remedies available; and (iii) provide information on the number, nature and outcome of any complaints or cases of sexual harassment in employment and occupation detected by labour inspectors and dealt with by the courts or any other body.

Article 5. Special protection measures. Restrictions on women's employment. The Committee previously asked the Government to take the opportunity of the ongoing legislative review process to amend section 69 of the Labour Law and Ordinance No. 6828 of 1 December 2010 to ensure that any restrictions on women's employment are limited to maternity in the strict sense, and are not based on stereotypical perceptions of the capabilities of women and their appropriate role in society, which would be contrary to the Convention and constitute obstacles to the recruitment and employment of women. The Government indicates that a Bill amending the Labour Law, including section 69, was submitted to the Chamber of Deputies for adoption and that it is still before Parliament. The Committee asks the Government to review its approach to restrictions on women's employment and to take the necessary steps to ensure that section 69 of the Labour Code and the corresponding Ordinance No. 6828 are modified so that any restrictions on the work that can be done by women are limited to maternity protection in the strict sense, and are not based on stereotypical assumptions regarding their capacity and role in society. It asks the Government to provide information on any progress made in this regard.

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 2001)

Articles 1 and 2. Gender pay gap. The Committee previously asked the Government to provide detailed information on the measures taken or envisaged in order to: (1) reduce the significant gender pay gap; and (2) improve the access of women to a wider range of job opportunities including into higher-level and higher-paid occupations, as well as in sectors in which they are currently absent or under-represented, with a view to reducing inequalities in remuneration that exist between men and women in the labour market. The Committee further asked the Government to provide detailed and up-to-date comparable statistics on earnings of women and men, including sex-disaggregated data by industry and occupational category. The Committee notes the information according to which in 2019: (1) a worker's nominal average monthly remuneration was 186,800 tenge (KZT); (2) for men, the figure was KZT222,500 while for women it amounted to KZT150,800 – that is to, women's remuneration was 67.7 per cent of men's; and (3) where the work has the same characteristics in terms of qualifications and place of work, men and women's remuneration is the same. The Committee also notes the numerous statistical information provided by type of economic activity concerning, amongst other thing: the number of employees, their wage, the index of average monthly wages and real wages, the number of employees and their wages by region, the average monthly salary and real wage index by regions, the average monthly salary and number of employees in the industry by type of economic activity, etc. Finally, the Committee notes that the United Nations Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW), in its 2019 concluding observations, expressed concern that the significant gender pay gap (34 per cent) and the horizontal and vertical segregation in the labour market impede the full achievement of equality at work (doc. CEDAW/C/KAZ/CO/5, 12 November 2019 para. 37(b)). The Committee notes the detailed information provided by the Government, all pointing to the fact that the gender pay gap in the country is still significant. The Committee reiterates therefore its request to the Government for detailed information on the concrete measures taken to improve the access of women to a wider range of job opportunities including into higher-level and higher-paid occupations, as well as in sectors in which they are currently absent or under-represented, in particular in industrial sectors where wages are higher than the national average, such as oil and gas, mining and processing, transport and construction, etc.

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1999)

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government in the light of the decision taken by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020). The Committee reviewed the implementation of the Convention on the basis on the additional information received from the Government this year, as well as the information available to it in 2019.

The Committee notes the observations of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), received on 30 September 2020, on the persistence of gender stereotypes, the definition of discrimination in national law and prohibited grounds of discrimination, gaps in protection against discrimination and enforcement, discrimination in job advertisements, cases of victimization and workplace violence. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments in this regard.

Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention. Prohibited grounds of discrimination. In its previous comment, the Committee requested the Government to: (1) indicate the reasons for the omission of the ground of colour during the revision of the legislation and take the opportunity of any future revision of the Labour Code of 2015 to include colour as a prohibited ground of discrimination in section 6(2); and (2) provide detailed information on the measures taken to ensure effective protection in practice against discrimination based on the grounds enumerated in the Convention, including colour. In its report, the Government indicates that the Ministry of Labour and Social Protection (MTPS) works continuously to improve the labour legislation. The Committee trusts that the Government will take the opportunity of a forthcoming revision of the Labour Code to include the ground of colour in the list of grounds of discrimination that are explicitly prohibited by law. In the meantime, it requests the Government to provide detailed information on the measures taken to ensure in practice effective protection against discrimination based on the grounds listed in the Convention, including colour.

Article 2. Equality of opportunity and treatment for men and women. In its previous comment, the Committee urged the Government to provide: (1) detailed information on the measures taken to promote and ensure in practice equality of opportunity and treatment for men and women in employment and occupation in a wide range of jobs, including high-level jobs and those with career prospects, and (2) information on the distribution of women and men in the various vocational training courses and in education. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government, which indicates the measures taken with regard to women, in particular the number of women as of 1 September 2020 who have benefited from programmes, short courses and loans to start their own businesses. The Committee also notes that the United Nations Committee for the Elimination of Discrimination Against Women (CEDAW) in its concluding observations of 2019 welcomes: (1) the increased representation of women in the judiciary and at different levels of the executive branch and the increased participation of women in political parties; and (2) the progress achieved in promoting access for women to employment. The Committee notes that, according to the information provided to CEDAW, the Government has drawn up a second action plan on family policy and gender equality 2020–2022. The Committee further notes that, according to the CEDAW, this new action plan should refocus the conceptual framework of the State on the promotion and empowerment of women and the implementation of a strong gender equality policy. However, the Committee notes the concerns expressed by the CEDAW with regard to: (1) the postponement to 2030 of the full realization of the goal of 30 per cent representation of women in decision-making posts; (2) the under-representation of women at the ministerial level, in the foreign service, in the armed forces and in local administrations; (3) the low representation of women in the Senate (10.6 per cent), which is presided over by a woman, and at the head of local representative bodies (maslikhat); (4) the low representation of women in the governing bodies of political parties; (5) the lack of disaggregated data on the political participation of women; (6) regional discrepancies in the political representation of women; (7) discriminatory gender stereotypes hindering the participation of women in political and public life; (8) the reports of discrimination in employment and sexual harassment in the workplace, exacerbated by persistent gender stereotypes; (9) the concentration of women in traditional and low-paid sectors of the economy and a glass ceiling that precludes most women from reaching senior management positions; and (10) the limited access to employment and social security schemes for disadvantaged groups of women, such as migrant women, women domestic workers, rural women and women with disabilities (CEDAW/C/KAZ/CO/5, 12 November 2019, paragraphs 29 and 37). Furthermore, the Committee recalls that it previously noted the Law of 2009 on State Guarantees on Equal Rights and Equal Opportunities of Men and Women and the Strategy for Gender Equality 2006–16, the objectives of which include the equal representation of women and men in executive and legislative bodies and in decision-making positions, the expansion of women's entrepreneurship and the increase of women's competitiveness in the labour market. The Committee once again asks the Government to: (i) provide information, including statistics disaggregated by sex, on the impact of the measures taken, particularly in the framework of the Law of 2009 on State Guarantees, in promoting and ensuring in practice equality of opportunity and treatment for men and women in employment and occupation in a wide range of occupations, including high-level jobs and those with career prospects; and (ii) provide information on the distribution of men and women in the various vocational training programmes and in education. Lastly, the Committee requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged in the framework of the second action plan 2020–22 to implement the principle of equality of opportunity and treatment for men and women enshrined in the Convention.

Equality of opportunity and treatment for national, ethnic and religious minorities. In its previous comment, the Committee urged the Government to: (1) provide information on the conditions of access of national, ethnic and religious minorities to the public service, and particularly the linguistic requirements, and (2) take the necessary steps to collect and analyse data, disaggregated by branch of activity and occupation, on the distribution of men and women belonging to the various minorities in the public and private sectors, as well as their participation at different levels of vocational training and education. Noting with regret that the Government's report does not contain a specific reply to the questions raised previously, the Committee is bound to repeat its request. The Committee once again urges the Government to: (i) provide information on the measures taken with regard to the conditions of access of national, ethnic and religious minorities to the public service, and particularly the linguistic requirements; and (ii) take the necessary measures to collect and analyse data, disaggregated by sector and occupation, illustrating the distribution of men and women belonging to various minorities in the public and private sectors, as well as their participation in the various levels of vocational training and education.

Articles 2 and 3. National equality policy. The Committee notes the following progress welcomed by the CEDAW: (1) the adoption in 2019 of the National plan for the period up to 2025 to ensure the rights and improve the livelihoods of persons with disabilities; (2) the Forum for rural women to promote, amongst other things, entrepreneurship by women, held in 2018; and (3) the implementation of the "Women in Business" programme, conducted jointly with the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development, which is focused on providing concessional credit to businesses run by women (CEDAW/C/KAZ/CO/5, 12 November 2019, paragraph 5). The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the specific measures taken to implement these various programmes, the impact of these measures on the professional situation of people with disabilities and rural women and the development of female entrepreneurship.

Article 5. Special protection measures. Restrictions on the employment of women. In its previous comment, while noting the Government's wish to protect women's health and safety, the Committee urged the Government to: (1) take the necessary measures to guarantee equality of opportunity and equal protection in terms of health and safety for men and women, and to review the list of occupations prohibited for women that is currently in force so that measures to protect women in employment are limited to the protection of maternity in the strict sense of the term and do not reflect gender stereotypes about the capacities and role of women in society and in the family; and (2) provide information on the measures taken to consult workers' organizations and employers and the results of such consultations. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the MTPS has updated the list of jobs that women cannot do with the aim of bringing it into line with contemporary working conditions, which have improved in a significant number of workplaces in order to guarantee them access to jobs that are not a threat to their health as a result of automation and the introduction of technology. The Government adds that this list of jobs has been reduced by 33 per cent and will continue to be shortened and updated as scientific and technical progress is made. The Committee welcomes the Government's efforts to gradually reduce the list of jobs prohibited for women. The Committee requests the Government to indicate to what extent the social partners are consulted during the process of revising the list, and to provide a copy of the revised list. The Government is requested to provide information on the jobs that are now open to women and to specify whether the removal of prohibitions on jobs to which women have access has been covered by information campaigns.

Republic of Korea

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1997)

The Committee takes note of the Government's report and the supplementary information provided in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020).

The Committee also notes the observations of the Federation of Korean Trade Unions (FKTU), communicated with the Government's report, as well as the observations of the Korean Confederation of Trade Unions (KCTU) received on 20 September 2019. It further notes the observations of the KCTU communicated with the Government's supplementary information, as well as the comments of the Government on those observations.

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Legislation. The Committee recalls that section 8(1) of the Equal Employment Opportunity and Work–Family Balance Assistance Act (previously referred to as the "Act on Equal Employment and Support for Work–Family Reconciliation") only provides for equal wages for work of equal value "in the same business" and that the Equal Treatment Regulation (No. 422) limits the possibility of comparing work performed by men and women to "work of a similar nature". In its last comment, in light of the persistent and high gender pay gap, the Committee urged the Government once again to take the necessary steps to bring the above-mentioned Act and Regulation into full conformity with the Convention. It also asked the Government to continue to provide statistical information on the gender pay gap. In its report, the Government recalls that: (1) since its enactment in 1997, the Regulations on Handling Work related to Equal Employment Opportunity (No. 117) have specified that two jobs which are somewhat different but are recognized as of equal value in essence according to job evaluation constitute "work of equal value"; (2) in 2013, the concept of "work of similar value" was added to the Regulations to provide a clearer standard for equal pay for work of equal value (according to article 4.1 of these Regulations, work of equal value refers to comparable jobs done by men and women which are of "equal or similar" value in terms of required skills, efforts, responsibilities, working conditions, etc.); and that (3) additionally, in 2019, the scope of application of the "provision on prohibition of wage discrimination on grounds of gender" was expanded from workplaces with five employees and more to all workplaces.

The Committee notes that, on 14 March 2019, the Korean Supreme Court held that there must be no "unreasonable" discriminatory treatment based on other circumstances that are not related to work, as well as a prohibition on wage discrimination based on social status or gender under the Labour Standards Act and the Equal Employment Opportunity and Work–Family Balance Assistance Act (Case 2015 Du 46321). In that case, the Supreme Court ruled that paying different lecture fees to full-time lecturers and to part-time lecturers constitutes "unreasonable" discrimination for a circumstance that is not related to work, and is in violation of the principles of "equal treatment and equal pay for equal work", and thus, are invalid. While welcoming this decision, the Committee notes that the principle of equal pay for equal work upheld by the Court is narrower than the principle laid down in the Convention, as it does not give expression to the concept of equal pay for work of equal "value", within the meaning of Article 1 of the Convention. While noting the various initiatives undertaken by the Government to promote the principle of equal remuneration between men and women workers and to reduce occupational segregation, the Committee wishes to point out that, where legislation forms part of a comprehensive approach toward the elimination of gender-based salary discrimination, it is crucial that such legislation be effective and ensure the application of the principle of equal remuneration for men and women workers for work of equal value, within the meaning of Article 1 of the Convention. The Committee urges the Government to ensure that its legal framework does not only provide for equal remuneration for equal, the same or similar work, but also address situations where men and women perform different work that is nevertheless of equal value, so as not to hinder progress in eradicating gender-based pay discrimination. In this regard, it asks the Government to provide an updated list of the provisions (legislative, regulatory or otherwise) implementing the principle of the Convention, that is to say ensuring that: (i) men and women receive equal remuneration for work of equal "value"; and (ii) the scope of comparison between men and women extends beyond the same establishment or enterprise.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1998)

The Committee takes note of the Government's report and the supplementary information provided in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020).

The Committee also notes the observations of the Federation of Korean Trade Unions (FKTU) and the Korea Employers' Federation (KEF), communicated with the Government's report, as well as the observations of the Korean Confederation of Trade Unions (KCTU) received on 20 September 2019. It further notes the observations of the KCTU and the KEF, communicated with the Government's supplementary information, as well as the comments of the Government on those observations.

Article 1 of the Convention. Discrimination on the basis of political opinion. Schoolteachers. The Committee recalls that, in its previous comment, it stated that, insofar as political activities undertaken by elementary, primary and secondary school teachers are held outside of the school establishment and are unrelated to teaching, a general prohibition of political activities does not constitute an inherent requirement within the meaning of Article 1(2) of the Convention and concluded that disciplinary measures against teachers who engage in such activities constitute discrimination on the ground of political opinion, contrary to the Convention. Consequently, it urged the Government to take immediate steps to ensure that elementary, primary and secondary school teachers enjoy protection against discrimination based on political opinion in conformity with the Convention, as well as measures to ensure that teachers are not subject to disciplinary measures for such reasons. The Committee notes that, once again, the Government recalls that the Korean Constitution guarantees the political neutrality of elementary, primary and secondary education and refers to decisions of the Constitutional Court of 2012 and 2014 in this regard and to its decision of 23 April 2020 maintaining that the prohibition of elementary, primary and secondary teachers to join any political party or other political organization (according to article 65.1 of the State Public Officials Act) is constitutional. The Committee cannot but reiterate that, although in certain circumstances restrictions with respect to political opinion might constitute a bona fide qualification for certain posts (an inherent requirement of the job), it is essential that such restrictions are not carried beyond certain limits. This is because such practices may come into conflict with the Convention's provisions that require the implementation of a policy designed to eliminate discrimination on the basis of political opinion, in particular in respect of public employment (General Survey of 2012 on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 831). The Committee notes the Government's indication that a number of amendment bills to guarantee public officials' and teachers' political freedom, such as political party membership and the right to participate in election campaigns, are pending before the National Assembly. The Committee also notes the Government's commitment to ensuring that the Committee's requests are discussed. In this regard, the Committee notes the KCTU's observations that bills introduced in 2017 to reform the State Public Officials Act (SPOA), the Local Public Officials Act (LPOA) and the Public Official Election Act (POEA) are still pending before the competent standing committee, despite recommendations from the National Human Rights Commission of Korea that these laws be amended. Recalling that the protection of opinions which are neither expressed nor demonstrated would be futile, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the status of these amendments. It urges the Government to take concrete steps to ensure that schoolteachers enjoy protection against discrimination based on political opinion, as provided for in the Convention.

Inherent requirements of the job. Political opinion and public officials. In its previous comment, the Committee asked the Government to: (1) consider limiting the prohibition of political activities to certain positions and therefore consider the possibility of adopting a list of jobs in the public service for which political opinion would be an inherent requirement; and (2) in the meantime, provide information on the practical application of section 65(1) of the State Public Officials Act. The Committee notes the Government's acknowledgment that the freedom of civil servants in terms of their expression of political opinion and activities is limited in accordance with article 7 of the Constitution which provides that: "(1) all public officials shall be servants of the entire people and shall be responsible to the people; and (2) the status and political impartiality of public officials shall be guaranteed". It adds that this should be understood with the purpose of the career civil service system in mind, whereby public officials are recruited based on required qualifications for a certain grade and not with a specific position in view. It is only at a later stage that specific tasks and positions are allocated. The Government argues that, due to this specific characteristic of the Korean career civil service, it would be difficult to identify in advance and list the specific tasks which could be subject to limitations regarding political activities and opinion. It adds, however, that it fully understands the need for guaranteeing greater freedom of political expression to public officials and commits, when the National Assembly starts the process of revising the relevant legislation in the future, to support actively this process in order to ensure that an in-depth discussion takes place. In the supplementary information provided, the Government refers to the decision of the Constitutional Court of 23 April 2020 which ruled that the prohibition on forming or joining a political party was constitutional "as it is designed to ensure political neutrality of their service as servants to all citizens" but considered that the prohibition on forming or joining "any other political organization" was unconstitutional because it was too ambiguous. In this regard, the Government states that it will amend the State Public Officials Act in order to ensure clarity and the political neutrality of public officials. With regard to the practical application of the SPOA, the Government states that, among public officials who faced disciplinary action for violating section 65(1) over the period 2015–19, no official in general service (including teachers) has been the subject to disciplinary action for violating the prohibition of political party membership. The Committee notes, however, the KCTU's observation that teachers were indicted in 2015 and 2017 for the alleged violation of section 66 of the SPOA which prohibits public officials from engaging in any collective activity for any labour campaign or activities other than public services; and that these cases are still pending in court. It adds that several trade unions have requested that the provisions in several acts which excessively restrict the right of political activities of public officials be revised. The Committee wishes to recall that, in cases in which one of the criteria cited by the Convention is taken into consideration in determining the inherent requirements of a job, an objective reappraisal should be made in order to determine whether these prerequisites are really justified by the requirements of the job. Consequently, it cannot but reiterate that political opinion may be taken into consideration as a prerequisite justified by the inherent requirements of a given job, only if this restriction applies to a narrow range of jobs and not for the entire public sector. The Committee asks the Government, once again, to consider limiting the prohibition of political activities to certain positions and therefore to consider the possibility of adopting, in the near future, a list of jobs in the public service for which political opinion would be considered an inherent requirement. It asks the Government to provide information on any developments made in this regard, including before the National Assembly.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Workers with Family Responsibilities Convention, 1981 (No. 156) (ratification: 2001)

The Committee takes note of the Government's report and the supplementary information provided in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020).

The Committee also notes the observations of the Federation of Korean Trade Unions (FKTU) and the Korea Employers' Federation (KEF), communicated with the Government's report, as well as the observations of the Korean Confederation of Trade Unions (KCTU) received on 20 September 2019. It further notes the observations of the KEF communicated with the Government's supplementary information.

Article 3 of the Convention. National policy. Legislative developments. In its previous comment, the Committee requested the Government to provide information on: (1) the application of the Framework Act on Gender Equality, 2014 as amended, and the Equal Employment Opportunity and Work-Family Balance Assistance Act, 2007 as amended; (2) the concrete measures taken in application of several plans aiming at gender equality in employment and support to workers with family responsibilities; and (3) the family-friendly company certification system, indicating the criteria taken into account and process to award the certification to a corporation. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government in its report, notably the implementation of the Second Basic Plan for Gender Equality Policies (2018-2022) to ensure equal rights and opportunities of men and women and create a society that promotes work-life balance, the setting up of a gender equality committee and yearly implementation plans. It notes with interest that the scope of application of the Equal Employment Opportunity and Work-Family Balance Assistance Act, which used to be limited to businesses with five employees or more, has been extended to all workplaces, except those constituted only by relatives living together and housekeeping employees (Article 2 of the Presidential Decree No. 28910 of May 28, 2018), and that the paternity leave, under article 18-2 of the Act, has been extended from five to ten days in August 2019.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that it has established and implemented the "Women's Employment Plan" as the Sixth Basic Plan for Equal Employment Opportunities, focusing on three aspects (preventing career breaks, supporting reemployment after a career break and creating a non-discriminatory working environment) with seven major projects and 64 implementation strategies. It has taken measures to increase support and quality of childcare and nursery services and guaranteed workers' maternal and parental rights by eliminating blind spots in maternity and parental leave (notably by raising the benefits after the first three months of childcare leave, up to 50 per cent of the ordinary wage, and allowing workers who have worked for less than one year to take childcare leave). It also promoted family-friendly business management by raising public awareness on the issue, enhancing support and guidance for companies to promote work-life balance, strengthening public-private cooperation and promoting a culture of leaving work on time. According to the Government, the results of a 2018 implementation monitoring survey show enhanced support for childcare and the spread of a 'work-life balance' culture. The Government introduced child benefit in the amount of 100,000 won per month (USD80) for families in the bottom 90 per cent of income-earners and expanded the childcare support infrastructure (12 new community childcare centers, 574 public kindergartens and 238 public childcare centers). It also improved the childcare support system, notably for vulnerable families, by upgrading in-home childcare services and increasing childcare expense support for single-parent families. Finally, it raised the ceiling for father's childcare leave bonus schemes and increased the income replacement rate of benefits for reduced working hours during childcare periods (up to 80 per cent); implemented a vacation support program for workers and encouraged more companies to apply for a "family-friendly enterprise certification" (3,833 as of January 2020, compared to 2,807 in 2017). The Committee notes the information provided by the Government on the criteria taken into account and the process to award such certification.

The Committee welcomes such initiatives, as well as the implementation of the Second Basic Plan for the Promotion of Economic Activities of Career-interrupted Women (2015-2018) and the coming into force of the third Basic Plan (2020-2024). The Committee notes that many of these initiatives are geared specifically towards women and that even the names of some of the plans and initiatives reveal the correlation between caregiving duties (especially towards children) and female workers. The Committee wishes to recall that the Convention, and its accompanying Recommendation (the Workers with Family Responsibilities Recommendation, 1981 (No. 165)), have the dual objective of creating equality of opportunity and treatment in working life between men and women with family responsibilities, on the one hand, and between men and women with such responsibilities and workers without such responsibilities, on the other. Where inequalities exist between men and women workers regarding their family responsibilities and where that situation results in restricting the economic activity of women workers only, it would be legitimate to aim measures at women, provided that men are not formally barred from access to such measures should they find themselves in the same circumstances (see General Survey of 1993 on workers with family responsibilities, paras 25 to 29). The Committee also notes the observations made by FKTU and KCTU regarding the fact that family obligations are still overwhelmingly associated with, and carried out by, women and that female workers' careers are disproportionately impacted.

In view of the above, the Committee requests the Government: (i) to indicate the concrete measures taken to promote equality of opportunity and treatment in employment for men and women workers with family responsibilities as well as between workers with family responsibilities and those without such responsibilities; (ii) to indicate, more particularly, how it is ensured that those family-friendly measures do not reinforce the stereotype predominantly associating family responsibilities to female workers and create a feminization of diverse forms of employment and working arrangements; and (iii) to continue to provide information on any new legislative or policy development with a view to implementing the Convention.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Kuwait

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1966)

Article 1 of the Convention. Definition and prohibition of discrimination in employment and occupation. Legislation and practice. For a number of years, the Committee has been urging the Government to take the necessary measures to explicitly prohibit direct and indirect discrimination based on race, sex, colour, religion, political opinion, national extraction and social origin: with respect to all aspects of employment and occupation, namely access to vocational training, employment and particular occupations, and terms and conditions of employment; and covering all workers (that is, both nationals and non-nationals, in all sectors of activity, in the public and the private sectors, and in the formal and informal economy). The Government indicates in its report that Labour Law No. 6 of 2010 provides in sections 2 and 6 for the principle of equal treatment for all workers, as section 2 provides that "[t]he provisions of this Law shall apply to all workers in the private sector" and section 6 establishes that, "[w]ithout prejudice to any more advantageous benefits and rights granted to workers in individual or collective contracts, special regulations or by-laws observed by the employer or in accordance with professional or general customs, the provisions of this Law shall represent the minimum level of workers' rights." Section 46 provides that: "The service of the worker shall not be terminated without any justification or as a result of his activity in the syndicate or a claim or his legal rights in accordance with the provisions of the law. The service of the worker may not be terminated for reason of gender, race or religion." The Committee takes due note of section 46 of the Labour Law, which prohibits discrimination in the case of termination of employment on the basis of three grounds, namely gender, race and religion. However, the Committee recalls in this respect that the prohibition of discrimination in employment and occupation must cover all aspects of employment and occupation and encompass the seven prohibited grounds of discrimination listed in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention. The Committee once again urges the Government to take the necessary measures without delay to: (i) explicitly prohibit in the Labour Law direct and indirect discrimination based on race, sex, colour, religion, political opinion, national extraction and social origin with respect to all aspects of employment and occupation, including recruitment, and covering all workers; and (ii) ensure that all workers are protected in practice against all forms of discrimination, in employment and occupation, and provide full information in this respect.

Article 1(1)(a). Discrimination based on sex. Sexual harassment. The Committee recalls that the Government referred in a previous report to sections 191 and 192 of the Penal Code, which establishes the offence, subject to penalties, of "dishonouring another person under threat, by force or deceit". For a number of years, the Committee has been emphasizing that addressing sexual harassment only through criminal proceedings is not normally sufficient, due to the sensitivity of the issue, the higher burden of proof, which is harder to meet, and the fact that criminal law generally focuses on sexual assault or "immoral acts", and not the full range of behaviour that constitutes sexual harassment in employment and occupation (2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 792). In its previous comment, it therefore asked the Government to adopt provisions: (1) defining and prohibiting both quid pro quo and hostile working environment sexual harassment; and (2) establishing remedies and sanctions. In the absence of further information on these points, the Committee recalls once again that the provisions of the Penal Code do not address the full range of behaviour that constitutes sexual harassment in employment and occupation and that criminal proceedings are not normally sufficient to eliminate sexual harassment in these specific areas. The Committee also recalls that sexual harassment is a serious manifestation of sex discrimination and a violation of human rights, and requires effective measures to prevent and prohibit it, which should address both quid pro quo and hostile environment sexual harassment (2012 General Survey, paragraph 789). The Committee further notes that in its 2017 concluding observations, the United Nations Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW) expressed concern at the absence of legislation criminalizing sexual harassment in the workplace and recommended the amendment of the Private Sector Labour Act, the Civil Service Act and the Police Force Order Act in order to criminalize sexual harassment in the workplace and ensure effective access to legal redress for victims of sexual harassment (CEDAW/C/KWT/CO/5, paragraphs 36 and 37). In light of the above, the Committee once again urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that a comprehensive definition and a clear prohibition of both forms of sexual harassment (quid pro quo and hostile work environment) in employment and occupation is included in the Labour Law. It also asks the Government to: (i) take preventive measures, including awareness-raising initiatives on sexual harassment in employment and occupation and on the social stigma attached to this issue, among workers, employers and their respective organizations, as well as law enforcement officials, including the respective procedures, compensation and penalties; and (ii) provide information on the number, nature and outcome of cases of sexual harassment in employment and occupation dealt with by labour inspectors, the courts or any other competent authority.

Migrant workers. Sponsorship system. The Committee previously noted that Kuwait's sponsorship system (kafala), under which the legal status of migrant workers is tied to their employers, who act as their sponsors for obtaining a visa, has not been abolished, and it requested the Government to provide information on the concrete steps taken or envisaged to review the sponsorship system. It notes that the Government's report is silent on this subject. In this respect, the Committee notes that, in its 2017 concluding observations, the CEDAW recommended the Government to "continue efforts to completely abolish the kafala (sponsorship) system" (CEDAW/C/KWT/CO/5, paragraph 37). The Committee wishes to underline that, where a system of employment of migrant workers places those workers in a particularly vulnerable position and provides employers with the opportunity to exert disproportionate power over them, this could result in discrimination based on the grounds enumerated in the Convention, including race, colour, national extraction and sex (2012 General Survey, paragraph 779). The Committee asks the Government to take proactive steps to ensure that all migrant workers, including women migrant workers, enjoy effective protection against discrimination on the grounds set out in the Convention, namely race, colour, sex, religion, political opinion, social origin and national extraction. The Committee also asks the Government to provide statistical information on the number of men and women workers who have submitted complaints against their employers or sponsors regarding discrimination and abuse, and the outcome of the cases, indicating whether they have requested and been granted a change of workplace.

Stateless persons or residents without nationality (Bidoons). In its previous comments, the Committee asked the Government to provide information on: (1) the results of the implementation of the road map adopted by the Council of Ministers (Resolution No. 1612/2010); (2) the measures taken to ensure that all stateless persons or residents without nationality (Bidoons) are protected against discrimination in employment and occupation, including in access to employment, on the grounds set out in the Convention; and (3) to provide statistical information on the number of Bidoons living in the country and on their employment status. The Government indicates that the Central System, within the meaning of Law No. 68 of 2015, for stateless persons and residents without nationality, who are referred to by the Government as "illegal residents", is working intensively on the implementation of the road map, in addition to providing civil, cultural and social services and facilities for stateless persons. The Government adds that, by virtue of the Council of Ministers Decision No. 309 of 2011, the Central System provides numerous services to "illegal residents", including free education, free treatment and issuing all official documents (birth and death certificates, marriage and divorce contracts and authentic certificates). Collaboration is also ongoing between the Central System and the Civil Service (Diwan), the Public Authority, the Federation of Cooperative Societies and the Kuwait Ports Authority. The collaboration has resulted in jobs being found for stateless people in response to the needs of the labour market. According to the Government, 324 stateless persons were appointed to government bodies and 600 were appointed to the Kuwait Petroleum Corporation and its companies in 2018. In addition, with the collaboration of the Ministry of Defence, some of them were enrolled in the military. The Committee notes the measures taken by the Government to provide employment for stateless persons and residents without nationality, but points out that it does not indicate how they are protected against discrimination in employment and occupation. The Committee asks the Government to: (i) take the necessary measures to ensure that all stateless persons and residents without nationality (Bidoons) are protected in practice against discrimination in employment and occupation based on the grounds prohibited by the Convention in access to education, vocational training and employment; and (ii) provide more detailed information on the results of the implementation of the road map adopted by the Council of Ministers (Resolution No. 1612/2010).

General observation of 2018. With regard to the above issues, and in more general terms, the Committee would like to draw the Government's attention to its general observation on discrimination based on race, colour and national extraction which was adopted in 2018. In the general observation, the Committee notes with concern that discriminatory attitudes and stereotypes based on the race, colour or national extraction of men and women workers continues to hinder their participation in education, vocational training programmes and access to a wider range of employment opportunities, resulting in persisting occupational segregation and lower remuneration received for work of equal value.

Furthermore, the Committee considers that it is necessary to adopt a comprehensive and coordinated approach to tackling the obstacles and barriers faced by persons in employment and occupation because of their race, colour or national extraction, and to promote equality of opportunity and treatment for all. Such an approach should include the adoption of interlocking measures aimed at addressing gaps in education, training and skills, providing unbiased vocational guidance, recognizing and validating the qualifications obtained abroad, and valuing and recognizing traditional knowledge and skills that may be relevant both to accessing and advancing in employment and to engaging in an occupation. The Committee also recalls that, in order to be effective, these measures must include concrete steps, such as laws, policies, programmes, mechanisms and participatory processes, remedies designed to address prejudices and stereotypes and to promote mutual understanding and tolerance among all sections of the population.

The Committee draws the Government's attention to its general observation of 2018 and requests the Government to provide information in response to the questions raised in that observation.

Article 2. National equality policy. In the absence of information on the progress made in the adoption of a national equality policy, the Committee recalls that: (1) the primary obligation of ratifying States is to declare and pursue a national policy designed to promote equality of opportunity and treatment in respect of employment and occupation with a view to eliminating any discrimination; and (2) the implementation of a national equality policy presupposes the adoption of a range of specific measures, which often consist of a combination of legislative and administrative measures, collective agreements, public policies, affirmative action measures, dispute resolution and enforcement mechanisms, specialized bodies, practical programmes and awareness-raising (2012 General Survey, paragraphs 841 and 848). The Committee therefore once again asks the Government to take the necessary measures to formulate, in collaboration with employers' and workers' organizations, and adopt a national equality policy covering all workers aimed at eliminating discrimination in employment and occupation on all the grounds covered by the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the progress made in this regard.

Article 5. Special protection measures. Work prohibited for women. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the Government's indication that sections 22 and 23 of the Labour Law, which prohibit the employment of women at night, with some exceptions, and in work that is hazardous, arduous or harmful to health or violates public morals, are intended to protect women workers in general, and particularly pregnant women. The Committee requested the Government to take measures to ensure that protective measures applicable to women are limited to maternity protection in the strict sense, or based on occupational safety and health (OSH) risk assessments and do not constitute obstacles to the employment of women. The Government's report does not contain any information in this respect, except a reference the provisions of Chapter 4 of the Labour Law on maternity protection and occupational safety and health. The Committee once again recalls that protective measures for women may be broadly categorized into those aimed at protecting maternity, in the strict sense, which come within the scope of Article 5, and those aimed at protecting women generally because of their sex or gender, based on stereotypical perceptions about their capabilities and appropriate role in society, which are contrary to the Convention and constitute obstacles to the recruitment and employment of women. The Committee further recalls that it considers that provisions relating to the protection of persons working under hazardous or difficult conditions should be aimed at protecting the health and safety of both men and women at work, while taking account of gender differences with regard to specific risks to their health (2012 General Survey, paragraphs 839 and 840). Therefore, any restrictions on women's access to work based on health and safety considerations must be justified and based on scientific evidence and, when in place, must be periodically reviewed in light of technological developments and scientific progress to determine whether they are still necessary for protection purposes. The Committee urges the Government to: (i) review its approach regarding restrictions on women's employment in light of the above principles to ensure that any protective measures taken are limited to maternity protection in the strict sense, or are based on occupational safety and health risk assessments and do not constitute obstacles to the employment of women; and (ii) supply information on any developments in this regard.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Lao People's Democratic Republic

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 2008)

Articles 1. 2 and 3 of the Convention. Protection of workers against discrimination. Legislation. Scope of application. The Committee previously noted that the Labour Law (2014) excludes civil servants, among others, from its application and that, according to the Government, the Law on Government Officials No. 74/NA of 2015 prohibits discrimination against government officials. It also noted that, by requiring domestic workers to "comply with the working contract", section 6 excludes them from the protection of the Labour Law. Recalling that the principle of the Convention applies to all workers, the Committee asked the Government to indicate how civil servants and domestic workers are protected against discrimination in employment and occupation. The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that the contract between domestic workers and their employers is governed by specific regulations. The Government adds that the Ministry of Labour and Social Welfare is drafting a Decision on the management of domestic workers, which will be in conformity with the Convention. The Committee therefore asks the Government to provide detailed information on the specific regulations that apply to domestic workers, to which the Government refers, and to indicate how these regulations protect them from discrimination in employment and occupation on the grounds set out in the Convention. It also asks the Government to provide information on the draft Ministerial Decision on the management of domestic workers. Noting the Government's indication that the Law on Government Officials No. 74/NA of 2015 is only available in Lao, the Committee asks the Government to provide a copy of the Law and to identify the specific provisions that protect civil servants from discrimination in employment and occupation on the grounds set out in the Convention.

Article 1(1)(a). Prohibition of discrimination. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the Labour Law 2014, reforming the Labour Law 2007, prohibits direct and indirect discrimination in the workplace in general terms (sections 3(28) and 141(9)), without clearly defining direct and indirect discrimination. In addition, while there are provisions prohibiting gender discrimination, the Committee noted that the Labour Law 2014 no longer explicitly prohibits discrimination on the grounds of race, religion and belief, as previously provided for in section 3(2) of the Labour Law 2007, nor does it prohibit discrimination based on colour, political opinion, national extraction or social origin. The Committee notes the Government's reply, referring to article 35 of the Constitution (as revised in 2015), which provides that "Lao Citizens are equal before the law, irrespective of their gender, social status, education, beliefs and ethnic group". It also notes the Government's very general statement that it promotes equal rights for all persons without discrimination. The Committee is therefore once again bound to recall the importance of clear and comprehensive definitions of what constitutes discrimination and, in particular, of what constitutes direct and indirect discrimination, in identifying and addressing its many manifestations (2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraphs 743–745). In addition, recalling that the Labour Law 2014 only appears to prohibit discrimination by employers towards employees, the Committee once again draws the Government's attention to the fact that the Convention covers a wider range of situations, including the situation of discrimination by an employee towards another employee. Finally, the Committee again emphasizes that, where legal provisions are adopted to give effect to the Convention, they should include at least all the grounds set out in Article 1(1)(a), namely race, colour, sex, religion, political opinion, national extraction and social origin (2012 General Survey, paragraph 853). The Committee once again asks the Government to clarify whether the prohibition of discrimination concerns both employment and occupation and applies equally to employers and employees. It also asks the Government to take steps to amend the Labour Law 2014to clearly define direct and indirect discrimination, and explicitly prohibit discrimination on at least all the grounds set out in the Convention, and to provide information on the progress achieved to this end. In the meantime, the Committee once again asks the Government to indicate how workers are protected in practice against direct and indirect discrimination on all the grounds set out in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention.

Discrimination based on sex. Sexual harassment. The Committee previously noted that section 83(4) of the Labour Law 2014 allows a worker to bring an end to the employment contract in the event of harassment or sexual harassment by the employer, or when the employer ignores sexual harassment, and that section 141(4) prohibits employers from violating the personal rights of employees, especially women employees, by means of speech, sight, text, touch or touching inappropriate areas. The Committee however noted that sexual harassment is not explicitly defined and prohibited in the Labour Law 2014, and that it is unclear how the above provisions protect workers from all forms of sexual harassment in employment and establish adequate remedies and sanctions. In reply to the Committee's request for information on the measures taken by the Government to define, prevent and prohibit sexual harassment at work, the Government replied that rape is prohibited by sections 128 and 129 of the Penal Law 2005. The Committee therefore recalled that addressing sexual harassment only through criminal proceedings is normally not sufficient, due to the sensitivity of the issue, the higher standard of proof applicable, which is harder to meet, especially if there are no witnesses, and the fact that criminal law generally focuses on sexual assault or "immoral acts", and does not cover the full range of behaviour that constitutes sexual harassment in employment and occupation (2012 General Survey, paragraph 792). The Committee notes with regret that the Government has not replied to its previous requests. The Committee also notes, from the concluding observations of 2018 of the United Nations Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW), the persistent barriers, including stigma, fear of retribution, deep-rooted discriminatory gender stereotypes and limited legal literacy, that deter women and girls from registering their complaints regarding gender-based discrimination and sexual harassment (CEDAW/C/LAO/CO/8-9, 14 November 2018, paragraph 13(a)). The Committee therefore once again asks the Government to take action to: (i) define, prevent and prohibit sexual harassment in employment and occupation, both quid pro quo and hostile working environment harassment; (ii) provide for adequate sanctions and remedies; and (iii) provide information on the progress achieved in this regard. In the meantime, it asks the Government to provide information on the application in practice of sections 83(4) and 141(4) of the Labour Law 2014, including with respect to cases of sexual harassment. With a view to raising awareness of the issue, the Committee once again encourages the Government to formulate and implement practical measures to prevent and eliminate sexual harassment in employment and occupation, in cooperation with employers' and workers' organizations, such as through practical guidance, training, seminars or other awareness-raising activities, and to provide information on any progress made to this end. Finally, with regard to enforcement, the Committee takes note of the Government's statement that there have been no reports of sexual harassment cases and refers to its comments in its direct request.

Article 1(1)(b). Additional grounds of discrimination. The Committee previously noted that sections 87(1), 100 and 141(2) of the Labour Law 2014 provide protection against discrimination on the basis of pregnancy, marital status and HIV status in recruitment and termination of employment, but no longer prohibit discrimination based on nationality, age or socio-economic status, which were previously included in the Labour Law 2007. Noting that the Government has once again not provided information on this subject, the Committee is bound to reiterate its request to the Government to indicate the measures taken, in consultation with employers' and workers' organizations, with a view to maintaining the same level of protection against discrimination on the basis of nationality, age or socio-economic status as previously contained in the Labour Law 2007 with respect to all aspects of employment.

Article 4. Activities prejudicial to the security of the State. The Committee has repeatedly asked the Government to provide information on the application in practice of section 65 of the Penal Law 2005, which establishes a broad prohibition of activities considered to be prejudicial to the security of the State, including "propaganda activities", and to indicate how it ensures that this provision does not result in practice in discrimination based on political opinion in employment and occupation. The Committee notes the Government's indication that section 65 has been replaced by section 117 of the new Penal Law 2017, and that its contents remain the same. It also notes the Government's repeated reference to article 44 of the Constitution on freedom of association and section 11 of the Trade Union Law 2007 on collective agreements. However, it notes with concern that the Government has once again not provided any information on the application in practice of the current legislation. The Committee therefore urges the Government to provide detailed information on the application in practice of section 117 of the Penal Law 2017 and section 11 of the Trade Union Law 2007, and in particular to indicate the steps taken to ensure that these provisions do not in practice result in discrimination in employment and occupation on the basis of political opinion, including information on any complaints made by employees or extracts of any court decisions in this regard.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1992)

The Committee takes note of the Government's report and the supplementary information provided in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020).

The Committee notes the observations of the Free Trade Union Confederation of Latvia (FTUCL) communicated with the Government's reports.

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Assessing and addressing the gender pay gap. Referring to its previous comments, the Committee notes from the statistical information provided by the Government in its report, that, in 2018, gender pay differentials in gross monthly earnings were still higher in the public sector than in the private sector (18.2 per cent and 15.1 per cent respectively), but continued to widen in the private sector, while they slightly decreased in the public sector. The Committee notes, from Eurostat data, that the unadjusted gender pay gap (the difference between the average gross hourly earnings of men and women expressed as a percentage of the average gross hourly earnings of men) was estimated at 14.1 per cent in 2018. However, the gender pay gap was as high as 34.9 per cent in the financial and insurance activities and 25.3 per cent in wholesale and retail trade. The Committee notes the adoption of the Plan for the Promotion of Equal Rights and Opportunities for Women and Men for 2018-2020 which focuses on promoting economic independence and equal opportunities for women and men in the labour market, in particular by contributing to the achievement of the Inclusive Employment Guidelines for 2015-2020 which set as a priority to reduce the gender pay gap. It notes the Government's statement that, as a result, a study on the factors and causes of gender pay inequality, and its prevalence in certain sectors, was to be finalized by the Ministry of Welfare in the course of 2020. As regards its previous comments concerning the inclusion of equal remuneration in the indicators of the "Sustainability Index" for enterprises, the Committee notes the lack of information provided by the Government on the contents of the guidelines and recommendations developed by experts for each enterprise or on any follow-up action undertaken to ensure their implementation. Referring to its comments on the application of the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111), concerning gender occupational segregation, the Committee notes, from the statistical information provided by the Government, that women are mostly represented in economic activities characterized by low levels of remuneration, such as accommodation and food; education; human health and social work and other service activities. It further notes that women employed in the same economic activity as men systematically receive lower remuneration. The Committee notes this information with concern. It further notes that, in its 2018 report under the national-level review of implementation of the Beijing Declaration, the Government highlights that the gender pay gap, differences in labour market participation, and the division of care responsibilities are a set of reasons that impact on women's pensions, the difference in pensions between women and men being estimated at 12.7 per cent in 2016 (p. 32). In that regard, the Committee notes that, in its 2020 concluding observations, the United Nations (UN) Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW) expressed concern at the persistent gender pay gap resulting in lower pension benefits in traditionally female-dominated occupations (CEDAW/C/LVA/CO/4-7, 10 March 2020, paragraph 35(a)). The Committee further notes that, in its July 2020 report on the impact of COVID-19 measures on gender equality, the European network of legal experts on gender equality and non-discrimination from the European Commission highlighted that among the recipients of sickness allowance for leave on account of a COVID-19 diagnosis or quarantine, female workers were entitled to a daily sickness allowance which was 3.5 euros (EUR) lower than for male workers, again highlighting the existing pay gap. The Committee urges the Government to provide information on the concrete measures and activities undertaken to address the gender pay gap, both in the public and private sectors, in particular by addressing occupational gender segregation and promoting women's access to jobs with career prospects and higher pay, including in the framework of the Plan for the Promotion of Equal Rights and Opportunities for Women and Men for 2018-2020 and the Sustainability Index. In that regard, it asks the Government to provide information on the content of the study undertaken by the Ministry of Welfare or any other authorities concerning the extent and causes of wage differentials between men and women, as well as on any recommendations made to address it. The Committee asks the Government to continue to provide statistical data on the earnings of men and women, disaggregated by economic activity and occupation, both in the public and private sectors.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1992)

The Committee takes note of the Government's report and the supplementary information provided in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020).

Article 1(2) of the Convention. Discrimination on the basis of national extraction. Inherent requirements of the job. For a number of years, the Committee has been expressing concern at the discriminatory impact that the language requirements of the Law on State Language of 1999 may have on the employment or occupational opportunities of minority groups, in particular the large Russian-speaking minority. It recalled that section 6(2) of the Law provides that employees of private institutions, organizations and enterprises and self-employed persons shall use the official language if their activities affect the "lawful interests of the public" and observed that this requirement affects a large number of posts and occupations (public security, health, morality, health care, protection of consumer rights and employment rights, safety in the workplace and supervision of public administration). The Committee requested the Government to consider drawing up a list of occupations for which the use of the official language is required under section 6(2) of the Law on State Language so as to limit it to cases where language is an inherent requirement of the job. The Committee observes that, according to the January 2017 data of the Central Statistical Bureau (CSB), the ethnic distribution of the Latvian population included 25.4 per cent Russians. It notes with regret the absence of measures taken by the Government to limit the list of occupations for which the use of the official language is required under the Law. The Committee notes the Government's statement in its report and additional information that several amendments have been introduced between 2017 and 2020 in Cabinet of Ministers Regulation No. 733 of 2009, which prescribes the required level of proficiency in Latvian for each profession or occupation, pursuant to section 6(5) of the Law. The Government indicates that the purpose of the amendments is principally to: (1) harmonize the professions and occupations listed in the regulation with the titles and codes of professions included in the classification of occupations; and (2) provide a transitional period until 1 July 2021 for the persons whose state language proficiency for the performance of their professional and office duties has been increased by at least one level. In this regard, the Government recalls that, after passing the Latvian language examination successfully, people will receive a proficiency certificate to prove to the employer and educational institutions their ability to communicate in Latvian. However, if a person fails to master one level of the language courses, she or he will lose the opportunity to apply for the next level and will only have a second chance to apply for the same level once a year. The Committee notes the detailed information provided by the Government on the various Latvian language learning programmes and courses provided to children and adults by some municipalities, the State Employment Agency (SEA) and the Latvian Language Agency (LVA). In this regard, it notes more particularly that, between 2016 and 2018, 587 third-country nationals received Latvian language training to facilitate their integration into the labour market, in the framework of the project of the Asylum, Migration and Integration Fund implemented by the LVA. It further notes the Government's statement that one of the objectives of the National Identity, Civil Society and Integration Policy Implementation Plan 2019–20 is to strengthen Latvian language literacy in society.

In its supplementary information, the Government indicates that a gradual switch to Latvian as the sole language of instruction has been started and, to that end, amendments were introduced in 2018 in the Law on Education of 1998 and the Law on General Education of 1999. The Government states that the implementation of the reform regarding the language of instruction will be supported by new teaching and learning materials, including training for teachers, in order to help them successfully implement the new competence-based education content in Latvian. In that regard, the Committee notes that in 2018 the LVA launched a project aiming to support 3,500 teachers by 2021, including teachers with ethnic minority background, in order to help them develop their Latvian language skills for professional purposes. However, the Committee notes that, in their concluding observations, the United Nations Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination (CERD) and the United Nations Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW) express concern at the education reform, which will create undue restrictions on access to education in minority languages. The CERD also expresses specific concern at section 6 of the Law on State Language, which may result in direct and indirect discrimination against minorities in access to employment in public and private institutions (CEDAW/C/LVA/CO/4-7, 10 March 2020, paragraph 33, and CERD/C/LVA/CO/6-12, 25 September 2018, paragraph 16). The Committee wishes to recall that discrimination based on national extraction can occur when legislation imposing a State language for employment in public and private sector activities is interpreted and implemented too broadly and, as such, disproportionately and adversely affects the employment and occupational opportunities of minority language groups. Furthermore, it recalls that, in order to come within the scope of the exception provided for in Article 1(2) of the Convention regarding inherent requirements of a particular job, any limitation regarding access to employment must be required by the characteristics of the particular job, and in proportion to its inherent requirements. Such exception must be interpreted restrictively so as to avoid undue limitation of the protection that the Convention is intended to provide (2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraphs 764 and 827–831). In light of the persistent large number of posts and occupations for which the use of the official language is required under section 6(2) of the Law on State Language, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary steps to avoid any undue limitation on employment and occupational opportunities for any group by limiting the number of occupations in which proficiency in Latvian is considered to be an inherent requirement of the job. It further asks the Government to continue providing information on Latvian language classes and activities carried out to ensure that its national legislation, including the ongoing reform regarding the language of instruction, does not create in practice direct or indirect discrimination in access to education and employment for minority groups, in particular the large Russian-speaking minority.

Articles 1(2) and 4. Discrimination on the basis of political opinion. Inherent requirements of the job. Activities prejudicial to the security of the State. For a number of years, the Committee has been referring to the mandatory requirements set out in the Law on the State Civil Service of 2000, which provides that, in order to qualify as a candidate for any civil service position, the person concerned may not be or have been ''in a permanent staff position, in the state security service, intelligence or counterintelligence service of the USSR, the Latvian Soviet Socialist Republic (SSR) or some foreign State" (section 7(8)), or ''member of organizations banned by laws or court rulings" (section 7(9)). The Committee drew the Government's attention to the fact that the Law applies to any state civil service position and to employment by specified services irrespective of the level of responsibility, and requested the Government to amend sections 7(8) and 7(9) of the Law or to take steps to clearly stipulate and define the functions to which these sections apply. The Committee notes the Government's repeated statement that the purpose of such restrictions is to prevent persons from entering the public service who are not loyal to the State and who could constitute a threat to national security. The Government adds that in April 2019 the Ministry of Justice prepared a report on the necessity and appropriateness of the restrictions imposed by the Law on the State Civil Service on former employees of the Latvian SSR National Security Committee and concluded that such restrictions should be maintained in order to "ensure a loyal, professional and politically neutral State civil service, which ensures legal, stable, efficient and transparent operation of the public administration". Observing that the report of the Ministry of Justice highlights that it would however be more appropriate for a democratic country to assess the individual circumstances in each case and adopt a decision based on such assessment of the degree of past cooperation, the nature of the work, etc., the Committee notes the Government's indication that such information is not available and such a recommendation would thus be impossible to implement. With regard to the number of persons dismissed or whose applications have been rejected pursuant to sections 7(8) and 7(9) of the Law on the State Civil Service, the Government states that such data is not available for now. While understanding the Government's concerns and noting its explanations, the Committee again draws the Government's attention to the fact that the Law applies to any state civil service position and to employment by specified services irrespective of the level of responsibility. It recalls that, to come under the scope of the exception provided for in Article 1(2) regarding the inherent requirements of a particular job or in Article 4 on the security of the State, any limitation regarding access to employment should be interpreted strictly in order to avoid any undue limitations on the protection which the Convention seeks to guarantee. More particularly, it recalls that criteria such as political opinion may be taken into account as an inherent requirement, under Article 1(2), only for certain posts involving special responsibilities directly concerned with developing government policy. Moreover, for measures not to be discriminatory under Article 4 of the Convention, they must: (1) affect an individual on account of activities he or she is justifiably suspected or proven to have undertaken, and that such measures become discriminatory when taken simply by reason of membership of a particular group or community; (2) refer to activities qualifiable as prejudicial to the security of State; and (3) be sufficiently well defined and precise to ensure that they do not become instruments of discrimination on the basis of political opinion. In addition to these substantive conditions, the legitimate application of this exception must respect the right of the person affected by the measures to appeal to a competent body established in accordance with national practice (2012 General Survey, paragraphs 832–835). The Committee urges the Government to take the necessary steps to amend sections 7(8) and 7(9) of the Law on the State Civil Service in order to limit their scope of application to specific functions and positions in the State civil service, in conformity with the provisions of the Convention. It asks the Government to provide information on any progress made in that regard. In the meantime, the Committee asks the Government to provide any available data on the application of sections 7(8) and 7(9) in practice, including on the number of persons whose applications have been rejected pursuant to these sections, the reasons for these decisions and the functions concerned, as well as any appeals lodged against such decisions.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1977)

The Committee notes with concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments.

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Gender pay gap. The Committee recalls its previous comments in which it noted that, according to statistics published in October 2011 by the Central Statistics Office, in 2007 the gender pay gap was an estimated 6.2 per cent in services; 10.8 per cent in commerce; 21 per cent in agriculture; 23.8 per cent in manufacturing; and 38 per cent in transport and communications. In the absence of updated information in this regard in the Government's report, the Committee once again requests it to take the necessary steps to gather, analyse and communicate data on the remuneration of men and women and wage gaps in the different sectors of economic activity, including the public sector, and for different professional categories. The Committee once again requests the Government to adopt specific measures to rectify gender pay gaps, including raising awareness among employers, workers and their organizations of the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value, and to provide information on any action taken to this end and on any obstacles encountered.

Article 2. Legislation. Equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value. For more than 40 years the Committee has been requesting the Government to ensure that the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value is given full legal expression. The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report merely indicates that the new draft Labour Code is still under examination. The Committee is therefore bound to urge the Government to ensure that the draft Labour Code gives full legal expression to the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value, in order to facilitate a broad scope of comparison encompassing not only equal or similar work, but also work of an entirely different nature that is of equal value overall. Expressing the firm hope that the Government will be in a position to report progress on this matter in the near future, the Committee asks the Government to provide a copy of the relevant provisions when they have been adopted.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1977)

The Committee notes with concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments.

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Protection of workers against discrimination, including sexual harassment. Law and practice. For more than 20 years the Committee has been requesting that the Government introduce a definition and a general prohibition of direct and indirect discrimination on the grounds set out in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention, within the framework of the Labour Code reform, applicable to all aspects of employment and occupation. The Committee recalls that the Labour Code currently in force (the Labour Code of 1946, as amended) only covers discrimination between men and women in certain aspects of employment (section 26) and does not provide effective protection against all forms of sexual harassment, namely quid pro quo and hostile working environment sexual harassment. Indeed, the only section of the Code that could be applied in cases of sexual harassment is a provision that authorizes employees to leave their jobs without notice when "the employer or his representative commits the offence of molestation of the worker" (section 75(3)). The Committee recalls in this regard that legislation under which the sole redress available to victims of sexual harassment is the possibility to resign, while retaining the right to compensation, does not afford sufficient protection for victims of sexual harassment since it punishes them and could therefore dissuade victims from seeking redress (see 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 792). The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report does not contain any information on the progress or content of the ongoing reform of the Labour Code. However, the Committee observes that, according to the third annual report (2015) on the implementation of the National Strategic Plan for Women in Lebanon (2011–21), the Ministry of Labour has prepared a bill criminalizing sexual harassment in the workplace. Consequently, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure that the new Labour Code contains provisions defining and prohibiting direct and indirect discrimination on at least all of the grounds set out in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention, in all aspects of employment and occupation, as defined in Article 1(3), and all forms of sexual harassment (quid pro quo harassment and the creation of a hostile working environment). The Committee once again asks the Government to provide information on any progress made with a view to adopting the draft Labour Code. In the absence of full legislative protection against discrimination, the Committee also once again requests the Government to adopt specific measures to ensure, in practice, the protection of workers against discrimination on the grounds of race, colour, religion, political opinion, national extraction and social origin, and against sexual harassment in employment and occupation, including measures to raise awareness of these issues among workers, employers and their respective organizations, in order to improve prevention.

Foreign domestic workers. Multiple discrimination. For more than ten years, the Committee has been examining the measures taken by the Government to address the lack of legal protection for domestic workers, most of whom are women migrants, since these workers are excluded from the scope of the Labour Code and are particularly vulnerable to discrimination, including harassment, on the basis of sex and other grounds such as race, colour and ethnic origin. The Committee notes that, in its concluding observations, the United Nations Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination (CERD) noted with concern that "abuse and exploitation of migrant domestic workers continues to occur in spite of the measures taken by the State party". The CERD also noted with concern that "victims are often not able to seek assistance when they are forcibly confined to the residence of their employers or when their passports have been retained". The CERD recommended the following measures: "abolish the conditions that render migrant domestic workers vulnerable to abuse and exploitation, including the sponsorship system and the live-in setting"; "extend the coverage of the Labour Code to domestic work, thereby granting domestic workers the same working conditions and labour rights as other workers, including the right to change occupation, and subjecting domestic work to labour inspections"; "ensure that any specific legislation on domestic employment is aimed at tackling migrant domestic workers' increased vulnerability to abuse and exploitation"; and "conduct campaigns to change the population's attitudes towards migrant domestic workers and to raise awareness of their rights" (CERD/C/LBN/CO/18–22, 5 October 2016, paragraphs 41–42). The Government reports that domestic workers are covered by the Code of Obligations and Contracts, and once again refers to the model contract and the Bill on the employment of domestic workers. The Government also indicates that a Bill to ratify the Domestic Workers Convention, 2011 (No. 189), was submitted to the Council of Ministers and that the national steering committee of the Ministry of Labour, which is responsible for examining relations between employers and domestic workers, is currently developing significant measures to guarantee compliance with contracts and abolish the sponsorship system. However, the Government states that this process will take time. In this regard, the Committee notes the Government's indication that the Ministry of Labour and official bodies have not established restrictions regarding changes of employer and that this is an issue that only concerns the worker and the employer. Recalling its previous comments and noting with regret that the situation remains unchanged, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures, in cooperation with the social partners, to ensure genuine protection for migrant domestics workers, in law and practice, against direct and indirect discrimination on all of the grounds set out in the Convention, including against sexual harassment, and in all areas of their employment, either through the adoption of a bill on the employment of domestic workers or, more generally, within the framework of the labour legislation. The Committee asks the Government to supply information on any progress made in this regard and on any legislative changes to abolish the sponsorship system. The Committee asks the Government, in particular, to ensure that any new regulations envisaged on the right of migrant workers to change employers do not impose conditions or restrictions likely to increase these workers' dependence on their employer and thus increase their vulnerability to abuse and discriminatory practices.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1961)

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020). The Committee proceeded with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the supplementary information received from the Government this year, as well as the information at its disposal in 2019.

The Committee notes the observations of the International Organisation of Employers (IOE) and the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), received respectively on 26 August and 1 September 2019.

The Committee notes the complexity of the situation prevailing on the ground and the armed conflict in the country.

Follow-up to the conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards (International Labour Conference, 108th Session, June 2019)

The Committee notes the discussion which took place in the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards (CAS) on the application of the Convention and the conclusions adopted.

Articles 1 and 3(b) of the Convention. Definition of discrimination. Draft Constitution. The Committee notes that, in its conclusions, the CAS asked the Government to amend article 7 of the draft Constitution to ensure that the grounds of race, national extraction and social origin are included as prohibited grounds of discrimination. The Committee notes that both the IOE and the ITUC call on the Government to amend article 7 of the draft Constitution. The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that the Minister of Labour and Rehabilitation sent two letters (Nos 791 and 789, both dated 29 August 2019) to the President of the Presidential Council on the possibility of incorporating these changes into the draft Constitution and into the Constitution when adopted. The Committee hopes that the draft Constitution will be amended as requested and asks the Government to provide information on any developments in this regard.

Labour legislation. In its previous comment, the Committee noted that Law No. 12 of 2010 promulgating the Labour Relations Act (LRA 2010) does not contain a definition of discrimination. It also noted that section 3 of the LRA 2010 prohibits discrimination on the grounds of "trade union affiliation, social origin or any other discriminatory ground", but does not explicitly include the grounds of race, colour, sex, religion, political opinion and national extraction. In its conclusions, the CAS asked the Government to: (1) take concrete actions to ensure that direct and indirect discrimination on all grounds is prohibited in law and in practice; (2) ensure that the legislation covers, directly and indirectly, all the recognized prohibited grounds for discrimination set out in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention and take measures to prohibit discrimination in employment and occupation in law and in practice; and (3) include a definition of the term "discrimination" in the LRA 2010. The Committee notes that both the IOE and the ITUC have called on the Government to amend the LRA 2010 in accordance with the conclusions of the CAS. In this regard, the Committee takes note of the Government's indications that the words "or any other discriminatory grounds" in section 3 of the LRA 2010 cover all forms of discrimination without exception, and that the possibility of including the definition contained in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention in the new draft labour law is being taken into consideration. The Committee requests the Government to take measures to ensure that the national labour legislation includes a clear and comprehensive definition of discrimination in employment and occupation covering at least all the grounds set out in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention and to provide information in this respect.

Articles 1 to 3. Discrimination on the basis of race, colour and national extraction. Sub-Saharan migrant workers. The Committee notes that in its conclusions the CAS asked the Government to: (1) ensure that migrant workers are protected from ethnic and racial discrimination and from forced labour; (2) educate and promote equal employment and opportunities for all; (3) take immediate action to address the situation of racial and ethnic discrimination against migrant workers from sub-Saharan Africa (including women migrant workers) and, in particular, put an end to forced labour migration practices; and (4) conduct surveys to examine the situation of vulnerable groups, including migrant workers, in order to identify their problems and possible solutions. The Committee also takes note of the observations of the ITUC indicating that migrant workers from sub-Saharan Africa, and in particular women, remain especially at risk of discrimination. According to the ITUC, the Government should adopt and provide information on the concrete measures taken or envisaged to ensure that the prohibition in law and practice of direct and indirect discrimination is effective for all workers on Libyan territory, irrespective of their origin, nationality or status. The ITUC further calls for the adoption of measures to ensure that victims of discrimination have access to justice and obtain protection from reprisals and compensation for the damage suffered, and that effective, proportionate and dissuasive penalties are imposed on the perpetrators of discriminatory behaviour. Lastly, the ITUC underlines the fundamental importance of building the capacity of the labour inspection services with a view to combating all forms of discrimination in employment and occupation. The Committee takes note of the information provided by the Government on its efforts to combat human trafficking, and specifically that: (1) the national legislation prohibits human trafficking; (2) a bill increasing the penalties for human trafficking is currently under review by the legislative authorities; (3) the Office of the Public Prosecutor is investigating cases of abuse; and (4) victims who cannot afford to pay their legal fees can be assisted by a counsel appointed by the court. The Committee also notes the Government's indication that it is collaborating with neighbouring countries, the countries of origin of the victims and perpetrators, and with relevant local and international organizations, such as the International Organization for Migration (IOM), to combat human trafficking.

In its supplementary information, the Government further indicates that there is no current data on the number of convicted persons, nor on the number of cases. Moreover, the majority of informal shelters for migrant workers are closed and the remaining few are currently being closed following monitoring by law enforcement bodies. Medical and therapeutic services are provided to migrant workers in the formally recognized shelters, such as the "Tajoura" and "Baten el Jabbal" shelters, in coordination with the IOM, Médecins sans frontières and the Red Cross.

The Committee notes with deep concern the report of the United Nations Committee on the Protection of the Rights of All Migrant Workers and their Families (CMW) indicating that migrant workers from sub-Saharan Africa continue to be severely discriminated against, and that acts of physical and verbal abuse against them persist, including by Libyan officials, such as representatives of the Directorate for Combating Illegal Migration and the Libyan Coast Guard. The Committee also notes that, despite the fact that the LRA 2010 provides for mechanisms to resolve labour disputes, the CMW expresses great concern at the widespread impunity for violations of the rights of migrant workers, who are unable to seek justice for fear of being detained for illegal entry and stay (CMW/C/LBY/CO/1, 8 May 2019, paragraphs 28, 30 and 34). While noting the additional information provided by the Government, the complexity of the situation prevailing on the ground resulting from the ongoing armed conflict in the country as well as the impact of the current COVID-19 pandemic, the Committee urges the Government to: (i) take further action to address the situation of racial and ethnic discrimination against migrant workers from sub-Saharan Africa, including measures to ensure that the legislation on non-discrimination is applied in practice, that migrant workers subject to discrimination in employment and occupation have access to remedies, irrespective of their legal status in the country; and (ii) raise awareness of and promote equal employment and opportunities for all. The Committee asks the Government to provide information in this respect.

Technical assistance. The Committee notes that the CAS invited the Government to continue to engage and actively participate in ILO technical assistance in order to promote equitable and effective labour migration policies. The Committee also takes note of the IOE's observations referring to three projects for which the Government would be receiving technical assistance from the Office: (1) the project "Building the capacity of Libyan constituents and national actors to address unacceptable forms of work and promote fair and effective labour migration policies"; (2) the "Jobs for Peace and Resilience Flagship Programme"; and (3) the project "Support for Fair Migration for the Maghreb (AMEM)". Noting that these projects are currently on hold, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the resumption of technical assistance provided by the Office and its results.

The Committee is addressing other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1994)

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Assessing and addressing the gender pay gap. Referring to its previous comments where it noted that since 2011 the gender pay gap had been increasing regularly, the Committee notes, from 2020 Eurostat data, that the gender pay gap in unadjusted form (the difference between the average gross hourly earnings of men and women expressed as a percentage of the average gross hourly earnings of men) decreased from 15.2 per cent in 2017 to 14 per cent in 2018. It further notes, from the statistical information provided by the Government, that, in 2018, the gender pay gap was estimated to be 14.1 per cent in the public sector and 14.2 per cent in the private sector. The Committee notes the Government's indication, in its report, that the Programme on National Progress for Lithuania for 2014-2020 sets as a specific objective the reduction of the gender pay gap to 7 per cent by 2030. The Government adds that, to this end, it plans to continue the implementation of the measures identified in the Action Plan 2018-2021 for the Implementation of the National Programme on Equal Opportunities for Women and Men 2015-2021, namely by: (1) conducting surveys on wage differentials and disseminating their results; (2) organizing awareness-raising campaigns and educational and informational events, including information seminars for target groups (social partners, media, policymakers) on gender pay and pension gaps and their causes in order to resolve issues related to market segregation; and (3) conducting thematic reviews, including pay audits, in order to increase pay transparency and present their results to the Tripartite Council. The Committee further notes the Government's statement that it will continue to address sectoral and occupational gender labour market segregation. In that regard, the Committee notes, from the statistical information provided by the Government, that, in 2018, women were earning less than men in all types of activities except transport, and storage and construction. The largest gender pay gaps were observed in the financial and insurance sector (37.3 per cent), information and communications (27.8 per cent), human health care and social work (26.9 per cent) and manufacturing (24.8 per cent). In 2018, the average gross hourly earnings in industry, construction and services (excluding public administration, defence and compulsory social insurance) was estimated at €4.95 for women and €5.75 for men. The Committee further notes that in 2017 while women represented 77.1 per cent of the civil servants (excluding statutory), their remuneration was on average 10.3 per cent lower than those of men. The Committee notes that, according to the 2019 European country report on gender equality, the difference between men's and women's earnings is largely explained by the concentration of women in low-paid sectors and in certain categories of occupations. According to this report, more recent studies also confirmed that differences in the salaries of men and women are based on unjust and unfair setting of salary rates without considering most of the internal and external factors. Employers are more likely to assign men to more responsible and better-paid job positions, although the educational indicators of women are higher than those of men in today's society (p. 16). The Committee further notes that, in their recent concluding observations, several United Nations (UN) treaty bodies expressed concern about the persistent gender pay gap which results in lower levels of pension benefits and salaries in traditionally female-dominated occupations (CEDAW/C/LTU/CO/6, 12 November 2019, paragraph 36; and CCPR/C/LTU/CO/4, 29 August 2018, paragraph 15). Welcoming the recent downward trend observed in the gender pay gap, the Committee urges the Government to pursue its efforts and to provide information on the concrete measures and activities undertaken (in the framework of the Action Plan 2018-2021 for the Implementation of the National Programme on Equal Opportunities for Women and Men 2015-2021 or otherwise) to address the gender pay gap, both in the public and private sectors, in particular by addressing occupational gender segregation and promoting women's access to jobs with career prospects and higher pay. Recalling that section 23(2) of the Labour Code provides that an employer who has more than 20 employees on average must submit to the work council and the trade union, at least once a year, updated information, disaggregated by sex and occupation, on the average pay of employees (except for managerial positions), the Committee asks the Government to provide statistical information on the earnings of men and women, disaggregated by economic activity and occupation, both in the public and private sectors.

Articles 3 and 4. Objective job evaluation. Cooperation with workers' and employers' organizations. Referring to its previous comments where it noted that, as a result of a survey conducted in 2015 on the implementation of the methodology for the assessment of jobs and positions, the Tripartite Council suggested an updating of the 2005 methodology, the Committee notes the Government's statement that such methodology has not been reviewed. The Committee recalls that: (1) section 26(2)(3) of the Labour Code provides that an employer shall use uniform job evaluation criteria; (2) section 140(3) provides that remuneration systems are determined by collective agreement or, in the absence of such agreement (in workplaces with an average number of at least 20 employees) that it must be approved by the employer after information and consultation procedures, and be accessible to all employees; and (3) section 140(5) provides that the remuneration system must be designed in such a way as to avoid any gender discrimination or discrimination based on other grounds. It notes the Government's statement that out of the 259 collective agreements currently in force, only ten collective agreements contain provisions providing that companies shall ensure fair and competitive wages for all of their employees and avoid any discrimination, in particular on the ground of sex. The Committee observes the lack of information on whether such instruments contain specific provisions on remuneration systems. In that regard, the Committee notes that, according to the 2019 European country report on gender equality, the remuneration systems generally lack transparency as: (1) wages are usually set by individual agreement and not by a collective agreement; and (2) individual wages belong to the sensitive data protected by statutory or contractual confidentiality clauses (p. 18). As regards collective agreements, the Committee notes that the Government refers to the implementation, from 2017 to 2020, of the project "Model of Cooperation between Trade Unions and Employers in Developing Social Dialogue" which aims at enhancing social dialogue between employers' and workers' organization, in order to produce methodological measures for collective bargaining. In light of the persistent gender pay gap, the Committee urges the Government to provide information on the application of sections 26(2)(3) and 140(3) and (5) of the Labour Code in practice, including by indicating how it is ensured that remuneration systems are based on objective job evaluation methods that are free from gender bias. It further asks the Government to provide information on: (i) any measures taken or envisaged to promote wage transparency; and (ii) any steps taken, in cooperation with the social partners, to promote the principle of the Convention in branch, territorial and enterprise negotiations, and ensure that work in sectors and occupations in which women are predominantly employed is not being undervalued. The Committee again asks the Government to provide relevant extracts of collective agreements containing provisions that reflect the principle of the Convention.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1994)

Articles 2 and 3 of the Convention. Equality of opportunity and treatment for men and women. The Committee previously noted the persistence of occupational gender segregation and discriminatory attitudes concerning men's and women's roles at work and requested the Government to provide information on: (1) the steps taken, including in the context of the National Programme on Equal Opportunities for Women and Men 2015–21 and its accompanying Action Plan 2015–17, to effectively reduce occupational gender segregation and promote equality of opportunity and treatment of men and women in employment and occupation, including in recruitment, as well as on the results achieved; and (2) the distribution of men and women in employment, disaggregated by economic sector and occupation. The Committee notes the Government's statement in its report that the Action Plan 2018–21 for the Implementation of the National Programme on Equal Opportunities for Women and Men 2015–21 continues to support initiatives aimed at: (1) addressing gender stereotypes and segregation, as well as its causes and consequences, including through the exchange of good practices; (2) addressing gender segregation in education; and (3) disseminating information on equal opportunities in employment for the social partners. The Committee notes from the statistical information provided by the Government that in 2018 women accounted for 47.2 per cent of employed persons (compared with 52.8 per cent of men) and 45.3 per cent of participants who benefited from active labour market policy measures (compared with 54.7 per cent of men). In this regard, it notes from Eurostat data that the employment rate of women increased from 75.5 per cent in 2017 to 77.4 per cent in 2019 (compared with 79 per cent for men in 2019), and is one of the highest employment rates of women of the countries of the European Union. The Committee welcomes this information. It however notes from the statistical data of the European Institute for Gender Equality (EIGE) that the share of women on the boards of the largest publicly listed companies fell from 14 per cent in 2010 to 12 per cent in 2019. The Committee notes, from the Government's 2019 report under the national-level review of implementation of the Beijing Declaration (the Beijing+25 national report), that despite increased attention in the area of gender equality, violations of equal opportunities for women and men are still noticeable in many areas, and gender segregation in the labour market remains a reality. Indeed, while nearly 27 per cent of women compared to 6 per cent of men work in education, human health and social work activities, there are four times more men (31 per cent) than women (8 per cent) who work in science, technology, engineering and mathematics (STEM) occupations. The Government adds in the Beijing+25 report that gender equality in educational attainment and participation has improved slightly, while the situation concerning segregation in study fields remains a challenge, as 37 per cent of women students are still concentrated in the fields of education. health and welfare, humanities and the arts. The Committee recalls that, under section 26(6) of the Labour Code, employers with an average number of more than 50 employees are required to adopt and publish the measures implementing and enforcing the principles of the equal opportunities policy. It however notes, from the Government's Beijing+25 report, that in the companies inspected by the State Labour Inspectorate this requirement was generally not implemented. It further notes that, in its 2019 concluding observations, the United Nations Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW) expresses concern at: (1) the persistence of discriminatory gender stereotypes and calls for adherence to traditional roles and values for women, including in the media, as noted in the survey conducted by the Equal Opportunities Ombudsperson; (2) that the Law on Strengthening Families may reinforce discriminatory stereotypes regarding the roles and responsibilities of women and men in family and society; and (3) vertical and horizontal occupational gender segregation (CEDAW/C/LTU/CO/6, 12 November 2019, paragraphs 20 and 36). The Committee urges the Government to strengthen its efforts to effectively address stereotypes of the roles and responsibilities of women and men in the family and in society, as well as occupational gender segregation. In this regard, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on: (i) the measures taken to promote equality of opportunity and treatment for men and women in education, employment and occupation, particularly in the framework of the Action Plan 2018–21 for the Implementation of the National Programme on Equal Opportunities for Women and Men 2015–21; (ii) any assessment made of the impact of such measures, as well as the application of section 26(6) of the Labour Code in practice; and (iii) the distribution of men and women in employment, disaggregated by economic sector and occupation.

Equality of opportunity and treatment irrespective of race, colour and national extraction. Roma. Referring to its previous comments concerning the persistent discrimination against the Roma in education and employment, the Committee notes the Government's indication that the integration of the Roma into the labour market is enhanced through: (1) the implementation of general measures which fall under the responsibility of the Lithuanian Labour Exchange; and (2) the implementation of specific projects dedicated to the integration of the Roma into the labour market. In this regard, the Government refers to the Project "Working with the Roma: New job opportunities and challenges", implemented in collaboration with representatives from the Roma community, as a result of which, 40 persons participated in 2018 in a general skills development process, including language classes, and 78 persons started searching for a job or studying to become employed or self-employed. The Committee notes the Government's statement that one of the major obstacles identified for the integration of the Roma into the labour market is the lack of basic education, and that the distance education services provided by the Roma Community Centre only partially address this situation. Referring to its previous comments concerning the adoption of an Action Plan for Roma Integration into Lithuanian Society for 2015–20, the Committee however regrets the lack of information provided by the Government on its implementation. The Committee further notes that, in their recent concluding observations, several United Nations treaty bodies have expressed concern at: (1) the persistent stereotypes, prejudice and intolerance against the Roma which lead to discrimination in the fields of education and employment; (2) the persistent low literacy rates among the Roma compared with the general population; (3) the persistent low proportion of Roma children and young people completing basic education and the decrease in the number of the Roma with secondary and higher education; as well as (4) the low employment rate of the Roma, particularly Roma women (CERD/C/LTU/CO/9-10, 7 June 2019, paragraph 17, and CCPR/C/LTU/CO/4, 29 August 2018, paragraph 7). The Committee notes this information with concern. It further notes from the statistical information provided by the Government that among the complaints concerning discrimination on the grounds of race, nationality, language, origin, ethnicity and citizenship received by the Office of Equal Opportunities Ombudsperson from 2017 to 2019, 11 concerned employment and 10 education. The Committee however observes that such information does not relate specifically to the Roma. It further notes that, according to the 2019 European Commission country report on non-discrimination, no cases of discrimination against the Roma were brought to the courts from 2015 to 2018, and no complaints regarding discrimination against the Roma were brought to the Equal Opportunities Ombudsperson or started by the Ombudsperson in 2018. The Committee urges the Government to strengthen its efforts to combat stigma and discrimination against the Roma, including through awareness-raising campaigns against stereotypes and prejudice, in order to effectively ensure equality of opportunity and treatment in education, employment and occupation for the Roma community. It asks the Government to provide information on: (i) the specific measures taken to that end and on any assessment made of their impact, as well as on any new action plan elaborated as a follow-up to the Action Plan for Roma Integration in Lithuanian Society 2015–20; and (ii) the participation of the Roma in education and vocational training courses, as well as in the labour market.

General observation of 2018. With regard to the above issues, and in more general terms, the Committee would like to draw the Government's attention to its general observation on discrimination based on race, colour and national extraction which was adopted in 2018. In the general observation, the Committee notes with concern that discriminatory attitudes and stereotypes based on the race, colour or national extraction of men and women workers continue to hinder their participation in education, vocational training programmes and access to a wider range of employment opportunities, resulting in persisting occupational segregation and lower remuneration received for work of equal value. Furthermore, the Committee considers that it is necessary to adopt a comprehensive and coordinated approach to tackling the obstacles and barriers faced by persons in employment and occupation because of their race, colour or national extraction, and to promote equality of opportunity and treatment for all. Such an approach should include the adoption of interlocking measures aimed at addressing gaps in education, training and skills, providing unbiased vocational guidance, recognizing and validating the qualifications obtained abroad, and valuing and recognizing traditional knowledge and skills that may be relevant both to accessing and advancing in employment and to engaging in an occupation. The Committee also recalls that, in order to be effective, these measures must include concrete steps, such as laws, policies, programmes, mechanisms and participatory processes, remedies designed to address prejudices and stereotypes and to promote mutual understanding and tolerance among all sections of the population.

The Committee draws the Government's attention to its general observation of 2018 and requests the Government to provide information in response to the questions raised in that observation.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 2001)

Article 1(1)(a) and (b) of the Convention. Prohibited grounds of discrimination. Legislation. The Committee previously noted that, pursuant to Act of 3 June 2016, which amends the Labour Code, the Act of 13 May 2008 on equal treatment for men and women, and the conditions of service of local and central government officials, discrimination ‘‘on the basis of a change of sex’’ shall be deemed equivalent to discrimination on the basis of sex. It however drew the Government's attention to the fact that, despite section 454 of the Penal Code, which defines discrimination as ‘‘any distinction made between persons on account of their origin, their skin colour, […] their political views […]’’, the grounds of colour, political opinion, national extraction and social origin are not covered by the Labour Code (section L.241-1), the Act of 16 April 1979 establishing the general conditions of service for central government officials (section 1 bis) and the Act of 24 December 1985 establishing the general conditions of service for local government officials (section 1 bis). It requested the Government to amend these provisions to include colour, political opinion, national extraction and social origin. The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that Act of 7 November 2017 amending the Labour Code and the conditions of service of local and central government officials, introduced ‘‘nationality’’ among the grounds of discrimination prohibited under these laws. While welcoming this information, the Committee wishes to recall that the concept of "national extraction" covers distinctions made on the basis of a person's place of birth, ancestry or foreign origin, and thus differs from "nationality" (2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 764). It further notes the Government's repeated statement that victims of discrimination, on grounds which are not prohibited under section L.241-1 of the Labour Code, such as colour, political opinion, national extraction and social origin, can lodge a complaint under section 454 of the Penal Code, for which the Office of the Public Prosecutor will assess the case for prosecution. The Government adds that section L.244-3 of the Labour Code provides for a reversal of the burden of proof in labour tribunals where facts allow the presumption of the existence of discrimination, while under the Penal Code it is for the plaintiff to prove the existence of discrimination. The Committee is bound to reiterate that criminal prosecution is generally not sufficient to eliminate discrimination in the workplace: (1) because of its particular nature, which arises from the specific features of the work environment (fear of reprisals, loss of employment, hierarchies, etc.); and (2) because of the burden of proof, which is often hard to meet. Indeed, in the event of a complaint against discrimination, the burden of proof can be a significant obstacle, particularly as much of the information needed in cases involving unfair or discriminatory treatment is in the hands of the employer (2012 General Survey, paragraph 885). Furthermore, the Committee wishes to draw the Government's attention to the fact that, at national level, the common understanding seems to be that the legislation does not protect against discrimination in employment and occupation on the grounds of colour, political opinion, national extraction and social origin. The Committee refers in that regard to the awareness-raising campaign carried out in 2018 by the Centre for Equality of Treatment (CET) to combat discrimination in recruitment, which referred only to the grounds of discrimination listed in section L.241-1 of the Labour Code, without making any reference to section 454 of the Penal Code (CET, 2018 annual report, page 75). In order to enable workers to assert their rights effectively in relation to discrimination based on all the grounds listed in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary steps to amend the list of grounds of discrimination prohibited by the Labour Code (section L.241-1), the Act of 16 April 1979 establishing the general conditions of service of central government officials (section 1 bis) and the Act of 24 December 1985 establishing the general conditions of service of local government officials (section 1 bis) to include the grounds of colour, political opinion, national extraction and social origin. It asks the Government to provide information on any progress made in that regard. The Committee further asks the Government to provide information on the number of administrative and judicial decisions handed down by the competent authorities on cases or complaints for discrimination in employment and occupation, including on the basis of section 454 of the Penal Code, specifying the grounds of discrimination, the remedies provided and the sanctions imposed.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1962)

The Committee notes with concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments.

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Equal remuneration for work of equal value. Legislation. For several years, the Committee has been emphasizing that the provisions on equal remuneration of section 53 of the Labour Code are more restrictive than those of the Convention, as they limit the application of the principle of equal remuneration for work of equal value to persons engaged in the same job and with the same vocational qualifications. The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that in March 2016 the National Conference of Labour Inspectors raised the issue of the amendment of certain provisions of the Labour Code, including section 53, and that a draft text to amend this provision will soon be submitted to the National Labour Council (CNT) to seek the views of the social partners on this subject. While recalling that it considers that the full and complete incorporation into the legislation of the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value is essential to ensure the effective application of the Convention, the Committee trusts that the Government will take the opportunity of the draft amendment of the Labour Code to achieve the full integration of the principle of the Convention in the new Labour Code, in cooperation with employers' and workers' organizations, and that it will ensure that the new provisions encompass not only equal work or work performed under equal conditions, but also work which is of an entirely different nature, but nevertheless of equal value. It requests the Government to provide information on any progress achieved in this regard and on any other measures adopted or envisaged to promote and ensure equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value in practice.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1961)

The Committee notes with concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments.

Article 1 of the Convention. Protection against discrimination. For several years, the Committee has been emphasizing that neither the Labour Code nor the Civil Service Regulations prohibit discrimination on all the grounds covered by the Convention and has been asking the Government to take the necessary measures to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention. The Committee noted that the Labour Code does not prohibit discrimination on the basis of colour and social origin (section 261), and that the Civil Service Statute does not prohibit discrimination on grounds of race, colour and social origin (section 5). The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that, in March 2016, the National Labour Inspectors Conference (SAIT) raised the issue of amending the Labour Code provisions concerning prohibited grounds for discrimination and that a draft to introduce colour and social origin into the list of these grounds and expressly prohibit all discrimination, including indirect discrimination, will be transferred shortly to the National Labour Council (CNT) in order to gather the opinions of the social partners in this regard. With regard to the public service, the Committee notes the Government's indication that, while it considers that the term "colour" is not appropriate to the reality of Malagasy society, it is currently studying the possibility of including this motive in the list of grounds of prohibited discrimination. The Government adds that it also plans to introduce the provisions defining and prohibiting all discrimination, including indirect discrimination, and that all these issues will be raised during the forthcoming revision of the Civil Service Regulations. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on progress made regarding the revision of the Labour Code and the Civil Service Regulations to harmonize and supplement national legislative provisions in order to prohibit, in both the public and the private sectors, any discrimination on all of the grounds listed in the Convention, including race, colour and social origin, and to include a definition of discrimination which explicitly covers indirect discrimination. The Committee requests the Government to indicate any measures taken or envisaged in this respect, in cooperation with workers' and employers' organizations. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the interpretation and application in practice of section 261 of the Labour Code and section 5 of the Civil Service Regulations, and to provide copies of any administrative or judicial decisions issued in accordance with these provisions.

Discriminatory job vacancy announcements. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the allegations of the General Confederation of Workers' Unions of Madagascar (FISEMA) concerning the fact that vacancies for jobs as guards, domestic employees or workers in export processing zones advertised on the radio or through notices in the street, impose affiliation to a certain religion as a condition for recruitment or specify that the job is solely for men or women. The Committee notes the Government's statement that some advertisements for vacancies on radio or through notices in public places, are discriminatory in nature with regard to religion or sex. Given that the advertisement of job vacancies on the radio or on public notices has become common practice, the Government indicates that it envisages adopting legislation to regulate this practice in line with the provisions of the Convention. The Committee trusts that the Government will adopt, in cooperation with the workers' and employers' organizations, measures aimed at enforcing national legislation and prohibiting in practice all forms of direct and indirect discrimination on all the grounds listed in the Convention, including religion and sex, in job vacancies advertised on the radio or on public notices. It requests the Government to provide information on any progress made in this regard.

Domestic workers. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the Christian Confederation of Malagasy Trade Unions (SEKRIMA) highlighted the precarious nature of the conditions of employment of domestic workers, some being employed without an employment contract. The Committee notes the Government's indication that domestic workers enjoy the same rights as other workers, as labour legislation is applicable to them and they can lodge complaints with the labour inspectorate in cases of violations of their rights. The Committee notes, however, that, in its concluding observations, the United Nations Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW) expressed its concern about the precarious situation of women and girls in domestic work in private households and recommended that the Government strengthen the capacity of labour inspectors to monitor workplaces, including in private households (CEDAW/C/MDG/CO/6-7, 24 November 2015, paragraphs 30–31). The Committee trusts that the Government will take the necessary measures to ensure that domestic workers enjoy, in practice, the protection set out in the provisions of the Labour Code, particularly those relating to non-discrimination and employment conditions. It requests the Government to provide detailed information on the number and outcomes of checks conducted by labour inspectors to ensure the effective application of the provisions of the Labour Code for domestic workers, by sending extracts from inspection reports or relevant studies.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1965)

The Committee notes with concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments.

Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention. Discrimination based on sex. Sexual harassment. The Committee recalls that it previously asked the Government to consider amending the definition of sexual harassment in section 6(1) of the Gender Equality Act (GEA) of 2013 to explicitly include hostile work environment harassment and to ensure that the "reasonable person" in the definition of harassment no longer refers to the harasser, but to an outside person, in order to ensure effective protection against all forms of harassment in the workplace. While noting that the Government's report does not contain any information in this respect, the Committee notes the inclusion in the Malawi Public Service Management Policy 2018–2022 of a strategy to "implement programmes aimed at eliminating all forms of violence in the workplace and at home including gender-based violence, particularly sexual violence". In order to ensure comprehensive protection against sexual harassment, the Committee asks the Government to amend section 6(1) of the GEA to ensure that the term "reasonable person" in the definition of sexual harassment no longer refers to the harasser, but to an outside person. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the measures adopted pursuant to section 7 of the GEA to ensure that employers have developed and are implementing appropriate policies and procedures aimed at eliminating sexual harassment in the workplace. Further, the Committee asks the Government to take steps to address sexual harassment in the public service, including the provision of adequate reporting procedures, remedies and sanctions. It also encourages the Government to consider conducting awareness-raising campaigns, in cooperation with workers' and employers' organizations, focusing specifically on sexual harassment in employment and occupation.

Article 2. National Equality Policy. Promoting equality and inclusiveness in the public service. The Committee welcomes the provision by the Government of statistics on the distribution of men and women in decision-making positions (grades A–F). These statistics show that women never exceed more than 26 per cent of the composition of staff in these grades (25 per cent in the higher grade A, or only one woman, and 10 per cent in grade B). The Committee notes with interest the adoption in February 2018 of the Malawi Public Service Management Policy 2018–2022, which explicitly refers to the numerous Acts, including the Employment Act of 2000 and the GEA of 2013. The Committee further notes that the policy recognizes that "the public service is not inclusive enough in terms of gender" and other groups and that "there are perceptions that people with disabilities and people from different cultures are not equitably represented in the public service [and a] perception of dominance of a few groups of people in strategic positions based on political affiliations and tribe". According to the policy, the Government will take the following steps: promoting inclusiveness and equity in employment; adopting legislative, executive and administrative measures that guarantee the right to employment and promotion of women, ethnic minorities and people with disabilities, marginalized and vulnerable social groups, in line with GEA and other legislation; and implementing a strategic and systematic approach to human resource development in the public service. The Committee asks the Government to take the necessary steps to implement the strategy on equality and diversity in the Public Service Management Policy, and particularly to adopt legislative, executive and administrative measures to that end, and to effectively promote equal opportunities and treatment for all at all levels in the public service through training and awareness-raising. The Government is asked to provide specific information on the results achieved through this policy with respect to the employment of women, persons with disabilities and persons from vulnerable or marginalized groups, and to report any obstacles encountered.

Promoting gender equality. National Gender Policy of 2015 and Gender Equality Act of 2013. The Committee recalls the adoption of the National Gender Policy in 2015, which includes as one of its objectives the creation of "a favourable environment for equal employment opportunities and benefits for women and men in both formal and informal sectors" through the elimination of occupational segregation and discrimination and the review of labour laws. It also recalls the adoption of the Gender Equality Act (GEA) in 2013, which aims to promote gender equality and prohibits and provides redress for direct and indirect sex discrimination, harmful practices and sexual harassment. The GEA also provides for the introduction of programmes designed to raise awareness of its provisions. The Committee notes with interest that the Government has taken the following steps to promote the GEA: an Implementing and Monitoring Plan for the GEA was launched in 2016; the Committee on Gender was established; awareness-raising meetings targeting magistrates, police officers, representatives of the private sector and community-based and civil society organizations were conducted throughout the country; dissemination of the Act to various stakeholders was organized; and a teaching guide on the GEA was published. The Committee notes the Government's indication that there is a need for rules and regulations on gender equality to be developed and for the provisions on gender in other laws, such as the Public Service Act, the Service Commission Act and the Human Rights Commission Act, to be reviewed and harmonized with the provisions of the GEA. The Government also emphasizes the need to intensify civic education and awareness campaigns targeting traditional leaders and women and acknowledges that there is still a long way to go to achieve gender equality, in particular in employment, training and education. The Committee asks the Government to continue disseminating information to raise awareness of the GEA and to intensify its efforts in this regard among workers, employers and their organizations. The Committee asks the Government to take steps to adopt the rules and regulations pursuant to the GEA and to review the provisions on gender equality in other legislation in light of the GEA. It also asks the Government to provide information on the Implementing and Monitoring Plan for the GEA and any measure adopted to promote equal employment opportunities and benefits for women and men in both the formal and informal economy pursuant to the National Gender Policy.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 2001)

The Committee notes the observations of the General Confederation of Workers of Mauritania (CGTM), received on 28 August 2019, and the observations of the Free Confederation of Workers of Mauritania (CLTM), received on 12 June 2019. It also notes the Government's reply to the two organizations' observations, received on 21 October 2019.

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Principle of equal remuneration for work of equal value. Legislation and collective agreements. The Committee recalls that neither the Labour Code, nor Act No. 93-09 of 18 January 1993 issuing the general regulations of public servants and contractual agents of the State, nor the general collective labour agreement (CCGT) of 1974 reflect the principle of equal remuneration between men and women for work of equal value laid down by the Convention. The Committee notes that, in its report and its reply to the observations of the CGTM and the CLTM, the Government once again refers to the current reform of the Labour Code and the CCGT of 1974, and indicates that it will take the measures necessary to amend them to ensure the provisions therein clearly reflect the principle of the Convention. It adds that measures will also be taken to this end to amend the general regulations of public servants. Emphasizing that the Convention requires the implementation of the principle of equal remuneration between men and women for work of equal value, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to incorporate this principle into the labour legislation, within the context of the announced reform of the Labour Code and the CCGT, and the envisaged amendments to Act No. 93-09 of 18 January 1993. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken to this end.

Application of the Convention in practice. The Committee notes the observations of the CGTM according to which, in practice, there are significant differences between men and women in relation to remuneration for jobs of equal value. According to the organization, employers ensure that women do not attain certain highly skilled posts and, even if women do reach them, they are not treated in the same way as their male peers. The CGTM alleges that there are inequalities of treatment, including a 30 per cent wage gap between men and women and that women are deprived of several other advantages related to their functions. The Committee also notes the observations of the CLTM in which it states that, in the formal sector, there is no discrimination regarding remuneration of men and women for posts with the same vocational training and in the same occupational category. The CLTM states that discrimination is mainly found in relation to positions of responsibility or internal promotion, which benefit men more than women. The Committee once again recalls that, appropriate data and statistics are crucial in determining the nature, extent and causes of unequal remuneration, to set priorities and design appropriate measures, to monitor and evaluate the impact of such measures, and to make any necessary adjustments (see General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, 2012, paras 887-891). The Committee notes that the Government limits itself to indicating that it will take the necessary measures to collect and analyse data on the general policy concerning wages in the country to redress, where necessary, any disparities that may exist within certain activity sectors. Therefore, the Committee reiterates its previous request to take the necessary steps to collect and analyse data on wages for men and women and invites the Government to undertake an examination of the causes of the gender remuneration gap in order to devise appropriate remedial measures. The Committee also requests the Government to respond to the observations of the CGTM in this regard.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1963)

The Committee notes the observations made by the Free Confederation of Mauritanian Workers (CLTM), received on 12 June 2019, and the Government's reply, received on 21 October 2019.

Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention. Discrimination on the basis of race, colour, national extraction or social origin. Former slaves and their descendants. In its previous request, the Committee requested the Government to take steps to combat discrimination, including discrimination based on social origin, and the stigmatization suffered by certain segments of the population, particularly former slaves and descendants of slaves, in terms of access to education, training and employment, and to ensure the effective promotion of real equality and tolerance among the population. The Committee notes that, in its observations, the CLTM reports discrimination in access to well-paid and leadership posts to the advantage of only one part of the population, Arab Mauritanians, and the existence of an exclusion policy against black Haratine and Afro-Mauritanian workers from certain activity sectors, despite them being the majority in the population. The Committee notes that the Government's report is silent on this point, but observes that, in its response to the CLTM's observations on the application of the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122), the Government contests the allegations of a discriminatory employment policy regarding the Haratine and Afro-Mauritanian communities. The Committee further notes that general information on measures taken to combat discrimination and stigmatization as vestiges of slavery was provided by the Government in its response to the CLTM's observations on the application of the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29). The Government indicates that, at the instigation of religious leaders and with the participation of civil society organizations, information and awareness-raising measures have been adopted on the illegitimacy of slavery and on the dissemination of Act No. 2015-031 of 10 September 2015, repealing and replacing Act No. 2007-048 of 3 September 2007, criminalizing slavery and punishing slavery-like practices. Awareness-raising caravans also travelled throughout the territory to inform those affected by the vestiges of slavery of their rights. The Government adds that positive training and integration actions for young graduates of Haratine and Afro-Mauritanian origin have been implemented to assist them find a job, particularly through the establishment of three funds for the beneficiaries of these targeted actions. The Committee notes the report of the high-level mission that visited Mauritania in April 2018 and recommended the adoption of an action plan to combat forced labour and slavery to, inter alia, institutionalize and coordinate action to raise awareness of slavery and its vestiges, including discrimination. In addition, the Committee notes, according to a communiqué of the President of the Republic, the establishment by a decree of November 29 2019 of a General Delegation for national solidarity and the fight against exclusion ("Taazour"), the objective of which is to extend social protection, eliminate all forms of inequality, strengthen national cohesion, combat poverty and coordinate all interventions in the target areas. It notes that this ministerial-level Delegation is mandated over the next five years to implement a programme for the economic and social promotion of populations which have been victims of inequality and marginalization, by strengthening the means of production, and improving the purchasing power, and access to education, health, drinking water, decent housing and energy of the poor population. Lastly, the Committee notes that, in its concluding observations, the United Nations Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination (CERD) expressed its concern at the fact that "certain traditional social structures and cultural prejudices continue to stoke racial discrimination and to marginalize the Haratine community, particularly in terms of access to education, employment, housing, health care and social services" and at the "very limited representation of the black African (Halpular, Soninke and Wolof) and Haratine communities in political and public affairs, including in leadership and decision-making positions in public administration, the army and the police, in elective office at the national level and in the private sector and the media" (CERD/C/MRT/CO/8-14, 30 May 2018, paragraphs 11–12). The Committee also refers to its comments on the application of the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29), concerning awareness-raising activities on issues relating to slavery and its vestiges, particularly discrimination and stigmatization. Noting the willingness of the Government to actively fight against the vestiges of slavery, particularly the discrimination faced by former slaves and their descendants, the Committee requests it to intensify its efforts to raise awareness among all parts of the population of the illegitimacy of slavery and its vestiges, and to eliminate stigmatization and discrimination, particularly social prejudices, and to promote equality without distinction of race, colour, national extraction or social origin in employment or occupation. It also requests it to continue, including within the framework of the Taazour Delegation, its positive actions relating to education, training and employment of persons affected by stigmatization and discrimination based on race, colour, national extraction or social origin and to provide information on the measures taken to this end and the results achieved.

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 2002)

The Committee takes note of the Government's report and the supplementary information provided in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020).

Article 2 of the Convention. Determination of minimum wages. Remuneration Regulations. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to amend the Remuneration Regulations concerning the salt manufacturing, sugar and tea industries in order to remove all remaining gender-specific job appellations and different wages rates for men and women. The Committee notes that these three Remuneration Regulations were replaced with new ones in 2019. The Committee notes that the Salt Manufacturing Industry (Remuneration) Regulations 2019 do not use gender-specific job appellations. However, they explicitly provide in their second schedule for two different categories of wages, one for male employees and another one for female employees (even though the same wage rate applies to both categories). The Committee also notes that both the Sugar Industry (Agricultural Workers) (Remuneration) Regulations 2019 and the Tea Industry Workers (Remuneration) Regulations 2019 still include gender-specific appellations and set different wage levels for men and women in the same job occupations. The Committee urges the Government to amend without delay the Salt Manufacturing Industry (Remuneration) Regulations 2019, the Sugar Industry (Agricultural Workers) (Remuneration) Regulations 2019, and the Tea Industry Workers (Remuneration) Regulations 2019 in order to remove all remaining gender-specific job appellations, and gender specific wage categories and rates in the same job occupations. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken to ensure that, when determining minimum wage rates by occupations in the sectors covered by remuneration regulations, skills considered to be "female" are not undervalued in comparison with traditionally "male" skills and that female-dominated occupations are not undervalued in comparison with male-dominated occupations. The Committee also refers to its comments on the application of the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111).

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 2002)

The Committee takes note of the Government's report and the supplementary information provided in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020).

Articles 1(a) and 2 of the Convention. Discrimination on the basis of race, colour, national extraction and social origin. In its previous comments, the Committee expressed concern at the situation of workers from the Malaise Creole community and urged the Government to take proactive measures to address without delay discrimination based on race, colour and ethnic and social origin. In its report, the Government indicates that Mauritius is a multicultural country and that no persons identified themselves as members of the Malaise Creole community during the last population census. The Committee notes that in its activity report 2016–19, the Equal Opportunity Commission (EOC) indicates that complaints of discrimination based on ethnic origin, race, caste and place of origin amount to 9 per cent of the total number of complaints. It also notes that, in its 2018 concluding observations, the United Nations Committee on the Elimination of all Forms of Racial Discrimination (CERD) expressed concerned that the Creoles face de facto discrimination in all walks of life, are disproportionately vulnerable to poverty and have limited access to employment, housing, health care and education. The Committee notes with regret the fact that, as indicated by the CERD, the measures taken by the Government and the EOC have had a limited impact on improving the socioeconomic situation of the Creoles, and the lack of measures specifically targeted at improving their situation (CERD/C/MUS/CO/20-23, 19 September 2018, paragraph 26). The Committee once again urges the Government to take proactive measures to address discrimination in employment and occupation based on race, colour and ethnic and social origin, including against workers in Creole communities. The Committee also encourages the Government to undertake studies or research to analyse the situation of the different groups in the labour market with a view to eliminating discrimination in employment and occupation.

General observation of 2018. Regarding the above issues, and in more general terms, the Committee would like to draw the Government's attention to its general observation on discrimination based on race, colour and national extraction adopted in 2018. In the general observation, the Committee notes with concern that discriminatory attitudes and stereotypes based on the race, colour or national extraction of men and women workers continue to hinder their participation in education, vocational training programmes and access to a wider range of employment opportunities, resulting in persisting occupational segregation and differences in remuneration for work of equal value. Furthermore, the Committee considers that it is necessary to adopt a comprehensive and coordinated approach to tackling the obstacles and barriers faced by persons in employment and occupation because of their race, colour or national extraction, and to promote equality of opportunity and treatment for all. Such an approach should include the adoption of interlocking measures aimed at addressing gaps in education, training and skills, providing unbiased vocational guidance, recognizing and validating the qualifications obtained abroad, and valuing and recognizing traditional knowledge and skills that may be relevant both to accessing and advancing in employment and to engaging in an occupation. The Committee also recalls that, in order to be effective, these measures must include concrete steps, such as laws, policies, programmes, mechanisms and participatory processes, and remedies designed to address prejudices and stereotypes and to promote mutual understanding and tolerance among all sections of the population.

The Committee draws the Government's attention to its general observation of 2018 and requests the Government to provide information in response to the questions raised in that observation.

Article 1(2). Inherent requirements of the job. The Committee previously noted that section 13 of the Equal Opportunities Act, 2008 (EOA), provides for a wide range of cases in which an employer or a prospective employer may discriminate against a person on the basis of sex and that section 6(3) of the EOA and section 4(3) and (4) of the Employment Rights Act, 2008 (ERiA), provides that conditions, requirements or practices that have or are likely to have a "disadvantaging effect" are not deemed discrimination where they are "justifiable" or "reasonable in the circumstances". It urged the Government to ensure that the exceptions permitted correspond in a concrete and objective way to the inherent requirements of a particular job. The Committee notes that the Workers' Rights Act, No. 20 of 2019 (WRA), replaced the ERiA, but again provides in section 5(3) that "(a) person does not discriminate against another person by imposing or proposing to impose on that other person a condition, requirement or practice that has or is likely to have a disadvantaging effect, where the condition, requirement or practice is reasonable in the circumstances." Furthermore, the Committee notes the Government's indication that the Guidelines for Employers enumerate the provisions of section 13 of the EOA, without providing further guidance on their scope or implementation. In this regard, the Committee recalls that workers of both sexes should have the right to pursue freely any job or profession and that exclusions or preferences in respect of a particular job should be determined in a concrete and objective manner, taking into account the inherent requirements of a particular job and without reliance on stereotypes or negative prejudices about men's and women's roles. The Committee therefore asks the Government to review the application in practice of section 13 of the Equal Opportunity Act, 2008, and section 5(3) of the Workers' Rights Act,

No. 20 of 2019, to ensure that the exceptions permitted are in fact based on the inherent requirements of a particular job and do not restrict the right of workers of both sexes to pursue freely any job or profession. It also requests the Government to provide specific examples of the particular jobs concerned, as well as information on any judicial decisions interpreting these provisions or any advice, decisions or recommendations by the Equal Opportunity Commission dealing with this issue.

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1952)

The Committee takes note of the Government's report and the supplementary information provided in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020), as well as the observations of the Authentic Workers' Confederation of the Republic of Mexico (CAT), forwarded with the supplementary information. The Committee also notes the observations of the Autonomous Confederation of Workers and Employees of Mexico (CATEM), the International Confederation of Workers (ITC) and the Regional Confederation of Mexican Workers (CROM), forwarded with the Government's report.

Article 1(b) of the Convention. Equal remuneration for work of equal value. Legislation. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that section 86 of the Federal Labour Act provides that there shall be equal pay for equal work performed in the same post, the same working day and conditions of efficiency, and it requested the Government to take the necessary measures to give full legislative effect to the principle of the Convention. The Committee notes the Government's reference in its report to many legislative changes to integrate the principle of gender equality into the legislation (which are examined in greater detail by the Committee in its direct request on the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111)), although it observes that these changes have not modified section 86 of the Act. The Committee recalls that the legislation should not only provide for equal remuneration for "equal", "the same" or "similar" work, but should also address situations where men and women perform different work that is nevertheless of the same value (General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, 2012, paragraph 679). The Committee once again requests the Government to take measures to give full legislative expression to the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value as set forth in the Convention.

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 2006)

Article 1(b) of the Convention. Work of equal value. Legislation. In its previous request, the Committee noted that, while the Labour Law of 2011 explicitly provides, in section 77(2), for the principle of equal remuneration for work of equal value by guaranteeing each employed man or woman an equal wage for equal work or work of the same value performed with an employer, section 77(3) of the same Law continues to limit the concept of work of equal value to the same level of education, or professional qualifications, responsibility, skills, conditions and results of work. The Committee also drew the Government's attention to the fact that the expression "with an employer" in section 77(2) of the Labour Law limits the application of the principle of equal remuneration to workers employed by the same employer. The Committee notes the adoption of the new Labour Law in 2020 and that section 99 provides for the principle of equal remuneration for work of the same value. However, the Committee notes with regret that sections 99(1) and 99(2) have the same wording as the previous sections 77(1) and 77(2) of the Labour Law 2011. The Committee therefore once again recalls that the concept of work of equal value entails comparing the relative value of jobs or occupations that may involve different types of skills, responsibilities or working conditions that nevertheless are of equal value (see General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, 2012, paragraphs 673, 675, and 677). The Committee urges the Government to take the necessary steps to amend the Labour Law of 2020 in order to give full legislative expression to the principle of the Convention, and to ensure that comparison between the value of jobs or occupations can involve different employers and also different types of skills, responsibilities or working conditions that nevertheless are of equal value. It also requests the Government to provide information on all measures taken to this end.

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1963)

Article 2 of the Convention. Equality of opportunity and treatment for men and women. Public service. The Committee notes with interest the measures taken by the Government to mainstream gender equality in the public service through the deployment, in collaboration with UN Women, of a gender mainstreaming strategy in the public service providing for: (1) the setting up of administrative structures, the gender-sensitive management of human resources and competencies, and the embedding of equality in the behaviour and organizational culture of the administration; (2) capacity-building and the implementation of training; (3) the adoption of a manual of procedures for gender mainstreaming in recruitment, selection and appointments in the public service; and (4) amendments to the Public Service Regulations to include, inter alia, provisions for granting paternity leave and provisions relating to breastfeeding. It notes that this approach envisages standard specifications for the setting up of crèches close to workplaces, to be adopted by all ministerial departments. With regard to the appointment of women to senior posts in the public service, the Committee welcomes the appointment of women between late 2012 and mid-2019 to 12.4 per cent of senior posts and to 23 per cent of posts at all levels of responsibility. It also notes the obligation to appoint a woman to the committee responsible for interviews for the selection of candidates to these posts. The Committee trusts that the Government will be in a position to implement its gender equality mainstreaming policy in the public service and to continue promoting the employment of women at all levels, including in supervisory posts, and requests it to continue its efforts in this field. The Committee requests the Government to carry out regular evaluations of this policy, and to provide information on the results achieved, including statistics to support these evaluations. It also requests the Government to provide information on any amendments to the Public Service Regulations relating to paternity leave and any measures taken to enable men and women civil servants to achieve a better balance between their work and family responsibilities (crèches, etc.).

Private sector. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the National Employment Strategy (SNE) up to 2025 aims, inter alia, at promoting social inclusion and equity, in particular for young persons, women, rural workers and informal workers. The Government also recalls that, further to the evaluation of the Government Equality Plan 2012–16 (ICRAM 1), the Equality Plan 2017–21 (ICRAM 2) has identified seven strategic areas, including increasing the employability and economic autonomy of women and disseminating a culture of equality that combats discrimination and gender-based stereotypes. The Committee welcomes the numerous programmes and projects containing measures to improve the participation of women in the labour market, incorporate gender mainstreaming into all employment policies and promote gender equality and combat gender stereotypes, particularly in the media. The Committee notes the Government's indication that it is providing financial support for the implementation of partnership projects with associations working on the protection of women's rights at work, with the goals of awareness-raising of women regarding their rights and of employers regarding the importance of establishing a culture of professional equality in the enterprise. The Committee also notes that, according to the report entitled "In-depth national examination of the implementation of the Beijing Declaration and Platform for Action after 25 years" (Beijing+25), numerous measures have been taken to improve women's access to real estate, financial services and credit and to professional and business networks, with a view to thus developing entrepreneurship for women. Welcoming the measures and initiatives taken by the Government to achieve progress in gender equality in employment and occupation, the Committee trusts that the Government will be in a position to implement them with a view to increasing the participation of women in waged employment and in self-employment, to combat actively gender stereotypes and prejudices and to eliminate obstacles to gender equality. It requests the Government to take measures in this regard and provide information on the measures taken, the evaluations carried out and the results achieved throughout the country, including in rural areas.

Institution responsible for promoting equality and combating discrimination. The Committee notes with interest the promulgation on 21 September 2017 of Act No. 79.14 concerning the Parity and Anti-Discrimination Authority (APALD), the mandate of which includes receiving and examining complaints of discrimination, making recommendations to the competent authorities and monitoring follow-up action. It also notes that this institution, which includes members of the public administration and civil society, trade union representatives and employers' representatives, is also mandated to issue opinions on draft legislation and propose legislative amendments, promote the principles of equality and non-discrimination, particularly for women, and disseminate good practices in this field. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure that the APALD is established and becomes operational, particularly by granting it the necessary resources and staff to discharge its tasks, not only in relation to the handling of complaints, but also providing advice and recommendations, awareness-raising and training. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in this regard and also on APALD activities for combating discrimination and promoting equality in employment

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1977)

Article 1 of the Convention. Legislation. For many years, the Committee has repeatedly requested the Government to take all necessary steps to amend section 108(3) of Labour Act No. 23/2007, which provides that all employees have the right to receive equal wages and benefits for "equal work" without distinction based on, among other things, sex, with a view to ensuring that it fully reflects the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value set out in the Convention. It previously noted the Government's indication that the principle of the Convention is covered by this provision, and recalled that the concept of "work of equal value" includes, but goes beyond equal remuneration for "equal", "the same" or "similar" work, and also encompasses work that is of an entirely different nature, which is nevertheless of equal value. The Committee notes the Government's statement, in its report, that the revision of the Labour Act has already been discussed with the social partners and considered by the Council of Ministers and is now currently being reviewed by the National Assembly. It further notes the adoption of Act No. 10/2017 of 1 August 2017 approving the general status of state employees and agents, forwarded by the Government, and more particularly section 54(2) of the Act which provides that all state employees and agents are entitled to receive equal remuneration for "equal work". Regretting that the Government did not take this opportunitv to include in the legislation a provision explicitly providing for equal remuneration for work of equal value, as required by the Convention, the Committee notes however that, in 2021, the Government will benefit from ILO technical assistance in the framework of the «#Trade4DecentWork» project with a view to improve the implementation of ILO fundamental Conventions at national level, in particular by amending its national legislation. The Committee trusts that the Government will take every necessary steps to amend section 108(3) of Labour Act No. 23/2007 and section 54(2) of Act No. 10/2017, in order to fully reflect the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value in its national legislation, so as to cover not only situations where men and women are performing the same or similar work but also situations where they carry out work that is of an entirely different nature but is nevertheless of equal value. It asks the Government to provide information on any progress made in this regard, in particular as a result of the technical assistance provided by the ILO.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1977)

Article 1 of the Convention. Legislative protection against discrimination. The Committee previously noted that articles 35 and 36 of the Constitution and section 54(1) of the Labour Act No. 23/2007 provide for equality of rights at work for any worker, regardless of colour, race, sex, ethnic origin, place of birth, language, civil status, age, social condition, level of education, religious and political ideas and affiliation to a trade union. It however noted that the national legislation does not expressly prohibit both direct and indirect forms of discrimination in all aspects of employment and occupation. Regretting the repeated lack of information provided by the Government concerning the scope of application of section 54(1) of the Labour Act in practice, the Committee notes the Government's statement, in its report, that a draft new Labour Act is currently being reviewed by the National Assembly. In that regard, it notes that, in 2021, the Government will benefit from ILO technical assistance in the framework of the "#Trade4DecentWork" project with a view to improve the implementation of ILO fundamental Conventions at national level, in particular by amending its legislation. In light of the ongoing revision of the Labour Act, the Committee trusts that the Government will seize every opportunity to explicitly prohibit in its national legislation both direct and indirect discrimination, and that this prohibition will cover : (i) all the grounds listed in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention, as well as any other grounds already enumerated in its national legislation in accordance with Article 1(1)(b); and (ii) all aspects of employment and occupation (education, vocational guidance and training; access to employment and particular occupations; and terms and conditions of employment). It further asks the Government to provide information on any progress made in this regard, in particular as a result of the technical assistance provided by the ILO.

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 2001)

Article 1(1)(b) of the Convention. Additional grounds, including HIV status. Legislation. In its previous comment, the Committee requested the Government to take steps to ensure coherence between section 5 of the Labour Act that defines discrimination and section 33 on dismissal, so as to prohibit dismissals on the grounds of HIV and AIDS status, the degree of physical or mental disability, and family responsibilities. The Committee notes that in its report, the Government indicates that the current Labour Act is under review and that section 33(3) will be amended to extend the prohibition of dismissal of an employee to HIV and AIDS status, the degree of physical or mental disability, and family responsibilities. The Committee also requested the Government to provide information on the cases of discrimination in relation to HIV and AIDS status dealt with by labour inspectors and labour courts. The Committee notes that, in this regard, the Government refers to a court case of 2000, in which the Court considered that the refusal to employ a person solely on the basis of this person's HIV status was discriminatory. While taking note of this information, the Committee recalls that the fact that no new cases have been dealt with by the courts in the past twenty years may be an indicator of the lack of awareness, lack of access to remedies, or fear of retaliation. In that regard, the Committee wishes to point out that, according to the results of Namibia's first ever population-based HIV survey, known as NamPHIA, the country has become the first country in Africa to have more than three-quarters of its HIV-affected population virally suppressed (meaning they cannot pass the virus on to someone else) and welcomes this remarkable achievement. However, it also notes that Namibia still ranks fifth highest in the world in terms of its HIV burden, with an estimated 12.1 per cent of adults aged 15–49 living with HIV, according to the latest figures of the Joint United Nations Programme on HIV/AIDS (UNAIDS). The Committee trusts the Government will effectively ensure that section 33(3) of the Labour Act will be amended to extend the prohibition of dismissal of an employee to HIV and AIDS status (actual or perceived), the degree of physical or mental disability, and family responsibilities and asks to be provided with a copy of the amendment once adopted. The Committee also asks the Government to: (i) adopt specific measures to ensure that workers who are victims of discrimination on the basis of HIV status (actual or perceived) have effective access to legal remedies; and (ii) provide information on the number of cases of discrimination based on HIV status and on their outcome.

Articles 2 and 5. Implementation of the equality national policy and affirmative action. The Committee recalls that in its previous comment, it noted: (1) the adoption of the National Human Rights Action Plan (NHRAP) 2015–19, which identified as one of the main areas of focus "the right not to be discriminated against", in particular with respect to certain groups including women, indigenous peoples, persons with disabilities and LGBTI persons; and (2) the publication, in November 2017, of the Office of the Ombudsman's Special Report on Racism and Discrimination, which included recommendations for the Government (formulation of programmes and strategies, awareness-raising, support to victims, etc.) and for the employers' organizations (review of recruitment procedures, training to detect discrimination, establishment of procedures to deal with discrimination claims, etc.). The Committee further recalls that in the NHRAP, the following actions were envisaged: (1) a comprehensive review of the regulatory framework to assess non-discrimination compliance; (2) the development of a White Paper on Indigenous Peoples' Rights; (3) research of comparable legal instruments providing protection of the rights of persons with disabilities and developing benchmarks (i.e. building design standards); (4) research and review of laws and policies to identify and rectify provisions that discriminate against "vulnerable groups" (i.e. women, children, elderly persons, sexual minorities, persons with disabilities and indigenous peoples); (5) the review of the Affirmative Action (Employment) Act (Act No. 29 of 1998) with a view to establishing the continued relevance of race as part of the affirmative action criteria; and (6) the review of the current Racial Discrimination Prohibition Act (Act No. 26 of 1991) with a view to enacting new legislation against discrimination. In follow-up to its request to provide information on the implementation of the NHRAP 2015–19 and the impact of the Office of the Ombudsman's Special Report on Racism and Discrimination, the Committee notes that the Government merely indicates that the Namibia Employers' Federation (NEF) stated that it has disseminated the recommendations of the Ombudsman and the NHRAP to all its members. The Committee asks the Government to provide detailed information on the concrete measures taken to implement the action planned in the National Human Rights Action Plan 2015-19, in particular the review of the legislative and regulatory framework, and information on any research undertaken, obstacles encountered and results achieved in this regard. It further asks the Government to indicate what follow-up it gave to the recommendations in the Office of the Ombudsman's Special Report on Racism and Discrimination and the concrete steps taken to address such discrimination.

Designated groups. Persons disadvantaged on the ground of race, women and persons with disabilities. In its previous comment, the Committee requested the Government to: (1) step up its efforts to promote access to training and employment opportunities for workers belonging to the three "designated groups" pursuant to the Affirmative Action (Employment) Act, 1998; and (2) provide information on any legislative developments regarding the New Equitable Economic Empowerment Framework Bill 2015. The Committee notes that the Government refers to the 2016–2017 Employment Equity Commission (EEC) Report, in which the EEC has noted that, after 19 years of affirmative action implementation, "white employees", who constitute a mere 4 per cent of the workforce occupy 56 per cent of positions at the Executive Director level and 26 per cent of management positions. In addition, the Government indicates that results achieved for persons with disabilities were still rather disappointing compared to other groups, as they are under-represented at almost every occupational level. The Committee welcomes the Government's indication that the EEC introduced a number of measures to intensify it efforts towards workplace transformation, including the following initiatives: (1) the EEC identified some provisions of the Affirmative Action (Employment) Act, 1998 that required legislative redress and proposed amendments that are currently under consideration by the Labour Advisory Council (LAC); (2) the EEC engaged in the review of the EEC Employer's Guidelines and the Regulations to the Affirmative Action (Employment) Act, 1998; (3) the EEC prosecutes employers for non-compliance with the provisions of the Affirmative Action (Employment) Act, 1998; (4) the EEC visits work places to provide training on affirmative action; (5) the EEC case management system was introduced in 2017 to manage the affirmative action report process; and (6) the EEC identifies areas in which research projects are particularly needed and, in this context, has singled out research projects on persons with disabilities. The Committee welcomes the Government's efforts to deal with the persistent underlying causes of discrimination against the "designated groups". The Committee asks the Government to continue: to (i) step up its efforts to promote access to training and employment opportunities for designated groups and review regularly the affirmative action measures to assess their relevance and impact and to provide information on any measures taken is this regard and the results achieved; and (ii) provide information on any follow-up given to the work of the Employment Equity Commission (EEC) related to the review of the Affirmative Action (Employment) Act, 1998, and on the activities of this Commission. The Government is asked once again to provide information on any legislative developments regarding the New Equitable Economic Empowerment Framework Bill 2015.

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1971)

The Committee takes note of the Government's report and the supplementary information provided in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020).

The Committee also notes the observations of the Netherlands Trade Union Confederation (FNV), the National Federation of Christian Trade Unions (CNV) and the Trade Union Federation for Professionals (VCP) received on 29 August 2019, as well as the additional observations of the CNV and the FNV received on 24 September 2020, which were also transmitted by the Government.

Article 2 of the Convention. Measures to address differences in remuneration of part-time workers and workers in other non-standards forms of work contracts. The Committee previously noted the recommendations made by the Task Force Part-Time Plus established to address equal pay in a wider national context in which men are usually working full time and women part-time. It requested the Government to provide information on targeted measures taken to reduce the pay gap between men and women, taking into account the high number of women engaged in part-time work and their concentration in jobs that are generally lower paid, and to report in detail on the results achieved. The Committee notes the Government's statement, in its report, that a high number of women is still working part-time, in particular young women; the difference in the average number of hours worked per week between women and men (28 hours and 39 hours respectively, in 2017) being much greater that the European average. The Government indicates that, as a result, it has decided to undertake an Interdepartmental Policy Study (IBO) to explore the causes and effects of part-time work, as well as possible obstacles in working more or fewer hours, in order to elaborate relevant policy packages. As regards the concerns previously expressed by the FNV and the CNV regarding the gender pay gap with respect to other non-standard forms of work contracts (fixed-term work, zero or undefined hours contracts and self-employed workers), the Committee notes the lack of information provided by the Government. However, it notes that, in their additional observations, the FNV and the CNV point out that, as a result of the COVID-19 pandemic: (1) the number of hours worked by women has declined more rapidly than the number of hours worked by men; a situation which has had a negative impact on the labour market position of women and the achievement of equal remuneration; and (2) a high number of workers with flexible contracts lost their job. In that regard, the Committee notes that, in its supplementary information, the Government indicates that, on 22 June 2020, a temporary measure (TOFA) was introduced for "flexible workers" that have been laid off after 1 March due to the COVID-19 crisis, with a substantial loss of income. The scheme consists of a one-off gross payment of 1,650 Euros (EUR) for the period from March to May 2020. In light of the absence of measures implemented to address differences in remuneration of part-time workers, the Committee urges the Government to provide information on any measures taken to reduce the pay gap between men and women, taking into account the high number of women engaged in part-time work and their concentration in jobs that are generally lower paid, in particular as a follow-up of the planned Interdepartmental Policy Study on part-time work. It again asks the Government to provide information on any measures taken or envisaged to assess and address differences in remuneration with respect to other non-standard forms of work contracts and obstacles that may exist for such workers to initiate legal proceedings concerning pay inequalities between men and women.

Measures to address the gender pay gap. Referring to its previous comments, the Committee notes the Government's indication that the unadjusted pay gap between men and women decreased from 20 per cent, in 2014, to 19 percent, in 2016, in the private sector, and from 10 per cent, in 2014, to 8 per cent, in 2016, in the public sector. The Government adds that, after correction (taking into account differences in part-time and full-time work, age, level of occupation and management posts), in 2016, a difference remained of 7 per cent in the private sector and 5 per cent in the public sector, such figures being unchanged when compared to 2014. The Committee notes the Government's statement that an important part of the explanation of the gender pay gap is the persistent uneven distribution of care responsibilities between men and women which hampers women's participation in the labour market. In that regard, the Committee refers to its comments made on the application of the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111). As regards women in higher management level, the Committee notes the Government's statement that their number is rising too slowly as, mid-2017, women represented only 11.7 per cent of members of boards of directors and 16.2 per cent of members of supervisory boards. The Government adds that more companies need to work on moving women to higher positions and that it started to monitor progress in that regard, in particular through a benchmark on companies achieving diversity in top positions and the setting-up of a new Business Monitor. The Committee notes that the Government requested the Social and Economic Council (SER) to provide advice on effective measures that would contribute to gender diversity in higher management level. The Committee takes note of this information. However, it notes with regret the repeated lack of information provided by the Government on additional measures taken to address, in cooperation with the social partners, that part of the difference in remuneration that may be due to discrimination. In that regard, it notes that the FNV, the CNV and the VCP urge the Government to support a law proposal on equal pay for women and men that: (1) would request companies with more than fifty employees to prove that equal remuneration is paid to women and men for equal work; and (2) introduce a certification system with an obligation for employers to provide figures every three years on the remuneration of employees and address unequal remuneration situations, or pay fines, and the labour inspectorate being in charge of such monitoring. Furthermore, the trade unions consider that there is a need to address the possibility that part of the gender pay gap may be caused by discrimination, whether unconsciously or intentionally, while also improving the labour market position of women who are still overrepresented in lower-paid sectors, such as education, health care, childcare, cleaning and retail. In their additional observations, the FNV and the CNV add that the COVID-19 pandemic showed that such sectors are vital as women have been working in the frontline during the recent lockdown, while pointing out that this is not reflected in the level of their remuneration. In light of the persistent gender pay gaps, the Committee urges the Government to provide information on the proactive measures implemented to reduce the gender pay gaps, both in the public and private sectors, including by enhancing women's access to jobs with career prospects and higher pay. It asks more particularly the Government to provide information on any measures taken or envisaged to address the difference in remuneration that may be due to gender discrimination, including information on any legislative proposal in relation to the principle of the Convention. Finally, the Committee asks the Government to provide statistical information on the earnings of men and women, disaggregated by economic activity and occupation, both in the public and private sectors.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1973)

The Committee takes note of the Government's report and the supplementary information provided in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020).

The Committee also notes the observations of the Netherlands Trade Union Confederation (FNV), the National Federation of Christian Trade Unions (CNV) and the Trade Union Federation for Professionals (VCP) received on 29 August 2019, as well as the additional observations of the CNV and the FNV received on 24 September 2020, which were also transmitted by the Government.

Articles 2 and 3 of the Convention. National equality policy. The Committee previously noted the various measures implemented in the framework of the Action Plan on Labour Market Discrimination for 2014–2018, in particular in collaboration with social partners, in order to tackle discrimination in employment. It requested the Government to provide information on any evaluation made on the impact of such measures in promoting equality and addressing discrimination on the grounds set out in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention. The Committee notes the Government's statement, in its report, that a new Action Plan on Labour Market Discrimination for 2018–2021 is currently being implemented, building on the previous action plan. The Government indicates that: (1) the measures previously referred to are still being implemented, such as the Diversity Charter which has now been signed by 180 public and private companies; and (2) several other measures are ongoing, such as the extension of the supervision carried out by the labour inspectorate to make sure that sufficient safeguards are in place at company level to set-up a discrimination-free recruitment and selection policy. The Committee welcomes this information. Noting the Government's statement that the results of such measures will be discussed later, the Committee notes with regret the repeated lack of information provided by the Government on the impact of the measures implemented to promote equality and address discrimination in the labour market. It further notes that, in their observations, the FNV, the CNV and the VCP support the extension of the supervision powers of the labour inspectorate which is, in their view, necessary to combat discrimination during job interviews where much of discrimination takes place, but highlight that additional measures are needed to ensure enough capacity for labour inspectors to make sure that the rules are strictly enforced and to monitor complaints on discrimination. The Committee urges the Government to provide information on the impact of the different measures implemented to promote equality of opportunity and treatment and address discrimination in employment and occupation on all the grounds covered by the Convention, in particular in recruitment and selection processes, including in the framework of the Action Plan on Labour Market Discrimination for 2018–2021. Noting that the action plan will end in 2021, it asks the Government to provide information on any new action plan or policy elaborated as a follow-up, in particular in collaboration with the social partners.

Equality of opportunity and treatment irrespective of race, colour or national extraction. Ethnic minorities. The Committee previously noted the high unemployment rates among "non-Western" persons with a migration background (persons of whom both parents were born outside the Netherlands) and the need to address discrimination against certain ethnic groups, particularly those of Moroccan and Turkish origin, with respect to access to the labour market. Referring to its previous comments concerning the generic measures taken by the Government to address discrimination, in particular in the framework of the Action Plan on Labour Discrimination, the Committee notes the Government's statement that the main goal of the "Further integration into the labour market" programme is to evaluate the effectiveness of the various measures, instruments and policies implemented to address discrimination and improve the labour market position of all non-Western persons with a migration background, including men and women of Moroccan and Turkish origin. The Government adds that the results of the evaluation are expected in 2020–2021. The Committee further notes the Government's indication that the position of people with a non-Western migration background improved both in education and employment. In that regard, it notes, from the statistical information forwarded by the Government, that their net employment rate increased from 57.5 per cent in 2017 to 60.5 per cent in 2018. The Committee welcomes this information. It however regrets the repeated lack of information provided by the Government on: (1) the specific measures taken to address discrimination on the basis of race, colour and national extraction against non-Western minorities; as well as (2) the assessment of the impact of the measures already implemented. In that regard, it notes that, in their observations, the FNV, the CNV and the VCP highlight the persistent discrimination of people with a non-Western migration background in education and access to employment, referring to cases where temporary work agencies accept discriminative requests from hiring companies that explicitly ask for people that do not have a migration background. The trade unions add that it is complex to assess to which extent such practices exist because of the difficulty of collecting relevant statistical information. The Committee further notes that, in its 2019 concluding observations, the Human Rights Committee expressed specific concerns about the fact that persons belonging to ethnic minority groups continue to face discrimination in the labour market (CCPR/C/NLD/CO/5, 22 August 2019, paragraph 15). It further notes that, in its 2020 report, the United Nations (UN) Special Rapporteur on contemporary forms of racism, racial discrimination, xenophobia and related intolerance expressed specific concern about: (1) the unemployment rate of persons with a migration background which remains two and a half times higher than that of other Netherlanders, with individuals considered to be of a second-generation non-Western migration background generally facing an even higher unemployment rate, despite superior educational qualifications; (2) the higher percentage of individuals belonging to ethnic minorities who hold a "marginal" job (defined as jobs requiring a commitment of fewer than 20 hours/week) compared with native Netherlanders; and (3) the less favourable position of ethnic minorities, in particular those of Moroccan and Turkish origin, who are particularly disadvantaged in terms of earnings. The Special Rapporteur highlighted that ethnic minorities face discrimination both during hiring and afterwards, once they are in the workplace, as well as in education. Approximately 30 per cent of second-generation Turkish and Moroccan students dropped out of school in 2016 (A/HRC/44/57/Add.2, 2 July 2020, paragraphs 69 to 75). It further notes that, in its 2019 report, the European Commission against Racism and Intolerance (ECRI) expressed similar concerns highlighting that employment gap of these groups is not narrowing, in part due to discrimination. In that regard, it notes that ECRI recommended that authorities insert indicators and measurable targets to reach for all objectives and measures of the Action Plan against Labour Market Discrimination, while continuing to focus on access to the labour market, ensure that non-discriminatory recruitment procedures are developed and implemented, and extend the competences of the labour inspectorates to the field of recruitment (CRI(2019)19, 4 June 2019, page 10 and paragraphs 74 and 77). The Committee therefore urges the Government to strengthen its efforts to effectively address discrimination and ensure equality of opportunity and treatment in education, employment and occupation for non-Western persons with a migration background, including those of Moroccan and Turkish origin. It asks the Government to provide information on the concrete measures implemented to that end, in particular in the framework of the Action Plan on Labour Discrimination, as well as on any assessment made on their impact, including by providing the results of the evaluation which are expected in 2020–2021. The Committee further asks the Government to provide information on any cases of discrimination against non-Western persons with a migration background dealt with by labour inspectors, the Netherlands Institute for Human Rights or the courts, as well as the sanctions imposed and remedies provided.

Migrant workers. The Committee notes that, in their additional observations, the FNV and the CNV express deep concern about the high number of migrant workers in agriculture, food, transport and other sectors who are particularly exposed to unsafe working conditions as a result of the COVID-19 pandemic, as they often live and work together. The trade unions further highlight that health and safety measures for migrant workers on worksites, in housing facilities or in transportation to or from work are not enforced, as they work and live without being able to respect social distancing, without hygiene precautions, and are pressed to work even with COVID-19 symptoms. This resulted in a large number of workers being infected. Furthermore, even if there is sufficient equipment, which is generally not the case, migrant workers often do not have the time to wash hands and keep materials and machines clean as a result of their workload. Referring to its 2019 direct request on the Migration for Employment Convention (Revised), 1949 (No. 97), the Committee further notes that, in its 2019 concluding observations, the UN Human Rights Committee expressed concerns at the growing number of migrant workers, particularly from Poland and Hungary, who are coerced by employment agencies to work under exploitative conditions (CCPR/C/NLD/CO/5, 22 August 2019, paragraph 26). The Committee urges the Government to take proactive measures to promote equality of opportunity and treatment for migrant men and women in employment and occupation, in particular by combating exploitation of migrant workers and ensuring safe working conditions. It asks the Government to provide information on any measures and programmes implemented to that end, in particular in order to strengthen labour inspections in sectors employing a large number of migrants, as well as on their impact. Finally, the Committee asks the Government to provide information on the number and nature of cases of discrimination against migrant workers detected by or reported to labour inspectors, the Netherlands Institute for Human Rights or the courts, as well as the sanctions imposed and remedies provided.

General observation of 2018. With regard to the above issues, and in more general terms, the Committee would like to draw the Government's attention to its general observation on discrimination based on race, colour and national extraction which was adopted in 2018. In the general observation, the Committee notes with concern that discriminatory attitudes and stereotypes based on the race, colour or national extraction of men and women workers continue to hinder their participation in education, vocational training programmes and access to a wider range of employment opportunities, resulting in persisting occupational segregation and lower remuneration received for work of equal value. Furthermore, the Committee considers that it is necessary to adopt a comprehensive and coordinated approach to tackling the obstacles and barriers faced by persons in employment and occupation because of their race, colour or national extraction, and to promote equality of opportunity and treatment for all. Such an approach should include the adoption of interlocking measures aimed at addressing gaps in education, training and skills, providing unbiased vocational guidance, recognizing and validating the qualifications obtained abroad, and valuing and recognizing traditional knowledge and skills that may be relevant both to accessing and advancing in employment and to engaging in an occupation. The Committee also recalls that, in order to be effective, these measures must include concrete steps, such as laws, policies, programmes, mechanisms and participatory processes, remedies designed to address prejudices and stereotypes and to promote mutual understanding and tolerance among all sections of the population.

The Committee draws the Government's attention to its general observation of 2018 and requests the Government to provide information in response to the questions raised in that observation.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1983)

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government following the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020). The Committee proceeded with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the supplementary information received from the Government this year, as well as on the basis of the information at its disposal in 2019.

The Committee notes the observations of Business New Zealand and the New Zealand Council of Trade Unions (NZCTU) communicated with the Government's reports.

Article 1(b) of the Convention. Work of equal value. Legislative developments. The Committee previously noted that the Employment Relations Act (ERA) 2000, the Human Rights Act (HRA) 1993, and the Equal Pay Act (EPA) 1972, do not fully reflect the principle of the Convention, since they limit the requirement for equal remuneration for men and women to the same or substantially similar work. It however noted that, following the 2014 landmark decision of the New Zealand Court of Appeal (Terranova Homes & Care Ltd v. Service and Food Workers' Union Nga Ringa Tota Inc. (CA631/2013[2014]NZCA516) of 28 October 2014), which concluded that the EPA was not limited to providing for equal pay for the same or similar work, a tripartite Joint Working Group (JWG) was established in 2015 to develop pay equity principles. It previously noted that, following the recommendations made by the JWG, an Employment (Pay Equity and Equal Pay) Bill was introduced to Parliament on 26 July 2017, with the purpose of eliminating and preventing discrimination on the basis of gender in remuneration and other terms and conditions of employment. The Committee previously raised a number of concerns regarding the provisions of the Bill and asked the Government to take steps to ensure that any new legislation fully reflected the principle of the Convention.

The Committee notes the Government's indication, in its report, that the above mentioned Bill subsequently lapsed. The Government indicates that it reconvened the JWG (called the RJWG) in December 2017, which recommended that the pay equity principles be implemented by amending the existing EPA rather than creating a new Act. Following the recommendations made by the RJWG, the Government introduced the Equal Pay Amendment Bill on September 2018. The NZCTU indicates that it raised a number of concerns regarding the amendments but that, in its view, the provisions of the Bill were broad enough to accommodate the concept of «work of equal value». The Government also states that the Bill seek to accommodate the concept of «work of equal value». The Committee welcomes the adoption of the Equal Pay Amendment Act 2020 (2020 No. 45) which entered into force on 6 November 2020. It notes more particularly that the Act provides that an employer must ensure that: (1) there is no differentiation, on the basis of sex, between the rates of remuneration offered and afforded by the employer to employees of the employer who perform the same, or substantially similar, work (section 2AAC(a)); and (2) there is no differentiation, on the basis of sex, between the rates of remuneration offered and afforded by the employer for work that is exclusively or predominantly performed by female employees and the rate of remuneration that would be paid to male employees who have the same, or substantially similar, skills, responsibility, and experience; and who work under the same, or substantially similar, conditions, and with the same, or substantially similar, degrees of effort (section 2AAC(b)). The Act defines work that is or was «predominantly performed by females employees» as work that is currently, or that was historically, performed by a workforce of which approximately 60 per cent or more members are female (section 13F(2)).

The Committee notes that the Equal Pay Amendment Act 2020 further: (1) distinguishes between an equal pay claim (in case of alleged violation of section 2AAC(a)), a pay equity claim (in case of alleged violation of section 2AAC(b)) and an unlawful discrimination claim (in case of discrimination based on sex regarding other terms and conditions of employment than remuneration, pursuant to section 2A; (2) offers the employee who may allege one of these three kinds of claims a choice of proceedings between a claim under the EPA, a complaint under the HRA 1993 or an application to the Authority for resolution of a personal grievance under the ERA 2000 (section 2B); while (3) providing that in case of a pay equity claim, instead of having to go through the courts, employees can use a more simple and accessible pay equity bargaining process which may lead to a pay equity settlement. The Committee notes that pay equity claims can be raised by an individual employee, a union on behalf of one or more employees, or multiple unions acting jointly on behalf of the members of each union, and that union-raised claims can be raised with multiple employers. Copies of pay equity settlements shall be delivered to the Ministry of Business, Innovation and Employment (MBIE) for statistical and analytical purposes (sections 13A to 13ZZG). In that regard, the Committee notes that, in Business New Zealand's view, this is a better course to take than having the parties follow the litigation path which has too often resulted in a long drawn out process and if, in time, the plaintiffs are successful, damaging consequences for employers.

While acknowledging the efforts made by the Government to introduce in its national legislation new provisions defining "pay equity" and providing for a simplified pay equity bargaining process, the Committee notes that the Government did not seize this opportunity to take into consideration the concerns previously expressed by the Committee. Noting the Government's statement that the Equal Pay Amendment Act 2020 reflects the principle of the Convention, the Committee wishes to draw the Government's attention to the fact that the Act continues to restrict equal rates of remuneration to: (1) ''the same, or substantially similar, work'' (both in the case of an equal pay claim and a pay equity claim, e.g. sections 2AAC(a), 13B, 13E, 13ZE) ; or (2) ''the same, or substantially similar, skills, responsibility, and experience'' and ''work under the same, or substantially similar, conditions, and with the same, or substantially similar, degrees of effort'' (e.g. sections 2AAC(b) and 13ZE). It further notes that the provisions of the Act limit the scope of comparison to ''the employer of the employee'' (for an equal pay claim, section 2AAC(a)) or to ''another employee of the same employer'' (for a pay equity claim, section 13B), except when a union raises a multi-employer pay equity claim (sections 13B and 13E(3)). While noting the Government's statement that it will publish guidance for interpreting the meaning of ''substantially similar'' skills, responsibilities, working conditions and/or degrees of effort, the Committee is bound to repeat that the concept of ''work of equal value'' that lies at the heart of the Convention permits a broad scope of comparison, including but going beyond equal remuneration for ''equal'', ''the same'' or ''similar'' work, and also encompasses work that is of an entirely different nature which is nevertheless of equal value. It follows that the jobs to be compared on the basis of objective factors (such as skills, efforts, responsibilities, conditions of work, etc.) mav involve different types of skills, responsibilities or conditions of work, that can nevertheless be of equal value in its totality. As such, the principle of the Convention is not equivalent to the concept of ''pay equity'' as enshrined in the Equal Amendment Act 2020, nor is it reflected fully in the provision relating to ''equal pay for the same, or substantially similar work'' or for ''the same, or substantially similar'' skills, responsibilities, working conditions and/or degrees of effort. Furthermore, the Committee recalls that the application of the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value should not be limited to comparisons between men and women in the same company, as it allows for a much broader comparison to be made between jobs performed by men and women in different places or enterprises, or between different employers (see General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, 2012, paragraphs 676–679 and 697-698). Finally, the Committee notes that, in Business New Zealand's view, the aim of the Convention at the time of its adoption was to ensure that women received the same pay as men, and not that they should be paid what was paid to men doing some entirely different job. Business New Zealand adds that rates of pay are far better left to the market to determine. In that regard, the Committee wishes to recall that while ''value'' is not defined in the Convention, it refers to the worth of a job for the purpose of computing remuneration. ''Value'' in the context of the Convention indicates that something other than market forces should be used to ensure the application of the principle, as market forces may be inherently gender-based (see the 2012 General Survey, paragraph 674). The Committee therefore asks the Government to provide information on any steps taken or envisaged to give full legislative expression to the principle of the Convention with a view to ensuring that when determining whether two jobs are of equal value: (i) the overall value of the job is considered without limiting the comparison to «the same or substantially similar» work, conditions, skills, responsibility, experience and/or degrees of effort, and the definition allows for jobs of an entirely different nature to be compared free from gender bias; and (ii) the scope of comparison goes beyond the same company. It asks the Government to provide information on the application of the Equal Pay Amendment Act 2020 in practice, including on the number and nature of pay equality settlements agreed on, as well as a copy of the guidance provided by the Government for interpreting the Act. The Committee also asks the Government to provide information on any judicial or administrative decisions relating to the principle of the Convention, as well as on the manner in which it is ensured that when applying the Equal Pay Act, the Employment Relations Act and the Human Rights Act, the broader concept of work of equal value enshrined in the Convention is taken into account.

Occupational gender segregation and pay equity settlements in the public sector. The Committee previously noted the need for measures to address the undervaluation of work performed by women in the care sector, as well as in other sectors which predominantly employ women, including special education support and social work. The Committee takes note of the adoption of the Public Service Act 2020 (2020 No. 40), and notes more particularly that sections 80 to 84 of the Act, as amended by the Equal Pay Amendment Act 2020, regulate pay equity claims and the pay equity bargaining process in the public service. In that regard, it notes the NZCTU's indication that it supports the introduction of pay equity claims in the public sector and is involved in tripartite arrangements to oversee and assist in resolving these claims. As regards pay equity settlements in the public sector, the Committee previously noted that the Care and Support Workers (Pay Equity) Settlement Act 2017 specifies minimum hourly wage rates payable by employers with a view to redress past undervaluation of care and support work, which is mainly carried out by women. It notes the Government's statement that, as a result of the settlement which applies to more than 55,000 workers, home care and disability sector workers received pay rises of between 15 and 50 per cent depending on their qualifications and experience. It further notes that, while mental health and addiction support workers were excluded from the settlement, the Government together with trade unions and employers agreed in July 2018 to extend the settlement to those workers, who are predominantly women. In that regard, the Committee notes that the Support Workers (Pay Equity) Settlements Amendment Act 2020 came into force on 7 August 2020, now covering mental health and addiction support workers. Regarding pay equity claims lodged by the education support workers employed by the Ministry of Education, and by the statutory social workers employed by the Ministry of Children, the Committee notes the Government's statement that both pay equity claims were settled in 2018 for these workers who have been subject to historic gender-based undervaluation, thus agreeing on an increase of their minimum hourly rate. The Committee welcomes the pay equity settlements reached in public sector occupations which predominantly employ women. It notes that the Government adds that seven pay equity claims from three unions are ongoing, covering approximately 62,000 employees in four occupational groups in the public health sector (District Health Boards - DHB) where women are predominantly employed, namely nursing, midwifery, clerical and allied health and technical roles. It notes that according to the DHB Employed Workforce Quarterly Review, at the end of 2018, women represented about 89 per cent of DHB nurses; 78 per cent of corporate, clerical and other staff; and 81 per cent of DHB allied and scientific staff. The Committee notes that Business New Zealand again highlights that most women seeking pay equity settlements work in the public sector, among others as nurses or teachers, where the issue does not relate to discrimination but funding availability. Business New Zealand adds that some jobs are less well-paid than others but that this will always be the case and often reflects the nature of the industry, and that arbitrary increases, through pay equity settlements with no increase in productivity, have inevitable adverse effects: some employees lose their jobs and some businesses shut, because the increase is unaffordable. The Committee notes that the Government disagrees with the suggestion that pay equity settlements represent general wage claims, rather than pay equity claims. With regard to measures to address occupational gender segregation and its impact on the gender pay gap, the Committee refers to its comments under the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111). In light of the absence of legislation fully reflecting the principle of the Convention, the Committee asks the Government to provide information on the measures taken to ensure that pay equity settlements address the issue of undervaluation of work performed by women in line with the principle of equal remuneration between men and women for work of equal value. It further asks the Government to provide information on the pending pay equity claims in the public sector, in particular in the health sector. The Committee also asks the Government to indicate any other measures taken to address the undervaluation of work performed by women in sectors in which they are predominantly employed.

The Committee notes the supplementary information provided by the Government on matters raised in the direct request addressed to it and also reiterates the content of its observation adopted in 2019, which is reproduced below.

Article 1(b) of the Convention. Legislation. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to harmonize its legislation, Act No. 648 of 2008 on equal rights and opportunities, in order to incorporate fully the principle of equal remuneration for men and women workers for work of equal value, as enshrined in the Convention. The Committee notes that, in its report, the Government provides detailed information on the legislation in force, particularly on Act No. 648 of 2008, but that it does not provide any information on the harmonization of the Act with the principle enshrined in the Convention. The Committee recalls that the concept of "work of equal value" lies at the heart of the fundamental right of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value, and the promotion of equality. The concept of "work of equal value" is fundamental to tackling occupational gender segregation in the labour market, which exists in almost every country, as it permits a broad scope of comparison, including, but going beyond equal remuneration for "equal", "the same" or "similar" work, and also encompasses work that is of an entirely different nature, which is nevertheless of equal value (see 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 673). Recalling the importance of ensuring that men and women have a clear legal basis for asserting their right to equal pay for work of equal value vis-à-vis their employers and the competent authorities, whether their claim is on the basis of comparable data drawn from their own employer or from other comparable work outside their enterprise, the Committee urges the Government to take action in order to harmonize Act No. 648 of 2008 on equal rights and opportunities, to incorporate fully the principle of equal remuneration for men and women workers for work of equal value, as enshrined in the Convention and to provide information on progress in this regard.

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1974)

The Committee notes with concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments.

Legislation. The Committee previously noted that, for more than ten years, the Government has been indicating that the Labour Standards Bill of 2006, which would provide for equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value, is yet to be adopted. It notes the Government's repeated statement, in its report, that a provision covering the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value has been incorporated in the Bill (section 11.2). The Government adds that, in any case, the Constitution provides for equal remuneration for work of equal value. The Committee notes, however, that article 17(3)(e) of the Constitution provides for "equal pay for equal work without discrimination on account of sex, or any other ground". In this regard, the Committee wishes to recall that the wording of such provision unduly restricts the scope of comparison of jobs performed by men and women and does not reflect the concept of "work of equal value" as provided for under the Convention, which is fundamental to tackling occupational gender segregation in the labour market, as it permits a broad scope of comparison, including, but going beyond equal remuneration for "equal", "the same" or "similar" work, and also encompasses work that is of an entirely different nature, which is nevertheless of equal value (see General Survey on fundamental Conventions, 2012, paragraphs 672–675). The Committee notes with deep regret that the Government does not provide information on any progress made in the adoption of the Labour Standards Bill. It notes that, in concluding observations, the United Nations (UN) Human Rights Committee (UNHRC) and the UN Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW) respectively expressed concern about the delay in adopting the above-mentioned bill and recommended that the Government expedite the adoption of pending laws (CCPR/C/NGA/CO/2, 29 August 2019 and CEDAW/C/NGA/CO/7-8, 24 July 2017). The Committee therefore urges the Government to provide updated information on the current status of the adoption of the Labour Standards Bill. It trusts that real progress will be made soon in adopting legislation that fully reflects the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value in its national legislation, allowing for the comparison not only of equal, the same or similar work but also of work of an entirely different nature.

Article 2. Gender wage gap. The Committee notes the Government's statement that efforts are being made to obtain the statistical information pertinent to evaluate the progress made in the application of the principle of the Convention. In this regard, it recalls that appropriate data and statistics are crucial in determining the nature, extent and causes of unequal remuneration, to set priorities and design appropriate measures, to monitor and evaluate the impact of such measures, and to make any necessary adjustments (see General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, 2012, paragraph 891). However, the Committee observes from the 2019 Government's report under the national-level review of implementation of the Beijing Declaration, that the gender participation gap in labour force participation is still quite significant with an estimate of less than 25 per cent of women making up the country's formal labour force (NBS, 2018). In this report, the Government acknowledges that, despite women's contribution to the economy and to combating poverty through both remunerated and unremunerated work at home, in the community and in the workplace, several gender specific disparities exist as far as the country's economic indices are concerned, in particular as regard women's access to means of production and provides some concrete examples: (i) Nigerian labour markets are gendered, as a majority of those in formal employment are men. NBS 2018 data confirm that only 32,5 per cent of women were employed in the (non-agricultural) private sector; (ii) women run only 20 per cent of enterprises in the formal sector and 23 per cent of these enterprises are in the retail sector; women make up 37 per cent of the total work force in the garment industry, and they are very poorly represented in the wood, metals, chemicals, construction, and transport industries ; (iii) limited opportunities for employment and a rather small medium-scale enterprise sector have meant that micro or informal enterprise has become a default strategy for many Nigerians; (iv) data show that men are twice as likely to secure finance compared to women. In 2007, for example, about 64 per cent disbursed loans went to male applicants. Some of the reasons behind this include stringent prequalification criteria and a disconnect between available opportunities and women in the rural areas; (v) women's access to land, a key productive asset is limited: according to the Government's report, although the Nigeria Land Administration Act is egalitarian on paper, further work is required to operationalize the Act as the predominant practice is patrilineal inheritance (from father to son); (vi) women are significantly under-represented in secure wage employment in both the private and public sectors; and those who have formal sector jobs are constrained by the reproductive roles they play. As a result, many women occupy low-level posts that offer them the flexibility they need to manage their households while working in the formal economy.

The Committee notes further that, according to the Global Gender Gap Report from the World Economic Forum, in 2018 the country gender wage gap was high, being estimated at 35 per cent. In that respect, the Committee observes that, in its concluding observations, the CEDAW was concerned about the lack of information on the activities of labour inspectors to investigate the alleged gender wage gap, especially in the private sector (CEDAW/C/NGA/CO/7-8, 24 July 2017, paragraph 35). In light of the absence of legislation that fully reflects the principle of the Convention and the persistence of a significant gender pay gap, the Committee urges the Government to strengthen its efforts to take proactive measures, including in collaboration with employers' and workers' organizations, to raise awareness, make assessments, and promote and enforce the application of the provisions of the Convention in practice, in particular among workers, employers, their respective organizations and law enforcement officials. It further asks the Government to provide information on the measures taken to address the underlying causes of this persistent gender pay gap, identified in its report under the national-level review of implementation of the Beijing Declaration, such as traditional practices and gender stereotypes regarding women's professional aspirations, preferences and capabilities, and their role in the family, and to promote women's access to a wider range of jobs with career prospects and higher pay. Noting that the importance of micro-enterprises as the main source of income makes it a strategic area for the empowerment of women, the Committee asks the Government to indicate the concrete measures adopted to promote women's economic empowerment and entrepreneurship, as well as the results thereof. Finally, the Committee asks the Government to provide updated statistical information on the earnings of men and women, disaggregated by economic sector and occupation.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 2002)

The Committee notes with concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments.

Legislation. The Committee previously noted that, for more than ten years, the Government has been indicating that the Labour Standards Bill of 2006, which includes provisions on equality of opportunity and treatment, is yet to be adopted. It notes the Government's repeated statement, in its report, that a provision covering the principle of equality of opportunity and treatment in employment and occupation, is incorporated in the Bill. The Committee notes with deep regret that the Government does not provide information on any progress made in the adoption of the Labour Standards Bill, nor on the adoption of the Gender and Equal Opportunities Bill of 2016, which would provide protection against discrimination based on sex, age and disability; promote gender equality; and provide for special temporary measures, including in employment and occupation. It notes that, in their concluding observations, the United Nations (UN) Human Rights Committee (HRC) and the UN Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW) expressed concern about the delay in adopting the two above-mentioned bills and recommended that the Government expedite the adoption of pending laws and adopt comprehensive anti-discrimination legislation that: (i) includes a comprehensive list of prohibited grounds of discrimination, including race, colour, sex, religion, political opinion, and national or social origin; (ii) covers direct and indirect discrimination; and (iii) provides for effective remedies, including judicial remedies (CCPR/C/NGA/CO/2, 29 August 2019, paragraph 17, and CEDAW/C/NGA/CO/7-8, 24 July 2017, paragraphs 9, 10 and 35(b)). The Committee therefore urges the Government to provide updated information on the current status of the adoption of the Labour Standards Bill and Gender and Equal Opportunities Bill. It trusts that real progress will be made soon in adopting legislation that explicitly prohibits direct and indirect discrimination based on at least all the grounds set out in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention concerning all stages of the employment process, while also ensuring that the additional grounds already enumerated in its national legislation are preserved in any new legislation. In the meantime, the Committee again stresses the importance of enacting provisions to prevent and prohibit sexual harassment in the workplace, which is a serious manifestation of sex discrimination, and asks the Government to provide information on any progress made in this regard.

Articles 1 and 3. Discrimination based on sex with regard to employment in the police force. For many years, the Committee has been drawing the Government's attention to the fact that sections 118 to 128 of the Police Regulations of 1968, which provide for special recruitment requirements and conditions of service applying to women, are discriminatory on the basis of sex and thus incompatible with the Convention. More particularly, the Committee underlined that the criteria and provisions relating to pregnancy and marital status contained in sections 118, 124 and 127 constitute direct discrimination, and that sections 121, 122 and 123 on duties that women police officers could perform were likely to go beyond what is permitted under Article 1(2) of the Convention. The Committee also noted that legal provisions establishing common height for admission to the police were likely to constitute indirect discrimination against women. While noting the Government's general indication that this issue will be conveyed to the Police Service Commission for review, the Committee recalls that women should have the right to pursue freely any job or profession and that exclusions or preferences in respect of a particular job in the context of Article 1(2) of the Convention, should be determined objectively without reliance on stereotypes and negative prejudices about men's and women's roles (see General Survey of 2012 on fundamental Conventions, paragraph 788). It further notes that in its concluding observations, the CEDAW remained concerned about: (i) article 42(3) of the Constitution, which validates any law that may impose discriminatory restrictions with respect to an appointment to the police force; as well as (ii) the above-mentioned discriminatory provisions of the Police Act and Regulations (CEDAW/C/NGA/CO/7-8, 24 July 2017, paragraph 11). Recalling once again that each member State for which this Convention is in force, in accordance with Article 3(c), is under the obligation to repeal any statutory provisions which are contrary to equality of opportunity and treatment, the Committee urges the Government to bring its legislation into conformity with the Convention without delay, and to indicate any measures taken in this regard to effectively ensure equality of opportunity and treatment of women in the police force. It asks the Government, once again, to provide a copy of the Gender Policy for the Nigerian Police, as well as specific information on its implementation and impact, including any measures to address stereotypes and negative prejudices about the role of men and women in the labour market.

Articles 2 and 3. Equality of opportunity for men and women. The Committee previously noted that the National Gender Policy of 2006 was being reviewed and that, while no further information had been provided on training activities by the National Directorate for Employment (NDE) and the Technical Vocational Education Training (TVET) programme for rural women and women with disabilities, the Government referred to the "Community Services, Women and Youth Employment" (CSWYE) project. This project was being implemented to provide temporary employment opportunities in cleaning and light construction work through community services to unemployed women, youth, and persons with disabilities, while ensuring a level of guaranteed income for up to one year. The Committee notes with regret the lack of information provided by the Government on the measures taken to promote equal opportunities for men and women in employment and occupation. However, the Committee notes, from the 2019 Government's report under the national-level review of implementation of the Beijing Declaration, that the Government acknowledges that, although there have been major achievements when it comes to progress with gender equality and the empowerment of women, there are still several challenges, such as for example: gender stereotypes, social norms and cultural barriers; lack of enough up-to date gender disaggregated data; addressing the intersectional nature of gender inequality; inadequate funding to implement programmes and policies; insecurity, gender violence and conflict; non domestication of major treaties and poor implementation of some of the sector specific laws and policies (such as the National Gender Policy). In addition, the Committee notes that, in its concluding observations, the CEDAW was concerned that: (i) the CSWYE and "Growing Girls and Women in Nigeria" projects lack a legislative basis that would ensure their enforcement; (ii) there are no mechanisms in place to track the progress of the CSWYE project; (iii) there is no information on plans to expand that project to rural areas, where the majority of women live; (iv) women own less than 7.2 per cent of the total land mass and their land rights in rural areas are not guaranteed; and (v) rural women continue to face physical, economic and other barriers in gaining access, inter alia, to education and employment (CEDAW/C/NGA/CO/7-8, 24 July 2017, paragraphs 19 and 41). The Committee notes that, in the framework of the Universal Periodic Review (UPR), several UN bodies and organizations expressed concern about school dropout by many women and girls, in particular in the North-East region owing to the Boko Haram insurgency (A/HRC/WG.6/31/NGA/2, 27 August 2018, paragraphs 60–62). In this regard, the Committee notes, from the 2018 Statistical Report on Women and Men in Nigeria, published by the National Bureau of Statistics (NBS), that the enrolment rate of school-aged girls in primary education decreased from 48.6 per cent in 2014 to 47.5 per cent in 2016, and the completion rates for girls in primary, junior and senior secondary schools in 2016 were 64.8 per cent, 38.9 per cent and 28.7 per cent respectively. It notes that the literacy rate among girls and women aged between 15 and 24 years remained low at 59.3 per cent in 2016, compared to 70.9 per cent for men. While observing that the report of the NBS does not contain information on the situation of women in the private sector, the Committee notes that women represented only 44.9 per cent of the state civil service's employees in 2015 and were mostly concentrated in lower grades, their situation being similar in federal ministries, departments and agencies. Noting from the NBS statistical report that women are often disadvantaged in access to employment opportunities and in conditions of work as compared to men and that employment opportunities of many women are also limited as a result of their family responsibilities, the Committee notes with concern, from the 2017 Unemployment/Under Employment Report of the NBS, that the number of employed women decreased from 2017 to 2018 while their unemployment rate increased by 5.4 percentage points. The Committee notes that, in its concluding observations, the HRC expressed concern about discrimination against women in access to justice, education, employment and enjoyment of land and property rights persists both in law and in practice (CCPR/C/NGA/CO/2, 29 August 2019, paragraph 16). It also notes that, in its concluding observations, the CEDAW was concerned about the persistence of harmful practices and discriminatory stereotypes regarding the roles and responsibilities of women and men in the family and in society, which perpetuate women's subordination in the private and public spheres (CEDAW/C/NGA/CO/7-8, 24 July 2017, paragraph 21). The Committee notes that the Human Rights Council, in the context of the UPR, specifically recommended that the Government: (i) strengthen educational opportunities for girls; (ii) continue efforts to facilitate women's economic empowerment and access to economic opportunities, particularly in rural areas; (iii) prevent violence and discrimination against women; and (iv) intensify efforts to enable women to gain access to justice by increasing gender awareness among judges and other court personnel (A/HRC/40/7, 26 December 2018, paragraph 148). In light of the absence of legislation that fully reflects the principles of the Convention, the Committee urges the Government to strengthen its efforts to take proactive measures, including in collaboration with employers' and workers' organizations, to raise awareness, make assessments, and promote and enforce the application of the provisions of the Convention in practice, in particular among workers, employers, their respective organizations and law enforcement officials. It further urges the Government to provide information on the measures taken, including in the framework of the revision of the National Gender Policy of 2006, to improve equality of opportunity and treatment for men and women in employment and occupation, in particular in rural areas, by effectively enhancing women's economic empowerment and access to education and employment, including decision-making positions, as well as by improving the school attendance rate for women and girls while reducing their early dropout from school. The Committee asks the Government to provide statistical information on the participation of men and women in education, training, employment and occupation, disaggregated by occupational categories and positions, both in the public and private sectors, as well as in the informal economy.

Discrimination based on race, colour, religion, national extraction or social origin. Ethnic and religious minorities. The Committee previously noted that article 42(1)(a) of the Constitution – which provides that a citizen of Nigeria of a particular community, ethnic group, place of origin, sex, religion or political opinion shall not, by reason that he or she is such a person, be subjected either expressly by, or in the practical application of, any law in force in Nigeria or any executive or administrative action of the Government, to disabilities or restrictions to which citizens of Nigeria of other communities, ethnic groups, places of origin, sex, religious or political opinions are not made subject – only protects citizens and does not contain an explicit prohibition of discrimination in employment and occupation. Having noted that Nigeria is an ethnically and linguistically diverse society, the Committee has repeatedly requested the Government to provide information on the application of the Convention with respect to the different ethnic and religious groups in the country. It notes with regret that the Government once again provides no information on this point, nor regarding discrimination in employment and occupation resulting from the practice of ascribing certain occupations and social status to a person on the basis of that person's descent. The Committee notes with concern that, in its concluding observations, the HRC was concerned about: (i) allegations of discrimination against religious minorities, including discrimination against Christians in the northern states in terms of access to education and employment; as well as (ii) reports of discrimination against certain ethnic minorities in various aspects of their lives, including access to education and employment due to the differential access of indigenous persons and settlers, and segregation from society of some groups such as the Osu (CCPR/C/NGA/CO/2, 29 August 2019, paragraphs 44 and 50). In light of the absence of national legislation explicitly prohibiting direct and indirect discrimination on all the grounds set out in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention, concerning all stages of the employment process, the Committee urges the Government to provide information on any measures taken, in law and in practice, to address discrimination in employment and occupation faced by ethnic and religious minorities, including nomadic groups and Christians in the northern states. It asks the Government to provide information on any affirmative action and awareness-raising measures undertaken to promote equality of opportunity and treatment in employment and occupation for ethnic and religious minorities, as well as on any legislative developments relevant to the rights of minorities.

General observation of 2018. With regard to the above issues, and in more general terms, the Committee would like to draw the Government's attention to its general observation on discrimination based on race, colour and national extraction adopted in 2018. In the general observation, the Committee notes with concern that discriminatory attitudes and stereotypes based on the race, colour or national extraction of men and women workers continue to hinder their participation in education, vocational training programmes and access to a wider range of employment opportunities, resulting in persisting occupational segregation and lower remuneration received for work of equal value. Furthermore, the Committee considers that it is necessary to adopt a comprehensive and coordinated approach to tackling the obstacles and barriers faced by persons in employment and occupation because of their race, colour or national extraction, and to promote equality of opportunity and treatment for all. Such an approach should include the adoption of interlocking measures aimed at addressing gaps in education, training and skills, providing unbiased vocational guidance, recognizing and validating the qualifications obtained abroad, and valuing and recognizing traditional knowledge and skills that may be relevant both to accessing and advancing in employment and to engaging in an occupation. The Committee also recalls that, in order to be effective, these measures must include concrete steps, such as laws, policies, programmes, mechanisms and participatory processes, remedies designed to address prejudices and stereotypes and to promote mutual understanding and tolerance among all sections of the population. The

The Committee notes with deep concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments. The Committee informs the Government that, if it has not supplied replies to the points raised by 1 September 2021, then it may proceed with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the information at its disposal at its next session.

Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention. Prohibited grounds of discrimination. Legislation. Referring to its previous comments regarding legal protection against discrimination on the basis of the grounds set out in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention, the Committee welcomes the Government's indication in its report that section 8 of the final draft of the Industrial Relations Bill prohibits direct and indirect discrimination on the grounds of race, colour, sex, religion, pregnancy, political opinion, ethnic origin, national extraction or social origin, against an employee or applicant for employment or in any employment policy or practice. The Government adds that further consultations were held between the National Tripartite Consultative Council (NTCC) and the State Solicitor's Office in order to make final amendments to the Bill which was anticipated to be enacted in 2015. The Committee notes that the Government does not provide information on progress made concerning the review of the Employment Act, 1978, including the revision of sections 97–100 which prohibit only sex-based discrimination against women. It notes that the Decent Work Country Programme for 2013–15, which has been extended until 2017, has set as a priority the completion of the Industrial Relations Bill, and revisions of the Employment Act through the delivery of a new Employment Relations Bill. While noting that none of these Bills have been enacted to date, the Committee trusts that the Industrial Relations Bill will be adopted in the near future, and requests the Government to provide information on progress made in this regard. It also requests the Government to provide information on progress made concerning the review of the Employment Act 1978, and in particular sections 97–100, in collaboration with workers' and employers' organizations, with a view to aligning the provisions on discrimination with the Industrial Relations Bill and to bring them into conformity with the Convention.

Discrimination on the ground of sex in the public service. For over 15 years, the Committee has been referring to the discriminatory impact of section 36(2)(c)(iv) of the Public Services (Management) Act 1995, which allows calls for candidates to specify that "only males or females will be appointed, promoted or transferred in particular proportions", and section 20.64 of General Order No. 20 as well as section 137 of the Teaching Services Act 1988, which provide that a female official or female teacher is only entitled to certain allowances for their husband and children if she is the breadwinner. A female officer or female teacher is considered to be the breadwinner if she is single or divorced, or if her spouse is medically infirm, a student or certified unemployed. The Committee notes with deep regret that despite the adoption of a new Public Services (Management) Act in 2014, which repealed the Act of 1995, section 36(2)(c)(iv) referred to above has been maintained. It however notes that the National Public Service Policy on Gender Equity and Social Inclusion (GESI) adopted in 2013, and its action plan, set as priority action the revision of employment conditions in order to ensure equal access and employment conditions for all individuals regardless of gender. Noting the discriminatory impact of section 36(2)(c)(iv) of the Public Services (Management) Act 2014, section 20.64 of General Order No. 20 and section 137 of the Teaching Services Act 1988, the Committee urges the Government to take expeditious steps to review and amend these laws in order to bring it in line with the requirements of the Convention. It also requests the Government to provide information on any measures taken as a result of the GESI policy and action plan and any progress made to ensure equality of opportunity and treatment between men and women in the public service.

Discrimination against certain ethnic groups. Referring to its previous comments concerning the allegations made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) on the increased violence against Asian workers and entrepreneurs, who were blamed for "taking away employment opportunities", the Committee notes that the Government does not provide any information in this regard. The Committee once again requests the Government to investigate the allegations of discrimination against Asian workers and entrepreneurs including incidents of violence and to provide information on the results of such investigations. It also requests the Government to provide information on concrete measures taken to ensure protection in the context of employment and occupation, against discrimination on the grounds of race, colour, or national extraction, as well as on any measures taken or envisaged to promote equality of opportunity and treatment of members of different ethnic groups in employment and occupation.

Article 2. National equality policy. The Committee notes that the Government still does not provide information on a national policy specifically addressing discrimination on all the grounds enumerated in the Convention. With regard to discrimination based on sex, the Committee notes that some sections of the National Public Service Policy on Gender Equity and Social Inclusion of 2013 and the National Policy for Women and Gender Equality for 2011–15 seem to address the issue of gender equality in employment and occupation. The Committee recalls that, even though the relative importance of the problems relating to each of the grounds may differ for each country, when reviewing the situation and deciding on the measures to be taken, it is essential that attention be given to all the grounds of discrimination set out in the Convention in implementing the national equality policy, which presupposes the adoption of a combination of legislative and administrative measures, collective agreements, public policies, affirmative action measures, dispute resolution and enforcement mechanisms, specialized bodies, practical programmes and awareness raising (2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraphs 848–849). The Committee again urges the Government to provide full particulars on the specific measures taken or envisaged, in collaboration with workers' and employers' organizations, to implement a national policy aimed at ensuring and promoting equality of opportunity and treatment in employment and occupation on all the grounds enumerated in the Convention.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee expects that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1996)

Article 5 of the Convention. Special measures of protection and assistance. Restrictions on the employment of women. In its previous comments, the Committee hoped that restrictions to women's work would be strictly limited to maternity protection. The Committee notes with satisfaction that section 248 of the Labour Code of 2003, as revised in 2020, limits the prohibition on working in underground works to pregnant women, women who have recently given birth and women who breastfeed, as well as in activities that present risks to their safety or health or which may have an impact on their pregnancy or lactation. The Committee emphasizes that any protective measure applicable to the employment of women has to be rigorously proportional to the nature and scope of the protection sought and be limited to maternity protection if it is to be compatible with the principle of equality. It also wishes to emphasize that provisions relating to the protection of persons working under hazardous or difficult conditions should be aimed at protecting the health and safety of both men and women at work, and should be established on the basis of an evaluation showing that there exist specific risks for the health of women and men. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the implementation in practice of section 248 of the Labour Code, in particular regarding the criteria for determining which activities present risks to pregnant women and women who have recently given birth and women who breastfeed, and the measures taken to ensure that such criteria are compatible with the principle of equality between women and men.

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1980)

The Committee notes with concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments.

The Committee notes the observations of the Congress of Labour and Brotherhood of Rwanda (COTRAF-RWANDA) received on 24 June 2018. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments in this respect.

Articles 1(b) and 2 of the Convention. Equal remuneration for work of equal value. Legislation. The Committee recalls that the definition of the expression "work of equal value" which appears in section 1.9 of Law regulating Labour No. 13/2009 of 27 May 2009 refers only to "similar work" and is therefore too narrow to fully implement the principle of the Convention. It also recalls that this law does not contain any substantial provisions prescribing equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value and the Constitution only refers to "the right to equal wage for equal work". The Committee notes that the Government continues to repeat that, in practice, there is no discrimination between men and women with regard to remuneration, and that full legislative expression will be given to the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value in the ongoing revision process of Law No. 13/2009. The Government also indicates that the revision will also address the linguistic differences between the Kinyarwanda and English versions of section 12. The Committee once again refers to paragraphs 672–679 of its General Survey of 2012 on the fundamental Conventions explaining the meaning of the concept of "work of equal value" which not only covers "equal", the "same" or "similar" work but also addresses situations where men and women perform different work that is nevertheless of equal value. Noting that no progress has been made in this respect for a number of years, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary steps without delay to amend Law No. 13/2009 of 27 May 2009 regulating Labour, including sections 1.9 and 12, so as to give full legislative effect to the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value.

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) (ratification: 1983)

The Committee notes with deep concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments. The Committee informs the Government that, if it has not supplied replies to the points raised by 1 September 2021, then it may proceed with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the information at its disposal at its next session.

Article 1(a) of the Convention. Definition of remuneration. The Committee recalls that the Equality of Opportunity and Treatment in Employment and Occupation Act, 2000, contains no definition of the term "remuneration". The Committee notes the adoption of the Labour Code (Amendment) Act No. 6 of 2011, which amends section 95 of the Labour Code of 2006 to include the definition of "total remuneration" as "all basic wages which the employee is paid or is entitled to be paid by his or her employer in respect of labour performed or services rendered by him or her for his or her employer during that period of employment". The Committee notes that section 2 of the Labour Code, continues to exclude overtime payments, commissions, service charges, lodging, holiday pay and other allowances from the definition of wages. The Committee recalls that the Convention sets out a very broad definition of "remuneration" in Article 1(a) which includes not only "the ordinary, basic or minimum wage or salary" but also "any additional emoluments whatsoever payable directly or indirectly, whether in cash or in kind, by the employer to the worker and arising out of the worker's employment" (see 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 686). The Committee asks the Government to take the necessary measures to further amend section 95 of the Labour Code in order to ensure that at least for the purposes of the application of the principle of the Convention the concept of remuneration covers not only the basic wages, but also any additional benefit or allowance arising out of the worker's employment.

Different wages and benefits for women and men. The Committee notes with regret that despite the Government's previous announcement in this respect, the Labour Code (Amendment) Act No. 6 of 2011 does not repeal the existing laws and regulations establishing differential wage rates for men and women, nor does it revoke the Contract of Service Act which provides for different ages for men and women with respect to entitlement to severance pay. The Committee urges the Government to take measures without delay to ensure that all laws and regulations are repealed which contain differential wages for men and women, as well as the Contract of Service Act, which provides for different ages for men and women with respect to entitlement to severance pay. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any development in this regard.

The Committee informs the Government that, if it has not supplied replies to the points raised by 1 September 2021, then it may proceed with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the information at its disposal at its next session.

Article 1 of the Convention. Work of equal value. The Committee notes with regret the Government's indication that there has been no progress regarding the matter of amending section 3(1) of the Equal Pay Act of 1994, which provides for "equal pay for equal work" and is therefore not in conformity with the principle of equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value. The Committee requests the Government once again to take steps to amend section 3(1) of the Equal Pay Act without further delay in order to ensure that the legislation provides for equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value, as specified in the Convention; and to provide information on any progress achieved in this regard.

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 2001)

Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention. Legislative protection against discrimination. The Committee recalls that article 13 of the Constitution Order of 1979 contains a general prohibition against discrimination on the grounds of sex, race, place of origin, political opinions, colour or creed. For a number of years, the Committee has been drawing the Government's attention to the fact that article 13 of the Constitution: (1) does not refer to the grounds of national extraction and social origin listed in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention; and (2) excludes non-citizens from its scope of application, while the Convention covers both nationals and non-nationals. The Committee has further highlighted the lack of any specific legislation prohibiting discrimination in employment and occupation and recalled that constitutional provisions, while important, have generally not proven to be sufficient to address specific cases of discrimination in employment and occupation, and a more detailed legislative framework is required (see General Survey of 2012 on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 851). Referring to its previous comments where it noted the Government's intention to adopt a law similar to the Caribbean Community (CARICOM) Model Law on Equal Opportunity and Treatment in Employment and Occupation, the Committee notes with regret the Government's statement, in its report, that no further action has been taken in that regard. As regards section 27 of the Education Act (Cap 202) of 2006 which prohibits discrimination in admission to an educational institution or schools on a certain number of grounds, the Committee notes the Government's indication that social status is similar to social origin, but that there has been no judicial decision with respect to the meaning of social status. The Government adds that draft amendments to the Protection of Employment Act of 2003 have been made to prohibit termination of employment on the grounds of race, colour, gender, marital status, social status, sexual orientation, pregnancy, religion, political opinion or affiliation, nationality, or social or indigenous origin of the employee. Noting that such amendments are awaiting the approval of the competent authority, the Committee wishes to recall that the principle of equality of opportunity and treatment should apply to all aspects of employment and occupation. Under Article 1(3) of the Convention "employment" and "occupation" include access to vocational training, access to employment and to particular occupations, and terms and conditions of employment (see General survey of 2012, paragraph 749). The Committee notes that, in their concluding observations, several United Nations treaty bodies recently expressed concerns about: (1) the fact that article 13 of the Constitution is not applicable to non-citizens; and (2) the lack of provisions specifically prohibiting discrimination in employment and occupation (CCPR/C/VCT/CO/2/Add.1, 9 May 2019, paragraph 8; and CMW/C/VCT/CO/1, 17 May 2018, paragraph 26). In light of the persistent lack of progress made in the making of legislation that fully reflects the provisions of the Convention, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary steps without delay to ensure an effective legislative framework that explicitly prohibits direct and indirect discrimination based on at least all the grounds enumerated in Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention (race, colour, sex, religion, political opinion, national extraction and social origin), concerning all stages of the employment process and covering all workers, both nationals and non-nationals. It asks the Government to provide information on any progress made in this regard. The Committee recalls that the Government can avail itself of the technical assistance of the Office in this regard.

Articles 2 and 3(a). Lack of a national equality policy. Referring to its previous comments concerning the lack of a national policy promoting equality of opportunity and treatment in respect of employment and occupation, the Committee notes the Government's repeated statement that the competent authority has not developed a national equality policy yet. The Government however states that appropriate steps are being taken to formulate such a policy in a near future. In that regard, the Committee draws the Government's attention to the fact that the primary obligation of ratifying States is to declare and pursue a national policy designed to promote equality of opportunity and treatment in respect of employment and occupation, with a view to eliminating any discrimination in respect thereof (see General Survey of 2012, paragraph 841). In light of the absence of legislation that fully reflects the principles of the Convention, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to develop and implement a national policy promoting equality of opportunity and treatment in respect of employment and occupation, in order to effectively contribute to the elimination of direct and indirect discrimination and the promotion of equality of opportunity and treatment for all categories of workers. It asks the Government to provide information on any progress made in that regard.

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1993)

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020). The Committee proceeded with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the supplementary information received from the Government this year, as well as on the basis of the information at its disposal in 2019.

The Committee notes the observations of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), which were received on 11 September 2019.

Follow-up to the conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards (International Labour Conference, 108th Session, June 2019)

Article 2 of the Convention. Equality of opportunity and treatment between men and women. The Committee notes the discussion in the Committee on the Application of Standards (CAS) of the International Labour Conference, at its 108th Session (June 2019), on the application of the Convention, and the conclusions adopted. The conclusions of the CAS called upon the Government to: (1) report on the concrete measures taken to ensure that direct and indirect discrimination on all grounds is prohibited in law and in practice; and (2) provide without delay information on the implementation in practice of the Framework Law on State Guarantees of Equal Rights for Men and Women and Equal Opportunities in the Exercise of such Rights, No. 89 of 1 March 2005 (Law on State Guarantees of 2005).

The Committee welcomes the detailed information provided by the Government in its report regarding the legislative framework and the policies and programmes developed and implemented with respect to equality of opportunity and treatment between men and women. The Committee notes, in particular, that the Government acknowledges that gender equality cannot be achieved if laws and policies are not implemented in practice and indirect discrimination persists. The Government adds that in order to detect indirect discrimination the country's legislation in this area needs to be improved and the first priority is to amend the national legislation. It also indicates that to improve policy to ensure de facto gender equality, the National Development Strategy for 2030 provides for the following measures: (1) improving legislation in order to realize the State guarantees of creating equal opportunities for women and men; (2) developing institutional mechanisms to introduce national and international obligations to ensure gender equality and expand women's opportunities in sectoral policies; (3) activating mechanisms for the literacy and social inclusion of women, including rural women; (4) boosting the gender capacity and gender sensitivity of staff members at agencies in all branches of government; and (5) introducing gender budgeting setting in the budget process. The Committee welcomes the Government's indication that, with a view to achieving de facto gender equality, a working group on the improvement of laws and regulations to eradicate gender stereotypes, protect women's rights and prevent domestic violence has made proposals on introducing the concepts of direct and indirect discrimination, temporary measures, and compulsory gender analysis of laws. As regards the Law on State Guarantees of 2005, the Committee notes that in 2018, the Committee for Women's and Family Affairs (CWFA) monitored its implementation, by collecting and analysing data from central ministries and agencies, and selected local executive authorities. The Government further states that a report, which includes an analysis of the implementation of the law's articles, and conclusions and recommendations to improve its monitoring and implementation, was prepared in this regard.

The Committee notes from ITUC's observations that it regrets the lack of concrete information provided by the Government to the supervisory bodies, which would enable a more comprehensive assessment of the situation in the country. It further notes that ITUC emphasizes the need not only to draft laws but also to implement specific policies to eliminate all forms of discrimination and take proactive measures to identify and address the underlying causes of discrimination and gender inequalities deeply entrenched in traditional and societal values. The Committee notes ITUC's statement that the very name of the body responsible for the implementation of the national policy to protect and ensure the rights and interests of women and their families, the "Committee for Women's and Family Affairs", raises an issue because it appears to enshrine the idea that women are the only ones who have to assume responsibilities in relation to their families. In this regard, the Committee notes the Government's indication that, with the aim of eradicating stereotypes about the roles and duties of women and men in the family and society, and to boost awareness of and ensure equal rights and opportunities for men and women, a range of measures were implemented for different sections of society and the possibilities of the mass media are widely used. More than 200 programmes on understanding the importance of ensuring equal rights and opportunities for men and women were prepared and broadcasted by the members of the CWFA. In its supplementary information, the Government also indicates that it is taking every measure to root out gender discrimination against women based on stereotyped ideas of their capabilities and role in society, which contradict the Convention and hinder women's recruitment and employment.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that expanding economic opportunities for women and their competitiveness in the labour market, and the development of their entrepreneurial activities play a key role in ensuring gender equality. In this regard, it notes the detailed information regarding measures adopted to support the development of women entrepreneurship, through the allocation of grants, access to microcredit and an inter-agency working group to support women's entrepreneurship operating under the State Committee for State Property Investment and Management. The Government also indicates that further to the adoption of concluding observations in 2018 by the United Nations Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW/C/TJK/CO/6, 14 November 2018, paragraph 37), it has formulated, through broad discussions with the civil society, and adopted in May 2019, a National Plan of Action to Implement the Recommendations of the CEDAW 2019–22. In this regard, the Committee notes that the CEDAW, while welcoming the measures taken to support women entrepreneurs and to regulate domestic work and work from home, expressed concern inter alia about the following: (1) the concentration of women in the informal sector and in low-paying jobs in the healthcare, education and agriculture sectors; (2) the low level of participation of women in the labour market (32.6 per cent) and the low employment rate among women (40.5 per cent), compared with men (59.5 per cent); (3) the absence of social security coverage, the shortage of preschool facilities and family responsibilities non compatible with paid work, which make women particularly prone to unemployment; (4) the adoption in 2017 of the list of occupations for which the employment of women is prohibited; and (5) the lack of access to employment for women with a reduced capacity for competitiveness, such as women with disabilities, mothers with several children, women heads of single-parent families, pregnant women and women who have been left behind by male migrants.

With respect to the employment of women in the civil service, the Committee welcomes the various steps taken by the Government. It notes the indication that, as at 1 July 2019, there were 18,835 active civil servants in total (19,119 as at 1 January 2019), including 4,432 women, which represented 23.5 per cent of civil servants (4,441 or 23.2 per cent as at 1 January 2019). In leadership positions, there were 5,676 persons representing 30.1 per cent of all civil servants and 1,044 of them were women (18.4 per cent in such positions). The Committee further notes, from the Government's additional information, that as at 1 April 2020, women represented 23.7 per cent of civil servants, and 19.1 per cent of leadership positions. With a view to promoting gender equality in the civil service, the Government adds that the Civil Service Agency (CSA) together with all State bodies is taking appropriate steps to recruit women to the civil service at all levels of public administration. The Committee notes the Government's indication that, in the first half of 2019, the CSA together with the Institute for State Administration held 24 professional training courses for civil servants, including four retraining and 20 professional development courses, which were attended by 977 persons – 236, or 24.1 per cent, of whom were women. In line with the requirements of State statistical report form No. 1-GS, "Report on the quantitative and qualitative composition of civil service", the CSA also conducts quarterly monitoring and draws up statistical reports on the number of civil servants, including women, the results of which are transmitted to the appropriate State bodies and discussed at board meetings for the necessary steps to be taken. The Government also mentions positive measures adopted to promote the employment of women in the civil service, through the implementation, since 2017, of the State Programme on the Development, Selection and Placement of Gifted Women and Girls as Leading Cadres of Tajikistan 2017–2022; the establishment of incentives and quotas for women; and, on first appointment to the civil service, the granting of three additional steps on the grading scale, pursuant to Presidential Decree No. 869 adopted in 2017. According to the Government, as a result of implementing those measures, 36 women were recruited to various civil service positions in the first half of 2019.

Welcoming the positive developments regarding the promotion of gender equality in employment and occupation both in the private and the public sectors, the Committee asks the Government to pursue its efforts to foster equality opportunity and treatment between men and women in employment and occupation and, in particular, to take appropriate steps, including through amending legislation, to address indirect discrimination and occupational gender segregation. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the content, conclusions and recommendations of the report prepared to analyse the implementation of the Law No. 89 on State Guarantees of Equal Rights for Men and Women and Equal Opportunities in the Exercise of such Rights of 2005, as well as on any follow-up measures taken in this regard. The Committee also asks the Government to continue to provide detailed information on the situation of men and women in employment and occupation, both in the private and public sectors, as well as on the results of any positive measures taken to improve women's access to employment, and their results. Noting that the Government's report does not contain any information on any concrete measures taken, and their results, to address direct and indirect discrimination based on grounds other than sex, the Committee asks the Government to provide such information in its next report.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) (ratification: 1967)

The Committee notes the observations from the Confederation of Public Employees Trade Unions (KESK), received on 31 August 2020 and the Government's reply thereto received on 4 November 2020. Furthermore, the Committee notes the observations of the Confederation of Turkish Trade Unions (TÜRK-IS) transmitted by the Government on 3 November 2020.

The Committee also notes the observations of the Turkish Confederation of Employer Associations (TİSK) received on 31 August 2017, which were supported by the International Organisation of Employers (IOE) and the Government's reply thereto. The Committee also notes the observations of Education International (EI) and the Education and Science Workers' Union of Turkey (EGITIM SEN) received on 1 September 2017 and the Government's reply thereto. It further notes the observations of the Turkish Confederation of Public Workers Associations (Türkiye Kamu-Sen) and the TÜRK-IS which were attached to the Government's report.

Articles 1 and 4 of the Convention. Discrimination based on political opinion. Activities prejudicial to the security of the State. In its previous comments, the Committee noted with deep regret that the Government had not provided any information on the practical application of the Anti-Terrorism Act and the Penal Code in cases involving journalists, writers and publishers expressing their political opinions. Noting that it did not provide the required information, the Committee firmly urges the Government to provide information on the practical application of the Anti-Terrorism Act and the Penal Code in cases involving journalists, writers and publishers, as well as on all the cases brought before the courts against them, indicating the charges brought and the outcome.

Massive dismissals in the public sector: Civil servants, teachers and members of the judiciary. The Committee notes the observations of EGITIM SEN alleging the arbitrary dismissals of hundreds of its members (1,546 as of August 2017) from their teaching positions without any proof and without any court hearing; more than 300 were dismissed from their university positions because they had been critical of the Government and signed a petition in this regard. It also notes that, according to Türkiye Kamu-Sen, in 2015, 75,000 head teachers lost their jobs overnight (50,000 of these were members of EGITIM SEN). The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that the dismissals of civil servants, members of the judiciary and teachers took place after the coup attempt in July 2016, "on the grounds of membership, affiliation or connection with a terrorist organization". The Government adds that under the Penal Code and the Public Servants Law (Law No. 657), public officials who have been under investigation on charges of membership of a terrorist organization or an offense against constitutional order can be suspended from their posts, because "their conducting public duties constitutes a major threat to the security of public services, causing the disruption of it". The Government emphasizes that the criteria of loyalty to the State has to be met by civil servants. It also indicates that it has adopted several state of emergency decrees, including Decree-Law No. 667 on measures taken within the scope of state of emergency stating that "members of the judiciary, including the Constitutional Court, and all State officials shall be dismissed from the profession or the public service, if they are considered to have an affiliation, membership, cohesion or connection to terrorist organizations or to groups, formations or structures determined by the National Security Council to be engaged in activities against the national security of the State". Members of the judiciary who have been expelled from the profession can file a complaint before the Council of State. The Government adds that, pursuant to Emergency Decree-Law No. 6851, a commission to review the actions taken under the scope of state of emergency (hereafter the Inquiry Commission) has been established for a term of two years to assess and decide upon applications lodged by public servants, through the governorates or the last institution in which they were employed, against expulsion from their profession, cancellation of fellowship, dissolution of organizations, or the reduction in ranks in the case of retired personnel. According to the Government, the examination of complaints takes place on the basis of the documents that are in the file, and the decision of the Inquiry Commission is subject to review by the courts. In this regard, the Committee notes the KESK's allegations that, although 4 years passed, as of 3 July 2020 there were still 18,100 cases pending in front of the Inquiry Commission. It further alleges that: (1) there is no transparent mechanism through which public officers, who have no idea of the reason for their dismissal, can challenge any so called evidence against them; (2) there is no clear criteria that the Inquiry Commission adopted in its procedure; and (3) the selection of cases to be examined is arbitrary since there is no chronological or other order. The KESK also indicates that, according to a press statement issued by the Inquiry Commission, 96,000 of the applications were rejected and 12,200 public officers were reinstated, which shows that 89 per cent of the applications were rejected. It further underlines that even if public officers whose applications are rejected have a chance to apply to administrative courts, it will take several years.

The Committee notes from the Report of the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR) on the impact of the state of emergency on human rights in Turkey (January–December 2017), that "following the coup attempt [July 2016] at least 152,000 civil servants were dismissed, and some were also arrested, for alleged connections with the coup, including 107,944 individuals named in lists attached to emergency decrees" and over "4,200 judges and prosecutors were dismissed". The OHCHR's report also indicates that "an additional 22,474 people lost their jobs due to closure of private institutions, such as foundations, trade unions and media outlets" (paragraph 8). The Committee notes that the OHCHR observed that "dismissals were accompanied by additional sanctions applied to physical persons dismissed by decrees or through procedures established by decrees", including a lifelong ban from working in the public sector and in private security companies and the systematic confiscation of assets and the cancellation of passports (paragraph 68). According to the OHCHR's report, "[d]ismissed people lost their income and social benefits, including access to medical insurance and retirement benefits". Finally, the Committee notes the concern expressed by the OHCHR that "the stigma of having been assessed as having links with a terrorist organization could compromise people's opportunities to find employment" (paragraph 70).

The Committee also refers the Government to its 2018 observation, under the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), on the massive dismissals that took place in the public sector under the state of emergency decrees, and to the discussion that took place in the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards (CAS) in June 2019 on the application by Turkey of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) and to its current observation under Convention No. 98.

The Committee recalls that, under Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention, discrimination on the basis of political opinion is prohibited in employment and occupation. It also recalls that in paragraph 805 of its General Survey of 2012 on the fundamental Conventions, the Committee indicated that protection against discrimination on the basis of political opinion implies protection in respect of the activities of expressing or demonstrating opposition to established political principles and opinions and in respect of political affiliation. The Convention allows for exceptions, including measures warranted by the security of the State under Article 4, which are not deemed to be discrimination and must be strictly interpreted to avoid any undue limitations on the protection against discrimination. The Committee also recalls that it indicated in paragraphs 833–835 of its General Survey of 2012 that such measures "must affect an individual on account of activities he or she is justifiably suspected or proven to have undertaken" and they "become discriminatory when taken simply by reason of membership of a particular group or community". As "the measures refer to activities qualifiable as prejudicial to the security of the State[,] [t]he mere expression of opinions or religious, philosophical or political beliefs is not a sufficient basis for the application of the exception. Persons engaging in activities expressing or demonstrating opposition to established political principles by non-violent means are not excluded from the protection of the Convention by virtue of Article 4. […] [A]ll measures of state security should be sufficiently well defined and precise to ensure that they do not become instruments of discrimination on the basis of any ground prescribed in the Convention. Provisions coached in broad terms, such as 'lack of loyalty', 'the public interest' or 'anti-democratic behaviour' or 'harm to society' must be closely examined in the light of the bearing which the activities concerned may have on the actual performance of the job, tasks or occupation of the person concerned. Otherwise, such measures are likely to entail distinctions and exclusions based on political opinion […] contrary to the Convention." In addition, the Committee recalls that "the legitimate application of this exception must respect the right of the person affected by the measures 'to appeal to a competent body established in accordance with national practice'". The Committee also recalls that "it is important that the appeals body be separate from the administrative or governmental authority and offer a guarantee of objectivity and independence" and "be competent to hear the reasons for the measures taken against the appellant and to afford him or her the opportunity to present his or her case in full".

The Committee urges the Government to take appropriate steps to ensure that the requirements of the Convention are fully adhered to, taking into account the various criteria explained above. The Committee asks the Government to continue to provide information on the number of dismissals in the public sector, including teachers, that have taken place for reasons linked to the security of the State. The Committee further asks the Government to continue to provide information on the total number of appeals reviewed by the Inquiry Commission or by the courts, and their outcome, and to indicate whether in the course of the proceedings dismissed employees have the right to present their cases in person or through a representative. The Committee asks the Government to provide its comments regarding the KESK's allegations on the length of judicial reviews. The Committee further asks the Government to provide information on the number of complaints brought by dismissed employees alleging discrimination on the ground of political opinion.

Recruitment in the public sector. The Committee notes the Government's indications regarding the recruitment of personnel in the public sector, in reply to its request regarding the previous allegations made by the KESK regarding discrimination against civil servants (the recording in personnel files of inappropriate data, discriminatory use of promotion and appointments, and of the rewards system) and to the lack of adequate sanctions in the event of discrimination. The Committee notes that the Government indicates that, for a first appointment or a reappointment in the public sector, a "security investigation" and an "archive screening" have to be conducted in strict confidentiality at every stage. According to the Government, it is therefore not possible to give information to individuals or institutions other than the institution requesting the investigation. The Government adds that recruitment in public institutions and organizations is made through a merit-based central examination and placement procedure. The Committee notes from the observations made by Türkiye Kamu-Sen that appointment and promotion practices by way of oral examination or interviews work in favour of unions close to the Government and subject members of other unions to discrimination. The union adds that "while it has been recorded in court judgments […] that the interviews were not a fair means of evaluation", "the Government still does not implement these court decisions and continues to discriminate". In addition, the Committee notes that the KESK, in its 2020 observations, reiterates its concerns about the impartiality, neutrality and independency of the majority of those who serve in committees in charge of making decisions about new public officers' suitability to the public sector and alleges that oral exams are used to select those who are loyal to the Government rather than eligible for public services. The organization alleges that there is a broad and vague interpretation of the Penal Code and the Anti-Terrorism Act as regards the recruitment of new public officers and working life of public officers. The KESK also alleges that Presidential Decree No. 225 published on 25 October 2018 requires that "candidates shall be subjected to a 'security investigation' and 'archive screening' in a way that covers also family members". According to the organization, dozens of people were not recruited on the ground that there had been a judicial investigation against them in the past, even if they had been acquitted since. The KESK further states that: (1) the Decree was taken to the Constitutional Court that ruled that it was contrary to articles 13 and 20 of the Constitution and was therefore abolished; and (2) a draft law regulating the same issues would be discussed at the Parliament in October 2020. The Committee notes the Government's statement in its reply that, further to the annulment of the existing regulation on "security investigation" and "archive screening" by the Constitutional Court, and in line with the Constitutional Court decision, works are under way to submit a new piece of legislation to the Parliament as of October 2020, and the objections put forward by the KESK lack any legal basis. The Committee notes that the Government recalls that, in accordance with article 3(3) titled "Basic principles" of the Law No. 657 on Civil Servants, "the State is to base the entry into public service duties, the progress and promotion within the classes and the termination of duty on the merit system and to ensure that the civil servants have security in the implementation of this system with equal opportunities" and that entering the public office and promoting to senior management is based on merit. The Committee takes due note of the abolishment of Presidential Decree No. 225 published on 25 October 2018 and firmly hopes that the new piece of legislation announced by KESK and the Government will ensure that recruitment in the public sector is taking place without discrimination based on the grounds set out in the Convention, in particular political opinion. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on any development in this regard in law and in practice, including any procedure of "security investigation" and "archive screening" put in place by the future regulation. The Committee also asks the Government to ensure that persons alleging discrimination in recruitment and selection in the public sector have effective access to adequate procedures to review their case and to appropriate remedies. The Government is asked to provide information on any existing procedure allowing for an appeal against a negative decision in the recruitment process, the number and outcome of such appeals, and the effective implementation of court decisions relating to discrimination in recruitment and selection in the public sector.

Articles 1 and 2. Protection of workers against discrimination in recruitment. Legislation. For a number of years, the Committee has been referring to the fact that section 5(1) of the Labour Code, which prohibits any discrimination based on language, race, sex, political opinion, philosophical belief, religion and sect, or similar reasons in the employment relationship, does not prohibit discrimination at the recruitment stage. The Committee notes with satisfaction the adoption, in April 2016, of the Law on the Human Rights and Equality Institution of Turkey (Law No. 6701) which, in article 6, prohibits discrimination on the basis of gender, race, colour, language, religion, faith, sect, philosophical or political opinion, ethnic origin, wealth, birth, civil status, medical condition, disability or age, during the application, recruitment and selection processes, in employment and for termination of employment, and with respect to job advertisements, working conditions, vocational guidance, access to vocational training, retraining, on-the-job training, "social interests and similar subjects". According to article 6(3) of the Law, it is prohibited for employers or their representatives to reject a job application due to pregnancy, motherhood or childcare. The Committee notes that labour contracts or contracts for services which are excluded from the scope of labour legislation, and self-employment are covered by the provisions of article 6 of Law No. 6701. The Committee also welcomes the inclusion of employment in public institutions and organizations within the scope of this article. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the application in practice of article 6 of Law No. 6701 and, in particular, to indicate if any complaints by workers or any labour inspection reports were made under article 6, and their outcome.

Article 2. Non-discrimination. Equality between men and women. Vocational education and training and public and private employment. The Committee recalls that in its previous comments, it underlined the need to promote the access of women to adequate education and vocational training and to increase their participation in the labour force and in the public sector. With respect to the employment of women in the public service, the Committee notes the Government's indication that their participation has substantially increased due to temporary arrangements regarding working time and unpaid leave made available to mothers and fathers. As regards the private sector, it further notes that, according to the labour force statistics of February 2019, the labour force participation rate for women was 34 per cent (against 33.3 per cent in February 2018). The Committee welcomes the detailed information provided by the Government in its report, on the numerous programmes, projects, measures and activities developed and implemented with a view to promoting gender equality, including awareness-raising initiatives to fight against gender stereotypes and violence against women, strategies to reconcile work and family responsibilities such as the development of kindergartens and the provision of support for child care, vocational training programmes for women in non-traditional fields, and on-the job and entrepreneurship training programmes. The Committee notes that the Government also mentions the adoption of a Women's Employment Action Plan (2016–18) within the framework of the programme entitled "More and better jobs for women: Women's empowerment through decent work in Turkey" implemented jointly by the ILO and the Turkish Employment Agency (ISKUR) and financed by the Swedish International Development Agency (SIDA). The Government adds that the Action Plan aims to increase women's vocational skills and their means of access to the labour market and that 81 Provincial Gender Representatives, who received gender training, were appointed to monitor and report on its implementation together with the staff of ISKUR. The Committee also notes from the observations made by the TİSK that, according to the labour statistics, "one of the issues that needs to be addressed in order to facilitate the access of women to the labour market is education". The TİSK adds that, given the large number of women employed in the informal economy – in particular in agriculture – "priority must be given to the policies which will decrease undocumented work or informal employment of working women". The TİSK further points out that one of the main obstacles for women entering employment and on progressing in their career is the difficulties they face in reconciling work and domestic duties and that, despite the efforts made, there are not enough childcare institutions. The Committee notes the TÜRK-IS's allegations that, despite all the legal measures and policies put in place against discrimination, examples of differential treatments are still reported in practice. According to the TÜRK-IS, while the rights of pregnant women are regulated by law, women face the threat of dismissal from their employers when they fall pregnant or when they request to use lawful maternity leave, in particular in the private sector. The organization also raises concern regarding the new post-natal leave that would directly turn the way women work into long-term low paid jobs or part time working. In addition, the Committee notes the allegations by the KESK that equality between men and women is still a problem in the public sector since current policies and practices lead to discrimination and the Government's policies affect women very deeply, with an objective to keep them away from public, social, economic and professional life. It further alleges that the participation rate of women in the public sector is 38 per cent while it is 62 per cent for men, and women are channelized into some positions and sectors, such as health, social services and education that are considered suitable for women. Moreover, being a woman public officer means there are certain social and professional barriers and, as a result, only 8 per cent of higher and managerial posts are held by women. There are about 650,000 women teachers but only 25 women out of 1,299 senior managers in the Ministry of Education (1.9 per cent). The KESK adds that, according to official figures, the participation rate of women in the labour force was 29.7 per cent in May 2020 while it was 34.4 per cent one year before, corresponding to 1.3 million fewer women. According to the KESK, although it is a fact that there was a decrease in the employment rate due to the COVID-19 pandemic, this deeply affects women. The Committee notes the Government's statement in its reply that it is of great importance that women become individually and socially stronger, have more qualified education opportunities, enhancing their efficiency in decision-making mechanisms, increasing their employment level by facilitating their entry into the labour market, providing their social security, increasing the number of women entrepreneurs and creating more added value in the economy. The Government adds that empowering women in the labour market and increasing their participation in working life are among its main priorities and recalls the investments made in the private sector in crèches, day-care centres and pre-school education. The Committee welcomes the information provided by the Government regarding the quantitative targets established in the "Women section" of the 11th Development Plan (2019–2023). Through the provision of guidance services and subsidies to female entrepreneurs, the development of digital environments and cooperatives and the promotion of training in non-traditional fields, it is expected to increase: (1) the female labour force participation rate to 38.5 per cent; (2) the female employment rate to 34 per cent; (3) the rate of women in self-employment to 20 per cent; and (4) the rate of women employers to 10 per cent. The Committee also welcomes the adoption of the "Strategy Paper and Action Plan on Women's Empowerment" to cover the period 2018–2023, which is built on the following five elements: awareness of women of their own value; the right to have options and to choose among them; the right to access opportunities and resources; the right to have the power to control their own lives inside and outside the home; and their ability to influence the direction of social change in order to create a fairer social and economic order at national and international level. The Committee notes that it is envisaged in this framework to conduct an assessment of the legislation on the labour market in a way to ensure women's empowerment and making necessary improvements for effective implementation as well as studies for the employment of women in professions that are not limited to traditional employment areas and more generally various measures to tackle occupational segregation. The Government also emphasizes the improvement of the female labour force participation and the female employment rates between 2002 and 2019 (respectively from 27.9 to 34.4 per cent and from 25.3 to 28.7 per cent). The Committee notes that, in its concluding observations, the United Nations Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW) expressed concern about "the persistence of deep-rooted discriminatory stereotypes concerning the roles and responsibilities of women and men in the family and in society", which "overemphasize the traditional role of women as mothers and wives, thereby undermining women's social status, autonomy, educational opportunities and professional careers". The CEDAW also noted with concern that "patriarchal attitudes are on the rise within State authorities and society" and expressed concern "about the high dropout rate and under-representation among girls and women in vocational training and higher education, in particular in deprived rural areas and refugee communities" (CEDAW/C/TUR/CO/7, 25 July 2016, paragraphs 28 and 43). Noting the encouraging developments regarding the promotion of gender equality in employment but also the very slow increase in the labour force participation rates of women, the Committee asks the Government to step up its efforts and continue taking specific proactive measures, including within the framework of the "Strategy Paper and Action Plan on Women's Empowerment" (2018–2023), the 11th Development Plan (2019–2023) and the ILO–ISKUR–SIDA programme, to promote the access of women to adequate education and vocational training and to formal and paid employment, including to higher level positions. The Committee also asks the Government to provide information on the implementation of the quantitative targets in the "Women section" of the 11th Development Plan and the results of any assessment of the legislative framework concerning women's employment and the conclusions of any studies conducted in the field of gender occupational segregation. The Committee asks the Government to adopt proactive measures to actively combat persistent gender stereotypes and stereotypical assumptions regarding women's aspirations, preferences and capabilities and "suitability" for certain jobs or their interest or availability for full-time jobs and their role in society. The Committee also asks the Government to continue to take steps to enable both men and women to reconcile work and family responsibilities, including through the development of childcare and family facilities and support and by the removal of administrative obstacles to which the Government refers in this regard. Finally, the Committee asks the Government to provide its comments in reply to the TÜRK-IS' allegations regarding dismissal or threats of dismissal of pregnant women because of their pregnancy or taking full maternity leave.

Dress code. The Committee welcomes the Government's indication that further to the amendment in 2013 and 2016 of the Regulations on the dress code of personnel employed in public institutions, security organizations and armed forces, women working in these institutions and organizations are now allowed to work with a headscarf. The Committee hopes that the Government will continue to ensure that all persons working in public institutions, security organizations and armed forces continue to enjoy protection against religious discrimination on the basis of a dress code.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government, which reiterates the content of its previous request adopted in 2019.

Direct requests

In addition, requests regarding certain matters are being addressed directly to the following States: Convention No. 100 (Albania, Angola, Barbados, Belize, Chad, Comoros, Congo, Côte d'Ivoire, Democratic Republic of the Congo, Denmark: Greenland, Djibouti, Dominica, Fiji, France: French Polynesia, Gabon, Gambia, Georgia, Germany, Greece, Grenada, Guatemala, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Haiti, Honduras, Hungary, Iceland, India, Indonesia, Islamic Republic of Iran, Iraq, Ireland, Israel, Italy, Jamaica, Japan, Jordan, Kazakhstan, Kenya, Kyrgyzstan, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Latvia, Lebanon, Lesotho, Libya, Lithuania, Luxembourg, Madagascar, Malawi, Maldives, Mali, Mauritania, Mauritius, Mexico, Montenegro, Morocco, Mozambique, Namibia, Netherlands, New Zealand, New Zealand: Tokelau, Nicaragua, Niger, Nigeria, North Macedonia, Norway, Papua New Guinea, Republic of Korea, Republic of Moldova, Rwanda, Saint Lucia, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Sierra Leone, South Sudan, Suriname, Timor-Leste, Uganda); Convention No. 111 (Afghanistan, Albania, Argentina, Barbados, Belize, Burundi, Chad, China, Comoros, Congo, Democratic Republic of the Congo, Djibouti, Dominica, Fiji, France: French Polynesia, Gabon, Gambia, Georgia, Germany, Ghana, Greece, Grenada, Guatemala, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Haiti, Honduras, Hungary, Iceland, Indonesia, Iraq, Ireland, Israel, Italy, Jamaica, Jordan, Kazakhstan, Kenya, Kuwait, Kyrgyzstan, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Latvia, Lebanon, Lesotho, Liberia, Lithuania, Luxembourg, Madagascar, Malawi, Mali, Mauritania, Mauritius, Mexico, Montenegro, Morocco, Mozambique, Namibia, Netherlands, New Zealand, New Zealand: Tokelau, Nicaragua, Niger, Nigeria, North Macedonia, Norway, Papua New Guinea, Republic of Korea, Republic of Moldova, Saint Lucia, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Sierra Leone, South Sudan, Suriname, Tajikistan, Thailand, Timor-Leste, Turkey, Uganda); Convention No. 156 (Belize, Greece, Guatemala, Guinea, Iceland, Japan, Kazakhstan, Republic of Korea, San Marino).

Supplementary information received in 2020 to the 2019 reports

The following Member States have provided supplementary information in 2020. Their examination by the CEACR have however not led to a change to the CEACR comments issued in 2019: Convention No. 100 (Mali, Malta); Convention No. 111 (Mali, Malta).

Tripartite consultation

Antigua and Barbuda

Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144) (ratification: 2002)

The Committee notes with concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments.

Article 5(1) of the Convention. Effective tripartite consultations. The Government indicates in its report that the National Labour Board is currently engaged in the revision of the Labour Code. The Committee notes that the Government envisages establishing a subcommittee composed of members of the National Labour Board, along with representatives of workers and employers, to review international labour standards, engage the public in consultations when necessary and to make recommendations to the Minister on actions to be taken. The Committee notes, however, that once again the Government's report does not contain information with regard to tripartite consultations on the matters related to international labour standards covered by Article 5(1) of the Convention. Recalling its comments since 2008 concerning the activities of the National Labour Board, and noting that section B7 of the Labour Code, which establishes the Board's procedures, does not include the matters set out in Article 5(1) of the Convention, the Committee once again requests the Government to provide detailed information on the activities of the National Labour Board on matters related to international labour standards covered by the Convention. It further requests the Government to identify the body or bodies mandated to carry out the tripartite consultations required to give effect to the Convention. The Committee reiterates its request that the Government provide precise and detailed information on the content and outcome of the tripartite consultations held on all matters concerning international labour standards covered by Article 5(1)(a)–(e) of the Convention, especially those relating to the questionnaires on Conference agenda items (Article 5(1)(a)); reports to be presented on the application of ratified Conventions (Article 5(1)(d)); and proposals for the denunciation of ratified Conventions (Article 5(1)(e)).

Article 5(1)(b). Submission to Parliament. The Government reiterates information provided in April 2014, indicating that the 20 instruments adopted by the Conference from its 83rd to its 101st Sessions (1996–2012) were resubmitted to Parliament on 11 March 2014. It adds that a request would be made to the Minister by 15 November 2017 via the Labour Commissioner and Permanent Secretary concerning submission of the instruments to Parliament. The Committee refers to its longstanding observations on the obligation to submit and once again requests the Government to indicate whether effective consultations leading to conclusions or modifications were held with respect to the proposals made to the Parliament of Antigua and Barbuda in connection with the submission of the above-mentioned instruments, including information regarding the date(s) on which the instruments were submitted to Parliament. In addition, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the content, agenda, discussions and resolutions and on the outcome of the tripartite consultations held in relation to the submission of instruments adopted by the Conference as of 2014: the Protocol of 2014 to the Forced Labour Convention, 1930, and the Forced Labour (Supplementary Measures) Recommendation, 2014 (No. 203), adopted by the Conference at its 103rd Session, as well as the Transition from the Informal to the Formal Economy Recommendation, 2015 (No. 204), adopted by the Conference at its 104th Session.

Article 5(1)(c). Examination of unratified Conventions and Recommendations. The Government reports that the unratified conventions noted in its report were submitted to the National Labour Board on 11 November 2017 for re-examination with the social partners. The Committee requests the Government to provide updated information on the outcome of the re-examination of unratified Conventions, in particular: (i) the Labour Inspection (Agriculture) Convention, 1969 (No. 129), which is deemed a governance Convention; (ii) the Holidays with Pay Convention (Revised), 1970 (No. 132), (which revises the Weekly Rest (Industry) Convention, 1921 (No. 14); the Holidays with Pay (Agriculture) Convention, 1952 (No. 101), to which Antigua and Barbuda is a State party); and (iii) the Seafarers' Identity Documents Convention (Revised), 2003 (No. 185), (which revises the Seafarers' Identity Documents Convention, 1958 (No. 108), that has also been ratified by Antigua and Barbuda).

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Bangladesh

Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144) (ratification: 1979)

Article 5(1) of the Convention. Effective tripartite consultations. The Committee welcomes the information provided by the Government on tripartite consultations held within the Tripartite Consultative Council (TCC) during the reporting period on matters concerning international labour standards covered by Article 5(1) of the Convention. In this respect, the Committee notes that, in 2017, the TCC discussed the possibility of ratifying the Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138). The Government reports that preparatory work for the ratification of Convention No. 138 is being carried out, including tripartite consultations in the TCC concerning ratification. With regard to the possible ratification of the Labour Inspection (Agriculture) Convention, 1969 (No. 129), the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122), and the Indigenous and Tribal Peoples Convention, 1989 (No. 169), the Government reiterates that the ratification of these instruments is not feasible in the near future, indicating that in light of current economic and social circumstances in the country, it would take considerable time to create favourable administrative and legal systems prior to ratification. With respect to the ratification and application of the ILO instruments relevant to the occupational safety and health (OSH) framework contemplated under the 2013 Tripartite Statement of Commitment adopted after the tragic events of Rana Plaza and the Tazreen Factory, the Government indicates that the ratification of these instruments is not envisaged. The Government once again indicates that, while it has not ratified the OSH instruments, it is nevertheless committed to ensuring enforcement of existing legislation related to OSH. The Government refers in this context to the implementation of a set of initiatives taken with a view to improving the OSH situation of workers in the country, including the adoption of a National OSH Policy in 2013 and the establishment of a permanent Industrial Safety Unit under the Department of Inspection for Factories and Establishments within the Ministry of Labour and Employment (MOLE). It also refers to the establishment in March 2017 of a 20-member TCC for the ready-made garment (RMG) sector. The Government does not, however, indicate whether or not tripartite consultations were held to examine the possible ratification of the OSH instruments referenced. Lastly, the Government refers to the adoption of measures taken during the reporting period to strengthen the Tripartite Consultative Council, such as the establishment in 2017 of a TCC support unit within the MOLE. In addition, the formation of the TCC was incorporated in the Bangladesh Labour Act, 2006 (BLA), in amendments introduced in 2018. The Committee requests the Government to provide specific and detailed information on the content, the outcome and the frequency of the tripartite consultations held on all matters concerning international labour standards covered by the Convention, including on: replies to the questionnaires on Conference agenda items (Article 5(1)(a)); the submission of instruments adopted by the Conference to Parliament (Article 5(1)(b)); the re-examination at appropriate intervals of unratified Conventions and Recommendations to which effect has not yet been given (Article 5(1)(c)), including ILO instruments relevant to the occupational safety and health (OSH) framework; and reports to be presented on the application of ratified Conventions (Article 5(1)(d)).

In the context of the global COVID-19 pandemic, the Committee recalls the comprehensive guidance provided by international labour standards. It encourages Member States to engage in tripartite consultation and social dialogue more broadly as a solid foundation for developing and implementing effective responses to the profound socio-economic impacts of the pandemic. The Committee invites the Government to continue to provide updated information in its next report on the measures taken in this respect, in accordance with Article 4 of the Convention and Paragraphs 3 and 4 of Recommendation No. 152, including with regard to steps taken to reinforce the capacity of the tripartite constituents and strengthen mechanisms and procedures, as well as challenges and good practices identified.

Botswana

Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144) (ratification: 1997)

The Committee notes the observations from the Botswana Federation of Trade Unions (BFTU) received on 1 October 2020. The BFTU indicates that the Government submitted in 2019 a revised list of essential services to Parliament, without previously consulting the Labour Advisory Board (LAB) as provided by the law. The BFTU further indicates that the reports submitted to the ILO in 2019 and 2020 have not been consulted with the social partners. Finally, the BFTU alleges that the last tripartite meeting to discuss the measures to be taken to address the COVID-19 pandemic took place on 17 March 2020. Many measures have been taken since then without consultation. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments in this regard.

Article 5(1) of the Convention. Effective tripartite consultations. In its 2018 observation, the Committee requested the Government to provide detailed updated information on the content and outcome of effective tripartite consultations held within the Labour Advisory Board (LAB) and the High Level Consultative Committee (Sub-HLCC) on all matters related to international labour standards covered under Article 5(1) of the Convention, particularly with regard to the possible ratification of the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), and the Labour Inspection (Agriculture) Convention, 1969 (No. 129). The Committee further requested information on the frequency of consultations, as well as on jurisprudence relevant to the application of the Convention. The Government reports that the LAB met in 2016 and 2017 to discuss the Trade Disputes Bill of 2015 and the appointment of mediators and arbitrators. The Government also refers to the Labour Sector Committee of the High Level Consultative Council (HLCC), a tripartite structure that discusses issues pertaining to labour and employment, indicating that the HLCC meets four times a year. The Government adds that Botswana's labour laws are currently being reviewed by a tripartite Labour Law Review Committee with a view to aligning them with the provisions of ratified ILO Conventions, closing legislative gaps and transposing various judicial decisions into law. Noting that the Government has not provided the information requested relating to the implementation of Article 5(1) of the Convention, the Committee once again requests that the Government provide updated detailed information on the specific content and outcome of effective

Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144) (ratification: 1997)

The Committee notes the supplementary information provided by the Government in the light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020). The Committee examined the implementation of the Convention on the basis of the additional information received from the Government this year, as well as on the basis of the information at its disposal in 2019.

The Committee notes the observations formulated by the Trade Union Confederation of Burundi (COSYBU), received on 19 August 2019 and 14 August 2020.

Articles 2 and 5 of the Convention. Effective tripartite consultations. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to provide a copy of the legislative, administrative or other provisions giving effect to the Convention, and particularly those governing the composition and operation of the National Social Dialogue Committee (CNDS) and the provincial social dialogue committees (CPDS), and to provide detailed information on the consultations held annually on the matters relating to international labour standards set out in Article 5(1) of the Convention. The Government refers to the National Social Dialogue Charter adopted by the tripartite constituents in 2011, which enumerates the tripartite consultation mechanisms and their operation. It indicates that the CNDS was established by Decree No. 100/132 of 21 May 2013 revising Decree No. 100/47 of 9 February 2012 on the establishment, composition and operation of the CNDS. The CNDS is composed of seven Government representatives, seven employers' representatives and seven workers' representatives. It is chaired by an independent person chosen by the social partners. The Committee notes that the CNDS meets once quarterly in ordinary session and whenever necessary in extraordinary session. It also notes that the consultations held by the CNDS can be on any theme relating to the world of work. In its additional information, the Government explains that effective consultations between the tripartite constituents on matters relating to ILO activities take place through the CNDS. It specifies that the CNDS, as a national tripartite dialogue body, has provincial branches throughout the country, the provincial social dialogue committees (CPDS) created by Ministerial Ordinance No. 570/1697 of 21 November 2017. The Committee notes that the members of the CPDS elect a tripartite bureau, consisting of a President, a Vice-President and a Secretary, that meets once monthly. Furthermore, the Government refers to the Sectoral Social Dialogue Committee (CDSB), the mechanism for consultations on sectoral issues, which is active in some sectors, such as health and education, whereas action is required to revitalize it in other sectors. In its observations, COSYBU underscores that, since the adoption of the National Social Dialogue Charter in 2011 and the establishment of these social dialogue structures, no international instrument has been ratified or adopted. COSYBU maintains that it continues to call for consultations on the ratification of unratified ILO Conventions, including the two governance Conventions not yet ratified by Burundi, namely, the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No.122) and the Labour Inspection (Agriculture) Convention, 1969 (No. 129). In its previous comments, the Committee noted that these two Conventions were currently under examination by the Ministry of Public Service, Labour and Social Security. Furthermore, COSYBU indicates that it supports the motion before Parliament to adopt the following Recommendations: the Work in Fishing Recommendation, 2007 (No. 199); the HIV and AIDS Recommendation, 2010 (No. 200); the Domestic Workers Recommendation, 2011 (No. 201); the Social Protection Floors Recommendation, 2012 (No. 202); the Forced Labour (Supplementary Measures) Recommendation, 2014 (No. 203); the Transition from the Informal to the Formal Economy Recommendation, 2015 (No. 204); and the Employment and Decent Work for Peace and Resilience Recommendation, 2017 (No. 205). COSYBU asks to be kept informed of the outcome of the motion before Parliament. The Committee observes that the Government has not provided information on the content and outcome of the tripartite consultations that took place in the above-mentioned tripartite consultation mechanisms. The Committee requests the Government to provide a copy of the legislative provisions governing the composition and operation of the CNDS, the CDSB and the CPDS. It further requests the Government to provide detailed and updated information on the number, distribution and state of operation of all of these mechanisms in the country. It requests the Government to provide detailed information on the frequency, content and outcome of the tripartite consultations held on each of the matters relating to international labour standards set out in Article 5(1) of the Convention, including the consultations held to re-examine the prospects of ratification of unratified ILO Conventions, in particular those identified by the social partners, namely: the Social Security (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1952 (No. 102); the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122); the Labour Inspection (Agriculture) Convention, 1969 (No. 129); the Workers with Family Responsibilities Convention, 1981 (No. 156); the Maternity Protection Convention, 2000 (No. 183); the Domestic Workers Convention, 2011 (No. 189); and the Violence and Harassment Convention, 2019 (No. 190).

Article 4. Administrative support. The Committee notes the additional information provided by the Government further to its previous comments, in which it indicates that in fact there is no administrative support for consultation procedures, but that training is conducted on an occasional basis by trade union confederations and federations. The Committee recalls that under Article 4 of the Convention, the competent authority – the State – shall assume "responsibility for the administrative support of the procedures" relating to consultations and that this responsibility, as it noted in its General Survey of 2000, clearly encompasses responsibility for the financing that this entails. The Committee observes that Article 4(2) of the Convention concerns the financing of the measures that should be taken to provide appropriate training in order to enable those taking part in consultation procedures to carry out their functions effectively. The Committee hopes that the Government will take the necessary measures without further delay in order to fulfil its normal responsibilities. It requests the Government to keep the Office informed of any new developments in this regard.

COVID-19. The Committee notes that, in view of the COVID-19 pandemic, tripartite consultations on international labour standards may have been postponed. Against this background, the Committee recalls the guidance provided by international labour standards and encourages the Government to use tripartite consultations and social dialogue as a sound basis for the development and implementation of effective responses to the profound socio-economic repercussions of the pandemic. The Committee invites the Government to provide, in its next report, updated information on any arrangements made in this regard, including with respect to measures taken to build the capacities of the tripartite constituents, in accordance with Article 4 of the Convention and Paragraphs 3 and 4 of Recommendation No. 152, and to improve national tripartite procedures and mechanisms. It further requests the Government to provide information on the challenges encountered and good practices identified with regard to the application of the Convention, during and after the pandemic.

Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144) (ratification: 1998)

Articles 2 and 5 of the Convention. Effective tripartite consultations. Technical assistance. The Committee has been inviting the Government since 2014 to provide information on the progress made following the assistance provided by the ILO in 2013 on matters related to tripartite consultations and social dialogue. However, the Committee notes once again that the Government has not provided the requested information on the activities and progress achieved in ensuring the holding of the effective tripartite consultations required by the Convention. The Committee also recalls that, under the terms of Article 5(2), of the Convention, tripartite consultations have to be held at appropriate intervals fixed by agreement, but at least once a year (see the General Survey on tripartite consultation, 2000, paragraphs 119 and 120). The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken and the progress achieved with regard to matters relating to tripartite consultations and social dialogue. In particular, the Committee requests the Government to provide precise and detailed information on the frequency, content and outcome of the tripartite consultations held by the Higher Committee for Labour and Social Security on all the matters relating to international labour standards covered by Article 5(1) of the Convention, and particularly in relation to questionnaires on the items on the agenda of the Conference (Article 5(1)(a)), the submission of the instruments adopted by the Conference to the Parliament (Article 5(1)(b)), the re-examination at appropriate intervals of unratified Conventions and of Recommendations to which effect has not yet been given (Article 5(1)(c)) and the reports to be made on the application of ratified Conventions (Article 5(1)(d)).

Article 4(2). Training. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government according to which the economic crisis experienced by the country has slowed down most activities, including those relating to the training of participants in consultation procedures. The Committee once again requests the Government to describe the arrangements made for the financing of any necessary training of participants in the consultation procedures.

In the context of the global COVID-19 pandemic, the Committee recalls the guidance provided by international labour standards. It encourages the Government to engage more broadly in tripartite consultation and social dialogue, which offer a solid basis for the preparation and implementation of effective responses to the deep-rooted socio-economic repercussions of the pandemic. The Committee invites the Government to continue to provide updated information in its next report on the measures taken in this respect, in accordance with Article 4 of the Convention and Paragraphs 3 and 4 of Recommendation No. 152, including with regard to steps taken to reinforce the capacity of the tripartite constituents and strengthen mechanisms and procedures, as well as challenges and good practices identified.

Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144) (ratification: 1992)

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020). The Committee has examined the application of the Convention on the basis of the supplementary information received from the Government this year, as well as the information at its disposal in 2019.

The Committee also notes the observations of the Single Central Organization of Workers of Chile (CUT-Chile), received on 13 September 2018 and 6 October 2020. The Committee requests the Government to send its replies in this regard.

Tripartism and social dialogue. COVID-19 pandemic. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government in its supplementary report on the measures adopted to promote tripartism and social dialogue in the country. In this regard, the Government refers, among other measures, to the implementation of trade union training projects at the regional level within the framework of the trade union training fund, as well as the establishment of tripartite social dialogue forums at the national and regional levels in which consultations have been held on a broad range of labour issues, such as the regulation of the right to a lunch, the promotion of women's work in certain sectors, vocational reskilling and the recognition of labour rights to household refuse collectors. However, the Committee notes the allegation by the CUT-Chile that workers' organizations were not consulted regarding the new labour rules adopted in the context of the health emergency caused by the COVID-19 pandemic, such as: Act No. 21 227 of 6 April 2020 facilitating access to unemployment insurance benefits in exceptional circumstances; Act No. 21 220 of 26 March amending the Labour Code in respect of remote working; and the electronic severance procedure introduced by the Department of Labour. In the context of the global COVID-19 pandemic, the Committee recalls the broad guidance provided by international labour standards. The Committee encourages Member States to engage in broader tripartite consultations and social dialogue as a solid basis for drawing up and implementing effective responses to the deep-rooted socio-economic effects of the pandemic. The Committee invites the Government to provide updated information in its next report on the measures adopted in this respect, in accordance with Article 4 of the Convention and Paragraphs 3 and 4 of Recommendation No. 152, and particularly the measures adopted to build the capacities of constituents and strengthen tripartite mechanisms and procedures, as well as the challenges and good practices identified.

Articles 2 and 5 of the Convention. Effective tripartite consultations. The Committee notes the detailed information provided by the Government on the activities of the Higher Labour Council between 2017 and 1 January 2020. In particular, the Government refers to the holding of tripartite consultations on the possibility of ratifying the Protocol of 2014 to the Forced Labour Convention, 1930. The Government indicates that the Protocol was subsequently submitted to the Chamber of Deputies, where it is awaiting approval for ratification. Communications from the most representative organizations of employers and workers in the maritime sector were also forwarded on the amendments adopted in 2018 to the Maritime Labour Convention, 2006 (MLC, 2006). The Government also reports the establishment of various tripartite sectoral standing commissions, such as the Thematic Commission on Disability and the Thematic Commission on the implementation of the MLC. With regard to the latter, the Government indicates that it prepared an analysis of the national legislation with a view to identifying the necessary legislative adjustments to ensure compliance with the MLC, 2006. The Government once again refers to the organization in 2014, 2015 and 2019 of tripartite consultations within the framework of the Advisory Council on Occupational Safety and Health, as well as various regional tripartite workshops on the development of the National Occupational Safety and Health Policy (PNSST) with a view to giving effect to the provisions of the Promotional Framework for Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 2006 (No. 187). In this regard, the Government indicates, contrary to the indications made by the Production and Trade Confederation (CPC) in its observations of 1 September 2016, that employers' organizations were also invited to participate in the tripartite workshops (held on 8 August and 22 July 2014 and 9 March 2015). Moreover, in 2017 and 2018, tripartite consultations and workshops were held, some with ILO collaboration, to draw up the National Occupational Safety and Health Programme, which was finally adopted on 2 February 2018. The Government adds that in April 2019 a new version of the Programme was submitted to the members of the Advisory Council for their views. The Government further reports that, within the working group on dock work, tripartite consultations have been held on the possible ratification of the Occupational Safety and Health (Dock Work) Convention, 1979 (No. 152), and that a formal request was made to the Office for technical assistance on 21 January 2020 for the preparation of an analysis of possible legal gaps in the national legislation in this respect.

However, the Government notes the allegation by the CUT-Chile in its observations that, in practice, effective tripartite consultations on labour issues have not been held in the Higher Labour Council, which only operates for information purposes. In this respect, the CUT-Chile alleges that the social partners were not consulted prior to the submission of various international labour standards, some of which have been ratified. In particular, it maintains that tripartite consultations were not held in relation to the following instruments: the Violence and Harassment Convention, 2019 (No. 190), the Work in Fishing Convention, 2007 (No. 188), the Protocol of 2002 to the Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981, the Private Employment Agencies Convention, 1997 (No. 181), the Safety and Health in Mines Convention, 1995 (No. 176), the Protection of Workers' Claims (Employer's Insolvency) Convention, 1992 (No. 173), the Collective Bargaining Convention, 1981 (No. 154), the Rural Workers' Organisations Convention, 1975 (No. 141), the Labour Inspection (Agriculture) Convention, 1969 (No. 129), and the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81). The CUT-Chile adds that, while the Government has held consultations with the Office concerning the possible denunciation of the Indigenous and Tribal Peoples Convention, 1989 (No. 169), the social partners have not been consulted on this subject. The CUT-Chile also alleges that it did not receive copies of the reports on ratified Conventions, submitted under article 22 of the ILO Constitution sufficiently in advance to be able to comment on them. In this respect, the Committee recalls that, "[i]n order to be 'effective', consultations must take place before final decisions are taken, irrespective of the nature or form of the procedures adopted [...] The effectiveness of consultations thus presupposes in practice that employers' and workers' representatives have all the necessary information far enough in advance to formulate their own opinions" (see the 2000 General Survey on tripartite consultation, paragraph 31). Finally, the Committee notes that the Government has not provided information on the tripartite consultations held on replies to questionnaires concerning items on the agenda of the International Labour Conference, the re-examination at appropriate intervals of unratified Conventions and of Recommendations, and proposals for the denunciation of ratified Conventions (Article 5(1)(a), (b), (c) and (e)). The Committee therefore requests the Government to provide detailed and updated information on the specific content, frequency and outcome of the tripartite consultations held on all the matters relating to international labour standards covered by Article 5(1) of the Convention. Moreover, in light of the observations of the CUT-Chile, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the consultations held with the social partners on the manner in which the functioning of the procedures required by the Convention could be improved, including the possibility of establishing a schedule for the preparation of reports sufficiently in advance (Article 5(1)(d)).

Hong Kong Special Administrative Region

Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144) (notification: 1997)

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020). The Committee proceeded with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the supplementary information received from the Government this year, as well as on the basis of the information at its disposal in 2019.

Articles 2(1) and 3(1) of the Convention. Effective tripartite consultations. Election of representatives of the social partners. The Committee has been requesting for some years that the Government and the social partners promote and strengthen tripartism and social dialogue in order to facilitate the operation of the procedures governing effective tripartite consultations, including ensuring the meaningful participation of the Hong Kong Confederation of Trade Unions (HKCTU) in the consultation process. In its previous comments, the Committee expressed its concern that there is a risk that the HKCTU may have been excluded from meaningful participation in the consultative process among the most representative organizations of workers in the Labour Advisory Board (LAB), as a result of the electoral system in place in the Special Administrative Region. In this context, the Committee recalls the previous observations of the HKCTU, which expressed concern in relation to the electoral system for representation on the LAB, the designated tripartite body for tripartite consultations for purposes of the Convention. In its observations, the HKCTU indicated that the composition of the LAB includes six workers' representatives, five of whom are elected by registered trade unions, with a sixth representative appointed ad personam by the Government. It noted that, according to the current system, union votes are given equal weight regardless of size of membership, according to the principle of "one union, one vote". Moreover, the electoral system allows voters to vote for a slate of five candidates, as a block, in one ballot. As a result, if the slate of five candidates receives more than half of the votes, the slate would win all five seats. In its observations, the HKCTU maintained that this electoral system was unjust and had effectively prevented it from being elected to the LAB, despite its status as the second largest trade union confederation. The Committee notes the Government's indication that its position in respect of the application of the Convention remains unchanged. The Committee notes that, in its report, the Government once again reiterates its commitment to ensuring effective tripartite consultations through the LAB, as well as reiterating information previously provided concerning its electoral system. The Government reiterates that, in the Hong Kong Special Administrative Region (HKSAR), every workers' union is free either to affiliate to one or more trade union groups or to remain unaffiliated. The Government notes that more than half of the registered workers' unions are not affiliated to any major trade union group and that, since all workers' unions may exercise their free choice in the election, no trade union group can dictate the election results. It adds that all registered workers' unions are entitled to exercise their free choice in the election and that there is no question of any particular workers' union being excluded from the election. The Government reiterates its commitment to continuing to ensure that every registered trade union, including those affiliated to the HKCTU, enjoys the same right as other registered trade unions to nominate candidates and to vote in the election of workers' representatives of the LAB. Nevertheless, the Government reiterates that it would be improper and inappropriate if the system of electing workers' representatives to the LAB were to be changed for the advantage of a particular organization. In this context, the Committee notes that the latest election of workers' representatives in the LAB was held in November 2018. The Government indicates that 12 nominations were received, which included four incumbent workers' representatives and that, after the trade unions cast their votes by secret ballot, three incumbent workers' representatives and two other candidates were elected. The HKCTU was not elected to the LAB. The Committee recalls that the term "most representative organizations of employers and workers", as provided for in Article 1 of the Convention, "does not mean only the largest organization of employers and the largest organization of workers". In its 2000 General Survey on tripartite consultation, paragraph 34, the Committee refers to Advisory Opinion No. 1 of the Permanent Court of International Justice, dated 31 July 1922, in which the Court established that the use of the plural of the term "organizations" in Article 389 of the Treaty of Versailles referred to both organizations of employers and those of workers. Based on this opinion, the General Survey clarified that the term "most representative organizations of employers and workers" does not mean only the largest such organization. If in a particular country there are two or more organizations of employers or workers which represent a significant body of opinion, even though one of them may be larger than the others, they may all be considered to be "most representative organizations" for the purpose of the Convention. In such cases, governments should endeavour to secure an agreement of all the organizations concerned in establishing the tripartite procedures (2000 General Survey on tripartite consultation, paragraph 34). The Committee therefore once again urges the Government to make every effort, together with the social partners, to ensure that tripartism and social dialogue are promoted and strengthened so as to facilitate the operation of procedures that ensure effective tripartite consultations that include the most representative organizations of employers and workers, as required under Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention, including by encouraging the Labour Advisory Board to amend its current electoral system. The Committee also once again requests the Government to report on progress made in ensuring the HKCTU's meaningful participation in the consultative process among the most representative organizations of workers.

Article 5(1). Effective tripartite consultations. The Government indicates that, during the reporting period, the LAB's Committee on the Implementation of International Labour Standards (CIILS) was consulted on all reports to be submitted under article 22 of the ILO Constitution. The procedures for preparing these reports and copies of the reports were communicated to all members of the LAB. In 2018, members of the CIILS met with officials from the Transport and Housing Bureau and the Marine Department of the HKSAR Government and were informed of progress with regard to the application of the Maritime Labour Convention, 2006 (MLC, 2006), in the HKSAR. The Committee notes the report of the LAB for 2017–18, communicated together with the Government's report. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide detailed and up-to-date information on the content and outcome of the consultations held on all of the matters relative to international labour standards as required under Article 5(1)(a)–(e) of the Convention.

In the context of the global COVID-19 pandemic, the Committee recalls the comprehensive guidance provided by international labour standards. It encourages the Government to engage in tripartite consultation and social dialogue more broadly as a solid foundation for developing and implementing effective responses to the profound socio-economic impacts of the pandemic. The Committee invites the Government to provide updated information in its next report on measures taken in this respect, in accordance with the guidance provided in Article 4 of the Convention as well as Paragraphs 3 and 4 of Recommendation No. 152, including with regard to steps taken to build the capacity of the tripartite constituents and strengthen mechanisms and procedures, as well as challenges and good practices identified.

Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144) (ratification: 1999)

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020). The Committee is examining the application of the Convention on the basis of the supplementary information received from the Government this year, as well as on the basis of the information at its disposal in 2019.

The Committee notes the Government's replies to the observations made by the social partners in 2016, which were included in its 2019 report. The Committee also notes the joint observations of the International Organisation of Employers (IOE) and the National Employers Association of Colombia (ANDI), received on 4 September 2019. It also notes the observations of the General Confederation of Labour (CGT), received on 16 September 2019. The Committee requests the Government to provide its replies to these observations.

Tripartism and social dialogue in the context of the COVID-19 pandemic. The Committee notes the detailed information provided by the Government in its supplementary report on the tripartite consultations held within the framework of the various subcommittees of the Standing Committee for Dialogue on Wage and Labour Policies (CPCPSL) on the labour measures adopted to mitigate the effects of the pandemic. In particular, the Government refers to the tripartite consultations held on such subjects as measures to prevent job losses and the follow-up to the complaints made relating to the suspension of contracts, the imposition of unpaid leave by the employer and dismissals. The Government also reports the adoption of the Labour Mediation Strategy during the COVID-19 Period, in the context of which 70 cases have been dealt with, as well as the establishment on 30 July of the Employment Mission, which will benefit from ILO technical assistance with a view to developing strategies and instruments to improve employment in the country. The Committee also notes the detailed information provided by the Government concerning the progress made by the Special Committee for the Handling of Conflicts referred to the ILO between 2012 and 2020, as the Special Committee continued to hold virtual meetings during the quarantine period established due to the pandemic. The Committee further notes the detailed information provided by the Government in its supplementary report on the four sessions of the Subcommittee on International Labour Matters held between March and September 2020, in which the discussions covered, among other subjects: the different measures adopted by ILO Member States to address the impact of the pandemic on the labour market; the implementation of technical cooperation activities in the country with ILO participation; the supplementary reports on ratified Conventions; the follow-up to the implementation of the Domestic Workers Convention, 2011 (No. 189), and particularly measures to mitigate the impact of the pandemic on domestic work. In the context of the global COVID-19 pandemic, the Committee recalls the broad guidance contained in international labour standards. The Committee encourages Member States to engage in broader tripartite consultation and social dialogue to provide a solid basis for the development and implementation of effective responses to the deep-rooted socio-economic effects of the pandemic. The Committee invites the Government to continue providing updated information on the measures adopted in relation to tripartite consultations within the context of the COVID-19 pandemic, and particularly those intended to build the capacity of constituents and strengthen tripartite mechanisms and procedures, in conformity with Article 4 of the Convention and with Paragraphs 3 and 4 of the Tripartite Consultation (Activities of the International Labour Organisation) Recommendation, 1976 (No. 152), and the challenges and good practices identified.

Article 3(1) of the Convention. Election of the representatives of the social partners. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to indicate the measures that had been adopted to conduct the trade union census envisaged in section 5 of Act No. 278 of 30 April 1996. In this regard, the Committee notes the Government's indication that the census is the tool through which the representativeness of trade union confederations is determined on the various tripartite bodies in the country. The Committee notes with interest that in 2017 a trade union census was carried out for the first time in over 30 years. Since certain discrepancies were identified following the verification of the results, the Ministry of Labour initiated a verification process in which the data on the number of union members found by the trade union census carried out by the Ministry of Labour was compared with the information provided by union confederations. The Government reports the holding of regular workshops with union confederations in which they are consulted and their views are taken into consideration. The Government adds that most of the union confederations in the country were also consulted regarding the methodology used during the verification process. The Government adds that, as a result of the verification process, clearer information was obtained on, among other subjects, trade union registers that had been annulled, those that were active and inactive, the findings of the census and organizations that are not members of confederations. The Government indicates that since March 2018 information on the findings of the census and the implementation of the verification process has been published in quarterly bulletins. However, the Committee notes the Government's indication that, as significant differences were identified between the information provided by trade union confederations and the findings of the census, the verification process has not yet been completed. The Government adds that the objective is to prevent any organization registered with the Ministry of Labour being able to claim that it speaks for the union movement. In this respect, the Government expresses its commitment to maintaining, together with the trade union confederations, a mechanism for the regular updating of the data of the trade union census. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing detailed and updated information on the measures adopted within the framework of the process of the verification of the Ministry of Labour's trade union census, and its findings.

Article 5. Effective tripartite consultations. The Committee notes the detailed information provided by the Government on the tripartite consultations held between 2017 and 2019 on the matters relating to international labour standards covered by Article 5(1) of the Convention in the context of the Tripartite Subcommittee on International Labour Matters of the CPCPSL. With reference to the re-examination of unratified Conventions, the Government indicates that tripartite consultations have been held on the possible ratification of the Workers' Representatives Convention, 1971 (No. 135), the Rural Workers' Organisations Convention, 1975 (No. 141), the Nursing Personnel Convention, 1977 (No. 149), and the Maternity Protection Convention, 2000 (No. 183). The Government indicates that the process of the ratification of Conventions Nos 149 and 183 is currently proceeding in the Congress of the Republic. Tripartite consultations have also been held on the measures necessary to examine the potential ratification of the Maritime Labour Convention, 2006 (MLC, 2006). The Government indicates that during the tripartite consultations it was also agreed to adopt measures to focus its efforts on analysis of compliance with ratified Conventions. The Government refers to the organization of various activities relating to international labour standards within the framework of the Subcommittee on International Labour Matters, such as capacity building on the ILO Standards Review Mechanism (SRM).

However, the Committee notes the CGT's indication that tripartite consultations have not been held on proposals for the denunciation of ratified Conventions (Article 5(1)(e)), on reports to be made to the Office pursuant to article 19 of the ILO Constitution or on unratified Conventions and Recommendations to which effect has not yet been given, in accordance with Paragraph 5(e) of the Tripartite Consultation (Activities of the International Labour Organisation) Recommendation, 1976 (No. 152). The CGT also considers that technical and financial assistance is necessary to increase the frequency of the tripartite consultations held in the Subcommittee on International Labour Matters. With regard to the manner in which the views of the representative organizations are taken into account during the tripartite consultations, the Government indicates that, under the terms of Act No. 278 of 1996, the decisions of the CPCPSL are adopted by consensus by the representative parties. The Government indicates that the claims of each of the actors in the CPCPSL are taken into consideration and voted upon, with a view to ensuring effective tripartite consultations, in accordance with the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing updated and detailed information on the content and outcome of the tripartite consultations held on all the matters relating to international labour standards covered by Article 5(1) of the Convention.

Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144) (ratification: 2001)

The Committee notes the Government's report sent in June 2019, in response to comments formulated in previous observations, starting in 2013. With regard to the serious failure of the obligation to submit the instruments adopted by the Conference, laid down in article 19(5) and (6) of the ILO Constitution, the Government indicates its commitment to submitting the instruments adopted by the International Labour Conference to the competent authorities, in full respect of the provisions of the Convention. It also supplies a list of representative organizations of employers (three organizations) and of workers (12 organizations), indicating that they participated in the drafting of the reports. The Committee nevertheless notes with regret that the Government's report contains no response to the Committee's previous comments, reiterated since 2013, requesting the Government to provide detailed information on the content of the consultations and the recommendations made by the social partners on each of the matters listed in Article 5(1) of the Convention. Noting that the Government has not provided for many years any information on the practical application of the Convention, the Committee again requests the Government to provide information on the consultations held with the social partners concerning the proposals made to Parliament upon the submission of instruments adopted by the Conference (Article 5(1)(b) of the Convention. It again requests the Government to provide detailed information on the frequency, the content and the results of the tripartite consultations held on the questions concerning international labour standards covered by the Convention and other ILO activities, in particular with regard to questionnaires concerning items on the agenda of the Conference (Article 5(1)(a)); the submission of instruments adopted by the Conference to the Parliament (Article 5(1)(b)); the re-examination, at appropriate intervals of unratified Conventions and of Recommendations to which effect has not yet been given (Article 5(1)(c); and reports on the application of ratified Conventions (Article 5(1)(d)).

COVID-19. The Committee notes that as a result of the COVID-19 pandemic, tripartite consultations on international labour standards may have been postponed. With that in mind, the Committee recalls the guidance provided by international labour standards and encourages the Government to use tripartite consultations and social dialogue as a solid basis for formulating and implementing effective responses to the profound socio-economic repercussions of the pandemic. The Committee invites the Government to provide, in its next report, up-to-date information on all measures taken in this regard, particularly as concerns the measures taken to strengthen constituents' capacities and also to improve national tripartite mechanisms and procedures. It also requests the Government to provide information on the challenges encountered and good practices identified regarding application of the Convention during and after the pandemic period.

Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144) (ratification: 2005)

The Committee notes with concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments.

Articles 1 and 3(1) of the Convention. Participation of representative organizations. The Government reiterates in its report that two legislative texts were drafted in 2013 in consultation with the social partners. These texts were referred to the National Council for Labour, Employment and Social Security (CONTESS) in 2014. The aim of the first text is to create an institutional framework for setting the issue of representativeness as provided by section 215 of the Labour Code, which establishes that "the representative nature of trade union organizations shall be determined by the outcome of workplace representation elections" and that "the ranking … thus determined by the workplace elections shall be recorded in an order issued by the Minister in charge of labour". Nevertheless, the draft order is in preparation, hence the criteria for determining the representativeness of employers' and workers' organizations is still to be established. The aim of the second text is to reinforce the electoral procedures to be followed in occupational or national elections, with free and independent elections which are essential for ensuring the formation of legitimate workers and employers' organizations and also their representativeness. The Government points out that the two draft texts have not been approved by CONTESS, which assigned the task of examining the drafts to the standing committee but the latter did not adopt them. The Government indicates that it will keep the Office informed of any developments in the matter. The Committee refers to its comments on the application of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and expresses the firm hope that the Government will adopt the above-mentioned draft texts as soon as possible so that objective and transparent criteria can be established for appointing workers' representatives to national and international tripartite bodies, including the International Labour Conference.

Article 4(2). Financing of training. The Government indicates that a seminar on labour law was held for members of grassroots unions affiliated to the two most representative federations of workers' unions in Djibouti. The seminar took place from 28 to 31 August 2016 at the National Institute of Public Administration and was funded by the executive secretariat responsible for reform of the administration. In addition, the Operational Action Plan 2014–18, adopted under the national employment policy, includes a component of training on labour legislation for trade union representatives and employers. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on appropriate arrangements made for the financing of any necessary training for participants in consultation procedures, as provided for by the Convention.

Article 5. Tripartite consultations required by the Convention. Frequency of tripartite consultations. The Committee notes the detailed record of the meeting of CONTESS that took place on 27 and 28 November 2016, which the Government attached to its report. In this regard, it notes the agenda of the meeting, which included draft texts for the implementation of the Labour Code and also the discussion of unratified Conventions (Article 5(1)(c) of the Convention). In this regard, the Committee notes with interest the ratification proposals adopted unanimously concerning the Maritime Labour Convention, 2006 (MLC, 2006), and the Protocol of 2014 to the Forced Labour Convention, 1930. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing detailed information on the content and outcome of the tripartite consultations held on each of the matters referred to in Article 5(1) of the Convention, and in particular to continue to send copies of the records of CONTESS meetings.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144) (ratification: 1999)

Tripartism and social dialogue in the context of the COVID-19 pandemic. The Committee notes that, in their observations of 2020, the CASC, CNTD and CNUS state that the Government has taken measures to deal with the effects of the pandemic, which impact workers and production in general, without prior consultation of the social partners, except in exceptional cases, (Recommendation No. 152, Paragraph 5(c)). They report that workers' organizations have only been consulted on those measures, the approval of which requires a tripartite vote, such as the withdrawal of funds from the Dominican Institute for Protection and Prevention of Occupational Hazards (IDOPRIL). In relation to the social support measures implemented by the Government to mitigate the effects of the pandemic, the trade union organizations state that the social partners were consulted separately on this matter, which led to suspicion on the part of the workers' organizations and the exclusion of the representatives of workers in a situation of increased vulnerability, such as migrant workers, domestic workers, persons with disabilities and self-employed workers. In addition, they report that on 11 September 2020, tripartite consultations were held within the framework of the Labour Advisory Council, where agreement was reached on the joint implementation of economic, labour and health measures to address the crisis that has been affecting the country's tourism sector for years (in which there are more than 500,000 formal and informal workers) and which has been exacerbated by the pandemic. The Committee recalls the broad guidance provided by international labour standards, and encourages Member States to engage in tripartite consultations and broad social dialogue as a solid basis for the development and implementation of effective responses to the profound socio-economic impact of the pandemic. The Committee invites the Government to provide up-to-date information on the measures adopted with a view to mitigating the impact of COVID-19 and the measures to contain it. In particular, it requests the Government to report on the measures adopted to build the capacity of constituents, and strengthen the tripartite mechanisms and procedures, as well as on the challenges and good practices identified, in conformity with Article 4 of the Convention and Paragraphs 3 and 4 of Tripartite Consultation (Activities of the International Labour Organisation) Recommendation, 1976 (No. 152).

Article 5 of the Convention. Effective tripartite consultations. In response to the Committee's previous comments, the Government has provided a copy of the "Operating Regulations for the Tripartite Round Table on issues relating to international labour standards", which were drafted with the technical assistance of the ILO; as well as copies of the meeting reports of the Tripartite Round Table. Under the provisions of section 2 of the Regulations, the functions of the Tripartite Round Table include: analysing and discussing compliance with ratified Conventions; discussing and developing the reports on ratified Conventions; discussing and promoting compliance with recommendations issued by the ILO supervisory bodies; and analysing the content and possible impact of unratified Conventions and the Recommendations to which effect has not yet been given. Section 6 of the Regulations provides that the Tripartite Round Table shall meet at least once every three months. The Committee notes the Government's information that Tripartite Round Table began operating on 20 June 2018. It also notes the notifications and reports of the seven working meetings that took place between 20 June 2018 and 16 July 2019, in which tripartite consultations were held on several active cases before the Committee on Freedom of Association. The Committee observes, however, that the Government has not provided information in its report on the effective tripartite consultations on the issues covered by Article 5(1) of the Convention: (a) government replies to questionnaires concerning items on the agenda of the International Labour Conference; (b) the submission of instruments to the National Congress; (c) the re-examination at appropriate intervals of unratified Conventions and of Recommendations; (d) the reports on ratified Conventions to be made to the Office under article 22 of the ILO Constitution; and (e) proposals for the denunciation of ratified Conventions.

The Committee notes that, in their observations, the CASC, CNTD and CNUS maintain that tripartism has deteriorated over recent years and that workers' organizations have not been consulted on important labour-related decisions. The workers' organizations refer to their participation in informal meetings in December 2019 and August 2020 with various authorities and domestic workers' organizations in order to discuss the application of the Domestic Workers Convention, 2011 (No. 189), including methodology for determining domestic workers' wages. In this regard, they report that such meetings were held without the participation of the employers' organizations. Lastly, the workers' organizations refer to the Tripartite Round Table on conflict resolution in the Dominican Republic and maintain that it is only used to hold information meetings. They indicate that, consequently, on 16 July 2019, the CNUS and CNTD withdrew their participation from that Round Table, pending the finalization of responsibilities and concrete solutions to the conflicts raised at its meetings. Therefore, the Committee requests the Government to transmit detailed and up-to-date information on the frequency and content of the consultations held within the framework of the Tripartite Round Table on issues relating to international labour standards relating to the application of the Convention, as well as on the outcome of those.

Ecuador

Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144) (ratification: 1979)

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020). The Committee is examining the application of the Convention on the basis of the supplementary information received from the Government this year, as well as on the basis of the information at its disposal in 2019. The Committee also takes note of the technical assistance mission carried out at the Government's request by the Office in December 2019 with a view to assisting the tripartite constituents in drawing up a road map to strengthen social dialogue and provide specific replies to the supervisory bodies' comments.

The Committee notes the observations formulated by the National Federation of Education Workers (UNE) and Public Services International (PSI) in Ecuador, received on 29 August 2019, as well as the Government's replies to those, included in its supplementary report of 2020. It also notes the observations of PSI, received on 28 September 2020, and of the Ecuadorean Confederation of Unitary Class Organizations of Workers (CEDOCUT) and the Trade Union Association of Agricultural, Banana and Peasant Workers (ASTAC), received on 1 October 2020, relating to the application of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide its replies in that respect.

Tripartism and social dialogue in the context of the COVID-19 pandemic. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government in its supplementary report relating to the tripartite consultations held on 12 and 25 June 2020 within the framework of the National Labour and Wages Council (CNTS). The Government indicates that the objective of those consultations was to present the guidelines issued by the Ministry of Labour to mitigate the effects of the pandemic and to receive proposals from workers' and employers' representatives to maintain employment during the health emergency. The Government states that the members of the CNTS agreed on the establishment of a technical committee with the participation of two representatives of the employer sector and two representatives of the worker sector with a view to developing proposals to ensure the sustainability of employment and enterprises, and to address the situation facing the country as a result of the COVID-19 pandemic. The Committee notes, however, that PSI states in its observations that, since March 2020, under the decreed state of emergency, the Government has taken many administrative measures and passed various executive decrees without holding tripartite consultations on those. PSI reports that these measures have led to a regression in workers' rights, especially those of public sector workers. In this respect, it refers, inter alia, to the introduction of the possibility of reducing the working hours and remuneration of public sector workers, and to the abolishment of various posts in that sector. PSI also refers to the adoption of the Organic Act on Humanitarian Support to combat the crisis resulting from COVID-19 and states that it introduces regressive reforms to the Labour Code. For their part, ASTAC and CEDOCUT report that the workers' organizations were not consulted prior to the adoption, on 17 September 2020, of Ministerial Agreement No. MDT-2020-185, which contains a new method of calculating the basic unified wage and sets out the possibility of freezing it in 2021. ASTAC and CEDOCUT emphasize the need to adopt measures to guarantee the representation of the workers' and employers' sectors in the tripartite bodies, as well as their real and effective participation in the development of standards (see Paragraph 5(c) of Recommendation No. 152). In this context, the Committee recalls the broad guidance provided by international labour standards and encourages Member States to promote and participate in broader tripartite consultation and social dialogue as a solid basis for the preparation and implementation of effective responses to the deep-rooted socio-economic impact of the pandemic. The Committee requests the Government to send detailed and updated information on the tripartite consultations held regarding the measures taken to address the socio-economic impact of the pandemic. It also invites the Government to provide in its next report detailed information on measures taken to build the capacity of the constituents, and strengthen tripartite mechanisms and procedures, as well as on the challenges and good practices identified.

Articles 1, 2 and 3(1) of the Convention. Adequate procedures. Election of the representatives of the social partners to the National Labour and Wages Council (CNTS). In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to provide information on the consultations held to establish procedures which ensure effective tripartite consultations. It also requested the Government to send its comments on the observations made by PSI and UNE, in which they indicate that they are not recognized as representative organizations of the workers in the public sector. PSI and UNE also considered that the Government has opted systematically to disregard workers' organizations that might be an obstacle to the implementation of its reforms but has intervened directly in the establishment of organizations that give legitimacy to its actions. PSI and UNE claimed that the Government had not held effective consultations with them and had not replied to the various proposals put forward concerning the creation of a forum for bipartite dialogue for the public sector incorporated in what was previously the National Labour Council. In its 2020 report, the Government indicates that, in accordance with Ministerial Agreement No. MDT-044 of 30 January 2016, amendments were made to section 10 of Ministerial Agreement No. MDT-2015-0240 of 20 October 2015 on the organization, composition and operation of the CNTS. Specifically, the phrase "trade union federations of legally recognized working persons" was replaced with "federations, confederations, fronts, organizations and/or unions of most representative working persons at the national level". The Government indicates that the CNTS is thereby composed of those organizations of the most representative workers at the national level. In this regard, the Committee notes that, in its 2020 observations, PSI reports the lack of an adequate procedure and political will to determine the "most representative organizations", resulting, in practice, in the absence of an institution for tripartite consultation on international labour standards. Furthermore, UNE and PSI reiterate that they are still not recognized as representative organizations of the public sector, and nor are their affiliate organizations. In its reply, the Government indicates that the Ministry of Labour has a register of workers' organizations, in which the level of representation is determined by the number of workers represented by that organization according to institutional records. The Committee recalls that the term "the most representative organizations of employers and workers" as provided for in Article 1 of the Convention "does not mean only the largest organization of employers and the largest organization of workers." If in a particular country there are two or more organizations of employers or workers which represent a significant body of opinion, even though one of them may be larger than the others, they may all be considered to be "most representative organizations" for the purpose of the Convention. In such cases, governments should endeavour to secure an agreement of all the organizations concerned in establishing the consultative procedures (see 2000 General Survey on tripartite consultations, paragraph 34).

With regard to the procedure for selecting representatives to the CNTS, section 10(1) of the 2015 Ministerial Agreement provides that the Minister of Labour shall convene "the employers' and workers' organizations in order that, by means an elector appointed by each of them, the principal and alternate representatives of the CNTS may be elected." If no agreement is reached, the Minister of Labour calls a second election. In this respect, the Committee notes that, PSI and UNE report that they did not obtain a response from the Government to the nomination they presented for the designation of new representatives of the CNTS in 2018. In this regard, the Government indicates that PSI has not been considered a member of the CNTS, as it does not meet the requirements established for membership. The Committee notes that ASTAC and CEDOCUT denounce the introduction of various legislative reforms in recent years that hinder the holding of tripartite consultations, and in particular the representation of workers' organizations freely elected by their organizations, on various national tripartite bodies, such as the Board of Directors of the Ecuadorian Social Security Institute (IESS) in which the worker sector has not been represented since May 2018. The Committee also notes that ASTAC and CEDOCUT refer to the "Report on violations of trade union rights" of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), which states that between 2013 and 2015 there was a fall in representation and a de-institutionalization of social dialogue and tripartism. In addition, the same report denounces the emergence of workers' organizations parallel to the existing ones, and close to the Government. Lastly, the Committee notes that the road map presented by the technical assistance mission carried out in December 2019 proposed, as a central point, the inclusion of all representative trade union organizations in the CNTS. The Committee emphasizes that the participation of all the representative trade unions in the CNTS is a fundamental element for carrying out effective consultations and the application of the Convention in general. In the light of the observations of the workers' organizations, the Committee requests the Government to adopt the measures necessary to ensure that all the country's "most representative organizations" of employers and workers can participate in the CNTS and the other consultative bodies of a tripartite nature, such as the Board of Directors of the IESS, pursuant to Recommendation No. 152, Paragraph 5(c). The Committee also requests the Government to adopt the measures necessary to obtain the agreement of all organizations concerned, including workers' organizations freely elected by their organizations' members, with the establishment of the consultative procedures regarding the criteria used to determine representativeness among those organizations.

Article 5. Effective tripartite consultations. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government relating to tripartite consultations held on international labour standards between June 2019 and June 2020. The Government indicates that in February 2019 tripartite consultations were held, within the working groups established for this purpose, on comments to formulate on the draft Violence and Harassment Convention, 2019 (No. 190), and draft Violence and Harassment Recommendation, 2019 (No. 206), during the 108th Session of the International Labour Conference. The Government also reports that, based on the support expressed by the social partners on 19 September 2019, a technical report was sent to the Ministry of Foreign Relations and Human Mobility for the adoption of the measures necessary for the ratification of Convention No. 109 and Recommendation No. 206. In addition, the Government reports that various national institutions are participating in the preparation of a report on the potential ratification of the Protocol of 2014 to the Forced Labour Convention. The Government indicates that, once the report has been finalized, it will be sent to the National Assembly and other national bodies for discussion on potential ratification of the Protocol. The Committee notes, however, that the Government has not indicated whether there are plans to hold tripartite consultations relating to the potential ratification of the Protocol. With regard to the consultations held on reports on ratified Conventions, the Government indicates that once these reports are sent to the Office, they are brought to the attention of the employers' and workers' organizations, through the representatives of these sectors on the CNTS. In this respect, the Committee draws the Government's attention to the fact that "in order to be 'effective', consultations must take place before final decisions are taken, irrespective of the nature or form of the procedures adopted… The effectiveness of consultations thus presupposes in practice that employers' and workers' representatives have all the necessary information far enough in advance to formulate their own opinions" (see the 2000 General Survey on tripartite consultation, paragraph 31).

The Committee notes, however, that UNE and PSI maintain that they were not consulted with regard to international labour standards or the Government's request for technical assistance from the Office for the reform of the Labour Code, or other labour law reforms introduced within the CNTS. The Government indicates that during 2019 it held dialogues with workers' organizations about the proposed labour reforms and their benefits. In addition, in its 2020 supplementary report, the Government states that on 25 May 2020, it held a meeting with various public sector workers' organizations affiliated with PSI, at which matters such as the visit of the ILO technical mission to the country and the ratification process of Convention No. 190 were addressed. The Government reports tripartite consultations held throughout 2019 within the CNTS relating to the review and adoption of labour reforms and wage determination for 2020. It also refers to the establishment, under Ministerial Agreement No. MDT-2018-0008, of four standing social dialogue working groups, including the standing public sector working group. The Government indicates that, on 15 June 2018, PSI requested to participate in the public sector working group, which the Government acknowledged via official letter No. MDT-MDT-2018-0535 of 18 July 2018. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing up-to-date information indicating the specific content and the outcome of the tripartite consultations held on all issues relating to international labour standards covered by Article 5(1)(a) to (e) of the Convention. Furthermore, in the light of the observations of UNE and PSI, the Committee requests the Government to send detailed information on the manner in which it is ensured that all the most representative organizations participate in those consultations. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the consultations held with the social actors on ways to improve the functioning of the procedures required under the Convention, including the possibility of establishing a schedule for the preparation of reports far enough in advance to enable the social partners to formulate their contributions in this respect (Article 5(1)(d)).

Fiji

Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144) (ratification: 1998)

Article 3 of the Convention. Election of representatives of employers and workers organizations. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to explain the manner in which the representative national workers' and employers' organizations have been able to determine their representatives. In this regard, the Committee notes the discussion that took place in the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards (the Conference Committee) in June 2019 concerning the application by Fiji of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87). The Conference Committee called upon the Government to, inter alia, refrain from interfering in the designation of the representatives of the social partners on tripartite bodies and to reconvene the Employment Relations Advisory Board (ERAB) without delay, in order to start a legislative reform process. The Government indicates in its report that, according to the 2007 Employment Relations Act, the Minister for Employment is the appointing authority for the ERAB, and representatives of workers and employers are appointed from among persons nominated by workers' and employers' organizations. It adds that there is no Government interference in the designation of representatives of the social partners to the ERAB. In this context, the Committee notes section 8(3) of the 2007 Act, which provides that, in making appointments to the ERAB, "… the Minister may take into account the principles of equality set out in section 38 of the Constitution, necessary for the effective operation of the Board." The Government reports that, after the expiration of the ERAB membership in October 2019, it invited the social partners to submit their nominees to the Minister. The Fiji Commerce and Employer's Federation (FCEF) submitted their nominees on 21 October 2019 and 23 October 2019, respectively, while the Fiji Trades Union Congress (FTUC) submitted their nominees on 30 October 2019. The Committee nevertheless refers to its 2019 observation in relation to the application of Convention No. 87, in which the FTUC observed that the Government provided no indication regarding when the appointment of the ERAB members would be made, despite the urgency of the situation, also recalling the observations of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC),which expressed concern about government manipulation of national tripartite bodies, thus curtailing the possibility of genuine tripartite dialogue. Referring to its 2019 observation under Convention No. 87, the Committee expresses its firm hope that the Government will refrain from any undue interference in the nomination and appointment of representatives of the social partners to the ERAB, and will take steps to ensure that the social partners are able to freely designate their representatives. The Committee urges the Government to take steps to appoint the ERAB members without delay so that the ERAB may reconvene and hold regular tripartite consultations for the purposes of the procedures covered by the Convention. It requests the Government to provide updated information on progress made in this regard. In addition, the Committee requests the Government to describe the manner in which the discretion provided for under section 8(3) of the 2007 Employment Relations Act has been applied in practice.

Article 5(1) of the Convention. Effective tripartite consultations. The Committee notes the Government's indication that meetings of the ERAB were held regularly during the reporting period despite the boycott of the FTUC and its withdrawal from ERAB meetings in June 2018, February 2019 and August 2019. In this respect, referring to its 2019 observation on Convention No. 87, the Committee notes that, according to the FTUC, the Government's reference to boycott clearly reveals that there remain issues in the appointment process of ERAB members. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government with regard to the tripartite consultations held within the ERAB during the reporting period. The Government reports on the submission to Parliament of the questionnaire on the abrogation and withdrawal of: the Night Work (Women) Convention, 1919 (No. 4); the Minimum Age (Trimmers and Stokers) Convention, 1921 (No. 15); the Protection against Accidents (Dockers) Convention, 1929 (No. 28); the Night Work (Women) Convention (Revised), 1934 (No. 41); the Minimum Age (Non-Industrial Employment) Convention (Revised), 1937 (No. 60); and the Hours of Work and Rest Periods (Road Transport) Convention, 1939 (No. 67). The Government indicates that the Conventions concerned were abrogated or withdrawn. In addition, tripartite consultations were held with regard to the ILO Centenary ratification campaign and proposals of newly adopted instruments pending submission to Parliament, including the Violence and Harassment Convention, 2019 (No. 190), were discussed. With respect to the re-examination of unratified Conventions, the Government indicates that it is envisaged to ratify the Protocol of 2002 to the Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981; the Labour Statistics Convention, 1985 (No. 160) and its accompanying Labour Statistics Recommendation, 1985 (No. 170). Finally, the Government indicates that it remains committed to holding tripartite consultations with regard to the reports on the application of ratified Conventions (Article 5(1)(d)) and the proposals for denunciation of ratified Conventions (Article 5(1)(e)). The Committee notes the ratification of the Violence and Harassment Convention, 2019 (No. 190) on 25 June 2020. The Government has not, however, provided detailed information as requested on the content and the outcome of the tripartite consultations held under this Article of the Convention. The Committee therefore requests the Government to provide updated and detailed information on the content and outcome of the tripartite consultations held on all matters concerning international labour standards covered by the Convention, particularly relating to the questionnaires on Conference agenda items (Article 5(1)(a)); the submission of instruments adopted by the Conference to Parliament (Article 5(1)(b)); the re-examination at appropriate intervals of unratified Conventions and Recommendations to which effect has not yet been given (Article 5(1)(c)); reports to be presented on the application of ratified Conventions (Article 5(1)(d)); and the proposal for the denunciation of Conventions (Article 5(1)(e)).

In the context of the global COVID-19 pandemic, the Committee recalls the comprehensive guidance provided by international labour standards. It encourages Member States to engage in tripartite consultation and social dialogue more broadly as a solid foundation for developing and implementing effective responses to the profound socio-economic impacts of the pandemic. The Committee invites the Government to provide updated information in its next report on measures taken in this respect, including with regard to steps taken to build the capacity of the tripartite constituents and strengthen mechanisms and procedures, as well as challenges and good practices identified.

Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144) (ratification: 1994)

The Committee notes with concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments.

Article 5 of the Convention. Effective tripartite consultations. The Committee recalls that, in its previous comment, it had requested the Government to provide detailed information on each of the tripartite consultations held on matters concerning international labour standards covered by the Convention. The Government indicates in its report that tripartism is working well in the country to the extent that it has moved towards establishing a Committee of Social Partners. The said Committee includes civil society organizations and the conference of churches; it is responsible for the monitoring of the IMF Structural Adjustment Programme 2014–16 in Grenada, including labour reforms. Additionally, the Government specifies that a comprehensive review of the Labour Code was conducted during the 2014–15 period. Moreover, the Government recalls that, pursuant to section 21(2) of the Employment Act, the functions of the Labour Advisory Board reflect the provisions of Article 5(1) of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information on the activities of the Labour Advisory Board on the tripartite consultations on international labour standards covered by the Convention, including full particulars on the consultations held on each of the matters listed in Article 5(1) of the Convention. The Government is also requested to indicate the intervals at which the above-mentioned consultations are held, and the nature of the participation by the social partners during these consultations.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144) (ratification: 1997)

The Committee notes with concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments.

Articles 2 and 5 of the Convention. Effective tripartite consultations. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to provide detailed information on the subjects and outcome of the tripartite consultations held on each of the items set out in Article 5(1). The Government indicates that it is making efforts to ensure compliance with the obligations deriving from the Conventions that it has ratified, including Convention No. 144, and recognizes that tripartite consultations on international labour standards were not undertaken effectively. However, it emphasizes that significant improvements have been implemented following a workshop to strengthen capacities on international labour standards and for the preparation of reports organized by the ILO on 22 and 23 October 2016. In 2016, the Government replied to the Committee's comments on Conventions Nos 29, 87, 98, 100, 105, 111 and 182. It adds that, although the social partners were consulted before the final replies were sent, they made no observations in that regard. In 2017, the Government replied to the Committee's comments concerning Conventions Nos 6, 26, 81, 87, 88, 95, 97, 98, 124, 129, 159 and 173. Following the tripartite consultations held, the observations made by the most representative workers' organizations were included in the final replies. With regard to the re-examination of unratified Conventions and of Recommendations to which effect has not yet been given, the Government indicates that tripartite consultations have been held on 11 instruments respecting working time (Conventions Nos 1, 30, 47, 106 and 175 and Recommendations Nos 13, 98, 103, 116, 178 and 182). The Government adds that it sent its replies to the most representative organizations of employers and workers, but that the Trade Union Confederation of Malagasy Revolutionary Workers (FISEMARE) was the only one to provide comments on this subject. It adds that, between 28 February and 1 March 2017, the Ministry of Labour organized, with ILO support, a tripartite workshop to validate the situation with regard to the Labour Relations (Public Service) Convention, 1978 (No. 151). This review was validated unanimously by the representatives of the three partners present. Furthermore, a steering committee to promote Convention No. 151 was established to follow the process of ratification and engage in advocacy with the competent authorities, including the Government and Parliament. The Government adds that it has responded to the abrogation of Conventions Nos 21, 50, 64, 65, 86 and 104 and to the withdrawal of Recommendations Nos 7, 61 and 62, included on the agenda of the 107th Session of the International Labour Conference in 2018. It specifies that these responses were communicated to the most representative social partners, but that the latter made no observations on this subject. In its 2000 General Survey, Tripartite Consultation International Labour Standards, paragraph 71, the Committee recalls that Paragraph 2(3) of the Tripartite Consultation (Activities of the International Labour Organisation) Recommendation, 1976 (No. 152), specifies that consultations may only be undertaken through written communications, "where those involved in the consultative procedures are agreed that such communications are appropriate and sufficient". The Committee notes with interest that the Government, with ILO support, organized a workshop on 12, 13 and 14 September 2017 to validate the comparative study of the legislation in force and the provisions of the Maritime Labour Convention, 2006 (MLC, 2006), and the Work in Fishing Convention, 2007 (No. 188), with a view to their ratification. It adds that two roadmaps on the ratification of the MLC, 2006, and Convention No. 188 were unanimously approved by the tripartite partners present. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing updated information on the manner in which it ensures effective tripartite consultations, as well as on the content and outcome of the tripartite consultations held on each of the issues covered by Article 5(1). It also requests the Government to keep it informed of any developments relating to the ratification of Conventions Nos 151, 188 and the MLC, 2006.

Article 3. Choice of the representatives of employers and workers by their respective organizations. The Committee notes that the implementation of Decree No. 2011-490 on trade union organizations and representativity implies for the tripartite partners the implementation of various types of action, including the holding of elections for staff delegates at the enterprise level within the territory of Madagascar by the Ministry of Labour, the convening of the social partners for an indication of the provisional results, and the consolidation by ministerial order of the definitive results for national and regional representation. The Government indicates that, in accordance with this process, the elections of staff representatives were launched in 2014 throughout Madagascar. It adds that Order No. 34-2015 to determine trade union representativity for 2014 and 2015 was adopted and was issued in February 2014. However, the Order has been contested by certain workers' organizations, including the General Confederation of Malagasy Trade Unions (FISEMA), FISEMARE and the Revolutionary Malagasy Union (SEREMA), challenging the outcome of the ballot, which placed the Christian Confederation of Malagasy Trade Unions (SEKRIMA) first among the most representative unions at the national level. In March 2015, these unions lodged an appeal for the result to be set aside. The Government explains that, as the appeal was suspensive in its effect, the application of the Order was suspended until the court issued its ruling rejecting the appeal in 2017. Moreover, as the establishment of the various labour-related bodies is conditional upon representativity, as they involve tripartite representation, such as in the case of inter-enterprise medical services management councils and the executive council of the National Social Insurance Fund (CNAPS), the tripartite actors concerned agreed to adopt an alternative solution. In this context, the Government indicates that all the representatives of the various organizations appointed to the different social dialogue structures in existence, and the labour-related bodies referred to above, were subject to tacit renewal of their mandates. The Committee requests the Government to make every effort, in consultation with the social partners, to ensure that tripartism and social dialogue are promoted so as to facilitate procedures that guarantee effective tripartite consultations (Articles 2 and 3). In this respect, it requests the Government to provide updated information on any developments relating to the choice of employers' and workers' representatives for the purposes of the procedures covered by the Convention, including the dates and organization of their elections. The Committee also requests the Government to provide a copy of the Order that is in force with its next report.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144) (ratification: 2005)

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020). The Committee examines the application of the Convention on the basis of the supplementary information received from the Government this year, as well as on the basis of the information at its disposal in 2019.

The Committee notes the observations of the Serbian Association of Employers (SAE), the Confederation of Autonomous Trade Unions of Serbia (CATUS) and the Trade Union Confederation "Nezavisnost", transmitted by the Government together with its 2019 report. It also notes the observations of the CATUS, transmitted by the Government together with the supplementary information in 2020.

Articles 2 and 5 of the Convention. Effective tripartite consultations. The Committee notes that, following the recommendations and the report of the Conference Committee at its 107th Session in June 2018, a tripartite workshop on the application of Convention No. 144 was held on 25 January 2019, with technical assistance from the ILO. The workshop was attended by representatives of trade unions and employers' associations as well as the Secretary of the Social and Economic Council of the Republic of Serbia (SEC). It was agreed at the workshop that issues concerning the preparation of the delegation of Serbia for its participation at the International Labour Conference (ILC) would be addressed in person through tripartite consultations in the SEC to be held at least two times a year (before and after the ILC), in addition to issues dealt with through written communications . In this context, the Government indicates that the composition of the delegation and the platform for its participation will be discussed in person as a separate item to be placed on the agenda of the SEC. It adds that the consultations held during the SEC sessions will also address all other matters of relevance to cooperation with the ILO, including: replies to questionnaires; recommendations submitted to the competent authorities with regard to the submission of ILO Conventions and Recommendations in compliance with article 19 of the ILO Constitution; re-examination and review at regular intervals of unratified Conventions and Recommendations not yet given effect to examine the measures to be taken, if any; issues that have arisen from the obligation of submission of national reports in compliance with article 22 of the ILO Constitution; and those concerning the proposed abrogation of ratified Conventions. The Government also reports that, on 25 September 2018, the SEC organized an Information Day at the National Assembly where discussions focused on, inter alia, strengthening social dialogue and building the capacities of the SEC and the social partners. The Committee notes that the SAE affirms that, during 2018 and the first half of 2019, tripartite consultations were held within the SEC with regard to different economic and social topics, which were formalized by the adoption of conclusions. The SAE argues, however, that the said conclusions were not implemented by the responsible national institutions. In this regard, the SAE emphasizes that the SEC, is the highest national institution of social dialogue and a legal platform, whose initiatives must be respected by the competent institutions.

The Committee also notes the information provided by the Government in its supplementary report with regard to the content of the tripartite consultations held during the five sessions of the SEC that took place between 17 March and 14 September 2020, including the adoption of the 2020 Work Plan for the SEC. In its observations, the CATUS submits that social dialogue in Serbia is still in its infancy. It considers that there is a need to adopt further measures to strengthen social dialogue in the country, stressing that the SEC is the appropriate body to ensure a transparent process of social dialogue where the views of the social partners may be heard and consensus may be reached. The Committee requests the Government to continue its efforts to take effective and time-bound measures to ensure effective tripartite consultations in conformity with the provisions of the Convention, and to report on the nature, content and frequency of consultations in relation to the matters within the scope of Article 5(1)(a)–(e) of the Convention.

In the context of the global COVID-19 pandemic, the Committee recalls the comprehensive guidance provided by international labour standards. It encourages Member States to engage in tripartite consultation and social dialogue more broadly as a solid foundation for developing and implementing effective responses to the profound socio-economic impacts of the pandemic. The Committee invites the Government to provide updated information in its next report on measures taken in this respect, including with regard to steps taken to build the capacity of the tripartite constituents and strengthen mechanisms and procedures, as well as challenges and good practices identified in conformity with Article 4 of the Convention and Paragraphs 3 and 4 of Tripartite Consultation (Activities of the International Labour Organisation) Recommendation, 1976 (No. 152).

Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela

Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144) (ratification: 1983)

Follow-up to the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry (complaint made under article 26 of the Constitution of the ILO)

The Committee recalls that the Governing Body, at its 332nd Session (March 2018), approved the appointment of a Commission of Inquiry to examine a complaint made under article 26 of the ILO Constitution alleging non-observance by the Government of the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela of the Minimum Wage-Fixing Machinery Convention, 1928 (No. 26), the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144). The Committee notes that the Commission of Inquiry completed its work in September 2019 and that its report was presented to the Governing Body, which took note of it at its 337th Session (October 2019).

The Committee notes the document submitted to the Governing Body (GB.340/INS/13) with the Government's reply to the Commission of Inquiry's report, and also the discussion which took place on this matter at the 340th Session (October 2020) of the Governing Body and which will continue at its next session in March 2021. In its reply, and in its report to the Committee, the Government states that it does not accept the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry since compliance with them would entail the violation of the Constitution of the Republic, the separation of powers, the law, the independence, the sovereignty and the self-determination of the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela. However, the Committee observes that the Government did not avail itself of the prerogative granted under the ILO Constitution – namely, to refer the complaint to the International Court of Justice within three months of receipt of the report. Moreover, the Committee observes that the Government expresses its readiness to improve its compliance with the Conventions ratified by the country on the basis of constructive suggestions from the ILO supervisory bodies and to receive technical assistance from the Office.

The Committee recalls that, in formulating comments on the application of the Convention by the Government of the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela, it has been raising many of the issues examined by the Commission of Inquiry, which confirmed and examined in detail a number of the concerns raised by the Committee with regard to the application of this governance Convention. In this regard, the Commission of Inquiry considered in its report that, in light of the gravity of the issues raised, the situation and the progress achieved on its recommendations should be the subject of active supervision by the ILO supervisory bodies concerned. In particular, it stated that the Government must submit to the CEACR the corresponding reports on the application of the Conventions covered by the complaint for examination at its session in November–December 2020.

The Committee notes that the Commission of Inquiry, after finding that the Government did not provide evidence of compliance with the consultation requirements set out in the Convention, recommended that the authorities concerned take without further delay – and with implementation to be completed no later than 1 September 2020 – the necessary steps to ensure due and effective compliance with the consultation requirements set out in the Convention, and the ending of the exclusion from social dialogue and consultation of the Federation of Chambers and Associations of Commerce and Production of Venezuela (FEDECAMARAS) and trade union organizations that are not close to the Government. In particular, the Commission recommended, through tripartite dialogue with the representative organizations of employers and workers:

(i) the establishment of effective tripartite consultation procedures. In light of the serious deficiencies in social dialogue in the country, taking into consideration the recognition by the Government itself of the need to create mechanisms for social dialogue, the Commission of Inquiry advised the establishment in the very near future of bodies or other institutionalized procedures for social dialogue to facilitate compliance with the obligations set out in the Convention, in relation to consultations to promote the application of international labour standards; and

(ii) the institutionalization of dialogue and consultation covering the subjects envisaged in all ratified ILO Conventions or relating to their application.

While noting that in its report the Government emphasizes its disagreement with the conclusions and recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry, the Committee recalls that on previous occasions when following up on recommendations of a Commission of Inquiry the Committee has observed that the ILO Constitution does not make the results of an inquiry subject to the consent of the State concerned. In this regard, the Committee has recalled that under article 32 of the Constitution, the only authority capable of affirming, varying or reversing the findings or recommendations of a Commission of Inquiry is the International Court of Justice, and that therefore, a government which chooses not to avail itself of the possibility of referring the matter to the International Court of Justice ought to take account of the conclusions and act upon the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry, in light of the provisions of the ILO Constitution.

The Committee notes the observations, regarding the follow-up to the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry and the application of the Convention, sent by the following organizations: the Independent Trade Union Alliance Confederation of Workers (ASI), received on 30 September 2020; the Confederation of Workers of Venezuela (CTV), received on 30 September 2020; FEDECAMARAS, with the support of the International Organisation of Employers (IOE), received on 1 October 2020; the Confederation of Autonomous Trade Unions (CODESA), the General Confederation of Labour (CGT) and the National Union of Workers of Venezuela (UNETE), received on 1 October 2020. Finally, the Commission takes note of the observations of the Bolivarian Socialist Confederation of Men and Women Workers in Urban and Rural Areas and Fishing of Venezuela (CBST-CCP) received on 3 December 2020, stating that the CBST-CCP has managed, in coordination with the Government and despite adverse conditions, to maintain compliance with the Convention in the course of 2020. The Committee requests the Government to send its observations in this regard.

Articles 2, 5 and 6 of the Convention. Effective tripartite consultations. The Committee notes that the Government once again states that it has always complied fully with the Convention and that the ILO supervisory bodies, including the Commission of Inquiry, are confusing the tripartite consultation provided for in the Convention on matters relating to the ILO with social dialogue in general, which the Government asserts that it also promotes. In this regard, the Committee notes with regret that, even though the conclusions of the Commission of Inquiry's report reminded the Government of the scope of the obligations contained in the Convention – conclusions to which the Committee refers – the Government does not provide any evidence of having held tripartite consultations on any of the matters referred to in Article 5(1) of the Convention, devoting its report to claiming that it promotes social dialogue in general. The Committee notes in this respect that the examples cited by the Government in its report to claim the existence of the aforementioned social dialogue (the Government indicates that it held meetings at the highest level with representatives of the employers, including FEDECAMARAS, CONSECOMERCIO and FEDEINDUSTRIA, and refers to public declarations by those representatives reportedly recognizing the existence of social dialogue with the Government), and also the measures connected with combating the pandemic that the Government describes (claiming that it has adopted them taking account of the various suggestions and recommendations of the various national sectors of production), do not contain any indication or evidence of compliance with the specific consultation requirements established in the Convention to promote the application of international labour standards.

At the same time, the Committee notes that the observations sent by FEDECAMARAS, the ASI, the CTV, UNETE, the CGT and CODESA allege that the Government is not complying with the tripartite consultation requirements contained in the Convention; they emphasize that the examples and measures referred to by the Government cannot be considered as effective social dialogue either; they express regret at the absence of social dialogue and tripartite consultation in the country; and they assert that the Government is unwilling to establish any tripartite mechanisms. In this regard, FEDECAMARAS indicates that the public declarations of its representatives referred to by the Government were transcribed partially and do not indicate the existence of agreement or of compliance with the Convention; and that it cannot be argued that either the limited meetings held between some of its representatives and the Government to resolve operational issues in the context of the pandemic or the patchy responses aimed at tackling the crisis can be regarded as effective social dialogue.

With regard to the forwarding by the Government of its reports on the application of ratified Conventions to employers' and workers' organizations, the Committee notes that almost all of the social partners' observations criticize delays in delivery of the reports and the lack of any tripartite consultation or discussion in this regard. From the information provided by the Government the Commission can only note, regarding the communication of reports, the application of article 23(2) of the ILO Constitution, which a number of organizations claim is done too late for it to fulfil its function (for example, according to the notification of dispatch forwarded by UNETE, the CGT and CODESA, the reports were forwarded one day before the deadline established by the ILO Governing Body for sending them to the Committee).

The Committee observes, as the Commission of Inquiry already did, that even though the notifications of dispatch of the Government's reports to which it has had access refer to the Convention, the Government has not provided any evidence showing that these imply or are supported by the slightest intention of, or invitation to, genuine tripartite consultation. As regards the other matters for consultation referred to in Article 5(1) of the Convention to promote the application of international labour standards, the Government does not mention or provide any evidence or information on consultation procedures for complying with the Convention.

The Committee is therefore bound to note that the Government, once again, has not provided any information that gives evidence of compliance with the requirements of the Convention, either regarding effective consultations on matters relating to the ILO referred to in Article 5(1) or regarding the nature and form of consultation procedures in accordance with Article 2(2).

In light of the above, the Committee notes with deep regret that no progress whatsoever has been made either with respect to compliance with the Convention or with respect to the implementation of the recommendations made by the Commission of Inquiry in this regard.

The Committee is aware of the ongoing consideration being given by the Governing Body to the follow-up of the report of the Commission of Inquiry. In view of the grave violations of labour rights described above, the systematic failure to comply with a number of ILO Conventions and the serious lack of cooperation from the Venezuelan authorities with regard to its obligations, the Committee considers it critical that within the context of the ILO standards the situation in the country be given the full and continuing attention of the ILO and the ILO supervisory system in order to obtain robust and effective measures that can bring about compliance in law and in practice with the Conventions concerned.

In the context of the COVID-19 pandemic, the Committee recalls the extensive guidance provided by international labour standards. The Committee encourages the Government to engage in the widest possible tripartite consultations and social dialogue as a sound basis for formulating and implementing effective responses to the profound economic and social effects of the pandemic. The Committee invites the Government to provide updated information in its next report on the measures taken in this respect, in accordance with the guidance provided in Article 4 of the Convention and Paragraphs 3 and 4 of the Tripartite Consultation (Activities of the International Labour Organisation) Recommendation, 1976 (No. 152), including on capacity-building measures for the tripartite constituents and measures to reinforce mechanisms and procedures, and also on the challenges and good practices that have been identified.

Labour administration and inspection

Albania

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 2004)

Labour Inspection (Agriculture) Convention, 1969 (No. 129) (ratification: 2007)

In order to provide a comprehensive view of the issues relating to the application of the ratified Conventions on labour inspection, the Committee considers it appropriate to examine Conventions Nos 81 (labour inspection) and 129 (labour inspection in agriculture) together.

COVID-19 measures. The Committee notes the Government's statement in its report regarding the labour inspection activities related to COVID-19. In particular, the Government indicates that the State Labour Inspectorate and Social Services (SLSSI), together with the State Health Inspectorate, is part of a task force responsible for monitoring the relevant protocols to reduce the transmission of infection among employees with a view to ensuring a safe and healthy working environment.

Articles 10, 11 and 16 of Convention No. 81 and Articles 14, 15 and 21 of Convention No. 129. Staffing and material means of the labour inspection services; scope of inspections carried out. The Committee previously noted that the number of labour inspectors was not sufficient to perform fully the inspection tasks required by law and that the lack of financial resources limited the ability of inspectors to travel. The Committee notes with concern the Government's indication in its report that the number of employees of the SLSSI remains unchanged at 155, with 37 at the central level and 118 at the regional level. It also notes the Government's indication that the total budget of the SLSSI for 2020 amounts to 186,300,000 Albanian lek (ALL) (approximately US$1,781,000) of which ALL120,278,000 (approximately US$1,150,000) is the salary fund, ALL20,086,000 (approximately US$192,000) is the Social Insurance Fund and the rest are investments and operating expenses. Six vehicles are available, of which three are used by the Central Directorate. Only three out of 12 regional branches have a vehicle at their disposal. Moreover, the Government indicates that there are 46 tablets and 55 laptops available for inspectors. The Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the budget allocated to labour inspection is sufficient to secure the effective discharge of the duties of the inspectorate, including the provision of suitably equipped offices and necessary transport facilities. The Committee also once again requests the Government to provide specific information on the staffing and material means of the SLSSI in performing inspections in agriculture, including transportation and local offices.

Articles 12(1) and 16 of Convention No. 81 and Article 16(1) and 21 of Convention No. 129. Right of inspectors to free entry of workplaces and undertaking of inspections as often as is necessary to ensure the effective application of the relevant legal provisions. The Committee previously noted that 10 per cent of inspections were unscheduled and/or emergency inspections, for which an authorizing officer shall issue an authorization within 24 hours.

The Committee notes the Government's information that 13,079 entities were inspected in 2019, of which 78 per cent were planned inspections. Among the 2,823 unscheduled inspections, 197 were due to occupational accidents, 600 were in response to complaints and 2,026 were carried out following indications of flagrant violations. During the first three months of 2020, a total of 2,524 entities were inspected, of which 90 per cent were planned inspections. Among the 239 unscheduled inspections, 38 were due to occupational accidents, 135 were in response to complaints and 66 were carried out following indications of flagrant violations.

The Committee also notes the Government's reference, regarding inspection procedures, to Law No. 10433 of 2011 on inspection and Law No. 9643 of 2006 on labour inspection. Section 13 of the Law on labour inspection provides that the labour inspector and controller are authorized to enter the working premises of any entity without prior notice. According to section 26 of the Law on inspection, inspections shall be carried out in the implementation of the inspection programme as a principle, and "off-programme" inspections may only be carried out in prescribed situations. Section 27 of the Law on inspection also provides that the administrative inspection procedure is initiated as a rule, upon the issuance of the authorization by the Chief Inspector or the chief inspector of the territorial branch. The inspection may only be initiated without authorization where a flagrant violation is found to be occurring or the occurrence of events, accidents or incidents that have affected or may affect life or health or the environment. The initiation of such an inspection shall be noted immediately in a special part of the inspection report, and the inspector is obliged to notify, without delay, the person responsible for the issuance of the authorization. Section 27 further provides that although the issuance of an authorization in violation of the relevant provisions shall not invalidate the decision of the inspection, it does constitute a disciplinary violation.

Referring to its 2006 General Survey, Labour Inspection, paragraphs 265 and 266, the Committee observes that, restrictions maintained on inspectors' free initiative in this regard, such as the requirement for a formal authorization issued by a higher authority, can only stand in the way of achieving the objectives of labour inspection as set out in the instruments. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary legislative measures to ensure that labour inspectors are empowered to make visits to workplaces liable to inspection without previous notice in conformity with Article 12(1)(a) of Convention No. 81 and Article 16(1)(a) of Convention No. 129, and that they are able to undertake labour inspections as often and as thoroughly as is necessary to ensure the effective application of the legal provisions, in conformity with Article 16 of Convention No. 81 and Article 21 of Convention No. 129. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken in this regard and to continue to provide information on the undertaking of inspections in practice, indicating the number of scheduled and unscheduled inspections, as well as the total number of workplaces liable to inspection. Lastly, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on any disciplinary measures imposed on labour inspectors related to the procedures for the authorization of inspection under the Law on inspection.

Article 6 of Convention No. 81 and Article 8 of Convention No. 129. Conditions of service. The Committee notes the Government's indication, in response to the Committee's previous comments on the remuneration scale and career prospects of labour inspectors, that the transfer and promotion of labour inspectors, as civil servants, is subject to Law No. 152 of 2013 on the Civil Service, as well as Decision of the Council of Ministers (DCM) No. 243 of 2015 on admission, movement, probationary period and appointment in the executive category and DCM No. 242 of 2015 on filling vacancies in the lower and middle management category. Regarding the current levels of remuneration, the Government provides information on the current salary categories of labour inspectors, and indicates that field inspectors receive a basic salary of ALL38,000, with a supplemental salary related to educational level and seniority. The Government also indicates that it is unable to provide comparative information between labour inspectors and tax inspectors due to limited data. The Committee further notes the Government's indication that the issue of the payment of inspectors will be addressed in the framework of the salary and job classification reform in process. The Committee requests the Government to pursue its efforts to improve the conditions of service of labour inspectors within the framework of the current salary and job classification reform, and to provide information on any progress made or results achieved. It also requests the Government to strengthen its efforts to ensure the availability of comparative information on the actual remuneration scale of labour inspectors in relation to other comparable categories of government employees exercising similar functions, such as tax inspectors or police officers, and to provide this information, when available.

Articles 5(a), 17 and 18 of Convention No. 81 and Articles 12(1), 22 and 24 of Convention No. 129. Prosecutions and penalties. The Committee previously noted the Government's indication that the policy pursued by the SLSSI intended to reduce the number of fines in a rational way, and it requested the Government to provide statistical information regarding prosecutions and penalties.

The Committee notes the Government's indication, and the information in the Annual Reports on Inspection Activities for 2018 and 2019 (available on the Government's website), that 175 fines were imposed in 2018 and 160 fines in 2019 (compared with the 381 fines in 2011 previously noted by the Committee). Fines were collected with a total value of ALL26,138,600 (approximately US$249,900) and ALL559,268 (approximately US$5,340) in interest on arrears from fines. Moreover, in 2019, 53 inspections decisions were appealed to SLSSI, of which 45 were upheld. There were also 44 judicial processes related to the sanctions imposed on various entities, where the inspection decision was upheld in 23 cases (with an additional 18 cases still ongoing). The Committee also notes that, according to 2019 Annual Report on Inspection Activities, administrative measures (a warning, fine or a suspension of activities) were imposed following 27 per cent of the total inspections carried out. Moreover, a higher percentage of violations were detected during unscheduled inspections, including in 78.6 per cent of inspections undertaken following accidents, 64 per cent of inspections following indications of flagrant violations and 48 per cent of those following complaints. Noting with concern the significant decline in the number of fines imposed since 2011, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures it is taking to ensure the application of adequate penalties for violations of the legal provisions enforceable by labour inspectors. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the reasons for this decline, and to continue to provide detailed information on the number and nature of fines imposed, the outcomes of the judicial appeals of inspection decisions and the percentage of violations detected during unscheduled and scheduled inspections respectively.

Matters specifically relating to labour inspection in agriculture

Articles 6(1)(a) and (b) and (3), and 19 of Convention No. 129. Labour inspection activities in agriculture. The Committee previously noted that the number of inspections in the agricultural sector constituted 0.8 per cent of total inspections, and that nearly half of the workforce in Albania was employed in the agricultural sector.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that in 2019, 284 inspections were carried out in the agriculture, forestry and fishery sector (2.1 per cent of the total inspections carried out), covering 1,519 employees (0.5 per cent of the total number of employees in workplaces inspected). Nineteen administrative measures were imposed, including six suspensions of work (due to violations of legal provisions on employment), nine warnings and one fine. During the first three months of 2020, 67 inspections in agriculture, forestry and fishery (2.6 per cent of the total inspections carried out), covering 450 employees (0.8 per cent of employees in workplaces inspected). Ten administrative measures were imposed, including three suspensions of work, six warnings and one fine. The Government also indicates that there are no specific trainings targeting inspections in the agriculture sector, but the topics of trainings conducted in 2019 will have a direct impact on inspections in all economic sectors. Noting the continuing low percentage of the inspection visits carried out in agriculture, the Committee once again requests the Government to strengthen its efforts to ensure the enforcement of laws and regulations in agriculture, including with respect to occupational safety and health (OSH), and to continue to provide information on the number of inspections carried out in that sector. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on measures undertaken or envisaged to ensure that training is provided to labour inspectors on agriculture-related subjects, and on any progress made in this respect.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1972)

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government on 15 September 2020 in response to a complaint pending under article 26 of the ILO Constitution. In light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020), the Committee proceeded with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of this supplementary information received from the Government (see Articles 2, 4, 7, 10, 11, 12, 16 and 23 below*),* as well as on the basis of the information at its disposal in 2019.

The Committee notes that the above-mentioned complaint under article 26 of the ILO Constitution – alleging non-compliance by Bangladesh with this Convention, as well as the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) – is pending before the Governing Body. At its 340th Session (October–November 2020), the Governing Body, in view of the information communicated by the Government on the situation of freedom of association in the country and taking due note both of the Government's commitment to continue to further improve the overall situation and to address the outstanding issues before the supervisory bodies: (i) requested the Government to develop, with the support of the Office and of the secretariat of the Workers' and Employers' groups, and in full consultation with the social partners concerned, a time-bound road map of actions with tangible outcomes to address all the outstanding issues mentioned in the complaint submitted under article 26 to the 108th Session of the International Labour Conference (2019); (ii) requested the Government to report on progress made in that regard to the Governing Body at its next session; and (iii) deferred the decision on further action in respect of the complaint until its 341st Session (March 2021).

Articles 2, 4, 12 and 23 of the Convention. Labour inspection in export processing zones (EPZs) and special economic zones (SEZs). In its previous comments, the Committee requested that EPZs and SEZs be brought under the purview of the labour inspectorate.

The Committee notes the Government's reference in its report to the EPZ Labour Act, which was adopted in February 2019. It welcomes that Chapter XIV of that Act now provides for labour inspection by labour inspectors appointed under the Bangladesh Labour Act (BLA) and that the Government indicates that labour inspectors of the Directorate of Inspection for Factories and Establishments (DIFE) have already undertaken labour inspections in five factories in EPZs. The Committee also notes the Government's indications that consultations are ongoing with workers, investors and relevant stakeholders to see how labour inspections undertaken by the DIFE can best be integrated with the existing supervision exercised by the Bangladesh Export Processing Zones Authority (BEPZA). The Government states in the supplementary information provided that an inspection framework is being developed, which will be shared when completed. The Committee notes, in particular, that section 168 of the EPZ Labour Act allows the Chief Inspector and other Inspectors appointed under the BLA to undertake inspections but observes that an approval of the Executive Chairman of the BEPZA is required. In this respect, the Committee recalls that, pursuant to section 4(3) of the Bangladesh Export Processing Zones Authority Act, the objectives of the BEPZA include encouraging and promoting foreign investment in the zone. The Committee recalls that Article 12 of the Convention provides that labour inspectors provided with proper credentials shall be empowered to enter freely and without previous notice at any hour of the day or night any workplace liable to inspection. While the Committee welcomes the progress made in opening EPZs and SEZs for labour inspections by the DIFE, it requests the Government to provide information on the outcome of the above-mentioned discussions and consultations, including the inspection framework under development. Further, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that labour inspectors are empowered to enter freely and without previous notice establishments in EPZs and SEZs, without any restrictions. In this respect, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the nature and the modalities of the approval required from the BEPZA for the undertaking of inspections, including if a separate request is required before each inspection, and if so, the number of requests made, the number approved, the time elapsed between each request and approval, and the reasons given for each failure to approve. Lastly, it requests the Government to provide statistical information on the labour inspections undertaken in EPZs and SEZs, disaggregated into inspections by the DIFE and inspections under the BEPZA, including the overall number of inspections undertaken, the violations detected and the measures taken as a result.

Article 6. Status and conditions of service of labour inspectors. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that retention of labour inspectors was a problem and that a number of recently recruited labour inspectors had left the DIFE after having been trained, to take up work with other government services. The Committee noted that a study on the reasons for the high attrition rate of the DIFE recommended, among other things, the creation of more senior positions and the further development of staff competencies. In this respect, the Committee notes the Government's indication that following the recommendations in that study, a new proposal providing for the recruitment of a significant number of labour inspectors was made, including the creation of senior positions. The Committee notes that the amendments to the BLA, adopted in November 2018, provide for the creation of an additional labour inspection position, bringing the number of career positions with the labour inspectorate to six (previously five). The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the measures taken to implement the recommendations in the study on the reasons for the high attrition rate, and to provide information on the implementation of the new career structure adopted in 2018, including the number of appointments made at each position, as well as information on the attrition rate among inspectors at different professional levels.

Articles 7, 10, 11 and 16. Human resources and material resources of the labour inspectorate. Frequency and thoroughness of labour inspections. In its past comments, the Committee noted that 575 labour inspection positions had been approved in 2014 but not filled, and that the number of labour inspectors decreased from 345 to 320 between 2017 and 2018.

The Committee notes with concern, from the statistics provided by the Government responding to the Committee's request that the number of labour inspectors further decreased to 308 labour inspectors by August 2019. However, it also notes the Government's supplementary information that as of 2020, the DIFE has been upgraded with an additional 993 manpower. The Committee also notes the information provided, on the number of labour inspections carried out, the training provided to labour inspectors, and that the Government reiterates the information from July 2017 with respect to the equipment and transport facilities available to the DIFE. Finally, it welcomes the information concerning the increase in the budget of the DIFE from 351.20 million Bangladesh taka to 418.5 million taka.

The Committee notes that in the supplementary information provided, the Government once again refers to proposals to increase the manpower of the DIFE, indicating that it has been proposed to create an additional 1,698 positions, including senior positions. Welcoming the proposed increase in the number of labour inspectors, the Committee requests the Government to continue to make every effort to recruit an adequate number of qualified labour inspectors, including by taking measures to fill all of the 575 labour inspection posts already approved in 2014, and to continue to provide information on the proposal to further increase the number of labour inspectors. In this respect, it requests the Government to clarify whether the additional 993 positions referred to by the Government have been filled or only approved. It requests the Government to strengthen its efforts to ensure that workplaces are inspected as often and as thoroughly as is necessary to ensure the effective application of the relevant legal provisions, and to provide information on the current number of labour inspectors working at the DIFE (not only on the number of positions approved or proposed), as well as on the number of labour inspection visits carried out, and to disaggregate this information by sector. Noting the information provided by the Government in this respect, the Committee also requests the Government to provide up-to-date information on the budget, equipment and transport facilities available to the DIFE, and the training provided to labour inspectors.

Articles 12(1), 15(c) and 16. Inspections without previous notice. Duty of confidentiality in relation to complaints. In its previous comments, the Committee noted an increase in the number of inspections that were unannounced (random or complaints-driven), from 2.5 per cent of all inspections in 2014 to 20 per cent in 2016–17, compared with those undertaken with prior notice (regular inspections).

The Committee notes the indication of the Government that the BLA permits labour inspectors to deal with complaints confidentially. The Committee also notes with concern that the Government indicates that inspections in factories are normally announced, while inspections in shops and establishments are normally unannounced, and it notes the information provided concerning the number of inspections in each. The Committee recalls the importance of undertaking a sufficient number of inspections that are unannounced, including at factories as well as shops and establishments, to ensure that when inspections are conducted as a result of a complaint without prior notice, the fact of the complaint is kept confidential. The Committee requests the Government to provide further information on the specific measures taken or envisaged to ensure that labour inspectors treat as absolutely confidential the source of any complaint and give no intimation to the employer that an inspection visit was made in consequence of the receipt of such a complaint, including measures taken with respect to inspections of factories. It also requests the Government to provide more specific information on the number of inspection visits that were unannounced and those that were undertaken with prior notice, disaggregated by RMG factory, shop, establishment, and other factories, as well as statistical information on the outcome of those visits disaggregated in the same manner.

Articles 17 and 18. Legal proceedings, effective enforcement and sufficiently dissuasive penalties. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government, in reply to the Committee's request for statistics on enforcement in relation to violations of the legal provisions. In 2018, 42,866 labour inspections were undertaken and 116,618 violations detected (compared with 40,386 inspections and 100,336 violations in 2017), 1,531 cases submitted to the labour courts (1,583 in 2017) and 798 resolved cases (574 in 2017). The Committee notes that the outcome of cases referred to the courts were limited to the imposition of fines, and that the amount of penalties imposed in 2018 was 3.55 million taka (approximately US$41,268, an average of approximately US$52 per resolution). The Committee also notes that the Government reiterates that there is one legal officer at the DIFE responsible for the follow-up of labour law violations detected by labour inspectors, that a legal advisory firm is affiliated with the DIFE, and that there is a plan to establish a legal unit at the DIFE. The Government indicates that this unit is proposed to be composed of 17 legal officers. The Committee notes with regret that the Government does not provide a reply in response to the Committee's request for information on any measures taken or envisaged to ensure that penalties for labour law violations are sufficiently dissuasive, including penalties other than fines. The Committee, once again, requests the Government to provide information on any measures introduced or envisaged to ensure that penalties for labour law violations are sufficiently dissuasive and to improve the proceedings for the effective enforcement of the legal provisions. In this respect, it also requests the Government to provide information on the progress made to establish a legal unit at the DIFE, including on the number of staff and their functions. Lastly, it requests the Government to continue to provide information on the specific outcome of the cases referred to the labour courts (such as the imposition of fines and also sentences of imprisonment) and to specify the legal provisions to which they relate.

The Committee previously noted that labour officials of the Department of Labour (DOL) address cases of alleged violations of freedom of association through conciliation and requested information on the measures taken to secure the enforcement of legal provisions related to freedom of association. In this respect, the Committee notes the Governments' indication that pursuant to the BLA, the DOL does not intervene in the conciliation concerning violations of freedom of association. The Committee takes due note of this information and refers to its comments under Conventions Nos 87 and 98.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government, which reiterates the content of its previous request adopted in 2019.

[The Government is asked to reply in full to the present comments in 2021.]

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1999)

The Committee notes with deep concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments. The Committee informs the Government that, if it has not supplied replies to the points raised by 1 September 2021, then it may proceed with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the information at its disposal at its next session.

Absence of practical information to enable the Committee to assess the operation of the labour inspectorate in relation to the provisions of the Convention and relevant national laws. The Committee notes the updated information regarding the number and geographical distribution by category of labour inspection staff. It notes, by comparison with the data given in the report received from the Government in 2008, a substantial reduction in labour inspection staff, in particular labour inspectors (from 75 to 55) and principal controllers (from 96 to 72). The Committee recalls that, according to Article 10, in order to secure the effective discharge of the duties of the labour inspectorate, the number of labour inspectors must be determined with due regard to the importance of the duties which inspectors have to perform, in particular the number, nature, size and situation of the workplaces liable to inspection; the number and classes of workers employed in such workplaces; the number and complexity of the legal provisions to be enforced; the material means placed at the disposal of the inspectors; and the practical conditions under which visits of inspection must be carried out.

While the laws and regulations concerning labour inspection and its mandate and prerogatives are available, it must be noted that there are no numerical data on other areas defined in Article 10 and, as the Government admits, there are no specific measures for giving effect to the provisions of Article 11 concerning the material conditions of work of labour inspectors, who do not have access to the transport facilities required for them to carry out their duties. The Committee notes, on the other hand, that according to the Government, inspectors' travel and related costs are reimbursed by the competent authority on presentation of invoices, which was not always the case, according to the report received in 2008.

The Committee once again requests the Government to provide in its next report all the available information needed to assess the application of the Convention in law and in practice. This information should cover, among other matters: (i) the up-to-date geographical distribution of public officials responsible for labour inspection as defined in Article 3(1) of the Convention; (ii) the geographical distribution of workplaces liable to inspection or, at the least, those for which the Government considers that the conditions of work require specific protection from the labour inspection services; (iii) the frequency, content and number of participants at the training courses provided for labour inspectors during their career; (iv) the level of remuneration and conditions for career advancement in relation to other public officials with comparable responsibilities; (v) the proportion of the national budget allocated to the public labour inspection services; (vi) a description of the cases in which inspectors visit enterprises, the procedure followed and the transport facilities that they use for this purpose, the activities that they carry out and their outcome; and (vii) the proportion of supervisory activities carried out by inspectors in relation to their conciliation duties.

The Committee also requests the Government to communicate a copy of any inspection activity reports originating from regional directorates, including the reports cited in the Government's reports sent to the ILO in 2008 and 2011; a copy of the draft or final text of the regulations relating to the status and conditions of service of labour inspectors; copies of the proposed amendments to the Labour Code, and of the memorandum which was reportedly sent to the ILO and is intended to improve the functioning of the labour inspection service.

In order to establish a labour inspection system that will respond to the social and economic goals which are the object of the Convention, the Committee urges the Government to make every effort to adopt the measures needed to implement the measures described in the Committee's general observations made in 2007 (concerning the need for effective cooperation between the labour inspection service and the judicial system), in 2009 (concerning the need for statistics on industrial and commercial workplaces subject to labour inspection and the number of workers covered, and 2010 (concerning publication of the content of an annual report on the functioning of the labour inspection system). The Committee recalls once again the possibility of obtaining technical assistance from the ILO and of requesting, within the context of international financial cooperation, financial assistance in order to give the necessary impetus to the establishment and operation of the labour inspection system, and would be grateful for any information on progress made and difficulties encountered.

The Committee expects that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1983)

The Committee notes with deep concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments. The Committee informs the Government that, if it has not supplied replies to the points raised by 1 September 2021, then it may proceed with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the information at its disposal at its next session.

Articles 3, 6, 7, 10 and 16 of the Convention. Numbers, conditions of service and functions of labour inspection staff. Number of labour inspection visits. The Committee notes from the Government's report that the Labour Department cannot increase its staff and that inspectors operate in all areas of labour administration. The Government also declares that every attempt is made to ensure that inspectors are professional in their conduct. The Committee requests once again the Government to indicate the criteria and process for the recruitment of labour inspectors, and to specify the training activities provided to them upon their entry into service and in the course of employment. Please also indicate how it is ensured that the conditions of remuneration and career development of labour inspectors reflect the importance and specificities of their duties, and take into account personal merit.

The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the time and resources spent on mediation/conciliation of industrial disputes in relation to their primary duties of inspection established under this Convention. It asks the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that, in accordance with Article 3(2), any duties which may be entrusted to labour inspectors in addition to their primary functions shall not be such as to interfere with the effective discharge of the latter. It also asks the Government to provide information on the measures taken to ensure that all workplaces are inspected as often and as thoroughly as necessary in line with Article 16 of the Convention.

Article 15. Duty of confidentiality. Referring to the Committee's previous comments on this issue, the Committee notes from the Government's report that there has not been any change in legislation to give effect to this Article of the Convention and that the issue is to be addressed by the Industrial Relations Advisory Committee. The Government also reports that the department and labour inspectorate have always maintained strict confidentiality. The Committee once again requests the Government to take steps to ensure that the legislation is supplemented so as to give full effect to Article 15 of the Convention and to keep the Office informed of all progress in this respect and to send copies of any relevant draft or final texts.

Articles 5(a), 17, 18, 20 and 21. Cooperation with the justice system and enforcement of adequate penalties. Publication and content of an annual report. The Committee notes from the Government's report that steps will be taken to improve the quality of the annual report on inspection services. The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to ensure that an annual report on the work of the labour inspection services is elaborated and published and that it contains information on all the items listed in Article 21 of the Convention, notably, statistics of inspection visits, violations and penalties imposed as well as industrial accidents and cases of occupational disease. The Committee draws the Government's attention in this regard to the guidance provided in Paragraph 9 of the Labour Inspection Recommendation, 1947 (No. 81), as to the type of information that should be included in the annual labour inspection reports.

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1979)

The Committee notes with deep concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments. The Committee informs the Government that, if it has not supplied replies to the points raised by 1 September 2021, then it may proceed with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the information at its disposal at its next session.

Articles 20 and 21 of the Convention. Establishment, publication and communication to the ILO of annual inspection reports. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that despite its reiterated comments on this subject, no annual labour inspection reports had been communicated to the ILO since 1995. It notes that the Government underlines the importance of establishing, publishing and transmitting annual labour inspection reports, but that it indicates that the annual reports as currently prepared do not contain all of the subjects as required under Article 21. The Committee urges the Government to indicate the measures adopted or envisaged to ensure that annual inspection reports are published and transmitted to the ILO in accordance with the requirements of Articles 20 and 21. The Committee reminds the Government, once again, that it may avail itself of technical assistance for this purpose.

The Committee requests the Government in any event to provide statistical information that is as detailed as possible on the activities of the labour inspection services (industrial and commercial workplaces liable to inspection, number of inspections, infringements detected and the legal provisions to which they relate, penalties applied, number of industrial accidents and cases of occupational disease, etc.) to enable the Committee to make an informed assessment on the application of the Convention in practice.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1952)

The Committee notes the observations of the Confederation of Public and Private Sector Workers (CTSP) received on 1 September 2019, in which it reiterated its observations of 2016, 2017 and 2018 and adds that the situation has deteriorated.

Articles 3, 12, 13, 15, 16, 17 and 18 of the Convention. Discharge of primary duties of the labour inspectorate. Appropriate sanctions. In its previous comment, the Committee noted the Government's indications concerning the obstacles faced in applying the Convention in practice, particularly the inadequate numbers of labour inspectors, and requested the Government to supply detailed information together with statistics on the planning and implementation of systematic inspections throughout the country, including in the export processing zones, and also their results. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government concerning the planning and implementation of inspection visits in two of the ten departments in the country in several activity sectors, including: (i) in the western department: 64 inspections (32 initial inspections and 32 catch-up inspections) conducted in 2017; 16 inspections (11 of which in the textile industry), 31 unannounced inspection visits in enterprises and 24 investigations, conducted in 2018; and 42 visits planned and ten advice services carried out in 2019; and (ii) in the north-eastern department, ten initial inspections and ten follow-up inspections were conducted in 2018. The Government indicates that the main objective of labour inspection over this period has been redressing the inconformity identified, rather than imposing penalties. The Committee also notes that the CTSP in its observations indicates that inspectors do not provide technical advice to workers and employers, but limit themselves to calculating the statutory benefits due in disputes between employers and workers. The CTSP also indicates that there are no statistics on labour inspection in the country; to its knowledge, there is no planning or implementation of systematic inspections throughout the country; and, in practice, labour inspection was carried out only in the textile industry. While duly noting the progress achieved since 2017 by the labour inspectorate in the country, particularly concerning the planning and implementation of visits in two of the ten departments in the country, the Committee requests the Government to strengthen its efforts to progressively expand the planning and conducting of inspection visits to all regions and all economic sectors of the country. The Committee also requests the Government to continue to provide information on the measures taken in this regard, including the statistics concerning the number of inspections planned and conducted, disaggregated by sector, along with details of the results of these visits, including the warnings issues, legal procedures brought or recommended, and penalties imposed and applied. The Committee also requests the Government to ensure that, during their inspection visits, the inspectors perform their primary functions in conformity with Article 3 of the Convention.

Articles 6, 10 and 11. Human and material resources available to the labour inspectorate. The Committee notes the Government's indication in reply to its previous comments that: (i) between 2014 and 2017, thanks the project to build the capacities of the Ministry of Social Affairs and Labour (ILO/MAST), piloted by the ILO, a team was established of 20 officials, 12 of whom are inspectors in the field and eight are trainers; (ii) in 2018, means of transport (six motorcycles and a car) were provided to certain regional MAST offices and that efforts are envisaged to equip all inspection services with the means necessary to guarantee labour inspection in workplaces; and (iii) it planned to upwardly revise the salaries of labour inspectors in the same way as all other inspectors of the public administration. The Committee notes the CTSP's observations, according to which the Government has not made an effort to change the status of labour inspectors in order to provide them with better employment conditions, such as a decent salary, a guarantee of productive employment and social advantages, which could jeopardize the independence of inspectors. The Committee requests the Government to pursue its efforts towards progressively increasing the number of inspectors and the material means placed at their disposal to enable them to effectively discharge the functions of the inspection services. The Committee also requests the Government to take the necessary measures to improve the conditions of service of the inspectors, including increasing their remuneration. In this regard, it requests the Government to provide information on the salary scales and labour inspectors' career prospects, compared with public servants who carry out similar functions within other government services, such as tax inspectors and the police.

Articles 6, 7(1) and Article 15(a). Recruitment of inspectors. Prohibition from having any direct or indirect interest in the undertakings. In its previous comment, the Committee noted that, in its observations, the CTSP indicated that recruitment of labour inspectors was carried out on the basis of clientelism. The Committee notes the Government's indication that, to ensure full application of sections 47 to 75 of the Decree of 17 May 2005, revising the general public service regulations, which regulate the recruitment procedure of public service agents, including labour inspectors, an administrative structure has been established for this purpose, entitled the Office for Human Resources Management (OMRH). The Committee also notes that the CTSP reiterated in 2019 its previous observations on this matter and indicated the further deterioration of the labour inspectorate's independence vis-à-vis employers. The Committee requests the Government to ensure that labour inspectors are recruited with sole regard to their qualifications for the performance of their duties and that their status and conditions of service are such that they are independent of changes of government and of improper external influences in conformity with Articles 6 and 7(1) of the Convention. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the composition of the OMRH as well as on its prerogatives.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1949)

The Committee notes the observations of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) received on 16 September 2020. The ITUC states that, as part of the response to the COVID-19 pandemic, a number of states (including Uttar Pradesh, Madhya Pradesh, Rajasthan and Gujarat) have made changes to their labour laws by way of amendments, ordinances or executive orders, bypassing tripartite consultations and parliamentary debates. The ITUC states that the changes, based on the extraordinary measures provisions of the Factories Act 1948, gravely undermine workers' rights and leave them without protection, in particular with regard to working hours, safety and health and wages. The ITUC also expresses concern about the provisions adopted in the state of Madhya Pradesh that exempt "non-hazardous factories" from routine inspections by the Labour Commissioner, and permit these factories to submit third-party certification regarding compliance instead. The ITUC states that this exemption is a violation of the Convention and will endanger the health and safety of workers. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations in this respect.

In addition, the Committee notes that the Occupational Safety and Health (OSH) and Working Conditions Bill, previously noted by the Committee, was adopted in September 2020. The Committee proceeded with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the new legislation adopted (see Articles 12 and 17 below), as well as on the basis of the information at its disposal in 2019.

The Committee notes the observations made by the Council of Indian Employers (CIE), received on 30 August 2019, and the observations made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), received on 1 September 2019, as well as the Government's reply in relation to the observations made by the ITUC.

Follow-up to the conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards (International Labour Conference, 108th Session, June 2019)

The Committee notes the discussion in the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards (CAS) of the International Labour Conference, at its 108th Session (June 2019), on the application of the Convention, and the conclusions adopted. The conclusions of the CAS called upon the Government to: (i) ensure that the draft legislation, in particular the Code on Wages, and the OSH and Working Conditions Act, is in compliance with the Convention; (ii) ensure that effective labour inspections are conducted in all workplaces, including the informal economy and in all Special Economic Zones (SEZs); (iii) promote collaboration between officials of the labour inspectorate and employers and workers, or their organizations, in particular when it comes to the implementation of inspection reports; (iv) increase the resources at the disposal of the central and state government inspectorates; (v) ensure that labour inspectors have full powers to undertake routine and unannounced visits and to initiate legal proceedings; (vi) pursue its efforts towards the establishment of registers of workplaces at the central and state levels; (vii) provide detailed information on the progress made with respect to measures taken to improve the data collection system, enabling the registration of data in all sectors; (viii) ensure that the operation of the self-certification scheme does not impede or interfere with the powers in functions of labour inspectors to carry out regular and unannounced visits in any way, as this is only a complementary tool; (ix) submit its annual report on labour inspection to the ILO; and (x) provide information on the number of routine and unannounced visits, as well as on the dissuasive sanctions imposed against infractions to guarantee the enforcement of labour protections in practice. The CAS also invited the Government to accept a direct contacts mission and to elaborate a report in consultation with the most representative employers' and workers' organizations on progress made in the implementation of the Convention in law and practice. The Committee notes with concern the statement in the Government's report that it does not accept any direct contacts mission.

Articles 2 and 4 of the Convention. Labour inspection in SEZs. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the Government's earlier indication that few inspections had been carried out in SEZs, and that Development Commissioners continued to exercise inspection powers in some SEZs. The Committee notes the observations of the ITUC expressing concern that the power of labour inspectors are being exercised by Development Commissioners who have a responsibility to promote investment in SEZs. The Committee also notes the observations made by the CIE that some of the SEZs have jurisdictions in more than one state, and that due to this administrative difficulty, Development Commissioners have been appointed to oversee the functioning of the SEZs. The CIE adds that Development Commissioners have been given full powers to enforce the labour laws through labour inspectors deputed by the local governments.

The Committee notes the Government's indication, in response to the concerns expressed by the ITUC, that the deputed labour inspectors from the states work independently, are paid by the states and may conduct inspections on their proper initiative without prior intimation to the Development Commissioners. The Committee further notes the Government's indications, in reply to the Committee's request to ensure that effective labour inspections are conducted in all SEZs, that the number of inspections has increased substantially in the last three years. In this respect, the Committee notes with interest from the statistical information provided by the Government, an increase in the number of inspections undertaken in six of the seven SEZs from 2016–17 to 2018–19: from 0 to 62 in Falta Kolkata; from 26 to 30 in Vishakapatnam; from 46 to 105 in Mumbai; from 16 to 30 in Noida; from 368 to 2,806 in Kandla; and from 189 to 222 in Chennai. The number of inspections undertaken in the SEZ Cochin went from 22 to 18 over the same period. The Committee notes however, that the number of penalties imposed remained low, and in three out of the seven SEZs, no penalties were imposed during this period. The Committee requests the Government, in line with the 2019 conclusions of the CAS, to ensure that effective labour inspections are conducted in all SEZs. Welcoming the information already provided, the Committee requests the Government to provide more detailed statistical information on the number of labour inspectors responsible for inspections in these zones, the number of inspection visits, the number and nature of offences reported, the number of penalties imposed, the amounts of fines imposed and collected, and information on criminal prosecutions, if any. It also requests the Government to continue to provide information on the number of enterprises and workers in each SEZ. The Committee further requests the Government to provide up-to-date information indicating in which SEZs labour inspection powers have been delegated to Development Commissioners, including the specific powers so delegated and how inspections are carried out in those SEZs.

Articles 4, 20 and 21. Availability of statistical information on the activities of the labour inspection services at the central and state levels. Availability of statistics in specific sectors. The Committee notes the Government's reference, in reply to the Committee's previous request for an annual labour inspection report, to the 2018–19 report published by the Ministry of Labour and Employment, which contains statistical information on inspection activities at the central level (including the number of labour inspections, the number of irregularities detected, the number of prosecutions and convictions, as well as the number of accidents in mines). Concerning the state level, the Committee notes the statistical information on labour inspection activities provided by the Government with its report (including on the number of labour inspections in 14 states, and the number of violations detected, prosecutions and penalties imposed in 15 states). Finally, the Committee welcomes the information available on the Shram Suvidha web portal at the Ministry of Labour and Employment concerning the information on registered workplaces in nine states and the information that discussions are ongoing with other states concerning the integration of information into the portal. The Committee also notes the observations made by the ITUC that the statistical data provided does not allow for an assessment of the effective operation of the labour inspection services. The Committee urges the Government to pursue its efforts to ensure that the central authority (at the central level or the state levels), publishes and transmits to the ILO annual reports on labour inspection activities containing all the information required by Article 21. In line with the 2019 conclusions of the CAS, the Committee encourages the Government to pursue its efforts towards the establishment of registers of workplaces at the central and state levels. In this regard, the Committee also once again requests the Government to provide detailed information on the progress made with respect to measures taken to improve the data collection system enabling the registration of data in all sectors.

Articles 10 and 11. Material means and human resources at the central and state levels. The Committee notes with interest the Government's indication, in response to the Committee's request to increase the resources at the central and state government inspectorates, that more than 574 labour inspectors have been recruited at the state levels in the last two years, bringing the total number of labour inspectors to 3,721. The Government adds that at the central level, the number of labour inspectors is 4,702. The Committee also notes the information provided by the Government in relation to the central level and 19 states on the transport facilities or transport allowance provided, as well as on the available material resources.

The Committee notes the statement of the CIE that the use of technology, information and communications technology in particular, has contributed to promoting compliance. The Committee also notes the observations made by the ITUC that the human and material resources of the labour inspectorate are inadequate. It notes the Government's reply that inspectors at the central government level and in most states are provided vehicles for conducting inspections. In line with the 2019 conclusions of the CAS, the Committee requests the Government to continue to take measures to increase the resources at the disposal of the central and state government inspectorates, and to provide information on the concrete measures taken in that respect. It also requests the Government to continue to provide information on the number of labour inspectors, material resources and transport facilities and/or budget for travel allowances of the labour inspection services at the central level and for each state, and to provide statistical information on the workplaces liable to inspection at the central level and state levels.

Articles 12 and 17. Free initiative of labour inspectors to enter workplaces without prior notice, and discretion to initiate legal proceedings without previous warning. The Committee previously requested the Government to ensure that, in the ongoing legislative reform, any legislation developed be in conformity with the Convention. The Committee notes the Government's indication, in response to this request, that the Code on Wages was adopted in August 2019. The Committee notes that pursuant to section 51(5)(b) of the Code on Wages, labour inspectors entitled "inspectors-cum-facilitators" may inspect establishments "subject to the instructions or guidelines issued by the appropriate Government from time to time". It further notes that the Code on Wages provides that inspectors-cum-facilitators shall, before the initiation of prosecution for an offence, give employers an opportunity to comply with the provisions of the Code within a certain time limit through a written direction (section 54(3)).

In addition, the Committee notes the adoption of the OSH and Working Conditions Code on 28 September 2020. The Code provides that, subject to rules made, inspector-cum-facilitators may enter any place which is used, or they have reason to believe is used, as a work place and inspect and examine the establishment and any premises, plant, machinery, article, or any other relevant material (section 35(1) and (2)). The Committee notes that while the Code also gives inspectors-cum-facilitators and other appropriately authorized officers the power to enter workplaces at any time during normal working hours or at any other time deemed necessary, it requires them to give notice in writing to the employer prior to undertaking a survey (section 20(1)); and with respect to inspections in mines (section 41), to provide at least three days before conducting inspections (for the purpose of surveying, levelling or measuring any mine or any output therefrom), except in emergency situations pursuant to a written order from the Chief Inspector-cum-Facilitator. The Committee further notes that section 110 provides that an inspector-cum-facilitator shall not initiate prosecution proceedings against an employer for any offence in Chapter XII of the Code (on offences and penalties), and shall give an opportunity to comply with relevant provisions of the Code within a period of thirty days from the date of notice giving opportunity, and, if the employer complies with such provisions within the period, no such proceeding shall be initiated against the employer. Section 110 further provides that the period of notice does not apply in the case of an accident or if it concerns a violation of the same nature repeated within a period of three years from the date on which the first violation was committed. In addition, the Committee notes the statistics provided by the Government concerning the number of convictions and penalties imposed at the central level and for 11 states for the period of 2016–19.

The Committee recalls that under Article 12(1)(a) of the Convention, labour inspectors shall be empowered to enter freely and without previous notice at any hour of the day or night any workplace liable to inspection, and it further recalls Article 17 of the Convention provides that, with certain exceptions, persons who violate or neglect to observe legal provisions enforceable by labour inspectors shall be liable to prompt legal proceedings without previous warning, and that it must be left to the discretion of labour inspectors to give a warning or advice instead of instituting or recommending proceedings. The Committee requests the Government to take measures to ensure that labour inspectors are empowered, in law and practice and in line with Article 12(1)(a) and (b) of the Convention, to make visits without previous notice. In this respect, noting that the Code on Wages provides for inspections subject to the instructions or guidelines issued by the appropriate Government, the Committee urges the Government to ensure that the instructions issued fully empower labour inspectors in accordance with Article 12(1)(a) and (b) of the Convention. The Committee also requests the Government to provide further information on the meaning of the term "survey" in section 20 of the OSH and Working Conditions Code, and to indicate whether labour inspectors are required to provide notice of all inspections in writing under the Code. It also urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that labour inspectors are able to initiate legal proceedings without previous warning, where required, in conformity with Article 17 of the Convention. In this respect, it requests the Government to provide further information on the meaning of the term "inspectors-cum-facilitators," including the functions and powers of officials performing this role. Noting the statistics already provided, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the number and nature of offences reported, the number of penalties imposed, the amounts of fines imposed and collected, and information on criminal prosecutions, if any.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government which reiterates the content of its previous request adopted in 2019.

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 2000)

The Committee notes the observations made by the Kyrgyzstan Federation of Trade Unions (KFTU) received on 30 September 2020.

Articles 12, 16, 17 and 18 of the Convention. Limitations and restrictions of labour inspection. Effective enforcement of penalties for labour law provisions. 1. Moratorium on labour inspections. The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report regarding the adoption of Government Decision No. 586 of 2018 on the introduction of a temporary ban on the inspection of economic entities. The Committee notes with deep concern that Government Decision No. 586 provides for such a temporary ban between 1 January 2019 and 1 January 2021 (section 1). The Government Decision states, in its preamble, that it aims to: create favourable conditions for business development, improve the investment climate, support the economic activities of business entities and prevent interference of authorized bodies in the activities of business entities. However, the Committee notes the KFTU's statement that since inspections have been prohibited, any violation of workers' labour rights can only be investigated on the basis of a worker's complaint, which creates favourable conditions for employers to cover up any violation of labour rights and industrial accidents. The KFTU further states that the moratorium has had a negative impact on occupational safety and the prevention of occupational accidents.

While noting that inspections may be carried out in connection with applications from individuals and legal entities concerning violations of labour rights (section 1(4)), the Committee recalls that Article 16 of the Convention provides for the undertaking of labour inspections as often as is necessary to ensure the effective application of the relevant legal provisions. Recalling that a moratorium placed on labour inspection is a serious violation of the Convention, the Committee urges the Government to eliminate the temporary ban on inspections and to ensure that labour inspectors are able to undertake labour inspections as often and as thoroughly as is necessary to ensure the effective application of the legal provisions, in compliance with Article 16 of the Convention. The Committee also requests the Government to provide its comments with respect to the KFTU observations.

2. Other limitations on labour inspection. The Committee previously noted with concern that Law No. 72 of 2007 (as amended) on the conduct of inspections in enterprises provides for various limitations on labour inspection powers and the undertaking of labour inspections, including restrictions relating to: (i) the power to undertake labour inspections without prior notice (scheduled inspection visits have to be notified at least ten days prior to the inspection (section 6(6)); (ii) the free initiative of labour inspectors (labour inspections require a formal authorization, in coordination with the body for the development of entrepreneurship (section 12(3)); (iii) the frequency of labour inspections (e.g. scheduled inspections shall not be conducted more than once a year in workplaces considered to be at high risk, and not more than once every three years in workplaces with an average degree of risk (section 6(3)), and inspections shall not be conducted in new businesses within the first three years of their operation (section 6(8)); and (iv) the scope of inspections, particularly in terms of the issues that can be examined in the course of inspections (sections 6(5) and 7(4)). Pursuant to section 20 of Law No. 72 where a court does not confirm the existence of a violation as detected by an inspector, and where the court considers that this is the result of a fault of the labour inspector, the inspector shall be removed from office. Section 11 of Law No. 72 provides that scheduled and unscheduled inspections are not intended to impose financial or other sanctions on businesses and that in the event of an observed violation of the legislation during a scheduled inspection, inspectors may issue a written warning to the enterprise requesting it to eliminate the violation within 30 days (three days if the violation impacts the safety or health), and following the expiry of this delay, may take measures to influence the enterprise, as provided for in legislation.

The Committee notes that the Government indicates that there have been no amendments to these provisions of Law No. 72 and that it plans to consider the issue within the framework of the National Tripartite Commission. The Government states that in accordance with Law No. 72, the authorized state body may carry out unplanned on-site inspections only after the Ministry of Economy has given its consent. The Committee notes with deep concern the Government's statement that this is the only form of inspection during which labour inspectors can check that employers comply with the requirements of labour legislation, and its further statement that if the organization has a qualified lawyer, any inspection with prior notice or limited to the study of documents provided by the employer has almost no chance of identifying evidence of actual labour law violations. The Committee also notes the observations of the KFTU referring to the number of occupational accidents and indicating that Law No. 72 has had a negative impact on occupational safety and the prevention of occupational accidents.

The Committee recalls its general observation of 2019 on the labour inspection Conventions, expressing concern at reforms that substantially undermine the inherent functioning of labour inspection systems and urging governments to remove these restrictions, with a view to achieving conformity with Convention No. 81. The Committee once again urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that labour inspectors are empowered to make visits to workplaces liable to inspection without previous notice in conformity with Article 12(1)(a) of the Convention and that they are able to initiate or recommend immediate legal proceedings without prior warning, where required, in conformity with Article 17 of the Convention. It further urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that labour inspectors are able to undertake labour inspections as often and as thoroughly as is necessary to ensure the effective application of the legal provisions. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the progress made in this regard, including the consideration given to this issue within the National Tripartite Commission. It recalls that the Government can avail itself of the technical assistance of the ILO in this regard.

Article 13(2)(b). Measures to ensure the safety and health of workers. In its previous comments, the Committee referred to section 17 of the Occupational Safety and Health Act and section 402 of the Labour Code and requested the Government to bring the national legislation into compliance with the requirements of the Convention by empowering labour inspectors to take measures with immediate executory force in case of imminent danger to the health or safety of workers, even where no specific violation of the legislation is identified. The Committee notes that the Government indicates that it plans to consider the issue within the framework of the National Tripartite Commission. The Committee once again requests the Government to take measures to bring the national legislation into conformity with Article 13(2)(b) of the Convention and to provide information on the measures taken.

Articles 20 and 21. Annual labour inspection report. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to provide information on the measures taken by the central labour inspection with a view to publishing and transmitting to the Office the annual labour inspection report. In this respect, the Committee notes the statistical data on labour inspection visits and violations detected provided in the Government's report in 2019, but notes that the Government has not submitted an annual report on the work of the labour inspection activities. The Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that annual inspection reports are published and transmitted to the ILO in accordance with the requirements of Articles 20 and 21.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

[The Government is asked to reply in full to the present comments in 2021.]

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1962)

The Committee notes with deep concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments. The Committee informs the Government that, if it has not supplied replies to the points raised by 1 September 2021, then it may proceed with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the information at its disposal at its next session.

Labour law reform. The Committee notes the information provided by the ILO Decent Work Technical Support Team and the Regional Office for Arab States that a tripartite meeting took place in 2019 with the support of the ILO and that a new labour law reform is under way. The Committee requests the Government to take into account the matters raised below and in a request addressed directly to the Government in the context of this new reform process, in order to ensure the full conformity of a new Labour Code with the Convention, and to provide information on any progress made in this regard.

Article 3(1) and (2) of the Convention. Primary functions and additional duties of labour inspectors. 1. Supervision of union matters. The Committee previously noted that, pursuant to section 2(c) of Decree No. 3273 of 26 June 2000, the labour inspectorate has the power to monitor vocational organizations and confederations at all levels in order to check whether the latter, in their operations, are exceeding the limits prescribed by law and by their rules of procedure and statutes. It recalls that for many years it had requested the Government to take steps to limit labour inspectors' intervention in internal trade union affairs. The Committee notes the Government's reply in its report that the role of labour inspectors is limited to accessing union records and to cases where a union submits its final account or a union council member files a complaint. The Government indicates that there are currently no complaints in this respect with the Department of Labour Relations and Trade Unions. The Committee further notes the statistics provided by the Government indicating that, in 2015, the labour inspectorate supervised 207 trade union elections and received 13 applications for authorization to establish unions.

In this respect, the Committee recalls that, according to Article 3(1) of the Convention, the primary functions of the labour inspection system shall be to monitor and secure the conditions of work and the protection of workers while engaged in their work, and that in accordance with Article 3(2), any further duties which may be entrusted to labour inspectors shall not be such as to interfere with the effective discharge of their primary duties or to prejudice in any way the authority and impartiality which are necessary to inspectors in their relations with employers and workers. Further, the Committee expressed reservations in its 2006 General Survey, Labour inspection, paragraph 80, regarding excessive use of close supervision by labour inspectors of the activities of trade unions and employers' organizations, to the extent that it takes the form of acts of interference in these organizations' legitimate activities. The Committee urges the Government to take the necessary steps, in the context of the ongoing labour law reform, to ensure that the functions assigned to labour inspectors do not interfere with their main objective, which is to provide for the protection of workers in accordance with Article 3(1) of Convention No. 81. In this respect, it urges the Government to ensure that any supervision of trade union activities is carried out only in relation to the protection of the rights of trade unions and their members, and does not take the form of acts of interference in their legitimate activities and internal affairs.

2. Work permits for migrant workers. The Committee notes the statistics provided by the Government indicating that, in 2015, a significant amount of the labour inspectorate's activities focused on the issuance (60,814) and renewal (148,860) of work permits, as well as inspections related to work permits (253). The Committee requests the Government to take specific measures to ensure that the functions assigned to labour inspectors to issue and monitor work permits do not interfere with the main objective of labour inspectors to secure the enforcement of legal provisions relating to conditions of work and the protection of workers, as required under Article 3(1) of the Convention. It requests the Government to provide information on the time and resources spent on labour inspection activities in these work areas, compared to activities aiming at securing the enforcement of legal provisions relating to conditions of work and the protection of workers.

Article 12(1) and (2). Right of inspectors to enter freely any workplace liable to inspection. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to amend the Memorandum No. 68/2 of 2009 which requires prior authorization in writing for all unscheduled inspection visits. It notes that, according to section 6 of Decree No. 3273 of 2000 on Labour Inspection, labour inspectors shall have the authority to enter freely and without prior notice all enterprises under their supervision during hours of work at the enterprise and all parts thereof; and in conducting an inspection visit they shall apprise the employer of their presence on the premises, unless they consider such information detrimental to the execution of their functions. However, the Committee also notes the Government's indication that written authorization is provided in order for an inspection to be carried out, and that inspections are carried out as part of an inspector's annual or monthly programme. In this regard, the Committee recalls that Article 12 of the Convention provides that labour inspectors provided with proper credentials shall be empowered to enter freely and without previous notice at any hour of the day or night any workplace liable to inspection. It recalls that the requirement to obtain prior permission to undertake an inspection in all cases constitutes a restriction on the free initiative of inspectors to undertake an inspection, including where they have reason to believe that an undertaking is in violation of the legal provisions. The Committee once again requests the Government to take measures to amend Memorandum No. 68/2 of 2009 to ensure that labour inspectors provided with proper credentials are empowered to enter freely any workplace liable to inspection, in accordance with Article 12(1) of the Convention, and to provide copies of any texts or documents showing progress in this regard.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1953)

Articles 3(1) and (2), 4(2), 10 and 16 of the Convention. Effective organization of the labour inspection services and the supervision and control by central labour inspection authorities at the provincial levels. Number of labour inspectors and number and thoroughness of labour inspections. The Committee previously noted a serious shortage of labour inspectors in relation to the number of workplaces liable to inspection. It also noted that the provincial labour directorates had a number of functions, such as the registration of trade unions and the conciliation and settlement of industrial disputes, not related to the primary duties of labour inspectors (as defined in Article 3(1) of the Convention).

The Committee notes the Government's statement in its report that the provincial governments are working to strengthen the labour inspection staff and expand their area of activities. In this respect, it takes due note of the information provided by the Government in its annual labour inspection report of 2018 that there has been a slight increase in the overall number of inspectors compared to the information in the 2017 annual labour inspection report in the provinces of Punjab (from 221 labour inspectors and 13 mine inspectors in 2017 to 225 labour inspectors and 13 mine inspectors in 2018), Sindh (117 labour inspectors and 26 mine inspectors in 2017 to 132 labour inspectors and 21 mine inspectors in 2018) and Khyber Pakhtunkhwa (KPK) (40 labour inspectors in 2017 and 50 in 2018). The Committee notes that one province saw an overall decrease (Balochistan with 73 labour inspectors and nine mine inspectors in 2017 down to 63 and 16 in 2018), and it notes that for Balochistan (37 per cent), KPK (46 per cent) and Sindh (30 per cent), a significant proportion of authorized positions are vacant. The Committee further notes the information provided by the Government on the number of inspections undertaken by the respective inspectorates and the number of workers covered by these inspections, as well as the Government's indication that the approximate labour force of Pakistan was 65.5 million in 2017–18. With respect to data, the Government indicates that the provincial reporting of data concerning labour inspection is progressing, but that there are sometimes differences in the reported data in different reports.

With respect to the Committee's previous request on additional duties assigned to labour inspectors, the Committee notes the Government's statement that the additional duties do not interfere with the effective discharge of their primary duties under Article 3(1) of the Convention. It states that, for example with respect to Punjab, the time spent performing additional functions like registration of trade unions, conciliation and settlement of industrial disputes by labour inspectors, is approximately 5 per cent of the total working time, which leaves ample time to perform primary duties. With respect to this diversion of labour inspector time for additional duties, rather than the primary duties of monitoring and securing the conditions of work and the protection of workers while engaged in their work, the Committee recalls that, according to Article 3(2) of the Convention, any further duties which may be entrusted to labour inspectors should not be such as to interfere with the effective discharge of their primary duties or to prejudice in any way the authority and impartiality which are necessary to inspectors in their relations with employers and workers. The Committee urges the Government to pursue its efforts to ensure that the number of labour inspectors is sufficient to secure the effective discharge of the duties of the inspectorate, including by filling the vacant positions in each province. It requests the Government to continue to ensure the availability of accurate information on the number of labour inspectors in each province and to continue to provide information on the number of labour inspectors (as well as vacant positions) and labour inspections performed in each province. The Committee also requests the Government to provide further information on the measures taken to strengthen the authorities responsible for labour inspection in the four provinces. In this respect, the Committee once again requests the Government to provide an organizational chart of the labour inspection services in each province.

Article 12. Free access of labour inspectors to workplaces. In its previous comment, the Committee noted that the 2017 Sindh Occupational Safety and Health (OSH) Act restricts the conduct of inspection visits to "any reasonable time" (and only permits entry "at any time" in situations that are or may be dangerous) (section 19). It recalled that according to Article 12 of the Convention, labour inspectors shall be empowered to enter freely and without previous notice at any hour of the day or night any workplace liable to inspection. It also noted the 2019 Punjab OSH Act, which covers labour inspection, did not contain any provisions related to the power of labour inspectors to freely enter workplaces liable to inspection without prior notice.

The Committee notes the Government's reiterated indication that labour inspectors may enter workplaces freely and without previous notice, pursuant to the Factories Act of 1934 and the Mines Act of 1923. It notes in this respect the information provided by the Government on the applicable legislation in the respective provinces, indicating that the Factories Act of 1934 is not applicable in the provinces of KPK and Sindh, which adopted provincial Factories Acts in 2013 and 2015, respectively.

In this respect, the Committee notes the provisions on the powers of inspectors in the Factories Act of 1934, the Sindh Factory Act of 2015 and the KPK Factories Act of 2013, which do not specifically refer to entry without prior notice while providing that inspectors may enter establishments (which are liable to inspection, or which they have reason to believe to be liable) as they think fit, subject to any rules made by the Government (section 11 of the Factories Act of 1934, section 12 of the KPK Factories Act and section 13 of Sindh Factories Act). The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that labour inspectors in all provinces are empowered in law and practice to enter any workplace liable to inspection freely and without previous notice at any hour of the day or night, as provided for in Article 12(1) of the Convention. It requests the Government to provide information on any rules (or legislation) adopted with an impact on the exercise of the powers of inspectors referred to in section 11 of the Factories Act of 1934, section 12 of the KPK Factories Act and section 13 of Sindh Factories Act. It also requests the Government to provide information on the exercise of this right in practice in the provinces of KPK and Sindh, indicating the number of inspections conducted with and without prior notice.

Articles 17 and 18. Effective enforcement. Sufficiently dissuasive penalties for labour law violations and for obstructing labour inspectors in the performance of their duties. The Committee welcomes the information provided, in reply to the Committee's previous request concerning enforcement and in the annual labour inspection report of 2018, concerning the number of infringements detected, the number of convictions, and the amount of fines imposed by the Directorates of Labour and Departments of Mining of each province. It also notes the Government's statement, in response to the Committee's previous request related to the obstruction of labour inspectors, that there have been no cases reported relating to obstruction of labour inspectors in their duties in all Provinces. Concerning the Committee's previous request regarding progress made to provide for increased penalties, the Committee further notes the Government's reference to the adoption, in January 2020, of the KPK Mines Safety, Inspection and Regulation Act, 2019, which revised and raised the applicable fines in the case of violations in mining. Noting that the Government previously referred to draft labour legislation providing for increased penalties in Balochistan and Sindh, the Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the progress made with respect to increasing the level of fines and other penalties for labour law violations and the obstruction of labour inspectors in their duties in each of the provinces. It also requests the Government to continue to provide information in relation to each of the provinces on the number of violations detected, the number of such violations which resulted in prosecution, and subsequent convictions, and both the number and amount of the fines imposed, and to provide information on the proportion of imposed fines that are paid in practice for each province. Noting the Government's indication that no cases have yet been reported related to any obstruction of labour inspectors in their duties, the Committee urges the Government to provide information on the possible reasons for this lack of reporting, including whether it is related to a lack of sufficiently detailed inquiry, or to inspectors' reluctance to initiate such reports. It requests the Government to provide information on any cases reported in the future, in relation to each of the provinces, including the outcome of the case and the specific penalties applied (including the amount of fines imposed).

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1967)

The Committee takes note of the observations of the National Confederation of Workers (CNT) and the Confederation of Workers Authentic (CUT-A), received in 2019.

Articles 6, 7, 10 and 11 of the Convention. Labour inspectors. Status and conditions of service, recruitment, training, number and material conditions of work. In relation to its earlier comments, the Committee notes from the Government's report that the establishment of the Ministry of Labour, Employment and Social Security (MTESS) by Act No. 5115 of 2013 has improved labour inspectors' working conditions. The Committee notes in particular the information provided by the Government to the effect that: (i) their remuneration is higher than that under the former Ministry of Justice and Labour; (ii) open competitions have been held for the recruitment of new inspectors to the public service: the MTESS employed 31 inspectors in 2015 and 25 inspectors in 2019; (iii) the new inspectors have received training through the training plan put in place by the ILO Country Office for the Southern Cone of Latin America, and continuous training was given to inspectors from 2015 to 2019 in areas including forced labour, child labour, and occupational safety and health; and (iv) new office space has been allocated to the Directorate for Labour Inspection and Monitoring (DGIF), and the inspectors are provided with all office supplies.

The Committee notes in its observations that the CUT-A remains concerned that: (i) the number of inspectors (fewer than 30 in all), is insufficient to cover the entire national territory; (ii) there is a lack of initial and continuous training for inspectors and no profile whereby to determine the requirements for their posts; (iii) there is a lack of inspectors holding public servant status. Instead, inspectors are contracted employees, which prevents them from performing their functions fully; and (v) inspectors are poorly remunerated. The Committee also notes from the CNT's observations with regard to public sector workers that the contracted employees do not enjoy the same employment conditions as appointed public servants, for example, the right to a retirement pension, healthcare or cover against occupational risks, occupational accidents and diseases.

The Committee notes from the information provided by the Government that all inspectors who entered the service in 2015 did so through a merit-based competition and enjoyed the status of temporary public servants, while 22 of the 25 inspectors employed in 2019 held the status of temporary public servants, while three inspectors held the status of permanent public servants. In that connection, the Committee notes the Government's indication that inspectors obtain their posts through open competition in conformity with sections 15 and 35 of Act No. 1626 of 2000 on the Public Service, and Decree No 3857 of 2015, which approves the general regulations governing selection for entry and promotion in the public service for permanent and temporary posts. Section 8 of the Decree cited establishes merit-based competition as the technical mechanism of selection for the recruitment of persons to the public administration, applicable, inter alia, to technical, daily wage or professional posts.

The Committee recalls in respect of the temporary recruitment of labour inspectors, apparently the case for the large majority of inspectors, that that form of recruitment is not in conformity with Article 6 of the Convention, which provides that the status and conditions of service of the inspection staff must be such that they are assured of stability of employment and are independent of changes of government and of improper influences. The Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the status and conditions of service of labour inspectors comply with the requirements of Article 6 of the Convention. In that respect, it also requests the Government to provide additional information of the salary structure and benefits applicable to labour inspectors and to public servants who perform similar functions in other government services (such as tax inspectors or the police). The Committee also requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged to increase the number of labour inspectors. The Committee further requests the Government to continue providing information on the number of inspectors and their distribution by region, their status and conditions of service, giving details of the method employed for their recruitment and of their remuneration. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the number of suitably equipped local offices, as well as on availability of transport facilities necessary for the performance of labour inspectors' duties, in accordance with Article 11 of the Convention.

Articles 11, 12, 16 and 18. Application in the Chaco region. Further to its earlier comments on the creation of labour law enforcement units in the Chaco region, the Committee notes that CUT-A indicates deep concerns in its observations at the shortcomings in labour inspection in that region, and that although the Government has opened an MTESS office there, the office has neither the means nor the independence to monitor possible irregularities in situ, and that the inspectors are only able to enter rural properties under court order. Moreover, CUT-A points out that not only do workers have to go to the MTESS office to register their complaint, but they must also deliver the official notice to their employer summoning the employer to clarify the situation. The Committee requests the Government to communicate its comments in respect of the CUT-A's observations. With reference to its comments under the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29), the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the functioning of the MTESS office established in the Chaco region and its impact on the application of the legislation on the working conditions and protection of workers in that region, including information on the number of inspection visits undertaken, the violations detected and the penalties imposed. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the number of labour inspectors at work in the region.

Article 12(1)(a). Restrictions on labour inspectors freely to enter workplaces liable to inspection. In its previous comments the Committee once again requested the Government to take the necessary measures, including through the amendment of Resolution No. 1278 of 2011 (which provides technical and legal guidance on aspects of the inspection and monitoring services and summary inspection procedures), to ensure that labour inspectors are empowered to enter freely any place liable to inspection. In that connection, the Committee notes the information provided by the Government to the effect that Resolution No. 47 of 2016 approved the general inspection procedure for monitoring labour, social security and occupational safety and health legislation, and repealed sections 1.1 and 1.19, on inspection processes, of Resolution No. 1278.

The Committee notes that article 3 of Resolution No. 47 provides that: (i) the general inspection procedure may be initiated ex officio, or by inspection order signed by the Minister or Vice-Minister of Labour, or at the request of a party. Once initiated, the DGIF will submit the complaints and/or requests for inspection to the legal counsel of the Vice-Minister of Labour, for a ruling on whether or not to proceed with an inspection (section 1.1.); (ii) in order to carry out inspections in response to complaints or requests, the respective inspection orders must be issued. Where the legal counsel of the Vice-Minister of Labour deems the orders inappropriate, they will be dismissed and filed (section 1.1.); (iii) in the case of an ex officio inspection or inspection at the request of a party (following acceptance of the request or complaint), the Director-General of Labour Inspection and Monitoring will submit a draft inspection order to the Minister or Vice-Minister of Labour for consideration (section 1.2.); (iv) the inspection orders must, among other requirements, be signed by the Minister or Vice-Minister; they are otherwise void (section 1.2.); (v) inspectors holding an inspection order are empowered to enter freely and without previous notice at any hour of the day or night any workplace liable to inspection and to remain there for the time required; and, (vi) to broaden the scope of the inspection (to monitor aspects not included under the inspection order), the inspectors must inform the Director-General of Labour Inspection and Monitoring, so that the Director-General may propose the consequent broadening of the inspection order to the Minister or Vice-Minister, including in the event of detection of imminent danger to the lives, physical integrity, safety and health of the workers (section 1.2.).

The Committee notes that Resolution No. 56 of 2017 amplifies Resolution No. 47 and approves the regulations governing the procedures for ensuring compliance with labour, social security, and occupational safety and health standards, and those for addressing non-compliance. Those regulations provide that: (i) the inspector dealing with the complaint alleging non-compliance and/or request for inspection shall submit the complaint to the Director-General of the DGIF for consideration (section 1); (ii) on receipt of the complaint and/or the request for inspection, the Director shall forward it to the Chief Legal Counsel of the Vice-Ministry of Labour, who shall decide whether or not an inspection is appropriate; if so, the DGIF shall submit the draft inspection order to the Minister or Vice-Minister of Labour (section 2); (iii) where the action is ex officio, the DGIF shall submit the draft inspection order for signature by the Minister or Vice-Minister (section 3); and (iv) Following endorsement by the Minister or Vice-Minister, the order shall be forwarded to the DGIF (section 4).

The Committee notes that by virtue of Resolutions Nos 47 and 56, only inspectors in possession of an inspection order signed by a higher competent authority (the Minister or Vice-Minister of Labour) may enter freely, at any hour of the day or night any workplace liable to inspection. The Committee recalls that Article 12 of the Convention provides that labour inspectors provided with proper credentials shall be empowered to enter freely and without previous notice at any hour of the day or night any workplace liable to inspection. The Committee also recalls that the requirement to obtain prior authorization before an inspection constitutes a restriction on the freedom of inspectors to conduct inspections, especially if they have reason to believe that an enterprise is violating compulsory legal provisions. The Committee therefore urges the Government to adopt without delay the necessary measures to amend MTESS Resolutions No. 47 of 2016 and 56 of 2017, on inspection procedure, to ensure compliance with labour, social security and safety and health standards, so as to guarantee that inspectors provided with proper credentials are able to enter freely any workplace liable to inspection, in accordance with Article 12(1)(a) of the Convention, without the need to obtain previous higher authorization.

Article 16. Frequency and thoroughness of labour inspections. The Committee notes that section 3(2.1) of Resolution No. 47 provides that: (i) more than one inspection visit may be made under one inspection order wherever the first visit has not made possible collection of all relevant data; and (ii) in no case may more than two visits be made under one inspection order.

In addition, the Committee notes from the observations of the CNT that for the period between 16 August and 1 November 2019 (slightly over two months) 98 enterprises where allegations of non-compliance with labour standards had been registered received inspection visits. The CNT points out, however, that while that figure represents a twofold increase in the number of monthly visits (about 40 visits) compared to the monthly average in 2017 and part of 2018, it is not even equivalent to one per cent of all enterprises listed, as at June 2019, by the Directorate for the Registration of Employers and Workers (59,567 enterprises nationwide). Consequently, the CNT indicates that the labour inspection is not fulfilling its fundamental role of ensuring compliance with the labour laws. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the measures adopted or envisaged to ensure that workplaces are inspected as frequently and as thoroughly as is necessary to guarantee the effective application of the relevant legal provisions, in conformity with Article 16 of the Convention.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee takes note of the Government's report and the supplementary information provided in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020). The Committee also notes the observations on the Convention made by the Autonomous Workers' Confederation of Peru (CATP), received in 2019, which refer to various issues raised by the Committee in its previous comment.

Moreover, the Committee notes the observations of the CATP, received in 2020 together with the Government's report, which reiterate its 2019 observations and also refer to the following issues: (i) Legislative Decree No. 1499 (May 2020) amended section 6 of Act No. 28806 (the General Labour Inspection Act) by eliminating the advisory role that labour inspectors had towards employers and workers; consequently, employers presented a high number of requests for suspension of workers in the midst of the COVID-19 pandemic which were not in conformity with legal requirements and were declared invalid by the administrative labour authority; (ii) the number of labour inspectors in the National Labour Inspection Authority (SUNAFIL) is insufficient; this implies an overload for inspectors which is an obstacle to the effective accomplishment of their functions; (iii) labour inspection only covers the private sector, which means that workers in the public sector are not covered; (iv) the SUNAFIL does not provide safe and healthy working conditions to labour inspectors, including the necessary preventative and protective measures in the context of the current pandemic; (v) the SUNAFIL's training centre does not adequately plan its activities, which has a negative impact on the training of the inspectorate's personnel; (vi) the labour inspectorate is not notified of work accidents occurring in the informal economy and therefore they are not investigated; (vii) the SUNAFIL does not have a work plan which would ensure the regular sanctioning of recidivist enterprises, the monitoring of frequent violations and the application of the sanctions imposed by the competent bodies based on the inspectorate's work; and (viii) since 2015, annual labour inspection reports have not been published on the official webpage. The Committee requests the Government to transmit its comments in response to these serious allegations.

Articles 6 and 15(a) of the Convention. Legal status and conditions of service of inspectors. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the Government's indication that the SUNAFIL and the regional governments had not yet incorporated the new civil service system envisaged by the Civil Service Act No. 30057 of July 2013 and that their employees were still governed by the labour legislation regulating private enterprises until the public service career system was implemented. In this regard, the Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that, as of June 2019, the National Civil Service Authority (SERVIR) includes 463 entities that are in the process of implementing the system envisaged by the Civil Service Act, and that these include the SUNAFIL and 17 regional governments. Moreover, the Government indicates, in its supplementary information, that the implementation of the new civil service system is progressive, by entities and offices, and that it is done in four stages (preparation of the institution concerned, analysis, implementation of internal improvements, and competitions under the new system) as provided for in the document entitled "Procedure for the transition of a public institution to the civil service system under Act No. 30057" approved by Presidential Resolution No. 034-2017-SERVIR/PE. The Government adds that the SUNAFIL is at stage two of the process and that its transition is therefore not yet finalized. The Government indicates that the integration of workers to the new civil service system can only happen once the institution concerned has completed the transition process. The Government also adds that those who perform labour inspection functions in regional governments, and who had been transferred to SUNAFIL under Act No. 30814 on the strengthening of the labour inspection system, are not part of the transition process to the new civil service system. The Committee also notes that the CATP emphasizes the importance of the Government ensuring that the implementation of the Civil Service Act does not have a negative effect on the legal status and conditions of service of inspectors. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the number of inspectors who have already been transferred to the civil service system, those who are still in a transitional period, those for whom the transition has not yet commenced, and those who will not be part of the transition process at all. It also requests the Government to provide information on the impact that the integration of the labour inspectorate into the new civil service system has on the conditions of service, salary scales, and career prospects of staff of regional governments with inspections functions. In addition, the Committee requests that the Government provide information on the legal status of each of these categories of inspectors, with an indication of whether they all benefit from guarantees, such as stability of employment, independence of changes of government and of improper external influences, irrespective of whether or not they have been included in the civil service system. The Committee further requests the Government to provide information on the salary scales, benefits and career prospects of labour inspectors in relation to other comparable categories of public servants engaged in similar functions in other Government services, such as tax inspectors and the police.

Articles 12(1)(a) and (c), and 15(c). Scope of the right of free entry of labour inspectors into workplaces liable to inspection. In previous comments, the Committee noted that the provisions of the General Labour Inspection Act, and particularly sections 10 to 13, make inspections conditional on an order from a higher authority. The Committee once again notes with regret that there has been no progress in this regard and that these provisions of the General Labour Inspection Act remain in force. The Committee recalls that in its 2006 General Survey on Labour Inspection, in paragraphs 265 and 266, it indicates that the different restrictions placed in law or in practice on inspectors' right of entry into workplaces, such as restrictions on the free initiative of inspectors in this regard through the requirement for formal authorization issued by a higher authority or another competent authority, can only stand in the way of achieving the objectives of labour inspection as set out in the instruments. The Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that, in law and practice, inspections are not subject to an order issued by a higher authority.

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1995)

Labour Inspection (Agriculture) Convention, 1969 (No. 129) (ratification: 1995)

In order to provide a comprehensive view of the issues relating to the application of ratified Conventions on labour inspection, the Committee considers it appropriate to examine Conventions Nos 81 (labour inspection) and 129 (labour inspection in agriculture) together.

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020). The Committee proceeded with the examination of the application of the Conventions on the basis of the supplementary information received from the Government this year, including the summary of the annual labour inspection report of 2019 (see Article 3(1) and (2) of Convention No. 81 and Article 6(1) and (3) of Convention No. 129 below), as well as on the basis of the information at its disposal in 2019.

The Committee takes note of the observations of the Independent and Self-Governing Trade Union "Solidarnosc" received on 19 August 2019, and the Government's reply to these observations received on 26 September 2019.

Articles 2(1), 5(a), 6, 12(1) and 16 of Convention No. 81 and Articles 4, 6, 12, 16(1) and 21 of Convention No. 129. Coverage of workplaces by labour inspection. Restrictions on collaboration between labour inspection officials and other public institutions and on inspectors entering workplaces freely. The Committee previously noted the limitations on the work of the labour inspectorate in the Act on Freedom of Economic Activity (AFEA) related to prior authorization by the inspection authority, as well as practical difficulties it posed in inspecting workplaces with multiple employers and the conduct of joint inspections. The Committee notes that the Entrepreneurs' Law, adopted in 2018, replaced the AFEA. It notes that pursuant to sections 48(1) and 54(1) of the Entrepreneurs' Law, prior notice to the entrepreneur is required and the undertaking of simultaneous controls of an entrepreneur's activities are not permitted, but that sections 48(11)-(1) and 54(1)-(8) state that these restrictions do not apply if the inspection is carried out on the basis of a ratified international agreement. With respect to authorization, the Committee takes note of the Government's indication that prior authorization by the inspection authority seeks to ensure transparency, reliability, validity, and legitimacy of public administrative bodies. It notes that pursuant to section 49(1) and (2) of the Entrepreneurs' Law, labour inspectors are empowered to conduct controls without prior presentation of the authorization from the inspection authority only in cases where control activities are necessary to prevent a crime or offence or securing evidence that such an offence has been committed, or when inspections are justified by a direct threat to life and health or environment, so long as such authorization is presented later to the entrepreneur within three days from the date of initiation of a control. Furthermore, the Committee notes that the Entrepreneurs' Law empowers inspectors to carry out control activities only during working hours (section 51(1)).

The Committee recalls that according to Article 12 of Convention No. 81 and Article 16 of Convention No. 129, labour inspectors provided with proper credentials shall be empowered to enter freely and without previous notice at any hour of the day or night any workplace liable to inspection. The Committee requests the Government to ensure that the Entrepreneurs' Law is amended to provide without qualification that labour inspectors with proper credentials are empowered to enter freely any workplace liable to inspection, in accordance with Article 12(1) of Convention No. 81 and Article 16(1) of Convention No. 129. Noting the absence of the information, the Committee once again requests the Government to indicate whether the conduct of joint inspections with other public authorities, including the State Sanitary Inspection and the Road Transport Inspectorate, is possible under the Entrepreneurs' Law.

Article 3(1) and (2) of Convention No. 81 and Article 6(1) and (3) of Convention No. 129. Additional functions entrusted to labour inspectors, and labour inspection activities for the protection of migrant workers in an irregular situation. The Committee takes note of the Government's indication, in reply to its previous request, that the National Labour Inspectorate (NLI) supervises and controls compliance with legal provisions related to OSH and the legality of employment of both Polish citizens and migrant workers. The NLI's controls cover visas and other residence permits or work permits, the conclusion of written employment contracts or civil law contracts, and compliance with labour legislation. The NLI predominantly targets entities where migrant workers from outside the EU/EEA and Switzerland are engaged in work due to the high risk of irregularities. Controls are initiated based on the results of past controls, or referrals and complaints lodged by other institutions, including the Border Guard. The Government indicates that the NLI's controls can also be initiated based on complaints made by migrant workers, predominantly concerning non-payment of wages or the lack of written employment contracts. Moreover, the NLI's controls focus on temporary employment agencies, as well as employers sending workers to Poland and employers in Poland posting workers to other countries.

The Committee notes the statistics provided by the Government indicating that in 2018, a total of 7,817 controls were undertaken on the legality of employment of migrant workers which detected labour law violations related to the payment of wages and other benefits (related to 1,555 migrant workers), medical examinations (780 migrant workers), OSH trainings (1,370 migrant workers), records of working hours (662 migrant workers), and other working time regulations including rest periods (569 migrant workers). These inspections also detected a lack of work permits (related to 3,101 migrant workers), employers' non-adherence to the terms and conditions under work permits or residence permits (related to 1,087 migrant workers), and violations related to employers' obligation to conclude written contracts (916 migrant workers). The Government indicates that labour inspectors issued decisions or oral orders to correct these violations. It further indicates that infringements of labour law provisions result in notifications by the NLI to the social insurance institution, the head of the customs and revenue office, and the police or the Border Guard. The Committee also notes with concern that, according to the 2018 annual labour inspection report, available on the website of the NLI, the NLI performed 176 joint inspections with the Border Guard, and that the NLI sent 711 notifications to the Border Guard of cases regarding the illegal performance of work by migrant workers. The same report also indicates that the Chief Labour Inspector signed a new cooperation agreement with the Chief Border Guard to cope with a dramatic increase in the number of migrant workers from outside the EU. The Committee further notes the Government's indication in its supplementary report that in 2019, labour inspectors conducted 8,348 controls of the legality of employment and performance of work by migrant workers, which represented a 7 per cent increase from 2018. In addition, according to the summary of the 2019 labour inspection report, the NLI controlled the legality of work performed by 43,400 migrant workers in 2019, among which, 5,947 persons were found engaged in "illegal" work (related to the lack of the required work permit in the majority of cases).

The Committee notes that the observations of Solidarnosc refer to, among the new tasks undertaken by the inspectors, the increased control activity on the legality of employment of migrant workers. The Committee urges the Government to take measures to ensure that the additional functions assigned to labour inspectors do not interfere with the main objective of labour inspectors, which is to provide for the protection of workers in accordance with Article 3(1) of Convention No. 81 and Article 6(1) of Convention No. 129. In this respect, it requests the Government to provide information on the manner in which it ensures that cooperation with other authorities such as the Border Guard does not prejudice in any way the authority and impartiality which are necessary to inspectors in their relations with employers and workers, in accordance with Article 3(2) of Convention No. 81 and Article 6(3) of Convention No. 129. The Committee also requests the Government to indicate the manner in which the NLI ensures the enforcement of employers' obligations with regard to the statutory rights of migrant workers, including those in an irregular situation. It also requests the Government to provide information on the orders issued by labour inspectors related to labour law violations (such as orders for establishing an employment contract, payment of overdue wages or other benefits resulting from their work) concerning migrant workers in an irregular situation, and the results obtained from such orders.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Portugal

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1962)

Labour Inspection (Agriculture) Convention, 1969 (No. 129) (ratification: 1983)

In order to provide a comprehensive view of the issues relating to the application of the ratified Conventions on labour inspection, the Committee considers it appropriate to examine Conventions Nos 81 (labour inspection) and 129 (labour inspection in agriculture) together.

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020) and the information in the 2018 report on the activities of the Working Conditions Authority (ACT). Moreover, the Committee notes the observations made by the General Confederation of Portuguese Workers–National Trade Unions (CGTP–IN), the General Workers' Union (UGT) and the Confederation of Portuguese Business (CIP), communicated with the Government's report.

The Committee further notes the observations made by the UGT, and the Confederation of Trade and Services of Portugal (CCSP) received in 2020, communicated with the Government's supplementary information. It notes that the UGT alleges that the ACT: (i) focuses on prevention at the expense of inspections and application of penalties; (ii) insufficiently coordinates its work with social partners; and (iii) issues its activity reports on inspections at irregular intervals and with many delays. The Committee asks the Government to provide its comments in this respect.

The Committee notes that a representation under article 24 of the ILO Constitution was submitted to the Governing Body by the Union of Labour Inspectors (SIT), alleging non-compliance by Portugal with the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), the Labour Inspection (Agriculture) Convention, 1969 (No. 129), and the Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981 (No. 155). At its 340th Session (October–November 2020), the Governing Body decided that it was receivable and to designate a tripartite committee for its examination (GB.340/INS/19/8, paragraph 5). The Committee notes that the allegations contained in the representation refer to Articles 7 and 10 of Convention No. 81, and 9 and 14 of Convention No. 129 concerning training and number of labour inspectors. In accordance with its usual practice, the Committee has decided to suspend its examination of these issues pending the decision of the Governing Body in respect of the representation.

COVID-19 measures. The Committee appreciates the efforts of the Government to provide information on the labour inspection measures taken by the Government in the context of the COVID-19 pandemic, including Decree No. 2-C/2020 of 17 April 2020, regulating the extension of the state of emergency decreed by the President of the Republic, which foresees strengthening the resources and powers of the ACT. The Committee also notes that CCSP indicates that a working group was established to monitor labour matters during the crisis arising from the COVID-19 pandemic, chaired by the Inspector General, with the participation of social partners, and that this group monitored the implementation of emergency measures and included a report on the inspections conducted by the ACT.

Article 6 of Convention No. 81 and Article 8 of Convention No. 129. Status and conditions of service of labour inspectors. The Committee takes note of the information provided by the Government in its report in response to the Committee's previous request concerning overtime. It also takes note of the Government's indication that the career of labour inspectors, as well as their development, is provided for in Decree-Law No. 112/2001, which establishes the legal framework and defines the structure of the inspection careers of the Public Administration. In addition to the base salary provided for in that Decree-Law, inspectors are also entitled to a supplement for the exercise of the inspection function amounting to 22.5 per cent of the base salary. The Committee notes the Government's indication that pursuant to this Decree-Law, a new career and remuneration system will be implemented for labour inspectors. In this regard, the Committee takes note that the UGT indicates that it has opposed the worsening of working conditions for labour inspectors and their lack of career prospects (which prevents progression). The union further indicates that, in 2018, a tripartite agreement was signed called "Combating precariousness and reducing labour segmentation and promoting greater dynamism in collective bargaining", which includes measures aimed at strengthening the conditions of service of the ACT. The UGT indicates that the agreement provides for measures to strengthen conditions of service at the ACT, the number of labour inspectors, the information systems of the ACT and mechanisms for hearing the views of the social partners. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on measures taken to improve the conditions of service of labour inspectors, including the results obtained through the implementation of the 2018 tripartite agreement. In this respect, it requests information on the measures taken, including within the context of the new career and remuneration system, to ensure that the remuneration levels and career prospects for labour inspectors are commensurate with that of other public officials exercising similar functions. In addition, the Committee requests information on stability of employment for labour inspectors (excluding management positions), including information on the proportion of inspectors with two years, five years, and more than eight years on the job.

Articles 9 and 10 of Convention No. 81 and Articles 11 and 14 of Convention No. 129. Technical experts and sufficient number of labour inspectors. In its previous comments, the Committee welcomed the Government's indication that the ACT was in the process of recruiting 117 labour inspectors. It notes that in September 2019 and in May 2020, an additional 53 and 80 new inspectors were recruited respectively, raising the total number of labour inspectors to 417 by 2020 (compared with 359 inspectors in 2012). The Committee also notes the Government's indication that, in addition to labour inspectors, the ACT has a total of 505 support staff (as compared to 514 in 2016) and that a number of competitions have been opened for the recruitment of senior technicians. In this regard, the Committee takes note that the CGTP–IN states that both the number of labour inspectors and support staff are still insufficient to ensure the effective exercise of the functions of the inspection service. The CGTP–IN also indicates that the ACT does not ensure the presence of at least one occupational safety and health technician in each regional office. The Committee welcomes the Government's efforts to ensure the recruitment of a sufficient number of labour inspectors to secure the effective discharge of the duties of the inspectorate, and requests it to continue to provide information on any further measures taken in this respect. It also requests the Government to continue to provide information on the training or other measures taken to facilitate the rapid integration of these new inspectors. Lastly, it requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken to ensure that duly qualified technical specialists are associated with the work of inspection.

Article 16 of Convention No. 81 and Article 21 of Convention No. 129. Adequate frequency and thoroughness of inspections to secure compliance. In response to its previous request concerning an inspection strategy pursued to achieve a satisfactory coverage of workplaces by sufficiently thorough labour inspection visits, the Committee notes the Government's indication that the definition of inspection priorities is based on: (i) the monitoring of undertakings where accidents at work have occurred or occupational diseases have been detected; and (ii) consideration of the number of workers potentially covered by the situations considered to be the most serious for their safety or physical and mental health. The Government indicates that the new information system will contribute to a more efficient and effective planning of the inspection action. The Government states that, in this process, the employers' and workers' organizations represented on the ACT's Consultative Board are consulted, having agreed on the Iberian Campaign for the Prevention of Accidents at Work (2016–18) and the National Campaign for Safety and Health for Temporary Workers (2016–18).

The Committee notes that the CGTP–IN asserts that the number of inspection visits has decreased dramatically over the years, as well as the number of workplaces visited and the number of workers covered. In this regard, the Committee notes the substantial decrease in the number of inspections (from 90,758 in 2011 to 37,482 in 2017), the number of undertakings inspected (from 80,159 in 2011 to 24,584 in 2017) and the number of workers covered (from 609,343 in 2011 to 317,838 in 2017). However, it also notes that over the same period, the number of violations detected increased from 17,607 in 2011 to 24,352 in 2017. In this regard, the Committee notes that the Government indicates that in 2013, there was a change in the statistical criteria for collecting information on the number of inspection visits and workplaces visited to avoid inflating the data by counting a visit to the same workplace that covered different subjects as a new visit. The Government further states that the data on the outcome of inspection visits indicate that there have been no significant changes in the number of penalties applied. The Committee notes, in addition, that according to the information in the 2018 report on the activities of the ACT, there has been increase from 2017 to 2018 in the number of inspections (38,287 in 2018), number of undertakings inspected (25,200), workers covered by inspections (399,836) and violations detected (26,465). Recalling the importance of ensuring that workplaces are inspected as often and as thoroughly as is necessary to ensure the effective application of the relevant legal provisions, the Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on developments related to the overall number of labour inspections undertaken and workers covered. In this respect, the Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the number of inspections that are planned versus the number that are reactive to complaints or accidents; the average or normal duration of planned versus reactive inspections; and the nature and number of violations identified and sanctions pursued for each type of inspection.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government which reiterates the content of its previous request adopted in 2019.

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1976)

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020). The Committee proceeded with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the supplementary information received from the Government this year and the annual labour inspection report for 2019 submitted by the Government (see Articles 3, 5(a), 7, 10, 9, 12, 13, 16, 17, 18 and 21(e) below), as well as on the basis of the information at its disposal in 2019.

COVID-19 measures. The Committee appreciates the efforts of the Government to provide information in its report regarding various measures taken in 2020 in the context of the COVID-19 pandemic, including the monitoring undertaken by the Occupational Safety and Health (OSH) Unit of the Labour Inspection Department, through periodic and surprise inspections. The Government provides information on the implementation of awareness-raising and information campaigns, the establishment of inter-ministerial working groups and the creation of a hotline service to receive complaints and observations from workers.

Technical cooperation. Following its previous comments, the Committee welcomes the information in the Government's report concerning the progress achieved in the context of the technical cooperation programme between the Government and the ILO (2018–20), particularly the second pillar which concerns improving the labour inspection and OSH systems. In this respect, the Committee notes with interest the adoption of the labour inspection policy in April 2019. This policy was developed on the basis of the Assessment of the Qatar Labour Inspection System, prepared by the Ministry of Administrative Development, Labour and Social Affairs and the ILO. The policy includes the collection of data, the implementation of an evidence-based strategy and measures to ensure transparency and accountability of inspections. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government in its supplementary report that it is working on the implementation of the policy, which has been disseminated among all labour inspectors, and that the strategy for implementation focuses on data collection and analysis, and continuous capacity-building of inspectors. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide detailed information on the measures taken in the context of the ongoing technical cooperation to strengthen the implementation of the Convention, including on the implementation of the labour inspection policy.

Articles 3, 12 and 16 of the Convention. Sufficient number of labour inspections and coverage of workplaces. The Committee previously urged the Government to pursue its efforts with respect to strategic planning and the development of a modern strategic inspection plan. In this respect, the Committee notes with interest the Government's indication that in March 2019, the strategic unit of the labour inspectorate became operational and began working on developing a modern strategic inspection plan. The Government indicates, in response to the Committee's previous request on the establishment of priorities, that priorities and objectives for inspections have been identified related to recurrent issues, particularly the prevention of falls from heights and the payment of wages.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that in 2018, 21,178 undertakings were inspected, with a total of 43,366 inspection visits (compared with 44,550 inspections conducted in 2016). This included 19,328 labour inspection visits, 22,736 OSH inspection visits, and 1,302 inspection visits on wage protection. According to the information in the annual labour inspection report for 2019, 21,644 undertakings were inspected in 2019, with a total of 43,842 inspection visits (21,763 concerning working conditions and 22,079 concerning OSH). The Committee also notes the information provided in response to its previous comments, that most inspections on labour and on OSH did not detect any violations, but that 100 per cent of the wage protection inspections disclosed violations. The inspection visits resulted in: 1,419 infringement reports in 2018 and, for 2019, 235 such reports for OSH and working conditions and 2,318 reports related to the wage protection system; 6,548 warnings to remedy an infringement in 2018 and 8,127 in 2019; 797 suspensions of transactions with the Ministry of Administrative Development, Labour and Social Affairs in 2018 and 495 suspensions in 2019; and 3,524 cases where guidance was provided in 2018 and 3,509 cases in 2019. The information provided by Government indicates that approximately 70 per cent of visits in 2018 and 2019 did not detect any violations (31,078 inspections in 2018 and 30,357 such inspections in 2019 all in the labour and OSH areas).

The Committee takes due note of the information in the annual labour inspection report of 2019 that measures with immediate enforcement were taken in 1,070 cases concerning working conditions and 495 concerning OSH in 2019. The Committee also notes the information in the Government's supplementary report that between 1 January and 31 August 2020, 19,117 inspection visits to work sites were carried out (resulting in the issuance of 4,945 infringement reports), as well as 4,500 inspection visits to workers' accommodation (resulting in the issuance of 1,915 infringement reports), and transactions were suspended for 19,131 companies.

The Committee also notes the statement in the Assessment of the Qatar Labour Inspection System that at present, employers are sometimes given prior notice of inspections, either because the inspectors require more information on the location of the worksite, or to allow employers time to gather relevant documentation. The Assessment states that the practice of informing employers of imminent visits must cease, as the effectiveness of an investigation frequently depends on the unpredictability of the visit. Noting that over two thirds of OSH and labour inspection visits did not detect any violations but that all wage protection visits did, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the most frequent categories of violation in the area of wage protection, as well as information regarding possible reasons for the low detection rates during labour and OSH inspections. It also requests the Government to continue to provide information on the activities of the strategic unit, including the implementation of the modern strategic inspection plan, as well as progress achieved with respect to the priorities and objectives established, including particularly on wages. Recalling that labour inspectors provided with proper credentials shall be empowered to enter freely and without previous notice any workplace liable to inspection in accordance with Article 12, it requests the Government to continue to provide information on the total number of inspections undertaken, as well as on the outcome of these visits, and to specifically indicate the number of these inspections that were unannounced and those that were undertaken with prior notice.

Articles 5(a), 17, 18 and 21(e). Effective cooperation between the labour inspectorate and the justice system, legal proceedings and effective enforcement of adequate penalties. The Committee previously noted that labour inspectors, upon detecting non-compliance, draw up infringement reports which are then referred to the courts for further action. It noted that the outcome of most inspections was no further action. It also noted that the technical cooperation programme included a review of relevant legislation in order to strengthen the enforcement powers of labour inspectors.

In this respect, the Committee welcomes the Government's indication that plans are under way, in the context of the ongoing technical cooperation, to strengthen enforcement mechanisms and to provide labour inspectors with enhanced enforcement powers. The Government states that labour inspectors will be provided with clear guidance to follow, including the identification of situations requiring immediate action, such as the suspension of activities or the adoption of other stringent enforcement measures to address non-compliance. The Committee also notes the number of infringement reports referred to courts in 2019 was 235 related to working conditions and OSH and 2,318 under the wage protection system. It once again observes that no information on the outcome of these cases has been provided, but notes the Government's statement, in reply to the Committee's previous request, that work is under way to provide these statistics. The Committee further notes the statement in the Assessment of the Qatar Labour Inspection System that the Labour Inspection Department does not have readily available information on penalties, fines or imprisonment imposed by the judiciary and that inspectors had expressed frustration with the judiciary's failure to inform them of the outcome after their referral of a company for court proceedings. In this respect, it notes with interest the Government's reference to a Memorandum of Understanding between the Ministry of Administrative Development, Labour and Social Affairs and the Supreme Judicial Council, which aims to establish electronic information sharing on the cases referred to courts, the judgments handed down, and relevant appeals. The Committee notes the information in the Government's supplementary report that the Memorandum also includes the possibility of sharing copies of employment contracts and information on the transfer of wages. The Government indicates that the Memorandum constitutes a first step towards improving cooperation and efficiency, helping litigants and providing support to workers in the country. The Committee urges the Government to continue to pursue its efforts, in the context of the ongoing technical cooperation programme, to strengthen the effectiveness of enforcement mechanisms, including measures to provide enhanced enforcement powers to labour inspectors. It requests the Government to continue to provide specific information on the measures taken to promote effective collaboration between the labour inspectorate and the judicial system, including the implementation of the Memorandum of Understanding. It once again urges the Government to provide information on the outcome of cases referred to the judiciary by labour inspectors through infringement reports, including the penalties imposed and fines collected by virtue of the Labour Law and the legal provisions to which they relate.

Articles 5(a), 9 and 13. Labour inspection in the area of OSH. The Committee previously noted that, pursuant to section 100 of the Labour Law, inspectors have the authority to prepare an urgent report, to be referred to the Minister, if they detect an imminent danger in the workplace. These reports will result in the Minister issuing a decision of partial or total closure until the hazard is removed. It requested information on the number of such reports issued, as well as on the number of occupational accidents, including fatal occupational accidents, and the occupation or sector concerned.

The Committee notes the information provided by the Government in response to its previous request that 22,736 OSH inspections were undertaken in 2018, and 22,079 such visits in 2019 (compared with 14,526 such visits in 2016). It notes the information provided on a number of measures taken by the labour inspectorate related to improving OSH, including: (i) the involvement of the labour inspectorate in the development of a national OSH policy, which will cover data analysis and collection; (ii) preventative activities undertaken by the OSH Department of the labour inspectorate to address heat stress, including targeted inspections on hours of work during the summer; (iii) awareness-raising workshops and an OSH conference to celebrate national OSH day; and (iv) further training for inspectors on OSH issues. The Government indicates that the construction sector remains a priority, and that in the context of the Memorandum of Understanding with Building and Wood Workers' International (BWI), 13 joint inspections were carried out. The Committee notes the information in the 2019 annual labour inspection report that there were 117 fatal occupational accidents in 2019 (compared with117 in 2017 and 123 in 2018), and it observes that the statistics provided on accidents in the annual labour inspection report are not disaggregated by occupation or sector. It also notes an absence of information on the implementation in practice of closure decisions pursuant to section 100 of the Labour Law, and notes the information in the Assessment of the Qatar Labour Inspection System that the approval process from the Minister to halt activities usually takes two to three days.

The Committee further notes the information provided concerning the implementation of the National Action Plan on Heat Stress between June and August 2020 by the OSH Unit. This included an inspection campaign which resulted in the closure of 263 work sites for violations of the Ministerial Decree on heat stress and working hours. In addition, the Committee notes the Government's indication that it has strengthened the monitoring of workers' accommodation with a view to protecting their health and safety. In this respect, the Committee notes that in 2020 the Labour Law was amended to add specifically that housing provided for workers by employers must meet the conditions and specifications in the relevant Ministerial Decision (Ministerial Order No. 18 of 2014 Setting the Conditions and Specifications of Workers' Accommodations) (section 106bis) and to establish applicable penalties for non-compliance (section 145bis). The Committee urges the Government to continue taking immediate and time-bound measures to address the number of fatal occupational accidents, including further measures to strengthen the capacity of labour inspectors with respect to the monitoring of OSH, particularly in the construction sector. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the number of occupational accidents, including fatal occupational accidents, and to ensure that this information is disaggregated by occupation or sector. It also requests the Government to continue to provide information on the number and type of OSH inspection visits undertaken and on measures taken to enforce the legislation on heat stress. It requests the Government to provide information on the number of violations detected, the number of infringement reports issued and, in particular, the information previously requested concerning the follow-up given by the judicial authorities to such infringement reports, as well as information on the application of sections 106bis and 145bis of the Labour Law. It further requests the Government to continue to provide information on the joint inspections undertaken with the BWI, including the modalities of these inspections and how the targets of these inspections are selected. Lastly, the Committee requests the Government to provide further detailed information on the implementation in practice by labour inspectors of the power to make orders requiring measures with immediate executory force in the event of imminent danger to the health or safety of the workers, indicating the number of urgent reports and closure decisions issued under section 100 of the Labour Law, and separately under the Ministerial Decree on heat stress and working hours, disaggregated by occupation and sector.

Articles 7 and 10. Recruitment and training of labour inspectors and the effective discharge of their duties. The Committee takes due note that one of the focuses of the labour inspection policy is the establishment of a learning and development framework for labour inspectors. In this regard, the Committee notes with interest the detailed information provided by the Government on the development of a four-year strategic training plan 2019–22 by the labour inspectorate's strategic unit, which includes three training tracks. It also notes the information provided for 2018 on the number of study visits and training courses, their content, and the number of participants. The Committee further notes the Government's indication that it will strengthen the capacity of inspectors in the preparation and writing of reports, and concerning the issuance of infringement reports. In addition, the Committee notes the information in the annual labour inspection report that in 2019, 200 inspectors received training on inspection skills, and 196 received training on labour legislation. It further notes the Government's indication in its supplementary report that the implementation of the strategic training plan was temporarily suspended due to the COVID-19 pandemic, but resumed with remote training on forced labour in July 2020 and on occupational safety and health in October 2020.

In addition, it notes the Government's indication, in response to the Committee's previous request on recruitment, that it plans to develop specific standards, qualifications and requirements for newly recruited inspectors, and that new inspectors will follow a specialized introductory training track. Lastly, the Committee notes the information in the 2019 annual labour inspection report that there are four interpreters who work with inspectors. It notes in this respect the statement in the Assessment of the Qatar Labour Inspection System that the number of interpreters working with the inspectorate should be increased. The Committee requests the Government to continue to pursue its efforts to ensure that inspectors receive adequate training for the performance of their duties. In this respect, it requests the Government to continue to provide information on the implementation of the strategic training plan 2019–22, specifying the number of labour inspectors that received training, the duration of such training, the subjects covered, and whether it was induction or continuous training. It requests the Government to continue to provide information on its planned development of standards for the recruitment of inspectors, as well as the introductory training provided to new inspectors. The Committee further requests the Government to continue to provide information on measures taken to ensure the recruitment of labour inspectors and of interpreters able to speak the languages of migrant workers, and to indicate the different languages for which the interpreters provide assistance.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Labour Inspection (Agriculture) Convention, 1969 (No. 129) (ratification: 1975)

In order to provide a comprehensive view of the issues relating to the application of ratified Conventions on labour inspection, the Committee considers it appropriate to examine Conventions Nos 81 (labour inspection) and 129 (labour inspection in agriculture) together.

Article 3(1) and (2) of Convention No. 81 and Article 6(1) and (3) of Convention No. 129. 1. Additional duties entrusted to labour inspectors related to immigration. The Committee previously noted that, in accordance with the Regulation on the organization and functioning of the labour inspectorate (approved by Government Decision No. 488/2017), labour inspectors are entrusted with supervising the employment of migrant workers (section 12(1)B(i)).

The Committee notes the Government's reference in its report to Ordinance No. 25/2014 which provides that on the employment and secondment of foreigners, employers who employ migrant workers without a work permit shall pay the overdue remuneration to the workers concerned, as well as all relevant taxes, fees and social security contributions as if the workers concerned had the appropriate permit, including to those who have returned to their home country (section 38(1) and (2)). Moreover, employers bear liability, including joint and several liability, to any subcontractors for overdue wages for the work performed by migrant workers in an irregular situation (section 38(4)). The Committee also notes that a migrant worker found to be carrying out work without a permit shall be informed in writing in both Romanian and English, by the General Inspectorate for Immigration or, as the case maybe, by labour inspectors of the territorial labour inspectorates, regarding their rights to the recovery of outstanding remuneration, before the execution of a possible obligation to return. The Committee further notes that, according to the information of the 2019 annual report on labour inspection activities (Annual Report), 1,302 controls were carried out regarding compliance with relevant provisions of Ordinance No. 25/2014, of which 667 were conducted jointly with the General Inspectorate for Immigration; 69 sanctions were applied, including 55 orders of fines worth 1,928,000 Romanian lei (RON) (US$464,500) and 14 warnings; and 135 measures were ordered to remedy the non-conformities found.

The Committee observes that, although Ordinance No. 25/2014 provides for the reinstitution of the statutory rights of migrant workers in an irregular situation, the relevant information in the 2019 Annual Report does not indicate how these provisions are applied by the labour inspectors. The Committee requests the Government to take specific measures to ensure that the functions assigned to labour inspectors do not interfere with the main objective of labour inspectors to ensure the protection of workers in accordance with labour inspectors' primary duties as set forth in Article 3(1) of Convention No. 81 and Article 6(1) of Convention No. 129. Noting the information provided in the annual report on the application of Ordinance No. 25/2014, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on specific measures undertaken by the inspectorate to ensure the enforcement of the rights of migrant workers, including those in an irregular situation. In addition, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the number of cases in which these workers have been granted their due rights, such as the payment of outstanding wages or social security benefits, disaggregated based on controls carried out by the labour inspectorate alone and controls conducted jointly with the General Inspectorate for Immigration. The Committee further requests the Government to provide information on the number of cases in which migrant workers were deported following the control activities of labour inspectors, again disaggregated based on controls carried out by the labour inspectorate alone and controls conducted jointly with the General Inspectorate for Immigration.

2. Control of undeclared work. The Committee notes that, pursuant to section 12(1)B of the Regulation on the organization and functioning of the labour inspectorate, the labour inspectorate identifies cases of undeclared work, and notifies, as required, the criminal investigation bodies (clause b); ascertains whether the activity being performed constitutes a labour relationship but performed on the basis of another type of contract (clause d); and orders the conclusion of individual employment contracts and the registration of workers concerned in the general register as employees (clause e). The Committee also notes that, according to the information in the 2019 Annual Report, 67,632 controls were performed in this regard and 8,551 persons were found engaged in undeclared work, including 5,942 persons performing work without an employment contract. Moreover, 4,793 measures were ordered to correct the non-conformities. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the definition of undeclared work in national legislation, as well as information on specific measures ordered to correct the non-conformities. It requests the Government to continue to provide information on the work of the labour inspectorate with respect to undeclared work, including the number of persons found engaged in undeclared work, the number of cases in which the labour inspectorate orders the conclusion of an employment contract, as well as the action taken by the inspectorate with respect to those workers where no employment contract is subsequently concluded.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Russian Federation

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1998)

The Committee notes the observations of the Confederation of Labour of Russia (KTR), received on 30 September 2020. The Committee notes that the KTR refers to constraints on the work of the state labour inspectorate in the context of the pandemic, including the state labour inspectorate's alleged refusal to respond to workers' complaints submitted during the pandemic, and an increase in labour rights violations. The Committee also notes that the KTR raises concerns related to the functioning of the labour inspection system, including: (i) the insufficient number of state inspectors in relation to their expanding duties and their workload; (ii) labour inspectors' conditions of service compared with other public servants of federal authorities operating at the regional level; (iii) existing restrictions on the powers of labour inspectors, including on the scope of inspections, and their practical implications; and (iv) insufficient information in the Reports on the Work of the State Labour Inspectorates. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments in response to these serious allegations.

Legislative developments. The Committee notes the observations of the KTR indicating that new requirements for conducting inspections will be introduced by Federal Act No. 248-FZ of 31 July 2020 on State Oversight (Supervision) and Municipal Oversight in the Russian Federation, which enters into force on 1 July 2021 (Federal Act No. 248-FZ). The Committee notes that, according to the KTR, this Act also contains potential restrictions on the powers of labour inspectors. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments in respect of the KTR's observations. It also requests the Government to provide a copy of Federal Act No. 248-FZ.

Not having received other supplementary information, the Committee reiterates its comments adopted in 2019 and reproduced below.

The Committee notes the observations made by the Confederation of Labour of Russia (KTR), received on 26 September 2019. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments in this respect.

Articles 3(1), 6, 10 and 16 of the Convention. Number of labour inspectors and coverage of workplaces by labour inspection visits. In its previous comments, the Committee observed that the number of labour inspectors had continuously decreased over a number of years from 2,680 to 2,102 between 2012 and 2016. It also noted from the 2016 report of the Federal Service of Labour and Employment (Rostrud) that the number of labour inspectors was insufficient to achieve sufficient coverage of workplaces by labour inspection visits, which often resulted in the verification and control of documents from the offices of the Rostrud rather than the conduct of actual labour inspection visits in workplaces. The Committee notes with concern from the information provided by the Government in its report that the actual number of labour inspectors continued to decrease to 1,835 inspectors in 2018. The Committee notes from the 2018 report of the Rostrud that the turnover of staff affects the efficiency of labour inspection activities. The Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to guarantee the recruitment of an adequate number of labour inspectors to ensure that workplaces are inspected as often and as thoroughly as is necessary to enable the effective application of the relevant legal provisions. It requests the Government to continue to provide information on the number of labour inspectors. The Committee also requests information on the conditions of service of labour inspectors (including salary, benefits, and career prospects) in comparison to public servants exercising similar functions within other government services (such as tax inspectors and the police) as well as on the reasons for the high attrition rate of labour inspectors.

Articles 7, 17 and 18. Enforcement of labour law provisions. In its previous comment, the Committee noted a disparity between the number of cases reported by the labour inspectorate, the number of investigations initiated and the number of convictions. It noted the Government's indication that criminal cases were often not pursued as criminal intent could not be established. With respect to administrative cases, the Committee noted the Government's indication that they were sometimes not pursued due to the lack or incomplete nature of documents in non-compliance reports prepared by the labour inspectorate and that decisions on the closure of administrative cases were often communicated too late for the labour inspectorate to submit appeals within the prescribed time limits.

The Committee notes that, based on the information provided by the Government, there is still a significant discrepancy between the number of files sent to the prosecutor's office by the federal labour inspectorate (7,580) and the number of criminal cases instituted (518), and that the Government's report is silent on the number of actual convictions. The Committee also notes that there have been a significant number of cancellations of acts of inspections, orders, decrees, conclusions and other decisions of labour inspectors by the judicial authorities in 2018 (1,206). The Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the effective enforcement of the legal provisions enforceable by labour inspectors. It once again requests the Government to provide information on the concrete measures taken to address the deficiencies identified, such as training for labour inspectors on the establishment and completion of non-compliance reports, including the collection of the necessary evidence; the improvement of communication and coordination activities with the judiciary on the required evidence to establish and effectively prosecute labour law violations, as well as the need for timely communication of the outcome of cases to the labour inspectorate. The Committee requests the Government to provide concrete statistics on the administrative and criminal cases reported by the labour inspectorate, including the relevant legal provisions, the investigations and prosecutions initiated, and the penalties imposed as a result. The Committee also requests information on the reasons for the significant number of cancellations of the decisions taken by labour inspectors.

Articles 12 and 16. Labour inspection powers and prerogatives. In its previous comment, the Committee noted that section 357 of the Labour Code only gives labour inspectors the power to interview employers (and not workers) and that Federal Law No. 294-FZ, the Labour Code and Regulation No. 875 provide for numerous restrictions on the powers of labour inspectors, including the free initiative of labour inspectors to undertake inspections without prior notice (sections 9(12) and 10(16) of Law No. 294-FZ), and the free access of labour inspectors to workplaces (without an order from a higher authority) at any hour of the day or night (sections 10(5) and 18(4) of Law No. 294-FZ). It also noted limitations with regard to the grounds on which unscheduled inspection visits may be undertaken (section 360 of the Labour Code, section 10(2) of Law No. 294-FZ and section 10 of Regulation No. 875). The Committee further noted that pursuant to section 19(6)(1) and (2) of the Code of Administrative Offenses, labour inspectors may incur administrative liability where they fail to observe certain of these restrictions, for example where they undertake labour inspections on grounds other than those permitted in law. It urged the Government to take the necessary measures to bring these legislative Acts into compliance with Articles 12 and 16 of the Convention.

The Committee notes the Government's reference to the introduction of a risk-based approach in the work of the labour inspection services. In this respect, it notes that resolution No. 197 of February 2017 on the introduction of changes to certain acts of the Russian Federation, provides that depending on the assessment of risks, planned inspections may not be carried out more often than: (i) once every two years for workplaces considered to be high-risk; (ii) once every three years for workplaces considered to have a significant risk; (iii) once every five years for workplaces considered to have medium risk; and (iv) once in six years for workplaces to be of moderate risk. Moreover, for workplaces considered to have a low level of risk, planned inspections are not permitted. In this respect, the Committee notes that pursuant to the amendments introduced by Federal Law No. 480-FZ of 25 December 2018 to the Federal Law No. 294-FZ, inspections cannot be scheduled for low-risk small and medium enterprises. The Committee also notes that in 2018, 37 cases were brought under section 19(6)(1) against officials of the state labour inspectorates for violating the requirements regarding the procedure for state supervision. Recalling and emphasizing the importance of fully empowering labour inspectors to make visits without previous notice in order to guarantee effective supervision, the Committee once again urges the Government to take the necessary measures to bring the national legislation into conformity with Articles 12 and 16 of the Convention. Particularly, it urges the Government to ensure that labour inspectors are empowered to: (i) make visits without previous notice, in line with Article 12(1)(a) and (b) of the Convention; (ii) to interrogate both employers and staff, in accordance with Article 12(1)(c)(i); and (iii) to allow for the undertaking of labour inspections as often and as thoroughly as is necessary to ensure the effective application of the relevant legal provisions, in accordance with Article 16. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the impact of the risk-based inspection system on the coverage of workplaces by labour inspection. In this regard, it requests that the Government provide statistics on the number of labour inspections undertaken in each year since the implementation of this system, indicating the number of inspections in small, medium-sized and large enterprises. The Committee requests the Government to provide further information on the cases brought under section 19(6)(1) of the Code on Administrative Offenses, indicating the requirements of the legislation on state control that were violated, particularly specifying violations related to undertaking labour inspections on grounds other than those permitted in law, and any penalties assessed against inspectors based on such violations.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government, which reiterates the content of its previous request adopted in 2019.

Saint Vincent and the Grenadines

Labour Inspection (Agriculture) Convention, 1969 (No. 129) (ratification: 2010)

In order to provide a comprehensive view of issues relating to the application of ratified Conventions on labour inspection, the Committee considers it appropriate to examine Conventions Nos 81 (labour inspection) and 129 (labour inspection in agriculture) together.

Articles 3(2), 10, 16, 17 and 18 of Convention No. 81 and Articles 6(3), 14, 21, 22 and 24 of Convention No. 129. Additional functions assigned to labour inspectors. Number of inspectors, number of inspection visits and enforcement. With regard to its previous comment regarding the limited staff available at the Department of Labour to discharge of the duties of the inspectorate, the Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that the situation remains the same due to national budgetary constraints and the relatively high rate of turnover for labour officers during the last five years. The Committee further notes that there are currently five officers who act as labour inspectors, but that they also perform other duties beside inspections. However, the Government states that a number of occupational safety and health (OSH) inspectors will be recruited following the promulgation of the OSH Act.

The Committee notes that 41 inspection visits were conducted in 2019 and 12 more visits between January and August 2020. In 2019, these inspection visits were conducted in shops, workplaces of professionals, hotels, industrial workplaces, in the workplaces of domestic workers and security workers. No inspection visits were conducted in the agricultural sector that year. It notes in this respect the Government's indication that there has been a significant decline in the number of workers in the agricultural sector over the last 15 years.

The Committee recalls that, in accordance with Article 3(2) of Convention No. 81 and Article 6(3) of Convention No. 129, any further duties which may be entrusted to labour inspectors shall not be such as to interfere with the effective discharge of their primary duties, as defined in Article 3(1) of Convention No. 81 and Article 6(1) of Convention No. 129. Taking note of the national budgetary constraints, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken or envisaged to ensure that the labour inspection services have at their disposal an adequate number of labour inspectors to enable them to effectively carry out their duties and that workplaces are inspected as often and as thoroughly as is necessary. In this respect, it requests the Government to continue to provide information on the number of labour inspectors (including OSH inspectors) and the number of inspection visits undertaken, including the number of inspection visits undertaken in the agricultural sector. It once again requests the Government to provide information on the results of those inspections, such as the number of violations detected and penalties imposed. Lastly, the Committee requests the Government to specify all the other functions carried out by the officials entrusted with labour inspection functions and to provide information on the amount of time spent by those officials on such other functions.

Article 7 of Convention No. 81 and Article 9 of Convention No. 129. Adequate training of labour inspectors. Following its previous comment, the Committee notes the Government's indication that no training has been provided to labour inspectors since 2011 and that the majority of officers who have been trained are no longer employed by the Department of Labour. The Government states that new officers were transferred from other government Ministries or Departments and received only on-the-job training from the more experienced officers remaining in the Department. The Committee requests the Government to intensify its efforts to ensure that all labour inspectors receive appropriate training for the discharge of their duties and to provide information on the content, frequency and duration of any training given to new or recently transferred inspectors, as well as similar information with respect to training for more experienced inspectors.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1962)

Article 13(2)(b) of the Convention. Measures with immediate executory force in regard to occupational safety and health. The Committee previously noted that Decree No. 2006-1255 of 15 November 2006 limits the application of measures with immediate executory force in the event of imminent danger to health or safety of workers to situations arising from failure to comply with occupational safety and health laws or regulations (section 18), except in the building sector, where no violation of the legislation is required for an order of cessation of work (sections 19 and 20). The Government indicated that these limitations were being considered in the context of the reflections concerning the strengthening of the legal powers of labour inspectors. The Committee notes the Government's statement in its report that the draft text strengthening the legal powers of labour inspectors, which necessitates the revision of a number of provisions of the national labour legislation, is under way and that the various actors concerned are concerting thereon. The Committee requests the Government to pursue its efforts to take the necessary measures to bring its legislation and practice into full conformity with Article 13(2)(b) of the Convention as soon as possible, allowing inspectors to impose measures with immediate executory force in the event of imminent danger to the health or safety of the workers in all industrial and commercial establishments, without the obligation to determine whether or not there is violation of the legislative or regulatory provisions.

Articles 17 and 18. Effective enforcement of adequate penalties for violations of legal provisions. Further to its previous comments, the Committee notes the statistics provided by the Government, and also that the numbers of compliance letters (556 in 2015; 1,062 in 2016; 1,069 in 2017; and 1,429 in 2018) and official notices (24 in 2015; 54 in 2016 and 56 in 2018) issued by labour inspectors requiring employers to conform with the legislation, have increased, while more severe measures, such as reports of non-compliance, have greatly reduced (58 in 2014; 2 in 2015; 0 in 2017; and 1 in 2018. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the reasons for the reduced number of non-compliance reports issued. It also requests the Government to provide specific information on the number of documents submitted annually by the labour inspectorate to the prosecutors and judges, the number of cases where proceedings have been filed or legal action engaged, and the outcomes thereof.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Labour Inspection (Agriculture) Convention, 1969 (No. 129) (ratification: 2000)

In order to provide a comprehensive view of the issues relating to the application of the ratified Conventions on labour inspection, the Committee considers it appropriate to examine Conventions Nos 81 (labour inspection) and 129 (labour inspection in agriculture) together.

Article 12(1)(a) of Convention No. 81 and Article 16(1)(a) of Convention No. 129. Free entry of labour inspectors to workplaces without prior notice. The Committee previously noted restrictions on the powers of inspectors in the Law on Inspection Oversight, with regard to: (i) the ability of labour inspectors to undertake inspection visits without previous notice (sections 16, 17, 49 and 60); and (ii) the scope of inspections (section 16). The Committee noted the 2019 conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards (CAS) on the application of Conventions Nos 81 and 129 by Serbia, which called on the Government to amend sections 16, 17, 49 and 60 of the Law on Inspection Oversight without delay; and undertake the legislative reforms in consultation with the social partners as well as to ensure effective collaboration between the labour inspectorate and the social partners. In this respect, the Committee noted the Government's reference to consultations held by the Ministry of Labour, Employment, Veteran and Social Affairs with the Ministry of Public Administration and Local Self-Government, which issued the Law on Inspection Oversight, and a tripartite workshop planned for 2020.

The Committee welcomes the Government's indication in its report that a tripartite workshop took place in February 2020 in Belgrade to follow-up on the conclusions of the CAS, attended by the representatives of the Office of the Prime Minister of Serbia, the Ministry of Labour, Employment, Veteran and Social Policy, the Ministry of Public Administration and Local Self-Government, the labour inspectorate, the Occupational Safety and Health Directorate, the Serbian Association of Employers (SAE), the Trade Union Confederation "Nezavisnost", and the Confederation of Autonomous Trade Unions of Serbia (CATUS), and including the participation of the ILO. The Committee notes the Government's reference to the conclusions of the workshop, and notes with interest that among the areas of consensus emerging from the workshop to address the conclusions of the CAS was agreement to establish a tripartite working group to determine the specific form the amendments should take, including whether to amend the Law on Inspection Oversight only, or to develop a specific labour inspection law. The Committee also notes that, according to the Government's supplementary information under the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144), the Ministry of Labour, Employment, Veteran and Social Affairs informed the Social and Economic Council on 4 March 2020 of the results of the tripartite workshop on Conventions Nos 81 and 129. The Committee further notes that section 60(1) of the Law on Inspection Oversight, which provided the possibility of fines on labour inspectors in case of failure to notify the entity subject to oversight of an upcoming instance of inspection oversight in writing, has been amended and deleted. Taking due note of this information, the Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the measures taken to amend the Law on Inspection Oversight, including the establishment of the tripartite working group and the outcomes of its meetings, and on any other steps taken to ensure the appropriate follow-up to the conclusions of the CAS, in consultation with the social partners. The Committee also requests the Government to continue to provide information on the application in practice of Article 12(1)(a) of Convention No. 81 and Article 16(1)(a) of Convention No. 129, including statistics on the number and nature of inspections undertaken without previous notice (such as in response to occupational accidents, complaints or serious violations).

Articles 3(1)(a) and (b), 7, 10 and 16 of Convention No. 81 and Articles 6(1)(a) and (b), 9, 14 and 21 of Convention No. 129. Adequate number of qualified labour inspectors and inspection visits to ensure the effective application of the legal provisions. The Committee previously noted the decreasing number of labour inspectors since 2016, as well as trade unions' concerns regarding the insufficient numbers of inspectors and their lack of appropriate conditions and means of work. In this respect, the Committee requested information on measures taken by the Government concerning the implementation of its proposed three-year action plan to hire civil servants carrying out inspections, and of the recommendations of a 2019 analysis of inspection services.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that the labour inspectorate has 229 labour inspectors for 409,868 registered business entities as of May 2020 (a decrease from 240 labour inspectors for 416,815 registered business entities in 2019), and that the Government states that the labour inspectorate is competent to control those entities' compliance with labour legislation. The Committee also notes the Government's reference to the adoption, by Decision of the Government, of the Three-year Action Plan for the employment of civil servants carrying out inspections under the jurisdiction of national inspections, according to which it is necessary to employ 13 additional labour inspectors in 2020, and 27 more additional labour inspectors in 2021. The Government also indicates that there are currently 38 vacancies for labour inspector posts. The Committee further notes the Government's indication that all labour inspectors are equipped with laptops and modems for mobile internet, but that the labour inspectorate is poorly equipped with scanners and printers, and needs IT equipment, including new desktop computers. The Committee requests the Government to provide further information on the implementation of the Three-year Action Plan for the employment of civil servants carrying out inspections under the jurisdiction of national inspections, indicating the specific number of additional labour inspectors hired. The Committee also requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the labour inspectorate offices are suitably equipped. In this respect, it requests the Government to indicate any measures taken or envisaged to improve the material means placed at the disposal of labour inspectors and to address the deficiencies in IT equipment identified.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1961)

The Committee notes with concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments.

Articles 6 and 7 of the Convention. Recruitment and training of labour inspectors and independence of labour inspectors. The Committee notes the information in the Government's report that no training opportunities have been provided to labour inspectors in terms of technical or specialized areas, although initial induction training is offered for labour inspectors within the various units in the Ministry of Labour and Social Security. The Committee also notes the Government's indication that, with respect to qualifications of the labour inspection staff, one of the factors considered in recruitment is political affiliation. The Committee recalls that pursuant to Article 6 of the Convention, labour inspection staff shall be composed of public officials whose status and conditions of service are such that they are assured of stability of employment and are independent of improper external influences and, pursuant to Article 7, they shall be recruited with sole regard to their qualifications for the performance of their duties. The Committee requests the Government to take necessary measures to ensure that labour inspectors are recruited with sole regard to their qualifications for the performance of their duties, in accordance with Article 7 of the Convention. Taking due note of the resource constraints, the Committee expresses the hope that the Government will be in a position to make the necessary arrangements to implement an ongoing training programme for labour inspectors, and it requests the Government to provide information on any developments in this respect.

Article 12(1)(a). Unannounced visits and free access to workplaces liable to inspection. The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that owners of workplaces are notified of formal inspection visits. In this respect, the Committee recalls that under Article 12 of the Convention, labour inspectors provided with proper credentials shall be empowered to enter freely and without previous notice any workplace liable to inspection. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures, including in the context of the ongoing labour law reform process, to ensure that labour inspectors are empowered, in law and practice, to enter freely and without previous notice any workplace liable to inspection.

Article 18. Adequate penalties. The Committee notes the Government's reference to the Factories Act, 1974 concerning applicable fines or penalties, and it observes in this respect that the fines established are quite low. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures in the context of the ongoing labour law reform, to ensure the establishment of adequate penalties for the legal provisions enforceable by labour inspectors.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Labour Inspection (Agriculture) Convention, 1969 (No. 129) (ratification: 1992)

In order to provide a comprehensive view of the issues relating to the application of ratified Conventions on labour inspection, the Committee considers it appropriate to examine Conventions Nos 81 (labour inspection) and 129 (labour inspection in agriculture) together.

The Committee takes note of the Government's report and the supplementary information provided in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020).

Legislation. The Committee previously noted the legislative reforms regarding the Labour Inspection Act (LIA) of 2014 and requested the Government to indicate the extent to which labour inspectors are bound by the general principles established under the Inspections Act (IA) as well as how the overlapping or conflicting provisions under the IA and the LIA are applied in practice to the daily work of labour inspectors.

The Committee notes the Government's reference in its report to section 3 of the LIA providing that unless otherwise provided by the LIA, the performance of inspection and inspectors shall be subject to the provisions of the IA governing inspection, the provisions governing the general administrative procedure and the provisions of specific regulations governing the supervision of individual inspection services that operate within the inspectorate. The Government states in this respect that inspectors carry out their work pursuant to the LIA, but that for issues not regulated in the LIA, they carry out inspections pursuant to the IA. In this respect, the Committee notes that qualifications of inspectors, the initiation of inspections, additional powers including seizure of documents, inspection records, and entities liable to inspection are covered by the LIA (sections 9–11 and 13–15), while inspection procedures and access to workplaces are regulated by the IA. The Committee takes note of the information provided by the Government.

Article 3(1)(a), (b) and (2) of Convention No. 81 and Article 6(1)(a), (b) and (3) of Convention No. 129. Functions entrusted to labour inspectors. Additional duties entrusted to labour inspectors related to immigration. The Committee previously noted with concern that labour inspectors can impose fines on migrant workers for the performance of work that violates the Employment, Self-employment and Work of Aliens Act (ESWAA) (sections 51, 60, 61, 63, and 66), and are obliged to inform the police authority when its supervision activities lead to the suspicion of illegal residence of migrant workers (section 44(4)). It requested the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the control duties by the labour inspectorate under the ESWAA do not prejudice the exercise of its primary duty to secure the enforcement of the legal provisions relating to conditions of work and the protection of workers. It also requested information on the manner in which the labour inspectorate ensure the enforcement of employers' obligations with regard to the rights of migrant workers.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that sanctions for violations of the ESWAA do not affect the protection of labour rights of migrant workers or their right to suitable working conditions. In accordance with section 19(1)-2 of the LIA, inspectors may prohibit the worker concerned from performing work until the correction of the irregularity, if during an inspection they find that the employer has enabled a foreigner or a person without citizenship to work contrary to regulations governing the employment of foreigners. According to the 2019 annual report on inspection activities (Annual Report), the inspectors found 49 infringements in 2019, compared to 29 in 2018. The Government also states that the labour inspectorate imposed sanctions on migrant workers due to such violations in a few cases in 2018 and 2019. The Government further indicates that a migrant worker whose employment contract is determined to be null and void in accordance with section 23 of the Employment Relationship Act (ERA) only enjoys the protection of labour rights if they prove the existence of an employment relationship in court.

The Committee recalls that, in accordance with Article 3(1) and (2) of Convention No. 81 and Article 6(1) and (3) of Convention No. 129, the function of the system of labour inspection is to secure the enforcement of the legal provisions relating to conditions of work and the protection of workers while engaged in their work, and that any further duties which may be entrusted to labour inspectors shall not be such as to interfere with the effective discharge of their primary duties. It also recalls that neither Convention No. 81 nor Convention No. 129 contain any provision suggesting that any worker be excluded from the protection afforded by labour inspection on account of their irregular employment status (paragraph 77, General Survey of 2006, Labour inspection). Referring to paragraph 452 of its General Survey of 2017, Working together to promote a safe and healthy working environment, the Committee further indicates that workers in a vulnerable situation may not be willing to cooperate with the labour inspection services if they fear negative consequences as a result of inspection activities, such as the loss of their job or expulsion from the country. The Committee requests the Government to take measures to ensure that the duties entrusted to labour inspectors do not interfere with the fundamental objective of securing the protection of workers in accordance with the primary duties set out in Article 3(1) of Convention No. 81 and Article 6(1) of Convention No. 129. It requests the Government to provide further specific information on the number of cases in which sanctions were imposed on migrant workers, the violations concerned and the sanctions imposed. The Committee once again requests the Government to provide information on the manner in which the labour inspection services ensure the enforcement of employers' obligations with regard to the rights of migrant workers, in particular those in an irregular situation or without an employment contract, including specific information as to the payment of remunerations and any other benefits owed for the work they performed.

Articles 6 and 10 of Convention No. 81 and Articles 8 and 14 of Convention No. 129. Number of labour inspectors and their conditions of service. Stability and independence of labour inspectors. The Committee previously noted the continuous decline in the number of labour inspectors and their heavy workload, as well as issues related to external pressure facing inspectors from both complainants and employers, as documented in the Annual Report for 2017. It requested the Government to take measures to ensure that the number of labour inspectors is sufficient to secure the effective discharge of the duties of the inspectorate, and to provide information on measures taken to address the pressure facing labour inspectors.

The Committee notes the Government's information that the number of approved posts at the labour inspectorate increased from 106 in 2017 to 121 in 2019, and that recruitment procedures are under way. According to the 2019 Annual Report, there are 120 employees at the labour inspectorate, including 91 inspectors (up from 81 in 2018) and the number of business entities increased from 215,354 in 2018 to 220,236 in 2019. The Annual Report further states that inspectors, in particular those in charge of monitoring working conditions and employment relationships and social affairs, still face difficulties to promptly process all requests. In 2019, the labour inspectorate received 7,215 complaints, of which about 80 per cent fall into the competence of inspectors monitoring working conditions and employment relationships. Information in the 2019 Annual Report also indicates that the number of these inspectors has increased in recent years in response to their heavy workload, but that there has been a decrease in the number of occupational safety and health (OSH) inspectors (from 41 in 2008 to 31 in 2019). In this regard, the Annual Report states that measures will be taken to reinforce OSH inspections.

The Committee also notes the Government's indication that a risk assessment undertaken of the work of the inspectorate indicated that nearly all employees of the labour inspectorate, and particularly inspectors, are exposed to the risk of third-party violence, due to the nature of their work. In order to address this, the labour inspectorate has taken measures to prevent unauthorized access to its offices, drafted instructions outlining measures to reduce such violence, and organized various lectures and workshops on stress management, communication in difficult situations and other relevant topics. Concerning protection against aggression, certain inspections are carried out by two inspectors or together with other supervisory authorities, and inspectors may also request that police officers be present at the inspection. The Government also indicates that, in addition to the provisions on the independence of inspectors provided for by the IA and the LIA, certain inspections are carried out by inspectors from the head office instead of local units if it is assessed necessary to prevent the external influence from local stakeholders. The Committee also notes that, however, the 2019 Annual Report states that labour inspectors continue to be overwhelmed with the amount of assigned cases and face a significant level of external pressure from both complainants and employers in the form of insults, misconduct and aggressiveness concerning matters beyond their mandate. While taking note of the increase in the number of inspectors from 2017 to 2019, the Committee requests the Government to reinforce its efforts to ensure that the number of labour inspectors is sufficient to secure the effective discharge of the duties of the inspectorate, regarding both inspectors monitoring working conditions and employment relationships and OSH inspectors. It also requests the Government to continue to provide information on the measures taken in this respect. In addition, the Committee urges the Government to strengthen its efforts to address the issues raised in the 2019 Annual Report related to violence, harassment and other external pressure facing labour inspectors, including with a view to ensuring their independence from improper external influences.

Article 12(1)(b) of Convention No. 81 and Article 16(1)(b) of Convention No. 129. Access to workplaces liable to inspection. The Committee previously noted that pursuant to section 21 of the IA regarding business and other premises not belonging to the person liable, persons owning or possessing business premises, production premises or other premises or land can refuse inspectors' free access under certain conditions. The Committee notes the Government's explanation in response to its request that an inspection may only be denied in the exceptional cases provided for by section 21 of the IA. The Government also indicates that, if a person unjustifiably refuses to allow an inspection, they may be subject to the same measures as a witness who refuses to testify, and the inspection may be carried out against their will. With reference to its comments above on the LIA and the IA, the Committee notes that the LIA does not contain provisions relating to access to workplaces liable to inspection. The Committee recalls that, by virtue of Article 12(1)(b) of Convention No.81 and Article 16(1)(b) of Convention No.129, labour inspectors should be empowered to enter by day premises which they may have reasonable cause to believe to be liable to inspection in order to efficiently ensure workers' protection, and that these Articles do not allow for any restrictions. With reference to its General Survey of 2006, Labour Inspection, paragraph 266, the Committee also recalls that restrictions placed in law or in practice on inspectors' right of entry into workplaces can only stand in the way of achieving the objectives of labour inspection as set out in the Convention. The Committee once again urges the Government to take measures to bring the national legislation into conformity with Article 12 of Convention No. 81 and Article 16 of Convention No. 129 to ensure that that labour inspectors are empowered to enter by day premises which they may have reasonable cause to believe to be liable to inspection. In the meantime, it requests the Government to provide detailed information on the implementation of section 21 of the IA in practice, indicating the number of times that inspectors have been denied access to workplaces under this section, the reasons given for each denial under one or more of the exceptions provided for in section 21, and the outcome of any proceedings reviewing each denial.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1956)

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020). The Committee proceeded with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the supplementary information received from the Government this year, as well as on the basis of the information at its disposal in 2019.

The Committee notes that a representation under article 24 of the Constitution of the ILO was presented to the Governing Body by the Flight Attendants' Union alleging non-observance by Sri Lanka of the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), and the Protection of Wages Convention, 1949 (No. 95). At its 334th Session (October–November 2018), the Governing Body decided that the representation was receivable and to set up a tripartite committee to examine it (GB.334/INS/14/3). In accordance with its past practice, the Committee has decided to suspend its examination of the application of the Convention, insofar as the effective enforcement of measures taken by labour inspectors to institute proceedings and the impartiality of the labour inspection system are concerned, pending the decision of the Governing Body in respect of the representation.

The Committee notes the observations of the Ceylon Bank Employees' Union (CBEU), the Ceylon Estates Staffs' Union (CESU), the Ceylon Federation of Labour (CFL) and the Ceylon Mercantile Industrial and General Workers Union (CMU) on the application of the Convention, and the Government's reply thereto, both received in 2018.

Articles 3, 4, 5(a), 16, 20 and 21 of the Convention. Effective functioning of the labour inspection system and reliable statistics to evaluate its effectiveness. Annual reports of the labour inspectorate. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government in its report for the period ending 31 August 2016, in response to the Committee's previous comments, on the implementation of the Labour Inspection System Application (LISA), and the Government's indication that all labour and occupational safety and health (OSH) inspectors have been trained to implement the system. In this context, the Government stated that from 2017 onwards, it would be possible to provide a comprehensive annual labour inspection report, in accordance with Articles 20 and 21 of the Convention. The Committee nevertheless notes that the observations of the CBEU, the CESU, the CFL and the CMU take issue with the administration of LISA and its effectiveness in the collection of data, and allege that the system does not systematize the labour inspectorate's work or contribute to the improvement of its quality. In response, the Government states that LISA has been continuously improved since its launch, with newly added modules that should help to speed up related inspections. The Committee takes due note that the 2017 annual report of the Department of Labour contains information on laws and regulations relevant to the work of the inspection service, as well as statistics on the number of labour inspectors, of registered factories, of inspection visits, of court cases filed by labour officers, and of occupational accidents. However, this annual report does not contain statistics on occupational diseases, or statistics of workplaces liable to inspection and the number of workers employed therein, other than factories. The Committee requests the Government to continue to publish and transmit to the ILO an annual labour inspection report, in accordance with Article 20 of the Convention. The Committee also requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that this annual report contains complete information on all the subjects listed in Article 21(a)–(g) of the Convention, in particular on: statistics of workplaces liable to inspection and the number of workers employed therein (Article 21(c)); and statistics of occupational diseases (Article 21(g)). The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken in this regard. In addition, the Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information on the implementation of LISA in practice, including its impact on the effectiveness of the work of the labour inspectorate, both with regard to the number and quality of inspections and the collection of statistics.

Articles 3(1)(a) and (b), 9, 13 and 14. Role of the labour inspectorate in the field of OSH. Notification of industrial accidents and cases of occupational disease to the labour inspectorate. Following its previous comments, the Committee notes the information on the number of inspections visits provided by the Government and in the 2017 annual report of the Department of Labour. The Committee also notes the Government's indication regarding the role of the National Institute of Occupational Safety and Health (NIOSH), which provides continued services to train labour inspectors on OSH issues. In this regard, the Committee notes the observations of the CBEU, the CESU, the CFL and the CMU stating that the NIOSH is poorly resourced in terms of trained staff and equipment. In addition, as regards measures to ensure that the labour inspectorate is informed of industrial accidents and cases of occupational disease, the CBEU, the CESU, the CFL and the CMU allege that there is no proper link between the general labour inspectorate and the OSH inspectorate to allow for: (i) information sharing and recording; and (ii) issues detected by regular labour inspectors to be followed-up on by OSH inspectors. The unions further allege that occupational injuries are very under-reported. In this respect, the Government states that, due to the scope of application of the Factories Ordinance, certain workplaces, such as estates in plantations, can only be inspected by general labour inspectors and not by OSH inspectors. The Committee also notes the Government's indication in its supplementary report that industrial accidents and cases of occupational diseases are regularly reported to the respective divisions, and that the inspecting staff of the Department of Labour (including labour officers, factory-inspecting engineers, specialist factory engineers and medical officers) all receive training with OSH components. The Government states in this regard that when they identify hazardous work environments or unsafe workplaces during inspections, labour officers refer it to the District Factory Engineers Office or to the Occupational Safety Division. The Committee requests the Government to provide further information on the measures taken to ensure that there is effective cooperation between general labour inspectors and OSH inspectors, with a view to securing the effective enforcement of the legal provisions relating to OSH. In addition, the Committee requests the Government to indicate the manner in which it is ensured that the labour inspectorate are notified of industrial accidents and cases of occupational disease, in accordance with Article 14 of the Convention, and to provide further information on the application in practice of this provision, including statistics on occupational accidents and diseases notified.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 2009)

Articles 3, 4, 5(b), 6, 8, 10, 11, 13, 17 and 18 of the Convention. Operation of the labour inspection system under the supervision and control of a central authority and duality of inspection functions assumed by state and trade union labour inspectors in this system. The Committee previously noted that the responsibility for labour inspection fell within both the State Inspection Service for Labour, Migration and Employment (SILME) of the Ministry of Labour, Migration and Employment, and the inspectorate established by the Federation of Independent Trade Unions, and requested further information on the relationship between the two inspectorates. In this respect, the Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that the trade union inspectorate operates under the direction of national and regional trade union committees, but that trade union inspectors interact closely with labour inspectors from the SILME. The Committee notes the Government's reference to 276 joint inspections undertaken in the period between 2018 and the first half of 2020, and its indication that the Federation of Independent Trade Unions currently has 17 branch committees, dealing with all sectors of the economy, and 28 labour inspectors (a decrease from the 36 trade union inspectors noted in 2018). The Committee nevertheless observes an absence of information regarding its previous requests concerning: (i) the status and conditions of service of labour inspectors in the SILME; and (ii) the funding of the trade union inspectorate. The Committee also notes that, pursuant to the Law on Inspections of Economic Entities No. 1269 (Law No. 1269), adopted in 2015 and subsequently amended (2017, 2019, 2020), a Council for the Coordination of the Activities of Inspection Bodies has been created, with the power to coordinate inspection plans of inspection bodies, to avoid duplication of inspections (sections 5 and 6). The Committee requests the Government to provide further information on the relationship between the SILME and the trade union inspectorate, including on the modalities of any arrangements in place to ensure effective cooperation between those two bodies, and on the relationship between both inspectorates and the Council for the Coordination of the Activities of Inspection Bodies. The Committee also requests the Government to provide the laws and regulations governing the status and conditions of service of state labour inspectors and the duties and powers of trade union inspectors, to enable the Committee to make a full assessment, as well as information on state labour inspectors' conditions of service (including remuneration and career prospects) in relation to the conditions applicable to similar categories of public servants and trade union inspectors. In the absence of information in this regard, the Committee once again requests the Government to provide information on the sources of funding for the operation of the trade union labour inspectorate. Finally, the Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the numbers of SILME inspectors and trade union inspectors, and the material means at their disposal.

Articles 12 and 16. Powers of labour inspectors. 1. Moratorium on inspections. The Committee previously noted with deep concern that, pursuant to Law No. 1505 of 21 February 2018 providing for a moratorium on inspections in industrial workplaces, the provisions in the Code regarding labour inspections would be suspended during the period of application of Law No. 1505. In this respect, the Committee notes with deep concern that, pursuant to Government Decree No. 990 of January 2018, as amended in 2019, a moratorium on all types of inspections of the activities of business entities in the area of manufacturing has been imposed until 1 January 2021. The Government states that, in 2019, the SILME inspected 2,069 economic entities, including 1,662 scheduled inspections and 375 unscheduled inspections. The Committee notes that the Government also indicates that, during this period, inspections at 818 economic entities were either not implemented or postponed for various reasons, such as their inclusion in the category of industrial facilities, the temporary or permanent halting of activities, or liquidation. In this respect, the Committee recalls its general observation of 2019 on the labour inspection Conventions, expressing concern at reforms that substantially undermine the inherent functioning of labour inspection systems, including moratoria on labour inspections, and urging governments to remove these restrictions, with a view to achieving conformity with Convention No. 81. Recalling that any moratorium placed on labour inspection is a serious violation of the Convention, the Committee requests the Government to take all necessary measures to ensure that no further restrictions of this nature will be placed on labour inspection in the future. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the developments in this regard, and to continue to provide information on the number of inspection visits undertaken by the SILME, disaggregated by type of inspections and by sectors.

2. Other restrictions on the powers of labour inspectors. The Committee previously noted that sections 19 and 348 of the Labour Code require employers to ensure free access of SILME labour inspectors to workplaces, but noted with concern that a number of restrictions on inspections existed in the Law on Inspections of Economic Entities, which applied to the labour inspectorate. In this respect, the Committee notes that the previous Law on Inspections of Economic Entities has been repealed, and notes with concern that Law No. 1269 appears to contain similar restrictions on the power of inspectors, including with regard to: (i) the frequency of inspections (section 22); (ii) the duration of inspections (section 26); (iii) the ability of labour inspectors to undertake inspection visits without previous notice (sections 16, 19, 21 and 24); and (iv) the scope of inspections (section 25). Referring to its general observation of 2019 on the labour inspection Conventions, the Committee once again urges the Government to take the necessary legislative measures to ensure that labour inspectors are empowered to make visits without previous notice, and that they are able to undertake labour inspections as often and as thoroughly as is necessary to ensure the effective application of the legal provisions, in conformity with Articles 12 and 16 of the Convention.

Article 13. Preventive measures in the event of a danger to the safety and health of workers. The Committee previously requested the Government to indicate the manner in which state labour inspectors are empowered to take steps with a view to remedying defects observed in plants, layout or working methods, which they may have reasonable cause to believe constitute a threat to the health or safety of workers. In this respect, the Committee notes that section 30 of Law No. 1269, provides for inspectors' ability to make a decision on the temporary suspension of the activities of an economic entity for a maximum three month period and in prescribed circumstances, including due to a threat to life or health. The Government also indicates that, in 2019, inspections revealed 1,663 instances of infringements involving compliance with safety standards. The Committee requests the Government to provide further information on the manner in which state labour inspectors are empowered to take steps with a view to remedying defects observed in plants, layout or working methods, which they may have reasonable cause to believe constitute a threat to the health or safety of workers, in accordance with Article 13. Noting the Government's indication regarding 1,663 instances of infringements of occupational safety and health (OSH) standards detected in 2019, the Committee also requests the Government to provide statistics on the application in practice of inspectors' temporary suspension powers under section 30 of Law No. 1269 related to safety and health.

Articles 20 and 21. Obligation to publish and communicate an annual report on the work of the labour inspectorate. The Committee notes with regret that, while the Government provides statistics regarding labour inspection, it has not communicated an annual report on the activities of the labour inspection services for a number of years. The Committee nevertheless notes the Government's reference to the existence of an OSH information and resource centre, which holds data on labour legislation, OSH rules and regulations and other issues. The Committee further notes that, pursuant to section 37 of Law No. 1269, inspection bodies must submit annual reports to the Council for the Coordination of the Activities of Inspection Bodies. The Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the annual report of the labour inspectorate is published and transmitted to the ILO in the near future, in accordance with Article 20 of the Convention, and that this annual report contains information on all the subjects listed under Article 21.

In light of the situation described above, the Committee notes with concern that there has been no meaningful progress since the Committee's last examination in 2018 with regard to the significant limitations on the functioning of the labour inspectorate, including the legislative restrictions on the undertaking of inspection visits and the moratorium on inspections in manufacturing, which constitute a serious violation of the Convention.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

[The Government is asked to supply full particulars to the Conference at its 109th Session and to reply in full to the present comments in 2021.]

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1951)

The Committee takes note of the Government's report and the supplementary information provided in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020).

The Committee also notes the observations of the Turkish Confederation of Employers' Associations (TISK), communicated with the Government's report and received on 29 September 2020, and the observations of the Confederation of Public Servants Trade Unions (MEMUR-SEN), communicated with the Government's supplementary report.

COVID-19 measures. The Committee notes the Government's indication in its supplementary report that the number of inspections decreased due to COVID-19, but that the labour inspectorate focused instead on the examination of applications for short-time working allowances (unemployment allowances provided following an application to reduce or suspend the employment period). The Government also indicates that labour inspectors informed employers, workers and OSH professionals about occupational safety and health (OSH) measures to protect against COVID-19 in the workplace. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on developments in this regard.

Articles 3, 5(b), 10 and 16 of the Convention. OSH inspections, including in the mining sector and in relation to subcontracting situations. The Committee previously noted the concerns of several trade unions relating to OSH inspections, including their insufficient coverage, the widespread noncompliance with OSH requirements and the high incidence of occupational accidents and diseases. In this respect, the Committee notes the statistics provided in the Government's report, including the number of workplaces and workers in the mining sector and in subcontracting situations, of OSH inspections undertaken in such workplaces and of occupational accidents and diseases recorded. The Committee notes that the total number of occupational accidents reported in 2017, 2018, and in the first five months of 2019 remain significant (359,653 in 2017; 430,769 in 2018 and 159,099 in the first five months of 2019) and that the total number of OSH inspections conducted was 10,804 in 2017, 12,649 in 2018 and 3,088 in all of 2019. The Committee also notes the observations of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) on Conventions Nos 155, 167, 176 and 187, which allege that the number of fatal occupational accidents has increased in 2020, as well as the Government's response that the number of accidents should not be examined in isolation, but should be evaluated over the years, against OSH conditions and the number of employees in the country. The Government indicates that OSH inspections, including in mining, decreased due to COVID-19. With regard to occupational accidents, the Committee refers the Government to its detailed comments adopted in 2020 on the OSH Conventions ratified by Turkey. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the reason for the 75 per cent decrease in the number of OSH inspections in 2019, and to continue to provide statistics on the number of OSH inspections conducted and of occupational accidents and diseases registered in workplaces overall, including the mining sector and workplaces with workers in subcontracting situations. In the absence of information in this regard, the Committee once again requests the Government to provide information about arrangements in place to ensure collaboration between officials of the labour inspectorate and employers and workers or their organizations.

Articles 5(a), 7(3), 17 and 18. Effective enforcement of laws and regulations providing for sufficiently dissuasive penalties. Effective cooperation between the inspection services and the judicial system. The Committee takes due note of the statistics provided by the Government concerning the number of inspections conducted and the sanctions imposed in the period 2016–19. Nevertheless, the Committee notes an absence of information on the compliance strategy pursued to address the issue of effective enforcement of dissuasive sanctions, which had been discussed in 2015 by the Committee on the Application of Standards (CAS) of the International Labour Conference on the application of Convention No. 155. The Government indicates that, despite the increase in fines for non-compliance with the Occupational Health and Safety Law No. 6331, as amended by Act No. 6645 in 2015, the amount of administrative penalties applied per inspection during the period 2016–18 has decreased compared to 2014, and the Committee notes from the statistical information in the Government's supplementary report that there was a further decrease from 2018 to 2019. The Committee also observes with concern that the total number of fines imposed (3,938 in 2016; 3,485 in 2017; 2,637 in 2018; and 470 in 2019) remains low compared to the number of OSH inspections effectuated in the period 2016–19 (14,287 in 2016; 10,804 in 2017 ;12,649 in 2018; and 3,088 in 2019), and the number of enterprises suspended as a result of OSH inspections has substantially declined (820 in 2016; 726 in 2017; 239 in 2018; and 49 in 2019). With regard to effective cooperation between the labour inspection services and the judiciary, the Committee notes that, according to information provided by the ILO Ankara Office, the training programmes provided to labour inspectors and auditors of the Social Security Institution (SSI) in 2018 and 2019 included a component on judicial processes, with the participation of judges from the Ministry of Justice. The Committee also notes the observations of the TISK regarding the participation in ITC–ILO training courses, in February 2020, of 40 labour inspectors and two judges from the Supreme Court and Turkish Academy of Justice. The Committee requests the Government to provide further information on the impact of the increase in fines introduced in 2015, particularly on compliance with OSH legislation, and to continue to provide statistics on fines and sanctions imposed, as compared to the number of violations detected. It also requests the Government to provide information on the reason for the more recent decrease in the number of fines imposed as well as for the decrease in the number of penalties applied per inspection. The Committee further requests the Government to continue to take the necessary measures to ensure effective cooperation between the inspection services and the judiciary and to provide information in this regard.

Articles 10 and 16. Number of labour inspectors, frequency and thoroughness of labour inspections. Further to its previous comments, in which it noted a total of 974 labour inspectors, the Committee notes the Government's indication in its supplementary report that, as of August 2020, there were 939 labour inspectors, and 91 Auditors employed in the Directorate of Guidance and Inspection of the Ministry of Family, Labour and Social Services, with plans to hire 80 new Assistant Labour Inspectors. The Committee also notes the statistics provided by the Government concerning the number of OSH and administrative inspections conducted per year for the period 2010–18. With regard to activities undertaken to combat child labour, the Committee welcomes the Government's indications regarding training provided on this subject to labour inspectors and to auditors between 2017 and 2019 and the information provided on the workplaces where it was determined that children had been employed. The Committee also notes that, according to the Government's supplementary report, some activities regarding child labour have been postponed due to the COVID-19 pandemic.

With regard to its request on ensuring that the number of labour inspectors and inspections is sufficient to secure the effective application of the legal provisions, the Committee notes the observations of the TISK, which consider that the number of labour inspectors has not sufficiently increased in the face of a rising number of workers and workplaces. According to the TISK, the determination of priority sectors and enterprises, with different inspection plans according to enterprises' type and size, would also be necessary to make a more efficient use of resources. The MEMUR-SEN also considers that due to insufficient staff and insufficient amount of equipment, labour inspections cannot be carried out adequately. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments in this regard. Observing that the number of labour inspectors has remained stable since its previous comments, the Committee also requests the Government to indicate the measures taken to ensure that the number of labour inspectors is sufficient to secure the effective discharge of their duties, and to ensure that workplaces are inspected as often and as thoroughly as is necessary to ensure the application of the relevant provisions. In addition, the Committee requests the Government to provide further information on the role of auditors in the labour inspection system, including their functions and powers. With respect to the monitoring of child labour, the Committee refers to its comments under the Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138), and the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182).

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1963)

The Committee notes with concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments.

Article 4 of the Convention. Supervision and control by a central authority. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to pursue its efforts in placing again the labour inspection system under the supervision and control of a central authority, following its decentralization in 1995. In this respect, the Committee recalls the reiterated discussion of the case by the Committee on the Application of Standards (CAS) of the International Labour Conference (in 2001, 2003 and 2008) and the conclusions of the CAS emphasizing the need for the inspection system to be under the responsibility of a central authority. The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that the Ministry of Gender, Labour and Social Development (MGLSD) plays a supervisory role, although the system of labour inspection is decentralized. The Government indicates that the MGLSD has started a process to amend the legislation and to place the inspection system under a central authority. The Committee urges the Government to pursue its efforts to place the labour inspection system under a central authority with a view to ensuring coherence in the functioning of the labour inspection system and to provide information on the steps taken in that regard, including a copy of any legislation adopted.

Articles 10, 11 and 16. Resources of the labour inspection system and inspection visits. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to pursue its efforts to ensure that human and financial resources are allocated to labour inspection. The Committee notes that the Government indicates that the MGLSD has continued to ensure that human and material resources are allocated to labour inspection and that additional vehicles have been provided to the Department of Labour. However, the Committee notes the Government's indication that inadequate funding continues to represent a challenge. In addition, the Committee notes the 2016 report on the audit undertaken by the auditor general of the Department of Occupational Safety and Health (OSH) of the MGLSD on OSH enforcement activities. The report finds that: (a) out of an estimated 1 million workplaces in the country, only 476 were inspected between 2013 and 2015 (212 in 2012–13, 125 in 2013–14, and 139 in 2014–15, based on departmental annual performance reports); (b) the MGLSD procured analytical and clinical laboratory equipment, but the OSH Department has not fully trained inspectors on the use of the equipment; and (c) enforcement of the OSH legislation has not been effective due to limited personnel and logistics. With respect to personnel issues, the Committee notes that the report indicates that out of 48 approved staff positions, only 22 are currently filled. The Committee notes with concern the limited human and material resources allocated to labour inspection and urges the Government to take steps to ensure that there are a sufficient number of labour inspectors provided with adequate resources, including through the filling of vacant positions, in conformity with Articles 10 and 11 of the Convention, in order to ensure that workplaces are inspected as often as is necessary for the effective application of the relevant legal provisions, as required by Article 16 of the Convention.

Articles 20 and 21. Publication and communication of an annual report on labour inspection. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted the Government's commitment to publish and submit to the ILO an annual inspection report on the work of the labour inspection services, pursuant to section 20 of the Employment Act 2006. The Committee notes the Government's indication that a draft annual report has been compiled. However, it notes with concern that no report has been published or submitted to the ILO. The Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that annual reports on labour inspection are published and communicated regularly to the ILO within the time limits set out in Article 20 and that they contain the information required by Article 21(a)–(g).

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Labour Inspection (Agriculture) Convention, 1969 (No. 129) (ratification: 2004)

The Committee notes the observations of the Federation of Trade Unions of Ukraine (FPU), received on 30 September 2020. The Committee proceeded with the examination of the application of Conventions Nos 81 and 129 on the basis of the observations received from the FPU this year (see Articles 12(1)(a) and (b), 16 and 17 of Convention No. 81 and Articles 16(1)(a) and (b), 21 and 22 of Convention No. 129 below), as well as on the basis of the information at its disposal in 2019.

In order to provide a comprehensive view of the issues relating to the application of the ratified Conventions on labour inspection, the Committee considers it appropriate to examine Conventions Nos 81 (labour inspection) and 129 (labour inspection in agriculture) together.

The Committee notes the observations of the Confederation of Free Trade Unions of Ukraine (KVPU) on the application of these Conventions, received on 29 August 2019.

Articles 4, 6 and 7 of Convention No. 81 and Articles 7, 8 and 9 of Convention No. 129. Organization of the labour inspection system under the supervision and control of a central authority. Partial decentralization of labour inspection functions. The Committee previously noted the assumption of labour inspection functions by "authorized officials" within local authorities, in addition to the State Labour Service (SLS). It requested the Government, in line with the 2018 conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards of the International Labour Conference, to ensure that the inspection functions of the local authorities are placed under the supervision and control of the SLS. In this regard, the Committee once again notes the information provided by the Government in its report on the efforts made to avoid duplication of inspections between the SLS and local authorities. The Committee also notes the information provided by the Government regarding trainings conducted by the SLS with labour inspectors in local authorities. In response to the Committee's previous comments on the recruitment of these authorized officials, including the qualifications required, the Committee notes the Government's indication that, to receive a service certificate as a labour inspector, it is necessary for officials to submit information on qualifications and work experience to the SLS, and that, as of January 2019, there were 1,258 labour inspectors with a service certificate, out of which 531 work for local authorities. The Committee nevertheless notes that the Government has not provided a reply concerning the legal provisions governing the status and conditions of service of these authorized officials, the qualifications required for their recruitment or whether there are regular competitions to recruit them, as there are for SLS inspectors. The Committee recalls that the Committee on the Application of Standards recommended in its 2018 conclusions that the Government ensure that the status and conditions of service of labour inspectors guarantee their independence, transparency, impartiality and accountability in line with the Conventions. The Committee therefore urges the Government to indicate the measures taken to ensure that the inspection functions of the local authorities are placed under the supervision and control of the SLS. The Committee once again requests the Government to indicate the legal provisions governing the status and conditions of "authorized officials" working as labour inspectors (Article 6 of Convention No. 81 and Article 8 of Convention No. 129), and how it is ensured that their status and conditions of service are such as to guarantee their independence from any improper external influence. The Committee also requests further information on the manner in which it is ensured that "authorized officials" working as labour inspectors have adequate qualifications for the effective performance of inspection duties (Article 7(1) of Convention No. 81 and Article 9(1) of Convention No. 129). In this regard, the Committee requests information related to the labour inspectors working for local authorities, including the number of local authorities employing these inspectors and the number of inspectors at each authority; the compensation levels and tenures of employment for local authority labour inspectors compared with SLS inspectors; and whether training programmes for SLS inspectors are also required for local authority inspectors.

Articles 10, 11 and 16 of Convention No. 81 and Articles 14, 15 and 21 of Convention No. 129. Material means and human resources to achieve an adequate coverage of workplaces by labour inspection. The Committee previously requested information on the filling of the vacant labour inspector posts, measures taken to improve the budgetary situation of the SLS, and the material resources at the central and local levels of the SLS. In this regard, the Committee welcomes the Government's indication that, as of 1 January 2019, the number of labour inspectors is 710 (up from 615 inspectors noted in 2018) for 1,003 existing posts (up from 904 noted in 2018). The Committee observes, however, an absence of information on the material resources at the central and local levels of the SLS. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take measures to provide sufficient material resources (offices, office equipment and supplies, transport facilities and reimbursement of travel expenses) at the central and local levels of the SLS. The Committee urges the Government to pursue its efforts to fill vacant posts for labour inspectors, and to continue to provide statistics on the number of labour inspectors.

Articles 12(1)(a) and (b), 16 and 17 of Convention No. 81 and Articles 16(1)(a) and (b), 21 and 22 of Convention No. 129. Restrictions and limitations on labour inspection. 1. Moratorium on labour inspection. The Committee previously noted with deep concern that a moratorium was imposed on labour inspection between 1 January 2018 and 22 February 2018. In this respect, it notes the Government's statement that the law introducing the moratorium on state supervision expired on 1 January 2019. The Committee also notes the observations of the FPU, which allege that a moratorium on scheduled measures of state supervision in enterprises considered to be medium-risk or low-risk has been imposed since March 2020, in response to the COVID-19 pandemic. Taking into account the particular challenges faced by the country in the context of the COVID-19 pandemic, the Committee urges the Government to resume regular inspections as soon as possible, consistent with public health guidelines in the country. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments on any developments in this respect.

2. Other restrictions. The Committee previously noted that Act No. 877 of 2007 on Fundamental Principles of State Supervision and Monitoring of Economic Activity (Act No. 877) and Ministerial Decree No. 295 on the procedure for state control and state supervision of compliance with labour legislation of 2017 (Decree No. 295), provide for several restrictions on the powers of labour inspectors. These include restrictions with regard to: (i) the free initiative of labour inspectors to undertake inspections without prior notice (section 5 of Decree No. 295 and section 5(4) of Act No. 877); (ii) the frequency of labour inspections (section 5(1) of Act No. 877); and (iii) the discretionary powers of labour inspectors to initiate prompt legal proceedings without previous warning (sections 27 and 28 of Decree No. 295). The Committee urged the Government, in line with the 2018 conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards, to take the necessary measures and appropriate reforms to bring the labour inspection services and the legislation into conformity with the Conventions.

The Committee notes with deep regret that the Government has not replied to the Committee's request in this respect. The Committee also notes the observations of the KVPU according to which, following a ruling of the Sixth Administrative Court of Appeal on 14 May 2019, Decree No. 295 no longer applies to labour inspections and the SLS may supervise application of labour law only on the basis of the requirements of Act No. 877. According to the KVPU and the FPU, inspection procedures largely replicate the provisions of Act No. 877 and the SLS carries out labour inspection in accordance with the requirements of the Act. In this respect, the Committee notes the adoption of Ministerial Decree No. 823 of 21 August 2019 on the Procedure for State Control of Compliance with Labour Legislation, as amended by Ministerial Decrees No. 1132 of 4 December 2019 and No. 617 of 8 July 2020. The Committee notes with concern that Decree No. 823, as amended, provides for restrictions on the powers of labour inspectors with regard to the maximum duration of labour inspections (section 9). The Committee also observes that, while the amendment by Ministerial Decree No. 1132 appeared to remove certain restrictions from Decree No. 823, restrictions on the power of labour inspectors remain under Act No. 877. In this respect, the Committee further notes the FPU's observations, alleging that pursuant to section 1(2) of the amended procedures, labour inspection, with the exception of measures related to the detection of informal employment, must be carried out in accordance with Act No. 877. In addition, the Committee notes the FPU's reference to Ministerial Decree No. 383 of 20 May 2020, which limits the frequency of scheduled measures of state supervision according to the degree of risk attributed to an economic entity, namely: (i) once every two years for high-risk entities; (ii) once every three years for medium-risk entities; and (iii) once every five years for low-risk entities (section 5). The FPU further alleges that a draft Act on the fundamental principles of state supervision prepared by the Government largely replicates Act No. 877 and also limits the powers of labour inspectors.

The Committee recalls its general observation of 2019 on the labour inspection Conventions, expressing concern at reforms that substantially undermine the inherent functioning of labour inspection systems and urging governments to remove these restrictions, with a view to achieving conformity with Convention No. 81 and Convention No. 129. The Committee also recalls that, pursuant to Article 12(1)(a) and (b) of Convention No. 81 and Article 16(1)(a) and (b) of Convention No. 129, labour inspectors provided with proper credentials shall be empowered to enter freely and without previous notice at any hour of the day or night any workplace liable to inspection, and to enter by day any premises which they may have reasonable cause to believe to be liable to inspection. The Committee also recalls that Article 16 of Convention No. 81 and Article 21 of Convention No. 129 stipulate that workplaces shall be inspected as often and as thoroughly as is necessary to ensure the effective application of the relevant legal provisions. In addition, Article 17 of Convention No. 81 and Article 22 of Convention No. 129 provide that persons who violate or neglect to observe legal provisions enforceable by labour inspectors shall be liable to prompt legal proceedings without previous warning, and that it is up to the discretion of the labour inspectors to give warning and advice instead of instituting such proceedings. The Committee strongly urges the Government to take the necessary measures and adopt appropriate reforms to bring the labour inspection services and the national legislation into conformity with the provisions of Conventions Nos 81 and 129, including with Articles 12(1)(a) and (b), 16 and 17 of Convention No. 81 and Articles 16(1)(a) and (b), 21 and 22 of Convention No. 129, and to ensure that no additional restrictions are adopted. The Committee recalls that the Government can avail itself of the technical assistance of the ILO in this regard. The Committee also requests the Government to provide its comments in respect of the FPU's observations, to provide information on any revisions to the legislation governing labour inspection, and to transmit a copy of the new Act on the fundamental principles of state supervision, if adopted. Lastly, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on draft law No. 1233 of 2 September 2019, which has been approved by the Parliamentary Committee for Social Policy and Veteran's Rights, and which foresees further limits on labour inspectors' powers related to the application of fines for certain categories of entrepreneurs, as well as a decrease in the level of applicable fines.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

[The Government is asked to reply in full to the present comments in 2021.]

United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1949)

The Committee notes the observations of the Trades Union Congress (TUC), communicated with the Government's report and received on 13 October 2020, as well as the response of the Government, received on 29 October 2020.

COVID-19 measures. The Committee appreciates the efforts of the Government to provide information in its report in relation to measures taken by the Health and Safety Executive (HSE) and the Health and Safety Executive Northern Ireland (HSENI) in response to the COVID-19 pandemic, which include the provision of information and technical advice, and the establishment of dedicated helplines for workers, trade unions and the public to report concerns about workplace practices. The Committee also notes the Government's statement that the HSE continues to engage with the tripartite stakeholders during this period.

Articles 6, 10 and 11 of the Convention. Number and conditions of service of labour inspectors. The Committee previously noted with concern the declining numbers of inspectors, and noted the TUC's allegations concerning important staff recruitment and retention issues faced by the HSE due to limitations on career progression and unattractive wages, compared to similar positions in the private and public sectors.

As regards recruitment and retention measures, the Committee notes the Government's indication that the effectiveness of the HSE demonstrates that there are sufficient numbers of inspectors to secure the effective discharge of its duties. The Committee notes the statistics in the Annual Report of the HSE 2019–20 indicating that there were 1,059 inspectors, visiting officers and regulatory compliance officers in the HSE as of March 2020, compared to 1,066 in March 2019. However, the Committee notes that the TUC alleges the existence of difficulties in reversing the declining numbers of inspectors and that there are only 290 full-time equivalent main grade regulatory inspectors for the whole of the United Kingdom, excluding Northern Ireland. The Committee further notes the Government's statement that additional financial and human resources have been secured to underpin the HSE's approach to the COVID-19 pandemic. In this respect, the Committee notes that, according to the TUC, the additional staff secured using this financing can only be hired under fixed-term contracts, for this financial year. The TUC also indicates that the additional resources have been used to offer HSE staff overtime.

With regard to the conditions of service of inspectors, the Committee notes the Government's statement that it refutes the TUC's observations, and maintains that the pay policy of the public sector is applied fairly. The Committee nevertheless notes the TUC's reference to data from exit interviews in which departing HSE staff indicated to HSE that pay was the main or a significant factor for a large majority in their decision to leave. The TUC further alleges that the higher wages of temporary staff hired in the context of the pandemic have also led to dissatisfaction among the remaining staff. In response to the TUC's observations, the Government asserts that it believes its funding to be adequate, including in relation to the response to COVID-19. The Committee recalls that, in its 2006 General Survey, Labour Inspection, paragraphs 204 and 209, it underlined the importance of the levels of remuneration and career prospects of inspectors to attract, retain and protect high-quality staff from any improper influence. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide statistics on the number of inspectors performing labour inspection in the HSE, and detailed information on the conditions of service of labour inspectors, including their actual remuneration scale and career prospects, in relation to comparable categories of government employees exercising similar functions, such as tax inspectors or police officers. In addition, the Committee requests the Government to indicate any measures taken or envisaged to recruit new labour inspectors or to improve the conditions of service of labour inspectors, with a view to retaining them within the labour inspection service. The Committee invites the Government to consider engaging in discussions with the social partners on this issue, and requests the Government to provide information on the outcome of any discussions undertaken.

Articles 6, 11 and 15(a). Financial resources of the labour inspection services. The Committee had previously noted the use of the Fee for Intervention (FFI) cost recovery scheme, which obliges employers in breach of occupational safety and health (OSH) requirements to cover HSE costs in identifying, investigating, rectifying and/or enforcing relevant violations. In this respect, the Committee noted the challenges, based on the Annual Report of the HSE 2018–19, relating to the effective management of the financial resources and the effect of the uncertain nature of FFI income on budgeting. The Committee also noted the TUC's concerns regarding the risk of unintended consequences, such as employer reluctance to seek advice and technical information proactively from the HSE.

In response to the TUC's observations, the Committee notes that the Government considers that there is no risk of employer reluctance, because the fee-paying work would arise in the first instance as a result of a non-fee-paying inspection or investigation. The Committee also notes that, in response to its request for the Government to take measures to address budgeting challenges, the Government indicates that funding is regularly discussed at the senior level of the HSE. The Committee notes that the Business Plan of the HSE 2019–20 refers to increasing the costs recovered from regulatory work, and to the submission of proposals for a future fees and charges strategy to the HSE board. The HSE further indicates in its Annual Report 2019–20, that it expects a significant reduction in its income due to its decreased ability to undertake cost recoverable and commercial work during the COVID-19 lockdown, and that this would inevitably result in a need for additional funding from the Government. Reaffirming that labour inspection is a vital public function, at the core of promoting and enforcing decent working conditions, and recognizing the particular challenges faced by the country in the COVID-19 context, the Committee requests the Government to continue to take the necessary measures to ensure that sufficient budgetary resources are allocated for labour inspection. As regards the cost recovery scheme, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on whether employers have been, or will be, surveyed about any reluctance or concerns they may have in seeking technical assistance and advice from HSE in light of FFI, and also detailed information on the strategy of the HSE regarding fees and charges, including income targets established for cost recovery work and the FFI scheme, if any. In addition, the Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information on the outcome of the HSE's proposals concerning funding, with respect to obtaining additional resources.

Articles 10 and 16. Resources of the labour inspection system and inspection visits. 1. Coverage of workplaces by labour inspection. The Committee previously noted the reform of the labour inspection strategy regarding the planning and targeting of workplaces for inspections, and underlined the importance of ensuring that often-vulnerable categories of workers are not excluded from protection because they are not employed in high-risk workplaces or sectors, or are employed in sectors where labour inspection is considered too resource-intensive. In this regard, the TUC had alleged that some potentially dangerous workplaces were going without inspection because regional variations and other anomalies were not taken into account in the HSE's approach.

The Committee notes the statistics contained in the Annual Report of the HSE 2019–20, which refer to 13,300 inspections completed in 2019–20, including approximate numbers of inspections in different industries. The Committee also notes that the Government refers to the ongoing reflection and improvement work on the intelligence-led system allowing for the targeting of workplaces ("Going to the Right Places Programme" and the "Find-it targeting tool"), including benchmarking visits to provide a comparison for performance. The Government indicates that following this evaluation, steps were taken to ensure that resources were diverted to sectors where issues were identified. The Committee notes the Government's indication, in particular, that it is important to continue to monitor sectors outside existing higher risks groups, and that it considers vulnerable workers in the establishment of inspection priorities and programmes. The Committee also notes the TUC's observations that the high rate of injuries in low-risk workplaces puts into question the approach of the HSE. The TUC states that the risk-ranking is based on the factory inspectorate model, and is not adapted to workplaces of today, where risks related to various occupational diseases, including COVID-19 infection and occupational cardiovascular disease, as well as psychosocial risks, may affect workers of all types. The TUC also expresses concerns that the data available for the "Find-it targeting tool" is limited, and that the decrease in inspector numbers will have an effect on the quality and quantity of the available data. In this respect, the Committee notes the Government's response to the TUC's observations, indicating that the HSE has dedicated staff undertaking work on psychosocial risks and that data on the subject is recorded and reported annually, thus informing prioritization and resource allocation. The Committee requests the Government to provide further detailed information on the manner in which vulnerable categories of workers, or workers in sectors outside identified higher risks groups, are taken into account in the HSE's inspection priorities and programmes. In addition, the Committee requests the Government to continue to provide statistics on the number of inspections conducted, disaggregated by industry, as well as information on the outcome of the assessment undertaken of the "Going to the Right Places Programme" and the "Find-it targeting tool", including their impact on the quality and quantity of labour inspection visits.

2. Strategies for compliance in lower-risk small and medium-sized enterprises (SMEs). The Committee previously noted that long-standing problems, such as helping smaller businesses to manage risks proportionately, were one of the targets of the period covered by the Annual Report of the HSE 2018–19. In this regard, the Committee notes the Government's indication that the HSE has given advice and guidance to address the needs of SMEs on its website, and is currently reviewing the impact of this guidance. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the impact of the measures taken by the HSE on the compliance of SMEs with the relevant legal provisions, and to continue to provide information on measures taken to achieve this objective. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the outcome of its review on the impact of the guidance provided.

Articles 17 and 18. Prompt legal proceedings for violations of the legal provisions enforceable by labour inspectors. The Committee previously noted a decrease in the number of cases brought by the HSE in which a verdict or conviction has been reached, and requested information on the HSE's assessment regarding the reasons for this decrease. In this respect, the Committee notes the Government's indication that changes to sentencing guidelines for health and safety prosecutions in February 2016 have increased the level of penalties available, which has led to prosecutions taking longer, and that it is still reviewing the factors impinging on prosecution work. The Committee notes that, according to the Annual Report of the HSE 2019–20, there were 355 prosecution cases where a verdict has been reached in the period covered by that report, as compared to 396 in 2018–19 and 509 in 2017–18. The Committee also notes the observations of the TUC, agreeing that the change in sentencing guidelines is slowing down prosecutions, as the prospect of potential increased fines has meant longer sentencing hearings. According to the TUC, the work in this respect takes a significant amount of inspector time and resources and these resource implications must be addressed. The TUC also urges the Government to include trade unions in the ongoing review. The Committee further notes the Government's indication that there have been no changes to HSE policy for decision-making and that it remains committed to prosecuting where there is sufficient evidence to provide a realistic prospect of conviction and it is in the public interest to do so. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on its assessment of the factors impinging on the HSE's prosecution work and on any measures taken or envisaged to improve the situation, including increased allocations for inspector time and resources, and to provide information on any consultations held on this matter. The Committee also requests the Government to provide further information on the role of inspectors in the process, including the time and resources dedicated to these legal proceedings as a proportion of overall inspector time and resources.

Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1967)

The Committee notes the report and the supplementary information provided by the Government in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020).

The Committee notes the observations made jointly by the Independent Trade Union Alliance Confederation of Workers (CTASI) and the Federation of University Teachers' Associations of Venezuela (FAPUV), received on 15 September 2020, the observations made by the CTASI, received on 30 September 2020, and the observations of the Bolivarian Socialist Confederation of Men and Women Workers in Urban and Rural Areas and Fishing of Venezuela (CBST-CCP), received on 3 December 2020. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments in this regard.

Articles 3(1)(a) and (b), 13 and 16 of the Convention. Labour inspection in the field of occupational safety and health (OSH). The Committee notes that, in reply to its previous request concerning OSH, the Government indicates in its report that: (i) according to the Report and Account, in 2018 the National Institute of Prevention and Health and Safety at Work (INPSASEL) carried out 1,671 inspections of occupational safety and health conditions; (ii) in 2019, INPSASEL implemented 103 comprehensive actions and 3,014 follow-ups at the national level, which consist of preventive action and monitoring of working conditions and environment by a multidisciplinary team of public officials from the State Departments of Occupational Safety and Health (GERESAT) attached to the Inspection, Occupational Health and Education Coordination Units; and (iii) INPSASEL currently has over 170 inspectors. The Government adds that orders with immediate executory force have not been issued as cases of non-compliance with occupational safety and health requirements have not been identified which could cause immediate and serious danger to the life or health of workers. In this regard, the Committee draws the Government's attention to the fact that the total absence of the identification of serious cases of non-compliance (over a long period of time and for a large population) could, in certain cases, demonstrate that workplaces are not being inspected as often and as thoroughly as necessary. With reference to its comments on the OSH Conventions, the Committee requests the Government to make every effort to ensure that OSH inspections are carried out as often and as thoroughly as necessary and to continue providing detailed information on labour inspection in relation to occupational safety and health. With regard to the effect given in practice to Article 13 of the Convention, the Committee requests the Government to investigate and report on the reasons why there have been no orders with immediate executory force issued in the event of imminent danger to the health and safety of workers, and to provide information on this practice in the future.

Articles 6, 7(1) and 15(a). Independence and competence of labour inspectors. Legal status and conditions of service of personnel performing inspection duties. Selection of inspectors. The Committee notes the Government's indication, in reply to its previous comment on the selection criteria for inspectors, that they are related to the skills, training and experience of applicants and that political ideology is not among the requirements for employment. It adds that the recruitment of officials discharging inspection duties is governed by the provisions of the Public Service Regulations Act, the Regulations of the Act on administrative careers and the internal Regulations on recruitment and employment stability, which are based on the Constitution of the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela, which provides that the appointment and removal of public employees may not be determined on the basis of political membership or opinions. The Government also indicates that no complaints of discrimination have been received from workers wishing to obtain employment in the labour inspection services. In this regard, the Committee notes that the CTASI and the FAPUV, in their joint observations, reiterate that the appointment and removal of public employees is based on political criteria and that inspectors are not in a position to perform their duties with independence. The CTASI also reiterates that the selection of inspection personnel is discriminatory on grounds of political ideology. The Committee recalls that, under the terms of Article 6 of the Convention, the inspection staff shall be composed of public officials whose status and conditions of service are such that they are assured of stability of employment and are independent of changes of government and of improper external influences. Article 7 also provides that labour inspectors shall be recruited with sole regard to their qualifications for the performance of their duties and that the means of ascertaining such qualifications shall be determined by the competent authority. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments on the observations of the CTASI and the FAPUV, and to provide information on the measures adopted or envisaged to ensure the stability and independence of labour inspectors, as required by the Convention.

Articles 10 and 11. Number of inspectors and material resources. The Committee notes the Government's indication, in reply to its previous request, that in 2019 the labour inspection services had 196 labour inspectors assigned to the inspection units of the People's Ministry for the Social Process of Labour (MINPPTRASS), distributed at the national level in accordance with the economically active population, the number of industries and the size of the territory. It adds that, around August 2020, the figure was 184. The Government further indicates that there is at least one inspection unit in each state and the INPSASEL recently completed the first phase of the Comprehensive Intensive Training Programme (PIFI). In this regard, the Committee notes that the CTASI and the FAPUV allege that the labour inspection system is not effective, as the MINPPTRASS does not have sufficient personnel and is the Ministry with the lowest budget, and that the number of inspectors is low and there is a scarcity of means of transport and payments to cover the daily expenses of the staff. The CTASI adds that the budgetary shortage limits the Ministry in the discharge of its principal function of the enforcement of labour legislation. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments in this regard. While observing a slight decrease in the number of labour inspectors, the Committee expects that the Government will take all necessary measures to ensure the effective discharge of the functions of the labour inspection services. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on the number of labour inspectors, and particularly on the material resources available to inspectors for the performance of their duties (including vehicles and premises).

Articles 12(1) and (2) and 15(c). Notification of the presence of inspectors on the occasion of an inspection. Timing of inspections. Requirement of confidentiality. In its previous comment, the Committee noted that section 514(1) of the Basic Act concerning labour and men and women workers (LOTTT) maintains the requirement for inspectors to show identification upon their arrival and to specify the reason for the visit, and that it only allows visits during working hours, which limits the free access of inspectors to workplaces. The Committee notes the Government's indication that under article 89(1) of the Constitution, which provides that with respect to employment relationships, the actual situation shall take precedence over the form or appearance of the relationship, public inspection officials may freely enter at any hour of the day or night any workplace liable to inspection, irrespective of the working hours indicated by the employer, since under the terms of section 516 of the LOTTT the scope of action of public inspection officials includes and covers work units and, in general terms, places where work is performed. The Committee recalls that it had previously raised concerns that the requirement to notify the reason for the inspection under section 514(1) might jeopardize the confidentiality of the existence of a complaint, as well as the identity of the complainant. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to amend the provision referred to above to: (i) ensure recognition in the national legislation of the principle of confidentiality and the power of inspectors provided with proper credentials not to notify their presence if they consider that such notification may be prejudicial to the performance of their duties, as required by Articles 12(2) and 15(c) of the Convention; and (ii) give effect to Article 12(1)(a) of the Convention by empowering inspectors (provided with proper credentials) to enter freely at any hour of the day or night any workplace liable to inspection.

Article 16. Supervision by labour inspectors, frequency and thoroughness of inspections. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the number of inspections was 44,211 in 2016, 38,791 in 2017 and 31,174 in 2018. The Committee also notes that the figure was 12,599 in 2019. The Government adds that in 2016, 2017, 2018 and 2019 a total of 844, 1,313, 7,722 and 5,101 penalties were imposed, respectively. The Government further indicates that in 2016 and 2017, labour inspectorates focused on the application of penalties were established in various states, which resulted in an increase of 100 per cent in the recovery of fines in 2016 and 22.82 per cent in 2017. In this regard, the Committee notes that the CTASI and the FAPUV in their joint observations, and the CTASI in its observations, indicate that, particularly in relation to child labour, where there are serious problems, these figures do not tally with the real situation in the country. The Committee further notes the indication by the CTASI that the current pandemic has resulted in a decrease in the operations of both labour inspection services and labour tribunals, which is an obstacle to the identification of violations of labour legislation and makes it difficult to make complaints of violations of labour rights. Lastly, the CTASI indicates that although labour inspection services are empowered to impose penalties calculated on the basis of the minimum wage, the penalties are generally very low. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments in this regard.

The Committee notes with concern the significant decrease in the total number of inspections in 2019 in comparison with previous years and requests the Government to explain the reasons. The Committee also requests the Government to continue providing statistical data on violations of labour laws, with an indication of the provisions breached and the penalties imposed. With reference to its previous comments concerning the Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138), the Committee also requests detailed information on the inspection activities carried out in relation to child labour.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1994)

Articles 5(a) and 16 of the Convention. Inspections as often and as thoroughly as necessary. Self-inspection and self-assessment. Annual inspection plans. The Committee previously noted the information provided by the Government in relation to the use of self-inspection forms by the labour inspectorate, as well as a decrease in self-inspection questionnaires used and recommendations issued, as compared to violations detected in the period 2005–12. In this regard, the Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that there are no sanctions in labour legislation for enterprises failing to submit the self-inspection questionnaires, which has led to: (i) low numbers of enterprises returning self-inspection questionnaires; (ii) a low quality of answered questionnaires; and (iii) a low number of recommendations issued. The Government refers to several measures envisaged to improve the effectiveness of self-inspection questionnaires as a tool to assist the labour inspectorate in increasing efficiency and inspections.

The Committee notes with concern that the Government indicates that, due to several difficulties which include the insufficient number of staff, inspection work has not been performed regularly and thoroughly. In this respect, the Committee notes the Government's indication that the numbers of inspections were 3,667 in 2016, 3,298 in 2017, 3,652 in 2018 and 3,969 in 2019. The Committee further notes that, pursuant to the Directive of the Prime Minister No. 20/CT-TTg dated 17 May 2017 regarding the Reorganization of Inspection and Examination Activities for Enterprises, the formulation and approval of an annual inspection plan must ensure that an enterprise does not undergo more than one inspection every year from a state inspection body. The Directive further provides that, with respect to ad hoc inspections, it is not allowed to expand the inspection scope, and inspect contents that are outside the scope of the inspection decision. In this regard, the Committee notes the Government's indication that a number of planned inspections could not be performed, due to overlapping functions and mandates with other agencies. The Committee observes that restrictions on the frequency and scope of inspections could pose limitations on the ability of labour inspectors to inspect workplaces as often and as thoroughly as is necessary to ensure the effective application of the relevant legal provisions, in accordance with Article 16. In this respect, the Committee recalls its general observation of 2019 on the labour inspection Conventions, expressing concern at reforms that substantially undermine the inherent functioning of labour inspection systems and urging governments to remove these restrictions, with a view to achieving conformity with Convention No. 81. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that, in accordance with Article 16 of the Convention, workplaces are inspected as often and as thoroughly as is necessary to ensure the effective application of the relevant legal provisions. The Committee requests the Government to provide further information on the impact of the Directive of the Prime Minister No. 20/CT-TTg dated 17 May 2017 on the inspections of the labour inspectorate, including with respect to their frequency and scope. In this regard, it requests the Government to provide detailed statistics on conducted inspection visits, disaggregated by sector and by inspection type (inspections performed according to inspection plans, regular inspections or ad hoc inspections) and identifying the number of inspections responding to complaints or to accidents, and inspections that are announced versus unannounced. The Committee also requests the Government to provide further specific information on why a number of planned inspections could not be performed, indicating in detail what overlapping functions and mandates with other agencies prevented these inspections from being carried out. In addition, the Committee further requests information on the number of self-inspection questionnaires issued and returned. Recalling that self-inspection and self-assessment should be complementary to, and not replace, labour inspection, the Committee requests the Government to provide further information on the measures taken by labour inspectors in cases where enterprises fail to respond to self-inspection questionnaires.

Article 3(2). Additional functions entrusted to labour inspectors. Following its previous comments on the exercise of multiple functions by inspectors and the low number of inspectors, the Committee notes that the Government indicates that the overall number of inspectors remains insufficient. The Government states that only approximately one third of the 464 inspectors in the labour sector, working for the Ministry of Labour, War Invalids and Social Affairs (MOLISA), the agencies performing specialized inspection functions under the MOLISA, and the provincial Departments of Labour, Invalids and Social Affairs, perform labour inspection tasks. The Committee notes that, pursuant to section 214 of the Labour Code 2019, labour inspection includes the handling of labour-related complaints and denunciations, but also notes the Government's statement that the labour dispute settlement process in compliance with the provisions of the Labour Code and the Criminal Procedure Code does not involve labour inspectors. Taking into account the difficulties raised by the Government regarding the number of inspectors in relation to their increasing workload, the Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information on all additional functions or responsibilities that are assigned to or expected from labour inspectors, separately identified for the national and provincial levels. The Committee also requests the Government to provide detailed information on the proportion of time and resources spent by labour inspectors on their primary functions, as set out in Article 3(1), compared to those spent on all additional functions entrusted to them, separately assessed for the national and provincial levels. The Committee strongly encourages the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that, in accordance with Article 3(2) of the Convention, any duties which may be entrusted to labour inspectors in addition to their primary duties shall not be such as to interfere with the effective discharge of those primary duties.

Articles 5(a), 20 and 21. Publication of an annual inspection report. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the Inspectorate of the MOLISA (Ministry Inspectorate) prepares an annual inspection report, in accordance with the regulations of the Government Inspectorate, containing the information covered by Article 21, except for statistics on occupational accidents and diseases. The Committee nevertheless notes that no annual report on the activities of the labour inspection services has been transmitted to the Office. In this regard, the Committee notes that the Government requests technical assistance from the Office as regards the establishment of a database of enterprises covering all types of production and businesses, to help it report on the information covered by Article 21(c) of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to take all the necessary measures to ensure that the annual report of the labour inspectorate is published and transmitted to the ILO in the near future, in accordance with Article 20 of the Convention, and that this annual report contains information on all the subjects listed under Article 21. The Committee hopes that the technical assistance requested by the Government will be provided in the near future, with a view to ensuring the establishment of a register of enterprises and full compliance with Articles 20 and 21 of the Convention.

Articles 10 and 11. Resources available to the labour inspectorate. Further to its previous comments which noted the Government's indication that human resources, material means and facilities of the labour inspectorate were inadequate, the Committee notes the Government's indication that increasing the number of labour inspectors has been difficult. The Government states that there were approximately 155 officials performing labour inspection tasks, from the Ministry Inspectorate, the agencies performing specialized inspection functions under the MOLISA, and the provincial Departments of Labour, Invalids and Social Affairs. The Government indicates that while the labour inspection team has a strong background, the current number of inspectors is still deemed to be insufficient. The Committee further notes the Government's indication that some localities have few inspectors while their tasks have increased and their work becomes more complex, which has a negative impact on the validity and effectiveness of inspection activities. Concerning material means, the Committee notes section 6 of Circular No. 14/2015/TT-BLDTBXH of 2015 of the MOLISA, as amended, which stipulates that inspectors must be provided with equipment and working facilities at the agency, in accordance with laws and regulations, and stipulates the equipment provided to inspectors on work trips. The Committee urges the Government to strengthen its efforts with a view to ensuring that the labour inspectorate has sufficient human and material resources for the effective discharge of its duties. In addition, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the application in practice of section 6 of Circular No. 14/2015/TT-BLDTBXH, as amended, and to continue to provide information on the tools and other material means available to labour inspectors.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Labour Inspection (Agriculture) Convention, 1969 (No. 129) (ratification: 1993)

In order to provide a comprehensive view of the issues relating to the application of the ratified Conventions on labour inspection, the Committee considers it appropriate to examine Conventions Nos 81 (labour inspection) and 129 (labour inspection in agriculture) together.

The Committee takes note of the Government's report and the supplementary information provided in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020).

Articles 3(1)(a) and (b), 4 and 6 of Convention No. 81 and Articles 6(1)(a) and (b), 7 and 8 of Convention No. 129. Functions assumed by designated agents. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to indicate whether the "designated agents" of the employment councils (which report to the Ministry of Public Service, Labour and Social Welfare) assume labour inspection functions as provided for in Article 3(1)(a) and (b) of Convention No. 81 and Article 6(1)(a) and (b) of Convention No. 129, or whether they assume exclusively other functions, such as the conciliation and mediation of labour disputes. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that "designated agents" carry out functions of conciliation and mediation of labour disputes in their respective sectors, in addition to carrying out labour inspection functions. It also notes the Government's indications that "designated agents" of employment councils derive their powers from section 63 of the Labour Act and exercise similar functions to those of labour officers, except that they operate only in one specific industry. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the manner in which the labour inspectorate maintains supervision and control of the designated agents in their performance of labour inspection functions, in accordance with Article 4 of Convention No. 81 and Article 7 of Convention No. 129. It also requests the Government to provide specific information on the labour inspection powers and duties of these agents, the resources provided to them, the procedures for their recruitment and any training provided to them. Lastly, the Committee requests the Government to provide further information on the status and conditions of designated agents performing labour inspection functions (Article 6 of Convention No. 81 and Article 8 of Convention No. 129), including their conditions of job security and levels of remuneration in comparison to job security and remuneration for other employees performing labour inspection functions, and how it is ensured that the status and conditions of service of designated agents are such as to guarantee their independence from any improper external influence.

Article 13 of Convention No. 81 and Article 18 of Convention No. 129. Preventive measures by labour inspectors with immediate executory force. The Committee previously noted that the Factories and Works Act gives partial effect to Article 13 of Convention No. 81, and noted the Government's indication that the proposed Occupational Safety and Health (OSH) Bill would explicitly provide inspectors with immediate executory powers to stop work where there is imminent danger to the worker. The Committee notes that, in reply to its previous request, the Government once again refers to certain provisions of the Factories and Works Act relating to the powers of inspectors (sections 5(6), 6 and 19(1)(a) and (b)) and states that the jurisdiction of inspectors under this Act is limited to factories and building works, leaving a gap with respect to non-factory environments, such as agriculture. The Government adds that the OSH Bill seeks to extend inspectors' mandate to cover all workplaces. The Committee further notes that, according to the supplementary information provided by the Government, the OSH Bill has been submitted to the Cabinet Committee on Legislation for consideration. The Committee requests the Government to pursue its efforts to give full effect to Article 13(2)(b) of Convention No. 81 and Article 16(2)(b) of Convention No. 129, to empower inspectors to make orders requiring measures with immediate executory force in the event of imminent danger to the health or safety of the workers in all sectors, and to provide examples of instances when factory inspectors have undertaken preventive measures with immediate executory force, including but not limited to issuing prohibition notices, or ordering work stoppages. While welcoming the indication of progress on the OSH Bill, the Committee notes that the Government has been referring to the proposed or upcoming OSH Bill for a number of years; the Committee trusts that the Government will soon be in a position to provide specific information on the adoption of the OSH Bill.

General observation

Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122)

The Committee notes that, in the year since its previous session in November 2019, the world has experienced a global pandemic that has had profound, far-reaching health and socio-economic consequences. Efforts to control the spread of the COVID-19 virus through confinement measures have led to closures of businesses of all sizes across many economic sectors, with ensuing job losses for millions. In addition, educational and vocational training systems and institutions have been disrupted, forcing many to place their training and education on hold due to the pandemic. ILO Member States have sought to mitigate the impacts of the health and socio-economic crisis through immediate and longer-term response and recovery measures as the crisis continues to evolve.

The COVID-19 crisis threatens the survival of enterprises, jobs and incomes for workers, including self-employed workers, increasing poverty and exacerbating existing inequalities in access to employment and decent work. Moreover, the Committee observes that the pandemic has accelerated changes that were already occurring in the structure and organization of work due to globalization, digitalization and other technological innovations that have led to new and emerging working arrangements. Telework and digital platform work have increased exponentially as urgent measures to prevent the spread of the virus have meant that more workers are working at home and electronically where they are able to do so.

While the nature and extent of the impacts of the pandemic vary between regions and countries, as well as between and across economic sectors, access to full, productive and freely chosen employment and decent work is essential for all workers, just as the ability to retain a skilled, qualified workforce is essential for employers to ensure the optimal functioning of their businesses.

In this context, the Committee wishes to draw attention to its 2020 General Survey on Promoting Employment and Decent Work in a Changing Landscape, which examined the application of Convention No. 122, together with an additional seven employment instruments. [1] It also refers to its Addendum, published after the outbreak of the COVID-19 pandemic, in which the Committee examines the impact of the pandemic on the application of the instruments examined in the General Survey. The General Survey is already available on the NORMLEX website and the Addendum will be available once it is published in early 2021.

In addition, and taking into account the many dimensions of the current socio-economic and employment crisis, the Committee intends for this general observation to enhance awareness, understanding and use of the principles and guidance contained in Convention No. 122, as the overarching governance Convention dedicated to the promotion of full, productive and freely chosen employment and decent work. Its intent is also to highlight the importance of a number of related employment instruments, primarily certain instruments not examined in the General Survey or Addendum, that the Committee nevertheless considers to be directly relevant to the design, development and effective implementation of sustainable economic recovery, employment and job creation measures.

The Committee observes that, taken together, these instruments offer extensive practical guidance that may assist ILO constituents in the development and effective implementation of comprehensive, sequenced, multi-track response and recovery measures. Such measures will support countries in responding to the current global crisis, ensuring an inclusive, sustainable recovery as well as increased resilience and preparedness to enable countries to face future crises that may arise.

Promoting full, productive and freely chosen employment, decent work and income-generation opportunities

Article 1. In its 2005 general observation on Convention No. 122, the Committee noted that the primary objective of Convention No. 122 as expressed in its Article 1(1) is the pursuit of "an active employment policy, which has as a major goal of macroeconomic policy, a focus on the design and implementation of an active employment policy. The achievement of full and productive employment should not be an afterthought, but should be considered throughout the macroeconomic policy formulation stage."

[1] The Vocational Rehabilitation and Employment (Disabled Persons) Convention, 1983 (No. 159), and its Recommendation No. 168, 1983; the Home Work Convention, 1996 (No. 177), and its Recommendation No. 184, 1996; the Employment Policy (Supplementary Provisions) Recommendation, 1984 (No. 169); the Employment Relationship Recommendation, 2006 (No. 198); and the Transition from the Informal to the Formal Economy Recommendation, 2015 (No. 204).

The Committee wishes to draw particular attention in this context to the comprehensive guidance provided in the Employment and Decent Work for Peace and Resilience Recommendation, 2017 (No. 205), in relation to the measures to be taken to generate employment and decent work in crisis situations, for purposes of, among other objectives, recovery and resilience (Paragraph 1). Recommendation No. 205 expressly provides that, in enabling recovery and building resilience, Members should adopt and implement a comprehensive and sustainable employment strategy to promote full, productive, freely chosen employment and decent work for both women and men, taking into account the provisions of Convention No. 122 (Recommendation No. 205, Paragraphs 7(a) and 10).

Article 2 calls on governments to keep under review, in the framework of a coordinated national economic and social policy, the measures taken to achieve the goals of the national employment policy.

The Committee notes in this regard that the impact of such measures should be assessed regularly so that they may be adjusted as needed to effectively tackle challenges through general as well as targeted measures. Moreover, in its comments over the years on the application of Convention No. 122, the Committee has emphasized the need to regularly examine and assess the evolving situation of the national labour market, inter alia, by collecting, compiling and disseminating information on employment trends, including the size and distribution of the economically active population, work, employment, unemployment, hours of work and labour underutilization, among others. Reliable labour market data is critical to ensure that labour policies are adequate, and that educational and training systems are adapted to anticipate and meet current and emerging skills needs. The latter has been a challenge during the COVID-19 pandemic, when virtually all countries saw their statistical sources disrupted. While the ILO actively supported emergency plans to keep the information flowing at the national level, it undertook an innovative global technique using now-casting methods to estimate the impact of the pandemic on the world of work, by estimating the loss of hours of work in all regions, and by ranking sectors of activities by risk. This dimension takes on crucial importance given that, due to the crisis, certain key economic sectors have been devastated, such as tourism, aviation and others, including global supply chains, or have been severely disrupted, in many cases leaving workers at the end of the chain with few options but to seek alternative employment as and where they can. On the other hand, certain sectors have experienced increased demand, such as health, emergency services, food and agriculture, and information technology. Moreover, the Committee observes that enterprises and workers in these sectors are often at the front lines of the pandemic, where ensuring occupational safety and respect for fundamental principles and rights at work and international labour standards must be ensured as integral components of crisis response.

Article 3 of Convention No. 122 calls on Member States to engage in consultations in relation to the development and implementation of active labour market measures. The Committee considers that inclusive, gender-responsive measures to promote sustainable employment and decent work, income-generation opportunities and job-rich growth should be planned, implemented and monitored in consultation and with the active participation of employers' and workers' organizations, and take into account the views of representatives of persons concerned by the measures to be taken. In this respect, Recommendation No. 205 highlights the importance of consultation and social dialogue, contemplating in addition consultation with civil society organizations, where appropriate (Paragraphs 8(d) and 11) (See also Part VII of Addendum to 2020 General Survey on Promoting Employment and Decent Work in a Changing Landscape).

The Committee notes that designing and implementing an effective response to the socio-economic aftermath of the COVID-19 crisis requires a multi-track approach that includes a range of sequenced policy measures, ranging from immediate urgent measures to intermediate and longer-term measures. It recalls that Recovering from the Crisis: A Global Jobs Pact (2009), adopted by the Conference in the context of the 2008 financial and economic crisis, called on ILO Member States to pursue a decent work response to the crisis, based on international labour standards, that ensures the link between social progress and economic development.

The Committee notes that the pandemic has highlighted the need to strengthen public health systems in most Member States. In this respect, it recalls the importance in the response to the pandemic of social policy instruments, such as the Social Policy (Basic Aims and Standards) Convention, 1962 (No. 117), and the Social Policy (Non-Metropolitan Territories) Convention, 1947 (No. 82), which seek to improve the standards of living and social progress of the peoples concerned and establish general principles calling on Member States to ensure that all such policies are primarily directed to the well-being and development of the population and the promotion of its desire for social progress. In its Preamble, Convention No. 117 affirms that economic development must serve as a basis for social progress, providing, inter alia, that all steps should be taken by appropriate international, regional and national measures to promote improvement in such fields as, inter alia, public health and social security (see also Article 4 of Convention No. 82). The Committee recalls that Convention No. 122 and the body of related employment instruments are closely linked to fundamental principles and rights at work and to both the fundamental and priority Conventions. In its Preamble, referring to the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, 1948, Convention No. 122 affirms that "everyone has the right to work, to free choice of employment, to just and favourable conditions of work and to protection against unemployment". In addition, the Preamble highlights certain instruments of direct relevance to employment policy, including the Employment Service Convention, 1949 (No. 88) and the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111). The Private Employment Agencies Convention, 1997 (No. 181), while providing for the regulation of private employment agencies and their coordination with public employment services, also provides for the protection of workers' rights based on international labour standards.

To achieve the objective of full, productive and freely chosen employment set out in Convention No. 122, certain key steps must be taken. First, there must be a political commitment to ensure the right to work by realizing full employment. Secondly, Member States must build or strengthen the institutions necessary to ensure the best possible organization of the labour market. Third, States must take measures to support inclusive access to employment by supporting education and training as well as lifelong learning, to reduce skills mismatches and anticipate labour demands, particularly in a rapidly shifting world of work where the pace of change due to factors such as globalization, digitalization and technological innovations continues to accelerate. Against this backdrop, the Committee notes that the pandemic has caused seismic shifts by devastating certain sectors while increasing demand in others, highlighting the need for resilient and integrated systems that can adapt effectively and quickly in situations of crisis to reskill and upskill workers in order to enhance their employability and facilitate their redeployment to other occupations and sectors where demand is high.

The Committee observes that Convention No. 122, taken together with the body of interdependent and mutually supporting employment instruments referenced, provides a comprehensive framework for realizing the right to full, productive and freely chosen employment and decent work, as well as to education and vocational training as a necessary condition for achieving this objective.

Education, vocational training and lifelong learning

The Human Resources Development Convention (No. 142) and Recommendation (No. 195), (1975) provide comprehensive guidance in this area. In particular, the Human Resources Development Convention, 1975 (No. 142), calls on States to put in place comprehensive and coordinated policies and programmes of vocational guidance and training that are closely linked with employment, particularly through public employment services (Article 1(1)). Convention No. 142 reflects the notion of freely chosen employment, calling for countries to develop inclusive policies and programmes whose purpose is to "encourage and enable all persons, on an equal basis and without any discrimination whatsoever, to develop and use their capabilities for work in their own best interests and in accordance with their own aspirations, the needs of society being taken into account" (Article 1(5)).

The Human Resources Recommendation, 2004 (No. 195) recognizes in its Preamble that "education, training and lifelong learning contribute significantly to promoting the interests of individuals, enterprises, the economy and society as a whole, especially considering the critical challenge of attaining full employment, poverty eradication, social inclusion and sustained economic growth in the global economy". Recommendation No. 195 calls for Members to take steps to facilitate access to lifelong learning, recognizing that education and training are critical to meet emerging skills needs for both workers and employers.

The Committee observes that access to education and training, as well as to job counselling and placement services, is particularly crucial for young women and men as a result of the crisis. Young persons are already disadvantaged in the labour markets of most countries, with unemployment rates in some countries that are more than twice as high as those of adult workers. To avoid a "lockdown" generation that may be affected by the current crisis for decades to come, youth employment policies and active labour market measures should be developed that, among other things, seek to ensure access to education, vocational training and skills development and to facilitate the transition from education and training to work.

In the context of the current crisis, the Committee observes that educational and training systems, as well as employment services, should assist workers who seek to use their transferable skills, upskill and re-skill to enable them to be redeployed to other suitable work. To ensure increased socio-economic resilience for future crises, the Committee stresses that employment impact assessments and the compilation and analysis of labour market information are essential tools that inform the development and implementation of evidence-based policies for the promotion of full, productive and freely chosen employment and decent work.

The Committee welcomes the technical assistance provided by the Office in carrying out rapid employment impact assessments. It notes that the ILO Guidelines on Rapid Diagnostics for Assessing the Country Level Impact of COVID-19 on the Economy and Labour Market were applied in 47 countries covering all regions, to assist the tripartite constituents in the formulation of targeted policy recommendations for an employment-rich recovery, with a focus on hard-hit groups such as migrants, informal economy workers, women and youth. These guidelines promoted strong tripartite engagement in addressing the impact of the crisis on labour markets. In some cases, such assessments were carried out in cooperation with the World Bank, the United Nations Development Programme and regional financial institutions, such as the Asian Development Bank, the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development and the Inter-American Development Bank.

Recommendation No. 205 recognises the need in crisis situations to assess and meet emerging skills needs, providing that States should formulate or adapt a national education, training, retraining and vocational guidance programme that assesses and responds to emerging skills needs for recovery, in consultation with education and training institutions and social partners. Recommendation No. 205 invites States to coordinate education, training and retraining services, including higher education, apprenticeship, vocational training and entrepreneurship training, so as to enable those whose education and training have been interrupted to access education and training (Paragraph 19(c)).

The ILO Centenary Declaration, 2019 affirms that in its human-centred approach to the future of work, the ILO must direct its efforts to, among other things, promoting the acquisition of skills, competencies and qualifications for all workers throughout their working lives, to address existing and anticipated skills gaps, ensure that education and training systems are responsive to labour market needs and enhance the ability of workers to access decent work opportunities (section II.A.(iii)). These objectives are more critical than ever to ensure a brighter future of work in the aftermath of the COVID-19 pandemic.

Promoting sustainable enterprises as drivers of productive employment and decent work

The Committee notes that the achievement of full, productive and freely chosen employment is not possible without establishing enabling environments for the creation and growth of sustainable and resilient enterprises. Recommendation No. 205 recognizes the importance of creating or restoring an enabling environment for sustainable enterprises, particularly small and medium-sized enterprises, as well as cooperatives and the social and solidarity economy, to generate employment, decent work and income generation opportunities (Paragraph 11 (c)).

The Committee welcomes in this respect the monitoring and collection by the ILO of key information resources available on the functioning of enterprises in the crisis, including its impact on enterprises, responses by enterprises and state policy measures to support affected enterprises. The Office has launched on-line dedicated products, tools and guidelines to assist enterprises in adjusting to the impact of the pandemic, including a site on COVID-19 Enterprises Resources and a SME Resilience COVID-19 section, which provide guidance on: COVID-19 impact assessment, informality in micro and small enterprises, business continuity, protection of workers, and inclusive finance, among others. A dedicated section on Business and COVID has also been created in the Helpdesk for multinational enterprises, including prevention and mitigation checklists for SMEs and guidance on teleworking.

The Job Creation in Small and Medium-Sized Enterprises Recommendation, 1998 (No. 189), recognizes that small and medium-sized enterprises play a fundamental role in economic growth and development, are increasingly responsible for the creation of the majority of jobs throughout the world, and can help create an environment for innovation and entrepreneurship. Moreover, it recognizes that small and medium-sized enterprises provide the potential for women and other traditionally disadvantaged groups to gain access under better conditions to productive, sustainable and quality employment opportunities. It calls on governments to create an environment that is conducive to the growth and development of these enterprises and removes barriers to their functioning.

Subsequently, with the adoption of the Promotion of Cooperatives Recommendation, 2002 (No. 193), the Conference also recognized the importance of cooperatives in job creation, which operate in all sectors of the economy, including in the informal economy. It calls on Members to take measures to support and strengthen cooperatives by providing a supportive policy and legal framework consistent with the nature and function of cooperatives and guided by cooperative values and principles (Paragraphs 3 and 6). The Committee notes that, in the context of the pandemic, cooperatives and other social and solidarity economy organizations around the world have been providing essential assistance to their members, connecting people in need of support with local governments and social partners. Financial cooperatives have provided liquidity support to their members, launching crowdfunding and other solidarity initiatives to support local micro, small, and medium enterprises as well as people in vulnerable situations. Many cooperatives have transformed their products and services to meet urgent local needs for protective equipment and social care. In the framework of ongoing development cooperation projects, the ILO has included the impact of COVID-19 in cooperatives needs assessments to better assess and address current and future needs. Direct financial and technical support is being provided to social and solidarity economy organizations (SSEOs) hit by the crisis. At the global level, the Office is documenting good practices of cooperatives and SSEOs in responding to the crisis, so that these examples can inform the development of response and recovery measures by ILO constituents.

The Committee further notes that Recommendation No. 205 calls on States to create incentives in crisis situations for multinational enterprises to cooperate with national enterprises to create productive, freely chosen employment and decent work, taking into account the Tripartite Declaration of Principles concerning Multinational Enterprises and Social Policy (Paragraph 11(h)).

Non-discrimination and inclusivity

The Committee has previously emphasized the importance of developing and effectively implementing inclusive employment policies in times of crisis that provide for equality of opportunity and treatment as a priority and take the needs and concerns of those in vulnerable situations into consideration. In the context of the pandemic, the Committee notes that employment policies should provide for both integrated and targeted measures.

In this respect, the Committee observes that all response and recovery measures should be gender-responsive. Women have been affected significantly by the pandemic, suffering higher levels of job loss and unemployment rates overall. In addition, women are more likely than men to be in precarious, poorly remunerated informal jobs. On the other hand, women are concentrated in certain jobs and sectors at the front lines of the pandemic, for example, as supermarket workers or as care economy workers (such as doctors, nurses and other health care professionals and domestic workers). The Committee notes that not only are these workers at higher risk of exposure to the virus, during the pandemic they have been required to work excessive hours while also shouldering an increased burden of caring for children and elderly or ill family members.

These inequalities are compounded in situations of discrimination on multiple and intersecting grounds, which may include sex, race, colour, religion, disability, migrant status, sexual orientation, gender identity and other grounds. The Committee emphasizes that, where individuals belong to more than one disadvantaged group, multiple and intersectional discrimination compounds and exacerbates existing inequalities, affecting both health and economic outcomes.

Policy responses to the crisis need to take into account both multiple and intersecting forms of discrimination and inequalities, including pervasive gender inequalities. For example, women belonging to minority groups have faced persistent inequality during the COVID-19 crisis, given the intersecting burdens they carry due to gender discrimination and inequality. Minority women are disproportionately represented in informal economy jobs, which are more vulnerable to disruption and fail to provide health coverage, unemployment benefits or paid sick leave.

The pandemic has also shown the importance of addressing stigma in addition to discrimination. The Committee notes that there have been instances of stigmatization of certain groups blamed for transmitting the virus, including migrants and frontline health workers. In the case of health workers, there have been incidents of stigmatization, violence and harassment during the pandemic, where they are seen as possible sources of infection due to the work they perform. Members of these groups are also more frequently subjected to violence and harassment. For these reasons, the Committee stresses the need to squarely address stigma and discrimination in developing and implementing crisis response and recovery measures.

In this regard, Recommendation No. 205 provides that "in taking measures on employment and decent work in response to crisis situations, Members should take into account the need to combat discrimination, prejudice and hatred on the basis of race, colour, sex, religion, political opinion, national extraction, social origin, disability, age or sexual orientation or any other grounds" (Paragraph 7(f)).

The Committee notes that in many countries the majority of the population is employed in the informal economy, where many disadvantaged groups are concentrated. While the Committee has recently examined the Transition from the Informal to the Formal Economy Recommendation, 2015 (No. 204) in its General Survey, it nevertheless wishes in this general observation to encourage States to refer to the guidance provided in Recommendation No. 204 in developing and implementing measures aimed not only at facilitating the transition to the formal economy, but also measures to prevent the informalization of formal economy jobs.

Tripartite consultation and social dialogue

The Committee recalls that tripartite consultation and social dialogue are essential in normal times and become even more critical in times of crisis (2010 General Survey, paragraph 794). Article 3 of Convention No. 122 requires ratifying States to consult with the social partners and with representatives of those affected by the measures to be taken. Recognition of the importance of consultation and social dialogue is a thread running through Convention No. 122 and its related Recommendations (Nos. 122 and 169), as well as through all of the employment instruments highlighted in this general observation, which require Member States to engage in consultations with the social partners as well as with representatives of concerned groups (See also Part VII of the Addendum to the 2020 General Survey).

The Committee notes the concerns expressed in the observations by the employers' and workers' organizations that in many cases governments took urgent measures to mitigate the effects of the crisis through the development of employment policies without their participation. In this regard, the Committee notes that effective consultation and participatory social dialogue facilitates the design, development and implementation of agreed solutions that take into account the perspectives and concerns of the individuals and groups involved, and promotes greater ownership of and commitment to the outcomes of the participatory process. Recommendation No. 205 emphasizes the importance of social dialogue and tripartite consultation in response to crisis situations (Preamble, Paragraphs 8(d), 24 and 25). In particular, Paragraph 24 calls on Members to ensure that the response measures contemplated in the Recommendation are developed or promoted through gender-inclusive social dialogue, taking into account the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144).

Conclusions

The Committee notes that most countries, including those that have not ratified Convention No. 122, have adopted some form of employment plan, policy or strategy designed to promote employment and job creation. Nevertheless, the Committee notes a range of gaps and challenges identified in the reports of countries and the social partners that may limit the beneficial impact of these plans, policies and strategies during this pivotal period of crisis. It observes that many such policies do not address the needs of all segments of the population, particularly of those groups that encounter the most difficulties in accessing the labour market (women, young people, older workers, persons with disabilities, racial and ethnic minorities and others). In this respect, the Committee notes that the information provided by ratifying States on the application of Convention No. 122, including in the context of the pandemic, has shown that taking an inclusive approach to responding to the crisis, based on reliable labour market data, has enabled them to develop effective targeted responses that take into account the different needs and concerns of workers, businesses and economic sectors.

Therefore, the Committee encourages governments and social partners in those countries to take the necessary measures to develop, declare and pursue, through a participatory social dialogue process, inclusive, gender-responsive and comprehensive employment policies that take account of the provisions of Convention No. 122 and of the body of employment instruments adopted. It recalls that constituents may avail themselves of ILO technical assistance in this respect.

The Committee also notes that a number of countries have adapted their existing employment policies specifically to address issues of concern arising during the pandemic, such as promoting the survival and sustainability of enterprises and livelihoods, job retention as well as job creation, education and training, particularly reskilling and upskilling. Governments are encouraged to ensure that these policies and their implementation take into account all segments of the population, particularly those made more vulnerable by the crisis, as well as the need to strengthen national institutions and international cooperation with a view to enhancing resilience and preparedness in the event of future crises, whatever form these may take.

The need to address the human dimension of the COVID-19 pandemic must be at the forefront of response and recovery measures. In this respect, the Committee recalls that the Centenary Declaration for the Future of Work adopted by the Conference in June 2019 calls for the ILO to carry forward into its second century with unrelenting vigour its constitutional mandate for social justice by further developing its human-centred approach to the future of work, putting workers' rights and the needs, aspirations and rights of all people at the heart of economic, social and environmental policies (ILO Centenary Declaration, Part I. D). In adopting the Centenary Declaration, the tripartite constituents highlighted the transformative changes taking place in the world of work as well as the persistent inequalities that remain. They recognised that it is imperative to act with urgency to seize the opportunities and address the challenge to shape a fair, inclusive and secure future of work with full, productive and freely chosen employment and decent work for all (ILO Centenary Declaration, Part I.). The Committee considers that responding to this clarion call is more critical than ever before in the context of the pandemic, which represents one of the most significant challenges yet faced by the ILO and its constituents. The human-centred approach is key to the success and sustainability of efforts made to overcome this crisis.

The Committee encourages constituents to ensure that all response and recovery measures developed and implemented are based on respect for human rights and the rule of law, including respect for fundamental principles and rights at work and international labour standards, comprising the fundamental and governance Conventions, as well as the technical Conventions. It requests governments to provide information on steps taken to ensure that measures taken in relation to promoting employment and decent work during and after the crisis are based on those principles and standards.

Finally, to enable the Committee to effectively assess the application of ratified Conventions, and also to enable the Office to facilitate the exchange of good practices, innovative and effective solutions, and lessons learned, the Committee invites constituents to continue to collect and communicate, together with their reports, detailed information on the inclusive, gender-responsive employment policies and active labour market measures adopted or envisaged in response to the pandemic and the socio-economic crisis left in its wake, which would impact on the application of Convention No. 122 and the additional employment instruments examined herein, particularly with respect to:

- new employment-related policies and programmes adopted taking into account the impact of the COVID-19 crisis;
- adaptations made to existing policies and programmes to promote employment and decent work;
- measures taken to create an enabling environment for entrepreneurship and for enterprises of all sizes, particularly micro, small and medium-sized enterprises;
- measures to promote cooperatives as sources of income and livelihoods for workers, especially those in the informal economy and those belonging to disadvantaged groups;
- the manner in which employment-related policies, programmes and measures ensure inclusivity and integrate the fundamental principle of non-discrimination and equality of opportunity and treatment, starting with gender equality;
- measures taken to establish or strengthen the national institutions necessary to ensure effective response and recovery, including the public employment service and private employment agencies, where these exist, as well as educational and vocational guidance and training institutions;
- examples of consultation and social dialogue in the development, implementation, monitoring and review of response and recovery measures;
- obstacles encountered and lessons learned in the development and effective implementation of crisis response and recovery measures.

The Committee considers that the development of a transformative agenda to achieve employment and decent work that is aligned with the human-centred approach adopted by the Conference in the ILO Centenary Declaration for the Future of Work, 2019 and with the Sustainable Development Goals, and is based on fundamental principles and rights at work as well as international labour standards, is key to overcoming the devastating impacts of the pandemic. The Committee expresses the hope that the pursuit of this objective, guided by Convention No. 122 and related instruments, will transform the challenges faced worldwide today into opportunities for a brighter future of work.

Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122) (ratification: 1978)

The Committee notes with deep concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments. The Committee informs the Government that, if it has not supplied replies to the points raised by 1 September 2021, then it may proceed with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the information at its disposal at its next session.

Article 1 of the Convention. Adoption and implementation of an active employment policy. ILO technical assistance. In response to previous comments, the Government indicates in its report that, although the strategy for the formulation of a national employment policy was commenced in April 2003, and new structures have been established, the preparation of a national employment policy paper has still not been completed. The Committee notes that the National Employment Forum held in 2010 showed the need to develop a new employment policy adapted to labour market needs, which will have to target as a priority the reform of the vocational training system and the improvement of employment support services. The Government indicates that, out of a population of 818,159 inhabitants of working age, recent estimates place the unemployment rate at 48.4 per cent. It also indicates that, following a mission for the evaluation of technical cooperation undertaken by the ILO in March 2011, the Government reiterated its commitment to developing a Djibouti Decent Work Programme. It adds that it is still awaiting Office support for this purpose. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken to ensure that employment, as a key element of poverty reduction, is central to macroeconomic and social policies, and on the progress made in the adoption of a national policy for the achievement of full employment within the meaning of the Convention.

Youth employment. The Government indicates that in 2012, despite a certain improvement, unemployment particularly affected young persons with higher education degrees. Moreover, although the country does not currently have a formal strategy to promote youth employment, several initiatives have been established to improve the operation of the labour market, promote entrepreneurship and provide training adapted to labour market needs. The Committee invites the Government to provide information on the manner in which the measures adopted have resulted in productive and lasting employment opportunities for young persons, and on the collaboration of the social partners in their implementation.

Article 2. Collection and use of employment data. In March 2014, the Government provided the summary of the employment situation prepared by the National Employment and Skills Observatory. The number of jobs is increasing (30,118 jobs created in 2007, 35,393 in 2008 and 37,837 in 2010). The Committee invites the Government to indicate the measures taken to improve the labour market information system and to consolidate the mechanisms linking this system with decision-making in the field of employment policy. It also requests the Government to provide updated statistical data disaggregated by age and sex, as well as any other relevant data relating to the size and distribution of the workforce, the nature and scope of unemployment and underemployment and the respective trends.

Article 3. Collaboration of the social partners. The Committee recalls the importance of the consultations required by the Convention and once again requests the Government to provide information on the measures adopted or envisaged for the consultation of the representatives of the persons affected on employment policies.

The Committee expects that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122) (ratification: 1967)

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020). The Committee proceeded with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the supplementary information received from the Government this year, as well as on the basis of the information at its disposal in 2019.

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Employment policy measures. Impact of COVID-19. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to provide information on the impact of the employment measures taken under its twin key strategies: the Action Plan for Jobs and Pathways to Work 2016–20. It also requested the Government to continue to provide information on the procedures for deciding on and reviewing employment measures implemented within the framework of an overall economic and social policy. The Committee notes with interest that the Action Plan for Jobs has delivered strong job growth. In its supplementary report the Government indicates that as of the first quarter of 2020, total employment had grown to 2,353,500, representing 490,300 more people in employment since the Action Plan for Jobs was first launched in 2012. The Committee further notes that these are the highest employment figures ever recorded in the country and significantly above the Government's 2020 target of 2.1 million. The Government indicates that the unemployment rate, which peaked at almost 16 per cent in 2012 had fallen to 4.7 per cent in the first quarter of 2020 and long term unemployment had fallen to 1.2 per cent, well below the target of 2.5 per cent set out in Pathways to Work 2016–2020. The Committee notes that the Government's policies had increased the employment rate by over 15 per cent in all eight regions from the first quarter of 2012 to the first quarter of 2020. The Committee further notes that the targets set in the Programme for Government in 2016 for the creation of 200,000 additional jobs by 2020, including 135,000 jobs outside of Dublin, had been exceeded with jobs created totalling 272,700. The Government indicates that the impact of COVID-19 on Ireland's economy is evidenced in the Labour Force Survey figures for the second quarter of 2020, which indicate that employment decreased by 149,800 (-6.3 per cent), bringing total employment down to 2,222,500. The Committee notes that a new Programme for Government was introduced in June 2020, setting a new target to create 200,000 additional jobs by 2025. With regard to the procedures for deciding on and reviewing employment measures implemented, the Government indicates that a set of milestones and metrics are used as indicators of progress in addressing the challenges and delivering on Pathways to Work 2016–2020. Progress on milestones are presented quarterly to the Cabinet Committee, and metrics are published on the Department website and reviewed and updated on an annual basis to reflect the key challenges and issues being addressed under this strategy each year. The Committee notes from the supplementary information provided by the Government that the majority of activities under Pathways to Work 2016–2020 have now been completed and reflect the much different economic landscape resulting from the COVID-19 pandemic. In this respect, the Government indicates that the Department of Employment Affairs & Social Protection (DEASP) is developing a successor strategy for the period 2020–25, aimed at ensuring that positive labour market outcomes are achievable for all groups in Irish society and that the Irish labour force is well positioned to respond to ongoing and future economic challenges. The Government further indicates that the DEASP will continue to review its labour market activation programmes to ensure that they remain aligned to labour market needs. The Labour Market Advisory Council is expected to remain an important component of the recovery process, providing guidance on the active labour market policy responses required to address the economic challenges that Ireland is facing over the immediate and longer term. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide detailed updated information, including statistical data disaggregated by sex, age, region and economic sector on the impact of the COVID-19 pandemic on employment, unemployment and visible underemployment and on measures taken or envisaged to address the challenges encountered. The Committee further requests the Government to provide information on the implementation and outcomes of the new Programme for the creation of 200,000 additional jobs by 2025. The Government is further requested to provide updated information on the development, implementation and impact of the employment strategy for the period 2020–2025.

Education and training policies and programmes. The Committee had previously requested the Government to provide information on the impact of the Action Plan for Education, the National Skills Strategy 2025, and the Further Education and Training Strategy 2014–19. The Government indicates that the annual review of the Action Plan for Education registers an achievement rate of 85 per cent for 2018, rising to 86 per cent in the first quarter of 2019. The key achievements of the Action Plan from 2018 to 2020 include: the establishment of the Technological University Dublin; an employer satisfaction survey, as well as the roll-out of 11 new apprenticeship programmes in 2019 and three in 2020. The Government indicates that through the Action Plan to Expand Apprenticeship and Traineeship for the period 2016–20, the number of apprenticeship programmes has grown from 25 to 58 with a further 20 in development. The pathways to participation in Apprenticeship has also been reviewed to ensure that the national apprenticeship system is more inclusive of diverse backgrounds and is accessible to all. In addition, the Government launched a national apprenticeship jobs platform in 2019 (www.apprenticeshipjobs.ie) and a national promotional campaign, Generation Apprenticeship, was created to promote apprenticeship participation and opportunities at local, regional and national levels. The Committee notes that the number of employers engaging with the apprenticeship system increased from 3,558 in 2015 to over 6,000 in 2019 and that annual new apprentice registrations grew from 3,153 to 6,177 between 2015 and 2019. The Government indicates that the COVID-19 has impacted recruitment into apprenticeship programmes, with recruitment being reduced by 60 per cent as of mid-2020. A time-limited Apprenticeship Incentivisation Scheme for employers of apprentices has been introduced whereby a €3,000 grant is paid over a two-year period for each new apprentice who is registered between 1 March and 31 December 2020 and retained into the third quarter of 2021. With regard to the National Skills Strategy 2025, the Government indicates that the level of adult participation in lifelong learning in Ireland increased from 6.9 per cent in 2016 to 12.6 per cent in 2019. A National Skills Council as well as an Expert Group on Future Skills Needs (EGFSN) have been established to advise the Government on future skills requirements and associated labour market issues that may impact the national potential for employment growth. The Government adds that nine Regional Skills Fora have been established to engage employers, enterprises and education and training providers at the regional level to tailor responses to skills needs. These Fora engaged with over 1,498 enterprises in 2019, 75 per cent of which were small, medium and micro-enterprises. The Committee notes the implementation of the Further Education and Training Strategy 2014–2019 (FET), which resulted in significant progress in education and which is periodically assessed and reviewed. The Government indicates that as a part of Budget 2018, the rate of the National Training Fund (NTF) levy has been increased (by 0.1 per cent in 2018 to 0.8 per cent and by a further 0.1 per cent in both 2019 and 2020) and a reform package, developed in consultation with employers, has been attached to the fund to make it more responsive to employers' needs. The Government further indicates that as part of the reform package various policies and programmes, such as Skills to Advance, Springboard+ and Skillnet Ireland have been implemented to promote the upskilling and reskilling of the current workforce. The Committee notes that Skills to Advance, which is an employee development policy framework, enables targeted support for groups in vulnerable situations in the Irish workforce, with a particular focus on those with lower skills levels. It also supports small and medium-sized enterprises in developing their workforce. The Committee further notes that the Government has also initiated the Skill to Compete programme in response to the urgent need for activation, upskilling and reskilling of workers who have been displaced from their jobs as a result of COVID-19. It will provide for 19,000 additional full time and part time places, prioritizing placement of persons who have lost their jobs as a result of the pandemic. The Government anticipates that a period of at least 18 months will be required to fully address the labour market disruption caused by COVID-19. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide detailed updated information, including statistics disaggregated by age and sex, on the impact of the Action Plan for Education, the National Skills Strategy 2025, the apprenticeship programmes and other relevant measures, in terms of enabling young people, women and persons belonging to disadvantaged groups to secure lasting employment. The Committee further requests the Government to provide information on the impact of upskilling and reskilling initiatives and programmes, such as the Skill to Compete and Springboard+ 2020 programmes, on persons who have lost their jobs as a result of COVID-19 and on employment trends.

Article 3. Consultations with the social partners. In its previous comments, the Committee requested further information on the activities of the Labour Employer Economic Forum (LEEF) with respect to the development, implementation and review of coordinated employment policy measures and programmes and their links to other economic and social policies. In its supplementary information, the Government indicates that, in response to COVID-19, the national Return to Work Safely Protocol was introduced in May 2020. It is designed to support employers and workers in putting measures in place to prevent the spread of COVID-19 in the workplace. The initiative was jointly led by the Department of the Prime Minister (the Taoiseach), the Department of Business, Enterprise and Innovation and the Health and Safety Authority. The Protocol was developed and adopted following discussion in the LEEF, as the forum for high-level dialogue between the Government, trade unions and employer representatives on matters of strategic national importance. The Committee notes that a sub-group of the LEEF has been established to oversee the implementation of the Protocol across Ireland, in parallel with existing occupational health and safety statutory requirements. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing examples of the participation of the social partners in the development, implementation and review of measures adopted to promote full, productive and freely chosen employment, including measures aimed at overcoming the profound impacts of COVID-19 on the labour market.

Japan

Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122) (ratification: 1986)

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020). The Committee examines the application of the Convention on the basis of the supplementary information received from the Government this year (see section concerning the COVID-19 pandemic), as well as on the basis of the information at its disposal in 2019.

The Committee notes the observations made by the Japanese Trade Union Confederation (JTUC–RENGO), transmitted by the Government together with its report. The Committee also notes the observations of the Japan Business Federation (NIPPON KEIDANREN), transmitted by the Government together with its report and supported by the International Organisation of Employers (IOE). It further notes the Government's reply to the observations of the Japan Postal Industry Workers' Union (YUSANRO) of 2016.

COVID-19 pandemic. Socioeconomic impacts. Response and recovery measures. The Committee notes the serious social and economic impact of the COVID-19 pandemic at the national and local levels, as well as the measures taken by the Government to mitigate it. The Committee notes that a Declaration of a State of Emergency was issued on 7 April 2020, which was subsequently lifted in all prefectures on 25 May 2020. Several emergency response packages, representing over 20 per cent of Japan's gross domestic product (GDP), have been adopted to address the COVID-19 pandemic, protect the public and move towards economic recovery. In this framework, the Committee notes the information provided by the Government in its supplementary report concerning the broad range of measures adopted by the Government to protect employment and livelihoods. The Government refers to, among other measures: expanding special measures on the Employment Adjustment Subsidies until December 2020; launching a fund to support workers who are forced to leave work due to the impact of COVID-19 and are not able to receive allowances during this period; and providing assistance to businesses to ensure business continuity (such as cash payments to Small and Medium Enterprises (SMEs)) and financial subsidies to workers affected by school closures. The Committee notes that in its observations, JTUC–RENGO highlights that, taking into account the negative prospects concerning the impact of the pandemic, the expansion of the Employment Adjustment Subsidies should be implemented until at least March 2021. JTUC–RENGO points out that additional measures should be taken to encourage employers to retain workers. Recalling the comprehensive guidance provided by international labour standards, the Committee wishes to draw the Government's attention to the Employment and Decent Work for Peace and Resilience Recommendation, 2017 (No. 205), which provides guidelines for developing and implementing effective, consensus-based and inclusive responses to the profound socio-economic impacts of the pandemic. The Committee invites the Government to provide updated information in its next report on the impacts of the global COVID-19 pandemic and the measures taken, in consultation with the social partners, to address these impacts when implementing the programmes and measures aimed at ensuring the objectives of the Convention and the outcomes of these programmes and measures.

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Employment trends and active labour market measures. The Committee notes the Government's report received in August 2019, which includes detailed information in reply to its 2017 Observation. The Committee notes that the Government refers to the implementation of measures contemplated under the "Long-term Vision for Overcoming Population Decline and Vitalizing the Local Economy in Japan" and its accompanying comprehensive strategy which provides measures for the inclusion of persons with disabilities in the labour market. Furthermore, the Committee notes the adoption in 2018 of the "Act on the comprehensive promotion of labour policies" and the order for enforcement of such Act with a view to promoting a work-style reform allowing workers to choose different work styles depending on their personal circumstances. In December 2018, the Government also adopted the "Basic Guidelines for Labour Policies" which highlight the importance of effective utilization of workers' capabilities. The Government also indicates that, since 2018, the "counter for securing human resources" is the main public employment office providing job placement services, especially in those sectors facing serious labour shortages, such as social welfare, construction, security and transportation. In this respect, the Committee notes the statistical information, compiled from the Labour Force Survey of the Statistics Bureau and provided by the Government, regarding employment trends for the period 2016–2018. The data provided indicates that labour force participation has increased despite declines in the working age population. The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed updated information on the impact of the employment measures adopted, including the measures implemented under the Japan Revitalization Strategy, the Long-term Vision for Overcoming Population Decline and Vitalizing the Local Economy in Japan and the Basic Guidelines for Labour Policies. It also requests the Government to continue to provide updated detailed information, including statistics on employment trends, disaggregated by age, sex and economic sector. The Committee also reiterates its request to the Government to provide detailed updated information on the procedures for deciding on and reviewing employment measures implemented within the framework of an overall economic and social policy.

Article 3. Participation of the social partners. In reply to the Committee's previous comments, the Government reiterates that the tripartite Labour Policy Council has deliberated on important matters concerning the enactment, amendment and enforcement of employment legislation and its opinions were taken into account in the planning and designing of employment policies. In its observations, NIPPON KEIDANREN indicates that it participated constructively in the formulation of the Basic Guidelines. The Committee welcomes the Government's indication that consultations were also held with representatives of workers and employers directly affected by the employment policies developed, such as persons with disabilities, who were consulted in the framework of the Subcommittee for the Employment of Person with Disabilities under the Labour Policy Council. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the activities of the tripartite Labour Policy Council with respect to the development, implementation and review of employment policy measures and programmes, including those adopted to address the socioeconomic impact of COVID-19, and the manner in which they are coordinated with other economic and social policies. It also requests the Government to provide updated detailed information, including concrete examples of the manner in which representatives of those affected by the measures to be taken are consulted and their views taken into account in the development, implementation and review of employment policies and programmes.

Libya

Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122) (ratification: 1971)

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020). The Committee proceeded with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the information contained in the Government's report received in August 2020 in reply to the Committee's 2018 observation. The Committee takes note of the complexity of the situation prevailing on the ground and the armed conflict in the country.

Follow-up to the conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards (International Labour Conference, 107th Session, May–June 2018)

The Committee recalls the discussion that took place in the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards (CAS) at its 107th Session in May–June 2018 concerning the application of the Convention. Acknowledging the complexity of the situation prevailing on the ground and the presence of armed conflict, the CAS highlighted the impact and consequences of conflicts on poverty and development, decent work and sustainable enterprises, and recognized the importance of employment and decent work for promoting peace, enabling recovery and building resilience. Taking into account the Government's submission and the discussion in the CAS, the Committee requested the Government to provide information regarding updated statistics on the labour market, disaggregated by sex and age; information on the labour market strategy and the way in which employment objectives are to be achieved; information on progress made in the compilation and analysis of labour market data; and information on measures to promote the establishment and development of small and medium-sized enterprises (SMEs) as well as measures introduced to increase the participation in the labour market of persons in vulnerable situations. The CAS urged the Government to submit a detailed report to the Committee of Experts at its November 2018 session. It also urged the Government to avail itself of ILO technical assistance to adopt and implement without delay an active policy designed to promote full, productive and freely chosen employment, in consultation with the social partners. The CAS called on the ILO, the international community and employers' and workers' organizations to collaborate with the goal of reinforcing the labour administration system in Libya so that full, productive and freely chosen employment could become a reality in the country as soon as possible.

Articles 1 to 3 of the Convention. Implementation of an active employment policy. Consultations with the social partners. The Committee notes from the Government's report, as well as from the 2020 National Report submitted to the Working Group on Universal Periodic Review (the 2020 UPR report), that article 56 of the draft Constitution of Libya states that all citizens have the right to work and the Government strives to create job opportunities through stimulation of the economy, investment promotion and youth employment plans and programmes. The UPR report indicates that the Ministry of Labour and Rehabilitation has worked on the adoption of a package of practical measures to achieve these goals. These include the expansion of training programmes aimed at work in the private sector and of development projects. In addition, the Ministry of Labour is seeking to facilitate work and employment on development projects and in the construction sector, one of the most labour intensive sectors. In partnership with the private sector, the Ministry of Labour has identified a number of promising employment areas in new professions and is encouraging young people to receive training in these fields. In this respect, training initiatives on the use of solar and renewable energy and sea fishing, among others, have been rolled out (document A/HRC/WG.6/36/LBY/1, 18 August 2020, paragraph 42(b)–(d)). The Committee also takes note of the Libya Economic Monitor of the World Bank (WB) of July 2020, which indicates that the Libyan economy has recently been hit by four overlapping shocks: an intensifying conflict that suffocates economic activity; the closure of oil fields, which has placed the country's major income-generating activity largely on hold; decreasing oil prices that reduce income from oil production in surviving fields; and the COVID-19 pandemic, which threatens to further suppress the economy. The 2020 WB report emphasizes that the armed conflict and the blockade of the country's major oil ports and terminals in January 2020 generated the most serious political, economic and humanitarian crisis faced by Libya since 2011. The economic impact had already been felt in 2019 as real GDP growth slowed sharply to 2.5 per cent down from a period of steady recovery during 2017–18. Moreover, the country is expected to suffer from a deep recession in 2020, with GDP projected to shrink by about 41 per cent. The Committee notes that the Government, referring to the special circumstances in the country, requests technical assistance from the Office. The Committee encourages the Government to take the necessary steps to avail itself of ILO technical assistance to enable it to develop, adopt and implement without delay an active national policy designed to promote full, productive and freely chosen employment, in consultation with the social partners. It requests the Government to provide detailed updated information on the measures taken and the progress made in this regard.

Article 2. Employment trends. Labour market information. The Committee notes the estimates provided by the Government regarding employment trends in 2020, in reply to its previous comments According to the Centre of Information and Certification, the working population (aged 15 to 64 years old) is estimated at 4,750,000 (61 per cent of the total population), of whom 70 per cent make up the labour force. The Government adds that 86 per cent of the labour force is employed, while the remaining 14 per cent is seeking employment. In this regard, the Committee notes the statistical information provided by the Government on the number of jobseekers as of 23 March 2020, disaggregated by age, sex, qualifications and region. The Government reports that at that time there were 128,678 jobseekers (56 per cent women) registered in the 76 labour offices. The majority of these jobseekers are registered in the Western (55 per cent) and Central regions (27 per cent). Noting that the Government does not provide information on the nature or impact of measures taken to improve the labour market information system, the Committee reiterates its request in this regard. It also reiterates its request that the Government indicate the manner in which the labour market information obtained is used, in collaboration with the social partners, for the formulation, implementation, evaluation and modification of active labour market measures. The Committee further requests the Government to continue to provide updated statistics, disaggregated by sex and age, concerning the size and distribution of the labour force, the type and extent of employment, unemployment and visible underemployment.

Promotion of SMEs. In reply to its previous comments, the Committee notes the Government's indication that the Ministry of Labour and Rehabilitation pays attention to the principle of partnership with the private sector, in compliance with the UN Sustainable Development Goals (SDGs). It also seeks to take different national initiatives in areas which strengthen capacity building in the Libyan labour market through measures and means which are suitable for this current phase. The Government refers to the implementation of several programmes and projects by the Financial Support Fund, reactivated under Decree No. 237 of 2018 of the Ministry of Labour, to create job opportunities for job seekers through promoting different economic activities, together with the social partners. In 2020, the Financial Support Fund formulated an operational plan of action under the general executive programme to fund economic projects. In addition, several memoranda of understanding (MoUs) regarding the funding of small and medium-size enterprises (SMEs) were concluded to activate the partnership between the private and public sectors with a view to increasing employment opportunities. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide detailed updated information on the nature and the impact of the measures taken to create an enabling environment for sustainable enterprises, particularly for small and medium-size enterprises, as well as other entrepreneurship opportunities that can contribute to income-generation opportunities and generate employment.

Employment of women. The Committee notes the Government's indication in its 2020 UPR Report that women make up a large proportion of the national workforce in all areas, and that this proportion is increasing annually. The Government states that, according to official statistics, women represent 37 per cent of the workforce, while the proportion of women working in leadership roles and in the judiciary has increased (document A/HRC/WG.6/36/LBY/1, paragraph 63). The Committee also notes the information provided by the Government with respect to the measures taken to increase the labour force participation rate of women, including in managerial and decision-making positions across all economic sectors. In particular, the Government refers to the establishment of the women's support and empowerment unit pursuant to Decree No. 210 of 2016. The Government adds that several women's empowerment units have been set up in various ministries. The Government also refers to a campaign aimed at combating violence against women with the participation of the Women's Support and Empowerment Unit. In the framework of this campaign, several recommendations were formulated, which are currently being carried out within the strategic plan of the Unit. The recommendations include establishing a 30 per cent quota of women in leadership positions, an obligation of providing a conducive environment for persons with special needs and women with disabilities in state institutions, a working group to conduct a study on violence against women in the work environment. Furthermore, the Government indicates that it envisages formulating policies aimed at increasing women's representation in political life, which remains weak. Lastly, the Government reports that, according to statistics issued by the Documentation and Information Centre on 17 June 2020, a total of 1,127,730 women were employed in the public sector. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide detailed updated information on the nature of the measures taken to increase the participation of women in the labour market, including in managerial and decision-making positions in both the public and private sectors. It also requests the Government to provide detailed updated information on the impact of such measures, including updated statistical data, disaggregated by age, sex and economic sector or occupation.

Persons with disabilities. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to provide updated detailed information on the impact of active employment measures taken to promote the employment of persons with both mental and physical disabilities. It further requested the Government to provide updated statistics disaggregated by age and sex, indicating the number of persons with disabilities employed in the public and private sectors. The Government refers to the implementation of the strategic objectives of the Persons with Disabilities Support and Empowerment Unit under the Ministry of Labour and Rehabilitation. The strategic objectives include the provision of training and rehabilitation to persons with disabilities and the establishment of effective communication mechanisms between employers and jobs seekers with disabilities. The Government also refers to, among other activities, the launching of awareness-raising campaigns on the rights of persons with disabilities addressed to the social partners and the creation of a database on persons with disabilities of working age. The Government reports that as of 2020, there are 236 persons with disabilities working in the public sector, of whom 68 are women. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide detailed updated information, including statistics disaggregated by sex and age, on the nature and the impact of measures adopted or envisaged to promote the employment of workers with disabilities on the open labour market, and in particular measures aiming to increase the numbers and proportion of women with disabilities in employment.

Migrant workers. The Committee notes the Government's indication that special efforts have been undertaken by the Ministry of Labour and Rehabilitation in collaboration with numerous countries to identify migrant and casual workers working in the informal economy, with a view to protecting their rights in conformity with international conventions. Moreover, the Government refers to the adoption of a national strategy for the development of human resources aimed at providing guidance and counselling to new migrant workers entering the Libyan labour market. The Committee notes that, in its 2019 concluding observations of 8 May 2019, the UN Committee on the Protection of the Rights of All Migrant Workers and Members of Their Families (CMW) noted that the Government is in the process of drafting a new labour law aimed at increasing protection of the rights of migrant workers and members of their families. The CMW nevertheless expressed concern about reports that migrant workers and members of their families, who are detained by the Directorate for Combating Illegal Migration, armed groups, smugglers or traffickers, are frequently subjected to forced labour. The Committee also expressed concern at the large number of reports of collusion and complicity of some representatives of State institutions with smuggling and trafficking networks. It also expressed concern that migrants in an irregular situation are frequently not paid for work performed, do not receive the amount of money agreed, or are denounced to the Directorate by their employers after having accomplished their work (document CMW/C/LBY/CO/1, paragraphs 12, 26 and 36). The Committee emphasizes that forced or compulsory labour, where it exists, is incompatible with the principle of freely chosen employment set out in Article 1(3) of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information on the steps taken to address reported cases of abuse of migrant workers and their families, including those who are detained by the Directorate for Combating Illegal Migration. It further requests the Government to provide information on the progress made in drafting the new labour law aimed at increasing protection of the rights of migrant workers and their families and the development and adoption of any strategy addressed to tackle irregular migration, and to provide a copy once they are adopted. Finally, the Committee requests the Government to provide updated detailed information on measures taken or envisaged to promote the employment of migrant workers.

COVID-19 pandemic. Socioeconomic impacts. Response and recovery measures. The Committee notes the supplementary information provided by the Government with respect to the response measures it has taken to mitigate the serious effects of the COVID-19 pandemic. The Government indicates that, based on a proposal put forward by the Presidential Council to address the impact of the pandemic, the Libyan-Korean Centre at the Ministry of Labour and Rehabilitation has turned the training line for sewing operators into a production line, under the supervision of the Women's Support and Empowerment Unit in the Ministry of Labour. The Centre manufactures protective masks and contributes to the manufacture of specialized medical apparel for hospitals and health centres in Tripoli and the Southern region. Moreover, the Government indicates that the Women's Support and Empowerment Unit has submitted a proposal for a contingency plan against COVID-19 to the Head of the Government of National Unity which proposes, among other measures, ensuring the availability of adequate food and medical supplies in all regions; and adopting urgent measures to provide support to displaced families and for groups in need of health and nutritional care and assistance. In this context, recalling the comprehensive guidance provided by international labour standards, the Committee wishes to draw the Government's attention to the Employment and Decent Work for Peace and Resilience Recommendation, 2017 (No. 205), which provides guidelines for developing and implementing effective, consensus-based and inclusive responses to the profound socio-economic impacts of the pandemic. The Committee invites the Government to provide updated information in its next report on the impact of the global COVID-19 pandemic and the nature and impact of concrete measures taken to address it on the achievement of the objective of full, productive and freely chosen employment.

Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122) (ratification: 1966)

The Committee notes with concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments.

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Implementation of an active employment policy. In its previous comments, the Committee expressed the hope that the Government would soon be in a position to report progress in the formulation and implementation of an employment policy. In this regard, the Committee notes with interest the Government's indications that Act No. 2015-040 of 9 December 2015 determining the orientation of the National Employment and Vocational Training Policy (PNEFP) has been adopted and is the subject of an awareness-raising campaign. It adds that the National Plan of Action for Employment and Training (PANEF) has been replaced by the Operational Plan of Action (PAO), which contains the various policy priorities implemented by the PNEFP. The Government indicates that the objective of the PNEFP, together with the implementation of the General State Policy (PGE), the National Development Plan (PND) and the Sustainable Development Objective (ODD), is to eradicate unemployment and underemployment by 2020 through the creation of sufficient numbers of formal jobs to absorb jobseekers. The PNEFP also has the goal of establishing a relevant information system on the labour market and vocational training and of designing and introducing a harmonized system of certification and training. The Government adds that four employment fairs were organized in December 2015 and that 1,119 young school-leavers were trained and integrated into small-scale rural occupations within the context of a partnership with UNESCO. Also in relation to employment promotion, the Government reports two "Rapid Results" initiatives of the Ministry of Employment, Technical Education and Vocational Training (MEETFP), which it indicates have been fully achieved. The first initiative focused on the matching of training and employment in 12 growth sectors. The second established a vocational training centre in the town of Andranofeno Sud with a view to employment generation. The centre provides training to around 100 students in six main areas: tourism, hotels and catering, agriculture and livestock, wood art and trades, automobile mechanics, construction and public works. The Government adds that 1,058 rural young school-leavers have been trained in 15 types of trades in several regions and that 59 persons with disabilities were trained by the National Training Centre for Persons with Disabilities (CNFPPSH) in the regions of Analanjirofo and Sava. The National Employment and Training Observatory has been transformed into the National Employment and Training Office. With regard to the upgrading of technical education and vocational training, the Government reports the rehabilitation in 2015 of five technical and vocational schools, 60 classrooms and the accreditation of 97 public and private technical establishments. The Government adds that four vocational training centres for women are now operational. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on any developments relating to the implementation of the National Employment and Vocational Training Policy, as well as on its impact on the employment rate and the reduction of unemployment, and on the transition from the informal economy to the formal economy. The Committee once again requests the Government to provide information to enable it to examine the manner in which the main components of economic policy, in such areas as monetary, budgetary, trade or regional development policies, contribute "within the framework of a coordinated economic and social policy" to the achievement of the employment objectives set out in the Convention. The Committee also requests the Government to provide updated information on the measures adopted or envisaged to create lasting employment, reduce underemployment and combat poverty, particularly for specific categories of workers, such as women, young people, persons with disabilities, rural workers and workers in the informal economy. In this regard, it requests the Government to provide further information on the types of training provided by the CNFPPSH to persons with disabilities.

Coordination of education and training policy with employment policy. The Committee notes with interest that, under the terms of section 2 of the PNEFP, its objective is the implementation of a policy for massive job creation and the promotion of vocational training. Section 10 of the PNEFP specifies that the policy includes in particular activities for employment creation, enterprise support, labour market mediation, the direct promotion of employment for young persons, women and vulnerable categories, the promotion of decent work and the extension of social security. In section 5, it establishes the right to training and qualifications irrespective of a person's individual and social situation and educational level. The Committee further notes that section 46 calls for the creation of partnership between the State, territorial communities and technical and financial partners with a view to launching and financing employment promotion action for young persons, women and disadvantaged categories of workers. The Government indicates that the action taken for youth employment includes, on the one hand, the promotion of self-employment and traditional or informal enterprises and, on the other, support for integration into enterprises and traditional activities. The objectives of this action include support for young persons in their vocational projects and the reinforcement of financing capacities. The Ministry provides training to young persons with a view to promoting self-employment and the creation of small and medium-sized enterprises and industry. During the course of 2015 and the first half of 2016, training of this type was provided to 1,436 young persons from six regions. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on the results of the action taken to ensure the coordination of vocational education and training policy with employment policy. It once again requests the Government to indicate the results achieved through the implementation of these programmes in terms of the access of qualified young persons to lasting employment. The Committee further requests the Government to indicate the impact of the measures taken to promote the creation of small and medium-sized enterprises.

Compilation and use of employment data. The Government indicates that the Periodic Household Survey was commenced and then replaced by the global population census in light of the State's priorities due to the significant increase in the population. However, it reports the preparation of a partnership project with the International Labour Office with a view to establishing a system of reliable databases on employment. The National Employment and Training Office will be responsible for the management of the system. The Government adds that in 2016 the MEETFP started to establish Regional Employment Services (SRIE) in Regional Departments, and that there are now SRIEs in nine Regional Departments and that they are responsible for managing the regional employment information system, which involves matching young jobseekers and enterprises. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the progress achieved by the project in the establishment of a system of reliable databases on employment. It also requests the Government to provide further information on the impact of the SRIEs in relation to the compilation and use of employment data.

Article 3. Participation of the social partners in the formulation and implementation of policies. The Government indicates that a National Agreement on Employment and Vocational Training was concluded with the social partners in October 2015 and with enterprise groups in the five priority areas in November 2015. The Government also reports the conclusion of two other agreements including the social partners, namely the agreement on the financing of the Technical Support Team for the PNEFP and the agreement on the fund for its implementation. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing updated information on the consultations held with the representatives of the social partners on the subjects covered by the Convention. The Committee once again requests the Government to provide detailed information on the consultations held with the representatives of the most disadvantaged categories of the population, and particularly with the representatives of workers in rural areas and the informal economy.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Fee-Charging Employment Agencies Convention (Revised), 1949 (No. 96) (ratification: 1964)

The Committee notes the Government's report. It also notes the observations of the Free Confederation of Mauritanian Workers (CLTM), received on 12 June 2019, as well as the information provided by the Government in reply to these observations, received on 21 October 2019.

Part II of the Convention Progressive abolition of fee-charging employment agencies conducted with a view to profit. In its observations, the CLTM alleges a lack of transparency in the recruitment of workers by employment agencies conducted with a view to profit, indicating that intermediary structures, such as unofficial employment agencies, benefit from the indifference or even complicity of the authorities and allow for workers to be deceived. The CLTM mentions, in particular, domestic servants who were allegedly mistreated, abused and regarded as slaves after being recruited by an employment agency to work in the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia. The Committee notes that the Government is silent on the CLTM's observations alleging that women domestic workers recruited by an employment agency to work in the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia have been subjected to conditions akin to slavery. In this regard, the Committee notes the concerns expressed by the Committee on the Protection of the Rights of All Migrant Workers and Members of their Families, at its 308th meeting concerning the consideration of the initial report of Mauritania that, according to the information available to the Committee, "around 900 women working in the Gulf countries are victims of trafficking" (CMW/C/SR.308, 11 April 2016, paragraph 7; see also the Concluding observations on the initial report of Mauritania, CMW/C/MRT/CO/1, 31 May 2016, paragraph 30). The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments with respect to the observations made by the CLTM in respect of domestic workers recruited to work abroad.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Mozambique

Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122) (ratification: 1996)

The Committee notes with concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments.

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Formulation and implementation of an active employment policy. The Committee notes with interest that following ILO technical assistance, Mozambique adopted a National Employment Policy (NEP) in 2016. The NEP's principle objectives are: to promote job creation, entrepreneurship and sustainable employment to contribute towards the economic and social development of the country and the well-being of the population. The NEP includes, among its main targets, the creation of new jobs (particularly in the private sector); implementation of programmes contributing to increased productivity, competitiveness and the development of human capital; establishment of the institutional conditions necessary to improve the functioning of the labour market; and ensuring the harmonization of sectoral policies as well as an institutional framework for employment and self-employment. The Committee notes the publication of the Fourth National Poverty Assessment in 2016, which places the national poverty rates in the range of about 41 per cent to 45 per cent of the population (representing between 10.5 and 11.3 million extremely poor people). The report also states that, due to the concentration of Mozambique's workforce in subsistence agriculture and low productivity informal enterprises, the country is characterized by high levels of individual and household vulnerability, particularly in rural zones in the north and central areas of the country. The Committee requests the Government to provide comprehensive information on the results achieved and the challenges encountered in attaining the objectives established in the NEP, particularly on the outcome of the programmes established to stimulate growth and economic development, raise working and living standards, respond to labour market needs and address unemployment and underemployment.

Article 2(a). Collection and use of labour market information. The Committee notes the development of the Household Survey by the National Statistics Institute (INE) 2014–15. It observes that, according to statistical information included in the Employment Policy report, in 2015 the unemployment rate was 25.3 per cent. The main source of employment was self-employment (73.1 per cent of the economically active population (EAP)), while wage employment represented 20 per cent of the EAP. In addition, 15 per cent of the EAP was employed as unpaid family workers (8.5 per cent were men and 21 per cent were women), 7.3 per cent were temporary workers and 9 per cent were casual workers. The Committee also notes that the NEP calls for the improvement of the country's labour market information system. The Committee requests the Government to provide up-to-date information, including statistical data disaggregated by economic sector, sex and age, on the current situation and trends regarding the active population, employment, unemployment and underemployment throughout the country.

Youth employment. The Committee notes that the NEP's principal targets include promoting investment to create employment for young women and men and stimulating professional training and labour mobility for young people. To achieve these objectives the NEP sets out lines of action that call for promoting youth entrepreneurship through training programmes, particularly in rural areas, as well as increasing access to credit; investing in youth training and increasing the number of traineeships. The Government indicates that in 2015 awareness-raising conferences on Pre-occupational Traineeship Regulations were held at the national and provincial levels to encourage enterprises to engage trainees. In addition, the Government refers to the establishment of financial programmes to support entrepreneurial initiatives developed by young people. The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information on the manner in which the implementation of the NEP, the Pre-occupational Traineeship Regulations and other programmes providing education and vocational training for young persons or supporting entrepreneurship of young women and men have increased access of young people to full, productive and sustainable employment.

Women's employment. The Committee notes that the NEP calls for strengthened initiatives promoting gender equality in economic and social development programmes. The lines of action set out in the NEP include: promoting women's employment, including in traditionally male occupations; prioritizing education and vocational training with a view to promoting equal employment opportunities for women and men; and eliminating gender discrimination in access to employment. The Committee requests the Government to provide updated detailed information on the results of the specific measures adopted and implemented under the NEP to promote equal employment and income opportunities for women and men and to eliminate the gender gap in education, particularly in relation to literacy rates.

Education and vocational training. The Committee previously requested the Government to provide information on the results achieved under the Employment and Vocational Training Strategy (EEFP) 2006–15 and the Integrated Programme for Vocational Education Reform (PIREP). The Committee notes from the Employment Policy report that access to secondary education is limited and the completion rate remains very low at 13 per cent. The report adds that the relevance of education and vocational training to the needs of the labour market is also very low. The Government indicates that reforms have been introduced in the areas of education and vocational training to address these challenges. In particular, the Government refers to the adoption of the Vocational Education Law in the framework of the PIREP, which provides that the National Authority for Vocational Training, whose executive board includes representatives of the social partners, is the body responsible for the Vocational Training System. Moreover, vocational training centres and technical institutes in the country have been renovated. Finally, the Government indicates that in 2014, in the framework of the EEFP, 2,490,672 jobs (464,413 for women) were created and 633,971 people participated in the training (219,260 women). The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information, including statistical information disaggregated by age and sex, on the impact of the measures taken in the area of education and vocational training and on their relationship to prospective employment opportunities.

Article 3. Consultations with the social partners. The Committee notes that, prior to its adoption, the NEP was examined by the social partners within the Labour Advisory Commission in May 2016. Moreover, the Employment Policy establishes that the Labour Advisory Commission and the Development Observatory are the bodies entrusted with the responsibility of following up on the implementation of the NEP. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide detailed information on the involvement of the social partners in the promotion and implementation of the NEP.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Employment Service Convention, 1948 (No. 88) (ratification: 1949)

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020). The Committee proceeded with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the supplementary information received from the Government and the social partners, as well as on the basis of the information at its disposal in 2019.

The Committee notes the observations made by Business New Zealand (BusinessNZ) and the New Zealand Council of Trade Unions (NZCTU).

Articles 1 and 3 of the Convention. Contribution of the employment service to employment promotion. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to continue to provide information on the measures taken to achieve the best possible organization of the employment market and the results of the measures implemented, including the impact of the welfare reforms on the quality of employment services and employment promotion. The Committee notes that the Government reiterates its commitment to improving well-being and living standards in the country, including through the development of an Economic Strategy and an Employment Strategy, the latter setting out the Government's vision for the labour market and providing a roadmap for a series of action plans focused on improving employment outcomes for population groups experiencing poor labour market outcomes (Māori, Pacific people, youth and persons with disabilities). Consultations on the reform to the vocational education and welfare systems have started in 2019 and the Ministry of Sustainable Development is currently working through the May 2019 recommendations of the Welfare Expert Advisory Group on resourcing and strengthening the provision of employment support through the welfare system. The Government further points to the Social Security Amendment Act (No. 2) 2015, as well as the Social Security (Extension of Young Persons Services and Remedial Matters) Amendment Act 2016, which uses community-based providers to deliver wrap-around support to help young people into work, education or training. It also informs about the functioning of several welfare programmes including the Mana in Mahi programme targeted towards young people aged between 18 and 24 years, as well as to the NEET service that is addressed to 16- and 17-year-olds that are not in education, employment or training. The Government highlights that its priority consists in supporting people to achieve meaningful and sustainable employment, while also recognising the value of unpaid work, such as caring for children and other family members and community-based volunteering. The Committee notes that in its supplementary report, the Government refers to several measures taken to respond to the economic impact of COVID-19, including wage subsidies accessible to the majority of employers, leave support and immediate access to benefits. The Government further indicates that the Regional Skills Leadership Groups established in 2019 have been supplemented with additional interim offices to ensure that the immediate labour market and skills needs of the regions are met.

The Committee further notes that BusinessNZ observes that Work and Income, the public employment service, is perceived by many employers as providing job applicants who are less qualified and reliable than those found elsewhere and that employers choose instead to advertise their own job vacancies. BusinessNZ also voices concerns as to the employability of individuals trained solely in training institutions and lacking on-site experience, pointing to problems inherent in the proposals to reform the education and training system. In its additional observations, BusinessNZ maintains that the manner in which wage subsidies have been established does not necessarily assist smaller employers in difficult situations as a result of the pandemic. The NZCTU expresses concern that the welfare reforms are focused on reducing the number of beneficiaries and not on the quality and sustainability of employment. It considers that more emphasis should be placed on a set of active labour market employment policies. In their additional observations, the NZCTU alleges that some employers might have used benefits without complying with labour legislation. In view of the concerns raised, the Committee requests the Government to provide updated detailed information on the nature and impact of measures taken to achieve the best possible organization of the employment market, particularly in the framework of the measures taken to address and mitigate the effects of the COVID-19 pandemic. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on any measures taken or envisaged to render the public employment service more appealing to employers in the country, so as to ensure that the employment service contributes to the fullest extent possible to the achievement and maintenance of full and productive employment.

Articles 4 and 5. Cooperation of workers' and employers' representatives. The Committee previously requested the Government to indicate the manner in which consultations are held with regard to the matters covered by the Convention. The Committee notes the Government's indication that advisory committees and working groups are set up for high-level projects. It welcomes the detailed information provided on the Welfare Expert Advisory Group (WEAG) established in May 2018 to provide advice and recommendations on the future of New Zealand's social security system in consultation with key stakeholder groups (Iwi and Māori, Pacific Peoples and persons with disabilities. The Government also refers to the consultation group for the temporary migrant worker exploitation review, composed of representatives from business, unions, migrants and international students, as well as to the New Zealand Disability Strategy Revision Reference Group, the majority of whose members are persons with disabilities. The Committee notes, however, that according to BusinessNZ, the WEAG seems to have focused more on the provision of social welfare than employment, with no direct employer input in the expert group. The NZCTU, for its part, acknowledges the establishment of the WEAG, but suggests that there are failures in implementing its recommendations. It also considers that more focus should be given to active labour market employment policies and commends the Government's efforts to set up a tripartite working group on the Future of Work. In view of the observations of the social partners, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the implementation of the recommendations provided by the WEAG as well as information on the manner in which the Government cooperates with workers' and employers' representatives in the development of the employment service policy and other matters covered by the Convention.

Article 6(b)(iv) and (c). Migrant workers. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to provide information on the measures taken to facilitate any movement of workers from one country to another. The Committee notes the Government's indication that it has developed and proposed changes to immigration settings to ensure that the immigration system supports the country's economy and labour market, including better matching the skills needed with those available through immigration, ensuring that temporary work visas are granted for genuine regional shortages and investing in immigration compliance capability. The Government is currently considering changes to employer-assisted visas with focus on employers placing more nationals into jobs and ensuring that temporary migrant workers are not exploited in employment and have wages and working conditions consistent with national values. There is also an in-depth policy and operational review ongoing to better understand temporary migrant worker exploitation and identify impactful and enduring solutions, as well as many other initiatives related to migrant exploitation (increased immigration fees and levies, migrant sex workers research and the restoration of the right to prescribed rest and meal breaks for migrant workers through the 2018 amendment of the Employment Relations Act). The Government also informs that it has replaced the employer-assisted post-study work visa with a post-study work visa providing open work rights for international students of a certain qualification level. The Committee notes that in its supplementary report, the Government refers to the "Visitor Care Manaaki Manuhiri (Assistance for Foreign Nationals Impacted by COVID-19) Programme" that consists of in-kind assistance to migrant workers that experience serious financial hardship and are unable to meet their basic needs. Furthermore, the Government has allocated $50 million to address temporary migrant exploitation, as it is estimated that migrants are at increased risk during the pandemic. Measures include an improved system to report exploitation and an information and education action plan for migrants and employers on their rights and obligations.

The Committee notes the observations of BusinessNZ, indicating that the migrant worker situation is currently in a state of flux, with many employers unable to find the skilled or unskilled workers they need. It further suggests that while the Government's focus on employing nationals is understandable, migrant workers are urgently needed and accessing their skills is proving difficult given the current immigration delays. BusinessNZ adds that ,while more cases of migrant exploitation are currently before the courts, the majority involve migrant exploitation by migrant employers who are unfamiliar with or reluctant to observe the country's laws. BusinessNZ refers in its additional observations to the difficulties that employers have in finding workers in agriculture and horticulture, sectors that depend highly on immigration due to border restrictions. Taking due note of the information provided and in view of the concerns expressed by BusinessNZ, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the impact of the immigration system reform on the movement of workers from one country to another and on the employment of migrant workers in practice particularly in the framework of the measures taken to address and mitigate the negative effects of the COVID-19 pandemic. The Government is requested to provide statistics on the employment situation of migrant workers, including those benefitting from a post-study work visa.

Finally, the Committee invites the Government to provide updated information in its next report on the impact of the global COVID-19 pandemic on the implementation of the measures taken or contemplated to give effect to the provisions of the Employment Service Convention, 1948 (No. 88).

Employment Service Convention, 1948 (No. 88) (ratification: 1961)

The Committee notes with concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments.

Articles 1 and 3 of the Convention. Contribution of the employment service to employment promotion. The Committee notes with interest the adoption of the revised National Employment Policy (NEP) on 19 July 2017, which provides for a range of improvements to the employment service system. In particular, the Committee welcomes section 4.7.6 of the NEP, in which the Government undertakes to improve the collection, processing and analysis of employment statistics and other labour market information for purposes, inter alia, of improved employment and social development planning, and with the objective of establishing and maintaining functional and timely information regarding job vacancies, sectoral changes, geographical imbalances and other labour and income trends. The Committee further notes that, pursuant to section 4.7.7 of the NEP, the Government, through the Federal Ministry of Labour and Employment (FMLE), is to establish a minimum of two community employment centres (CECs) in all 744 local government areas in the country. The CECs are to provide a full range of employment services to jobseekers in rural and urban communities in the country, including training, referrals, career counselling and information on job vacancies. The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information on the measures taken or envisaged to implement the provisions of the NEP and its accompanying employment matrix, relating to the structure and functioning of the employment service. The Committee also requests the Government to provide updated information, including statistical information disaggregated by age and sex, on the number and location of public employment offices, including the CECs established in the different areas of the country, the number of new staff recruited, the number of applications for employment received, the number of vacancies notified and the number of persons placed in employment by such offices. The Government is requested to indicate the manner in which the employment service, in collaboration with other public and private bodies concerned, ensures the best possible organization of the labour market with a view to the achievement and maintenance of full, productive and freely chosen employment.

Articles 4 and 5. Consultations with the social partners. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the social partners, along with other stakeholders, participated in the review and validation of the revised NEP and its accompanying implementation matrix prior to its adoption by the Federal Executive Council in July 2017. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged to give effect to the provisions of Article 4, which requires arrangements to be made through one or more national advisory committees – and where necessary regional and local committees – for the cooperation of the social partners in the organization and operation of the employment service and the development of related policy. In this context, and referring once again to its previous comments, the Committee reiterates its request that the Government provide information on consultations held in the National Labour Advisory Board on the organization and operation of the employment exchanges and professional and executive registries, as well as on the development and implementation of employment service policies and programmes.

Article 6. Organization of the employment service. The Government reports that some of the employment exchanges and the professional and executive registries in Nigeria have been upgraded to model job centres. It adds that the services provided by the exchanges have been upgraded and their facilities computerized, enabling them to replace manual registration of jobseekers with an electronic platform linked to the National Electronic Labour Exchange (NELEX), enabling jobseekers and employers to meet online and access employment services. The Committee requests the Government to provide updated detailed information, including statistical information on the impact of reorganization and restructuring of the employment services under the revised NEP. The Committee further requests the Government to provide up-to-date information on the operation of the job centres and their contribution towards meeting the needs of employers and workers, particularly in those regions of the country with high levels of unemployment. The Government is also requested to provide updated information in its next report on progress made regarding the establishment of CECs in all 744 local government areas of the country, as called for under the NEP, as well as on other measures taken or envisaged to respond to the needs of employers and workers in all geographical regions of the country.

Article 7. Particular categories of jobseekers. The Committee welcomes the provisions in sections 4.7.3 and 4.7.4 in the revised NEP, in which the Government undertakes to develop and implement a range of measures to ensure the greater participation of women in the workforce and the full employability of persons with disabilities, respectively. In respect of the employment of women, the Committee notes that the federal and state Governments are to develop self-employment promotion programmes for women, especially in rural communities, and the Federal Ministry of Women's Affairs and Social Development, together with related state ministries and local government councils, shall establish mentorship programmes and gender-specific career counselling in the 744 local government areas (NEP, section 4.7.3). In relation to the employment of persons with disabilities, section 4.7.4 of the NEP provides, inter alia, that the Government will facilitate the passage of a draft law on persons with disabilities and establish vocational rehabilitation centres to develop and enhance the skills and potential of persons with disabilities. The Committee requests the Government to provide comprehensive updated information on measures taken to promote women's employment, particularly in rural communities, including information on the mentorship and gender-specific career counselling services provided in the local government areas, specifying the involvement of the employment service in this respect. The Committee further requests the Government to provide detailed information on measures taken or envisaged to give full effect to the provisions of section 7.7.4 of the NEP, including providing a copy of the law on persons with disabilities once it is adopted. The Committee recalls that the Government may avail itself of technical assistance with regard to the achievement of these objectives.

Article 8. Employment of young persons. The Committee notes the focus in section 4.7.1 of the NEP on job creation for young persons, particularly in the agricultural sector. In particular, the Government contemplates providing temporary employment for 500,000 graduates annually in the areas of education, agriculture, health and taxes. Referring once again to its previous comments, the Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information on the impact of the measures taken by the employment service to assist young persons in securing suitable employment, as well as information on the impact of measures taken by the National Directorate of Employment and the National Poverty Eradication Programme in this respect. The Government is also requested to provide information on the specific measures taken to implement the provisions of the NEP on youth entrepreneurship – including training and facilitating access to credit, insurance and other financial services – and skills acquisition for unemployed youth. It further requests the Government to provide information on the specific services and activities offered by the employment service in relation to the achievement of the objectives set out in section 4.7.1 of the NEP of generating employment opportunities and promoting skills acquisition for young persons.

Article 10. Measures to encourage the full use of employment service facilities. The Government indicates that private employment agencies (PEAs) are encouraged to advertise all job vacancies on the NELEX platform. In addition, it envisages taking steps to raise public awareness of the activities of the employment exchanges and the NELEX platform. The Committee reiterates its previous request that the Government provide detailed information on the measures taken or envisaged by the employment services, with the cooperation of the social partners, to encourage the full use of employment service facilities. The Government is requested to provide specific examples of activities conducted to reach out to the local workforce in various geographical regions of the country.

Article 11. Cooperation between public and private employment agencies not conducted with a view to profit. The Committee notes the provisions of the NEP concerning the regulation of the activities of PEAs operating in the country. In particular, the Government, through the FMLE, undertakes to ensure adequate protection for the workers placed by such agencies. The Government reports that annual capacity-building workshops carried out with PEAs have strengthened existing cooperation between the employment service and PEAs. It adds that the workshops have resulted in improved compliance by PEAs with statutory provisions and have raised their awareness of decent work principles. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide updated information on the measures taken or envisaged to ensure effective cooperation between the public employment service and PEAs not conducted with a view to profit, including information on the content and outcome of the annual capacity building workshops for such agencies.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Vocational Rehabilitation and Employment (Disabled Persons) Convention, 1983 (No. 159) (ratification: 2010)

The Committee notes with concern that the Government's report has not been received. It hopes that the next report will contain full information on the matters raised in its previous comments.

Articles 1–4 of the Convention. National policy. Promoting opportunities in the open labour market for persons with disabilities. The Committee notes that the Government's report fails to address most of the issues raised in its previous comments regarding the application of the Convention since its ratification. The Committee noted the Government's indications concerning a draft bill that was then before the National Assembly and which intended to ensure full integration of Nigerians with disability into society. Moreover, despite a comprehensive National Policy on the Rehabilitation of Persons with Disabilities, including implementation strategies, the Government states in a very brief report that it had ensured at least 2 per cent of the workforce for suitably qualified persons with disabilities; additionally, that letters of recommendations have been issued in order to enable persons with disabilities to be gainfully employed; that economic empowerment programmes have been organized, and that mobility aids and appliances have been distributed. Moreover, the Government indicates that it has endeavoured to ensure availability of vocational rehabilitation to all categories of persons with disabilities. The Committee renews its request for full information on the matters raised in its previous comments, particularly specific information on the status of the draft bill. The Committee requests the Government to provide full information on the implementation of the National Policy on the Rehabilitation of Persons with Disabilities. Please also provide relevant information on the application of the Convention, including statistical information disaggregated, as much as possible, by age, sex and nature of the disability, as well as extracts from reports and studies or inquiries on the matters covered by the Convention.

Article 5. Consultations. The Committee once again requests the Government to describe in detail the manner in which representative organizations of employers and workers, and representative organizations of and for persons with disabilities are consulted in practice regarding the implementation of the vocational rehabilitation and employment policy for persons with disabilities.

Articles 7 and 9. Services for persons with disabilities. Qualified staff for persons with disabilities. The Government indicates that it ensures that persons engaged in providing and evaluating vocational guidance, vocational training, placement, employment and other related services to persons with disabilities have adequate knowledge of disabilities and their limiting effects, as well as integrating them into active economic and social life. The Committee requests the Government to describe the measures taken or envisaged with a view to providing and evaluating vocational guidance and vocational training services for persons with all types of disabilities, and to indicate whether existing services for workers are being used with necessary adaptations. The Committee renews its request to the Government to provide further information on the number of persons trained and qualified staff made available to persons with disabilities.

Article 8. Rural areas and remote communities. The Government indicates that, in rural and remote communities, trainable persons with disabilities are attached to local craftsmen such as tailors, hairstylists, barbers, vulcanizers. The Committee once again requests the Government to describe the measures taken to promote the establishment and development of vocational rehabilitation and employment services for persons with disabilities in rural areas and remote communities.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Sierra Leone

Employment Service Convention, 1948 (No. 88) (ratification: 1961)

The Committee welcomes the Government's reply to the comments it has been making for many years in relation to the application of the Convention.

Articles 3, 4 and 5. Contribution of the employment service to employment promotion. Consultation with the social partners. The Committee recalls that, in its 2004 report, the Government indicated that it proposed to strengthen the employment services and that legislation in this regard had been included on the agenda of the Joint Advisory Commission for discussion. In its comments made initially in 2004, the Committee requested the Government to describe the manner in which the employment services reforms mentioned by the Government in its 2004 report, have contributed to securing their essential duty, which is to ensure "the best possible organization of the employment market as an integral part of the national programme for the achievement and maintenance of full employment and the development and use of productive resources" (Article 1 of the Convention), in cooperation with the social partners (Articles 4 and 5). It also requested the Government to provide statistical information on the number of public employment offices established, the number of applications for employment received, the number of vacancies notified and the number of persons placed in employment by these offices (Part IV of the report form). The Committee notes the information provided by the Government in respect of the functions of the Ministry of Labour and Social Security (MLSS), particularly in the areas of manpower planning and human resource development, developing and implementing employment and labour market policies, addressing the needs of disadvantaged groups and industrial training. The Committee further notes the Government's indication that there are six employment exchange centres in the country, but that there are insufficient resources to enable the establishment of additional centres. In addition, the Committee notes the Government's indication that the Joint Consultative Committee, composed of workers', employers' and Government representatives, meets regularly at national level to discuss employment policy, in particular labour and employment issues. The Government does not provide information on the employment services reforms or the proposed legislation on employment services, nor does it provide the statistical information requested. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to communicate updated detailed information with regard to the employment service reforms undertaken, including the development of relevant legislation, and the manner in which these reforms have contributed to the objectives set out in Article 1 of the Convention. It further requests the Government to provide updated statistical data compiled concerning the number of public employment offices established, the number of applications for employment received, the number of vacancies notified and the number of persons placed in employment by such offices. It also requests the Government to provide further details regarding the functioning of the Joint Consultative Committee (JCC). In particular, the Government is requested to provide updated detailed information in relation to consultations within the JCC concerning the development of employment services legislation and policy, as well as in relation to discussions held within the JCC with respect to the provisions of the Convention more generally. It also invites the Government to consider the possibility of establishing regional or local advisory committees as contemplated in Article 4(2).

Article 7. Particular categories of jobseekers. The Committee notes the Government's indication that special preference is given to persons with disabilities in terms of shortlisting for certain positions. The Government is requested to provide information on the nature and impact of this measure, indicating the positions to which this preference is applied. The Committee further requests the Government to communicate information on any other measures taken to give effect to this Article of the Convention.

Article 11. Cooperation between the public employment service and private employment agencies. The Government indicates that a coordination gap exists between the public employment service and private employment agencies. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on measures taken or envisaged at the national and regional levels to secure effective cooperation between the public employment service and private employment agencies not conducted with a view to profit.

Part V of the report form. Application in practice. The Government reports that there are six employment exchange centres at regional level and that there has been a devolution of functions to these entities. The Government indicates that there are inadequate resources to permit establishing additional employment centres in the country, particularly in underdeveloped areas. The Committee notes that the Government does not provide information on the nature or impact of the employment services reforms to which it referred in its 2004 report, nor on the manner in which the employment services ensure "the best possible organization of the labour market as an integral part of the national programme for the achievement and maintenance of full employment and the development and use of productive resources", as required under Article 1 of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed updated information on the nature and impact of measures taken to ensure the establishment of a network of employment offices sufficient in number to serve each geographical area of the country. The Committee reminds the Government that it can avail itself of the technical assistance of the Office if it so wishes.

Direct requests

In addition, requests regarding certain matters are being addressed directly to the following States: Convention No. 2 (Morocco, Myanmar); Convention No. 88 (Belize, Guinea-Bissau, Lebanon, Libya, Lithuania, Madagascar, Malaysia, Mauritius, Mongolia, Mozambique, Netherlands, Netherlands: Aruba, Caribbean Part of the Netherlands and Sint Maarten, Nicaragua, North Macedonia); Convention No. 96 (Libya, Luxembourg, Mauritania); Convention No. 122 (Barbados, Chad, China, Gabon, Greece, Guinea, Honduras, Iceland, Islamic Republic of Iran, Iraq, Israel, Japan, Lebanon, Mali, Mongolia, Montenegro, Netherlands, Netherlands: Aruba, Caribbean Part of the Netherlands and Sint Maarten, North Macedonia, Norway, Papua New Guinea, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Sri Lanka, Tajikistan); Convention No. 159 (Lebanon, Madagascar, Mali, Malta, Mexico, Mongolia, Netherlands, North Macedonia, Norway); Convention No. 181 (Mongolia, Morocco, Netherlands, North Macedonia).

Paid Educational Leave Convention, 1974 (No. 140) (ratification: 1983)

Articles 2 and 6 of the Convention. Formulation and application of a policy designed to promote the granting of paid educational leave. The Committee recalls that, for many years, it has been requesting the Government to provide information on the measures taken to give effect to the Convention. In its report, the Government provides summaries of court decisions relevant to the granting of paid educational leave in the public service sector. The Government indicates that training in the private sector is undertaken on the basis of a company's needs, such as succession planning, human resource needs and upgrading of technology, whereas training is implemented through scholarships in the public sector. Training is provided on the basis of the projected labour needs of the Government and training opportunities are advertised within the various Ministries and agencies as well as in national newspapers. The Committee once again recalls that the Convention requires the Government to formulate and apply a policy designed to promote, by methods appropriate to national conditions and practice and by stages as necessary, the granting of paid educational leave for the purpose of occupational training at any level, general, social and civil education and trade union education (Article 2) in consultation with the social partners (Article 6). Noting that the information provided in the Government's report does not indicate the manner in which Article 2 of the Convention is given effect, the Committee requests the Government to indicate the content and scope of the policy to promote the granting of paid educational leave for the purposes specified in Article 2 of the Convention and to communicate the texts, including government statements, declarations and other documents, in which the policy is expressed. In addition, the Committee once again reiterates its request that the Government provide full particulars on the measures taken or envisaged in order to give effect to these provisions of the Convention.

Articles 5 and 6. Arrangements for paid educational leave through collective agreements. Consultation with the social partners. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the National Tripartite Committee established in 1993 has constituted a subcommittee to deal with training and placement issues. It adds that there is no information available on the manner in which the public authorities, representative employers' and workers' organizations and institutions providing education or training have been consulted on the formulation and application of the national policy to promote the granting of paid educational leave for the purposes specified in the Convention. The Government states that the social partners make provision for some measure of paid educational leave in the private sector through the bargaining process. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the arrangements to enable the participation of employers' and workers' organizations and institutions providing education or training in the formulation and application of the national policy for the promotion of paid educational leave for the purposes specified in Article 2 of the Convention.

Article 8. Non-discrimination. The Government indicates that training under Article 2(a) includes training for apprentices and groups in vulnerable situations. In this regard, the Committee notes that the Industrial Training Act, Chapter 39:01, referenced in the Government's report, regulates apprenticeships, but that section 3(1) of the Act refers only to male apprentices (boys). The Government does not provide information regarding training for groups in vulnerable situations. The Committee requests the Government to provide information, including statistical data disaggregated by sex, on the apprenticeship training opportunities available to boys and girls. Noting that section 3(1) of the Industrial Training Act could be interpreted to exclude girls, it also invites the Government to consider amending the Act to extend apprenticeships to both male and female apprentices. It also requests the Government to provide particulars regarding the measures taken to ensure that groups in vulnerable situations have access to paid educational leave.

Application of the Convention. Part V of the report form. The Committee requests the Government to provide a general appreciation of the manner in which the Convention is applied, including, for instance, extracts from reports, studies and enquiries, and statistics disaggregated by sex and age on the number of workers granted paid educational leave during the reporting period.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Termination of Employment Convention, 1982 (No. 158) (ratification: 1988)

The Committee notes the information contained in the report of the Government received in September 2020.

The Committee also notes the observations of the General Union of Workers of Cameroon (UGTC), received on 6 November 2020. The Government is requested to provide its comments in this regard.

Article 2 of the Convention. Categories of workers excluded. In its reply to the Committee's previous comments, the Government indicates that with the exception of public servants governed by the General Public Service Regulations, a worker is any person working under the authority of an employer in exchange for remuneration and is protected by the Labour Code of 1992. In its observations, the UGTC asserts that men and women domestic workers are often subject to wrongful dismissal. The Committee once again requests the Government to provide copies of the legislative texts that apply to domestic workers in relation to the Convention. The Committee also requests the Government to provide detailed information on the manner in which it ensures adequate protection in the spheres covered by the Convention to workers in the informal economy. The Committee requests the Government to indicate whether the conditions of employment of public servants afford those concerned protection at least equivalent to that provided for in the Convention.

Article 8. Procedure of appeal. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the observations of the Cameroon United Workers Confederation (CTUC), which considered that the terminations of workers in certain enterprises were not in conformity with the procedure established under national legislation, since no authorization for termination had been sought or granted by the labour inspector. The Government reiterates that the procedure for the dismissal of workers is established in section 34(1) of the Labour Code and the implementing regulations thereto and indicates that field labour inspectors ensure compliance with this provision day and night. The UGTC alleges that although the Government claims that labour inspectors conduct inspections day and night, labour inspectors do not carry out monitoring at night, even though they are allowed to do so by law. Furthermore, according to the UGTC, inspectors wait until complaints from workers reach them before instituting conciliation procedures instead of carrying out preventive monitoring in enterprises. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the application in practice of this Article, including with regard to the procedure for the authorization of terminations.

Article 11. Notice period. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the observations of the CTUC indicating that, in practice, employers terminate the employment of workers without observing the obligation to give a notice period as established by section 34(1) of the Labour Code. The Government refers once again to section 34 of the Labour Code and Order No. 15/MTPS/SG/CJ of 26 May 1993 determining the conditions and duration of the notice period, taking into account the seniority and occupational classification of the worker. The Government indicates that in the event that this provision is violated, the party that feels aggrieved may refer the matter to the labour inspectorate, which, during conciliation, endeavours to reach a solution. The Committee notes that the report of the Government does not reply to the observations of the CTUC. The Committee therefore reiterates its request to the Government to indicate the manner in which it is ensured that workers are provided with reasonable notice of termination.

Article 12(3). Definition of serious misconduct. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that serious misconduct was not defined by the Labour Code but by case law. It notes the Government's indication that serious misconduct is defined in the internal regulations of enterprises and that, in the event of a dispute, the labour inspectorate is sufficiently competent to arbitrate. Nevertheless, in its previous comments the Committee noted the observations of the CTUC that, in national practice, the employer unilaterally defines the degree of seriousness of the misconduct, whereas under Cameroonian law only the judge is empowered to do so. The Committee requests the Government to clarify the question of the definition of serious misconduct in practice. It also reiterates its request to the Government to provide examples of judicial decisions which allow an evaluation of the application of Article 12(3) of the Convention in practice, and the courts' assessment of "serious misconduct".

Articles 12–14. Severance allowance. Consultation of workers' representatives. Terminations of employment for economic, technological, structural or similar reasons. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to indicate whether the dismissed workers had been paid their severance allowance and to provide information on all measures taken to alleviate the adverse effects of dismissals, such as those envisaged in Paragraphs 25 and 26 of the Termination of Employment Recommendation, 1982 (No. 166). The Committee noted that section 40(3) of the Labour Code establishes an obligation for the employer to call a meeting of staff delegates and the labour inspector to try to avoid any termination on economic grounds. It also noted that section 40(9) of the Labour Code provides that any worker whose employment has been terminated shall be given priority status, where skill levels are equal, for two years with regard to recruitment in the same enterprise. The Government indicates in its report that in order to alleviate the adverse effects of dismissals for economic reasons, it encourages employers to use the measures contained in Paragraphs 25 and 26 of Recommendation No. 166. In its observations, the UGTC refers to the dismissal of 14,000 workers by a group of enterprises due the impact of the COVID-19 pandemic, indicating that neither the unions nor the government were notified prior to these dismissals. Furthermore, the UGTC alleges that some were dismissed without being paid their entitlements. The Committee once again requests the Government to send the Office a copy of Order No. 22/MTPS/SG/CJ establishing procedures governing terminations on economic grounds. The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information on the application of these Articles of the Convention, and on the measures taken to alleviate the effects of dismissals for economic or similar reasons, such as those envisaged in Paragraphs 25 and 26 of Recommendation No. 166.

Application of the Convention in practice. COVID-19 pandemic. The Government indicates that as a result of the COVID-19 pandemic, Cameroon recorded 14,000 dismissals for economic reasons in 2020. In reply to the Committee's previous request, the Government indicates that the Minister of Justice is awaiting the judicial decisions allowing an evaluation of the application of Articles 4, 5 and 7 of the Convention and that they will be submitted as soon as possible. It indicates that dismissal procedures were observed for enterprises whose managers were approached by labour inspection services. It informs the Committee that in the Centre and Littoral regions, the total number of conciliation reports is higher than that of partial conciliation and non-conciliation reports. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the application in practice of these Articles, including statistics on the activities of the appeal bodies and the number of terminations on economic grounds. Referring to its previous comments on valid and invalid grounds for termination and the defence procedure prior to termination, the Committee requests the Government to send examples of judicial decisions which allow an evaluation of the application of Articles 4, 5 and 7 of the Convention The Committee also requests the Government to provide detailed information on the impact of the global COVID-19 pandemic on the implementation of the Convention.

Termination of Employment Convention, 1982 (No. 158) (ratification: 2000)

The Committee notes with concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments.

Article 1 of the Convention. For a number of years, the Committee has requested information concerning the ongoing revision of the Industrial Relations Bill which, according to the Government's 2013 report, includes provisions on termination of employment with the objective of giving effect to the Convention. In its reply to the Committee's previous comments, the Government indicates that the draft Industrial Relations Bill is still pending with the Department of Labour and Industrial Relations and is undergoing final technical consultations. The Government adds that the Department of Labour and Industrial Relations Technical Working Committee has carried out various consultations with national stakeholders, such as the Department Attorney General's Office, the Office of the Solicitor General, the Constitution Law Reform Commission, the Department of Personnel Management, the Department of Treasury and the Department of Planning, Trade Commerce and Industry, as well as with external technical partners, including the ILO. Referring to its previous comments, the Committee once again expresses the hope that the Government will take the necessary measures to ensure that the new legislation gives full effect to the provisions of the Convention. It also reiterates its request that the Government provide a detailed report to the ILO and a copy of the legislation as soon as it is enacted, so as to enable the Committee to examine its compliance with the Convention.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Minimum Wage Fixing Convention, 1970 (No. 131) (ratification: 1977)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments.

The Committee notes the observations of the Confederation of Private Employers of Bolivia (CEPB) and the International Organisation of Employers (IOE), received on 26 April and 3 September 2019, as well as those of the International Trade Union Organization (ITUC) received on 1 September 2019.

Follow-up to the conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards (International Labour Conference, 108th Session, June 2019)

The Committee notes that based on its follow-up, in its last comments, of the conclusions of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards (hereinafter Conference Committee) adopted in June 2018 on the application of the Convention, the Conference Committee examined the case for the second time in June 2019.

Articles 3 and 4(1) and (2) of the Convention. Elements for the determination of the level of the minimum wage and full consultation with the social partners. In its last comments, the Committee observed that while the Government stated that consultations were held with the social partners, the CEPB and the IOE claimed the opposite. The Committee also observed that there were divergences between the Government and the above-mentioned employers' organizations regarding the criteria reportedly taken into consideration in determining the minimum wage. In this context, the Committee expressed the firm hope that, in follow-up to the conclusions of the Conference Committee of June 2018, a direct contacts mission would take place without delay with a view to finding a solution to the difficulties faced in the application of the Convention. The Committee notes that, in 2019, the Conference Committee regretted that the Government had not responded to all the Conference Committee's conclusions in 2018, specifically the failure to accept a direct contacts mission. Therefore, in its 2019 conclusions, the Conference Committee once again urged the Government to: (i) carry out full consultations in good faith with the most representative employers' and workers' organizations with regard to minimum wage setting; (ii) take into account when determining the level of the minimum wage the needs of workers and their families, as well as economic factors as set out in Article 3 of the Convention; (iii) avail itself without delay of ILO technical assistance to ensure compliance with the Convention in law and practice; and (iv) accept an ILO direct contacts mission before the 109th Session of the International Labour Conference. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that: (i) a direct contacts mission is not necessary given that no difficulties are faced in the application of the Convention; (ii) the Bolivian Central of Workers (COB) annually presents a list of recommendations containing, among other issues, a proposal of increase in the national minimum wage; (iii) the same cannot be said of the CEPB, since Section 10 of its Statute provides that the confederation shall not assume the legal representation of its members, for the negotiation or settlement of individual labour disputes; (iv) nevertheless, the annual minimum wage increase takes into consideration the positions of workers and employers, with which the Government is promoting regular dialogue, based on good faith and respect, and consultation, as demonstrated by the round-table meetings established with the representatives of the CEPB and the COB; and (v) the determination of the national minimum wage level is based on economic and social factors taking into account inflation and productivity, as well as other economic indicators, inter alia, Gross Domestic Product (GDP), GDP per capita, the consumer price index, economic growth, unemployment rates, market fluctuations and the cost of living. Furthermore, the Committee notes that the CEPB and the IOE reiterate in their last observations, as they had done in the discussion in the Conference Committee, that: (i) the Government maintains dialogue and negotiates with workers' organizations, particularly with the COB, preventing the employers' sector to participate in consultations on the national minimum wage and to formulate proposals and criteria in this regard; and (ii) in fixing the minimum wage, the Government does not take into account objective technical criteria reflecting the economic reality of the country, such as productivity. Finally, the Committee notes that the ITUC, referring to the various social and economic factors taken into account in fixing the minimum wage, indicates that Bolivia is the country that has increased the minimum wage the most over the present decade in Latin America, without affecting the most relevant macroeconomic variables and without inflationary consequences.

The Committee observes that contradictions and divergences persist between the Government and the CEPB concerning the full and good faith consultations with the employers' representative organizations, and the criteria taken into account in determining the minimum wage. In this context, the Committee regrets to note the Government's refusal to accept a direct contacts mission to the country with a view to finding a solution to the difficulties faced in the application of the Convention. Recalling once again that these missions constitute an effective form of dialogue designed to find a positive solution to the issues in question, the Committee expresses the firm hope that the Government will review its position and that a direct contacts mission will take place before the 109th Session of the International Labour Conference, as requested by the Conference Committee.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Minimum Wage-Fixing Machinery Convention, 1928 (No. 26) (ratification: 1963)

The Committee notes the observations of the Trade Union Confederation of Burundi (COSYBU), received on 24 August 2020, as well as the Government's reply.

Article 3 of the Convention. Operation of the minimum wage-fixing machinery. In its previous comments, the Committee recalled that the Labour Code provides that decrees issued by the Minister responsible for labour, after consultation with the National Labour Council (CNT), shall fix wage areas and guaranteed inter-occupational minimum wages (section 74(a)) and that the CNT shall be considering the elements that may serve as a basis for fixing the minimum wage and conducting an annual review of minimum wage rates (section 249(1)). In the absence of information showing that effect has been given to these provisions, the Committee requested the Government to take all the necessary measures to reactivate without delay the minimum wage review process and to provide information in this respect, as well as on the minimum wages applicable by category as fixed by collective agreements in the various branches of activity or in enterprises. The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that the necessary measures to reactivate the minimum wage review process have been taken and, in this connection, a note will be sent to the social partners to put forward their views and proposals. It also notes that the COSYBU is calling on the Government to accelerate the minimum wage review process. In its reply, the Government indicates that: (i) the CNT examined this matter and it was considered necessary to prepare a study on the minimum wage; and (ii) the recruitment of a consultant to prepare the study and make concrete proposals was under examination. Finally, the Committee notes that the Government has not provided any information on the minimum wages applicable by category as fixed by collective agreements in the various branches of activity or in enterprises. Noting the lack of tangible progress made in activating the minimum wage-fixing machinery, established in sections 74 and 249 of the Labour Code, and the lack of information regarding the outcome of collective bargaining on the minimum wage, the Committee is bound to repeat its previous requests. It urges the Government to take all the necessary measures to reactivate without delay the minimum wage review process, as provided for in section 249 of the Labour Code, and to provide information in this regard, particularly on any decrees adopted further to this review, pursuant to section 74 of the Labour Code. It also once again requests the Government to provide information on the minimum wages applicable by category as fixed by collective agreements in the various branches of activity or in enterprises.

[The Government is asked to reply in full to the present comments in 2021.]

Minimum Wage-Fixing Machinery Convention, 1928 (No. 26) (ratification: 1977)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments.

Article 3 of the Convention. Operation of the minimum wage-fixing machinery. In its previous comments, the Committee recalled that the most recent decree fixing the minimum wage pursuant to sections 110 and 114 of the Labour Code was adopted in 1988 and that it was outdated. Noting that the Government indicated in its 2011 report that a study on the setting of a national minimum wage was being finalized, it requested the Government to provide information on any progress achieved in that regard. The Committee notes with regret that a new decree fixing the minimum wage has still not been adopted. It notes that the Government refers in its report to an agreement signed with the trade unions to conduct a study on fixing the national minimum wage. The Committee requests the Government to take without delay the necessary measures to fix the minimum wage pursuant to articles 110 and 114 of the Labour Code and to provide information in this regard, including on any studies carried out in this area and on consultation with the social partners.

Rwanda

Minimum Wage-Fixing Machinery Convention, 1928 (No. 26) (ratification: 1962)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments.

The Committee notes the observations of the Congress of Labour and Brotherhood of Rwanda (COTRAF–RWANDA) on the application of the Convention, received in 2018.

Articles 1 and 3(2) of the Convention. Minimum wage-fixing machinery. Consultation of employers' and workers' organizations. Further to its previous comments requesting the Government to take all necessary steps in order to accelerate the process of determining – in consultation with employers' and workers' organizations – minimum wage rates, the Committee notes that, despite the Government's previous indications that a draft law determining minimum wage rates was pending adoption, the Government once again refers in its report to a 2015 study on the matter and to ongoing consultations. The Government also refers to legislative revisions under way. The Committee notes that COTRAF–RWANDA emphasizes that there is still no appropriate minimum wage-adjusting mechanism in place to respond to the rising cost of living and inflation in the country. In this respect, the Committee notes the adoption of Act No. 66/18 of 30 August 2018 issuing the labour regulations of Rwanda (Labour Code), section 68 of which provides for the determination of the minimum wage through a decree issued by the competent minister. The Committee also notes that the National Labour Council is responsible for proposing, or issuing an opinion on, the determination and adjustment of minimum wage rates, under section 3 of Decree No. 125/03 of 25 October 2010. The Committee notes with regret, however, that according to information available, the new minimum wage rates have still not been determined and recalls that the last adjustment to these rates was in 1980. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the ministerial decree determining the minimum wage under section 68 of the new Labour Code will be adopted promptly, and requests the Government to take all necessary measures in this regard. In addition, it requests the Government to provide detailed information on the consultations held in this regard, including on the role played by the National Labour Council. The Committee reminds the Government of the possibility to avail itself of ILO technical assistance.

Article 4. Sanctions. The Committee notes that the Labour Code does not provide for sanctions in the case of non-respect of the provisions of national legislation concerning the minimum wage. The Committee requests the Government to ensure that the determination of the minimum wage rates will be coupled with the implementation of a system of sanctions in order to ensure that the wages actually paid are not lower than the minimum rates determined; and to provide information in this regard.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Minimum Wage-Fixing Machinery Convention, 1928 (No. 26) (ratification: 1963)

The Committee notes with concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments.

Article 3 of the Convention. Operation of the minimum wage fixing machinery. The Committee recalls that, following the discussion of this case before the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2014, it had requested the Government to provide information with regard to the announced reactivation of the Minimum Wages Advisory Board and the subsequent fixation of a new minimum wage in the country. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that a Minimum Wages Advisory Board was appointed in 2015 and that it undertook a comprehensive study of the economy with a view to providing advice to the Government on the feasibility of fixing a minimum wage in the country and the form that the minimum wage should take. The Government also indicates that the report of the Board was under discussion in the Cabinet. Despite the progress made with the reactivation of the minimum wage fixing mechanism in 2015, the Committee notes with concern that the minimum wage, which was last set in 1984, has yet to be adjusted. It therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures to revise the level of the minimum wage without further delay. Recalling the importance of ensuring the close involvement of employers' and workers' organizations at all stages of this process, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the composition of the Minimum Wages Advisory Board and on the consultations undertaken with the social partners in revising the level of the minimum wage.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Protection of Wages Convention, 1949 (No. 95) (ratification: 1961)

Protection of Workers' Claims (Employer's Insolvency) Convention, 1992 (No. 173) (ratification: 2006)

The Committee takes note of the joint observations of the Confederation of Free Trade Unions of Ukraine (KVPU) and the Federation of Trade Unions of Ukraine (FPU) on the application of Convention No. 95 (protection of wages) received on 29 September 2020, which refer to the continuing wage arrears situation in the country. The Committee notes that this serious issue is addressed in its pending comments on the application of that Convention.

The Committee also takes note of the observations of the FPU received on 30 September 2020 on the application of: (i) Convention No. 131 (minimum wage), which also refer to issues addressed in the Committee's pending comments on the application of that Convention, and (ii) Convention No. 173 (protection of workers' claims in case of the employer's insolvency).

The Committee further notes the observations of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) regarding the application of Conventions Nos 131, 95 and 173 received on 16 September 2020, which also refer to issues addressed in the Committee's pending comments on the application of those Conventions.

The Committee recalls that in 2019 it requested the Government to reply in full in 2021 to its comments on the application of Conventions Nos 131, 95 and 173. It requests the Government to also provide in its 2021 reports its comments on the observations of the KVPU, the FPU and the ITUC received in 2020.

Not having received supplementary information from the Government further to the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020), the Committee reiterates its comments adopted in 2019 and reproduced below.

In order to provide a comprehensive view of the issues relating to the application of the ratified Conventions on wages, the Committee considers it appropriate to examine Convention No. 131 (minimum wage) and Conventions Nos 95 and 173 (protection of wages) together. The Committee takes note of the observations of the Confederation of Free Trade Unions of Ukraine (KVPU) on the application of Conventions Nos 95 and 131 received on 29 August 2019. It also notes the observation of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) regarding the application of Convention No. 131 received on 1 September 2019.

Legislative developments

In its last comments, the Committee noted that the draft Labour Code would replace both the Labour Code of 1971 and the Wages Act of 1995, which were the main pieces of legislation giving effect to the ratified Conventions on wages. It requested the Government to provide information on the progress made towards the adoption of the new legislation. Noting that the draft Labour Code has not yet been adopted, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the finalization of the labour law reform.

Minimum wage

Article 3 of Convention No. 131. Criteria for determining the level of the minimum wage. The Committee notes that in their 2019 observations, the ITUC and the KVPU indicate that the minimum wage does not adequately take into account the needs of workers and their families and the cost of living. According to the ITUC, the minimum wage established for 2019 is 12 per cent lower than the subsistence minimum calculated by the Ministry of Social Policy, a benchmark which is not even adequate given that it does not factor in a number of household expenses. The KVPU also states that the Government has not considered the trade unions' suggestion to introduce a system of indexation to ensure that the minimum wage would not lose its value due to the rising inflation during the year. In addition, the KVPU notes that in setting the minimum wage the Government does not consider the overall level of wages in the country, leading to a significant gap between the minimum wage and the average wage. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments in this respect.

Article 4(2). Full consultation with employers' and workers' organizations. The Committee notes that the KVPU indicates that the negotiations on the determination of the minimum wage were not conducted in accordance with the procedure established by the applicable General Agreement. The KVPU also states that neither the Government nor the Parliament formally heard the position of the trade unions and that consequently the minimum wage results from a unilateral decision of the Government. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments in this respect.

Article 5. Enforcement. The Committee notes the KVPU's indication that proper inspections are not carried out due to the moratorium on inspections, and due to the lack of an appropriate number of inspectors. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments in this respect. It also refers to its comments on the application of the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), and the Labour Inspection (Agriculture) Convention, 1969 (No. 129).

Protection of wages

Article 12 of Convention No. 95. Wage arrears situation in the country. In its last comments, the Committee examined the situation of wage arrears in the country, a situation which was particularly prevalent in state-owned coal-mining enterprises. Further to these comments, the Committee notes the information provided by the Government in its 2019 report, including regarding the measures taken between 2017 and May 2019 for the payment of wages and wage arrears in state-owned coal-mining enterprises. On the other hand, the Committee notes with concern that, according to the information provided by the Government, the amount of wage arrears in the coal-mining industry has been increasing in the first months of 2019. It also notes that the 2019 observations from the KVPU refer to the continued wage arrears situation. The KVPU also reiterates that, as a result of lasting and systematic wage arrears, social tensions remain in the mining communities. The Committee wishes to emphasize once again that a situation in which part of the workforce is systematically denied the fruits of its labour cannot be prolonged and that priority action is therefore needed to put an end to such practices. The Committee recalls once again that the application of Article 12 in practice comprises three essential elements: (1) efficient control and supervision; (2) appropriate sanctions; and (3) the means to redress the injury caused, including fair compensation for the losses incurred by the delayed payment (see 2003 General Survey on the protection of wages, paragraph 368).

With regard to efficient control and supervision, the Committee notes that the Government indicates that since the beginning of 2019, labour inspectors have carried out inspection visits to determine compliance with labour legislation in eight enterprises in the coal industry. In six of these enterprises, 24 violations of legislation on labour, employment and compulsory state social insurance were discovered, some of which related to the payment of wages. On the other hand, the Committee notes that the KVPU reiterates its previous concerns indicating that the state bodies that control and supervise the application of the relevant legislation do not substantively address the issue of wage arrears. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure efficient control and supervision of the regular payment of wages in the country. It requests the Government to provide information in this regard and refers to its comments on the application of labour inspection Conventions Nos 81 and 129.

With regard to the imposition of appropriate sanctions, the Committee notes the information provided by the Government, including the indication that in order to systematically resolve the problem of arrears in the payment of wages, the Ministry of Social Policy prepared draft amendments to the existing legislation with the aim of strengthening the protection of workers' rights to the timely payment of wages, including by increasing the amount of compensation to be paid in case of delayed payment of wages. The Committee notes that the KVPU indicates that at times employers pay a portion of the wage arrears to avoid administrative and criminal liability. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any progress made in the adoption of measures to ensure that sanctions in case of non-payment or irregular payment of wages are appropriate.

With regard to the means to redress the injury, the Committee notes the information provided by the Government, including the indication that according to the Court Fee Act, complaints submitted by physical persons for the recovery of wages are exempted from the payment of court fees. On the other hand, the Committee notes that the KVPU reiterates that workers have difficulties exercising legal remedies due to their poor legal awareness and to the cost of legal representation. The KVPU also states that most of the court decisions on the recovering of wage arrears have not been implemented. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments in this respect. Moreover, noting that the Government indicates that the above-mentioned draft amendments prepared by the Ministry of Social Policy included the establishment of a mechanism to guarantee the payment of wages in arrears in cases of the employer's insolvency, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the progress made in this regard.

The practice of "envelope wages". In its last comments, the Committee requested the Government to provide information on the measures taken to eliminate the practice according to which workers are forced to agree to the undeclared payment of wages "in envelopes", resulting in the non-payment of the corresponding social contributions. The Committee notes that the Government indicates that the Ministry of Social Policy developed draft amendments to the existing legislation with the aim of counteracting the use of undeclared labour, taking into account successful international practices. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the progress made in this regard.

Articles 5 to 8 of Convention No. 173. Workers' claims protected by a privilege. Further to its previous comments, the Committee notes that section 64 of the 2018 Code of Bankruptcy Procedure provides that workers' claims arising out of the employment relationship shall be protected by a privilege and shall be satisfied on a first priority basis. Noting that section 2(4) of the Code of Bankruptcy Procedure excludes state-owned enterprises from its application, the Committee requests the Government to clarify how workers' claims are protected in the case of state-owned enterprises.

ILO technical assistance

The Committee notes that the country is receiving technical assistance from the Office on the issues raised in the present comments. The Committee hopes that the Government will be in a position to report concrete progress towards full and effective implementation of the ratified Conventions on wages in its next report.

[The Government is asked to reply in full to the present comments in 2021.]

Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela

Minimum Wage-Fixing Machinery Convention, 1928 (No. 26) (ratification: 1944)

Protection of Wages Convention, 1949 (No. 95) (ratification: 1982)

In order to provide a comprehensive view of the issues concerning the application of ratified Conventions on wages, the Committee considers it appropriate to examine Convention No. 26 (minimum wage) and Convention No. 95 (protection of wages) together.

The Committee takes note of the joint observations of the Federation of Chambers and Associations of Commerce and Production of Venezuela (FEDECAMARAS) and the International Organisation of Employers (IOE) on the application of the Convention No. 26, received on 1 October 2020. The Committee also takes note of the observations of the following workers' organizations on the application of Conventions Nos. 26 and/or 95: the Confederation of Workers of Venezuela (CTV), received on 21 August and 30 September 2020; the Federation of University Teachers' Associations of Venezuela (FAPUV) and the Independent Trade Union Alliance Confederation of Workers (CTASI), received on 28 August 2020; the CTASI, received on 30 September 2020; the Confederation of Autonomous Trade Unions (CODESA), the General Confederation of Labour (CGT) and the National Union of Workers of Venezuela (UNETE), received on1 October 2020; the National Union of Men and Women Public Officials in the Legislative Career Stream, and Men and Women Workers at the National Assembly (SINFUCAN) and the CTASI, received on 5 October 2020; and the Bolivarian Socialist Confederation of Men and Women Workers in Urban and Rural Areas and Fishing of Venezuela (CBST-CCP), received on 3 December 2020.

Minimum wage

Follow-up to the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry (complaint made under article 26 of the Constitution of the ILO)

Article 3 of Convention No. 26. Participation of the social partners in minimum wage fixing. The Committee recalls that in March 2018, in the context of the complaint alleging non-observance by the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela of the Minimum Wage-Fixing Machinery Convention, 1928 (No. 26), the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144), submitted under article 26 of the ILO Constitution by 33 employer delegates to the 104th Session (2015) of the International Labour Conference, the Governing Body established a Commission of Inquiry to consider the issues raised in the complaint. The Committee notes that the Commission of Inquiry completed its work in September 2019 and that its report was submitted to, and noted by, the Governing Body, at its 337th Session (October 2019).

The Committee notes the document submitted to the Governing Body at its 340th Session in October 2020 (GB.340/INS/13) containing the Government's response to the report of the Commission of Inquiry, and also notes the discussion that took place in the Governing Body, which will continue during its next session in March 2021. In its response, the Government indicates that it does not accept the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry because if it were to comply with them it would mean violating the national Constitution, the separation of powers, rule of law, independence, sovereignty and self-determination of the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela. However, the Committee observes that the Government has not made use of the prerogative provided by the ILO Constitution, of referring the complaint, within a period of three months, to the International Court of Justice. Moreover, the Committee notes that the Government expresses its willingness to improve compliance with the ILO Conventions ratified by the country on the basis of constructive suggestions issued by the ILO supervisory bodies, and to receive technical assistance for the Office. The Committee recalls that in previous occasions when following-up on recommendations of a commission of inquiry, it has observed that the ILO Constitution does not make the results of a Commission of Inquiry subject to the consent of the State concerned. In this regard, the Committee has recalled that under article 32 of the ILO Constitution, the only authority capable of affirming, varying or reversing the findings or recommendations of a Commission of Inquiry is the International Court of Justice, and that, therefore, a government which chooses not to avail itself of the possibility of referring the matter to the International Court of Justice ought to take account of the conclusions and act upon the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry, in light of the provisions of the ILO Constitution.

The Committee takes note of the conclusions of the Commission of Inquiry regarding the allegations of adoption without tripartite consultation of increases to the minimum wage (paragraphs 437 to 442 of the report of the Commission of Inquiry, hereinunder, "the report"). In particular, the Commission of Inquiry concluded that "The information gathered thus reveals the Government's failure to comply with Convention No. 26. In addition to the numerous increases in relation to which the Government did not provide specific evidence of consultation, regarding the communications submitted by the Government to prove that consultation had taken place with employers' and workers' organizations, the Commission considers that the mere sending of such belated and/or generic communications, containing abstract requests for proposals "in relation to the minimum wage" over six months, without providing any information on the anticipated machinery for fixing and applying the minimum wage, cannot be deemed to comply with the provisions of the Convention, which establish the obligation of the Government to engage in effective consultations." (paragraph 442 of the report).

The Committee also notes the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry (paragraphs 495 to 497), in which it observed "with the deepest concern the absence of effect given to the previous recommendations of the ILO supervisory bodies on the issues raised, as well as the gravity of the current situation", and considered that the competent authorities must give effect to those recommendations without further delay and complete their implementation by 1 September 2020 at the latest. The Commission of Inquiry urged the Government to avail itself of ILO technical assistance for implementation of the recommendations. With regard to consultations concerning minimum wages (paragraph 497(3)(i) of the report), the Commission of Inquiry recommended the adoption of the necessary measures to ensure due and effective compliance with the consultation requirements set out in Convention No. 26, and the ending of the exclusion from social dialogue and consultation of FEDECAMARAS and trade union organizations that are not close to the Government. In particular, the Commission of Inquiry recommended, through tripartite dialogue with the representative organizations of employers and workers, the establishment of effective tripartite consultation procedures. In light of the serious deficiencies in social dialogue in the country, taking into consideration the recognition by the Government itself of the need to create mechanisms for social dialogue, the Commission of Inquiry advised the establishment in the very near future of bodies or other institutionalized procedures for social dialogue to facilitate compliance with the obligations of consultation.

Finally, the Committee notes that the Commission of Inquiry recommended "the creation and convocation in the very near future of the following dialogue round-tables in support of the application of its recommendations: (i) a round-table for tripartite dialogue which includes all representative organizations; (ii) a round-table for dialogue between the authorities concerned and FEDECAMARAS on questions relating to that organization [...], and (iii) another round-table for representative workers' organizations to address subjects that are of specific concern to them." The Commission of Inquiry considered that "prior to the session of the ILO Governing Body in March 2020, the round-tables should have been established and have a schedule of meetings and an independent chair who enjoys the confidence of the tripartite constituents in the country, as well as, at the request of any of the constituents, the presence and assistance of the ILO" (paragraph 497(4) of the report).

The Committee notes with deep concern the conclusions of the Commission of Inquiry regarding the failure of the Government to hold consultations on fixing the minimum wage in the country.

Furthermore, further to its previous comments on this matter, the Committee notes that the Government refers in its report to the communications it sent in reply to the report of the Commission of Inquiry. Moreover, the Government indicates that, given the impact of the health crisis on the country and the realities of the different social and economic sectors, and taking account the opinions expressed publicly by the employers' and workers' organizations, it raised the national minimum wage a second time in April 2020, in the midst of the pandemic and despite the paralysis of many sectors in the country. The Committee notes with deep concern that FEDECAMARAS and the IOE, and CODESA, the CGT and UNETE, the CTV, SINFUCAN, FAPUV and CTASI alike point out that the last two increases in the minimum wage (January and April 2020) were once again decided unilaterally and without consultation by the Government. FEDECAMARAS and the IOE indicate that even before the health emergency broke, there was no apparent progress in the establishment of a round-table for tripartite dialogue, and that neither that recommendation nor any of the other recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry, which should all have been implemented before September 2020, had been either partially or completely implemented by the Government. Several of the workers' organizations that sent observations to the Committee also indicated that the Commission of Inquiry's recommendations on social dialogue and consultation had not been implemented.

In these circumstances, the Committee deplores the failure of the Government to fulfil its obligation to consult in respect of fixing the national minimum wage. The Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures without delay, including by taking into account the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry, to ensure full compliance with the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in that regard.

The Committee is aware of the on-going consideration being given by the Governing Body to the follow-up of the report of the Commission of Inquiry. In view of the grave violations of labour rights described above, the systemic failure to comply with a number of ILO Conventions and the serious lack of cooperation from the Venezuela authorities with regard to its obligations, the Committee considers it critical that within the context of the ILO standards the situation in the country be given the full and continuing attention of the ILO and the ILO supervisory system in order to obtain robust and effective measures that can bring about compliance in law and in practice with the Conventions concerned.

Protection of wages

Article 4 of Convention No. 95. "Socialist cestaticket". In its previous comments, while noting the observations of the social partners, the Committee examined the system of the "socialist cestaticket" (a food benefit to protect the purchasing power of workers in relation to food, established by Decree No. 2066 of 2015; the Decree allows several modalities whereby the benefit may be provided, including payment in kind), and requested the Government to take the necessary measures to engage in dialogue without delay at the national level involving all the employers' and workers' organizations concerned so as to examine possible solutions that are sustainable over time, including any necessary adjustment to the "socialist cestaticket" system, with a view to ensuring full conformity with Article 4 of the Convention. The Committee notes from the Government's report, that when the "socialist cestaticket" system is included in collective labour agreements, the choice of modalities of provision are adopted by common agreement of the interested parties. The Government adds that: (i) unions must guide workers as to the correct use of the coupons, tickets or electronic food cards; and (ii) the payment or provision of food is in addition to the actual wages paid; in no case does payment of the "socialist cestaticket" replace even partial, and still less full, payment of wages. However, the Committee notes the new observations submitted by the workers' organizations in this regard, reporting persistent difficulties in the application of this system. Under these circumstances, the Committee observes with regret that the Government has not taken steps to engage in dialogue at national level on these issues, as it has been requested to do in previous comments. The Committee is therefore obliged to reiterate its request to the Government to take the necessary measures to engage in dialogue without delay at the national level involving all the employers' and workers' organizations concerned so as to examine possible solutions that are sustainable over time, including any necessary adjustment to the "socialist cestaticket" system. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in this regard.

Article 5. Electronic payment of wages. The Committee notes that the CTV, CTASI and FAPUV indicate that electronic payment of wages has become generalized, causing serious inconvenience to workers when they are obliged to make cash payments, and insurmountable difficulties in the many areas where there are no banking services, and also given that the banking system imposes limits on the amount of cash that can be withdrawn. The Committee recalls that Article 5 provides that wages shall be paid directly to the worker concerned. The same provision allows a number of exceptions as may be provided by national laws or regulations, collective agreement or arbitration award or where the worker concerned has agreed to another arrangement. The Committee also recalls that it has considered that the payment of wages by bank transfer is compatible with the Convention to the extent that it fulfils the provisions of Article 5 (2003 General Survey, Protection of wages, paragraph 84). However, the Committee considers that there is an issue of application in practice when the prevailing circumstances would make it difficult or even impossible for workers to obtain the corresponding amount in cash from the bank or institution where their wages has been paid, as is denounced by the workers' organizations in the present case. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to address this issue and to provide information in that regard.

Article 12. Delayed payment of wages. The Committee notes that the CTASI refers to several cases of delayed payment of wages, in particular in the case of National Assembly workers. Recalling the importance of the payment of wages at regular intervals, the Committee requests the Government to provide its comments in that regard.

Weekly Rest (Commerce and Offices) Convention, 1957 (No. 106) (ratification: 1958)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments.

In order to provide a comprehensive view of the issues relating to the application of the ratified Conventions on working time, the Committee considers it appropriate to examine Conventions Nos 1, 14, 30 and 106 in a single comment.

The Committee notes the observations of the Confederation of Public and Private Sector Workers (CTSP), received on 29 August 2018, the Association of Haitian Industries (ADIH), received on 31 August 2018, and the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), received on 1 September 2018.

Follow-up to the conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards (International Labour Conference, 107th Session, May–June 2018)

The Committee notes the discussion which took place in the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards (Conference Committee), including with regard to the impact of the 2017 Act to organizing and regulating work over a 24-period divided into three segments of eight hours (hereinafter: Act on working time) on the application of the ratified Conventions on working time. In its conclusions, the Conference Committee asked the Government to: (i) review in consultation with the most representative employers' and workers' organizations the conformity of the Labour Code and the Act on working time, with respect to the ratified ILO Conventions on working time; (ii) strengthen the labour inspectorate and other relevant enforcement mechanisms to ensure that workers benefit from the protection afforded by the Conventions; (iii) report to the Committee of Experts on these measures; and (iv) avail itself of technical assistance to address these matters.

The Committee notes that, at the end of the discussion in the Conference Committee, the Government recalled that the Conventions that Haiti had ratified were part of its body of domestic law under article 276-2 of the Constitution of Haiti, and took precedence over national laws in the hierarchy of standards and could be invoked without reserve before the courts. Taking note of the observations of the Committee of Experts concerning the application of the Act on working time, the Government indicated that it was planning to hold tripartite consultations to identify and overcome the main difficulties encountered in the application of the Act, and to issue orders or regulations. The Government also indicated that it was aware of the delay in finalizing the process of reforming the Labour Code. Discussions had begun at the level of the Prime Minister's Office and would be continued within a tripartite framework, in the spirit of the San José Agreement of 21 March 2018 signed by the social partners, taking into account the Office's recommendations.

Furthermore, the Committee notes that the CTSP, in its observations, expresses regret at the lack of progress on working time issues since the discussion in the Conference Committee. However, the CTSP indicates that discussions on the reform of the Labour Code have resumed. The Committee also notes that the ADIH confirms that tripartite discussions on the reform of the Labour Code resumed in August 2018. According to the ADIH, the Act on working time should be repealed and the employers' and workers' organizations should be consulted on the application of the Conventions ratified in this field. The Committee further notes that the ITUC refers to the discussion of the case during the Conference Committee and indicates in particular that: (i) the Act on working time, which liberalizes the regulations on this subject, is giving rise to serious abuses; (ii) the Act was adopted without consultation and outside the process of negotiation of a new Labour Code; and (iii) the situation is aggravated by the lack of resources for labour inspection. The ITUC refers in particular to: (i) workers in the informal economy and in domestic work who are subjected to indecent working conditions in terms of both working time and leave entitlement; (ii) security personnel and subcontracted workers in the textile sector, where there is a regrettable lack of fixed working hours and a refusal by employers to pay overtime; and (iii) workers in export processing zones who are particularly subjected to abuses. The Committee requests the Government to send its comments on all the above observations.

Lastly, the Committee notes the Government's communication received on 30 October 2018 in which it informs the Committee that, further to the conclusions of the Conference Committee, it has requested ILO technical assistance to help it, inter alia, to submit the reports due, to strengthen the inspection services, to consolidate social dialogue with a view to pursuing social reforms, and to address the other matters raised by the Conference Committee. The Government also indicates that it hopes to receive this assistance before the next session of the International Labour Conference. The Committee hopes that this technical assistance will be made available without delay. The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information on the results of the planned technical assistance, and also on the measures taken to ensure the effective application in law and practice of the ratified Conventions on working time.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Radiation Protection Convention, 1960 (No. 115) (ratification: 1983)

The Committee notes with deep concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments. The Committee informs the Government that, if it has not supplied replies to the points raised by 1 September 2021, then it may proceed with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the information at its disposal at its next session.

General observation of 2015. The Committee would like to draw the Government's attention to its general observation of 2015 under this Convention, including the request for information contained in paragraph 30 thereof.

The Committee notes the information in the Government's current report that the National Occupational Safety and Health (NOSH) Bill does take into consideration all the Committee's observations as it ensures the effective protection of workers exposed to ionizing radiation in the course of their work. The Committee also notes from the Government's report that provisions have been made in the NOSH Bill for maximum permissible doses of ionizing radiation, alternative employment (especially for pregnant women) and the prevention of occupational exposure during an emergency. Furthermore, according to available information, the NOSH Bill has not yet been adopted due to concerns that it may be burdensome to employers. The Committee notes that, in spite of its previous request, the Government has not provided a detailed report as requested by the Committee. The Committee wishes to emphasize that the indication that the new legislation is in the process of adoption does not free the Government from the obligation to ensure the application of the provisions of the Convention during the transition period and to provide such information in its report. The Committee requests the Government to supply detailed information on the application of the Convention, including new legislation, if adopted, and where it has not been adopted, the manner in which the Government ensures the application of the provisions of the Convention in practice. It also reiterates its request to the Government to respond in detail to its previous observation which reads as follows:

Articles 3(1) and 6(2) of the Convention. Maximum permissible doses of ionizing radiation. With reference to its previous comments, the Committee notes the Government's response indicating that on 13 March 2009, the Labour Advisory Board was re-activated and that its main duty is the revision of national labour legislation. The Committee notes that the Ministry is currently in the process of identifying a consultant that will work with the Labour Advisory Board to conduct the revision of the legislation, and that comments made by the Committee will be submitted to the Board. The Committee hopes that in the course of the ongoing revision of national labour legislation due account will be taken on the exposure limits adopted by the International Commission on Radiological Protection, in order to ensure the effective protection of workers exposed to ionizing radiation in the course of their work.

Article 14. Provision of alternative employment. The Committee notes the Government's response indicating that there is no provision in the Labour Act for the transfer of pregnant women from their work involving exposure to ionizing radiation to another job. The Committee notes, however, the Government's statement that that the National Occupational Safety and Health Policy, adopted by Cabinet on 9 November 2004, can provide a suitable framework for drafting legislation that could make provision for such transfer and that legislation is drafted in consultation with the Labour Advisory Board. The Committee hopes that in the course of the ongoing revision of the national labour legislation due account will be taken of the need to ensure that suitable alternative employment opportunities, not involving exposure to ionizing radiations, be provided for workers having accumulated an effective dose beyond which detriment to their health considered unacceptable is to arise, as well as for pregnant women, who may be faced with the dilemma that protecting their health means losing their employment.

Occupational exposure during an emergency. The Committee notes that there is currently no provision within the Labour Act laying out the circumstances in which exceptional exposure is authorized. The Committee requests the Government, in the course of the ongoing revision of the national labour legislation, to take due account of the need to determine circumstances in which exceptional exposure is authorized, and to make protection as effective as possible against accidents and during emergency operations, in particular with regard to the design and protective features of the workplace and the equipment, and the development of emergency intervention techniques, the use of which in emergency situations would enable the exposure of individuals to ionizing radiations to be avoided.

The Committee expects that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981 (No. 155) (ratification: 2007)

Safety and Health in Construction Convention, 1988 (No. 167) (ratification: 2002)

In order to provide a comprehensive view of the issues relating to the application of ratified Conventions on occupational safety and health (OSH), the Committee considers it appropriate to examine Conventions Nos 155 (OSH) and 167 (OSH in construction) together.

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information on the application of Conventions Nos 155 and 167 provided by the Government in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020). The Committee proceeded with the examination of the application of those Conventions on the basis of the supplementary information received from the Government this year (see under Article 11(c) and (e) and application in practice of Convention No. 155, and Article 35 and application in practice of Convention No. 167 below), as well as on the basis of the information at its disposal in 2019.

COVID-19 measures. The Committee notes the information provided in the Government's supplementary report related to OSH measures in the context of the COVID-19 pandemic, including measures to strengthen prevention and monitoring during the resumption of work in construction and civil engineering projects.

A. General provisions

Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981 (No. 155)

Article 11(c) and (e) of the Convention. Production of annual statistics on occupational accidents and diseases and application of the Convention in practice. The Committee previously noted the 26,393 cases of occupational diseases reported in 2013, including 23,152 cases of pneumoconiosis. In response to its request on concrete measures taken to address pneumoconiosis, the Committee notes the information in the Government's report concerning different preventive OSH measures taken in recent years, including the formulation of risk prevention and control plans in coal mines. The Committee also notes with interest the adoption, in 2019, of a National Action Plan on the Prevention and Control of Pneumoconiosis. In this regard, the Committee welcomes the Government's indication in its supplementary report, that in the period July 2019–December 2020, 10 departments and the All-China Federation of Trade Unions jointly issued the Notice on Disseminating the Enhanced Action Plan for the Prevention and Control of Pneumoconiosis. The Government refers to the departments' intensified efforts in five areas, including supervision and law enforcement, and efforts to promote the special treatment of occupational hazards in key industries such as mining and metallurgy, and carrying out reviews on dust hazard management in various industries. The Committee further notes the Government's indication in its supplementary report that China has published data on occupational diseases through an annual statistical bulletin on the development of public health services. The Government indicates in this respect that there were 19,428 cases of occupational disease in 2019 (including 15,898 cases of occupational pneumoconiosis), a decrease from 23,497 cases of occupational diseases in 2018, (with 19,468 cases of occupational pneumoconiosis). The Committee further notes the Government's indication that in 2019, there were 44,609 occupational safety accidents resulting in the death of 29,519 workers. It takes note of the Government's indication that the 2019 figures represent a 33.5 per cent decrease since 2015 in the number of accidents, and a 34.1 per cent decrease in the number of fatalities. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide statistics on occupational accidents and diseases at the national level. The Committee further requests the Government to continue its efforts with regard to the prevention of occupational accidents and occupational diseases, and to continue to provide information on the specific preventive measures taken in this regard, including measures taken in the implementation of the National Action Plan on the Prevention and Control of Pneumoconiosis, and the impact of such measures.

Safety and Health in Construction Convention, 1988 (No. 167)

Article 8 of the Convention. Cooperation between two or more employers undertaking activities simultaneously at one construction site. The Committee previously noted section 24 of the Administrative Regulations on Work Safety in Construction Projects which states that the main contractor shall be responsible for the overall occupational safety at the construction site. When the main contractor subcontracts a construction project to any other entity, it shall explicitly stipulate their respective rights and obligations regarding work safety. The main contractor and the subcontractor shall bear joint and several liability with regard to the safety of the subcontracted project and shall share duties and responsibilities. The Committee also noted that the Government identified the inadequacy of accountability and responsibility as a contributing factor to the high accident rate in the construction sector, and it requested information on the enforcement of section 24 in practice.

The Committee notes the statistics provided by the Government, in response to the Committee's previous request, regarding enforcement in the construction industry in general. The Government refers to the adoption of the Opinion on Further Accelerating the Development of General Project Contracting (No. 93, 2016), which provides that project contracting enterprises may directly subcontract design or construction work to enterprises with the corresponding qualifications, but the general contractor enterprise shall be fully responsible for, among others, the quality and safety of the project in accordance with the contract signed with the construction entity. The Government also indicates that the Ministry of Housing and Urban-Rural Development issued a Notice on Management Measures for the Evaluation and Punishment of Contract Awarding and Contracting of Construction Projects (No 1. 2019) which identified violations relating to illegal contract awarding, subcontracting and illegal subcontracting, as well as established standards for investigation and punishment. The Government further indicates that the Measures for the Administration of Subcontracting for the Construction of Houses and Municipal Infrastructure Projects (Decree No. 47 of the Ministry of Housing and Urban-Rural Development) was revised in 2019, and provides that the contractor of a project through subcontracting shall have the necessary qualifications for the work required, and shall obey the occupational safety management measures of the main contractor on the construction site. The Committee recalls that, in accordance with Article 8(1)(a) of the Convention, whenever two or more employers undertake activities simultaneously at one construction site, the principal contractor, or other person or body with actual control over or primary responsibility for overall construction site activities, shall be responsible for co-ordinating the prescribed safety and health measures and, in so far as is compatible with national laws and regulations, for ensuring compliance with such measures; and that, in accordance with Article 8(1)(c), each employer shall remain responsible for the application of the prescribed measures in respect of the workers placed under his authority. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the measures it is taking to ensure the implementation of prescribed safety and health measures under the responsibility of the principal contractor whenever two or more employers undertake activities simultaneously at one construction site, particularly with respect to construction sites with several tiers of subcontracting. Noting the general information provided, the Committee once again requests detailed information on the application and enforcement of section 24 of the Administrative Regulations on Work Safety in Construction Projects in practice, including inspections undertaken, violations detected and penalties applied for non-compliance, including fines collected and prosecutions. The Committee requests that this detailed information identify how often the principal contractor, as distinct from the subcontractor, is the object of enforcement actions.

Article 18(1). Work at heights including roof work. The Committee notes the Government's statement, in reply to the Committee's previous request, that falls from heights are the main type of accident in construction, representing 52.2 per cent of total accidents in 2018. The Government indicates that supervision of personal protective equipment (such as safety belts) shall be strengthened in order to prevent such falls, and that in 2019, the Ministry of Housing and Urban-Rural Development, together with the State Administration for Market Regulation and the Ministry of Emergency Management, issued the Notice on Further Strengthening Supervision and Management over Personal Protective Equipment. The Government also reports that it is taking measures to strengthen monitoring of projects considered to be higher risk, including those involving work at high heights particularly through the development of detailed enforcement rules regarding such projects and the undertaking of targeted inspections. The Committee urges the Government to pursue its efforts to enforce safety measures for work at heights and to promote the use of safety equipment at all construction sites. It requests the Government to continue to provide information on the enforcement measures implemented in that respect and to provide data on the number of occupational accidents reported (including fatal and serious accidents) due to falls from heights, as well as the number and nature of violations detected and penalties applied for non-compliance.

Article 35. Effective enforcement of the provisions of the Convention and application in practice. The Committee previously noted the Government's identification of the contributing factors to accidents in the construction sector, including a lack of uniform standards in the construction sector; an inadequate enterprise-ownership regime with respect to, accountability and responsibility; the lack of thoroughness in the elimination of hidden workplace hazards; and the inadequacy of investigations and penalties following occupational accidents. It noted that in 2018, the construction industry was, for the ninth consecutive year, the sector with the largest number of occupational accidents.

The Committee notes the information provided by the Government, in response to its previous request, on the measures taken by the Ministry of Housing and Urban-Rural Development to improve the implementation of the Convention, including: (i) measures to strengthen safety inspections in the construction sector, including the elimination of more than 360,000 potential safety hazards on construction sites and the suspension of licences for 164 enterprises in 2018; (ii) improved regulation of the construction market to address illegal subcontracting; (iii) further awareness-raising on safety in construction and safety training for construction workers; and (iv) the development of a national information system on construction safety to promote supervision, collaboration and information sharing. The Government indicates that departments in charge of housing and urban-rural construction at all levels inspected 320,155 projects, investigated 11,302 illegal activities, penalized 8,161 enterprises and imposed fines of approximately ¥102 million (approximately US$15,513,000). In 2018, there were 734 occupational safety accidents in housing and municipal projects nationwide, resulting in the death of 840 workers. In this respect, the Committee notes with concern the Government's statement that this represents a 4.1 per cent increase in the number of fatalities due to accidents in the sector between 2017 and 2018. The major cause of accidents were falls from heights, falling objects, mechanical accidents and crane-related accidents. It further notes that in 2018, 983 cases of occupational diseases were reported in the construction sector, mostly related to civil engineering projects (827 cases). With reference to its comments above on Convention No. 155, the Committee notes that the main occupational disease reported in the construction industry was pneumoconiosis. In its supplementary report, the Government also refers to measures taken to increase the accountability of responsible personnel. The Government further refers to a large-scale investigation conducted in 2019, with the random inspections conducted of 163,446 projects, investigations into 351,677 potential safety hazards, and the issuance of 58,888 notices regarding rectification with deadlines, 304 legal enforcement proposals, and 6,437 notices of suspension of work or business suspensions. The Committee urges the Government to pursue its efforts to ensure the application of the Convention in practice, and to continue to provide information on the concrete steps taken to reduce the number of fatal accidents in the sector. It also urges the Government to continue to take measures to ensure the effective enforcement of the Convention through the provision of appropriate inspection services in the sector, as well as appropriate penalties and corrective measures. Lastly, the Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the application of the Convention in practice, including the number and nature of the contraventions reported and the measures taken to address them, the number of penalties and corrective measures applied, and the number, nature and cause of occupational accidents and occupational diseases reported.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

White Lead (Painting) Convention, 1921 (No. 13) (ratification: 1978)

Articles 1, 2 and 3 of the Convention. Prohibition of the use of white lead and sulphate of lead in the internal painting of buildings. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government in its report that there are no specific provisions in national legislation applying the Convention, but that the Labour Code contains general indications in this respect. The Committee hopes that the Government, in its next report, will be able to provide detailed information on the measures taken in law and practice to regulate the use of white lead and sulphate of lead and of all products containing these pigments, in accordance with the provisions of the Convention.

Application in practice. The Committee notes the Government's indication that there is no report of the inspection services which would provide information on the manner in which the Convention is applied in practice or which would provide statistical data relating to it. The Committee requests the Government to provide information when it is available on the application of the Convention in practice, including statistical information on cases of lead poisoning among working painters, indicating, in particular, morbidity and mortality due to lead poisoning.

Occupational Cancer Convention, 1974 (No. 139) (ratification: 1983)

The Committee notes with deep concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments. The Committee informs the Government that, if it has not supplied replies to the points raised by 1 September 2021, then it may proceed with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the information at its disposal at its next session.

The Committee notes that draft Regulations on the safe use of chemicals at work of 31 January 2003 are currently being discussed. It notes the Government's statement that these draft Regulations provide protection against occupational cancer and also that it refers to the international exposure limits standard established by the American Conference of Governmental Industrial Hygienists. The Committee further notes that Chapter 3.6 of Annex 2 of the draft Regulations contains rules applicable to carcinogenicity and also notes the Government's statement that these draft Regulations will attempt to provide for medical examinations. The Committee hopes that these Regulations will be adopted in the near future, ensuring the application of the Convention, and that they will also ensure that medical examinations or biological or other tests or investigations are carried out during the period of employment and thereafter, in accordance with Article 5 of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on measures taken to ensure the application of the Convention and to provide a copy of the Regulations, once they are adopted.

The Committee expects that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Guarding of Machinery Convention, 1963 (No. 119) (ratification: 1964)

The Committee notes with deep concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments. The Committee informs the Government that, if it has not supplied replies to the points raised by 1 September 2021, then it may proceed with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the information at its disposal at its next session.

For a number of years, the Committee has drawn the attention of the Government to the fact that the national legislation does not contain provisions to give effect to Part II of the Convention (prohibition of the sale, hire, transfer in any other manner and exhibition of unguarded machinery) and that it does not provide for the full application of Article 17 of the Convention (which applies to all sectors of economic activity), as it is not applicable to certain branches of activity, inter alia, sea, air or land transport and mining.

Since 1979, in reply to the Committee's comments, the Government has indicated in its reports that a Bill to revise the 1974 Factories Act was being drafted and would contain provisions consistent with those of the Convention, and would apply to all the branches of economic activity. In its latest report (received in 1986), the Government indicates that the draft Factories Bill, 1985, has been examined by the competent parliamentary committee and is to be submitted to Parliament for adoption.

With its report for the period ending 30 June 1991, the Government supplied a copy of extracts of the Factories Bill containing provisions which should give effect to Part II of the Convention. In this connection, the Government was requested to indicate the stage of the legislative procedure reached by the Bill and the body which was in the process of examination of the Bill. Since no information has been provided by the Government in this respect, the Committee once again expresses the hope that the above-mentioned Bill will be adopted in the near future and requests the Government to provide a copy of this text, once it has been adopted.

The Committee expects that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Promotional Framework for Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 2006 (No. 187) (ratification: 2014)

In order to provide a comprehensive view of the issues relating to the application of ratified occupational safety and health (OSH) Conventions, the Committee considers it appropriate to examine Conventions Nos 115 (radiation protection), 119 (guarding of machinery), 127 (maximum weight), 155 (OSH), 161 (occupational health services), 167 (OSH in construction), 176 (OSH in mining) and 187 (promotional framework for OSH) together.

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information on the ratified OSH Conventions provided by the Government in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020).

The Committee also notes the observations of the Confederation of Public Employees' Trade Unions (KESK) on the application of Conventions Nos 155 and 161, received on 31 August 2020, the observations of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) on the application of Conventions Nos 155, 167, 176 and 187, received on 16 September 2020, the observations of the Turkish Confederation of Employers' Associations (TISK) on the application of Conventions Nos 115, 119, 127, 155, 161, 167, 176 and 187, received on 29 September 2020, and the observations of the Confederation of Public Servants Trade Unions (MEMUR-SEN) on the application of Convention No. 155, communicated with the Government's supplementary report. In addition, the Committee notes the Government's responses to the observations of the ITUC and the KESK, received on 4 November 2020. The Committee proceeded with the examination of the application of Conventions Nos 115, 119, 127, 155, 161, 167, 176 and 187 on the basis of the supplementary information received from the Government and the social partners this year, as well as on the basis of the information at its disposal in 2019.

COVID-19 measures. The Committee notes the observations of the TISK concerning measures taken in response to the COVID-19 pandemic, including the dissemination of general and sector-specific OSH and COVID-19 information by the General Directorate of Occupational Safety and Health, and measures taken by employers' organizations and their member companies in the metal and textile sectors, such as the distribution of personal protective equipment. The Committee also notes the observations of the ITUC alleging that contagions and deaths due to COVID-19 have become worryingly predominant in factories. In this regard, the ITUC refers to: (i) the situation in a fish company where more than 1,000 employees allegedly work without preventive measures; and (ii) the alleged lack of preventive and protective measures for workers in the construction sector, and the dismissal of workers who raise concerns about OSH issues. The Committee notes the Government's response to the ITUC's observations regarding the actions it has taken in the COVID-19 context, including legislative changes and the provision of guidance materials, taking into account comparative practices. The Government states that necessary procedures regarding certain complaints duly made by employees have been carried out by the competent authorities. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the developments in this respect, including on the measures taken to ensure the application in practice of the ratified OSH Conventions in the COVID-19 context.

It notes the observations of the TISK, communicated with the Government's report in 2019 on Conventions Nos 115, 119, 127, 155, 161 and 187.

Articles 2, 3, 4(3)(a) and 5 of Convention No. 187, Articles 4, 7 and 8 of Convention No. 155, Article 1 of Convention No. 115, Article 16 of Convention No. 119, Article 8 of Convention No. 127, Articles 2 and 4 of Convention No. 161, Article 3 of Convention No. 167 and Article 3 of Convention No. 176. Continuous improvement of occupational safety and health in consultation with the most representative organizations of employers and workers and the national tripartite advisory body. National OSH policy and programme. The Committee previously noted the Government's indication that the tripartite National Occupational Safety and Health Council (National OSH Council) met twice a year, and had the objective of advising the Ministry of Family, Labour and Social Security and the Government on developing policies and strategies to improve OSH conditions. It also noted the adoption of the National OSH Policy (III) and National Action Plan for the period 2014–18, which included objectives related to the development of an occupational accident and disease statistics and recording system and the improved performance of occupational health services.

The Committee notes with concern the Government's indication in its report that the last meeting of the National OSH Council was held in June 2018 and that the review of the National OSH Policy and Action Plan for 2014–18, and the adoption of a new OSH Policy and Action Plan for 2019–23, are still pending. The Committee recalls that the previous Regulations on the National OSH Council of 2013 specified that its composition included 13 representatives from the social partners (and 13 from public institutions), and it notes the Government's indication that, pursuant to Decree-Law No. 703 of 2018, the National OSH Council will be reorganized and its new members will be nominated by the President. In this regard, the Committee notes the concerns of the KESK that there have been no meetings of the National OSH Council since 2018, which is confirmed by the Government's response. The Committee also notes the MEMUR-SEN's observation regarding the need for social dialogue mechanisms to establish a schedule of occupational diseases. The Government also provides information, in response to the Committee's request, on the progress achieved with respect to the annual performance indicators in each of the seven objectives set out in the National Action Plan 2014–18. The Committee further notes the Government's reference to tripartite meetings and consultations with sector representatives in the construction and mining sectors, and the observations made by the TISK on the application of Convention No. 155 stating that steps are being taken to improve social dialogue in the area of OSH. The Committee nevertheless notes the KESK's observation that the National Action Plan 2019–23 has yet to be adopted. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the review undertaken of the National OSH policy and Action Plan for the period 2014–18, including the evaluation of the progress made with the performance indicators. It requests the Government to provide information on the formulation and adoption of a new OSH policy and programme for the subsequent period. It requests the Government to provide information on the consultations held with the most representative organizations of employers and workers in this respect. The Committee further requests the Government to provide information on the re-establishment of the National OSH Council and to indicate if it includes representatives of employers' and workers' organizations. Finally, the Committee requests the Government to provide its comments in respect of the MEMUR-SEN's observations on the need to establish a schedule of occupational diseases in consultation with social partners.

Articles 2 and 3 of Convention No. 187 and Article 4 of Convention No. 155. Prevention as the aim of the national policy on OSH. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the proposed measures in the National OSH Policy Document III (2014–18) to reduce occupational accidents in the metal, construction and mining sectors.

The Committee welcomes the detailed information provided by the Government, in response to its request, on the application in practice of Conventions Nos 167 and 176, including the number of occupational accidents and fatal occupational accidents. The Committee notes the Government's indication that, while desired levels in the performance indicators in the National Policy Document III (2014–18) have not been reached, efforts to reduce occupational accidents and occupational diseases continue. The Government states that there are plans to revise the relevant targets and indicators in the preparation of the 2019–23 Action Plan to provide for more effective actions, after the restructuring of the National OSH Council. In this regard, the Committee also welcomes the information provided by the Government concerning several activities in the construction sector to reduce occupational accidents and the Government's reference to the imminent launch of a major project to improve OSH in the mining sector. In addition, the Committee notes the observations of the TISK concerning the publication of two communications on major industrial accidents in June and July 2020. The Committee notes, however, with concern the Government's indication that, in 2017, there were 587 fatal occupational accidents in the construction sector and 86 such accidents in the mining sector. The Committee also notes that, according to the ITUC, the number of fatal occupational accidents has increased in 2020 compared to 2019, with the main causes of fatalities being crush syndrome, traffic-related incidents and falls. In this respect, the Committee notes the Government's response that the number of accidents should not be examined in isolation, but should be evaluated over the years, against OSH conditions and the number of employees in the country. The MEMUR-SEN also alleges the existence of insufficiencies regarding various aspects of the national OSH system, and a high number of industrial accidents per day. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments in respect of the MEMUR-SEN's observations. The Committee also requests the Government to continue to take measures to reduce occupational accidents in the sectors and workplaces where workers are particularly at risk (particularly in the metal, mining and construction sector and where workers use machinery). It requests the Government to continue to provide detailed information on the number of occupational accidents, including fatal occupational accidents, in all sectors and workplaces. It also requests the Government to provide information regarding occupational diseases, including the number of cases of occupational disease recorded disaggregated, if possible, by sector, age group and gender.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

[The Government is asked to reply in full to the present comments in 2021.]

Occupational Cancer Convention, 1974 (No. 139) (ratification: 2010)

Safety and Health in Mines Convention, 1995 (No. 176) (ratification: 2011)

In order to provide a comprehensive view of the issues relating to the application of ratified Conventions on occupational safety and health (OSH), the Committee considers it appropriate to examine Conventions Nos 139 (occupational cancer), 155 (OSH) and 176 (safety and health in mines) together.

The Committee takes note of the observations of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) on the application of Conventions Nos 155 and 176, received on 16 September 2020, alleging that there is a lack of preventive and protective measures to protect workers against the spread of COVID-19 and a shortage of personal protective equipment throughout the country, but especially in the healthcare and mining sector. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments in this respect.

The Committee also notes the observations of the Confederation of Free Trade Unions of Ukraine (KVPU) on the application of Conventions Nos 155 and 176, received in 2019.

A. General provisions

Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981 (No. 155)

Article 11(c) of the Convention. Notification of occupational accidents and diseases. The Committee notes that, according to the observations of the KVPU, employers do not follow, in practice, the notification procedures established by Decision No. 337 of the Cabinet of Ministers of Ukraine of 17 April 2019 approving the Procedure for Investigating and Recording Accidents and Occupational Diseases. The KVPU alleges that employers transmitted the notifications in violation of the deadlines, for 120 out of the 209 accidents registered by the State Labour Service (SLS) in the first half of 2019. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments in this respect, and to take the necessary measures to ensure that Decision No. 337 is fully applied in practice with a view to ensuring the notification of occupational accidents and diseases by employers.

B. Protection against specific risks

Occupational Cancer Convention, 1974 (No. 139)

Articles 2, 3 and 4 of the Convention. Replacement of carcinogenic substances and agents, measures to be taken to protect workers, record keeping, and provision of information. The Committee notes that the Government's report does not respond to its previous comments on the issues covered by Articles 2 (replacement of carcinogenic substances and agents), 3 (measures taken to protect workers and for record keeping) and 4 (providing workers with information on the dangers involved and the measures to be taken) of the Convention. The Committee also notes with concern that the Government: (1) reiterates previously raised difficulties in the application in practice of those Articles, including lack of funding, leading to the absence of measures to replace carcinogenic substances and agents by non-carcinogenic or less harmful substances or agents, and of an appropriate system to record the number of workers exposed to carcinogenic substances and agents; and (2) indicates that there are currently no special measures to ensure that workers who have been, are or may be exposed to carcinogenic substances and agents, are provided with all possible information regarding the dangers involved and the measures that should be taken. Taking into account the difficulties raised, the Committee urges the Government to take all the necessary measures to ensure that full effect is given to Articles 2, 3 and 4 of the Convention in the near future, and to provide information on the measures taken in this respect.

C. Protection in specific branches of activity

Safety and Health in Mines Convention, 1995 (No. 176)

Articles 5(1), (2)(e) and 16 of the Convention. Supervision of safety and health in mines, suspension of mining activities, corrective measures and enforcement. In response to its previous comments on inspections undertaken in mines, the Committee notes the statistics provided in the Government's report regarding the number of inspections conducted, violations detected and total amount of fines imposed. The Committee also notes the observations of the KVPU, alleging that the application of Act No. 877-V of 2007 on Fundamental Principles of State Supervision and Monitoring of Economic Activity restricts inspection in mines. The KVPU also refers to an incident in 2017–18 in which there were two fatal accidents at the same mining workplace within a year of each other, due to the failure to respect an order prohibiting the use of certain equipment, issued by the administrative court following an application by the State Labour Service (SLS). Referring to its comments concerning restrictions on the powers of labour inspectors, adopted in 2020 under the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), and the Inspection (Agriculture) Convention, 1969 (No. 129), the Committee requests the Government to take all the necessary measures to ensure the effective enforcement of the provisions of this Convention, in accordance with Article 16. In this regard, the Committee requests the Government to continue to provide statistics on violations detected during inspections, and detailed information on the measures taken by inspectors in such cases, including penalties imposed and other corrective measures. In addition, the Committee requests the Government to provide further information on the application in practice of Article 5(2)(e), regarding the power of the competent authorities to suspend or restrict mining activities on safety and health grounds, until the condition giving rise to the suspension or restriction has been corrected.

Articles 5(2)(c) and (d), 7 and 10(d). Measures to eliminate or minimize the risks to safety and health in mines. Procedures for investigating fatal and serious accidents and the compilation and publication of statistics. Appropriate remedial measures and measures taken to prevent future accidents by employers as a result of investigations. Further to its previous comments, the Committee notes the Government's reference to the procedure for investigating accidents in enterprises in the coal industry, pursuant to Decision No. 337 of the Cabinet of Ministers of Ukraine of 17 April 2019 approving the Procedure for Investigating and Recording Accidents and Occupational Diseases. The Committee notes, however, that, according to the Government, 23 per cent of investigations mandated in 2018 are still outstanding, along with 5 per cent of the ones mandated in 2017 and 5 per cent of those mandated in 2016, due primarily to the lack of conclusions that should result from the investigation procedure. The KVPU also alleges that the established notification procedures for occupational accidents and diseases are not followed in practice. As regards measures taken to address the causes of such accidents, the Government indicates that the SLS established a commission to review regulatory documents on removing gases, ventilation and combating gas-dynamic phenomena, but does not refer to measures taken in mines in general. The Committee nevertheless notes the observations from the ITUC, which refers to the high rate of occupational accidents and diseases in the mining sector, and alleges that occupational fatalities and diseases in mining are underestimated as there is scant data in the industry. The ITUC further alleges that, according to the SLS, 68.7 per cent of workers in mining have been working in conditions which fail to meet sanitary and hygienic standards, that 53.5 per cent work with excessive dust, 42.3 per cent with excessive noise, 14.2 per cent with excessive vibration, and 9.8 per cent with excessive exposure of harmful chemicals. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments in respect of the ITUC's observations. The Committee also requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that full effect is given to Article 10(d) of the Convention, requiring that employers shall ensure that all accidents and dangerous occurrences are investigated and appropriate remedial action is taken in practice. As regards Article 5(2)(d) on the compilation and publication of statistics on accidents, occupational diseases and dangerous occurrences, the Committee refers to its comments adopted in 2020 concerning Article 11(c) of Convention No. 155. The Committee also requests the Government to provide further detailed information on the measures taken to ensure the application, in mines, of the employers' duties contained in Articles 7 and 10.

Article 5(2)(f). Rights of workers and their representatives to be consulted on and participate in OSH measures. Further to its previous comments on procedures to implement the rights of workers and their representatives to be consulted on and participate in OSH measures (Article 5(2)(f)), the Committee notes that section 42 of the Labour Protection Act provides that OSH representatives may apply for assistance to the bodies in charge of state supervision over OSH, and have a right to participate and make appropriate proposals during inspections. The Committee also notes, however, the observations of the KVPU, alleging that the national legislation does not provide for mandatory and documented procedures to secure real forms of participation by workers' and their representatives in consultations on OSH at the workplace. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments in this respect and to provide further information on the establishment of effective procedures to ensure the implementation of the rights of workers and their representatives to be consulted on OSH matters, and to participate in measures, relating to safety and health at the workplace in accordance with the provisions of the Article.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

[The Government is asked to reply in full to the present comments in 2022.]

Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981 (No. 155) (ratification: 1988)
Occupational Health Services Convention, 1985 (No. 161) (ratification: 1988)
Asbestos Convention, 1986 (No. 162) (ratification: 1995)

In order to provide a comprehensive view of the issues relating to the application of the ratified Conventions on occupational safety and health (OSH), the Committee considers it appropriate to examine Conventions Nos 155 (OSH), 161 (occupational health services) and 162 (asbestos) together.

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020) in which it provides information on the measures adopted to deal with the emergency health situation in the context of the COVID-19 pandemic.

COVID-19 measures. The Committee appreciates the Government's efforts to provide information on the OSH measures taken by the Government in the context of the COVID-19 pandemic, in particular the adoption of several decrees and resolutions relating to OSH. The Committee notes in particular Resolutions No. 52/020 (13 March 2020) and No. 54/020 (19 March 2020) of the Ministry of Labour and Social Security, agreed upon in a tripartite setting within the scope of the National Council for Occupational Safety and Health (CONASSAT), which set out provisions and recommendations for risk-prevention measures relating to COVID-19 in the area of work, as well as minimum guidelines to be included in the protocols for prevention, monitoring and action. The Committee also notes the Resolution of the General Inspectorate of Labour and Social Security of 14 April 2020, which provides for the establishment of special teams of labour inspectors, led by division directors and coordinators, to organize and monitor compliance with OSH measures within the context of the health emergency.

With regard to the other pending issues, the Committee reproduces the content of its comments adopted in 2019 below.

The Committee notes the observations of the Inter-Union Assembly of Workers – Workers' National Convention (PIT-CNT) on the implementation of Convention No. 161, communicated with the Government's report.

A. General provisions

Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981 (No. 155)

Articles 4, 7 and 8 of the Convention. Formulation of a national policy and adoption of legislation on occupational safety and health, in consultation with the representative organizations of employers and workers concerned. Further to its previous comments, the Committee notes that, within the framework of Act No. 19172 on the regulation and control of cannabis, and Decree No. 120/2014, regulating that Act, Decree No. 128/016 of 2 May 2016 has been adopted, establishing the procedure for the action in relation to the consumption of alcohol, cannabis and other drugs in the workplace. The Committee welcomes the Government's indication in its report that draft Decree No. 128/016 was approved by CONASSAT in 2015.

The Committee notes that section 3 of Decree No. 128/016 provides that in joint health and safety bodies (created within the framework of Decree No. 291/007, which implements the provisions of the Convention), and in sectorial industrial relations bodies, systematic guidelines and procedures to detect situations in which alcohol and other drugs are being consumed shall be adopted, and actions shall be developed for consumption prevention and early detection, with a view to facilitating early intervention. The Committee also notes the Government's indication in its report that in 2016 a sub-working group was established within CONASSAT to draw up a national OSH policy, and continued its activities in 2017. The Committee also notes the information provided by the Government on the adoption of a series of OSH decrees (Decrees Nos 119/017, 143/017 and 7/018) in consultation with the representative organizations of employers and workers concerned and on the preparation of a compendium of rules on OSH. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on the formulation of the national policy on OSH in consultation with the most representative organizations of employers and workers concerned. The Committee also requests the Government to continue providing information on all periodical reviews of the safety and health of workers and the working environment conducted within the framework of CONASSAT.

Occupational Health Services Convention, 1985 (No. 161)

Articles 3, 4 and 6 of the Convention. Progressive development of occupational health services in consultation with the most representative employers' and workers' organizations. Legislation. The Committee previously noted that the second paragraph of section 16 of Decree No. 127/014, which regulates the application of the Convention in all activities, provides that, within five years of the entry into force of the Decree, all of the branches of activity shall have occupational health and prevention services.

The Committee notes the PIT-CNT's indication in its observations that the time limits established by Decree No. 127/014 have now passed, and compliance with the Decree has been very limited, as the great majority of companies have not established occupational health services. In this respect, the Committee notes that Decree No. 127/014 has been amended by Decree No. 126/019, of 6 May 2019, which was agreed in CONASSAT. The Committee notes, in particular, that section 1 of Decree No. 126/019 sets aside the time limit envisaged in section 16(2) of Decree No. 127/014 and, consequently, provides that: (i) occupational health and prevention services shall be established in companies and institutions with more than 300 workers, irrespective of their area of activity or nature; (ii) this requirement shall be gradually extended to include companies with between 50 and 300 workers, in accordance with the list of branches and activity sectors that CONASSAT will submit to the executive; and (iii) all companies and institutions with more than five workers, irrespective of the nature of their activity, shall set up occupational health and prevention services within a maximum of 18 months from the entry into force of Decree No. 126/019. The Committee also notes that section 3 of the Decree specifies that all of the companies and institutions covered by the requirement to have occupational health and prevention services shall have 180 days from the entry into force of the Decree on the expiry of the corresponding deadline to complete the establishment of such services.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that, irrespective of the number of workers, occupational health services are currently compulsory in the chemicals, drug, pharmaceutical, fossil fuel and allied industries (pursuant to Decree No. 128/014, as amended by Decree No. 109/017 of 24 April 2017); in collective healthcare institutions, medical mutuals and cooperatives (under Decree No. 197/014, of 16 July 2014); in the dairy and non-alcoholic drinks, beer and malted barley industries, which form part of the group of activities relating to the processing and preservation of food, drinks and tobacco (pursuant to Decree No. 242/018, of 6 August 2018); in activities deemed to be dock work (under section 15 of Decree No. 394/018, of 26 November 2018) and, finally, in some activities in the refrigeration and metal products, machinery and equipment industries (pursuant to Decree No. 127/019 of 6 May 2019). The Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on the progress made in the establishment of occupational health services for all workers in all branches of economic activity and in all companies. In particular, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the gradual extension to companies with between 50 and 300 workers of the requirement to have occupational health and prevention services, including the decrees adopted to extend the requirement, as well as on the inclusion of companies with between five and 50 workers.

Asbestos Convention, 1986 (No. 162)

Articles 3(1) and 5 of the Convention. Measures for the prevention and control of, and protection of workers against health hazards due to occupational exposure to asbestos. Inspection system and sanctions. The Committee previously noted that Decree No. 154/002 prohibits the manufacture, import and marketing of asbestos and requested the Government to provide information on the inspections conducted to control the prohibition of asbestos. In this respect, the Committee notes the Government's indication that: (i) inspections and controls relating to asbestos are conducted by the Environmental Working Conditions Division (CAT) of the General Labour and Social Security Inspectorate of the Ministry of Labour and Social Security, the Hazard Management Unit of the State Insurance Bank and the Ministry of Public Health; (ii) training for the personnel of the General Labour Inspectorate enables them to identify specific cases of exposure to asbestos; (iii) if the CAT detects the presence of asbestos in inspected workplaces, it shall immediately order the corresponding preventive measures, the removal of the carcinogenic product and the monitoring of the workers' health, and may even order closures in the event of non-compliance; and, (iv) either the General Labour Inspectorate or the Ministry of Public Health shall impose sanctions for failure to comply with the prohibition of the manufacture and marketing of products containing asbestos, while the National Directorate of the Environment, of the Ministry of Housing, Land Management and the Environment shall impose sanctions for failure to comply with the prohibition of marketing waste containing asbestos.

Article 17. Demolition of plants or structures containing asbestos and removal of asbestos. Preparation of a work plan in consultation with the workers or their representatives. Noting that no information has been provided in this respect, the Committee once again requests the Government to adopt the necessary measures to ensure that: (i) the demolition of plants or structures containing friable asbestos insulation materials, and the removal of asbestos from buildings or structures in which asbestos is liable to become airborne, are undertaken only by employers or contractors recognized by the competent authority as qualified to carry out such work; and (ii) employers or contractors shall draw up a work plan before commencing demolition work, in consultation with the workers or their representatives.

Article 19. Removal of waste containing asbestos. In reply to its previous comments, the Committee notes the Government's references to section 21 of Act No. 17283 on environmental protection, as amended in 2019, which provides, firstly, that it is in the general interest to protect the environment against any effects that may derive from the production, handling and any waste management operations and their elements, whatever their type and throughout their life cycle and, secondly, that the Ministry of Housing, Land Management and the Environment shall issue and apply the necessary measures to regulate the management of waste, of whatever type, including the production, collection, transport, storage, marketing, recycling and other forms of recovery, treatment and final disposal. The Committee notes that the Government has provided information on the Hazardous Waste Removal Guide, which was drawn up with the aim of training municipal personnel in the management of such waste, including asbestos, and the indication that there is a list of registered operators authorized to handle, transport, destroy and dispose of waste, including hazardous waste. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken to ensure that: (i) employers are required to remove waste containing asbestos in such a manner that it does not present a risk to the health of the workers concerned, including those handling asbestos waste, or the population living in the vicinity of the company; and (ii) the competent authority and the employers are required to adopt appropriate measures to prevent pollution of the general environment by asbestos dust released from workplaces.

Article 22(2). Establishment by employers of written policies and procedures on measures for the education and periodic training of workers on asbestos hazards. Noting that information has not been provided in this respect, the Committee once again requests the Government to adopt the necessary measures to ensure that employers establish written policies and procedures on measures for the education and periodic training of workers on asbestos hazards and methods of prevention and control.

Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela

Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981 (No. 155) (ratification: 1984)

The Committee notes the observations of the Confederation of Workers of Venezuela (CTV), received on 2 September 2015, and of the National Union of Workers of Venezuela (UNETE), received on 2 October 2015, and also the Government's reply to the latter, received on 8 December 2015. The Committee also notes the joint observations sent by UNETE, the CTV, the General Confederation of Labour (CGT) and the Confederation of Autonomous Trade Unions (CODESA), which were received on 8 and 12 September 2016, and also the Government's reply, received on 11 November 2016.

Articles 4 and 8 of the Convention. Formulating, implementing and periodically reviewing a coherent national policy on occupational safety and health and the working environment, and measures to give effect to the above-mentioned national policy in consultation with the most representative organizations of employers and workers concerned. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the Government's indication that in 2014 round-table meetings were held on occupational safety and health (OSH) conditions in various sectors of the economy with the participation of representatives of the most representative organizations of workers and employers. The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that the "National policy on prevention, safety and health at work" is defined in the Basic Act on prevention, conditions of work and the working environment (LOPCYMAT) and reiterates the relevant legal provisions. The Committee notes with regret that the Government does not refer to periodic reviews of national policy or to the manner in which consultations are held, nor does it mention which workers' and employers' organizations have been consulted in this regard. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to provide information on the content of its national OSH policy (beyond the provisions of LOPCYMAT). The Committee also requests the Government to provide specific information on the consultations held with the most representative employers' and workers' organizations concerned regarding the formulation, implementation and review of its national policy, as referred to in Article 4, and on the adoption of the measures referred to in Article 8.

Article 5(e). Protection of workers and their representatives from disciplinary measures as a result of actions properly taken by them in conformity with the national OSH policy. In its previous comment, the Committee noted the repeated allegations of various workers' organizations denouncing the unjustified dismissal of prevention delegates. The Committee also notes that both the CTV and UNETE in their respective observations, and UNETE, the CTV, the CGT and CODESA in their joint observations, reiterate these allegations. The Committee notes with deep regret that the Government does not provide any information on this matter. The Committee recalls that, as stated in paragraph 26 of its 2009 General Survey, ILO standards on occupational safety and health, the basic principle that workers and their representatives should be protected from victimization pursuant to Article 5(e) is one of the main elements to be included in the national policy, and is indicative of the central importance attributed to this principle. The Committee urges the Government to examine, together with the above-mentioned trade unions, the situation of all prevention delegates who have been the victims of harmful action and, in cases where they have been dismissed as a result of actions properly taken by them in conformity with the policy referred to by Article 4 of the Convention, to ensure that they are reinstated in their posts without loss of benefits. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in this respect.

Articles 6 and 15. Functions and responsibilities; coordination. The Committee notes the Government's statement, in reply to its previous request, that the National Council for Occupational Safety and Health established pursuant to section 36 of the LOPCYMAT is not operational. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on its plans to implement section 36 of the LOPCYMAT with regard to making the above-mentioned Council operational. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken or envisaged to ensure the necessary coordination between the various authorities and bodies responsible for giving effect to the provisions of the Convention. The Committee further requests the Government to provide information on consultations regarding these measures held with the most representative organizations of employers and workers, and also the results thereof.

Article 7. Reviews, either overall or in respect of particular areas, carried out at appropriate intervals. In its previous comment, the Committee observed that the information provided by the Government on reviews already undertaken or being undertaken in specific sectors, as set out in Article 7 of the Convention, was of a general nature and did not enable it to assess whether these reviews gave effect to this Article of the Convention. The Committee notes the Government's indication that industries carry out mandatory periodic reviews and report occupational diseases to the National Institute for Occupational Prevention, Health and Safety (INPSASEL), which compiles and standardizes this information, issues alerts and triggers the corresponding actions. The Government also communicates epidemiological bulletins for 2017 and part of 2018 containing statistical data disaggregated by sector on occupational diseases and accidents. However, the Committee notes that the Government does not indicate which problems it has been possible to identify as a result of the statistics or any effective methods developed to resolve them. The Committee requests the Government to provide specific, detailed information on the main problems identified as a result of the reviews carried out under Article 7 of the Convention, effective methods developed to resolve them, priorities of action taken or envisaged, and evaluation of the results obtained.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

[The Government is asked to reply in full to the present comments in 2022.]

Zimbabwe

Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981 (No. 155) (ratification: 2003)
Occupational Health Services Convention, 1985 (No. 161) (ratification: 2003)
Asbestos Convention, 1986 (No. 162) (ratification: 2003)
Chemicals Convention, 1990 (No. 170) (ratification: 1998)
Prevention of Major Industrial Accidents Convention, 1993 (No. 174) (ratification: 2003)
Safety and Health in Mines Convention, 1995 (No. 176) (ratification: 2003)

In order to provide a comprehensive view of the issues relating to the application of ratified Conventions on occupational safety and health (OSH), the Committee considers it appropriate to examine the following Conventions together: Conventions Nos 155 (occupational safety and health), 161 (occupational health services), 162 (asbestos), 170 (chemicals), 174 (prevention of major industrial accidents) and 176 (safety and health in mines).

The Committee takes note of the Government's report and the supplementary information in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020). The Committee notes the observations of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) received on 16 September 2020. The Committee also notes the observations of the Zimbabwe Congress of Trade Unions (ZCTU) received on 29 September 2020, as well as the Government's reply in its supplementary report.

Draft Occupational Safety and Health Act. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government in its report indicating that the new Occupational Safety and Health (OSH) Act, with the objective of achieving greater compliance with the OSH Conventions ratified by Zimbabwe, has been submitted to the Cabinet Committee on Legislation for subsequent submission to Cabinet. The Committee also notes the statement of the ZCTU that it has been party to the development of the Act. In this context, the Committee requests the Government to take into account the comments that it is making on the application of Conventions Nos 155, 161, 162, 170, 174 and 176. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the developments in this regard and to transmit a copy of any new legislation once it has been adopted.

A. General provisions

Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981 (No. 155)

Application of the Convention in practice. The Committee notes that, according to the observations of the ITUC, in 2018, the National Social Security Authority (NSSA) registered a spike in fatal workplace accidents, with 5,965 injuries and 70 fatalities recorded compared to 5,007 injuries and 65 fatalities recorded in 2017, indicating a 19 per cent increase. Mining, agriculture and forestry, metal production, transport and storage and manufacturing are among the most accident-prone sectors. In particular, the working conditions of healthcare workers in Zimbabwe is dire and health facilities are understaffed and have low OSH standards. The situation has worsened with the COVID-19 pandemic breakout as hospitals are faced with unreliable access to water, which impedes their efforts to implement hygiene measures. The ITUC calls for the taking of preventive and protective measures to fight COVID-19 and for the provision of adequate personal protective gear to healthcare workers.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that it has embarked on joint inspections so as to effectively carry out monitoring and inspections in workplaces on OSH matters even during the COVID-19 lockdown period. The Government indicates that 3,767 inspections have been undertaken for the period from 1 September 2019 to 30 September 2020, including 2,636 factory inspections and assessments conducted at various workplaces. The Committee also notes the information provided by the Government in its report on Convention No. 170 that it remains a challenge to transfer cases of violations detected to the court due to limited understanding of the judicial system on OSH issues and weak deterrent penalties. The Government indicates that, in this regard, awareness-raising activities and trainings are organized for the judicial system in order to facilitate prosecution. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments with respect to the observations of the ITUC. It also requests the Government to provide information on any measures taken or envisaged to address the increasing number of occupational accidents, and to provide statistics such as on occupational accidents and diseases broken down by sector of occupation, age and gender and on the development of the number of the workforce. The Committee further requests the Government to take adequate preventive and protective measures to ensure a safe working environment for all workers in the context of the COVID-19 pandemic, particularly healthcare workers.

Article 13. Protection of workers removed from situations presenting imminent and serious danger. The Committee notes the Government's indication, in reply to its previous comments, that paragraph 5(d) of the national OSH policy provides for workers' right to refuse to undertake any work that has not been rendered safe. The Committee also notes the Government's reference to the draft OSH Act, section 22(2) of which provides for workers' right to refuse to do work which is likely to cause imminent danger to his or her safety or health. The Committee requests the Government to take measures to ensure that workers who have removed themselves from a work situation which they have reasonable justification to believe presents an imminent and serious danger to their life or health shall be protected from undue consequences, and to provide information on any legislation adopted in this respect.

Article 16. Duties of the employer to ensure safety at the level of the undertaking. The Committee previously noted that the national legislation referenced by the Government did not appear to impose a general duty on employers to ensure that, so far as is reasonably practicable, the workplaces, machinery, equipment and processes under their control are safe and without risk.

The Committee notes the Government's information that the draft OSH Act explicitly outline the duties of employers to provide a safe working environment (section 21). The Committee requests the Government to take measures to ensure the draft OSH Act provides for a general duty on employers to, so far as is reasonably practicable, ensure safety at the level of the undertaking, as required by Article 16 of the Convention.

B. Protection from specific risks

Asbestos Convention, 1986 (No. 162)

Legislation. The Committee previously noted the Government's indication that it envisaged the adoption of legislation on OSH and of regulations on asbestos, which would give wider coverage to the control of occupational exposure to chrysotile (white asbestos). The Committee notes the observations of the ZCTU, according to which, the current regulations do not cover all forms of asbestos. The Committee also notes the Government's indication in its report that the envisaged regulation on asbestos will cover all forms of asbestos as provided for by Article 2 of the Convention and give effect to all the provisions of the Convention. Noting that the Government has been referring to the asbestos regulations since 2014, the Committee requests the Government to ensure that, in the context of the current legislative reform, full effect is given to: Article 14 (labelling of asbestos and products containing asbestos); Article 15(4) (provision of adequate respiratory protective equipment by the employer); Article 17 (demolition of plants and structures containing asbestos); and Article 20(4) (workers' and their representatives' right to request to appeal to the competent authority concerning the results of the monitoring of the working environment). The Committee also requests the Government to continue providing information on any progress made regarding the adoption of the envisaged regulation on asbestos, and to provide a copy once adopted.

Article 6(2) and (3) of the Convention. Cooperation between employers and preparation of procedures for dealing with emergency situations. The Committee previously noted the promotional activities carried out by the National Social Security Authority (NSSA for the establishment of emergency preparedness programmes and industrial assessments on this subject in all major sectors of the economy.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that the envisaged regulation on asbestos in this regard will provide for the establishment of a cooperation mechanism between employers operating at the same workplace, as well as the draft OSH Act. The Committee requests the Government to ensure that the envisaged regulation on asbestos and the new OSH Act give full effect to this Article. Pending their adoption, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on how employers undertaking activities simultaneously at one workplace cooperate in order to comply with health and safety measures in practice, as prescribed by Article 6(2) of the Convention.

Article 15(1) and (2). Exposure limits and periodic review. The Committee previously noted that the occupational exposure limit was fixed at 0.5f/ml, with a review planned aimed at lowering the limit to 0.1f/ml. In this respect the Committee notes the Government's indication that the exposure limit for chrysotile asbestos has been reviewed and is set at 0.1f/ml. The Government also states that the exposure limit is provided for by the 2017 NSSA Guidelines for Occupational Exposure Limits for Chemical Contaminants and Dusts, and that the guidelines will further be upgraded to regulatory provisions under the envisaged hazardous substances regulation and asbestos regulation. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on any progress made regarding the adoption of relevant regulatory provisions prescribing limits for the exposure of workers to asbestos or other exposure criteria and the periodic review in this regard, due consideration being given to technological progress and advances in technological and scientific knowledge.

Article 21. Medical examinations. Following its previous comments, the Committee notes the Government's repeated reference to the Third Schedule of SI (Statutory Instrument) 68 of 1990 on Accident Prevention and Workers Compensation (sections 1(l) and 5(c)) and the Factories and Works (General) Regulations of 1976 (section 11), which provide for medical examinations for workers potentially exposed to harmful substances in all industries, including the chrysotile asbestos industry. Additionally, Part V of the Pneumoconiosis Act provides for medical examinations and, in particular, chest x-rays, for workers working in dusty occupations (defined in the Act to include work in or on a mining location or any other area where there is a dust-producing process). The Government also indicates that specific provisions on medical examinations will further be provided for by the envisaged regulation on asbestos. The Committee recalls that, pursuant to Article 21(1) of the Convention, workers must be provided with such medical examinations as are necessary to supervise their health in relation to the occupational hazard, and to diagnose occupational diseases caused by exposure to asbestos, which may require examination after the termination of employment. The Committee requests the Government to ensure that specific provisions on medical examination for workers exposed to asbestos, including after their employment is terminated or ended, are included in the envisaged regulation on asbestos, in conformity with Article 21 of the Convention. Pending the adoption of such regulation, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on how medical examinations for workers exposed to asbestos are carried out in practice, under the current legislative provisions of a general nature.

Application of Convention No. 162 in practice. The Committee notes the Government's indication that there have not been any contraventions reported to date. It also states that the OSH Inspectorate of the NSSA regularly carries out inspections in chrysotile asbestos manufacturing factories to ensure their compliance with the Factories and Works Act and other related legislative provisions. The Government further indicates that there are challenges of implementation due to limited resources with respect to the acquisition of equipment and accessories. The Committee requests the Government to strengthen its efforts to provide statistical information on the application of the Convention, including the relevant reports of the NSSA in this regard, specifically information on the number of workers covered by the legislation, the number of occupational diseases reported as being caused by asbestos and the number and nature of contraventions reported.

Chemicals Convention, 1990 (No. 170)

Article 6(1) of the Convention. Classification systems. Following its previous comments, the Committee notes the Government's indication that SI 12 of 2007 on Hazardous Substances, Pesticides and other Toxic Substances Regulations is repealed by SI 268 of 2018 on Hazardous Substances General Regulations, which provides for labelling for different hazardous substances. The Committee observes that SI 268 of 2018 does not appear to contain specific criteria for the classification of all chemicals. The Government indicates that, considering the limitation in national legislation with regard to the requirements of Article 6(1) of the Convention, a specific regulation addressing hazardous chemical agents will be formulated together with the draft OSH Act, in order to provide specific guidance on the classification and labelling of chemicals in accordance with the Globally Harmonized System of Classification and Labelling of Chemicals. The Committee therefore requests the Government to ensure the establishment of systems and specific criteria for the classification of all chemicals, as well as procedures for their labelling, including through the adoption of the envisaged regulation on hazardous chemical agents. Pending the adoption of such regulation, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on how chemicals are classified in practice as well as their labelling.

Application of Convention No. 170 in practice. The Committee previously noted that the NSSA and the Environmental Management Agency (EMA) monitor and enforce the legislative provisions relative to the registration and labelling of chemicals and impose penalties when violations are detected.

The Committee notes that, according to the observations of the ZCTU, due to the limits of the monitoring system, there are still cases in which employers expose workers to hazardous work environments where non-labelled chemicals are used. The Committee notes the Government's indication that during 4,285 inspections in various sectors, 117 cases of chemical exposure were discovered, including 17 in agriculture, but that the statistics are not disaggregated by specific chemical stressor. The Government also states that improvement notices were issued in most cases of violations detected. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on the number of inspections conducted in this regard, the number and nature of contraventions reported, and the number and nature of penalties imposed.

Prevention of Major Industrial Accidents Convention, 1993 (No. 174)

Articles 4 and 17 of the Convention. Formulation, implementation and periodic review of a coherent national policy and establishment of a comprehensive siting policy. Following its previous comments, the Committee notes the observations of the ZCTU that the Government has not started the legislative review regarding the siting of major hazard installations.

The Committee also notes the Government's indication in its report that a specific regulation on the prevention of major industrial accidents will be developed incorporating key provisions of the Convention. The Government states that this envisaged regulation will include provisions on the siting of major hazard installations. The Committee further notes the Government's indication that the national OSH policy, as revised in 2019, indicates in paragraph 4.18 that major accident hazards shall be managed through an effective systems approach including proper siting of the major hazard installation following policies and procedures, as spelt out by the Government from time to time. With reference to the additional points raised in the corresponding direct request, the Committee urges the Government to strengthen its efforts to give full effect to the Convention. It requests the Government to continue providing information on any progress in this regard, including provisions on the siting of major hazard installations, and to provide a copy of the text of the above regulation once adopted. The Committee also requests the Government to continue providing information on the implementation and periodic review of the national OSH policy regarding the aspects specific to major hazard installations, in consultation with the most representative organizations of employers and workers and with other interested parties who may be affected.

C. Protection in specific branches of activity

Safety and Health in Mines Convention, 1995 (No. 176)

Article 16(2) of the Convention. Inspection services and application of the Convention in practice. The Committee notes the reference of the ITUC in its observations to several fatal accidents in the mining industry registered in 2018–19, including two major accidents which killed 37 persons. The ITUC also refers to the 2018 report of the Zimbabwe Chamber of Mines, according to which 81 fatal accidents were recorded in 2018, in comparison with 32 in 2017, representing an increase of 153 per cent. Falls of ground (48 per cent), gas accidents (14.8 per cent) and shaft accidents (7.4 per cent) were the major causes of fatal accidents. The ITUC indicates that the high rate of fatal accidents results from poor design of mining sites and a lack of supervision of mining operations. It alleges that there is non-compliance with safety and hygiene rules in the mining sector aimed at protecting workers from COVID-19. The Committee further notes the observations of the ZCTU referring to the limited resources available that hamper the implementation of monitoring activities.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that limited resources are available for monitoring, and that this results from an unfavourable economic situation. The Government also states that strategies will be put in place to ensure that the few available resources are used for effective inspection activities. The Committee notes with concern the significant increase in fatal accidents in the mining sector, and urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the availability of the necessary resources for appropriate inspection services in this regard. It requests the Government to provide information on the number of inspections undertaken in mines, the number of cases of non-compliance detected and the issues to which they relate, as well as the remedial measures ordered and penalties imposed. It further requests the Government to provide detailed information on the number of occupational accidents in the mining sector, including fatal occupational accidents, disaggregated by cause and by age.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Direct requests

In addition, requests regarding certain matters are being addressed directly to the following States: Convention No. 13 (Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela); Convention No. 45 (Kyrgyzstan, Tajikistan, Tunisia, Uganda, Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela, Viet Nam); Convention No. 62 (Democratic Republic of the Congo, Tunisia); Convention No. 115 (Tajikistan, Turkey, Ukraine, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland: Bermuda, Guernsey and Jersey, Uruguay); Convention No. 119 (Democratic Republic of the Congo, Kyrgyzstan, Tajikistan, Turkey, Ukraine); Convention No. 120 (Democratic Republic of the Congo, Kyrgyzstan, Tajikistan, Tunisia, Ukraine, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela, Viet Nam); Convention No. 127 (Turkey, Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela); Convention No. 136 (Uruguay); Convention No. 139 (Netherlands, Russian Federation, Ukraine, Uruguay, Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela); Convention No. 148 (Netherlands, Tajikistan, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland: Anguilla, United Republic of Tanzania, Zambia); Convention No. 155 (Belize, Brazil, China, Côte d'Ivoire, Mali, Tajikistan, Turkey, Ukraine, Uruguay, Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela, Viet Nam, Zimbabwe); Convention No. 161 (Côte d'Ivoire, Turkey, Ukraine, Uruguay, Zimbabwe); Convention No. 162 (Uganda, Uruguay, Zimbabwe); Convention No. 167 (Belgium, China, Turkey, Uruguay); Convention No. 170 (Belgium, China, Cyprus, Netherlands, United Republic of Tanzania); Convention No. 174 (Ukraine, Zimbabwe); Convention No. 176 (Mongolia, Turkey, Ukraine, United States of America, Uruguay, Zambia, Zimbabwe); Convention No. 184 (Ukraine, Uruguay); Convention No. 187 (Burkina Faso, Chile, Côte d'Ivoire, Iraq, Kazakhstan, Portugal, Turkey, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, Viet Nam).

The Committee noted the information supplied by the following State in answer to a direct request with regard to: Convention No. 45 (Ukraine).

Supplementary information received in 2020 to the 2019 reports

The following Member States have provided supplementary information in 2020. Their examination by the CEACR have however not led to a change to the CEACR comments issued in 2019: Convention No. 13 (Uruguay); Convention No. 45 (Turkey, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland: Falkland Islands: Malvinas and Gibraltar); Convention No. 115 (United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland: Bermuda, Guernsey and Jersey); Convention No. 119 (Uruguay); Convention No. 120 (Uruguay); Convention No. 136 (Uruguay); Convention No. 139 (Uruguay); Convention No. 148 (United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland: Guernsey, Uruguay); Convention No. 176 (Uruguay); Convention No. 184 (Uruguay).

Workmen's Compensation (Accidents) Convention, 1925 (No. 17) (ratification: 2004)

The Committee notes the observations of the Confederation of Trade Unions of Armenia (CTUA) communicated with the Government's report.

Article 11 of the Convention. Compensation of industrial accidents in the event of the insolvency of the employer or insurer. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to take the necessary measures, without further delay, to ensure that the 800 injured workers employed by companies liquidated after 2004 who, following the adoption of Governmental Decision No. 1094-N of 2004, had not been paid compensation, be duly compensated. The Committee notes the indication by the Government that there are currently around 210 employees of liquidated companies who are entitled to compensation for a work-related accident but who have not yet been compensated, because of the non-existence of the subsequent proprietors of the liquidated companies. The Committee further notes that, according to the Government, new measures are under discussion, with a view to implementing the right to compensation of the persons concerned. In this regard, the Committee notes the indication by the CTUA that the Ministry of Labour and Social Issues has submitted for public discussion a draft law on amendments and changes to the Civil Code, that would provide for the payment of compensation out of the State Budget for workers who have not received any compensation following a work-related accident or occupational disease. Recalling that it has been raising this issue since 2013, the Committee urges the Government to provide compensation for the above-mentioned workers currently seeking it, and for similarly situated workers henceforth. In this connection, the Committee expects that the Government will soon report on the adoption of measures necessary to ensure the due and effective compensation of injured workers and their dependents in the event of the insolvency of the employer or insurer and requests the Government to provide information on any measures taken or envisaged in this regard.

The Committee has been informed that, based on the recommendations of the Standards Review Mechanism Tripartite Working Group (SRM Tripartite Working Group), the Governing Body has decided that member States for which the Convention is in force should be encouraged to ratify the more recent Employment Injury Benefits Convention, 1964 [Schedule I amended in 1980] (No. 121), or the Social Security (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1952 (No. 102), and accept its Part VI (see GB.328/LILS/2/1). Conventions Nos 121 and 102 reflect the more modern approach to employment injury benefits. The Committee therefore encourages the Government to follow up the Governing Body's decision at its 328th Session (October–November 2016) approving the recommendations of the SRM Tripartite Working Group and to consider ratifying Convention No. 121 or Convention No. 102 (Part VI) as the most up-to-date instruments in this subject area.

Equality of Treatment (Accident Compensation) Convention, 1925 (No. 19) (ratification: 1978)

The Committee notes with deep concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments. The Committee informs the Government that, if it has not supplied replies to the points raised by 1 September 2021, then it may proceed with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the information at its disposal at its next session.

Article 1(2) of the Convention. Equality of treatment in relation to compensation for industrial accidents. Ever since the Convention was ratified in 1978, the Committee has been drawing the Government's attention to the need to amend section 29 of Decree No. 57-245 of 1957 concerning compensation for industrial accidents and occupational diseases in order to bring the national regulations into conformity with Article 1(2) of the Convention, according to which the nationals of States that have ratified the Convention and their dependants must receive the same treatment as Djibouti grants to its own nationals in respect of accident compensation. Under the terms of the Decree No. 57-245 of 1957, unlike nationals, foreign workers injured in industrial accidents who transfer their residence abroad no longer receive a periodic payment but a lump-sum payment equal to three times the periodic payment they received previously. The Committee notes that the Government refers in its report to Act No. 154/AN/02/4ème-L of 31 December 2002 codifying the functioning of the Social Protection Institute (OPS) and the general retirement scheme for employees, indicating that the Act does not prescribe different treatment for national and foreign employees and their dependants with regard to compensation for industrial accidents and, in accordance with the Convention, does not impose any residence requirement for foreign workers to be entitled to benefits. The Committee observes, however, that the above-mentioned Act does not primarily deal with periodic payments for industrial accidents but rather with the issue of those payments being combined with retirement benefits. It further observes that, in its report on the Workmen's Compensation (Accidents) Convention, 1925 (No. 17), the Government continues to refer to the provisions of Decree No. 57-245 of 1957 in the context of the regulations governing periodic payments for industrial accidents. In view of the above, the Committee again requests that the Government amend section 29 of Decree No. 57-245 of 1957 so as to bring the national legislation into full conformity with Article 1(2) of the Convention.

Sickness Insurance (Industry) Convention, 1927 (No. 24) (ratification: 1978)

The Committee notes with deep concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments. The Committee informs the Government that, if it has not supplied replies to the points raised by 1 September 2021, then it may proceed with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the information at its disposal at its next session.

Article 1 of the Convention. Setting up a system of compulsory sickness insurance. The Committee notes that Act No. 212/AN/07/5ème-L establishing the National Social Security Fund (CNSS) provides that new complementary social instruments such as sickness insurance will be instituted by means of regulations (section 5 of the Act). It also notes the adoption of Act No. 199/AN/13/6ème-L of 20 February 2013 extending treatment coverage to self-employed workers and of Decree No. 2013-055/PR/MTRA of 11 April 2013 establishing CNSS registration procedures and contributions for self-employed workers. The Government states that these items of legislation are the precursor to establishing a universal sickness insurance system in Djibouti in the near future. The Committee hopes that once this insurance system is established it will cover the payment of sickness benefits to insured persons, which are currently covered by employers, contrary to the terms of the Convention. It requests the Government to keep it informed of any developments regarding the introduction of a universal sickness insurance system.

The Committee expects that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Invalidity Insurance (Industry, etc.) Convention, 1933 (No. 37) (ratification: 1978)

Invalidity Insurance (Agriculture) Convention, 1933 (No. 38) (ratification: 1978)

The Committee notes with deep concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments. The Committee informs the Government that, if it has not supplied replies to the points raised by 1 September 2021, then it may proceed with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the information at its disposal at its next session.

Establishment of a compulsory invalidity insurance scheme. With reference to its observation relating to the Sickness Insurance (Industry) Convention, 1927 (No. 24), the Committee recalls that the national social protection system has been undergoing restructuring for a number of years, which involves the merger of various insurance funds in the interests of more efficient management. In this context, although the social protection system has no specific branch for invalidity benefits, the Government indicates that Act No. 154/AN/02/4ème-L of 31 January 2002 codifying the operation of the Social Protection Institute (OPS) and the general retirement scheme for salaried employees, contains several provisions that authorize workers aged 50 years and over who are affected by a permanent physical or mental impairment to claim an early retirement pension when they have accrued a minimum of 240 contribution months (section 60 ff.). The Committee emphasizes that, even though it is justified in the context of early retirement, the fixing of a minimum age at which a person can receive invalidity benefit, as set forth by Act No. 154, is in breach of Article 4 of Convention No. 37 and the Invalidity Insurance (Agriculture) Convention, 1933 (No. 38). Moreover, the length of the qualifying period for entitlement to invalidity benefit must not, according to Article 5(2) of Conventions Nos 37 and 38, exceed 60 contribution months. In view of the failure of these provisions to give effect to the main requirements of Conventions Nos 37 and 38, the Committee requests the Government to carry out the feasibility studies needed to establish an invalidity insurance scheme.

The Committee expects that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Equality of Treatment (Social Security) Convention, 1962 (No. 118) (ratification: 1967)

The Committee notes with deep concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments. The Committee informs the Government that, if it has not supplied replies to the points raised by 1 September 2021, then it may proceed with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the information at its disposal at its next session.

Article 5 of the Convention. Payment of benefits in the case of residence abroad. Referring to its previous comments, the Committee notes with interest the conclusion in 2012 of the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) General Convention on Social Security, which aims in particular to enable migrant workers who have worked in one of the 15 ECOWAS member States to exercise their right to social security in their country of origin through the coordination of national social security systems. However, since Cabo Verde is the only other ECOWAS member State that has ratified Convention No. 118, the Committee requests the Government once again to indicate whether, as it understands from its reading of section 91 of the Social Security Code, nationals of any State that has accepted the obligations of the Convention for the corresponding branch should in principle be able to claim payment of their benefits in the case of residence abroad. If so, the Committee requests the Government to indicate whether a procedure for the transfer of benefits abroad has been established by the National Social Security Fund to meet any requests for the transfer of benefits abroad. In addition, the Committee requests the Government to clarify whether any Guinean nationals transferring their residence abroad would also be entitled to have their benefits transferred abroad, in accordance with the principle of equal treatment established under Article 5 of the Convention.

Article 6. Payment of family benefit. Referring to the comments it has been formulating for many years regarding the provision of family allowances in respect of children residing abroad, the Committee notes that, under section 94(2) of the Social Security Code, to be entitled to family benefit, dependent children "must reside in the Republic of Guinea, subject to the special provisions of the international Conventions on social security of the International Labour Office, reciprocal agreements or bilateral or multilateral agreements". With respect to reciprocal agreements or bilateral or multilateral agreements, the Committee recalls that to date Guinea has concluded no agreement of this sort for the payment of family allowances in respect of children residing abroad. Regarding the special provisions of the ILO Conventions, it recalls that under Article 6 of Convention No. 118 any State which has accepted the obligations of the Convention for branch (i) (family benefit) must guarantee payment of family allowances both to its own nationals and to the nationals of any other Member which has accepted the obligations of the Convention for that branch, as well as for refugees and stateless persons, in respect of children who reside on the territory of any such State, under conditions and within limits to be agreed upon by the States concerned. The Committee notes that the Government's report does not provide any information in this respect and hopes that the Government will be able to confirm formally in its next report that the payment of family benefit will also be extended to cover insured persons up to date with their contributions (whether they are nationals, refugees, stateless persons or nationals of any other States which have accepted the obligations of the Convention for branch (i)) whose children reside in the territory of one of these States and not in Guinea. The Committee also requests information as to how the condition of residence is dispensed with in these cases for the application of section 99(2) of the Code, which only recognizes as dependent those children "that live with the insured person", and also for section 101, which makes payment of family allowances subject to an annual medical examination of the child, up to the age where he or she comes under the school medical service, and the regular medical care for beneficiaries of school age attending courses in educational or vocational training establishments.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Workmen's Compensation (Occupational Diseases) Convention (Revised), 1934 (No. 42) (ratification: 1955)

The Committee notes the observations of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), received on 25 September 2020, and requests the Government to provide information in response to these observations.

The Committee notes with deep concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments. The Committee informs the Government that, if it has not supplied replies to the points raised by 1 September 2021, then it may proceed with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the information at its disposal at its next session.

The Committee notes the observations of the Confederation of Public and Private Sector Workers (CTSP), received on 1 September 2019, concerning the application of Conventions Nos 12, 17, 24, 25 and 42. The Committee notes that the CTSP alleges the dysfunction of the Board of Directors of Social Security Organisations (CAOSS), as well as the need to carry out actuarial studies and audits on the Employment Injury, Sickness and Maternity Insurance Office (OFATMA) and resuming discussions on a thorough reform of the Ministry of Social Affairs and Labour (MAST), in the framework of social dialogue. At the same time, the Committee notes the indication that a campaign for the ratification of Convention No. 102 and the implementation of Recommendation No. 202 was conducted. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments on these observations.

The Committee notes the observations of the Confederation of Public and Private Sector Workers (CTSP), received on 30 August 2017 and 29 August 2018, and the observations of the Association of Haitian Industries (ADIH), received on 31 August 2018, concerning the application of ratified Conventions on social security. The Committee notes with deep concern that the Government's reports for Conventions Nos 12, 17, 24, 25 and 42 have not been received. While it is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments initially made in 2012, the Committee notes the Government's communication received on 30 October 2018 in which it informs the Committee that, further to the conclusions of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards, it has requested ILO technical assistance with a view to helping in the presentation of the reports due, strengthening the inspection services, consolidating social dialogue for the continuation of social reforms, and addressing the other points raised by the Conference Committee. The Government adds that it hopes to receive the requested assistance before the next session of the International Labour Conference. The Committee hopes that this technical assistance will be provided without delay and that it will give rise to timely delivery of all outstanding reports. It also requests the Government to send its comments on the observations of the CTSP and the ADIH.

The Committee notes the observations made by the Confederation of Public and Private Sector Workers (CTSP), received on 31 August 2016, by which it reiterated most of the issues raised previously, indicating that, even though some state efforts to increase the coverage of the insurance have been visible, these were focused on the capital city, leaving apart the people living in rural areas.

The Committee notes that on 15 September 2015 the Confederation of Public and Private Sector Workers (CTSP) provided its observations concerning the application of the Conventions under examination. The CTSP indicates that the affiliation of employers to the Employment Injury, Sickness and Maternity Insurance Office (OFATMA), although a legal obligation, is a reality in practice for less than 5 per cent of workers. In the specific case of agricultural workers, the CTSP considers that it is necessary to take urgent measures to extend effective coverage by the OFATMA, as they represent the majority of workers in the country and produce 30 per cent of the gross domestic product, and yet they remain without any social protection.

The Committee is fully aware that the Government indicated in its last report that the Act of 28 August 1967, establishing the OFATMA, covers all dependent workers irrespective of their sector of activity, but that the absence of formal agricultural enterprises means that most agricultural workers are engaged in family subsistence agriculture and are excluded from the scope of the social security legislation. Nevertheless, the Committee observes that the application of the existing legislation appears to give rise to difficulties, even with regard to workers in the formal economy. Moreover, the sickness insurance scheme has never been established, even though the Government has indicated that it is pursuing its efforts to establish progressively a sickness insurance branch covering the whole of the population and to enable OFATMA to regain the trust of the population.

With a view to better assessing the challenges facing the country in the application of the social security Conventions and providing better support for the initiatives taken in this respect, the Committee requests the Government to provide further information in its next report concerning the functioning of the employment injury scheme administered by OFATMA (numbers covered, amount of contributions collected annually, number of employment accidents and occupational diseases recorded, amount of benefits paid for employment injury). Please include information on strategies for increasing participation in and utilization of OFATMA services by the eligible populations.

International assistance. The Committee notes that the Government is receiving substantial support from the ILO and the international community, particularly in the field of labour inspection. Moreover, since 2010, the ILO and the United Nations system as a whole have made available to the Government their expertise for the establishment of a social protection floor. The Committee considers that it is necessary for the Government to envisage as a priority the establishment of mechanisms to provide the population as a whole, including informal workers and their families, with access to essential health care and a minimum income when their earnings capacity is affected as a result of sickness, employment accident or occupational disease. In this regard, the International Labour Conference adopted the Social Protection Floors Recommendation (No. 202) in 2012, with a view to the establishment of basic social security guarantees to prevent and alleviate poverty, vulnerability and social exclusion. In this connection, the implementation of Conventions and of Recommendation No. 202 should continue in parallel, seeking and exploiting synergies and complementarity.

The Committee recalls that the establishment of a social protection floor was included by the Haitian Government as one of the elements of the Action Plan for National Recovery and Development of Haiti, adopted in March 2010. However, the Government has not yet provided any information on the measures adopted to achieve this objective. The Committee notes, among other matters, the conclusion in 2010 of a national programme for the promotion of decent work which includes an item dedicated to the establishment of the social protection system under the social security Conventions ratified by Haiti.

Conclusions and recommendations of the Standards Review Mechanism. The Committee notes that, at its 328th Session in October 2016, the Governing Body of the ILO adopted the conclusions and recommendations formulated by the Standards Review Mechanism Tripartite Working Group (SRM TWG), recalling that Conventions Nos 17, 24, 25 and 42 to which Haiti is party are outdated and charging the Office with follow-up work aimed at encouraging States party only to these Conventions to ratify the following instruments as they represent the most up-to-date standards:

- As regards employment injury: the Employment Injury Benefits Convention, 1964 [Schedule I amended in 1980] (No. 121) and/or the Social Security (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1952 (No. 102) and accept the obligations in its Part VI.
- As regards medical care and sickness benefit: the Medical Care and Sickness Benefits Convention, 1969 (No. 130) and/or the Social Security (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1952 (No. 102), and accept the obligations in its Parts II and III.

The Committee expects that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Workmen's Compensation (Accidents) Convention, 1925 (No. 17) (ratification: 1964)

Legislative reform. Further to its previous comments, in which it took note of the ongoing process of amendment of the Work Injury Benefits Act, 2007 (WIBA, 2007) and development of a new legislation that would address current gaps, the Committee notes the indication provided by the Government in its report that a Bill is now before the National Treasury to seek concurrence on the financial implications if enacted. The Committee further notes with interest that the Government has initiated a process to develop the Occupational Diseases Fund established by the Bill into a social insurance-based employment injury scheme, and that the first high-level Social dialogue meeting to address this matter was held on 23 September 2020. The Committee expects that these legislative developments will give full effect to the Convention and that its comments will be duly taken into account for this purpose. The Committee requests the Government to keep it informed of the adoption of the bill and of the establishment of the Occupational Diseases Fund, and of the adoption of any other measures related to their implementation.

Article 5 of the Convention. Payment of compensation for permanent incapacity or death in the form of periodical payments. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, in accordance with section 30 of the WIBA, 2007, an employee who suffered permanent disablement was entitled to a lump-sum payment equivalent to 96 months' earnings. It invited the Government to review the WIBA, 2007, so as to compensate victims of occupational accidents suffering permanent incapacity, or their dependants in cases of fatal accidents, with periodical payments and to limit compensation by way of lump sum to cases where the competent authority was satisfied that it would be properly utilized. The Committee notes the indication provided by the Government that the new social insurance-based employment injury scheme "will introduce periodical payments for victims of occupational accidents suffering permanent incapacity or survivors of victims of occupational fatalities", and that in cases of payment of a lump sum, the Government agency under which the scheme will be administered will ensure that compensation will be paid on assurance that the lump sum will be properly utilized. The Committee hopes that the Government will take the necessary measures to ensure that permanently injured workers or their dependents, as the case may be, are provided with compensation in the form of periodical payments, in accordance with Article 5 of the Convention, under the new employment injury insurance scheme. The Committee also hopes that, in cases where compensation is paid in the form of a lump sum, the Government will put in place the necessary safeguards to ensure that it is properly used by beneficiaries. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken for these purposes upon adoption of the new employment injury insurance scheme.

Articles 9 and 10. Provision of medical, surgical and pharmaceutical aid free of charge. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that section 47 of the WIBA, 2007, provides that an employer must defray reasonably incurred medical expenses which occurred after an occupational accident. The Committee further noted the indication by the Government that the term "reasonable expenses" would be defined at the occasion of the review of the WIBA, 2007, so as to include all medical intervention necessary and welcomed the Government's indication that Clause 55 of the Bill would contain a list of the expenses incurred by an employee as the result of an accident arising out of, and in the course of, the employee's employment to be defrayed by the employer. The Committee hopes that the Government will take the necessary measures, without further delay, to ensure that injured workers are provided, free of charge, with all the medical, surgical and pharmaceutical aid as well as with the artificial limbs and surgical appliances that are recognized to be necessary in consequence of accidents at work, without limitation of cost, with a view to give full effect to Articles 9 and 10 of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the legislative provisions and other measures adopted or envisaged for that purpose.

Article 11. Compensation of industrial accidents in the event of the insolvency of the employer or insurer. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the WIBA, 2007, did not provide the necessary arrangements to ensure in all circumstances, in the event of the insolvency of the employer or insurer, the payment of compensation to workers who suffer personal injury due to industrial accidents, as required by Article 11 of the Convention. The Committee hopes that the Government will take advantage of the ongoing legislative reform to address this issue and requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken or envisaged to ensure that victims of occupational accidents and their dependents are provided with the compensation they are entitled to in all circumstances, in line with Article 11 of the Convention.

The Committee has been informed that, based on the recommendations of the Standards Review Mechanism Tripartite Working Group (SRM Tripartite Working Group), the Governing Body has decided that member States for which the Convention is in force should be encouraged to ratify the more recent Employment Injury Benefits Convention, 1964 [Schedule I amended in 1980] (No. 121), or the Social Security (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1952 (No. 102), and accept its Part VI (see GB.328/LILS/2/1). Conventions Nos 121 and 102 reflect the more modern approach to employment injury benefits. The Committee therefore encourages the Government to follow up the Governing Body's decision at its 328th Session (October–November 2016) approving the recommendations of the SRM Tripartite Working Group and to consider ratifying Convention No. 121 or Convention No. 102 (Part VI) as the most up-to-date instruments in this subject area, taking opportunity of the ongoing legislative review and of the establishment of an employment injury insurance scheme.

Workmen's Compensation (Accidents) Convention, 1925 (No. 17) (ratification: 1980)

The Committee notes with deep concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments. The Committee informs the Government that, if it has not supplied replies to the points raised by 1 September 2021, then it may proceed with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the information at its disposal at its next session.

With reference to its previous observation, the Committee notes the reply of the Government that, contrary to Article 7 of the Convention, no provision is made in national legislation for the payment of additional compensation for injured workers requiring the constant help of another person; and that compensation for all expenses (medical, surgical or pharmaceutical, etc.) is limited to 20,000 East Caribbean dollars, whereas no such ceiling is foreseen in the Convention in case of occupational accident (Articles 9 and 10 of the Convention). The Committee regrets to note that since the entry into force of the Convention in 1980 the Government has been unable to bring the provisions of the national legislation in conformity with Articles 7, 9 and 10 of the Convention. In this situation, the Committee deems it necessary to ask the Government to undertake an actuarial study which will determine the financial implications of the introduction into the national insurance scheme of the benefits guaranteed by these Articles of the Convention. The Committee wishes to remind the Government of the possibility to avail itself of the technical assistance of the Office in this respect.

Equality of Treatment (Social Security) Convention, 1962 (No. 118) (ratification: 1965)

Articles 4 and 5 of the Convention. Payment of old-age, invalidity and survivors' benefits in the case of residence abroad. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to bring the legislation into full conformity with the Convention by removing the restrictions relating to the payment of old-age, invalidity and survivors' benefits to Tunisian nationals where the latter are not resident in Tunisia at the date on which the application for benefits is made (section 49 of Decree No. 74-499 of 27 April 1974 and section 77 of Act No. 81-6 of 12 February 1981). The Committee notes the reply provided by the Government in its report concerning the measures taken with a view to ensure the application in practice of Article 4 and 5 of the Convention. It notes, in particular, that in line with the instructions of the Ministry of Social Affairs of 2007 and 2016 on the application of the Circular of the Tunisian Central Bank No. 93/21 of 10 December 1993, as modified by Circular 2007–21 of 14 August 2007, the National Social Security Fund (CNSS) transfers old-age, invalidity and survivors' benefits abroad to Tunisian nationals living abroad, nationals of countries that have concluded bilateral agreements with Tunisia and nationals of European Union (EU) countries that are not bound by bilateral agreements with Tunisia, when they reside in their country of origin. The Government also indicates that, by virtue of the many bilateral agreements on social security concluded by Tunisia with other countries such as France, pensions are also transferred to third countries bound to both countries by instruments of coordination in the area of social security. Taking this into consideration, the Government is of the view that the incompatibility of the legislation with Articles 4 and 5 of the Convention is largely superseded by the multiplicity of international social security agreements providing for the export of benefits, which give effect to the above-mentioned Articles in practice. Lastly, the Committee notes once again the Government's indication that a draft law and decree has been prepared with a view to ensuring the conformity of the national legislation with the Government's obligations under the Convention. Taking note of the information provided by the Government on the measures taken to ensure in practice the payment of social security benefits to Tunisian nationals residing abroad in the same way as foreign nationals, the Committee recalls that applying the Convention also requires the adoption of legislative provision that give effect to its provisions. The Committee firmly hopes that the Government will adopt, without any further delay, the legislative amendments that are necessary to put the national legislation in full conformity with Articles 4 and 5 of the Convention by removing the condition of residence at the time of application to which nationals are subject for the payment of old-age, invalidity and survivor's benefits abroad. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the legislative measures adopted in this regard and on any developments concerning the conclusion of additional bilateral or multilateral agreements for the maintenance of social security rights and payment of benefits abroad, notably with the European Union. Lastly, the Committee requests the Government to provide statistical information concerning the transfer of social security benefits abroad for the branches of the Convention accepted by Tunisia.

Workmen's Compensation (Accidents) Convention, 1925 (No. 17)

Article 7 of the Convention. Additional compensation for persons in need of constant help. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, according to section 16 of the Social Security (Employment Injuries Insurance) Act No. 10 of 1952, the disablement pension to which victims of employment injury are entitled can be increased for those who needed constant attendance, but only for persons with an assessed disability of 100 per cent. On this basis, the Committee requested the Government to provide information on any form of supplementary assistance available to those with a permanent disability of less than 100 per cent who require the constant help of another person. The Committee notes the reply provided by the Government in its report. according to which the above-mentioned provision of the national legislation does not contravene Article 7 of the Convention. The Committee recalls that Article 7 of the Convention requires that all injured persons whose incapacity is of such nature that they need the constant help of another person be provided with additional compensation, irrespective of their degree of disability, and not only those with an assessed degree of disability of 100 per cent. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any measure ensuring that victims of employment injury with a disability of less than 100 per cent are provided with or compensated for the constant help of another person when they so require.

Article 9. Pharmaceutical aid. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government in reply to its previous request concerning the provision of pharmaceutical aid free of charge to victims of industrial accidents who are not hospitalized.

The Committee has been informed that, based on the recommendations of the Standards Review Mechanism Tripartite Working Group (SRM Tripartite Working Group), the Governing Body has decided that Member States for which Convention No. 17 is in force should be encouraged to ratify the more recent Employment Injury Benefits Convention, 1964 [Schedule I amended in 1980] (No. 121), or the Social Security (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1952 (No. 102), accepting its Part VI (see GB.328/LILS/2/1). Conventions Nos 121 and 102 reflect the more modern approach to employment injury benefits. The Committee therefore encourages the Government to follow up the Governing Body's decision at its 328th Session (October–November 2016) approving the recommendations of the SRM Tripartite Working Group and to consider ratifying Conventions Nos 121 or 102 (Part VI) as the most up-to-date instruments in this subject area.

Workmen's Compensation (Accidents) Convention, 1925 (No. 17)

Articles 9 and 10 of the Convention. Cost-sharing with respect to medicines and appliances. The Committee takes due note of the information provided by the Government in reply to its previous request concerning the exceptions to cost-sharing with respect to medicines and appliances, and in particular the "wide range of exemptions from prescription charges targeting those who are most in need and those who have the least means to pay", as well the financial contribution required from other persons for entitlement to prescription medicines and appliances free of charge.

The Committee has been informed that, based on the recommendations of the Standards Review Mechanism Tripartite Working Group (SRM tripartite working group), the Governing Body has decided that member States for which Convention No. 17 is in force should be encouraged to ratify the more recent Employment Injury Benefits Convention, 1964 [Schedule I amended in 1980] (No. 121), or to accept Part VI of the Social Security (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1952 (No. 102) (see GB.328/LILS/2/1). ### Social Security (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1952 (No. 102) (ratification: 1982)

Employment Injury Benefits Convention, 1964 [Schedule I amended in 1980] (No. 121) (ratification: 1982)

Invalidity, Old-Age and Survivors' Benefits Convention, 1967 (No. 128) (ratification: 1983)

Medical Care and Sickness Benefits Convention, 1969 (No. 130) (ratification: 1982)

In order to provide a comprehensive view of the issues relating to the application of the ratified Conventions on social security, the Committee considers it appropriate to examine Conventions Nos 102 (minimum standards), 121 (employment injury benefits), 128 (invalidity, old-age and survivors' benefits) and 130 (medical care and sickness benefits) together.

The Committee notes the observations of the Independent Trade Union Alliance Confederation of Workers (ASI) on the application of Conventions Nos 102 and 130, received on 30 September 2020.

The Committee deeply regrets that the Government has not provided a detailed reply to the observations made by the ASI in 2011 and 2016 on the application of the Conventions. The Committee recalls that the ASI alleged: (1) that the legislation envisaged by the Basic Act on the Social Security System of 2002 (LOSSS), as partially reformed in 2012, generates legal inconsistencies due to the lack of clarity and of political will to implement the benefits system envisaged by the Act, resulting in an incomplete, uncoordinated and unequal system; and (2) the existence of procedural difficulties encountered by users of the social security system in asserting their rights before the courts, and particularly the Supreme Court of Justice (TSJ), which has provided contradictory indications concerning the development that should characterize the implementation of the fundamental right to social security, especially through procedural delays and reversals of case law. The Committee urges the Government to provide a detailed reply on this matter and emphasizes the importance of dialogue with the social partners on decisions relating to social security. The Committee also draws the Government's attention to the new issues raised by the ASI in its 2020 observations (see Article 10 of Convention No. 102, Article 10 of Convention No. 121, Article 13 of Convention No. 130 and Articles 71(3) and 72(2) of Convention No. 102) and requests the Government to provide its comments in this regard.

Part II (Medical care), Article 10 of Convention No. 102, Article 10 of Convention No. 121 and Article 13 of Convention No. 130. Medical care benefits. With reference to its previous comments, the Committee notes the information provided by the Government on the network of health services at the various levels, and the number of medical treatment provided during the years 2016–18. The Committee also notes the ASI's observations alleging that the current crisis in the country has resulted, among other consequences, in the exhaustion of medicines and basic products for the prevention and treatment of diseases, and lack of care for people with chronic conditions, nutrition problems, pregnant women and newborns, as well as the inadequate management of the COVID-19 pandemic. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments in this regard and to indicate the manner in which it is ensured that medical care is accessible, under reasonable conditions, to all persons protected, as envisaged by Article 13 of Convention No. 130. With reference to Convention No. 121, the Committee once again requests the Government to provide information on the measures adopted or envisaged to explicitly provide in the relevant legislation for at least the medical care benefits enumerated in Article 10 of the Convention.

Article 16(1) of Convention No. 130. Provision of medical care throughout the contingency. The Committee notes the Government's reply to its previous request concerning the duration of medical care for insured persons and their spouses and children, taking into account the limitation of 52 weeks set out in section 128 of the General Regulations of the Social Insurance Act. More specifically, the Committee notes the Government's indication that, once this period has elapsed, the insured worker has to be reassessed to determine the state of incapacity, with a view to determining whether the temporary incapacity persists, whether it has ended, or whether it has become permanent, and that at all times the care and the worker's income are maintained, in accordance with section 10 of the Social Insurance Act and section 128 of the General Regulations of the Social Insurance Act. The Committee also observes that, according to the information available on the website of the Venezuelan Social Insurance Institute (IVSS) referring to this legislation, in cases where the insured person in receipt of medical care for a long illness exhausts entitlement to medical care that person shall continue to receive such care on condition that there is a favourable medical opinion for that person's recuperation. Recalling that Article 16(1) of the Convention requires the medical care, as specified in Article 10, to be provided also to the spouses and children of persons protected throughout the contingency, the Committee requests the Government to indicate the provisions of the national legislation which guarantee that all the children and spouses of insured workers shall receive the medical care required by the Convention for as long as necessary.

Articles 10 and 19, in conjunction with Article 5, and Articles 13 and 16(2) and (3) of Convention No. 130. Protected persons and legislation respecting medical care. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government in reply to its previous comments concerning Articles 10 and 19 of Convention No. 130, in conjunction with Article 5, on the protection of the spouses of salaried employees and their dependants, or 75 per cent of the economically active population and their dependants. The Committee also notes the information provided by the Government in reply to its previous requests concerning Articles 13 and 16(2) and (3) of the Convention on the need to provide copies of the laws and regulations specifying the medical care provided to persons protected, and regulating the practice of the continued provision of medical care in cases of sickness when the beneficiary is no longer in the category of persons protected.

Article 22, in conjunction with Article 1(h) of Convention No. 130, Articles 13, 14(2) and 18(1), in conjunction with Article 19 of Convention No. 121, and Articles 10, 17 and 23, in conjunction with Article 26 of Convention No. 128. Level of cash benefits. The Committee takes due note of the information provided by the Government on the level of cash sickness benefits (Convention No. 130) and employment injury benefits (Convention No. 121). With reference to the invalidity, old-age and survivors' benefits envisaged in Convention No. 128, the Committee notes the information provided and requests the Government to provide information on the application of Articles 10, 17 and 23, in conjunction with Article 26, on the level of invalidity, old-age and survivors' benefits for a standard beneficiary as determined by the Convention.

Articles 4, 7, 8 and 18, in conjunction with Article 1(e)(i) of Convention No. 121. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government in reply to its previous requests concerning Article 4 (coverage), Article 7 (conditions under which a commuting accident is considered to be an industrial accident), Article 8 (list of occupational diseases) and Article 18, in conjunction with Article 1(e)(i) (age of dependent children) of Convention No. 121.

Article 21 of Convention No. 121 and Article 29 of Convention No. 128. Review of the rates of cash benefits. Statistical data. In its previous comments, the Committee drew the Government's attention to the need to provide the statistical data required by the report form to be able to assess the real impact of the readjustment of pensions and other long-term cash benefits, taking into account changes in the general level of earnings or fluctuations in the cost of living. The Committee once again requests the Government to provide the specific statistical data necessary to assess the application of Article 21 of Convention No. 121 and Article 29 of Convention No. 128.

Article 22(1)(d)(e) and (2) of Convention No. 121 and Article 32(1)(d)(e) and (2) of Convention No. 128. Reasons for the suspension of benefits. With reference to its previous comments on the need to amend section 160 of the General Regulations of the Social Insurance Act of 1989, as partially modified in 2012, under the terms of which the pension shall not be granted when the contingency (invalidity or partial incapacity) is due to a violation of the law or an offence against morals or decency, the Committee notes the Government's indication that it intends to refer the amendment indicated previously formally for assessment through the normal channels and corresponding bodies. The Committee notes that the Government makes the same reply in relation to the need to provide that, when benefits are suspended, a proportion shall be provided to the dependants of the beneficiary. The Committee requests the Government to indicate any measures adopted or envisaged to bring the national legislation into conformity with the provisions respecting the suspension of benefits contained in Article 22 of Convention No. 121 and Article 32 of Convention No. 128.

Article 21(1), in conjunction with Article 1(h)(i) of Convention No. 128. Age of children for entitlement to cash benefits in the event of the death of the breadwinner. With regard to the need, as indicated in its previous comments, to amend section 33 of the Social Insurance Act to raise from 14 to 15 years the age up to which children shall be entitled to a survivors' pension, the Committee notes the Government's indication that the Committee's comments will be taken into account when the Social Insurance Act is updated. The Committee firmly hopes that the appropriate measures will be taken, without further delay, to bring the legislation into conformity with the requirements of Article 21(1) of Convention No. 128 and requests the Government to provide information on any measures adopted or envisaged in this regard.

Article 38(2) and (3) of Convention No. 128. Agricultural sector. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to report any increase in the number of employees in agriculture protected under the Convention. The Committee regrets to note that the Government has not provided this information and recalls that Article 38(2) of Convention No. 128 requires each Member which has made a declaration temporarily excluding from the application of the Convention employees in the agricultural sector to indicate in its reports on the application of the Convention any progress which may have been made in this respect or, where there is no change to report, furnish all the appropriate explanations, and that paragraph 3 sets out the requirement to increase the number of employees protected in the agricultural sector to the extent and with the speed that circumstances permit. The Committee once again requests the Government to indicate any increase in the number of employees in the agricultural sector protected by the Convention.

Articles 71(3) and 72(2) of Convention No. 102. General responsibility of the State for the due provision of benefits and for the proper administration of social security institutions and services. With reference to its previous comments on the transition to a reformed social security system based on sound principles of good governance and social dialogue, the Committee notes the Government's indication concerning the holding in 2017 of a National Constituent Assembly, to which were invited all the sectors and social partners related to, affected or influenced by the legislative changes respecting each of the subjects covered. The Committee also notes the information provided by the Government on the difficulties encountered in maintaining the level of wages and the purchasing power of workers and their families, and the access of the population to essential goods and services during the current economic and social crisis aggravated by the economic and commercial blockade suffered by the country. The Committee further notes the allegations by the ASI in its observations that for the past four years the country has been beset by a large-scale and complex humanitarian emergency, which is compounded by the severe failings of the hospital and health system, giving rise to the need for international assistance and cooperation, as well as, among other matters, the abandonment of certain adult care centres, which became critical in 2019. The Committee also notes the ASI's allegations on problems relating to good practices in the transparency, control and monitoring of the management of certain cash benefits and social programmes. The ASI emphasizes the urgency of giving effect to the LOSSS, the implementation of which would lead to an improvement in the quality of life as a central priority of social policy. Taking into account the information provided by the Government on the difficulties that are being experienced, the Committee requests it to make every effort to guarantee the provision of medical care and cash benefits to persons protected in the current context, in accordance with the provisions of Article 71(3) of Convention No. 102. The Committee requests the Government to inform it of any measures adopted or envisaged in this regard. The Committee also requests the Government to provide its comments on the ASI's observations relating to the governance of social security institutions and services.

The Committee informs the Government that, if it has not supplied replies to the points raised by 1 September 2021, then it may proceed with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the information at its disposal at its next session.

With reference to its comments on the application of Article 6 of the Convention, the Committee notes that, like Act No. 8/1992, sections 111 and 112 of Act No. 2/2005 of 9 May 2005 on public servants allow women workers to be dismissed for gross misconduct following the appropriate disciplinary procedure. In previous reports, the Government indicated its intention to amend the legislation so that any misconduct by pregnant workers would give rise to a disciplinary procedure at the end of the period of maternity or postnatal leave. The Committee hopes that the Government will take all the necessary measures to establish a formal prohibition on giving a public servant her notice of dismissal during her absence on maternity leave or at such time that the notice would expire during such absence.

Labour Clauses (Public Contracts) Convention, 1949 (No. 94) (ratification: 1960)

Article 2 of the Convention. Inclusion of labour clauses in public contracts. Since 2011, the Committee has been asking the Government to take all appropriate steps to ensure that provisions giving full effect to Article 2 of the Convention are incorporated into the general administrative clauses of the specifications prescribed by section 49 of Act No. 10/010 concerning public contracts. The Government indicates that it undertakes to refer the issue to the National Labour Council. The Government also reproduces a list of laws and regulations whose purpose is to govern the organization and functioning of public contracts and procedures for the award, execution and monitoring of contracts by the State, the provinces and other public entities. In this regard, the Committee notes once again that the legislation governing public contracts does not contain any provisions for the inclusion of labour clauses in public contracts, as prescribed in Article 2(1) and (2) of the Convention. The Committee once again draws the Government's attention to the 2008 General Survey on labour clauses in public contracts and on the Practical Guide to Convention No. 94, drawn up by the Office in September 2008, which provides guidance and examples to follow to ensure that the national legislation is in conformity with the Convention. Noting that the Government has not sent any information on the measures taken or contemplated to give specific effect to the essential requirements of the Convention, namely the inclusion of labour clauses in public contracts as provided for in Article 2 of the Convention, the Committee urges the Government to take all the necessary steps to guarantee the full application of the Convention, and to keep the Office informed of any progress made in this matter, including as regards the referral of the issue to the competent authorities.

Article 6 of the Convention. Legislation giving effect to the Convention. The Committee notes that the Government has never supplied any information of a practical nature concerning the application of the Convention. It would therefore be grateful if the Government would collect and transmit together with its next report up-to-date information on the average number of public contracts granted annually and the approximate number of workers engaged in their execution, extracts from inspection reports showing cases where payments have been retained, contracts have been cancelled or contractors have been excluded from public tendering for breach of the Fair Wages Rules, as well as any other particulars which would enable the Committee to have a clear understanding of the manner in which the Convention is applied in practice.

Moreover, the Committee understands that the Government has entered into a World Bank-financed technical assistance project for growth and social protection with a view to improving, among other things, the transparent operation and the efficient management of public procurement. In this connection, the Committee would appreciate receiving additional information on the implementation of this project and the results obtained, in particular as regards any amendments introduced or envisaged to public procurement laws and regulations which might affect the application of the Convention.

Labour Clauses (Public Contracts) Convention, 1949 (No. 94) (ratification: 1962)

Article 2 of the Convention. Insertion of labour clauses in public contracts. Application of the Convention. Part V of the report form. The Committee refers to its observations since 2009, recalling that it has been commenting for a number of years on the absence of any laws, regulations or practices giving effect to the provisions of the Convention. In its previous comments, initially made in 2014, the Committee expressed the hope that the Government would take prompt action to ensure the effective implementation of the Convention both in law and in practice. The Committee notes the Government's response, indicating that there is at present no general law or regime in place that mandates particular labour clauses to be included in public contracts, as defined by the Convention. With respect to the application of Article 2 of the Convention, the Government reports that there is currently no policy or practice of including clauses in public contracts which guarantee basic protections such as wages (including allowances), hours of work and other conditions of labour, which are not less favourable than those established. The Committee notes the Government's indication that it is presently making legislative changes to insert labour clauses in public contracts. In this respect, the Committee notes from the material available on the Jamaican Ministry of Finance and Public Service website that the Public Procurement Act of 2015, the Public Procurement Regulation of 2018 and the Revised Handbook of Public Sector Procurement Procedures (March 2014) contain no reference to labour clauses and do not require the insertion of any clauses of the type prescribed by Article 2(1) in the public contracts to which the Convention applies. Once again, the Committee draws the Government's attention to its 2008 General Survey on labour clauses in public contracts, paragraph 45, which makes clear that "the mere fact of the national legislation being applicable to all workers does not release the State which has ratified the Convention from the obligation to take the necessary steps to ensure that public contracts contain the labour clauses specified in Article 2 of the Convention". As the Committee observed in the 2008 General Survey, "the Convention has a very simple structure, all its provisions being articulated around and directly linked to the core requirement of Article 2(1), i.e. the insertion of labour clauses ensuring favourable wages and other working conditions to the workers concerned. As a result, in case the national legislation makes no provision for the specific type of labour clause and in the specific terms set out in Article 2(1) of the Convention, the application of the remaining Articles 3, 4 and 5 becomes without object" (2008 General Survey, paragraph 176). The Committee observes that the labour clauses required by the Convention – which should be established by the competent authority in consultation with the social partners – are clauses of a very specific content (2008 General Survey, paragraph 46). The required clauses must ensure to the workers employed under public contracts, as these are defined under Article 1(a) through (d) of the Convention, the payment of wages (including allowances), hours of work and other conditions of labour that are not less favourable than those established for work of the same character in the trade or industry concerned [and which apply] in the district where the work is being performed (Article 2(1) of the Convention). Noting once again that it has been commenting for several years on the Government's failure to give effect to the Convention, the Committee recalls that the inclusion of appropriate labour clauses in all public contracts covered by the Convention does not necessarily require the enactment of new legislation, but can also be realized by administrative instructions or circulars, the Committee expects that the Government will take all necessary measures without further delay to bring its national legislation into full conformity with the core requirements of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to keep the Office informed of progress made and recalls that the Government can avail itself of the technical assistance of the ILO in this regard, should it wish to do so.

Mauritius

Labour Clauses (Public Contracts) Convention, 1949 (No. 94) (ratification: 1969)

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020). The Committee examines the application of the Convention on the basis of the supplementary information received from the Government this year, as well as on the basis of the information at its disposal in 2019.

Article 1(3) of the Convention. Scope of application. Subcontractors. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the provisions of section 46(5) of the Public Procurement Act, 2006, on the insertion of labour clauses, do not apply to subcontractors or assignees. Instead, it was left to the main contractor to ensure compliance and to submit evidence of this to the public procurement authority. Section 46(8) of the 2006 Act does not, however, place any legal responsibility on the main contractor to ensure compliance on the part of a subcontractor or to produce evidence of such compliance. Therefore, in its 2017 direct request, the Committee once again drew the Government's attention to the 2008 General Survey on labour clauses in public contracts, paragraphs 75–81, particularly paragraph 75, which points out that Article 1(3) of the Convention requires the competent authorities to take appropriate measures to ensure that labour clauses of the type required by the Convention are applied to work carried out by subcontractors or assignees of contracts. The Committee therefore once again requested that the Government take, without further delay, all necessary measures to ensure that labour clauses in public contracts apply fully to work carried out by subcontractors and assignees. The Committee notes that the Government refers in its supplementary report to the adoption of the Workers' Rights Act, Act No. 20 of 2019 (WRA), which repealed and replaced the Employment Rights Act 2008 (ERiA) as of 24 October 2019. The Committee notes with interest that section 29(1) of the WRA establishes the joint liability of the job contractor and the employer (principal) with regard to payment of the remuneration of the worker and the conditions of employment of the worker, including his or her safety, health and welfare. Furthermore, section 29(3) of the WRA provides that "no person who is jointly liable with a job contractor under subsection (1) may set up as a defence to a claim from a worker seeking to recover remuneration the fact that he has already paid to the job contractor any sum due under the arrangement with the job contractor." In addition, section 29(4) of the WRA provides that "every worker employed by a job contractor shall, for securing payment of his remuneration, have the same privileges, in respect of the property of the principal, as he would have had if he had been directly employed by the principal without the intervention of the job contractor."

The Committee notes the Government's indication in its 2019 report that the standard bidding document for "security services, cleaning services and those for street cleaning, refuse collection and disposal services" includes provisions that govern subcontracting. The Government adds that any subcontracting component proposed by the main contractor is subject to the employer's (the public authority's) approval. Therefore, the conditions governing the subcontractor with respect to labour clauses will be the same as those governing the main contractor. Notwithstanding the Government's indication, the Committee observes that the standard bidding document (SCS/RFQ-GCC18/10-13) (as revised on 18 October 2013) does not contain any clauses providing for the contractor's responsibility to ensure observance of the terms of the labour clauses by a subcontractor. The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information on the manner in which section 29 of the Workers' Rights Act, Act No. 20 of 2019 (WRA) is applied in practice to public employment contracts, as well as to provide the Office with copies of standard bidding documents currently in use.

Article 2. Insertion of labour clauses. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the Government's indication that the standard bidding documents for the procurement of goods were based on World Bank guidelines which did not contain the type of labour clauses required by the Convention. In this regard, the Committee urged the Government to take measures to ensure full implementation with the requirements of the Convention. The Government indicates that the standard bidding documents for procurement of goods do not contain labour clauses of the type required by the Convention, as the goods in question are imported and are not manufactured locally. Hence, the workers involved in the manufacturing process of these goods are outside of Mauritius and its jurisdiction. The Government adds that these workers are instead covered by legislation applicable in their home country. While the Committee notes the Government's explanation, it wishes to stress that the Convention applies to all public contracts, whether for works (for example construction of a new highway, extension of an airport terminal), goods (for example the purchase of new uniforms for customs officers or procurement of computer hardware for a ministry) or services (for example cleaning or IT services). In this respect, the Committee draws the Government's attention to the ILO's 2008 Practical Guide on Convention No. 94 and Recommendation No. 84, which provides guidance in relation to the requirements of the Convention, with the aim of ultimately improving their application in law and practice (page 7). For instance, with regard to the application of the Convention to cross-border public procurement contracts, the Practical Guide points out that, while work done outside the contracting State is not covered by the provisions of the Convention, this does not mean that all contracts with a transnational dimension are excluded from its scope. Therefore, in the case of public contracts involving the use of foreign workers brought into the country for purposes of the contract, the requirements of the Convention in relation to labour clauses would fully apply and the workers would enjoy the protection of the required clauses (pages 18 and 19). The Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the scope of application of the Public Procurement Act, 2006, are amended to cover all types of public contracts envisaged by the Convention.

Article 5(1). Adequate sanctions. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to indicate the measures taken or contemplated to ensure the application of adequate penalties for failure to respect the provisions of labour clauses contained in public contracts. The Government refers to section 45(6) of the Public Procurement Act 2006, which establishes that "no contractor shall be entitled to any payment in respect of work performed in the execution of the procurement contract unless he has, together with his claim for payment, filed a certificate stating: (a) the rates of remuneration and hours of work of the various categories of workers employed in the execution of the contracts; (b) whether any remuneration payable in respect of work done is due; and (c) any other information that the public body administering the procurement contract may require to satisfy himself that this Act has been complied with." In addition, section 46(7) provides that, in the event that remuneration is still owed to a worker employed on a public contract, the public body administering the contract "may, unless the remuneration is paid sooner by the contractor, arrange for the payment of the remuneration out of the money payable under the procurement contract." The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed updated information on the manner in which section 46(7) of the Public Procurement Act of 2006 is given effect in practice, as well as the manner in which effect is given to Article 5(1) of the Convention more generally.

Application of the Convention in practice. While noting that the Government does not provide information on the application of the Convention in practice, the Committee once again expresses the hope that the Government will make every effort to compile and communicate detailed updated information, including statistical data disaggregated by age and sex, regarding the application of the provisions of the Convention in practice.

Labour Clauses (Public Contracts) Convention, 1949 (No. 94) (ratification: 1952)

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020). The Committee proceeded with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the supplementary information received from the Government this year, as well as on the basis of the information at its disposal in 2019.

The Committee notes the observations of the Netherlands Trade Union Confederation (FNV), the National Federation of Christian Trade Unions (CNV) and the Trade Union Federation for Professionals (VCP), received on 29 October 2019. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments in this respect.

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Insertion of labour clauses in public contracts. For a number of years, the Committee has been requesting the Government to provide information on progress made in ensuring effective application of the core requirements of the Convention. The Committee also requested the Government to provide updated information on the Code of Responsible Market Conduct (the Code) and its impact, as well as on the number and type of sanctions imposed by the sectoral committees authorised to examine complaints alleging inefficient or inadequate application of the Code. The Government indicates that the Code provides a set of principles that call for adequate working conditions, correct payment of wages and other conditions of work and employment. It adds that, while the Code is not legally binding, it makes a moral appeal to commissioning parties, contractors, hirers, trade unions, and intermediaries to describe, accept, and carry out assignments in a socially responsible manner. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the Code was signed by almost 1,500 parties in 2019. It further notes the information provided by the Government indicating that some 50 complaints are received annually and that such complaints can lead to sanctions. In their observations, the workers' organizations express their concern at the position of the Government that no further adjustments are necessary regarding the implementation of the Convention. They point out that the Netherlands has never specifically implemented the Convention, but that the Public Procurement Act of 2012, as amended in 2016, provides a general legal framework for public procurement that implements the European public procurement directives but does not give effect to Article 2 of the Convention. The Committee further notes the observations made by the Dutch trade unions with regard to the provisions of section 2.115 of the Public Procurement Act, in which they express the view that this provision is purely permissive and does not ensure the application of Article of the Convention. The workers' organizations also refer in their observations to the Wet Aanpak Schijnconstructies (WAS) of July 2015, which introduces a civil-law "chain of liability" for payment of wages owed to workers engaged under public contracts. The Committee notes that neither the Dutch Public Procurement Act 2016 (as amended), nor the WAS contain any provisions giving effect to the Convention. In relation to the Code, the FNV, CNV and VNP indicate that the application of the Code is limited to its signatories, pointing out that the Code itself is a voluntary guide to prompt more responsible market behaviour, but which does not contain any legally binding provisions. The Dutch trade unions express their disagreement with the Dutch Government's reference to the Code as demonstrating the material implementation of Convention No. 94 in the Netherlands, observing that the Government's own institution, the Netherlands Authority for Consumers and Markets (ACM) takes the position that the inclusion of wage standards in the Code would infringe on (EU) competition law. The workers' organizations consider that, notwithstanding the importance of the Code, it is irrelevant to the issue of material implementation of the Convention, as it contains no provisions requiring implementation of Article 2. Therefore, the workers' organizations consider that, notwithstanding its repeated statements to the contrary, the Government of the Netherlands has no intention of complying fully with the requirements of Convention No. 94. While noting the importance of the Code of Responsible Market Conduct as a voluntary code of conduct, the Committee nevertheless wishes to draw the attention of the Government to its 2008 General Survey on labour clauses in public contracts (paragraph 128), in which the Committee stressed that the insertion of labour clauses in the specifications or general conditions of tender documents, even though it is a means of making persons tendering for contracts aware of the terms of such clauses in line with Article 2(4), does not suffice to give effect to the basic requirement of the Convention set out in Article 2(1), which requires that the labour clause be included as an integral part of the contract actually signed by the public authority and the selected contractor. Noting once again that it has been commenting for a number of years on the Government's failure to give effect to the Convention, the Committee trusts that the Government will take all necessary measures without further delay to bring its national legislation into full conformity with the core requirements of the Convention. In this regard, it recalls that the inclusion of appropriate labour clauses in all public contracts covered by the Convention does not necessarily require the enactment of new legislation, but can also be realised by administrative instructions or circular.

Part V of the report form. The Committee requests the Government to communicate concrete, up to date information on the practical application of the Convention in its next report. In particular, the Committee requests the Government to provide examples of public contracts issued during the reporting period containing labour clauses within the meaning of the Convention, as well as extracts of reports by the inspection services showing the number and nature of any violations and the sanctions imposed, information on the number of public contracts awarded during the reporting period, the approximate number of workers involved in their execution, and any other particulars bearing on the practical application of the Convention.

Social Policy (Basic Aims and Standards) Convention, 1962 (No. 117) (ratification: 1981)

The Committee notes with concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments.

Follow-up to the Conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards (International Labour Conference, 108th Session, June 2019)

The Committee notes the discussions in the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards, in June 2019, on the application of the Convention. The Conference Committee called on the Government to urgently: (i) ensure that labour market policies are carried out in consultation with the most representative, free and independent workers' and employers' organizations in order to help achieve the principles of the Convention, drawing on ILO technical assistance; (ii) ensure that migrant workers and their families are adequately protected against discrimination, and (iii) develop and implement sound and sustainable economic and labour market policies, in consultation with the most representative, free and independent workers' and employers' organizations. In this regard, the Conference Committee encouraged the Government to avail itself of ILO technical assistance and to provide further information on measures taken for consideration by the Committee of Experts at its next session.

Parts I and II of the Convention. Improvement of standards of living. In its previous comments, the Committee expressed deep concern at the serious situation in the country, stemming from the political and social crisis that began on 18 April 2018 and which had a serious impact on the population's living conditions. The Committee noted the information in the report of the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR) entitled, "Human rights violations and abuses in the context of protests in Nicaragua, 18 April–18 August 2018", expressing concern about human rights violations and abuses in the context of the protests in Nicaragua. The Committee noted that since the beginning of the crisis, a great number of individuals had lost their jobs, the number of persons living below the poverty line had increased, pro-Government groups illegally occupied private land and the right to health had been significantly affected. In this regard, the Committee requested the Government to provide information on the results achieved by the National Human Development Plan (PNDH 2012–2016), the Country Partnership Framework for Nicaragua for 2018–2022, and on all measures aimed at improving standards of living of the Nicaraguan population, particularly with regard to groups in vulnerable situations, such as women, young people, people with disabilities, small-scale producers engaged in subsistence agriculture, and indigenous communities and communities of African descent. While noting that the damage caused to the population's living conditions was a consequence of the country's political and social crisis, the Committee requested the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure that those measures took account of workers' basic family needs. The Committee also requested the Government to supply information on all measures taken in that regard as well as their outcome. In that context, the Committee reminded the Government of the possibility of availing itself of ILO technical assistance.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that, as a result of the implementation of various programmes and social projects, significant progress has been made in increasing the population's well-being and reducing poverty and extreme poverty. However, the Government reports that in 2018, there was a 3.8 per cent contraction in a number of economic sectors as a result of conflict in the country over the past few months. The Committee also notes the information provided by the Government on programmes implemented for small producers and rural workers between 2014 and 2018. The Government refers, for example, to the implementation of the "Support Project for Adaptation to Change in Markets and the Effects of Climate Change", through which 14,273 coffee and cacao-producing families received training and technical support. Under the "Special Support Plan for Small-scale Producers", 205,979 producers benefited from the technical assistance and support were provided to men and women producers. The Government also indicates that, through collective bargaining, the minimum wage has been increased for 380,000 workers in the various economic sectors. With respect to access to healthcare for the Nicaraguan population in the country, the Government indicates that there are 1,520 health-care centres and 66 mobile clinics and that the number of health-care personnel increased from 5,556 to 6,318 doctors and 31,124 to 35,841 health workers. The Government adds that 752,052 workers are registered with the social security system. With regard to education, the Government refers to the development of the "2017-2021 Education Plan", the objective is to continue improving access to education (especially for members of the indigenous communities and those of African descent), as well as the quality of education and comprehensive training. Lastly, the Government reports the construction of 57,859 houses, with a view to ensuring the right to housing for 236,165 persons. The Committee notes, however, that the Government has still not provided information on the results achieved by the National Human Development Plan (PNDH 2012–2016) and the Country Partnership Framework for Nicaragua for 2018–2022. The Committee once again requests the Government to provide detailed information, including statistics disaggregated by sex and age, on the results achieved by the Country Partnership Framework for Nicaragua for 2018-2022, as well as all measures aiming to ensure an improvement in the living standards of the Nicaraguan population (Article 2), particularly with regard to groups in vulnerable situations, such as women, young people, people with disabilities, small-scale producers engaged in subsistence agriculture, and indigenous communities and communities of African descent. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on the steps taken to ensure that such measures take account of workers' basic family needs, such as food and its nutritive value, housing, clothing, medical care and education (Article 5(2)). It also requests the Government to continue providing detailed information on all measures taken in this regard and their outcome.

Part III. Migrant workers. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to provide information on the measures taken to ensure that the working conditions of migrant workers who are required to live away from their homes take account of their family needs. It also requested the Government to provide statistical data on the number of migrant workers required to live away from their homes. The Committee notes that, according to the information supplied by the Directorate-General for Migration and Foreign Nationals, the number of Nicaraguan nationals who have emigrated abroad in search of work, as well as foreign workers who have arrived in the country looking for work, is on the increase. In 2014, 2,641 Nicaraguans emigrated, while in 2018 the number was 336,965. There were 5,194 immigrant workers in Nicaragua in 2014, compared with 183,275 in 2018. The Committee also notes the copy of the agreement concluded between Costa Rica and Nicaragua in December 2007, seeking to regulate binational labour migration management procedures for seasonal workers. The agreement provides that the Government of Costa Rica shall guarantee Nicaraguan workers the same labour rights, pay and entitlements as those legally available to national workers, as well as housing adapted to the safety and health requirements of national legislation. As part of that agreement, the Government refers to the "specific collective recommendation on agricultural workers, approved on 1 September 2017 by the Ministry of Labour and Social Security (MTSS) of Costa Rica, authorizing 750 foreign workers to work for a specified period planting and harvesting melons in Costa Rica. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing up-to-date statistical information, disaggregated by sex and age, on the number of migrant workers required to live away from their homes.

Article 13. Voluntary forms of thrift. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to provide information on the measures taken to encourage wage earners and independent producers to practise the voluntary forms of thrift envisaged by the Convention. The Committee also requested the Government to indicate the measures adopted to protect them against usury, particularly measures aimed at women. The Committee notes the Government's indication that 524 cooperatives are listed in the National Registry of Cooperatives of the Ministry of the Family, Community, Cooperative and Associative Economy (MEFCCA). The Government adds that those cooperatives offer financial intermediation, both thrift and credit, for their 123,862 associates, of whom almost half (52,588) are women. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing detailed up-to-date information on the measures taken to encourage wage earners and independent producers to practise the voluntary forms of thrift envisaged by the Convention. It also requests the Government to provide specific detailed information on the measures adopted to protect them against usury and, in particular, to specify the measures taken with a view to reducing loan interest rates by regulating loan transactions, and by increasing borrowing facilities for appropriate purposes through cooperative credit organizations or through institutions under the control of the competent authority. The Committee finally requests the Government to continue providing detailed information on the measures adopted in this regard that are intended specifically for women.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Labour Clauses (Public Contracts) Convention, 1949 (No. 94) (ratification: 1996)

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020). The Committee proceeded with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the supplementary information received from the Government this year, as well as on the basis of the information at its disposal in 2019.

The Committee notes the observations of the International Organisation of Employers (IOE) and the Confederation of Norwegian Enterprise (NHO), jointly submitted in October 2020. It further notes the additional observations of the Confederation of Norwegian Enterprise (NHO) and the observations of the Norwegian Confederation of Trade Unions (LO), both communicated together with the Government's report. The Government is requested to provide its comments in this respect.

Article 2 of the Convention. Insertion of labour clauses in public contracts. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to provide updated detailed information on the manner in which Regulation No. 112/2008, as amended, is applied in practice, and to communicate a summary of the evaluation concerning the Regulation. The Government refers once again to the evaluation of the Regulation carried out by the Office of the Auditor General of Norway and that the results of the evaluation were published in an official report in 2016. The 2016 report found that public authorities do not always have adequate procedures and systems in place to prevent social dumping in their procurement processes. In this context, the 2016 report noted a clear correlation between the development of such procedures and systems and compliance with the Regulation. The Government reiterates that, while in some 86 per cent of procurements, public authorities include information indicating that the contract would contain a labour clause, compliance is generally higher among central authorities in comparison to smaller municipalities. The Government indicates that, according to the 2016 report, lack of understanding of the requirements of the Regulation seems to be an important reason for inadequate compliance, and there is potential for improving the information and guidance on how to apply the Regulation. The Committee notes that, following the advice of the Office of the Auditor General, the Government has taken a number of measures to ensure a work-life without social dumping in public procurement. The Committee further notes that, in September 2018, the Government developed and published a new online guide on the Regulation on Pay and Working Conditions in Public Contracts. The Government reports that the Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs has requested the Agency for Public Management and eGovernment (Difi) to take measures to develop the online guide further, as well as to familiarise the public authorities with its contents. The Committee notes with interest that a similar guide has also been developed with respect to the public procurement legislation with the objective of limiting the number of subcontractors in the contract chain in sectors that are particularly vulnerable to social dumping. In their observations, the NHO and the IOE express their support of the Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs' initiative in tasking Difi with developing the online guide further to assist the public authorities in giving effect to the Convention. Nonetheless, they point out that any measures taken to disseminate information about the Regulation must ensure transparency and distinguish between best practices and applicable mandatory law. The Committee notes the Government's indication that it plans to evaluate compliance with the Regulation once the guide on the Regulation on Pay and Working Conditions in Public Contracts has been accessible online for some time. In addition, in its allocation letters to all governmental agencies for 2018 and 2019, the Government has urged that public procurements be carried out in such a way as to combat work-related crime. With respect to the LO observation on including pension schemes as a part of the employees' wage and working conditions, the NHO and the IOE concur with the Government's view that the Convention does not imply any obligations concerning occupational pension schemes. The Government indicates that it has appointed a committee of experts to examine several issues related to public procurement and public financing of welfare services. This committee will also look into questions related to pay and working conditions and pension schemes for employees employed by providers of welfare services. The Government reports that the Labour Inspection Authority's resources have been increased by 110 million Norwegian kroner from 2013 to 2019, including approximately 34 million kroner for combating work-related crime. The Government adds that several public authorities have developed their own models for public procurement that aim to promote decent work and fight work-related crime, social dumping and the exploitation of workers across supply chains. These models implement standard contract terms, including terms relating to labour rights that are stricter than those currently required by procurement regulations. The Committee notes that the Government has initiated the making of a guide for public authorities who want to use such stricter standards in their public contracts. In its observations, the Norwegian Confederation of Trade Unions (LO) indicates that the European Surveillance Authority (ESA) has sent a letter of formal notice to the Government concerning restrictions on subcontracting in the field of public procurement in Norway, in which it expresses the view that the relevant Norwegian public procurement law does not comply with EEA-law. ESA has also requested information concerning the municipal public procurement policies (models) used to combat work-related crime. The LO further observes that the Norwegian Government has rejected a proposal from the Labour Party to change the national public procurement law based on the new ruling of the EC-court (Case C-395/18- Tim SpA). The ruling stated that the requirement to ensure that providers comply with environmental, social and labour provisions in public procurement is a cardinal value equal to the other basic principles such as transparency, competition, predictability and non-discrimination. The Committee notes that the LO will continue to work to include the new ruling in national law. It also notes the observations of the IOE and the NHO, indicating that any measures taken to give effect to Convention No. 94 must be subject to an assessment of relevant EEA/EU Law on free movement and rules concerning public procurement. The Committee requests that the Government continue to provide information on the manner in which the Convention is applied, including, for instance, labour inspection reports, indicating the number of inspections of public administration contracts carried out, the number and type of violations detected and the sanctions imposed, if any. It further requests the Government to keep the Office informed of any developments in the relevant national legal and regulatory framework as well as with respect to evaluations of the Regulation on Pay and Working Conditions in Public Contracts.

Migration for Employment Convention (Revised), 1949 (No. 97) (ratification: 1967)

The Committee notes with deep concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments. The Committee informs the Government that, if it has not supplied replies to the points raised by 1 September 2021, then it may proceed with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the information at its disposal at its next session.

Articles 7 and 9 of the Convention. Free services and assistance and transfer of remittances. In its previous comments, the Committee considered that the requirement for migrant workers participating in the Canada–Caribbean Seasonal Agricultural Workers Programme "the Farm Labour Programme" – to remit 25 per cent of their earnings to the Government directly from Canada as mandatory savings, 5 per cent of which was retained to pay the administrative costs of the Programme, could be contrary to the spirit of Article 9 of the Convention. The Committee had also taken note of the concerns expressed by the Congress of Trade Unions and Staff Associations of Barbados that this requirement, together with the immediate deduction of certain costs such as airfares, pension and medical contributions from the workers' pay, created hardship for the workers, and the Programme needed to be reviewed. The Committee also drew the Government's attention to the fact that charging workers for purely administrative costs of recruitment, introduction and placement is prohibited under the Convention (General Survey of 1999 on migrant workers, paragraph 170).

The Committee notes the Government's indication that arrangements are made for a percentage of the earnings of the workers on overseas programmes to be remitted back to the country for them to access upon return and that workers travelling on the overseas programmes are required to sign an "agreement" (contract of employment) which allows for the deduction of 20 per cent of their wages to cover administration costs and national insurance contributions. According to the Government, upon arrival in Canada the workers are met by the Barbados liaison officers and in Barbados the employment services to migrants are rendered free of charge by the National Employment Bureau, which oversees the preparation and departure of workers. The Committee notes that the "Agreement for the Employment in Canada of Commonwealth Caribbean Seasonal Agricultural Workers – 2013" provides that the worker agrees that the employer shall remit to the government agent 25 per cent of the worker's wages for each payroll period and that "a specified percentage of the 25 per cent remittance to the government agent shall be retained by the Government to defray administrative costs associated with the delivery of the programme" (section IV, paragraphs 1 and 3). The worker also agrees to pay to the employer part of the transportation costs and the employer, on behalf of the worker, will advance the work permit fees and be reimbursed by the government agent (section VII, paragraphs 3–4). The Committee requests the Government to clarify why it is considered necessary to require migrant workers under the Farm Labour Programme to remit 25 per cent of their wages to the liaison service for mandatory savings, including for administrative costs, and to indicate whether the liaison service has a role in the recruitment, introduction and placement of migrant workers and whether any of the administrative costs retained by the liaison service relate to recruitment, introduction or placement. The Committee also requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that migrants for employment are permitted to transfer their earnings or such part of their earnings and savings as they desire, and to provide information on any steps taken, in cooperation with the workers' and employers' organizations, to review the impact of the Farm Labour Programme on the situation of Barbadian migrant workers.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Migration for Employment Convention (Revised), 1949 (No. 97) (ratification: 1953)

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020). The Committee proceeded with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the supplementary information received from the Government this year, as well as on the basis of the information at its disposal in 2019.

Article 6 of the Convention. Equality of treatment. Foreign live-in careaivers. In its previous comments. the Committee recalled the decision of the High Court of Justice in Yolanda Gloten v. the National Labour Court (HCJ 1678/07) of 29 November 2009 confirming that live-in caregivers, both nationals and foreigners, are excluded from the applicability of the Hours of Work and Rest Law, 1951. It noted, in this regard that, the High Court also acknowledged the need for an appropriate and clear legislative framework guaranteeing adequate pay and favourable working conditions for this group of workers (mostly women). In addition, the Committee noted the Government's indication that it was working to adopt a gradual approach towards the implementation of recommendations made to the Ministry of Economy to improve the situation of foreign caregivers, which related, among others, to amendments of the legislation and a comprehensive wage. The Committee noted also that, although both nationals and foreigners caregivers are excluded from the Hours of Work and Rest Law, the great majority of female Israeli care workers in the long-term caregiving sector are mostly employed in part-time jobs, while foreign caregivers are mostly live-in caregivers and therefore required to reside in the homes of their employers and prohibited from live-out arrangements or part-time employment. Therefore, it had requested the Government to ensure that the working conditions of foreign caregivers are in accordance with the provisions of Article 6 of the Convention. In its report, the Government reiterates that the Hours of Work and Rest Law, 1951, does not apply to live-in caregivers, independently of the nationality of the workers. The Committee notes that the Government does not provide information concerning the progress achieved with regard to the gradual implementation of the recommendations made to the Ministry of Economy mentioned in its previous report. The Committee observes further that, in its 2019 concluding observations, the United Nations Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (CESCR) noted that 58 per cent of migrant workers in Israel, most of them women, are employed as caregivers on a live-in basis and expressed concern over the fact that they are excluded from the applicability of the Hours of Work and Rest Law, 1951 and that their working conditions are not effectively monitored by the labour authorities. The CESCR also noted that while Israel has concluded bilateral agreements with some of the countries of origin of migrant workers to protect their rights, workers from countries that do not have a bilateral agreement with the State party may be at risk of exploitation and abuse (E/C.12/ISR/CO/4, 12 November 2019, paragraph 28). The Committee reiterates its request to the Government: (i) to pursue its efforts, in consultation with workers' and employers' organizations, to ensure that the proposed legislative framework guaranteeing adequate pay and favourable working conditions for caregivers is in accordance with the provisions of Article 6 of the Convention (such as for example concerning access to live-out arrangements or part-time employment); and (ii) to provide detailed information on the progress made and on any obstacles encountered in this regard. It also refers to its comments on the application of the Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) and the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111). Please provide excerpts from bilateral agreements with countries of origin of migrant workers, particularly of the provisions concerning the protection of migrant workers in abusive situations.

Migrant Workers (Supplementary Provisions) Convention, 1975 (No. 143) (ratification: 1981)

Part I. Migration in abusive conditions. Articles 2–7 of the Convention. Multilateral and bilateral cooperation. In its previous observation, the Committee noted the complex and global nature of the phenomenon of irregular migration as well as the efforts deployed by the Government to find solutions to address migration in abusive conditions, and requested it to continue to take all necessary measures to promote national (through cooperation with workers' and employers' organizations), bilateral, multilateral and regional cooperation to address the issue of irregular migration with full respect to migrant workers' human rights and to prosecute and punish those organizing and assisting in clandestine movements of migrants. The Committee also asked the Government to provide information on any developments in this regard as well as on all the measures adopted at national level to ensure respect, in law and in practice, of the human rights of all migrant workers. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government in its report about the Italian Agency for Development Cooperation (AICS) – established by Law No. 125 of 2014 – which is in charge of actions focused on migration and development, including research aimed at identifying the most suitable approaches to ensure safe, orderly and regular migration; and programmes and projects directed at ensuring a safe, orderly and regular migration. In this framework, in 2017, the AICS published a report on "Sustainable migration: Interventions in the country of origin" laying down a number of policy interventions to combat migration in abusive conditions, ranging from active labour policies, education, professional training and investments in the countries of origin, to "preparatory" programmes for migrants workers and policies for circular migration, among others. The Committee further notes the Government's indication that the work of AICS also involves organizations and associations of migrants in Italy. In addition, the Government informs that it has contributed to the design of the European Union's (EU) External Investment Plan (EIP) that provides the framework for investments in Africa and in the neighbouring countries of the EU with a view to promoting sustainable interventions to tackle some of the root causes of migration. Concerning international cooperation, the Committee also notes that the Government provides detailed information on the range of agreements signed, as of April 2017, to address the issue of irregular migration and regulate repatriation, including bilateral agreements with European and non-European countries, such as Algeria, Egypt and Nigeria, among others, and memoranda of understanding with several countries, encompassing, for example, Gambia, Ghana, Malta, Niger, Senegal, and Sudan. The Committee further notes from the website of the Government that in 2017 a Memorandum of Understanding was reached with the Government of Libya on "cooperation in the fields of development, the fight against illegal immigration, human trafficking and smuggling and on reinforcing the security of borders between the State of Libya and the Italian Republic", which has been criticized by various actors for its impact on the human rights of migrants, including more recently by the Commissioner for Human Rights of the Council of Europe (CoE) who asked for the suspension of the cooperation activities in place with the Libyan Coast Guard that impact, directly or indirectly, on the return of persons intercepted at sea to Libya until clear guarantees of human rights compliance are in place (statement of 30 January 2020) and asked all CoE Member States to urgently review their cooperation activities (Recommendation on bridging the protection gap for refugees and migrants in the Mediterranean, June 2019).

As regards the measures adopted at national level to ensure respect of the human rights of all migrant workers, the Committee notes the information provided by the Government on a number of legislative measures adopted, including: the increase by 20 per cent of the sanctions against the employer of a migrant worker who lacks the permit of residence or whose permit is expired, introduced by Legislative Decree No. 151 of 2015 amending section 22 of Legislative Decree No. 286 of 1998 (Consolidated Immigration Law); and the measures directed at combating labour exploitation in agriculture, adopted with Law No. 199 of 2016. In this respect, the Committee notes, in particular, the protocols signed between various ministries and public authorities to tackle the illegal intermediation of labour and the exploitation of agricultural workers "caporalato" in collaboration with trade unions, civil society organizations and the organizations of agricultural businesses. On the other hand, the Committee notes that the Government provides information about the difficulties faced in combating the trafficking of migrants, especially when this happens via the sea, due to the strategies adopted by the responsible criminal organizations to elude the jurisdiction of destination countries. The Committee also notes the Government's indication that the difficulties have been exacerbated further in recent times because smugglers now select, from the trafficked persons, young persons who have fishing experience or can speak English and leave to them the conduct of the boats beyond the territorial waters of the country of origin.

Acknowledging the efforts of the Government and emphasizing the continuing need for multilateral cooperation and cohesive action, particularly at European level, to address, in a comprehensive and effective manner, migration in abusive conditions, the Committee requests the Government to continue to take measures to promote cooperation at various levels to address irregular migration with full respect of migrant workers' human rights. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information in this respect, including on any progress made in overcoming the difficulties currently faced in counteracting the trafficking of migrants and prosecuting the authors. The Committee also asks the Government to provide information on the actions taken by the AICS to ensure safe, orderly and regular migration and to continue to supply information on the measures adopted at national level to ensure respect, in law and in practice, of the human rights of all migrant workers. It further encourages the Government to review its Memorandum of Understanding of 2017 with Libya with a view to ensuring respect for the human rights of all migrant workers.

Articles 1 and 9. Minimum standards of protection. Access to justice. The Committee recalls that in its previous observation it underlined that access to justice, including adequate access to assistance and advice, is a basic human right which must be guaranteed to all migrant workers in law and in practice and highlighted the importance of providing for effective and speedy legal procedures. In this regard, the Committee requested the Government : (1) to indicate the specific scope of the term "particularly exploitative working conditions" provided for in article 1(1)(b) of Legislative Decree No. 109/2012 – which contemplates the issuance of a six-month residence permit on humanitarian grounds for those third country nationals who in cases of "particularly exploitative working conditions", lodge complaints or cooperate in criminal proceedings against employers, at the initiative or with the favourable opinion of the courts; (2) to provide information on how it is ensured in practice that all migrant workers in an irregular situation can seek redress from the courts with respect to violation of their rights arising out of past employment including non-payment or under-payment of wages, social security and other benefits; (3) to provide data disaggregated by sex and origin on the number of migrant workers in an irregular situation that have filed administrative or judicial claims with respect to violations of their basic human rights or rights arising out of past employment; (4) to provide information on the manner in which adequate legal defence for migrant workers in an irregular situation is ensured, including in detention centres; and (5) to continue to provide information on inspections carried out in the construction and agriculture as well as other sectors to detect illegal employment of migrants and the results achieved.

Concerning the specific scope of the term "particularly exploitative working conditions" provided for in article 1(1)(b) of Legislative Decree No. 109/2012, the Committee notes the Government's indication that Law No. 132 of 2018 abrogated the temporary residence permit on humanitarian grounds, which was provided for by Legislative Decree No. 109/2012. The Government however informs that section 22 of the Consolidated Immigration Law, as amended by Law No. 132 of 2018, still stipulates that the foreign worker who lodges a complaint against his or her employer alleging "particularly exploitative working conditions" and cooperates in the related criminal proceeding, can be issued a special residence permit of the duration of six months, subject to the favourable opinion of the Public Prosecutor. Pursuant to section 22(12)(6) of the Consolidated Immigration Law, such special permit allows the possibility of taking up a job and can be converted, after its expiry, into a residence permit allowing wage-employment or self-employment. Concerning the notion of "particularly exploitative working conditions", the Government refers to article 603bis of the Criminal Code, as amended by Law No. 199 of 2016, which defines the crime of illegal intermediation of labour and labour exploitation. The Committee notes that, according to this article, the existence of labour exploitation is presumed in presence of one of more of the following conditions: (1) reiterated payment of remunerations that do not correspond with what is established in the national or territorial collective agreements signed by the most representative workers' organizations at national level, or that is not proportionate to the quantity and quality of the work performed; (2) reiterated violation of the norms regulating working time, rest periods and annual holidays; (3) breach of the norms governing occupational safety and health; and (4) subjecting the worker to working conditions, surveillance methods and housing conditions that are degrading. As regards migrant workers' access to justice in practice, the Committee notes the Government's indication that migrant workers who allege the non-payment or under-payment of wages, social security and other benefits are entitled to seek redress from the courts under article 2126 of the Civil Code, which provides for the payment of remuneration for the period in which the work has been performed as well as the payment of social security contributions on the part of the employer. The Government indicates that the complaint can be filed either by the concerned migrant worker or by a trade union or other association and explains that migrant workers in irregular situation can also denounce the situation before labour inspectors and the local offices of the national social security service. Furthermore, the Government indicates that on 10 February 2017 the Ministry of Interior and the Ministry of Labour and Social Policies adopted a joint decree defining the terms and modalities to ensure that illegally employed migrant workers have access to information concerning their rights and how to claim them, before the execution of any expulsion order, in accordance with European Directive 2009/52/CE. Based on this decree, an "information note" has been developed, containing information about the rights to remuneration and social security benefits as well as on the different avenues to claim these rights. The Committee notes the Government's indication that this note is distributed to the workers by employers' and workers' organizations and by labour inspectors. The Committee also notes from the "information note" annexed to the Government's report that such note is to be signed by the worker, to whom one copy of the document is given, while another copy is sent to the Immigration Office in charge of repatriation procedures. The Committee, however, notes that there is no indication as to the languages in which this note is available. It also notes that the information note does not provide information on the possibility that migrant workers have of obtaining a special resident permit in case of "particularly exploitative working conditions" under article 22 of the Consolidated Immigration Law. As far as the results of labour inspections are concerned, the Committee notes the information provided by the Government based on the data gathered by the National Labour Inspectorate in 2016. The Committee notes that the labour inspectors found 1,357 non-EU migrant workers in irregular situations, particularly in the industry and manufacturing sectors followed by the tertiary sector. The Committee further notes from the 2018 report of the Labour Inspectorate, available on its website, the specific information concerning the detection of illegal intermediation of labour and labour exploitation of workers, including migrant workers. In particular, the Committee notes that, in 2018, 7,160 inspections were undertaken in the agriculture sector, which found irregular situations in more than 50 per cent of cases. Of the 5,114 workers in irregular situations identified, 65.5 per cent did not have a contract and of these 263 were non-EU migrant workers without a residence permit. The Committee notes that, in total, the labour inspectorate identified 478 migrant workers as victims of exploitation, of whom 350 were in the agriculture sector, and 157 migrant workers without residence permits were equally victims of exploitation (130 in agriculture). Finally, the Committee notes that, in its concluding observations of 2017, the United Nations Human Rights Committee expressed concern at the absence of clear and effective procedures allowing migrant workers to complain about abusive working conditions, including in relation to outstanding pay (CCPR/C/ITA/CO/6, 1 May 2017, paragraph 28(d)). In light of all the above, the Committee requests the Government : (i) to indicate how it is ensured in practice that all migrant workers in irregular situations have access to complete information about their labour rights and the means of redress available, with appropriate safeguards for confidentiality, including the possibility of obtaining a "special residence permit", in a language understandable to them, as well as to legal assistance, also in detention centres, including any measures adopted in this respect in collaboration with the social partners; (ii) to provide data disaggregated by sex and origin on the number of migrant workers in an irregular situation that have filed administrative or judicial claims with respect to violations of their basic human rights or rights arising out of past employment; (iii) to provide information on the number of complaints lodged by migrant workers alleging "particularly exploitative working conditions" (such as for example non-payment or under-payment of wages, social security and other benefits) brought to the attention of the labour inspectors and the results thereof (violations found, penalties imposed, repayment amounts ordered); and (iv) to provide information on the number of special permits granted under section 22(12)(6) of the Consolidated Immigration Law.

Migration for Employment Convention (Revised), 1949 (No. 97) (ratification: 1964)

Article 6(1)(a) of the Convention. No less favourable treatment. Foreign worker levy. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that in several sectors, an annual foreign worker levy was to be paid to the Immigration Department and that there was an ambiguity as to whether this levy could be deducted from the workers' wage. The Committee notes that in its report, the Government indicates that: (1) on 1 January 2018, a policy was introduced to give effect to the Government's intention that all levies imposed on the hiring of foreign workers shall be borne by employers; and (2) a Steering Committee on the Multi-tier Levy was established to examine the impact of the levy system. Recalling that the deduction of levies from the wages of foreign workers may result in unfavourable treatment of these workers as compared to nationals, contrary to Article 6(1)(a) of the Convention, the Committee asks the Government to indicate what is: (i) the current legal situation in light of the new policy introduced in 2018 and the expected results from these changes (ii) the exact role of the newly established Steering Committee on the Multi-tier Levy and how it relates to this intention; and (iii) the outcome of the examination conducted by the Steering Committee on the deduction of the levies.

Article 6(1)(b). No less favourable treatment. Social security benefits. In its previous comments, the Committee urged the Government to adopt measures to end the differences in treatment between nationals and foreign workers with respect to the payment of social security benefits, and in particular with regard to compensations in cases of industrial injuries. In this regard, the Committee notes the conclusions adopted in 2018 by the Committee on the Application of Standards (CAS) of the International Labour Conference on the application of the Equality of Treatment (Accident Compensation) Convention, 1925 (No. 19), by Malaysia Peninsula and Sarawak. The Committee notes with satisfaction the information provided by the Government that foreign workers are now covered under the Employees' Social Security Act.

General observation

Maritime Labour Convention, 2006, as amended (MLC, 2006)

The Committee notes with deep concern the challenges and the impact that restrictions and other measures adopted by governments around the world to contain the spread of the COVID-19 pandemic has had on the protection of seafarers' rights as laid out in the Convention. [1]

The Committee takes note of the observations of the International Transport Workers' Federation (ITF) and of the International Chamber of Shipping (ICS), received by the Office on 1 October 2020 and 26 October 2020, respectively, indicating that all ratifying States have failed to comply with major provisions of the Convention during the COVID-19 pandemic, notably regarding cooperation among Members, access to medical care and repatriation of seafarers. They note that, in addition to the humanitarian concerns linked to the violations of seafarers' rights, there is now a risk that fatigue and other health issues could lead to serious maritime accidents. The Committee further notes the replies to these observations received from the Governments of Barbados, Cyprus, France, Honduras, Hungary, India, Ireland, Republic of Korea, Lithuania, Myanmar, Palau, Poland, Senegal, Singapore and United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, which acknowledge the existence of numerous challenges and highlight the different measures taken to ensure, as far as possible, the protection of seafarers' rights. Several other Governments have provided information to the Office concerning the measures adopted in relation to the implementation of the Convention during the pandemic (Australia, Belgium, Canada, Croatia, Denmark, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Japan, Malaysia, Panama, Slovenia and Spain). The Office has also received information about hundreds of individual seafarers' complaints which have been sent directly by the seafarers concerned or transmitted by the Seafarer Crisis Action Team set up by the Secretary-General of the International Maritime Organization (IMO). [2]

In particular, the Committee notes that according to the information provided by the ITF and the ICS, hundreds of thousands of seafarers (approximately 400,000 for the ITF) are currently stranded on board and a similar number is waiting at home unable to replace them and earn their living. This situation has unfolded into a humanitarian crisis. This is so, in spite of an unprecedented level of social dialogue among the key actors of the maritime sector at the international level and the high level of cooperation among them, numerous governments and United Nations agencies, under the leadership of the ILO and IMO.

The Committee notes with deep concern that, while ports around the world have continued to operate uninterruptedly during the pandemic, seafarers – who provide a key frontline service to society, with more than 90 per cent of world trade moved by sea, including food, medicines and vital medical supplies – continue to face extreme difficulties to disembark and transit through countries for the purpose of repatriation. Both the ITF and the ICS indicate that they have received thousands of individual claims from seafarers around the world describing desperate situations of violations of the provisions of the MLC, 2006. Seafarers are requested to continue working beyond the terms agreed in their seafarers' employment agreements (SEAs), they are denied access to medical care ashore (Regulation 4.1) and are deprived from their rights to repatriation (Regulation 2.5), annual leave and shore leave (Regulation 2.4) in a number of cases. It is recalled that most ships do not have medically trained staff on board and as consequence when access to medical care ashore is denied, seafarers have no medical care whatsoever.

The Committee notes the ITF indication that the notion of force majeure is being used by ratifying Members as a shield for non-compliance with the Convention. The MLC, 2006, is a comprehensive labour instrument for the maritime industry applicable to all ratifying countries, and not a compilation of labour regulations to be applied selectively, if and to the extent that circumstances so permit. At the beginning of the pandemic, ratifying States, in their different capacities as flag States, port States or labour-supplying States might have been confronted with genuine situations of force majeure, which rendered materially impossible the compliance with some of their obligations under the MLC, 2006. The Committee is bound to note, however, that more than ten months have elapsed since then, which constitutes realistically sufficient time frame allowing for new modalities to be explored and applied, in conformity with international labour standards. Force majeure may be invoked as a condition precluding wrongfulness for non-observance of a treaty obligation only in the case of unforeseen and unforeseeable event(s) creating an absolute and material impossibility of compliance with that obligation. In contrast, circumstances rendering observance of an international obligation more difficult or burdensome do not constitute a case of force majeure. The Committee stresses that the notion of force majeure may no longer be invoked from the moment that options are available to comply with the provisions of the MLC, 2006, although more difficult or cumbersome, and urges ratifying States which have not yet done so, to adopt all necessary measures without delay to restore the protection of seafarers' rights and comply to the fullest extent with their obligations under the MLC, 2006.

[1] The Committee notes the Information note on maritime labour issues and coronavirus (COVID-19) developed by the Office to provide a rapid response to questions regarding the implementation of the Convention as well the New Statement of the Officers of the Special Tripartite Committee of the MLC, 2006 on COVID-19.

[2] The Seafarer Crisis Action Team was set up in April 2020 in order to, inter alia, monitor developments, coordinate efforts, communicate with all relevant stakeholders and provide targeted support in seafarers' individual cases and particularly urgent situations regarding crew changes, repatriation, access to medical care and/or abandonment.

The Committee welcomes the resolutions recently adopted by the United Nations General Assembly, [3] the ILO Governing Body [4] and the IMO Maritime Safety Committee, [5] urging Member States to designate seafarers as key workers for the purpose of facilitation of safe an unhindered movement for embarking or disembarking a vessel, the facilitation of shore leave, and, when necessary, to shore-based medical treatment. The Committee observes that as result of the primarily international character of the maritime sector, it is not possible to comply with a number of obligations under the MLC, 2006, without allowing the movement of seafarers across borders in appropriate conditions. The Committee therefore strongly encourages ratifying States in their different capacities as flag States, port States or labour-supplying States who have not yet done so, to recognize seafarers as key workers without delay and to draw in practice the consequences of such qualification, in order to restore the respect of their rights as provided for in the MLC, 2006.

All governments are confronted with the need to strike an adequate balance between the protection of public health on the one hand, and the respect of the rights and dignity of seafarers on the other. The Committee notes in this regard the Recommended framework of protocols for ensuring safe ship crew changes and travel during the coronavirus (COVID-19) pandemic, which was proposed by a broad cross section of global industry associations representing the maritime transportation sector and which enjoy consultative status at the IMO (MSC.1/Circ. 1636). The United Nations General Assembly as well as the ILO and the IMO in the above-mentioned resolutions refer to the implementation of the Recommended framework of protocols as an appropriate guidance to ensure safe crew change and travel of seafarers. The Committee hopes that governments will refer to such guidance when adopting the measures urgently needed to restore compliance with their obligations under the MLC, 2006.

The ITF and the ICS, in their observations, allege that ratifying States have failed to comply with their obligation under Article I of the MLC, 2006, according to which Members shall cooperate with each other for the purpose of ensuring the effective implementation and enforcement of the Convention. The Committee acknowledges that numerous governments have undertaken important actions at bilateral, regional and international levels to identify solutions and generate initiatives to overcome the challenges faced by seafarers and shipowners as a result of the pandemic. The Committee observes, however, that based on the information provided by the ITF and ICS and the evidence available at the Office, the provisions of the Convention continue to be disregarded worldwide. Indeed, hundreds of thousands of seafarers around the world are still on board well beyond the original expiry date of their SEAs and in numerous cases well beyond the default 11 months maximum period of service on board derived from the provisions of the Convention, with reported phenomena of physical and mental exhaustion, anxiety, sickness and even suicides; thousands of seafarers have been disembarked but are not allowed to go back to their countries of origin and find themselves stranded in a foreign country; moreover, hundreds of seafarers have been denied medical care ashore which has resulted in death of seafarers in several cases. In numerous cases, port restrictions are repeatedly introduced with short-term announcements hindering the reasonable planning of the ships' route while the non-coordinated implementation and enforcement of the MLC, 2006, increases the risk of travel prohibition for both ship and crew and, in some cases, leads to the detention of ships due to State failures. The Committee considers that these elements constitute sufficient basis to conclude that Members, as a whole, have failed to comply with Article I, paragraph 2 of the MLC, 2006. The Convention does not contain any provisions allowing for the temporary suspension of the implementation of its provisions, in case of crisis, health related or otherwise. To the contrary, the Committee is of the view that it is precisely at times of crisis that the protective coverage of the MLC, 2006, assumes its full significance and needs to be most scrupulously applied. This is even more so as the Convention contains only minimum standards for the protection of seafarers' rights. The Committee accordingly urges Governments to adopt the necessary measures, in consultation with relevant seafarers' and shipowners' organizations, to further enhance cooperation with each other to ensure the

The Committee notes the ITF's indication that the failure to arrange the repatriation of seafarers at the end of their contracts effectively induces the forced extension of contracts (or continuation of labour without contract), in circumstances where consent clearly cannot be freely given. The ITF adds that this raises serious questions of the precipitation of the international community to a form of forced labour on ships worldwide. The Committee refers in this regard to Article III of the MLC, 2006, according to which each Member shall satisfy itself that the provisions of its laws and regulations respect, in the context of the Convention, the fundamental rights to the elimination of forced or compulsory labour. The Committee observes that, implicit in the very inaction of certain Member States of ensuring crew changes or allowing seafarers to go back home, gives seafarers no option but to stay on board and creates conditions for them to languish for months on end in situations that could amount to forced labour. The Committee accordingly requests all ratifying States, in their various capacities as flag States, port States or labour-supplying States, to adopt the necessary measures or reinforce existing ones without delay to ensure that, in no case, seafarers are forced to continue working on extended contractual arrangements without their formal, free and informed consent.

The MLC, 2006, contains a robust system to ensure the enforcement of its provisions. Under Regulation 5.1.1, paragraph 1, each Member is responsible for ensuring implementation of its obligations under the Convention on ships that fly its flag. Based on the information available, the Committee urges all ratifying countries with responsibilities as flag States to adopt the necessary measures and/or reinforce the existing ones without delay, including through more frequent inspections if necessary, to ensure that the ships that fly their flags fully comply with the provisions of the Convention. In particular, the Committee requests flag States, which have not yet done so, to ensure that:

(a) any extension of SEA is done with the seafarers' freely expressed consent (Regulation 2.1, paragraph 2));

(b) no fees or other charges for seafarer recruitment or placement, including the cost of any quarantine obligations before joining the ship, are borne directly or indirectly, in whole or in part, by the seafarer, other than the cost authorized under Standard A1.4, paragraph 5;

(c) the prohibition to forgo minimum annual leave with pay is strictly enforced, with the limited exceptions authorized by the competent authority (Regulation 2.4 and Standard A2.4, paragraph 3);

(d) seafarers are granted shore leave for their health and well-being and consistent with the operational requirement of their positions, subject to the strict respect of any public health measures applicable to the local population (Regulation 2.4, paragraph 2));

(e) seafarers are repatriated at no cost to themselves in the circumstances specified in the Convention, with strict respect of the default 11 months maximum period of service on board derived from the provisions of the Convention (Regulation 2.5 and Regulation 2.4);

(f) ships that fly its flag have a sufficient number of seafarers employed on board to ensure that ships are operated safely, efficiently and with due regard to security under all conditions, taking into account concerns about seafarer fatigue and the particular nature and conditions of the voyage (Regulation 2.7);

(g) seafarers on ships that fly its flag are covered by adequate measures for the protection of their health and have access to prompt and adequate medical care whilst working on board, including access to vaccination (Regulation 4.1);

(h) seafarers on ships that fly its flag are provided with occupational health protection and live, work and train on board ship in a safe and hygienic environment (Regulation 4.3);

(i) seafarers have access to shore-based welfare facilities, where they exist, subject to the strict respect of any public health measures applicable to the local population (Regulation 4.4); and

(j) measures are taken to support seafarers' wellbeing on board, in particular during the extended periods of service on board, including arrangements for contacting family and loved ones.

The Committee stresses that the failure to apply any of the core principles and requirements listed above under the pretext of a protracted health crisis risks, may render the Convention meaningless especially at a time and in circumstances where its protective coverage would be most needed. Such failure to apply any of the core principles and requirements listed above has a direct negative impact on navigational safety, thus increasing exponentially the risk of maritime accidents, with unpredictable consequences on human lives and the environment, and immeasurable disturbances on the international supply and distribution of necessity goods.

Under Regulation 5.2.1, paragraph 1, every foreign ship calling in the port of a Member may be the subject of inspections for the purpose of reviewing compliance with the requirements of the Convention (including seafarers' rights) relating to the working and living conditions of seafarers on the ship. The Committee has highlighted the complementary crucial role that port State control plays in the enforcement of the Convention. The Committee draws in particular governments' attention to the obligation to take steps to ensure that a ship shall not proceed to sea until any non-conformity has been rectified, or until the authorized officer has accepted a plan of action to rectify such non-conformities, in the situations foreseen under Standard A5.2.1. In this regard, the Committee considers that the extreme fatigue of seafarers who have been on board beyond the default 11 months maximum period of service on board derived from the Convention not only constitutes a situation clearly hazardous for the safety and health of the seafarers concerned, but also profoundly endangers the safety of navigation in general. The Committee refers in this regard to Standard A2.7, paragraph 2, which aims to ensure that seafarers work on board ships with sufficient personnel for the safe, efficient and secure operation of the ship and which highlights the need to avoid or minimize excessive hours of work to ensure sufficient rest and to limit fatigue. While noting the challenges faced by port State control authorities to conduct inspections during the pandemic, the Committee requests ratifying countries with responsibilities as port States which have not yet done so, to adopt the necessary measures without delay to fully comply with their obligations under the Convention. In particular, the Committee calls upon governments with port State responsibilities to:

(a) allow seafarers to enjoy their right to shore leave in accordance with Regulation 2.4, paragraph 2, subject to the strict respect of any public health measures applicable to the local population;

(b) facilitate the repatriation of seafarers serving on ships which call at their ports or pass through their territorial or internal waters (Standard A2.5.1, paragraph 7);

(c) allow and facilitate the replacement of seafarers who have disembarked and consequently ensure the safe manning of ships, by providing an expeditious and non-discriminatory treatment of new crew members who enter their territory exclusively to join their ships (Standard A2.5.1, paragraph 7);

(d) ensure that seafarers on board ships in their territory who are in need of immediate medical care are given access to medical facilities on shore (Regulation 4.1); and

(e) refrain from the adoption and/or repetitive modification of restrictive national measures and/or port regulations which may hinder the reasonable ex ante planning of ships' voyage and avoid inconsistent implementation and enforcement of the Convention vis-à-vis other contracting States.

The Committee notes that labour-supplying States must play a crucial role in cooperating with flag and port States to ensure the respect of seafarers' rights. The Committee calls upon governments with labour-supplying responsibilities which have not yet done so, to adopt the necessary and immediate measures to ensure that the required facilities are put in place in relation to transport, testing and quarantine in order to receive their seafarers currently abroad and allow others to join their ships.

The Committee notes that the COVID-19 pandemic has severely tested the legal framework set out in the MLC, 2006, for the protection of decent working and living conditions of seafarers. The pandemic has also laid bare the essential role of seafarers and the criticality of the shipping industry for the world economy. Regrettably, public and private responses on a global scale have not always been respectful of, or attentive to, the needs of the maritime labour force to the point that there is a pressing need for restoring full respect of basic seafarers' rights and drawing the right lessons for the future. The possibility to attract young talent into the seafarer profession might also be further compromised if the international community fails to deliver on this. The Committees welcomes the inclusion of the issue of the impact of COVID-19 on the maritime sector on the agenda of the Fourth meeting of the Special Tripartite Committee of the MLC, 2006, to be held in April 2021.

The Committee will continue to examine the information provided by Governments and/or social partners about the issues raised in this general observation, with a view to ascertain compliance with the application of the Convention by ratifying Member States during this period of crisis.

Congo

Maritime Labour Convention, 2006, as amended (MLC, 2006) (ratification: 2014)

The Committee notes with deep regret that the Government has failed to submit its first report on the application of the Convention for the fourth consecutive year. As the requested report was not received, the Committee examined the application of the Convention on the basis of publicly available information.

Article I. General questions on application. Implementing measures. The Committee notes that the provisions of the Convention are mainly implemented by Act No. 30-63 of 4 July 1963 issuing the Merchant Shipping Code, amended by Act No. 63-65 of 30 December 1965; by orders and decrees of the Ministry of Transport, Civil Aviation and Merchant Shipping; and by Regulation No. 08/12-UEAC-088-CM-23 of the Central African Economic and Monetary Community (CEMAC) adopting the Community Merchant Shipping Code of 22 July 2012 (CCMM), which is directly applicable in the Congo and is one of the documents that must be carried on board ships flying the Congolese flag and foreign ships operating in Congolese territorial waters. The Committee also notes that the Labour Code does not exclude seafarers from its scope of application. Having reviewed the available information, the Committee notes the inconsistency between certain national provisions and between these and the CCMM, as well as the absence of available information on the implementation of several provisions of the Convention. The Committee underscores the need to avoid any inconsistency in the applicable provisions. It recalls that, in accordance with Article I of the Convention, each Member which ratifies the Convention undertakes to give full effect to its provisions in order to secure the right of all seafarers to decent employment. The Committee therefore requests the Government to adopt without delay the necessary measures to implement the Convention, taking into account the matters raised in the request addressed directly to the Government. It further requests the Government to provide a copy of any legislative texts or other regulatory instruments once adopted, as well as full information on the implementation of the Convention, including updated statistics on the number of seafarers who are nationals or residents of the Congo or who work on board ships flying the Congolese flag. The Committee reminds the Government that it may avail itself of the technical assistance of the Office in this regard.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Dominica

Merchant Shipping (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 147) (ratification: 2004)

The Committee notes with deep concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments. The Committee informs the Government that, if it has not supplied replies to the points raised by 1 September 2021, then it may proceed with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the information at its disposal at its next session.

Article 2 of the Convention. Implementing legislation. The Committee notes the Government's indication that a special Tripartite Committee has been appointed to advise the Government on all matters relating to legislation and institutional changes necessary for the ratification of the Maritime Labour Convention, 2006 (MLC, 2006). It also notes that a National Action Plan has been prepared in order to formulate recommendations to the Government on matters of maritime laws and administration. While welcoming the Government's active steps towards the ratification of the MLC, 2006, the Committee is bound to observe that the Government's first report on the application of Convention No. 147 does not contain any information on the laws or regulations and other measures giving effect to the specific requirements of the latter Convention. The Committee therefore requests the Government to indicate in detail how each of the Articles of the Convention is applied in national law and practice, and explain in particular in what manner the provisions of the International Maritime Act, 2002, and of the Dominica Maritime Regulations, 2002, are substantially equivalent to the Conventions mentioned in the Appendix of the Convention relating to safety standards, social security measures and shipboard conditions of employment and shipboard living arrangements, as required under Article 2 of the Convention.

The Committee expects that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Maritime Labour Convention, 2006, as amended (MLC, 2006) (ratification: 2014)

The Committee notes with deep regret that the Government has failed to submit its first report on the application of the Convention for the fourth consecutive year. As the requested report has not been received, the Committee examined the application of the Convention on the basis of publicly available information.

Article I. General questions on application. Implementing measures. The Committee notes that the provisions of the Convention are mainly implemented through Regulation No. 08/12-UEAC-088-CM-23 of the Central African Economic and Monetary Community (CEMAC) issuing the Community Merchant Shipping Code of 22 July 2012 (hereinafter, CCMM), which is directly applicable to Gabon and is one of the documents that must be carried on board ships flying the Gabonese flag and foreign ships operating in Gabonese territorial waters. The Committee also notes that section 1 of the Labour Code does not exclude seafarers from its scope of application. The Committee notes the lack of available information on the implementation of several provisions of the Convention. It recalls that, in conformity with Article I of the Convention, each Member which ratifies it undertakes to give complete effect to its provisions in order to secure the right of all seafarers to decent employment. The Committee therefore requests the Government to adopt without delay the necessary measures to implement the Convention, taking into account the matters raised in the request addressed directly to the Government. It further requests the Government to provide a copy of any legislative texts or other regulatory instruments once adopted, as

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Maldives

Maritime Labour Convention, 2006, as amended (MLC, 2006) (ratification: 2014)

The Committee notes with deep regret that the Government has failed to submit its first report on the application of the Convention for the fourth consecutive year. As the requested report was not received, the Committee examined the application of the Convention on the basis of publicly available information.

Article I. General questions on application. Implementing measures. The Committee notes that, in its report on the Seafarers' Identity Documents Convention (Revised), 2003, as amended (No.185), the Government mentions that, following Law No. 35/2015 (First Amendment to Maldives Maritime Navigation Act No. 69/78), "power to make regulations related to maritime labour was delegated to the Minister". However, no regulations have been completed yet. In the same report, the Government also indicates that the High Court of the Republic of Maldives in its Case Number 2010/HC-A/62 significantly emphasized "the need for a specific legal regime for seafarers. As per the mentioned judgement, if normal employment laws are applied on seafarers, the law would fail to protect their rights as they have specific employment conditions arising from their unique working environment".

The Committee notes that the Maldives Maritime Navigation Act No. 69/78, as amended, is not available in English and that only a few Maldivian laws are available in English. Therefore, the analysis of the implementation of the Convention has mainly been based on the Employment Act of 2008. In this regard, the Committee notes that section 34(a) of this Act excludes "crew of sea going vessels" from the provisions of the Chapter on working time. The Committee accordingly understands that the rest of the provisions of the Employment Act are applicable to seafarers. The Committee requests the Government to adopt without delay the necessary measures to give effect to the provisions of the Convention and to provide information on any developments in this regard. It further requests the Government to supply copies in English of the relevant legislation, or a summary of the relevant provisions thereof. The Committee reminds the Government that it may avail itself of the technical assistance of the Office in this regard.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Supplementary information received in 2020 to the 2019 reports

The following Member States have provided supplementary information in 2020. Their examination by the CEACR have however not led to a change to the CEACR comments issued in 2019: Convention No. 22 (Cuba, Egypt, France: French Polynesia); Convention No. 23 (Egypt, France: French Polynesia); Convention No. 55 (Egypt, France: French Polynesia); Convention No. 56 (Egypt, France: French Polynesia); Convention No. 58 (France: French Polynesia); Convention No. 68 (Egypt); Convention No. 69 (Egypt, France: French Polynesia); Convention No. 92 (Cuba, Egypt); Convention No. 108 (Czechia, Cuba, Estonia, France: French Polynesia, New Caledonia); Convention No. 134 (Egypt); Convention No. 146 (France: French Polynesia); Convention No. 147 (Egypt, France: French Polynesia); Convention No. 163 (Czechia); Convention No. 164 (Czechia); Convention No. 166 (Egypt); Convention No. 185 (Croatia); MLC, 2006 (Estonia).

Medical Examination (Fishermen) Convention, 1959 (No. 113) (ratification: 1960)

Fishermen's Articles of Agreement Convention, 1959 (No. 114) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee notes with concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments.

The Committee notes that in its reports sent on the application of a number of fishing Conventions the Government indicates that the Liberian Maritime Law, RLM 107 (hereinafter the "Maritime Law") and the Liberian Maritime Regulations, RLM-108 (hereinafter the "Regulations") were amended in 2013 addressing the Committee's previous comments on the application of the Conventions, without providing any further information. Recalling that for more than 20 years the Government has been requested to provide information on the applicability of existing legislation to fishers and noting that it is not clear from the Government's response whether there are adequate provisions in the amended texts to cover fishers, the Committee requests the Government once again to clarify this issue.

In order to provide a comprehensive view of the issues to be addressed in relation to the application of the fishing Conventions, the Committee considers it appropriate to examine them in a single comment, as follows.

Minimum Age (Fishermen) Convention, 1959 (No. 112)

Article 1 of the Convention. Scope of application. Minimum age. The Committee notes that section 326(2) of the Maritime Law states that "persons under the age of 16 shall not be employed or work on Liberian vessels registered under this Title, except on vessels upon which only members of the same family are employed, school ships or training ships". The Committee recalls that according to Article 2 of the Convention, children under the age of 15 years shall not be employed or work on fishing vessels. The Committee also recalls that the exclusion of vessels upon which only members of the same family are employed is not provided for under the Convention. The Committee further notes that according to section 290 of the Maritime Law, its Chapter 10 – which deals with merchant seamen and minimum age – only applies to persons engaged on board vessels of at least 75 net tons. Moreover, section 326 of the same chapter, fixing the minimum age at sea, only applies to vessels registered under the Maritime Law. In this connection, section 51 limits the registration procedure to specific vessels, namely: (a) vessels of at least 20 net tons, owned by a citizen or national of Liberia and engaged solely in coastwise trade between ports of the country or between those of Liberia and other West African countries; and (b) seagoing vessels of more than 500 net tons engaged in foreign trade, owned by a citizen or national of Liberia. The Committee recalls that pursuant to Article 1 of the Convention, the term "fishing vessel" includes all ships and boats, of any nature whatsoever, whether publicly or privately owned, which are engaged in maritime fishing in salt waters, with the only exception of fishing in ports and harbours or in estuaries of rivers, or to individuals fishing for sport or recreation. The Committee requests the Government to clarify whether Chapter 10 of the Maritime Law applies to fishers. If that is the case, recalling that the Convention applies to all fishing vessels irrespective of tonnage or of the fact that only members of the same family are employed, the Committee requests the Government to adopt the necessary measures without delay in order to give full effect to the Convention. If that is not the case, the Committee requests the Government to indicate the national provisions giving effect to the requirements of the Convention.

Medical Examination (Fishermen) Convention, 1959 (No. 113)

Application of the Convention. The Committee had previously requested the Government to provide clarifications on the applicable legislation to fishers with regard to medical certification. The Committee had noted the information provided by the Government that existing legislation only applied to fishing vessels of 500 tons or more. Recalling that the Convention applies to all fishing vessels irrespective of tonnage, the Committee had requested the Government to adopt the necessary measures to ensure that fishers employed on board fishing vessels of less than 500 tons are subject to the same medical certification requirements in accordance with the provision of the Convention. The Committee regrets to note that the Government has not provided a reply to its previous observation. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to adopt without delay the necessary measures to give full effect to the provisions of the Convention.

Fishermen's Articles of Agreement Convention, 1959 (No. 114)

Application of the Convention. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to explain how effect is given to the provisions of the Convention and to provide clarifications on the application of the existing legislation to fishing vessels. The Committee regrets to note that the Government provides no information in this regard. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to adopt the necessary measures without delay to give full effect to the provisions of the Convention.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Fishermen's Competency Certificates Convention, 1966 (No. 125) (ratification: 1967)

The Committee notes with deep concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments. The Committee informs the Government that, if it has not supplied replies to the points raised by 1 September 2021, then it may proceed with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the information at its disposal at its next session.

Articles 3–15 of the Convention. Certificates of competency. The Committee has been commenting for a number of years on the absence of laws and regulations giving effect to the Convention. The Committee asks the Government to provide detailed information on any concrete progress made in respect of the adoption of national laws implementing the Convention. The Committee understands that the Office remains ready to offer expert advice and to respond favourably to any specific request for technical assistance in this regard. Finally, the Committee requests the Government to supply up-to-date information concerning the fishing industry, including statistics on the composition and capacity of the country's fishing fleet and the approximate number of fishers gainfully employed in the sector.

The Committee expects that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Occupational Safety and Health (Dock Work) Convention, 1979 (No. 152) (ratification: 1986)

The Committee notes with deep concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments. The Committee informs the Government that, if it has not supplied replies to the points raised by 1 September 2021, then it may proceed with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the information at its disposal at its next session.

The Committee notes with regret that the report submitted by the Government is identical to the most recent report submitted by the Government in 2007 which formed the basis for the Committee's observation in 2008 repeated in 2009, 2010 and 2011 for lack of a response from the Government. The Committee urges the Government to solicit technical assistance of the ILO to resolve any problems related to the application of this Convention, and hopes that a report will be supplied for examination by the Committee at it next session. In the meantime and in the absence of any new information, the Committee must, yet again, repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee notes the information provided by the Government according to which a national advisory technical committee on occupational safety and health has been set up pursuant to Decree No. 2000-29 of 17 March 2000 which gives effect to Article 7 of the Convention. It also notes, however, that the information requested concerning Articles 2, 4, 5, 6 and 11–36 are to be provided by the Government subsequently. As regards the further information the Committee has requested the Government to provide, the Committee notes that the Government has either not replied to questions raised by the Committee in its previous comments or it has provided information that is applicable to enterprises in general. The Government appears to imply that dockworkers should be treated in the same manner as other workers and ports be treated like any other enterprise. With reference to Articles 4–7, the Committee wishes to recall that the Government is required to take measures to give effect to the specific provisions in the Convention. The Committee must therefore once again repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee draws the Government's attention to the absence of specific health and safety provisions for dock work. The Committee noted previously that a draft Order on safety and health in dock work had been prepared by the technical departments of the Ministry of Labour and Social Security. In its report for the period ending 30 June 1993, the Government repeated this information and added that the draft had been submitted for adoption. The Committee hopes that the provisions of this text will ensure the application of the following provisions of the Convention: Article 4 (objectives and areas to be covered by measures to be established by national laws and regulations, in accordance with Part III of the Convention); Article 5 (responsibility of employers, owners, masters or other persons as appropriate, for compliance with safety and health measures; duty of employers to collaborate whenever two or more of them undertake activities simultaneously at one workplace); Article 7 (consultation of and collaboration between employers and workers). It asks the Government to provide a copy of the above Order as soon as it has been adopted.

In its previous reports, the Government referred to Orders No. 9033/MTERFPPS/DGT/DSSHT on the organization and functioning of the socio-medical centres of enterprises in the People's Republic of the Congo and No. 9034/MTERFPPS/DGT/DSSHT laying down the procedures for the establishment of socio-medical centres which are common to several enterprises in the People's Republic of the Congo. Since these texts have not been received, the Committee would be grateful if the Government would provide a copy of them.

Article 6. The Committee notes from the Government's report for the period ending 30 June 1993 that briefings are to be organized to inform workers about safety provisions in the place of work at which heads of establishment can alert them about the dangers arising from the use of machinery and the precautions to be taken. The Committee asks the Government to provide a copy of the provisions concerning the organization of these briefings and the measures taken to give effect to paragraph 1(c) of this Article.

Article 8. The Committee notes the Government's statement in its report for the period ending 30 June 1993 that all safety measures are provided for in Chapter II of Order No. 9036 of 10 December 1986. The Committee notes that the above part of the Order provides for general protective measures whereas the Convention requires the adoption of measures specific to dock work. It asks the Government to indicate which provisions require the adoption of effective measures (fencing, flagging or other suitable means including, when necessary, cessation of work) to ensure that when the workplace has become unsafe, workers are protected until it has been made safe again.

Article 14. The Committee notes from the Government's report for the period ending 30 June 1993 that the application of this Article is ensured by labour inspectors by means of inspections in enterprises. The Committee asks the Government to indicate which provisions ensure that electrical equipment and installations are so constructed, installed, operated and maintained as to prevent danger, and which standards for electrical equipment and installations have been recognized by the competent authorities.

Article 17. The Committee notes that section 41 of Order No. 9036, cited by the Government in its report for the period ending 30 June 1993 as giving effect to this Article of the Convention, includes specific measures only for the use of lifting gear in particular weather conditions (wind). The Committee asks the Government to indicate the measures taken to ensure that the means of access to a ship's hold or cargo deck are in conformity with the provisions of this Article.

Article 21. The Committee notes the provisions of sections 47–49 of Order No. 9036 which the Government cites in its report for the period ending 30 June 1993 as giving effect to this Article of the Convention. It notes that the above sections provide for protective measures for some machinery or parts of machines which can be dangerous. It asks the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged to ensure that all lifting appliances, every item of loose gear and every sling or lifting device forming an integral part of a load comply with the provisions of the Convention.

Articles 22, 23, 24 and 25. Further to its previous comments, the Committee notes that, in its report for the period ending 30 June 1993, the Government refers to the certification of machinery, including lifting appliances, which is conducted by technical inspectors and advisory bodies, as a general measure to ensure that lifting appliances are sound and in proper working order. However, these Articles of the Convention provide for a set of measures to ensure that appliances and loose gear can be used by workers without any danger or risk: testing of all lifting appliances and loose gear (every five years in ships); thorough examination (at least once every 12 months); regular inspection before use. The Committee asks the Government to indicate the provisions requiring the above measures to be taken in respect of all lifting appliances – on shore and on board – and of all loose gear.

Article 30. The Committee notes that section 43 of Order No. 9036 referred to by the Government, does not relate to the attaching of loads to lifting appliances. It asks the Government to indicate which provisions relate to this matter.

Article 34. The Committee asks the Government to provide a copy of the instructions concerning the wearing of personal protective equipment referred to by the Government in its report for the period ending 30 June 1993.

Article 35. Further to its previous comments, the Committee notes that section 147 of the Labour Code regulates the evacuation of injured persons who are able to be moved and who are not able to be treated by the facilities made available by the employer. It notes that the Government also refers in its reports to Orders Nos 9033 and 9034 mentioned in paragraph 2 above. The Committee asks the Government to indicate the measures taken either under the above texts, or otherwise, to ensure that adequate facilities, including trained personnel, are available for the provision of first aid.

Article 37(1). The Committee recalls that, under this provision of the Convention, committees which include employers' and workers' representatives must be formed at every port where there is a significant number of workers. Recalling the Government's statement that the health and safety committees provided for by the law have not been formed, the Committee asks the Government to indicate the measures taken to ensure the establishment of such committees in ports with a significant number of workers.

Article 38(1). The Government indicates in its report that, in the absence of health and safety committees, instruction and training are entrusted to a specialist in the matter within the enterprise. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the activities of these specialists.

Article 39. The Committee notes that section 61 of Act No. 004/86 of 25 February 1986 establishing the Social Security Code gives effect in part to this Article of the Convention. It asks the Government to indicate the provisions which ensure that this Article is applied to occupational diseases.

Article 41(1)(a). Further to its previous comments, the Committee notes that the Government refers to Order No. 9036 of 10 December 1986 as being the text which lays down general obligations for the persons and bodies concerned with dock work (ports being treated as any industrial enterprise) and that no specific measures have been taken in respect of dock work. The Committee asks the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged to set out the specific obligations taken for the persons and bodies concerned with dock work.

In the absence of any information on the application of the above provisions, the Committee asks the Government to indicate the specific measures which give effect to the following provisions of the Convention:

- Article 9(1) and (2). Safety measures with regard to lighting and marking of dangerous obstacles.
- Article 10(1) and (2). Maintenance of surfaces for traffic or stacking of goods and safe manner of stacking goods.
- Article 11(1) and (2). Width of passageways and separate passageways for pedestrians.
- Article 16(1) and (2). Safe transport to or from a ship or other place by water, safe embarking and disembarking, and safe transport to or from a workplace on land.
- Article 18(1)–(5). Regulations concerning hatch covers.
- Article 19(1) and (2). Protection around openings and decks, closing of hatchways when not in use.
- Article 20(1)–(4). Safety measures when power vehicles operate in the hold; hatch covers secured against displacement; ventilation regulations; safe means of escape from bins or hoppers when dry bulk is being loaded or unloaded.
- Article 26(1)–(3). Members' mutual recognition of arrangements for testing and examination.
- Article 27(1)–(3). Marking lifting appliances with safe working loads.
- Article 28. Rigging plans.
- Article 29. Strength and construction of pallets for supporting loads.
- Article 31(1) and (2). Operation and layout of freight container terminals and organization of work in such terminals.
- Article 38(2). Minimum age limit for workers operating lifting appliances.

The Committee expects that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Republic of Moldova

Occupational Safety and Health (Dock Work) Convention, 1979 (No. 152) (ratification: 2007)

Legislative and regulatory framework implementing the Convention. In its previous comments, while noting the Occupational Health and Safety Act (RM No. 186-XVI of 10 July 2008) and the Safety Rules for Work on Board Inland Navigation Vessels, the Committee requested the Government to specify the legislation and regulatory provisions giving effect to each Article of the Convention. The Government states that under section 20 of Act No. 595/1999 on the international treaties of the Republic of Moldova, the provisions of international treaties which, in line with their formulation, may be applied without the adoption of special normative acts, are enforceable and directly applicable in the judicial system of the Republic of Moldova. According to the Government, in so far as the Ministry of Economy and Infrastructure approved, on 18 December 2018 through Ordinance No. 604, the checklists for the control areas of the Naval Agency, including the checklist for the safety and security of operations in the port area, Articles 9(1) and (2); 10(1); 11(1) and (2); 12; 13(1), (2) and (4); 15; 16; 17(1); 18(1), (2), (3) and (4); 22; 23; 24; 27 and 38 of the Convention are directly applicable. The Government also specifies that the measures aimed at ensuring the proper application of those Articles of the Convention are at the approval stage. While noting the Government's indication that a certain number of Articles of the Convention are directly applicable under Ordinance No. 604 in question, the Committee notes that, broadly speaking, the information provided in the report remains insufficient in as much as it still does not enable the Committee to examine the effect given to various provisions of the Convention. The Committee recalls the need to provide more precise information by specifying the provisions of the law or national regulations that give effect to each Article of the Convention. The Committee trusts that the government will take all necessary steps to provide such information in its next report, including information on measures to ensure the proper implementation of the Articles of the Convention referred to by the Government. In this regard, the Committee refers to the list of provisions below on which it requests further information regarding the measures taken for their implementation.

Furthermore, given its importance, the Committee requested the Government to transmit a copy of the Giurgiulesti International Free Port Rules, and any standards or rules applicable to employers and workers. In this regard, the Committee notes the Government's indication that the Naval Agency is developing a set of regulations at departmental level, including the rules on the Giurgiulesti Port complex and the rules for captains of Giurgiulesti Port. The Committee requests the Government to provide a copy of these rules, if possible in one of the languages of the Office.

Article 1 of the Convention. Dock work. In its previous comments, the Committee asked the Government to provide information on the manner in which the employers' and workers' organizations concerned were consulted in establishing the definition of "dock work". The Committee notes the Government's indication that, to date, no port employers' organization has been established. The Government specifies that, in accordance with Act No. 239/2008 on the transparency of decision-making processes, public consultation is mandatory throughout the formulation and adoption process for technical regulations, or any other legislative Act. The Committee hopes that, in the future, the Government will be able to indicate the manner in which the workers' organizations concerned and, where relevant, the employers' organizations, are consulted on or otherwise participate in the establishment and revision of "dock work".

Article 5(1). Responsibility for compliance with the measures referred to in Article 4(1). In its previous comments, the Committee noted the Government's indication that section 10(1) of the Occupational Safety and Health Act provides that the employer shall take the necessary measures to protect the health and safety of workers, and requested the Government to provide further information on the national laws or regulations which make appropriate persons responsible for compliance with all of the measures referred to in Article 4 of the Convention. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the Occupational Safety and Health Act is implemented through Governmental decision No. 95 of 5 February 2009. The Committee requests the Government to provide a copy of Governmental decision No. 95 of 5 February 2009, indicating the relevant provisions which make appropriate persons responsible for compliance with all of the measures referred to in Article 4 of the Convention.

Article 6(1). Measures to ensure the safety of dockworkers. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the monitoring functions relating to safety in the Giurgiulesti Port complex currently fall to the Naval Agency, which has planned to lead periodic safety information campaigns in the port area. The Committee requests the Government to provide information concerning the periodic safety information campaigns led in all the country's dock work.

Article 7(2). Provisions for close collaboration between employers and workers. The Committee previously noted the establishment of a trade union committee to give effect to the provisions of the Convention. The Committee notes that, in its previous report, the Government nevertheless indicates that a trade union committee for employees in the Giurgiulesti Port complex has still not been set up. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the trade union committees or any other mechanism in place in the country's ports, including the Giurgiulesti Port, to ensure the full collaboration and consultation of employers and workers in the application of the measures set forth in Article 4(1) of the Convention.

Article 14. Installation, construction, operation and maintenance of electrical equipment. The Committee notes the indication that, in accordance with Act No. 174 on energy of 21 September 2017, the National Agency for Energy Regulation, as the body responsible for oversight of national energy, is tasked with formulating and approving the regulations on the operations of power stations, electricity networks and end users' electrical installations. In this respect, in 2019, the National Agency published on its website the draft operating rules for electrical installations and the draft safety rules for the operation of electrical installations in order to submit them for public consultation. The Committee requests the Government to keep it informed of the entry into force of this new regulatory framework and to specify the main provisions giving effect to this Article of the Convention.

Article 15. Adequate and safe means of access to the ship during loading or unloading. The Committee notes the indication that in the Giurgiulesti Port complex, handrails, special access passageways, and stairways joined with the various levels guarantee access to the ships. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on the measures taken to ensure in all the country's ports means of access guaranteeing safety when a ship is being loaded or unloaded alongside a quay or another ship.

Article 16. Safe transport to or from a ship or other place by water, safe embarking and disembarking, and safe transport to or from a workplace on land. The Committee notes the indication that the Naval Agency is developing a set of measures at departmental level, including regulations regarding the Giurgiulesti Port complex, which will contain the relevant provisions on safe transport in the port area and in the maritime area around the port. Once approved in line with the legal procedures, these regulations will be transmitted by the Government to the Office. The Committee requests the Government to provide a copy of the regulations once adopted and to specify the main measures giving effect to this Article of the Convention.

Article 17. Access to the hold or deck of a vessel. The Committee notes the indication that the Naval Agency is looking into the possibility of developing technical regulations on alternative means of access, as stipulated under Article 17(1)(b). The Committee requests the Government to report on all new developments in this regard and hopes that it will be in a position to indicate the manner in which the competent authority determines the acceptability of the means of access to the hold or deck of a vessel, thereby giving full effect to this Article of the Convention.

Article 34. Provision and use of personal protective equipment. Care and maintenance of personal protective equipment and clothing. The Committee notes the Government's indication that personal protective equipment and clothing is required for all workers involved in cargo handling operations in ports, port construction work and other work requiring a physical presence in the operational port area. The Committee also notes the indication that the Naval Agency is developing a set of regulations for ports. The Committee requests the Government to specify the legislative or regulatory text establishing the circumstances in which the provision and proper maintenance by the employer of personal protective equipment and clothing, and the proper use and care by workers of such equipment and clothing, is required. In the absence of such a text, the Committee encourages the Government to take the measures necessary to enable the Naval Agency to adopt a regulatory text in order to give full effect to this Article of the Convention.

Article 38(1). Provision of adequate training and instruction. The Committee notes the indication that the dockworkers in the inland port of Ungheni and all residents (economic agents) of Giurgiulesti International Free Port must, on a monthly basis or whenever appropriate, take classes and test their knowledge regarding their functions and the equipment used. The Committee requests the Government to specify the content of the classes referred to in the ports of Ungheni and Giurgiulesti, and to indicate to what extent prior training and instruction relating to risks and precautions to be taken are made available to workers employed in dock work in the country.

In the absence of information on their application, the Committee once again requests the Government to specify the measures taken or envisaged, in law or in practice, to give full effect to the following provisions of the Convention:

- Article 6(2). Consultation of workers concerning working procedures.
- Article 7(1). Provisions under which the competent authority consults the organizations of employers and workers concerned.
- Article 8. Measures to protect workers from health risks other than dangerous fumes.
- Article 9. Safety measures with regard to lighting and marking of dangerous obstacles.
- Article 10. Maintenance of surfaces used for vehicle traffic or stacking of goods in safe conditions.
- Article 11. Width of passageways for pedestrians and of passageways for cargo-handling appliances.

- Article 12. Suitable and adequate means for fighting fire.
- Article 13(1) to (3) and (5) to (6). Effective guarding of all dangerous parts of machinery, possibility of cutting off the power to machinery in an emergency, protective measures during cleaning, maintenance or repair work and adequate precautions if any guard is removed.
- Article 19. Protection around openings and decks.
- Article 20. Safety measures when power vehicles operate in the hold; hatch covers secured against displacement; ventilation regulations; and safe means of escape from bins or hoppers when dry bulk is being loaded or unloaded.
- Article 21. Design of lifting appliances, loose gear and lifting devices.
- Article 22(3) and (4). Retesting of shore-based lifting appliances and certification of lifting appliances and items of loose gear.
- Article 24. Inspection of loose gear and slings.
- Article 25. Registers of lifting appliances and loose gear.
- Article 26. Mutual recognition of arrangements for testing and examination.
- Article 31. Operation and layout of freight container terminals and organization of work in such terminals.
- Article 32. Handling, storing and stowing of dangerous substances; compliance with international regulations for transport of dangerous substances; and prevention of worker exposure to dangerous substances or atmospheres.
- Article 35. Removal of injured persons.
- Article 36(3). Medical examinations to be carried out free of cost to the worker and confidentiality of the records of medical examinations.
- Article 37. Safety and health committees.
- Article 38(2). Minimum age for operating lifting appliances and other cargo-handling appliances.
- Article 39. Notification of occupational accidents.
- Article 40. Regulations concerning suitable sanitary and washing facilities.
- Article 41. Assigned duties in respect of occupational safety and health, and appropriate penalties.

Part V of the report form. Application of the Convention in practice. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the Convention is partially implemented with the participation of several administrative bodies such as: the Naval Agency, responsible for monitoring occupational safety in the Giurgiulesti Port complex; the National Labour Inspectorate, in charge of investigating occupational accidents and formulating recommendations regarding occupational safety; the line ministries, which ensure inclusive public consultation with the dockworkers and transparency of the decision-making process; and the economic agents responsible for the periodic training and skills assessment pertaining to occupational safety and health in the port area. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on the manner in which the Convention is applied in the country and, in particular, to provide information on the number of dockworkers protected by the legislation, the number and nature of the violations reported, and the number of industrial accidents and cases of occupational disease reported.

Legislative and regulatory texts giving effect to the Convention. In general, the Committee notes that the Government has not provided copies of the legislative and regulatory texts giving effect to the Convention mentioned in its report. Referring to its previous comments, the Committee requests the Government to provide copies of the texts mentioned and any other relevant texts relating to safety and health in dock work, in particular the Safety Rules for Work on board inland navigation vessels (referred to in its previous reports), Ordinance No. 604, approved on 18 December 2018 by the Ministry of Economy and Infrastructure, Governmental decision No. 95 of 5 February 2009 on the implementation of the Occupational Safety and Health Act, and the other regulatory texts being developed mentioned in the present comment, where possible in one of the working languages of the Office.

Indigenous and Tribal Peoples Convention, 1989 (No. 169) (ratification: 2002)

The Committee notes the observations of the Single Confederation of Workers (CUT), which were received on 31 October 2020. The Committee observes that the CUT, in addition to providing information on issues already raised by the Committee in its previous comments, refers to the impact of the COVID-19 pandemic on indigenous peoples. The CUT claims that as a result of racial and socio-economic inequalities, and lack of assistance from the State, indigenous peoples, in particular Quilombola communities and isolated or recently contacted indigenous peoples, are in a situation of great vulnerability and heightened risk from the effects of COVID-19.

The Committee notes the Government's response to the observations of the CUT relating to the impact of COVID-19, received on 4 December 2020. Given that this response was received too late for examination by the Committee at its current meeting, the Committee proposes examining both communications in due course. In addition, the Committee requests the Government to provide its responses to the remaining observations presented by the CUT.

Furthermore, the Committee reiterates the comments adopted in 2019 which are reproduced below.

The Committee notes the observations of the International Organisation of Employers (IOE), received on 2 September 2019, which contain general comments on the application of the Convention; the joint observations of the IOE and the National Confederation of Industry (CNI), received on 31 August 2018; the observations of the National Confederation for Typical State Careers (CONACATE), which include general comments on the application of the Convention received on 28 August 2017, and the observations of the General Confederation of Workers of Peru (CGTP), received on 23 March 2017, which include a report by COICA (a Peruvian indigenous peoples' organization) on the application of the Convention in various countries.

Representation made under article 24 of the ILO Constitution. Right of Quilombola communities to the lands they traditionally occupy. Alcântara space launch centre. For many years, the Committee has been examining the question of the impact of the establishment of the Alcântara space centre (CEA) and the Alcântara launch centre (CLA) on the rights of the Quilombola communities of Alcântara. The Committee notes that the Governing Body at its 337th Session (October–November 2019) decided that the representation made under article 24 of the ILO Constitution by the Union of Rural Workers of Alcântara (STTR) and the Union of Family Agriculture Workers of Alcântara (SINTRAF), alleging non-observance by Brazil of the Indigenous and Tribal Peoples Convention, 1989 (No. 169), was receivable. The Committee observes that the allegations in the representation refer to the consequences of the extension of the area covered by the Alcântara space launch centre on the rights of the Quilombola communities and the lands traditionally occupied by them. In accordance with its usual practice, the Committee has decided to defer the examination of this issue until the Governing Body adopts its report on the representation.

Article 3 of the Convention. Human rights. The Committee observes that certain United Nations bodies and the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights (IACHR) have expressed concern in recent years at the situation of conflict surrounding territorial claims and at threats and attacks on the rights and integrity of the indigenous peoples of Brazil. The Committee notes the press release of 8 June 2017 of the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights (title: "Indigenous and environmental rights under attack in Brazil, UN and Inter-American experts warn") in which three UN Special Rapporteurs and a IACHR Rapporteur stated: "In the last 15 years, Brazil has seen the highest number of killings of environmental and land defenders of any country. [...] Indigenous peoples are especially at risk". The Committee notes that the IACHR, in its preliminary observations of 12 November 2018 concerning its visit to Brazil, emphasized that harassment, threats and murders characterized land disputes and forced displacements. The IACHR noted with concern that the impunity surrounding these acts of rural violence was contributing towards their perpetuation and increase. Furthermore, at the time of its travel to Mato Grosso state, the IACHR observed the grave humanitarian situation faced by the Guarani and Kaiowá peoples, largely due to violations of their land rights. The IACHR visited the Dorados-Amambaipeguá indigenous lands, and received information on the victims of the "Caaraó massacre", during which one person was killed and another six members of the community were injured, as well as reports of frequent armed attacks by militias.

The Committee also notes that the IACHR granted precautionary measures on 29 September 2019 in favour of members of the Guyraroká community of the Guarani Kaiowá indigenous people, since they had prima facie evidence that families of the community are in a serious and urgent situation because their rights to life and physical integrity are at serious risk. The IACHR takes into consideration reports concerning the high level of conflict between members of the community and landowners and concerning death threats (Resolution 47/19, Precautionary Measure (PM) 458/19).

The Committee notes this information with concern. The Committee urges the Government to take all the necessary measures to protect the life, physical and psychological integrity, and all the rights guaranteed by the Convention to indigenous and tribal peoples. The Committee considers that indigenous and tribal peoples can only assert their rights, particularly with regard to possession and ownership of the lands they traditionally occupy, if adequate measures are adopted to guarantee a climate free of violence, pressure, fear and threats of any kind.

Articles 6, 7, 15 and 16. Consultations. In its previous comments, the Committee referred to the process for regulation of the indigenous and Quilombola peoples' right to consultation which had been under way since 2012. In this regard, the Government indicated that the process of negotiation with the peoples concerned had encountered certain difficulties and that the Secretariat-General of the Government was endeavouring to restore the dialogue. The Government was considering the possibility of proposing a potential consultation mechanism on the basis of a practical case. The Committee also noted that the CNI and the IOE had emphasized that the absence of regulation on the consultations required by the Convention was generating legal uncertainty for enterprises.

In its report, the Government indicates that in recent years a number of indigenous peoples have taken initiatives in this area, indicating to the State the manner in which they wish to be consulted. In this context, they have drawn up their own protocols for prior consultation in which they formalize the diversity of procedures for building dialogue enabling effective participation in decision-making processes that can affect their lives, their rights or their lands. The Government refers in particular to the support given by the National Foundation for Indigenous Affairs (FUNAI) for drafting protocols for consultations involving the Xingu indigenous peoples in 2016, the Krenak indigenous people in 2018 and the Tupiniquim people in 2018, and to discussions under way in the Roraima Indigenous Council (CIR). In this regard, the Committee observes that, according to information on the website of the Public Prosecutor's Office, other communities have adopted protocols of this type. Moreover, regarding policies, programmes, actions and projects relating to social assistance for indigenous peoples, the Government indicates that FUNAI is intensifying efforts to sign agreements with provider institutions in order to ensure respect for the particular social and cultural characteristics of these peoples and to respect their right to free and informed prior consultation where appropriate.

The Government also points out that there is growing demand for infrastructure from indigenous communities (for electric power, water storage and distribution or road construction). In this regard, FUNAI ensures that all actions, activities or projects respect the right to free and informed prior consultation, so that relations between the Brazilian State and the indigenous communities are not vertical. The Government indicates that FUNAI, through its decentralized units, supplies technical, logistical and at times financial support to partner bodies and municipalities under whose jurisdiction indigenous lands are located in order to organize the necessary meetings.

The Committee welcomes the drawing up of consultation protocols by certain communities and the role played by FUNAI in this respect. The Committee requests the Government to provide further information on the status of these protocols and to indicate how it is ensured in practice that the protocols are applied in a systematic and coordinated manner through the country whenever consideration is being given to legislative or administrative measures which may affect indigenous peoples directly. The Committee also encourages the Government to continue its efforts with a view to the adoption of a regulatory framework on consultations which will enable the indigenous and Quilombola peoples to have a suitable mechanism guaranteeing them the right to be consulted and to participate effectively whenever consideration is being given to legislative or administrative measures which may affect indigenous peoples directly, and which will be conducive to greater legal certainty for all stakeholders. The Committee recalls the need to consult the indigenous and Quilombola peoples as part of this process and to enable them to participate fully through their representative institutions so as to be able to express their views and influence the final outcome of the process. It requests the Government to provide information on the consultation processes undertaken, including on the basis of the consultation protocols developed by the various indigenous communities and the results thereof.

Article 14. Lands. The Committee recalls that the two bodies responsible for the identification and demarcation of lands and the issuing of land titles are FUNAI (for lands traditionally occupied by indigenous peoples) and the National Institute for Settlement and Agrarian Reform (INCRA) (for lands traditionally occupied by the Quilombola peoples). The procedures are regulated by Decree No. 1775/96 and Decree No. 4887/03, respectively. The Government describes the various stages of the procedure, including: the request to open an administrative procedure for regularization; the preparation of a zone study (containing anthropological, historical, cartographic, land ownership and environmental elements); the declaration of limits; the opposition phase; the physical demarcation; the publication of the recognition order establishing the limits of the territory; and the registration and concession of the titles of collective ownership to the community by decree. The Committee notes the statistical information sent by the Government on land demarcation procedures in the states of Mato Grosso and Rio Grande do Sul. It observes that in Rio Grande do Sul, of a total of 48 procedures, 20 have resulted in regularization and 28 are in progress (at the study, declaration or demarcation stage). Regarding Mato Grosso, of a total of 50 procedures, 24 have resulted in regularization and 26 are in progress. The Committee also notes that, according to information on the FUNAI website, 440 lands have been regularized in the country as a whole. Moreover, 43 lands have had their limits identified, 75 lands have had their limits declared and nine lands have had their limits certified. Lastly, for 116 lands, the procedure is at the study stage.

The Committee notes that CONACATE refers in its observations to Constitutional Amendment Proposal No. 215/2000, under examination by the National Congress, the aim of which is to confer exclusive authority on the National Congress to approve the demarcation of lands traditionally occupied by indigenous peoples and also to ratify demarcations which have already been certified. CONACATE indicates that the final decision on any new demarcation of these lands would no longer be under the authority of the competent ministry but under the authority of the National Congress, where agri-industry is heavily represented.

The Committee also observes that, according to the information available on the website of the Federal Supreme Court (STF), in September 2019 FUNAI filed an extraordinary appeal (1.017.365/SC) with the Supreme Court on the issue of the "time frame". The "timeframe" approach followed by certain jurisdictions means that only lands actually occupied on 5 October 1988, the date of promulgation of the Constitution, should be recognized as lands traditionally occupied by indigenous peoples. Since the STF recognized the general scope of the constitutional issue under examination, its final decision will have binding force in all instances of the judiciary. Moreover, the Committee notes that, according to information on the Congress website, two interim measures were adopted in 2019 aimed at transferring the authority to identify, delimit, demarcate and register indigenous lands from FUNAI to the Ministry of Agriculture, Livestock and Supplies (MPO 870/2019 and MP 886/2019). The first measure was rejected by the National Congress and the second measure was deemed unconstitutional by the Supreme Court.

The Committee observes that the IACHR, in its preliminary observations of 12 November 2018 relating to its visit to Brazil, stated that it had received various testimonies concerning the difficulties and long delays which indigenous communities face regarding access to land ownership. The result of these difficulties was that public lands intended for these communities were occupied by landowners or private mining enterprises, and this gave rise to conflicts involving expulsions, displacements, invasions and other forms of violence. The IACHR also expressed concern at the weakening in recent years of institutions such as FUNAI.

The Committee recalls that Article 14 of the Convention provides that the rights of ownership and possession of the peoples concerned over the lands which they traditionally occupy shall be recognized. In addition, measures shall be taken in appropriate cases to safeguard the right of the peoples concerned to use lands not exclusively occupied by them, but to which they have traditionally had access for their subsistence and traditional activities. In this regard, the Committee emphasized in its General observation of 2018 that recognition of traditional occupation as the source of ownership and possession rights is the cornerstone on which the land rights system established by the Convention is based. The Committee trusts that the Government will continue taking all necessary measures to ensure the full application of the Convention with regard to the ownership and possession rights of indigenous and tribal peoples over all the lands which they traditionally occupy. It requests the Government to take the necessary measures to follow up in the very near future on the procedures pending before FUNAI concerning the delimitation, demarcation and registration of indigenous lands and before INCRA concerning lands traditionally occupied by Quilombola communities. The Committee in particular requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken regarding the situation of the Guarani and Kaiowá peoples. The Committee further requests the Government to provide information on the human and material resources allocated to both FUNAI and INCRA to fulfil their mandate at every stage of the procedure – studies, delimitation, demarcation and registration of lands.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government, which reiterates the content of its previous request adopted in 2019.

Guatemala

Indigenous and Tribal Peoples Convention, 1989 (No. 169) (ratification: 1996)

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020). The Committee proceeded with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the supplementary information received this year, as well as on the basis of the information at its disposal in 2019.

The Committee notes the observations of the Coordinating Committee of Agricultural, Commercial, Industrial and Financial Associations (CACIF) received on 30 August 2019 and the observations of the International Organisation of Employers (IOE), received on 2 September 2019, which contain general comments on the Convention. Likewise, it notes the joint observations of the Autonomous Popular Trade Union Movement and the Global Unions of Guatemala received on 30 September 2019, which were formulated together with the Maya Waquib' kej National Coordination and Convergence, the Association of Lawyers and Notaries of Guatemala (NIM AJPU), the Cultural Survival (Sobrevivencia Cultural) Association, the Committee of United Agricultural Workers (CUC), the Political Alliance for the Women's Sector (APSM), the Madre Selva Ecologist Collective and the Maya, Garifuna and Xinca Ancestral Authorities. The Committee notes the Government's replies to the observations from the IOE and the CACIF, as well as to the observations from the Autonomous Popular Trade Union Movement and the Global Unions of Guatemala, received on 30 October 2019.

The Committee also notes the supplementary observations received from the CACIF and the IOE on 1 October 2020. Lastly, the Committee notes the observations of the Autonomous Popular Trade Union Movement and the Global Unions of Guatemala received on 16 October 2020. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments in this respect.

The Committee notes that some of the information provided by the Government refers to measures taken within the framework of the health and economic crisis caused by the COVID-19 pandemic to provide advice to workers belonging to indigenous peoples on their labour rights and provide them with economic support. The Government indicates that, as one of the vulnerable groups affected by the situation, indigenous peoples have benefited from urgent action to address their financial needs.

The Committee notes that, in their supplementary observations, the Autonomous Popular Trade Union Movement and the Global Unions of Guatemala allege that certain of the measures adopted by the authorities in the context of the pandemic, such as the restrictions on freedom of movement, have had a disproportionate impact on the economic situation of rural indigenous communities. The trade union organizations also allege that certain indigenous communities have not benefited from health protocols to combat COVID-19 or from educational measures, such as courses via television, to which they did not have access. The Committee trusts that within the framework of the measures that the Government has reported have just been taken, it will be ensured that indigenous peoples benefit from appropriate protection against the COVID-19 pandemic and its consequences.

*Articles 2 and 33 of the Convention. Coordinated and systematic action. Institutions and national policy for indigenous people*s. In its earlier comments, the Committee noted the creation of the Office for Indigenous Peoples and Interculturality and of the process engaged for the development of the Indigenous Peoples and Interculturality Policy. It also noted the information regarding institutional instability, and the lack of a solid legal framework, budget and personnel to attend to the demands of the indigenous peoples. Accordingly, the Committee requested the Government to ensure the effective coordination and harmonization of the activities carried out by the different institutions responsible for implementing the rights provided in the Convention, defining their legal framework and ensuring the required resources.

The Committee notes from the Government's report the establishment in January 2019 of the Special Social Development Office to replace the Office for Indigenous Peoples and Interculturality. The mandate of the new Office, which includes the Vice-President of the Republic, is to provide technical guidance on the design of development policies for indigenous peoples, coordinate the design and management of an action plan for indigenous peoples and interculturality, and support the development of indigenous institutions. The Committee notes that the Office has established six thematic working groups for the most excluded and vulnerable indigenous peoples, including the thematic working group on indigenous peoples. The mandate of this working group includes improving mechanisms for the management of the services provided by State institutions to indigenous peoples, promoting action for the development of consultation processes and a legislative agenda focused on indigenous peoples. The Committee notes the supplementary information provided by the Government in 2020 in which it indicates that responsibility for the thematic working group on indigenous peoples has been transferred to the Ministry of Labour and Social Welfare. It also notes the information on the activities and meetings held by this working group to address issues relating to the rights of indigenous peoples (such as their labour rights, the coordination and language training of personnel in State bodies that provide public services in indigenous communities, and the enforcement of judicial sentences). The Committee also observes that, in accordance with its mandate of inter-institutional coordination and cooperation, the working group carried out an orientation exercise with its members to identify areas for intervention in line with national priorities and indicators focusing on indigenous peoples.

The Committee notes from the observations of the Autonomous Popular Trade Union Movement and the Global Unions of Guatemala that there are many dispersed, weak, underfunded and unstable indigenous institutions and services, a situation which hampers the establishment of effective public policies for indigenous peoples; they add that there is no effective mechanism enabling indigenous peoples to participate in areas of interest to them.

The Committee notes the changes made to the institutions competent to deal with matters relating to the peoples covered by the Convention, and particularly the establishment of the thematic working group on indigenous peoples in the Ministry of Labour and Social Welfare. The Committee trusts that the establishment of the thematic working group will contribute to the development of a robust and stable institutional framework for indigenous peoples. In this regard, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the action taken by the thematic working group for indigenous peoples to ensure that the many bodies responsible for the matters covered by the Convention take systematic and coordinated action in cooperation with indigenous peoples. The Committee once again requests the Government to provide specific information on the means and resources available to the thematic working group for indigenous peoples and the other institutions dealing with matters concerning indigenous peoples to enable them to discharge their mandates, and information on the analyses conducted on the results of its actions.

The Government indicates that the formulation of the national policy for indigenous peoples was under the direction of the Office for Indigenous Peoples, and that its development is now the responsibility of the thematic working group for indigenous peoples. The Autonomous Popular Trade Union Movement and the Global Unions of Guatemala indicate in their observations that neither the indigenous peoples nor the trade unions have been consulted on the proposed policy. In reply to these observations, the Government reports that the indigenous peoples have participated in the formulation of the policy since 2014 through community consultation days held in different locations to facilitate access and participation by local leaders. It adds that, for the holding of the community days, support was sought from institutions and organizations with a presence in the communities, such as the Academy of Maya Languages of Guatemala, the Office of the Defender of Indigenous Women, indigenous municipalities and local indigenous organizations. In its supplementary information, the Government indicates that the subject of the draft policy on indigenous peoples and interculturality 2019–2032 continues to be on the agenda of the thematic working group, which has established an inter-institutional steering committee with members of the General Secretariat of Planning and Programming of the Office of the President. However, this action has been left pending by the declared state of emergency in March 2020 due to the COVID-19 pandemic.

The Committee requests the Government to continue providing updated information on the progress made in the adoption of the policy on indigenous peoples and interculturality, indicating precisely how the participation of indigenous peoples has been secured in the development of the policy throughout the national territory, the contribution of these peoples to the draft policy and when it is envisaged that the policy will be finalized.

Implementation of the Peace Agreement. In its previous comments, the Committee referred to various commitments drawn up as part of the Agreement on Identity and Rights of Indigenous Peoples, part of the Peace Agreements of 1996, which have not been met, and it requested the Government to provide information on the measures adopted for their implementation. The Government reiterates that the Secretariat for Peace is responsible for follow-up and for coordinating the implementation of the Agreement on Identity and Rights of Indigenous Peoples, also providing technical, professional and logistical support. The Committee notes that the United Nations Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination (CERD), in its 2019 concluding observations regarding Guatemala, reiterated its concern at the scant progress in implementing the Agreement on Identity and Rights of Indigenous Peoples, and at the absence of a human rights and gender focus in the implementation of the National Reparations Programme (Document CERD/C/GTM/CO/16-17). In the written information communicated to the Committee on the Application of Standards of the International Labour Conference in 2019, the Government reaffirmed its unrestricted interest and commitment in taking the necessary actions to give continuity to the fulfilment of those commitments that are pending or partially fulfilled. The Committee requests the Government to intensify its efforts to implement the Agreement on Identity and Rights of Indigenous Peoples, with the participation of the indigenous peoples, and to provide information on progress achieved, pointing to possible obstacles to its full implementation. The Committee also requests the Government to communicate information on the activities of the national compensation programme for victims of the armed conflict belonging to the indigenous peoples.

Article 3. Human rights. In previous comments, the Committee expressed its deep concern at the considerable increase in acts of violence and repression of social protests by indigenous peoples, and firmly urged the Government to take measures to investigate the acts of violence and to set in motion the relevant judicial proceedings to identify and penalize the perpetrators. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government on the current situation of the investigations undertaken by the Office of the Public Prosecutor and the progress in the criminal proceedings relating to four murders and attacks on the physical integrity of leaders and defenders of the indigenous peoples. It also notes the information provided by the Deputy Ministry of Security of the Ministry of the Interior on the risk analyses carried out by the Department for the Protection of Persons and Security and the security measures adopted for the family members and persons close to the murdered leaders. The Government indicates that since 2015 there have been no investigations directly related to the repression of social protest by indigenous peoples. The Committee also notes the information provided by the Office of the Public Prosecutor concerning 11 open cases of murder and threats against defenders and/or leaders of indigenous peoples, which are under investigation. With regard to the murder of indigenous persons during the social protests in Totonicapán in October 2012, referred to by the Committee in previous comments, the Government reports that the seven persons accused of those crimes have been placed under measures alternative to pretrial detention ordered by the criminal court of first instance. An appeal against those measures has been filed by the Office of the Public Prosecutor and the Association of 48 Cantons of Totonicapán.

The Committee notes from their observations that the Autonomous Popular Trade Union Movement and the Global Unions of Guatemala refer to the murder of two elected mayors of Maya origin, as well as to the persecution of indigenous communicators. It also notes, from its 2019 concluding observations concerning Guatemala, that CERD remains seriously concerned at the acts of violence, threats and attacks against indigenous and Afro-descendent leaders and rights defenders, and also at the improper use of criminal procedure to criminalize those defenders (CERD/C/GTM/CO/16-17). Moreover, the United Nations Committee against Torture (CAT), in its 2018 concluding observations on Guatemala, indicates that private security companies sometimes took on the functions of the National Civil Police, creating an environment of intimidation amongst the indigenous communities (CAT/C/GTM/CO/7). The Committee notes that the Government, in the written information submitted in 2019 to the Committee on the Application of Standards, refers to the development of a Public Protection Policy for Human Rights Defenders in Guatemala, and to the dissemination, at the national level, of the Guatemalan system for monitoring the recommendations of the international human rights protection systems.

The Committee notes this information and reiterates its deep concern at the persistent reports of murders and attacks against defenders of indigenous peoples and indigenous communicators, and also at the absence of information on judicial decisions determining responsibilities and penalizing the perpetrators. The Committee recalls that the rights enshrined in the Convention can only be exercised where fundamental human rights, especially those regarding life and security of the person, are fully respected and guaranteed. The Committee therefore once again firmly urges the Government to intensify its efforts to ensure progress in the investigations and proceedings to identify and penalize the perpetrators and instigators of the acts of violence and persecution of defenders of indigenous peoples and indigenous communicators. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the progress made in the adoption of the Public Protection Policy for Human Rights Defenders and the action envisaged under that policy to protect defenders of indigenous peoples' rights.

Article 6. Appropriate consultation procedures. The Committee recalls that it has been raising the question of adopting appropriate consultation procedures in its comments for a number of years. In its previous observation, the Committee noted the existence of two Bills before Congress on consultations with indigenous peoples, but at the same time noted that the Government had not provided information on how indigenous peoples had been consulted regarding the Bills. The Committee also noted the related rulings of the Constitutional Court on the need for Congress to adopt legislation implementing consultation with indigenous peoples, as well as the social partners' concerns at the lack of a regulatory framework for such consultation, developed in consultation with the indigenous peoples. The Government indicates that since 2007 five Bills on consultation have come before Congress. The Committee observes that the Government has not provided information on the current situation with regard to those Bills, nor on the consultation processes with indigenous peoples on their content. The Committee notes that the Autonomous Popular Trade Union Movement and the Global Unions of Guatemala indicate that indigenous organizations rejected the consultation Bills, and that an attempt had been made to take the mere presence of indigenous peoples at the events organized by the Ministry of Labour and Social Welfare as signalling their support for the Bills. The Committee also notes from its observations that the CACIF recognizes the efforts made by the Executive to promote a procedure that would give legal certainty to the process of prior consultation. Nevertheless, the Committee reiterates its concern at the absence of an established procedure on the right to consultation, a situation which has led to contradictory legal rulings. In reply, the Government indicates that the Congressional Labour Committee convened the representative organizations of indigenous peoples and interested bodies to a public hearing in October 2019 to disseminate and discuss the content of a consultation Bill. The Committee notes, from the Government's reply to the trade union's observations, that the convocation was for a one-day hearing, it was written only in Spanish and restricted participation by indigenous peoples to two persons per organization. In the supplementary information provided in 2020, the Government provides a copy of the above-mentioned Bill submitted to the Legislative Steering Committee of Congress on 22 October 2019. The CACIF, in its 2020 observations, refers to the advisory opinion issued by the Constitutional Court in July 2020, in which it reiterates that the consultation procedure must be regulated by the Congress of the Republic through a legal provision, and emphasizes the importance of adopting legislation containing the necessary provisions to establish a consultation procedure in the country.

The Committee recalls that it is important for governments to establish, as a matter of priority and with the participation of the indigenous and tribal peoples, appropriate procedures for consulting the representative organizations of these peoples. In this regard, it reiterates the importance of holding prior consultations with the indigenous peoples before establishing those procedures (see General observations of 2010 and 2018). It also recalls that the consultations must be formal, full and aimed at producing genuine dialogue between governments and indigenous peoples, for which sufficient time must be given to these peoples to organize their own decision-making processes and to participate effectively in the decisions adopted. Based on these criteria and the information provided by the Government and the social partners, the Committee once again urges the Government to institute a consultation process with indigenous peoples with a view to discussing and subsequently adopting an appropriate consultation procedure with indigenous peoples, and requests the Government to provide information in that regard. The Committee encourages all interested parties to make every effort to participate in good faith in the process, with the aim of engaging in constructive dialogue that will lead to positive results. The Committee reiterates its request for information on the consultation processes engaged with the indigenous peoples, the methods employed, the entity directing the processes and the framework supporting them.

Article 14. Lands. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the information provided by the Government on the implementation of the Programme for the regularization and allocation of State land showed no progress in terms of identifying and registering the communal lands of the peoples covered by the Convention. The Committee requested the Government to adopt measures without delay to protect the land rights of the indigenous peoples, and to provide information on the areas of lands titled, together with information on the application in practice of the national regulations on communal lands. The Government indicates that under the specific Regulation for the recognition and declaration of communal lands of 2009, the Cadastral Information Registry (RIC) had visited the communities to disseminate the Regulation and had conducted initial surveys of the communal lands. The Committee notes that the regulation cited establishes the requirement of consultation with the indigenous communities prior to cadastral survey in respect of lands the property of, in possession or tenure of, those communities. Between 2005 and 2019, the RIC carried out 36 surveys in the same number of communities where the lands could potentially be declared communal, and 11 communities have been thus recognized. In the written information submitted in 2019 to the Committee on the Application of Standards, the Government indicated that, given the socio-cultural characteristics of the country, the process for the recognition and declaration of lands as communal is slow. The Committee urges the Government to intensify its efforts in adopting the measures necessary to accelerate the process of identification, titling and registration of the lands that the indigenous peoples have traditionally occupied. In that regard, the Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information on progress made and the difficulties arising in those processes, and also on the manner in which indigenous peoples participate in their implementation.

In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the Secretariat for Agrarian Affairs had made efforts to facilitate the settlement of agrarian disputes, and requested the Government to provide information on resolved and pending conflicts. The Government replies that between 2015 and 2019, the Secretariat for Agrarian Matters dealt with a total of 1,484 cases, involving 2,149 persons belonging to different ethnic communities. It also informs the Committee that the Presidential Dialogue Commission, within which different Government entities and civil society groups interact, has taken up ten cases related to land and natural resources conflicts. The Committee notes that the Autonomous Popular Trade Union Movement and the Global Unions of Guatemala indicate the persistent lack of protection of the collective property of indigenous peoples. Moreover, it further notes that CERD, in its 2019 concluding observations regarding Guatemala, refers to reports that indigenous peoples have been forcibly evicted from their territories without appropriate legal protection and, in some cases, through the use of excessive force (CERD/C/GTM/CO/16-17). The Committee urges the Government to take the appropriate measures to investigate the cases of eviction involving indigenous communities and to ensure that those communities have adequate means of defending their rights. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on the number of land conflicts dealt with and resolved through the efforts of the Secretariat for Agrarian Matters and the Presidential Dialogue Commission, giving examples of agreements reached.

Articles 6 and 15. Consultation, natural resources. Sacatepéquez cement plant. Since 2011, the Committee has been noting the conflict in San Juan Sacatepéquez related to the project to construct a cement plant and the Government's attempts to promote dialogue between the enterprise mounting the project and the indigenous communities. In its last comments, the Committee requested the Government to provide information on the Peace and Development Framework Agreement signed between the San Juan Sacatepéquez municipality, the Government and 12 indigenous communities under which it was agreed to foster a climate of trust, seek out-of-court solutions to criminal proceedings, and aim to provide special assistance for victims of the cement plant construction. In that regard, the Government replies that in 2017 and 2018 the Presidential Dialogue Commission had approached the actors interested in transforming the conflict and letters of understanding had been signed, reaffirming cooperation between the communities, the Cementos Progreso Company, responsible for the cement plant, and the municipality of San Juan Sacatepéquez. It indicates that the enterprise, in coordination with the municipality, continues to undertake projects that are beneficial to the communities of Asunción Chivoc y Cruz Blanca, las Trojes 1, Santa Fe Ocaña, and Pajoques y Pilar 1. The Committee duly notes the Government's indication that dialogue has been hampered by demonstrations led by mayors and community leaders against the regional ring road projected by the cement company in San Antonio Las Trojes. It notes from the observations of the Autonomous Popular Trade Union Movement and the Global Unions of Guatemala that conflict and violence persist between those in favour and those against the projects of the Cementos Progresos enterprise; and that some members of the San Juan Sacatepéquez communities, who had engaged in passive resistance, have been victims of human rights violations. The Committee, while taking due note of the Government's reaffirmed commitment to implement an immediate action plan answering to the communities' concerns with participation, compromise and a role for the communities and their representatives, observes that some indigenous communities are still in conflict with the local government regarding the San Juan Sacatepéquez cement plant project. The Committee therefore encourages the Government to continue taking all necessary measures to restore the climate of trust and dialogue between the local government, the enterprise and all the communities affected by the project. The Committee requests the Government to provide specific information on progress in fulfilling the Peace and Development Framework Agreement, and the ways in which the indigenous communities concerned have been involved in its implementation. It also requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken to investigate the allegations regarding violations of the rights of members of indigenous communities communicated by the trade unions.

Review of mining legislation. In its previous comments, the Committee reminded the Government of the need to take steps to bring the mining legislation into line with the Convention's requirements of consultation and participation. The Committee notes that the Ministry of Energy and Mines has set up a Revision Committee to draft reforms of the Mining Act with a view to including the content of Articles 6 and 15 of the Convention. It notes that six reform initiatives of that Act are currently before Congress, together with a number of Constitutional Court rulings setting forth consultations with the communities affected by the mining projects. In its observations, the CACIF stresses the innumerable economic losses, including the loss of jobs, brought about by the suspension of the mining projects in the absence of a clear consultation process. The Autonomous Popular Trade Union Movement and the Global Unions of Guatemala indicate that the Government has not complied with the order to hold consultations issued by the Constitutional Court in respect of various mining projects, and that the territories inhabited by the indigenous peoples continue to be laid open for extractive projects, with no participation by the communities affected. In that connection, the Government replies that in the absence of legislation on consultation in the country, the Constitutional Court's guidelines have been followed, and that the Ministry of Energy and Mining has ensured the establishment of forums for the inclusion and participation of indigenous representatives in areas where they can influence the projects.

The Committee notes with concern the ongoing lack of a mechanism for clear and systematic consultations with the indigenous peoples applicable to the natural resources extraction projects in their territories, resulting in a number of judicial rulings of non-compliance with the obligation to consult. In this regard, the Committee once again urges the Government to take all measures necessary to ensure that the mining legislation is in accordance with Articles 6 and 15 of the Convention and that appropriate consultation procedures with the indigenous peoples are in place, designed in consultation with the peoples in question, in coordination with all institutions concerned, and aimed at establishing a climate of trust and legal certainty. The Committee emphasizes that the establishment of effective consultation procedures helps to prevent and resolve conflicts through dialogue, and reduces social tension.

The Committee hopes that the technical assistance that the Office has been providing the Government for the implementation of Convention No. 169 will help to address the matters raised in its comments and promote the full application of the Convention, and particularly the rights of the indigenous peoples enshrined therein.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Honduras

Indigenous and Tribal Peoples Convention, 1989 (No. 169) (ratification: 1995)

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020). The Committee proceeded with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the supplementary information received this year, as well as on the basis of the information at its disposal in 2019.

The Committee notes the observations of the Honduran National Business Council (COHEP) received in 2018, in September 2019 and on 1 October 2020. The Committee notes that the International Organisation of Employers (IOE) supported the 2018 observations of the COHEP and, in September 2019, sent General observations on the application of the Convention. The Committee notes the Government's replies in this regard. The Committee also notes the observations of the General Confederation of Workers (CGT) and the Workers' Confederation of Honduras (CTH), received on 5 October 2020, and the Government's reply to those received on 30 October 2020.

Follow-up to the conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards (International Labour Conference, 105th Session, May–June 2016)

Article 3 of the Convention. Human rights. In its previous comments, the Committee noted with deep concern, as did the Conference Committee in its conclusions of 2016, the information regarding murders, threats and violence against representatives and defenders of the rights of indigenous peoples, as well as the climate of impunity. The Government was firmly urged to take the necessary measures to provide adequate protections for members of indigenous communities and their representatives against any acts of violence or threats, to investigate the reported murders and acts of violence and provide information in that respect.

In its report, the Government refers in general terms to the security and protection measures taken by the General Directorate of the Protection System (DGSP) in relation to several indigenous and rural communities, including police measures and measures for the installation of infrastructure and technology for human rights defenders in their own communities. The Government also refers to the adoption of preventive measures in the form of training for local authorities and awareness-raising activities on the importance of the work of defenders of indigenous peoples. In this respect, the Committee notes that, among the special prosecutors, in 2018, the Office of the Special Prosecutor for the Protection of Human Rights Defenders, Journalists, Media Representatives and Justice Officials was established.

The Committee notes with regret that the Government has not provided more detailed information on the specific measures adopted in relation to the investigations conducted and the legal proceedings in process concerning the acts of violence, including murder, against representatives and defenders of indigenous peoples. In this respect, the Committee notes in relation to the murder of Ms Berta Cáceres (former president of the Civic Council of Popular and Indigenous Organizations of Honduras (COPINH)), to which it referred in its previous observation, that, according to information from the judicial authorities and the Public Prosecutor's Office, on 29 November 2018, the First Chamber of the Trial Court with national jurisdiction found guilty seven citizens as co-perpetrators of the murder. The Committee also notes that, in December 2019, the Special Prosecutor for Crimes against Life requested that a case be opened against a citizen accused of instigating the murder of Ms Berta Cáceres.

The Committee notes that, in his 2019 report, the Special Rapporteur on the situation of human rights defenders in Honduras recognizes persons defending the rights of indigenous peoples as one of the specific groups of human rights defenders who are at risk. The Rapporteur notes that the threats made against indigenous peoples are essentially linked to their efforts to defend their land and natural resources, fight racism and discrimination and claim their economic, social and cultural rights and their right to access to justice. He indicates that indigenous activists of the Lenca, Maya, Tolupán, Garifuna, Nahua, Pech Tawahka and Misquito peoples frequently face death, prosecution, stigmatization, judicial harassment and discrimination for fighting for the rights of their peoples and observes that, "The vast majority of murders and attacks targeting rights defenders go unpunished; if investigations are launched at all, they are inconclusive." (A/HRC/40/60/Add.2).

In its supplementary information provided in 2020, the Government indicates that the DGSP has improved the Matrix for the evaluation of collective and individual risks and the identification of risks through constant monitoring. Through the Matrix, the characteristics of the population are determined and technical safety schemes implemented. The Prevention and Contextual Analysis Unit (UPAC), which forms part of the National Prevention Mechanism, has also developed four prevention plans which analyse the situation and set out prevention measures for certain indigenous communities, including the Lenca community in the Department of La Paz, the Tolupán people of Montana de la Flor in the Department of Francisco Morazán and the Garifuna communities of the Department of Cortés. The Government adds that between 2017 and 2018, the Office of the Public Prosecutor received 18 complaints of crimes against the life of members of indigenous and Afro-Honduran peoples, following which judicial action was taken in six cases, with six convictions. A total of 45 complaints were also received of threats, leading to judicial action in two cases and two convictions. The Government further reports that, as a consequence of the violent deaths of members of indigenous and Afro-Honduran peoples (a murder in Warunta, in the municipality of Ahuas, Department of Gracias a Dios, and multiple murders in the community of Santo Tomás, Gualcinse, Department of Lempira), as well as threats against members of the Lenca people in La Iguala, Department of Lempira, and in the Department of La Paz, the Special Prosecutor for ethnic matters and cultural heritage has called for the implementation of protection measures.

With reference to the seven persons found guilty of the murder of Bertha Cáceres, the Government indicates that four of them were sentenced to imprisonment for 50 years and the other three for 30 years. The trial of the person accused of instigating the crime (the former Executive President of Desarrollos Energéticos SA (DESA)) is still pending.

The Committee takes due note of this information on the initiatives to provide protection to the members of indigenous and Afro-Honduran peoples who are the victims of threats. In this regard, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the protection measures adopted at the request of the Special Prosecutor for ethnic matters and cultural heritage as a consequence of the violent deaths and threats against members of indigenous and Afro-Honduran peoples, with an indication of the types of measures and the persons benefiting.

The Committee urges the Government to continue taking the necessary measures to foster a climate free from violence in which the physical safety and psychological well-being of members of indigenous communities and their representatives are sufficiently protected, and the full and effective exercise of their human and collective rights is guaranteed, as well as their access to justice. While noting and welcoming the conviction of the perpetrators of the murder of Ms Berta Cáceres, the Committee urges the Government to take the appropriate measures to ensure that the instigators are held accountable and penalized. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing detailed information on the other complaints of acts of violence and threats against indigenous peoples and Afro-Hondurans and their representatives in the context of claiming their economic, social and cultural rights; as well as the investigations and proceedings initiated.

Articles 6 and 7. Appropriate consultation and participation procedures. The Committee recalls that, along with the Conference Committee in 2016, it urged the Government to take the necessary steps to establish appropriate consultation and participation procedures in accordance with the Convention and ensure that peoples covered by the Convention are consulted and are able to participate in an appropriate manner in the formulation of such procedures. The Committee noted that, between May and October 2016, workshops were held with the nine indigenous and Afro-Honduran peoples for dialogue on a preliminary draft Bill on prior, free and informed consultation with indigenous peoples and that the process was marked by the absence of representative organizations, such as the Fraternal Afro-Honduran Organization (OFRANEH) and the COPINH.

In its 2019 report, the Government indicates that, following the consultation process on the draft Bill, a national workshop was organized with the participation of the organizations of the populations concerned, which submitted a draft with the contributions of eight of the nine indigenous and Afro-Honduran peoples (the Lenca peoples withdrew from the process). The OFRANEH and the COPINH also did not participate in the dialogue. The Government indicates that, since that time, it has remained open to any organization that wishes to express its opinion on the revised draft Bill on consultation and adds that, on 14 July 2018, it also held a meeting with the Confederation of Indigenous Peoples of Honduras (CONPAH), which brings together all the indigenous and Afro-Honduran peoples. At that meeting, it was reported that the Government had referred the draft Bill to the National Congress, which subsequently established a Special Advisory Committee on the Consultation Act. The Government also reports that it has benefited from the technical comments of the International Labour Office.

In the supplementary information provided in 2020, the Government reports on the action taken during the state of emergency (declared on 16 March 2020) to disseminate the precise and detailed content of the Bill to the sectors involved, obtain technical opinions and seek cooperation in the process of its dissemination, consultation and adoption. The Government indicates that a map of indigenous and Afro-Honduran institutions is being prepared to be ready when the process of consultation commences for the adoption of the Bill. The Government observes that the state of emergency has involved restrictions on freedom of movement and the right of assembly, as a result of which it is not possible to begin a consultation process with all indigenous and Afro-Honduran peoples. While outreach meetings have been held through video conferences with certain representatives of indigenous peoples, not everyone could participate. The Government also provides information on the consultation processes undertaken by the State: the consultation process with the Miskito Territorial Council of DIUNAT on the implementation of Solar Power Project 90 and with the Miskito Territorial Councils on the oil extraction project on the Miskito coast.

The Committee notes that, in its 2019 observations, the COHEP reiterates its support for the adoption of an Act on prior, free and informed consultation, developed in accordance with the Convention and following dialogue with all the social partners. In its supplementary observations of 2020, the COHEP indicates that in February 2020 it participated in a meeting with the Legislative Steering Committee of the National Congress, where it was able to express its position concerning the Bill, and indicated in particular that the Act should only regulate matters related to the Convention; that consultation is not binding, as the final decision lies with the State; and that if the Act is not adopted, there would be no foreign or national investment in projects involving the development of communities due to the legal insecurity resulting from the legislative void. The COHEP adds that it has requested the Government to consult the representatives of the most representative organizations of workers and employers. Furthermore, in response to the 2020 observations of the CGT and the CTH indicating that there has been no discussion of the subject of the Convention in the Economic and Social Council (CES), the Government indicates that, within the framework of the CES, a Technical Tripartite Committee was established to discuss the Bill on prior, free and informed consultation, in which only the employers and the Government provided credentials for their representations. The Government adds that working meetings were held to analyse, discuss and draw up the Bill before its referral to the National Congress.

The Committee takes due note of the information provided and encourages the Government to continue taking the necessary measures with a view to the establishment of appropriate procedures for consultation with peoples covered by the Convention on any legislative or administrative measures likely to affect them, in accordance with the Convention. In this respect, the Committee considers it of the utmost importance that the Act adopted is the result of a process of full, free and informed consent with all the indigenous and Afro-Honduran peoples and therefore urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that indigenous peoples are consulted and are able to participate in an appropriate manner through their representative bodies in the formulation of these procedures, so that they can express their opinions and influence the final outcome of the process. Until the adoption of the Act, the Committee once again requests the Government to continue providing detailed information on the consultation processes held in relation to measures that directly affect indigenous peoples.

Articles 20, 24, and 25. Protection of the rights of the Misquito people. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to continue providing information on the impact of the measures adopted to improve the protection and conditions of work of Misquito dive-fishers and on the possibility of regulating dive-fishing. The Government indicates that is has been developing comprehensive compensation actions that go beyond the individual compensation of those affected by dive-fishing and aim to benefit the entire Misquito community. These compensation procedures are developed in collaboration with the victims (divers with disabilities) and the representative organizations of the Honduran Misquito population so as to guide the State in the implementation of projects that genuinely meet their needs. In relation to measures adopted in the field of health, the Government refers to: a cooperation agreement to provide comprehensive health services to the population engaged in dive-fishing activities with priority given to divers suffering from decompression sickness; a project to establish a centre for hyperbaric and diving medicine to provide preventive, therapeutic and rehabilitative medical care to divers with sequelae; and the commissioning of a water ambulance. The Government also indicates that: 33 scholarships for primary, secondary and university education have been granted to the children of divers with disabilities or deceased divers (148 scholarships for boys, girls and young persons and scholarships for higher education for 500 young persons between 2016 and 2019); a project for the construction of social housing is being carried out in various municipalities of the Gracias a Dios department; a fund has been established for the execution of different productive projects, in consultation with the Misquito population; and a total of 177 labour inspections have been carried out on dive-fishing boats which led to the reduction of occupational risks and improved productivity.

The Committee notes that the United Nations Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination, in its concluding observations of 2019, expressed concern regarding the situation of Misquito divers, who continue to be the victims of precarious working conditions, without adequate occupational safety measures, and the increase in the number of divers who are victims of accidents due to underwater fishing (CERD/C/HND/CO/6-8). The Committee also notes that, during its visit to the Mosquitia region, the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights (IACHR) observed concerning scenes of poverty, unemployment, a lack of health and energy services and a dearth of water sources and sanitation.

The Committee welcomes the comprehensive approach adopted by the Government in relation to the situation of Misquito divers, which seeks to grant comprehensive compensation to the victims of dive-fishing and improve the living and working conditions of the members of the Misquito community. The Committee encourages the Government to continue taking special measures in this respect, indicating the results achieved and the challenges that remain in improving the working conditions of Misquito divers, the inspection of those conditions and the living conditions of the Misquito population. Please indicate the manner in which the members of the Misquito population participate in the formulation, application and evaluation of such measures.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government, which reiterates the content of its previous request adopted in 2019.

India

Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107) (ratification: 1958)

Articles 2 to 5 of the Convention. Protection of the Dongria Kondh. In its previous observation, the Committee requested the Government to provide more specific information on the implementation of the Conservation-cum-Development plan by the state government of Odisha, which covers 13 particularly vulnerable tribal groups, including the Dongria Kondh, and on the steps taken to give effect to the orders issued by the Supreme Court of India in its judgment of 18 April 2013 on the protection of the religious rights of the scheduled tribes and other traditional forest dwellers in the Niyamgiri Hills. The Committee notes that, in its report, the Government states that it awaits information from the state government of Odisha in response to the questions raised by the Committee. The Committee recalls that, in the past, it referred to the situation of the Dongria Kondh people in relation to a bauxite mining project to be developed in the lands traditionally occupied by them, and noted with interest the Supreme Court of India's judgment of 18 April 2013, which provided certain directions to the state Government and the Ministry of Tribal Affairs for compliance in the context of the Scheduled Tribes and Other Traditional Forest Dwellers (Recognition of Forest Rights) Act, 2006. The Committee requests the Government to ensure that the rights and interests of the Dongria Kondh and the other particularly vulnerable tribal groups are fully respected and guaranteed, and to provide information on the measures taken in this regard. It also requests the Government to provide information on the implementation of the Conservation-cum-Development Plan prepared by the state government of Odisha and on the measures taken to give effect to the orders issued by the Supreme Court of India in its judgment of 18 April 2013 on the protection of the religious rights of the scheduled tribes and other traditional forest dwellers in the Niyamgiri Hills. The Committee also requests the Government to indicate the steps taken to ensure that the communities concerned are involved in the design and implementation of such measures. The Committee further refers to the point below on the implementation of the Recognition of Forest Rights Act, 2006.

Articles 11 to 13. Land rights. In its previous observation, the Committee requested the Government to continue providing information on the implementation of the Scheduled Tribes and Other Traditional Forest Dwellers (Recognition of Forest Rights) Act, 2006, and of the Right to Fair Compensation and Transparency in Land Acquisition Rehabilitation and Resettlement Act, 2013. The Committee notes the Government's indication that, according to the monthly progress report prepared by the Ministry of Tribal Affairs on the basis of the information received from the state governments, 4,196,880 claims (4,052,702individual and 144,178 community claims) were filed and 1,859,595 titles (1,789,670 individual and 69,925 community claims) were issued, as of 31 March 2018. The Committee further notes from the latest monthly report available from the website of the Ministry of Tribal Affairs, dated 12 March 2020 and covering the period ending on 30 November 2019, that 4,241,135 claims (4,092,183 individual and 148,952 community claims) were filed and 1,977,097 titles (1,900,923 individual and 76,174 community claims) were distributed. It also notes from the annual report 2019-2020 of the Ministry of Tribal Affairs that the Ministry aims to accelerate the implementation of the Recognition of Forest Rights Act, 2006, including by ensuring wider publicity and dissemination of information about the Act to the intended beneficiaries.

The Committee notes that on 13 February 2019, the Supreme Court of India, in its judgment on the matter of Wildlife First & Others v. Ministry of Environment, Forest and Climate Change & Others (Writ Petition No. 109/2008), directed state governments to evict the persons/parties whose claims under the Recognition of Forest Rights Act, 2006, were rejected. The Committee notes that 21 states are concerned, namely: Andhra Pradesh, Assam, Bihar, Chhattisgarh, Goa, Gujarat, Himachal Pradesh, Jharkhand, Karnataka, Kerala, Madhya Pradesh, Maharashtra, Manipur, Odisha, Rajasthan, Tamil Nadu, Telangana, Tripura, Uttarakhand, Uttar Pradesh and West Bengal. The Committee notes that, according to the annual Report 2019–2020 of the Ministry of Tribal Affairs, the said Ministry filed an application before the Supreme Court on 26 February 2019 asking the Court to consider modifying its order of 13 February to direct the state governments to file detailed affidavits regarding the procedure followed and the rejection of the claims, and to withhold until then the eviction of the concerned communities. The Committee notes that, on 28 February 2019, the Supreme Court stayed its order of evictions based on the consideration that the state governments had not provided sufficient information on how the decisions on the claims were made, and therefore directed all States to submit an affidavit by 12 July 2019, in which they should provide information on the procedure adopted for rejecting the claims; which competent authority rejected the claims; and under which provision of law the evictions orders were made. The Court also asked states to clarify whether the process established by the Recognition of Forest Rights Act, 2006 was respected, in particular as regards the role of the Gram Sabhas (village assemblies), and to indicate the process to be followed for eviction after the rejection orders were passed. The Committee notes that in July 2019 the stay on evictions was further extended.

The Committee notes with concern that an estimated 9 million forest dwellers would be affected by the eviction orders (A/74/183, 17 July 2019, paragraph 34). The Committee notes that concerns about the failure to ensure adequate implementation of the Recognition of Forest Rights Act, 2006 have been raised on various occasions by United Nations mandate holders, particularly with regard to the transparency of the process, the consent before displacement or eviction, and the provision of adequate redress and compensation (UA IND 13/2019, 19 June 2019; IND 9/2017, 24 August 2017; IND 9/2013, 8 July 2013, among others). The Committee also notes from the mission report of the United Nations Special Rapporteur on adequate housing as a component of the right to an adequate standard of living, and on the right to non-discrimination in this context, that a disproportionate number of displacements, in connection with projects of various kinds, appear to involve persons belonging to scheduled tribes (A/HRC/34/51/Add.1, 10 January 2017, paragraph 48). The Committee further notes that concerns have been raised over allegations of violence, harassment, intimidation and arbitrary arrests of people belonging to the concerned communities who sought to exercise their rights (UA IND 1/2018, 30 January 2018; IND 1/2019, 16 January 2019, among others). The Committee recalls that according to Article 12(2) and (3) of the Convention the peoples concerned shall not be removed from their territories without their free consent and that, if relocation takes place, they shall be provided with lands of quality at least equal to that of the lands previously occupied by them, suitable to provide for their present needs and future development, or, if they express preference for compensation in money or in kind, they shall be so compensated under appropriate guarantees.

In light of the above, the Committee requests the Government to: (i) supply information on any developments concerning the Supreme Court's order of 13 February 2019; and (ii) take the necessary measures to ensure that the rights to land of scheduled tribes and other traditional forest dwellers are fully recognized and protected, and the role and functions of the Gram Sabha, as spelt out also in the Recognition of Forest Rights Act, 2006, are fully respected, and provide information in this respect, including on any grievance filed against decisions made under the Recognition of Forest Rights Act, 2006, and of the Right to Fair Compensation and Transparency in Land Acquisition Rehabilitation and Resettlement Act, 2013. Please also provide information on the status of recognition of scheduled tribes' land rights falling outside the scope of application of the Recognition of Forest Rights Act, 2006.

Articles 5 and 11 to 13. Draft National Forest policy. The Committee notes that on 14 March 2018, the Ministry of Environment, Forest and Climate Change released the draft National Forest policy, 2018, for public comments and that, to date, revisions to the existing policy are still under discussion. The Committee requests the Government to ensure that scheduled tribes and other traditional forest dwellers are involved in the formulation of the new National Forest policy and that the rights under the Convention are fully recognized in the new policy. It also requests the Government to provide information on any measures taken in this respect and on any developments concerning the adoption of the Forest policy.

The Sardar Sarovar dam project. The Committee previously noted the Government's indication that updated information concerning the resettlement of the remaining 260 families affected by the Sardar Sarovar dam still needed to be provided by the State of Gujarat. The Committee requested the Government to provide updated information on the measures adopted for the resettlement of all families affected by the Sardar Sarovar dam in the state of Madhya Pradesh and other states concerned. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government on the progress made, as of June 2018, on the resettlement and rehabilitation of the families affected by the project in the state of Gujarat. The Committee also notes that the Sardar Sarovar dam has recently been expanded. It notes from communications made by United Nations mandate holders that the expansion may have resulted in the forced eviction and displacement of 40,000 families (Joint Urgent Appeal – JUA IND 8/2017, 29 August 2017). According to the same source, "it is alleged that the status of rehabilitation has been too slow; farmers have been mostly promised barren and non-cultivable lands or meagre cash compensation, and resettlement sites are not in a state of habitation, lacking infrastructure, such as sewage and water pipes, as well as lacking schools, access to health centres and access to other basic rights". Referring to the standards governing relocation under the Convention, which have been recalled above, the Committee requests the Government to take all necessary measures to ensure that persons belonging to the tribal population displaced by the expansion of the Sardar Sarovar dam project are provided with resettlement and compensation in conformity with Article 12(2) and (3) of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures adopted in this regard and the progress made towards resettlement and compensation. Please also indicate the overall status of progress in the resettlement and rehabilitation of the families affected by the project, specifying the number of families belonging to the tribal population that still remain to be settled and the measures taken concerning them.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Home Work Convention, 1996 (No. 177) (ratification: 2006)

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020). The Committee proceeded with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the supplementary information received from the Government this year, as well as on the basis of the information at its disposal in 2019.

The Committee notes the observations of the Confederation of Workers of Argentina (CTA Autonomous) and the Industrial Confederation of Argentina (UIA) received on 30 September and 1 October 2020, respectively. The Committee requests the Government to send its reply in this regard.

Promotion of telework. The Committee notes the adoption on 16 March 2020 of Decision 2020-207-APN-MT, which promotes telework for national public sector workers, except for essential service workers, and recommends that private enterprises operate at a minimum staffing level and adopt telework. On 16 March 2020, Decision No. 21/20 was also adopted, which provides that employers allowing employees to work from their private homes must inform their occupational risk insurer (ART) of the address where the work will be performed and the frequency of that work. That address will then be considered as a workplace under the Occupational Risk Act. In addition, the Committee notes the supplementary information provided by the Government. In particular, it notes with interest the adoption of Act No. 27555 of 30 July 2020 (hereinafter Act No. 27555) regulating telework. Section 2 of Act No. 27555 provides that contracts are considered as telework contracts "where the completion of activities, performance of work or provision of services … is carried out entirely or partially in the home of the worker, or in locations separate from the premises of the employer, through the use of information technologies." Section 2 also provides that the minimum legal requirements for telework contracts shall be established by a special law, while activity-specific regulations shall be established through collective bargaining. The Committee also notes that Act No. 27555 provides that workers on a home work contract have the same rights and obligations as those working on site (section 3), including the rights to freedom of association and collective bargaining (sections 12 and 13) and protection from occupational risks (section 14). Section 3 also provides that the wages of workers engaged in telework must not be less than what they would receive for on-site work. Section 4 provides that working hours must be agreed in advance and in writing, in accordance with the legally established limits. Act No. 27555 also regulates the right to digitally disconnect (section 5), the option to amend working hours to provide care in certain cases (section 6) and the right to receive training (section 11). The Act also establishes a number of obligations for employers, such as the obligation to provide the equipment, tools and support necessary to perform the work, and to reimburse any connectivity and/or service consumption costs that workers might incur as a result of teleworking (sections 9 and 10). Lastly, Act No. 27555 provides that the transfer of workers from on-site work to telework must be voluntary and agreed in writing (section 7), and can be revoked by the worker at any time (section 8).

The Committee notes that, in its observations, the CTA emphasizes that, while Act No. 27555 includes the rights and obligations established in the Convention and in the Home Work Recommendation, 1996 (No. 184), the effective exercise of these rights is problematic in practice, since they depend on collective bargaining conducted at a later stage. In addition, the CTA maintains that the effective enforcement of the obligations is subject to subsequent regulation by the competent state bodies. Moreover, the CTA indicates that the Act considers telework as a new employment contract (section 2) and not as an arrangement or option available to the employer for organizing work under the Employment Contracts Act (Act No. 20.744). The CTA also states that including the option of working by objectives (section 4(1) of the Act) renders the right of the worker to limit working hours (section 4(2)) and to disconnect (section 5) null and void in practice. With regard to occupational safety and health, the CTA maintains that section 14 of Act No. 27555 undermines the protection of workers, as it provides that accidents that occur at work are "presumed" to be occupational, while the Occupational Risks and Accidents Act (No. 24557) currently in force provides that such accidents are "deemed" to be occupational. The Committee also notes the CTA's indication that Act No. 27555 expressly provides for its entry into force 90 days from the eventual end date of the social, preventive and obligatory isolation period established by Emergency Decree No. 297/2020 currently in force, and that, consequently, it is impossible to determine when the Act will enter into force. The CTA emphasizes that, although the number of workers engaged in telework has increased exponentially during the pandemic, their working conditions are unknown. As the Act is not yet in force owing to the extension of the social, preventive and obligatory isolation period, employers have unilaterally established the parameters for teleworking, without any kind of public oversight. The CTA indicates that the only exception in this regard has been the signing of the "Agreement regulating telework under the COVID-19 (coronavirus) pandemic restrictions" between the judiciary of the province of Buenos Aires and the Judicial Association of Buenos Aires, which remains in force only during the social, preventive and obligatory isolation period. The CTA also maintains that there is no register of workers engaged in telework either prior to or during the pandemic, contrary to the guidance provided by Paragraph 7 of Recommendation No. 184.

The Committee notes the UIA's statement that the brevity of the legislative process by which Act No. 27555 was adopted did not allow for an effective social dialogue process to be held. The UIA indicates that, in the discussions held during the adoption process, the employer organizations expressed deep concern over various provisions of the Act that were difficult to apply in practice and that, moreover, were contrary to international labour standards. In this regard, the UIA indicates that Act No. 27555 does not establish an objective criterion for determining when remote work is considered as a contract performed under teleworking arrangements and when it is considered as work occasionally performed remotely, which is excluded from the regime of home work under the Convention. Furthermore, the UIA is opposed to the prohibition in Act No. 27555 against contacting workers outside of working hours (section 5(2) of the Act), and the obligation of the employer to have a system in place that prevents communication with workers outside of their working hours (section 4(2)). Lastly, the UIA refers to section 17(1) of Act No. 27555, which provides that in the case of transnational remote work, the national law applicable to the work contract is either that of the country where the work is performed or that of the country where the employer is domiciled, depending on which is more favourable to the worker. The UIA also refers to section 17(2) of the Act, which provides that collective agreements (concluded under section 2 of Act No. 27555) should establish a maximum number for these contracts. In this regard, it considers that cases in which Argentine law would not apply would contradict the territoriality principle established in the Employment Contracts Act (Act No. 20.744) and create a situation of legal uncertainty that could undermine compliance with international agreements. The Committee requests the Government to send detailed and updated information on the application in practice of Act No. 27555 of 30 July 2020, including the date of its entry into force, and updated statistical information on the number of workers that have begun to telework, disaggregated by age, sex and sector, and on the number of collective agreements concluded under section 2 of the Act. The Committee also requests the Government to send information on the manner in which the right to limit working hours and to disconnect is ensured. Recalling also that telework can be a useful means of enabling access to employment for individuals who sometimes face greater obstacles in this regard (such as young people, women, persons with disabilities and older people), the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the impact of Act No. 27555 on the employment of such individuals.

Plantations Convention, 1958 (No. 110) (ratification: 1958)

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020). The Committee proceeded with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the supplementary information received from the Government this year, as well as on the basis of the information at its disposal in 2019.

The Committee notes the observations formulated by the Independent Trade Union Association of Cuba (ASIC) of 28 August 2018. It also notes the Government's response to those, received on 22 November 2018, and reproduced in the supplementary report received this year.

Part IV. Wages. Articles 24 to 35. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to indicate the manner in which effect is given to these provisions of the Convention, which contemplate the establishment of procedures and mechanisms to fix and ensure minimum wages for plantation workers. The Committee notes the Government's indication that in Cuba the minimum wage is fixed by legal provision, and is established in line with the level of economic and social development, further to the opinion of the corresponding organizations. The Government refers, inter alia, to section 109 of the Labour Code, promulgated through Act No. 116 of 20 December 2013, which establishes the elements constituting the wage. In addition, the Government refers to section 126 of the Labour Code Regulations, promulgated through Decree No. 326 of 12 June 2014, which, when read together with section 113 of the Labour Code, establishes the wage system and provides that the minimum wage must correspond with the wage of the first degree of labour complexity on the wage scale. The Government also refers to various payment methods available, such as pay for performance, which aims to increase labour productivity, and pay for time, where the wage is paid in accordance with the time worked. The Government adds that, according to the National Statistics and Information Office, in 2017 the average monthly wage in State bodies in agricultural, farming and forestry activities was 834 pesos. The Committee recalls its previous comments on the Minimum Wage Fixing Convention, 1970 (No. 131), in which it noted that that Article 4(2) of that Convention provides for the consultation, in connection with the operation of the minimum wage-fixing machinery, of both the representative organizations of workers concerned and of employers or, where no such organizations exist, representatives of the workers and employers concerned. Likewise, Article 24 of Convention No. 110 provides specifically for consultation with the social partners in fixing the minimum wage in the plantations sector. The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed and updated information on the manner in which the representatives of the relevant workers' and employers' organizations were consulted in the context of the determination of the minimum wage, as required under Article 24 of the Convention. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the manner in which it is ensured that workers in the plantations sector receive at least the established minimum wage, including information on the number and outcomes of the inspections conducted relating to payment of the minimum wage in plantations.

Part V of the Convention (annual holidays with pay). Articles 36 to 42. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that section 107 of the Labour Code, allows for the employer to require the presence of the worker in exceptional circumstances, and allows for the employer to postpone or reduce the worker's holidays and to pay him or her the reduced proportion of the accumulated holidays. In this respect, the Committee requested the Government to indicate the manner in which it is ensured that this section of the Labour Code gives full expression to Article 41 of the Convention, which provides that any agreement to relinquish the right to an annual paid holiday or to forgo such a holiday, shall be void. The Committee notes the Government's indication that section 107 of the Labour Code sets forth that any postponement of holidays is exceptional as provided for in Article 41 and is not systematic. Referring to the emergence of "exceptional" circumstances, the Government indicates that this does not imply a regular occurrence, but only those circumstances that directly or decisively affect the performance of a task assigned to the worker that cannot be postponed. The Government adds that the law stipulates that upon expiry of the cumulated holiday period, enjoyment of the holiday can be postponed, which does not mean that the accumulated holidays will not be granted. The Government also indicates that, if it is agreed to simultaneously pay the accumulated holidays and the wages for the work performed, guaranteeing an effective period of leave of at least seven days in the year, this does not exclude longer periods being granted during the year. The Committee reiterates that Article 41 of the Convention provides that any agreement to relinquish the right to an annual paid holiday or to forgo such a holiday, shall be void. It therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures to give full effect to Article 41 of the Convention.

Parts IX and X (right to organize and collective bargaining –freedom of association). Articles 54 to 70. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to provide information on the measures adopted or envisaged to ensure that workers in plantations do not suffer discrimination or prejudice in their employment for having peacefully exercised the right to strike, as well as information on the exercise of this right in practice. It also requested the Government to provide statistical data on the number of collective agreements concluded in plantations, with an indication of the sectors of activity and the numbers of workers covered. In its reply, the Government indicates that the agricultural sector includes: (i) the National Association of Small Farmers (ANAP), which is the grass-roots association for members of cooperatives, farmers and their families; and (ii) the Cuban Association of Agricultural and Forestry Technicians (ACTAF), which comprises forestry and livestock technicians and professionals. The Government also indicates that there is no law or legal provision in the country prohibiting the right to strike. It adds that, while there is no legal text regulating the right to strike, provisions are in place protecting the right to equality at work without discrimination whatsoever. Lastly, the Committee notes the statistical data provided by the Government, which indicates that, in 2018, the number of state sector workers who were affiliated with the agricultural, forestry and tobacco workers' trade union stood at 307,469 and the number of non-state workers affiliated was 17,122. The Committee also notes that a total of 273,867 workers are protected by collective work agreements and that 7,159 collective agreements are in force, covering more than 2,800,000 workers. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures adopted or envisaged to ensure in practice that plantation workers enjoy adequate protection against acts of anti-union discrimination in respect of their employment. It also requests the Government to continue providing statistical information on the number of collective agreements concluded in the area of plantations, indicating the number of workers covered.

Part XI (labour inspection). Articles 71 to 84. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the observations of ASIC, in which it denounced alleged cases of prisoners subjected to forced labour in plantations, and cases of child labour during school holidays. ASIC also denounced the employment of secondary school students in state farms during the harvest period, who are not paid for their work, but receive academic credits and a favourable recommendation for entry into university. The Committee notes the Government's reply to ASIC's observations. The Government indicates that the National Inspection Office has not identified any cases of forced labour in agriculture and that the Public Welfare Office at the Ministry of Labour and Social Security has not received complaints or reports in this respect. With regard to work performed by prisoners, the Government indicates that such persons are not victims of forced labour, since their involvement in work is essentially voluntary and, in addition, they enjoy the labour and social security rights established in the legal framework. The Committee notes, however, that the Government has not provided specific information on the number, age, and type and conditions of work of the prisoners and of the secondary school students who work in the plantations during the harvest period. Furthermore, the Government indicates that section 2(d) of the Labour Code sets out the prohibition of child labour and the special protection of young people between the ages of 15 and 18 who enter the workforce, in order to ensure their full development. The Government adds that, within the framework of the basic secondary education system, there are plans to establish a foundation for the allocation of time for occupational training, aimed at developing values such as application, community and responsibility in students, and enabling the provision of activities of the vocational training and occupational guidance process. In this respect, the Committee requested the Government to provide detailed information on the number of prisoners and secondary school students who work in state farms, disaggregated by age and type of work. The Committee also requested the Government to indicate the manner in which they are compensated, as well as their conditions of work, and the manner in which it is ensured that the students have the freedom to choose whether or not to work. It also requested the Government to continue providing detailed information on the supervision and enforcement measures relating to the conditions of work of plantation workers. The Committee notes the statistical information provided by the Government on the number of labour inspections conducted in the agricultural sector and the violations identified during these inspections. In particular, the Government indicates that, in 2018, the National Labour Inspection Office conducted 141 inspections, in which it detected 898 violations, 347 of those relating to occupational safety and health. According to the Government, the principal violations detected consisted of the failure to guarantee safe and healthy conditions for workers and the violation of rules respecting the provision of personal protective equipment. The Committee therefore requests the Government to indicate the manner in which the Labour Inspectorate monitors and ensures that the activities of the vocational training and occupational guidance process in the plantations comply with Article 6 of the Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138). The Committee also once again requests the Government to provide detailed information on the number, age, type and conditions of work, compensation, and the manner in which it is ensured that the secondary school students and prisoners who work in the plantations have the freedom to choose whether or not to work. Lastly, the Committee requests the Government to continue providing detailed information on the supervision and enforcement measures relating to the conditions of work of plantation workers, particularly on the inspections conducted in the plantations, violations of the labour legislation identified and the penalties imposed.

Part IV of the report form. Application in practice. The Committee notes that the Government has not provided information concerning the application in practice of the Convention. The Committee therefore reiterates its request to the Government to provide detailed and up-to-date information on the application of the Convention in practice, including: (i) recent studies on the socio-economic conditions of workers in plantations; (ii) statistical data, disaggregated by sex and age, on the number of plantations and workers to whom the Convention applies; (iii) copies of the collective agreements applicable in the sector; and (iv) the number of workers' and employers' organizations established in the plantations sector, and any other information which enables the Committee to assess the situation of workers in plantations in relation to the provisions of the Convention.

[The Government is asked to reply in full to the present comments in 2021.]

Nursing Personnel Convention, 1977 (No. 149) (ratification: 1987)

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020). The Committee proceeded with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the supplementary information received from the Government this year, as well as on the basis of the information at its disposal in 2019.

The Committee takes note of the observations of the Greek General Confederation of Labour (GSEE) received on 3 September 2019. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments in this respect.

Article 2 of the Convention. Formulation and implementation of a nursing services and personnel policy. Nursing education and training. The Committee recalls that, in its previous report, the Government had indicated that a national health strategy was being developed and that a bill concerning reform to primary health care had been submitted to the Parliament. The Government reports on a series of labour law provisions adopted since 2013, indicating that they apply to workers in dependent employment relationships in the private sector, including to nursing personnel. The Committee notes that amendments were introduced to Law No. 1579/1985 that define nursing specialties in Pathology, Surgery, Paediatrics and Mental Health. In addition, Ministerial Decision No. A4/203/1988 established the requirements for obtaining a special nursing certificate. The Committee further notes that, pursuant to Law No. 2519/1997, graduates of the Technological Educational Institutes (TEI) Departments of Health Visitors can obtain a nursing specialty in mental health. The National Council for the Professional Development of Nursing defined other nursing specialities through the promulgation of section 45 of Law No. 4486/2017. The Government reports that, according to data compiled by the Nursing Directorate, as of November 2018, 1,550 nurses had acquired a specialty in pathology, 1,953 nurses in surgery, 920 nurses in paediatrics and 945 nurses and health visitors in mental health. In respect of the education and training policy for nursing personnel, the Government indicates that substitute teachers in the relevant specialties are recruited through a call for candidates issued by Ministerial Decision, whereas school nurses are recruited by the Regional Directorates of Education. The Committee notes that, in the field of higher education, during the reference period, two Higher Educational Institutes (AEI) and seven TEI provided first cycle programmes of studies in nursing. In its supplementary information, the Government indicates that, in the context of addressing the COVID-19 pandemic, enhancing nursing personnel and upgrading their skills are among the key actions taken by the Ministry of Health to strengthen the health care system. In this respect, the Committee notes with interest the adoption of Law 4690/2020 ratifying: (a) the Emergency Law of 13 April 2020 on "Measures to address the continuing impact of the Coronavirus COVID-19 pandemic and other urgent provisions" and (b) the Emergency Law dated 1 May 2020 on "Additional measures to address the continuing impact of the Coronavirus COVID-19 pandemic and return to normal, social and economic life and other provisions". According to Law 4690/2020, all nursing specialties are established in line with European standards. It also provides for the creation and filling of 2,250 posts for trainee specialist nurses. In order to meet the needs created by the pandemic, the Government introduced training programs in the specialties of Critical Care and ER Nursing and Public Health/Community Health Nursing, which will be offered for the period 2020–2021, targeted mainly at unemployed male and female nurses. Under the same law, the Programme "Be a Volunteer to tackle address Covid-19" was established and implemented in public health facilities until June 2020. The Committee notes that more than 10,000 participants providing voluntary services in specialties relevant to healthcare account for 38.9 per cent of the total participants. Of this 38.9 per cent, 6.4 per cent were nurses and 11.9 per cent were assistant nurses. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on developments in relation to the adoption of a national health strategy as well as reforms to primary healthcare. It further requests the Government to provide information on any legislative amendments introduced relating to the operation of public and private health services and, if applicable, to supply copies of any relevant legislative texts. It also requests the Government to provide information concerning measures taken in order to prevent or address the shortage of qualified nurses, indicating the measures taken in relation to education and training as well as in relation to employment and working conditions, including career prospects and remuneration, with the aim of attracting men and women to the profession and retaining them in it. In the context of the global COVID-19 pandemic, the Committee invites the Government to provide updated information on the implementation of the measures taken to strengthen the health system and to address the increasing demand for qualified nurses.

"Exclusive" nurses. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the shortage in qualified nursing personnel led to specific practices, including recourse to so-called "exclusive" nurses, namely female migrant workers employed in a quasi-nursing capacity and even informal hospital services provided by patients' families, which are increasingly tolerated by public establishments. In response to the Committee's previous request for information on "exclusive" nurses, the Government provides data from the different regions in the country regarding the employment of this category of nurses. In its observations, the GSEE expresses its concern with respect to this form of atypical work. The Committee requests the Government to supply detailed information in its next report on the conditions of recruitment and work of foreign nurses and "exclusive" nurse, as well as measures taken to regulate their activities. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments in respect of the observation of the GSEE.

Article 5(2) and (3). Determination of conditions of employment and work. The Government indicates that there is no collective agreement in force covering the country's nursing personnel. It nevertheless refers to the 19 September 2014 Collective Labour Agreement "on the regulation of the conditions of remuneration and employment of workers, members of primary associations of the Federation of Greek Healthcare Institution Unions (OSNIE) employed at private clinics that are members of the Association of Greek Clinics (SEK) across the country". The Government adds that legal disputes arising between nursing employees and their employers can be submitted to conciliation, mediation or arbitration procedures. The Committee notes that, each year, the competent department of the Ministry of Labour registers a relatively small number of cases of dispute resolution involving parties from trade union organizations of workers covering hospital staff and employer-operators of health service providers. In particular, the Government indicates that, from 1 June 2019 until 15 July 2020, the Ministry's relevant Department has not handled any cases involving resolution of disputes between nursing employees and their employers through conciliation. The Committee takes note of a series of arbitration awards referred to by the Government. On the other hand, the GSEE observes that there are important difficulties concerning the procedure for collective bargaining and the conclusion of new sectoral collective agreements, which were aggravated by the expiry of former collective agreements enabling employers to pay nursing personnel in private hospitals on the basis of the minimum wage. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the progress and results of collective negotiations to determine employment and working conditions of nursing personnel.

Article 6. Employment conditions of nursing personnel. Social security. Hours of work. The Government indicates that nursing personnel in the public and private sectors enjoy insurance coverage against risks of old age, disability, death, illness, maternity and unemployment. In its supplementary information, the Government indicates that the relevant Department of the Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs is considering including nurses who fall under the pension protection of the former Public Sector Fund, in the pension scheme for Heavy and Arduous Occupations. In response to the Committee's previous request regarding the List of Arduous and Unhealthy Occupations set out in Law No. 3863/2010, the Government reports that a new List was finalized after consultation with the social partners through the Social Security Council. In this regard, the conclusions of the Standing Committee on Arduous and Unhealthy Occupations, in which representatives of the social partners, experts from the Ministry of Labour and Social Security (formerly IKA ETAM, now known as EFKA) and representatives of scientific institutions participated. The Government indicates that the new List attempted to rationalize and modernize the old one, taking into account the technological developments and their consequences in current labour data. It also indicates that, under Law No. 3863/2010, employees excluded from the prior List continued to be covered under the pension scheme until the end of 2015, with a view to ensuring their protection. In particular, the Committee notes that the new List stipulates, inter alia, that, male and female nurses working under fixed-term or indefinite contracts in nursing institutions, clinics, microbiological and biochemical laboratories and health insurance institutions are covered under the Regulation on Arduous and Unhealthy Occupations, with the exception of those employed in health centres within the framework of rationalization and modernization of the Regulation on Arduous and Unhealthy Occupations. In its observations, the GSEE expresses concern with regard to the difficult working conditions of nursing personnel, which are aggravated by the understaffing of hospitals and the imposed working hours schedule. The GSEE maintains that, under the current legislation nursing staff in hospitals works in three consecutive 8-hour shifts. The Committee requests the Government to supply a copy of the Regulation on Arduous and Unhealthy Occupations. In addition, it reiterates its request that the Government provide information on whether and to what extent this exclusion impacts on social security protection for nursing personnel. Recalling that this Article of the Convention aims to ensure that nursing personnel – as any other worker – are entitled to sufficient rest and leisure in order to avoid fatigue, the Committee requests the Government to address GSEE's observations regarding the legal provisions allowing for 3 consecutive 8-hour shifts and to provide information on the provisions or other measures taken guaranteeing that nursing personnel enjoy conditions of employment and work at least equivalent to those of other workers in relation to hours of work, including regulation and compensation of overtime, inconvenient hours and shift work.

Article 7. Occupational safety and health. In response to the Committee's previous comments, the Government indicates that the National Strategy for Health and Safety at Work (2016–20) was adopted following consultations with the social partners in the Health and Safety at Work Council of the Supreme Labour Council. In its observations, the GSEE comments that the poor health and safety conditions under which nursing personnel work expose them to exhaustion and burn out. The GSEE refers to a series of studies, which show that irregular shifts in combination with the very small number of nurses working during each shift place a heavy burden on these workers, making the performance of their duties extremely difficult. In particular, the GSEE indicates that the morning shift is usually served by two to four nurses but the afternoon and night shifts by only one nurse. The Committee notes that, in the context of the COVID-19 pandemic, the need for nursing personnel has increased, which may aggravate these phenomena. The Committee requests the Government to provide a copy of the National Strategy in force and reiterates its request that the Government provide information on progress made and results achieved with respect to occupational safety and health for nursing personnel, including with respect to ensuring adequate staffing on all shifts during the COVID-19 pandemic. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the measures implemented to prevent and reduce psychosocial risks, and promote mental health and well-being, in addition to preventing the risk of long-term effects on nurses' well-being, particularly in the context of the pandemic.

Exposure to special risks. The Committee notes that according to "ILO: Country policy responses, COVID-19 and the world of work", the Government has allocated €85 million to the Ministry of Health to support the purchase of sanitary equipment and the hiring of 2,000 health professionals. The Committee draws the attention of the Government to Paragraph 49 of Recommendation No. 157, which provides that: "(1) all possible steps should be taken to ensure that nursing personnel are not exposed to special risks. Where exposure to special risks is unavoidable, measures should be taken to minimise it; (2) measures such as the provision and use of protective clothing, immunisation, shorter hours, more frequent rest breaks, temporary removal from the risk or longer annual holidays should be provided for in respect to nursing personnel regularly assigned to duties involving special risks so as to reduce their exposure to these risks; (3) In addition, nursing personnel who are exposed to special risks should receive financial compensation." The Committee also draws the Government's attention to the ILO Guidelines on decent work in public emergency services, 2018, which recognize the need to protect public emergency workers, including emergency health workers, from exposure to communicable diseases. In particular, paragraphs 50 and 51 of the Guidelines stress that suitable and sufficient personal protective equipment (PPE) should be provided as protection against exposure to hazardous conditions for public emergency services (PES) workers and that workers and/or their representatives should be consulted and participate in relation to the selection and correct use of PPE. Noting that nursing personnel are at high risk of being infected while treating patients with suspected or confirmed COVID-19, particularly when infection control precautions including use of personal protective equipment (PPE) are not strictly practiced, the Committee requests the Government to provide detailed updated information on the safety measures adopted or envisaged including the provision of PPE and training in its use, as well as provision of adequate rest breaks during workers' shifts and limitations on excessive hours wherever possible, with a view to protecting the health and wellbeing of nurses and limiting as much as possible their risk of contracting COVID-19.

Part V of the report form. Practical application. The Committee notes the data provided on the number of registered nursing students for the 2017–18 academic year, as well as statistics on the number of nursing students enrolled from for the academic years from 2013 to 2018. The Committee also takes note of the detailed information on persons practising in the nursing profession per level of training and field in the public and private sector based on the estimates, according to which 135,361 doctors and 55,963 nurses and midwives were employed in the beginning of 2020. The Committee notes a pronounced imbalance in the availability of doctors compared to nurses in Greece and observes that, according to the European Commission 2019 Country Health Profile on Greece, the country has the highest number of doctors but the lowest number of nurses per 1,000 population of any country in the European Union. The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information, disaggregated by age, sex and region, concerning the situation of nursing personnel in the country, including the nurse-population ratio, the number of nursing personnel broken down by public and private healthcare establishments, the number of students who graduate from nursing colleges annually and the number of institutions offering nursing education and training, the number of female and male nurses who enter and leave the profession each year, the organization and the operation of all institutions which provide healthcare services, as well as official studies, surveys and reports addressing health workforce issues in the Greek health sector, including those that might have been developed in the context of the COVID-19 pandemic.

Malawi

Nursing Personnel Convention, 1977 (No. 149) (ratification: 1986)

Article 2 of the Convention. National policy concerning nursing services and nursing personnel. Consultation. The Committee notes with interest the range of policy initiatives adopted by the Government during the reporting period in relation to public health services and the health workforce, particularly with respect to nursing services and nursing personnel. These policies were developed following consultation with and through the active participation of the relevant stakeholders, including the private sector, health training institutions, relevant regulatory bodies and civil society organizations. The Committee notes the adoption of Malawi's first National Health Policy (NHP) in July 2017, which establishes an overarching framework to guide the achievement of the country's health sector. It includes among its priority areas: health service delivery; human resources for health; leadership and governance; and health financing. In relation to the health workforce, the 2017 NHP contemplates the adoption of measures to ensure that a sufficient number of adequately trained and motivated health workers, including nurses, are recruited, deployed and retained in line with the health needs of the population at all levels of healthcare service delivery. The Committee also notes the adoption of the medium-term Health Sector Strategic Plan II (HSSP II) in 2017, which outlines a range of objectives and activities and guides for the use of resources during 2017–22. The HSSP II a set of priority strategies, including: improving retention and recruitment of properly deployed and motivated health workers and strengthening the health workforce planning process. The Committee further notes the development, in alignment with the above-mentioned policies on health and health workers, of the Nursing and Midwifery Policy (NMP), adopted in June 2018. The 2018 NMP provides a framework for the provision of comprehensive, quality and equitable nursing and midwifery services that will contribute to achieving the country's health-related goals. However, challenges noted in the 2018 NMP include a high disease burden in the country, as well as high rates of maternal mortality (439 per 100,000 births), neonatal mortality (27 per 1,000 live births) and an under-5 mortality rate of 64 per 1,000. It is noted that the maternal mortality ratio will need to be reduced by 84 per cent to meet Sustainable Development Goal targets. The main objectives of the 2018 NMP include: reducing nursing and midwifery vacancy rates from the current 63 per cent to 50 per cent by 2022; providing guidance to decision-makers, stakeholders and partners for the effective planning and implementation of nursing and midwifery services; facilitating delivery of quality nursing and midwifery services; supporting quality clinical mentorship and supervision of nursing students; and timely placement of new nursing and midwifery graduates. In addition, the 2018 NMP envisages the participation of a broad range of actors in its monitoring and implementation, including workers' organizations, nurses' associations, private sector organizations, development partners, and non-governmental organizations. In addition, the Committee notes the implementation of the Malawi German Health Programme (MGHP), which calls for the adoption of measures, in line with the 2017 NHP and the HSPP II, to ensure a better distribution and increased qualification of clinical and nursing staff in the area of maternal and newborn healthcare. The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed, up-to-date information on the measures taken in the context of the National Health Policy, the Health Sector Strategic Plan II 2017–22, the Nursing and Midwifery Policy and the Malawi German Health Programme, as well as on their impact in practice. In particular, the Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information on the implementation and impact of those measures designed to provide nursing personnel with employment and working conditions, including career prospects and remuneration, which are likely to attract persons to the profession and retain them in it.

Community health nursing. The Committee notes that, according to the HSSP II, a significant proportion of Malawi's population (84 per cent) has no access to healthcare, especially those persons residing in rural and hard-to-reach areas of the country. In this context, the Committee notes the adoption of the country's first National Community Health Strategy 2017–22 (NCHS) in November 2017, which is aligned with existing national health policies as well as with the HSSP II. The 2017 NCHS was developed following an intensive consultative process with relevant stakeholders in the health sector, which included local communities. The principal objective of the 2017 NCHS is to ensure quality, integrated community health services that are affordable, culturally acceptable, scientifically appropriate, and accessible to every household. In order to achieve this goal, the 2017 NCHS includes among its strategic objectives that of building a sufficient, equitably distributed, well-trained community health workforce that includes community nursing personnel. The Committee notes that, according to the 2017 NCHS, there is a shortage of community nurses. Moreover, the 2017 NCHS indicates that community nurses are being used to fill gaps at health facilities and are therefore spending less time on community work. They face challenges that include: lack of clarity regarding their roles and tasks; inadequate training and supervision; and poor incentives. To address the shortage of adequately trained and motivated community health workers (CHWs), the 2017 NCHS sets out a number of key interventions: recruitment of additional CHWs, including a minimum of two community health nurses (CHNs) per health centre and one community midwife assistant (CMA) per community health delivery structure; promoting equitable geographical distribution of CHWs; and providing high-quality, integrated pre-service and in-service training to all CHWs. The 2017 NCHS also envisages the launch of a more standardized package of financial, non-financial, social and performance-based incentives aimed at increasing the retention of CHWs and supporting their strong performance across the country. The Committee further notes that the 2018 NMP includes a policy priority area on community health nursing and midwifery. In this regard, the 2018 NMP includes the following strategies, among others: providing leadership for community health nursing and midwifery services and strengthening such services by integrating community health nursing interventions in all nursing and midwifery services. The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed updated information on the effective implementation, monitoring and impact of the measures adopted in the framework of the National Community Health Strategy 2017–22 and the 2018 Nursing and Midwifery Policy with regard to nursing services and nursing personnel, including nurses, midwives and community health workers.

Mental health nurses. The Committee notes that, according to the HSSP II, there are many people in Malawi with mental disorders, a majority of whom seek medical care at health facilities, but are misdiagnosed due to presenting with physical symptoms. Common disorders such as depression and anxiety, whose prevalence is estimated at 10–20 per cent are often missed or not treated. The Government indicates in the HSSP II that, although at least 20 psychiatric nurses and psychiatric clinical officers are trained every year, the number of psychiatric staff actively carrying out mental health-related activities is very low due to the general shortage of nurses in the health system. The Committee requests the Government to provide updated detailed information on the measures taken or envisaged to ensure the quantity and quality of mental health nursing care necessary for attaining the highest possible level of health for the population.

Article 2(2)(a) and (3). Nursing education and training. The Committee notes that the HSSP II places a priority on improving the quality of training through the expansion of training and education opportunities, including through continuing professional development (CPD). The HSSP II provides for the adoption of specific measures to promote quality nursing and midwifery pre-service education, such as measures to institutionalize periodic curriculum reviews for all training institutions, as well as institutionalizing student–tutor ratios for specified nursing and midwifery training programmes; and measures to promote continued collaboration between teaching and clinical/community staff. The HSSP II also calls for the implementation of measures that encourage all nurses and midwives to pursue CPD, by institutionalizing CPD and supporting nurses and midwives undergoing upgrading courses and in-service training. The Committee notes in this regard that mandatory CPD for nurse midwives was re-introduced by the Nurses and Midwives Council of Malawi with the assistance of the MGHP. The Committee requests the Government to provide updated detailed information on the nature, implementation, monitoring and impact of the measures adopted, to ensure that nursing personnel, including midwives, are provided with quality education and training appropriate to the exercise of their functions as well as to their professional career development.

Article 5(2). Determination of conditions of employment and work. In response to the Committee's previous comments, the Government indicates that the collective bargaining agreement for the nursing sector has still not been concluded. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the status of the collective bargaining process and progress made in this regard, as well as to transmit a copy of any collective agreements concluded for the nursing sector.

Article 7. Occupational safety and health. The Committee notes that the President of Malawi declared a state of national disaster in response to the COVID-19 pandemic on 19 March 2020. The National Covid-19 Preparedness and Response Plan was subsequently launched for the period March–June 2020. The Plan includes among its specific objectives building the capacity of healthcare workers on highly infectious diseases (such as COVID-19), as well as procuring and distributing supplies and equipment to all treatment centres. In this regard, the Committee draws the attention of the Government to paragraph 49 of the Nursing Personnel Recommendation, 1977 (No. 157), which provides that: "(1) all possible steps should be taken to ensure that nursing personnel are not exposed to special risks. Where exposure to special risks is unavoidable, measures should be taken to minimise it; (2) measures such as the provision and use of protective clothing, immunisation, shorter hours, more frequent rest breaks, temporary removal from the risk or longer annual holidays should be provided for in respect to nursing personnel regularly assigned to duties involving special risks so as to reduce their exposure to these risks; and (3) in addition, nursing personnel who are exposed to special risks should receive financial compensation." The Committee also draws the Government's attention to the ILO Guidelines on decent work in public emergency services, 2018, which recognize the need to protect public emergency workers, including emergency health workers, from exposure to communicable diseases. In particular, paragraphs 50 and 51 of the Guidelines stress that suitable and sufficient personal protective equipment (PPE) should be provided as protection against exposure to hazardous conditions for public emergency services' workers and that workers and/or their representatives should be consulted and participate in relation to the selection and correct use of PPE. Noting that nursing personnel, as they are often in close contact with patients, are at high risk of being infected while treating patients with suspected or confirmed COVID-19 when infection control precautions, including use of personal protective equipment (PPE) are not strictly practiced, the Committee requests the Government to provide detailed updated information on the safety measures being taken or that are envisaged, including the provision of PPE and training in its use, as well as provision of adequate rest breaks during workers' shifts and limitations on excessive hours wherever possible, with a view to protecting the health and well-being of nurses and limiting as much as possible their risk of contracting COVID-19.

Part V of the report form. Application in practice. The Committee notes that, according to the WHO Global Health Observatory, the total number of nursing and midwifery personnel in Malawi increased from 4,573 in 2016 to 7,957 in 2018. Nevertheless, the HSSP II indicates that the overall vacancy rate for nursing officers is currently 66 per cent (63 per cent among assistant community health officers, 72 per cent for chief nurse technicians, 45 per cent for chief nursing officers and 31 per cent for community midwifery assistants). This personnel shortage places a heavy burden on those nursing and midwifery professionals who are in employment. The Committee requests the Government to provide updated detailed information on the application of the Convention in practice, including statistical data disaggregated by sex, age and region concerning: the ratio of nursing personnel to the population; the number of persons enrolled in nursing schools; the number of female and male nurses who enter and leave the profession each year; the organization and the operation of all institutions which provide healthcare services; as well as official studies, surveys and reports addressing health workforce issues in the Malawi health sector.

Direct requests

In addition, requests regarding certain matters are being addressed directly to the following States: Convention No. 110 (Mexico); Convention No. 149 (Congo, Ghana, Guinea, Guyana, Iraq, Kenya, Kyrgyzstan, Malta, Tajikistan); Convention No. 172 (Belgium, Germany, Guyana, Iraq, Ireland, Lebanon); Convention No. 177 (Albania, Argentina, North Macedonia, Tajikistan); Convention No. 189 (Ecuador, Germany, Guyana, Ireland, Philippines).

II. Observations concerning the submission to the competent authorities of the Conventions and Recommendations adopted by the International Labour Conference (article 19 of the Constitution)

Albania

Serious failure to submit. The Committee notes with concern that the Government has not replied to its previous observations. It recalls that the constitutional obligation of submission is of the highest importance and is a fundamental element of the standards system of the ILO. The Committee therefore once again expresses the firm hope, as did the Conference Committee in June 2019, that the Government of Albania will comply with its constitutional obligation to submit Conventions, Recommendations and Protocols to the competent authorities in the future. Referring to its previous observations, the Committee reiterates its request that the Government provide information on the submission to the Albanian Parliament of 24 instruments: the Protocol of 1995 to the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947, adopted by the Conference at its 82nd Session, the Promotion of Cooperatives Recommendation, 2002 (No. 193), and the List of Occupational Diseases Recommendation, 2002 (No. 194), adopted by the Conference at its 90th Session, as well as the instruments adopted at the 78th, 84th, 86th, 89th, 92nd, 95th (Recommendation No. 198), 96th, 99th, 100th, 101st, 103rd, 104th and 106th Sessions. In addition, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the submission of the Violence and Harassment Convention (No. 190) and Recommendation (No. 206), 2019, adopted by the Conference at its 108th Session (June 2019).

Angola

Failure to submit. The Committee notes with regret that the Government has not provided the information requested in its 2018 observation. The Committee therefore once again reiterates its request that the Government provide the information required under Article 19 of the ILO Constitution on the 17 instruments pending submission to the National Assembly. These are: the Protection of Workers' Claims (Employer's Insolvency) Recommendation, 1992 (No. 180), adopted by the Conference at its 79th Session; the Protocol of 1995 to the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947, adopted by the Conference at its 82nd Session; and the instruments adopted at the 86th, 91st, 92nd, 94th, 95th, 99th, 100th, 101st, 103rd, 104th and 106th Sessions of the Conference (2003–17). In addition, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the submission of the Violence and Harassment Convention (No. 190) and Recommendation (No. 206), 2019, adopted by the Conference at its 108th Session (June 2019).

Antigua and Barbuda

Failure to submit. The Committee notes that the Government has not responded to its 2018 direct request. It therefore once again recalls the information provided by the Government in April 2014, indicating that the instruments adopted by the Conference from its 83rd to its 101st Sessions (1996–2012) were resubmitted by the Minister of Labour to the Cabinet of Antigua and Barbuda on 11 March 2014. The Committee reiterates its request that the Government specify the dates on which the 23 instruments adopted by the Conference from its 83rd to its 101st Sessions were submitted to the Parliament of Antigua and Barbuda. The Committee also once again requests the Government to provide information on the submission to Parliament of the Protocol of 2014 to the Forced Labour Convention, 1930, and the Forced Labour (Supplementary Measures) Recommendation, 2014 (No. 203), adopted by the Conference at its 103rd Session, the Transition from the Informal to the Formal Economy Recommendation, 2015 (No. 204), adopted by the Conference at its 104th Session, and the Employment and Decent Work for Peace and Resilience Recommendation, 2017 (No. 205), adopted by the Conference at its 106th Session. In addition, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the submission of the Violence and Harassment Convention (No. 190) and Recommendation (No. 206), 2019, adopted by the Conference at its 108th Session (June 2019).

Bahamas

Serious failure to submit. The Committee notes with regret that the Government has not provided information in response to its 2018 observation. It recalls that the constitutional obligation of submission is of the highest importance and is a fundamental element of the standards system of the ILO. The Committee expresses the firm hope, as did the Conference Committee in June 2019, that the Government will comply with its obligation to submit Conventions, Recommendations and Protocols to the competent authority (the Parliament). The Committee therefore once again urges the Government to provide information on the submission to Parliament of the 24 instruments adopted by the Conference at 14 sessions held between 1997 and 2017 (85th, 86th, 88th, 89th, 90th, 92nd, 95th, 96th, 99th, 100th, 101st, 103rd, 104th and 106th Sessions). In addition, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the submission to Parliament of the Violence and Harassment Convention (No. 190) and Recommendation (No. 206), 2019, adopted by the Conference at its 108th Session.

Bahrain

Serious failure to submit. The Committee notes that the Government has not responded to its previous observation. Referring to its 2019 comments, it notes the information provided by the Government on 18 July 2019, indicating that it has complied with its constitutional obligations through the submission of the instruments adopted by the International Labour Conference to its Council of Ministers, as the competent authority. It also notes the information provided by the Government on 22 July 2019, indicating that the Employment and Decent Work for Peace and Resilience Recommendation, 2017 (No. 205), was submitted to the Council of Ministers. The Committee notes that the Government does not specify the date of submission. The Committee once again recalls its previous observations, in which it noted that article 47(a) of the Constitution of Bahrain requires the submission of Conventions to the Council of Ministers, as the body responsible for the formulation of the State's public policy and for following up on its implementation. The Committee further recalls the Government's indication in September 2011 that, with the establishment of a National Assembly – composed of the Consultative Council (Majlis Al-Shura) and the Council of Representatives (Majlis al-Nuwab) – there was a need to establish a new mechanism for submission of the instruments adopted by the Conference to the National Assembly. The Committee points out that the constitutional obligation of submission is of the highest importance and is a fundamental element of the standards system of the ILO. The Committee recalls that the ILO remains available to explore with the national authorities the manner in which a mechanism could be established for the effective submission of instruments adopted by the Conference to the National Assembly in order to ensure the fulfilment of the Government's obligations under the ILO Constitution. The Committee once again expresses the firm hope, as did the Conference Committee in June 2016, June 2017, June 2018 and June 2019, that the Government will take immediate steps to submit Conventions, Recommendations and Protocols to the National Assembly. The Committee therefore once again urges the Government to provide full information on the submission to the National Assembly of the 23 instruments adopted by the Conference at 14 sessions held between 2000 and 2017 (88th Session, 89th Session, 90th Session, 91st Session, 92nd Session, 94th Session, 95th Session, 96th Session, 99th Session, 100th Session, 101st Session, 103rd Session and 104th Session). It further reiterates its request that the Government specify the competent authority to which Recommendation No. 205 was submitted, as well as the date of submission and once again reminds the Government of the availability of ILO technical assistance in meeting its submission obligations. In addition, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the submission of the Violence and Harassment Convention (No. 190) and Recommendation (No. 206), 2019, adopted by the Conference at its 108th Session (June 2019).

Belize

Serious failure to submit. The Committee notes with concern that the Government has not replied to its previous observations. It recalls once again that the constitutional obligation of submission is of the highest importance and is a fundamental element of the standards system of the ILO. The Committee expresses the firm hope, as did the Conference Committee in June 2017, June 2018 and June 2019, that the Government will comply with its obligation to submit Conventions, Recommendations and Protocols to the competent authority (the National Assembly). The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the submission to the National Assembly of the 41 pending instruments adopted by the Conference at 21 sessions held between 1990 and 2017. In addition, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the submission of the Violence and Harassment Convention (No. 190) and Recommendation (No. 206), 2019, adopted by the Conference at its 108th Session (June 2019).

Plurinational State of Bolivia

Serious failure to submit. The Committee notes with regret that the Government has once again not replied to its previous comments. It recalls that the constitutional obligation of submission is of the highest importance and is a fundamental element of the standards system of the ILO. The Committee notes that information has not been provided on the submission to the Plurinational Legislative Assembly of the 29 instruments adopted by the Conference at 19 sessions between 1993 and 2017. The Committee urges the Government to provide information on the submission to the Plurinational Legislative Assembly of the 29 instruments adopted by the Conference since 1993 for which submission is still pending. It reminds the Government that it may avail itself of ILO technical assistance if it so wishes. In addition, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the submission of the Violence and Harassment Convention (No. 190) and Recommendation (No. 206), 2019, adopted by the Conference at its 108th Session (June 2019).

Brunei Darussalam

Serious failure to submit. The Committee notes with concern that the Government has once again not replied to its previous comments. It recalls that the constitutional obligation of submission is of the highest importance and is a fundamental element of the standards system of the ILO. The Committee therefore urges the Government to provide information on the submission to the competent national authorities, within the meaning of article 19(5) and (6) of the ILO Constitution, of the ten instruments adopted by the Conference at its 96th, 99th, 100th, 101st, 103rd, 104th and 106th Sessions (2007–17). The Committee recalls that the Government may request the technical assistance of the Office, if it so wishes, to assist it in achieving compliance with its obligations under article 19 of the Constitution with respect to the submission to the competent authorities of the instruments adopted by the Conference. In addition, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the submission of the Violence and Harassment Convention (No. 190) and Recommendation (No. 206), 2019, adopted by the Conference at its 108th Session (June 2019).

Central African Republic

Failure to submit. The Committee notes with regret that the Government has once again not replied to its previous comments. It recalls that the constitutional obligation of submission is of the highest importance and is a fundamental element of the standards system of the ILO. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the submission to the National Assembly of the eight instruments adopted by the Conference at its 99th, 100th, 101st, 103rd, 104th and 106th Sessions (2010–17). In addition, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the submission of the Violence and Harassment Convention (No. 190) and Recommendation (No. 206), 2019, adopted by the Conference at its 108th Session (June 2019).

Chad

Failure to submit. The Committee notes with regret that the Government has once again not replied to its previous comments. It recalls that the constitutional obligation of submission is of the highest importance and is a fundamental element of the standards system of the ILO. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the submission to the competent authorities of the instruments adopted by the Conference at its 99th, 100th, 101st, 103rd, 104th and 106th Sessions (2010–17). In addition, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the submission of the Violence and Harassment Convention (No. 190) and Recommendation (No. 206), 2019, adopted by the Conference at its 108th Session (June 2019).

Chile

Serious failure to submit. The Committee notes with regret that the Government has once again not replied to its previous comments. It recalls that the constitutional obligation of submission is of the highest importance and is a fundamental element of the standards system of the ILO. The Committee once again expresses the firm hope, as did the Conference in June 2019, that the Government of Chile will comply with its obligations to submit Conventions, Recommendations and Protocols to the competent authorities in the future. The Committee therefore reiterates its request that the Government provide the required information, indicating the date of submission to the National Congress of 26 instruments adopted at 16 sessions of the Conference between 1996 and 2017 (83rd, 84th, 85th, 86th, 88th, 89th, 90th, 91st, 92nd, 95th (the Employment Relationship Recommendation, 2006 (No. 198)), 96th, 99th, 101st, 103rd, 104th and 106th Sessions). In addition, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the submission of the Violence and Harassment Convention (No. 190) and Recommendation (No. 206), 2019, adopted by the Conference at its 108th Session (June 2019).

Comoros

Serious failure to submit. The Committee notes with concern that the Government has not provided the information requested in its 2018 Observation. The Committee recalls that the constitutional obligation of submission is of the highest importance and is a fundamental element of the standards system of the ILO. The Committee therefore once again expresses the firm hope, as did the Conference Committee in June 2016, June 2017, June 2018 and June 2019, that the Government will comply with its obligation to submit Conventions, Recommendations and Protocols to the competent authority. It therefore urges the Government to provide information on the submission to the Assembly of the Union of Comoros of the 44 instruments adopted by the Conference at the 22 sessions held between 1992 and 2017. In addition, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the submission of the Violence and Harassment Convention (No. 190) and Recommendation (No. 206), 2019, adopted by the Conference at its 108th Session (June 2019).

Congo

Serious failure to submit. The Committee notes with concern that the Government has yet again not replied to its previous comments. The Committee recalls that the constitutional obligation of submission is of the highest importance and is a fundamental element of the standards system of the ILO. The Committee once again expresses the firm hope, as did the Conference in June 2019, that the Government of Congo will comply with its obligations to submit Conventions, Recommendations and Protocols to the competent authorities in the future. The Committee once again requests the Government to complete the submission procedure in relation to 65 Conventions, Recommendations and Protocols, adopted by the Conference during 31 sessions from 1970 to 2017, which have not yet been submitted to the National Assembly. In addition, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the submission of the Violence and Harassment Convention (No. 190) and Recommendation (No. 206), 2019, adopted by the Conference at its 108th Session (June 2019).

The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the submission of the Violence and Harassment Convention (No. 190) and Recommendation (No. 206), 2019, adopted by the Conference at its 108th Session (June 2019). It recalls that the Government may request the technical assistance of the Office, if it so wishes, to assist it in achieving compliance with its obligations under article 19 of the Constitution with respect to the submission to the competent authorities of the instruments adopted by the Conference.

El Salvador

Serious failure to submit. The Committee notes that the Government has not responded to its previous comments. It recalls that the constitutional obligation of submission is of the highest importance and is a fundamental element of the standards system of the ILO. In this context, the Committee recalls the information provided by a Government representative before the Conference Committee at its 108th Session in June 2019, indicating that the country welcomed the technical cooperation received from the ILO for the preparation of the Protocol of Institutional Procedures for the submission of ILO instruments. The Government representative indicated that the Government would soon take the first steps for the submission of the relevant Conventions and Recommendations to the competent authority. The Committee once again expresses the firm hope, as did the Conference Committee in June 2016, June 2017, June 2018 and June 2019, that the Government will comply with its obligation to submit Conventions, Recommendations and Protocols to the competent national authority. The Committee once again urges the Government to submit to the Legislative Assembly the instruments adopted at 23 sessions of the Conference held between October 1976 and June 2017. Moreover, it once again requests the Government to provide information on the submission of the remaining outstanding instruments adopted by the Conference at its 63rd (Convention No. 148 and Recommendations Nos 156 and 157), 67th (Convention No. 154 and Recommendation No. 163), 69th (Recommendation No. 167) and 90th (Recommendations Nos 193 and 194) Sessions. The Committee further requests the Government to provide information on the submission of the Violence and Harassment Convention (No. 190) and Recommendation (No. 206), 2019, adopted by the Conference at its 108th Session (June 2019).

Hungary

Serious failure to submit. The Committee notes with regret that the Government has once again not responded to its previous comments. It recalls that the constitutional obligation of submission is of the highest importance and is a fundamental element of the standards system of the ILO. The Committee accordingly reiterates its request that the Government provide information on the submission to the National Assembly of the instruments adopted by the Conference at its 99th, 100th, 101st, 103rd, 104th and 106th Sessions (2010–17). The Committee further requests the Government to provide information on the submission of the Violence and Harassment Convention (No. 190) and Recommendation (No. 206), 2019, adopted by the Conference at its 108th Session (June 2019).

Iraq

Failure to submit. The Committee notes with regret that the Government has once again provided no response to its previous comments. It recalls that the constitutional obligation of submission is of the highest importance and is a fundamental element of the standards system of the ILO. It therefore once again recalls the detailed information provided by the Government in November 2017, including the dates of submission to the Council of Representatives (Majlis Al-Nuwaab) of each of the instruments adopted by the Conference at its 88th, 90th, 92nd, 95th, 96th, 99th, 100th and 101st Sessions (2000–12). The Committee further recalls the Government's indication that Recommendations submitted to the Council of Representatives were not examined by the Council, but were transmitted to the Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs which, according to the Government's indication, is the competent authority with respect to Recommendations. The Committee further recalls the information provided by the Government in March 2017, indicating that the Protocol of 2014 to the Forced Labour Convention, 1930, was submitted to the competent authority. It notes in this regard that no information was provided on the date of submission, or on whether the instrument in question was in fact submitted to the Council of Representatives (Majlis Al-Nuwaab). The Committee once again recalls that, by virtue of article 19(5) and (6) of the ILO Constitution, each of the Members of the Organization undertakes to submit the instruments adopted by the Conference to the authority or authorities within whose competence the matter lies for the enactment of legislation or other action. In the 2005 memorandum concerning the obligation to submit Conventions and Recommendations to the competent authorities, the Governing Body indicated that the competent authority is the authority which, under the Constitution of each State, has the power to legislate or to take other action in order to implement Conventions and Recommendations. The competent national authority should normally be the legislature. The Committee therefore reiterates its request that the Government provide more specific information on the submission to the Council of Representatives of the remaining 12 instruments adopted by the Conference from 2000 to 2015. The Committee further requests the Government to provide information on the submission to the Council of Representatives of the Employment and Decent Work for Peace and Resilience Recommendation, 2017 (No. 205), adopted by the Conference at its 106th Session, and the Violence and Harassment Convention (No. 190) and Recommendation (No. 206), 2019, adopted by the Conference at its 108th Session (June 2019).

Kazakhstan

Serious failure to submit. The Committee notes with regret that the Government has once again provided no response to its previous comments. It recalls that the constitutional obligation of submission is of the highest importance and is a fundamental element of the standards system of the ILO. The Committee therefore once again reiterates its request that the Government provide information on the date of submission of the Transition from the Informal to the Formal Economy Recommendation, 2015 (No. 204), to Parliament. Moreover, the Committee once again requests the Government to provide information on the submission to Parliament of the remaining 36 instruments adopted by the Conference between 1993 and 2017, including with respect to the date of submission of each instrument. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the submission of the Violence and Harassment Convention (No. 190) and Recommendation (No. 206), 2019, adopted by the Conference at its 108th Session (June 2019).

Kiribati

Submission to Parliament. The Committee notes with satisfaction the Government's indication that the 23 instruments adopted by the Conference at its 88th, 89th, 90th, 92nd, 95th, 96th, 99th, 100th, 101st, 103rd, 104th, 106th and 108th Sessions were submitted to the competent authority. The Committee welcomes the progress made by the Government in complying with its constitutional obligation of submission.

Kuwait

Serious failure to submit. The Committee notes with regret that the Government has once again not provided the requested information on submission to the competent authority (the National Assembly). It recalls that the constitutional obligation of submission is of the highest importance and is a fundamental element of the standards system of the ILO. The Committee expresses the firm hope, as did the Conference Committee in 2016, 2017, 2018 and 2019, that the Government will comply with its obligation to submit Conventions, Recommendations and Protocols to the National Assembly (Majlis Al-Ummah). The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to indicate the date of submission of the instruments adopted by the Conference at its 92nd, 94th, 95th, 96th, 99th, 100th, 101st, 103rd and 104th Sessions to the National Assembly (Majlis Al-Ummah). In addition, referring to its previous comments, the Committee reiterates its request that the Government specify the date of submission to the National Assembly of the instruments adopted at the 77th Session (Conventions Nos 170 and 171, Recommendations Nos 177 and 178, and the Protocol of 1990), 80th Session (Recommendation No. 181), 86th Session (Recommendation No. 189) and 89th Session (Convention No. 184 and Recommendation No. 192) of the Conference. The Committee also reiterates its request that the Government provide information on the steps taken to submit the Employment and Decent Work for Peace and Resilience Recommendation, 2017 (No. 205), adopted at the 106th Session of the International Labour Conference to the National Assembly. The Committee further requests the Government to provide information on the submission of the Violence and Harassment Convention (No. 190) and Recommendation (No. 206), 2019, adopted by the Conference at its 108th Session (June 2019).

Kyrgyzstan

Serious failure to submit. The Committee notes with regret that the Government has once again failed to reply to its previous comments. The Committee therefore once again recalls the information provided by the Government in November 2016 relative to the Transition from the Informal to the Formal Economy Recommendation, 2015 (No. 204), concerning the characteristics of the informal economy in Kyrgyzstan. The Committee noted, however, that the Government has provided no information relating to submission. The Committee therefore once again refers to the comments it has been formulating since 1994, and recalls that, under article 19 of the ILO Constitution, every Member undertakes to bring the instruments adopted by the International Labour Conference before the authority or authorities within whose competence the matter lies for the enactment of legislation or other action. It recalls that the constitutional obligation of submission is of the highest importance and is a fundamental element of the standards system of the ILO. The Committee expresses the firm hope, as did the Conference Committee in 2016, 2017, 2018 and 2019, that the Government will comply with its obligation to submit Conventions, Recommendations and Protocols to the competent authority. The Committee once again urges the Government to provide information on the submission to the competent national authority of the 42 instruments adopted by the Conference at 21 sessions held from 1992 to 2017. The Committee reminds the Government of the availability of ILO technical assistance to assist it in overcoming this serious delay. In addition, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the submission of the Serious failure to submit. The Committee notes with regret that the Government has once again provided no reply to its previous comments. It recalls that the constitutional obligation of submission is of the highest importance and is a fundamental element of the standards system of the ILO. The Committee once again expresses the firm hope, as did the Conference Committee in June 2016, June 2017, June 2018 and June 2019, that the Government will comply with its obligation to submit Conventions, Recommendations and Protocols to the competent authorities. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to provide information on the submission to the competent national authorities (within the meaning of article 19(5) and (6) of the ILO Constitution) of the 35 Conventions, Recommendations and Protocols adopted by the Conference at 18 sessions held between 1996 and 2017. In addition, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the submission of the Violence and Harassment Convention (No. 190) and Recommendation (No. 206), 2019, adopted by the Conference at its 108th Session (June 2019).

Malawi

Failure to submit. The Committee notes that the Government has provided no reply to its previous comments. It therefore recalls the information provided by the Government concerning the submission to the President on 12 December 2018 of the HIV and AIDS Recommendation, 2010 (No. 200), adopted by the Conference at its 99th Session, the Domestic Workers Convention, 2011 (No. 189), adopted by the Conference at its 100th Session, the Forced Labour (Supplementary Measures) Recommendation, 2014, adopted by the Conference at its 103rd Session, and the Transition from the Informal to the Formal Economy Recommendation, 2015 (No. 204), adopted by the Conference at its 104th Session. In addition, the Government indicated that the Employment and Decent Work for Peace and Resilience Recommendation, 2017 (No. 205), was submitted to the competent authority. The Committee recalls that the constitutional obligation of submission is of the highest importance and is a fundamental element of the standards system of the ILO. While noting the Government's indication that the President is a member of the Parliament, the Committee recalls that the obligation of submission cannot be considered to have been fulfilled until the ILO instruments adopted have reached and been submitted to the legislative body. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to provide information on the submission to Parliament, and the dates of submission, of the seven instruments adopted by the Conference at its 99th, 100th, 101st, 103rd, 104th and 106th Sessions (2010–17). In addition, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the submission of the Violence and Harassment Convention (No. 190) and Recommendation (No. 206), 2019, adopted by the Conference at its 108th Session (June 2019).

Somalia

Serious failure to submit. The Committee notes that the Government has once again provided no response to its previous comments. It recalls that the constitutional obligation of submission is of the highest importance and is a fundamental element of the standards system of the ILO. The Committee expresses the firm hope, as did the Conference Committee in June 2016, June 2017, June 2018 and June 2019, that the Government will comply with its obligation to submit Conventions, Recommendations and Protocols to the competent authority. The Committee therefore urges the Government to take steps without delay to submit the 52 instruments adopted by the Conference between 1989 and 2017 to the competent national authority and to provide the information required under Article 19 of the ILO Constitution to the International Labour Office. In addition, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the submission of the Violence and Harassment Convention (No. 190) and Recommendation (No. 206), 2019, adopted by the Conference at its 108th Session (June 2019).

The Committee recalls that the Government may avail itself of the technical assistance of the Office, if it so wishes, to assist it in achieving compliance with its obligations under article 19 of the Constitution with respect to the submission to the competent authorities of the instruments adopted by the Conference.

Syrian Arab Republic

Serious failure to submit. The Committee notes with regret that the Government has once again failed to reply to its previous comments. It recalls the Government's indications in September 2015 that the Consultative Council for Consultation and Social Dialogue held discussions related to the submission of the instruments adopted by the Conference to the competent authorities. The Committee also recalls that 39 instruments adopted by the Conference are still pending submission to the People's Council. In this context, the Committee recalls that the constitutional obligation of submission is of the highest importance and is a fundamental element of the standards system of the ILO. The Committee therefore expresses the firm hope, as did the Conference Committee in June 2018 and June 2019, that the Government will provide information on the submission to the People's Council of the 39 instruments adopted by the Conference at its 66th and 69th Sessions (Recommendations Nos 167 and 168) and at its 70th, 77th, 78th, 79th, 80th, 81st, 82nd, 83rd, 85th, 86th, 90th (Recommendations Nos 193 and 194), 91st, 92nd, 95th, 96th, 99th, 100th, 101st, 103rd, 104th and 106th Sessions. The Committee urges the Government to take steps to submit the pending instruments without delay. In addition, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the submission of the Violence and Harassment Convention (No. 190) and Recommendation (No. 206), 2019, adopted by the Conference at its 108th Session (June 2019).

Timor-Leste

Serious failure to submit. The Committee notes that the Government has once again not replied to its previous comments. It therefore reiterates its request that the Government provide information on the submission to the National Parliament of the instruments adopted by the Conference at its 99th, 100th, 101st, 103rd, 104th and 106th Sessions (2010–17). In addition, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the submission of the Violence and Harassment Convention (No. 190) and Recommendation (No. 206), 2019, adopted by the Conference at its 108th Session (June 2019).

The Committee recalls that the Government may request the technical assistance of the Office, if it so wishes, to assist it in achieving compliance with its obligations under article 19 of the Constitution with respect to the submission to the competent authorities of the instruments adopted by the Conference.

Tuvalu

Serious failure to submit. The Committee notes with concern that the Government has once again provided no response to its previous comments. It recalls that Tuvalu became a Member of the Organization on 27 May 2008. In accordance with article 19(5)(a) and (6)(a) of the ILO Constitution, the Office communicated to the Government the text of the Convention, Recommendations and the Protocol adopted by the Conference at its 99th, 100th, 101st, 103rd, 104th and 106th Sessions (2010–15). The Committee trusts that the Government will take steps to submit without delay the eight instruments adopted by the Conference between 2010 and 2017 and provide the information required under article 19 of the ILO Constitution to the Office. In addition, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the submission of the Violence and Harassment Convention (No. 190) and Recommendation (No. 206), 2019, adopted by the Conference at its 108th Session (June 2019).

In this context, the Committee recalls that the Government may request the technical assistance of the Office, if it so wishes, to assist it in achieving compliance with its obligations under article 19 of the ILO Constitution relating to the submission of the instruments adopted by the Conference to the competent authorities.

Vanuatu

Serious failure to submit. The Committee notes with deep concern that the Government has once again provided no reply to its previous comments. It recalls that the constitutional obligation of submission is of the highest importance and is a fundamental element of the standards system of the ILO. The Committee once again expresses the firm hope, as did the Conference Committee in June 2016, June 2017, June 2018 and June 2019, that the Government will comply with its obligation to submit Conventions, Recommendations and Protocols to the competent authority (the Parliament of Vanuatu). The Committee urges the Government to provide information on the submission to the Parliament of Vanuatu of the instruments adopted by the Conference at 11 sessions held between 2003 and 2017 (91st, 92nd, 94th, 95th, 96th, 99th, 100th, 101st, 103rd, 104th and 106th Sessions). In addition, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the submission of the Violence and Harassment Convention (No. 190) and Recommendation (No. 206), 2019, adopted by the Conference at its 108th Session (June 2019).

The Committee reminds the Government that, if it so wishes, it may request the technical assistance of the Office to assist it in achieving compliance with its obligations under article 19 of the Constitution.

Yemen

Serious failure to submit. The Committee notes that the Government has once again provided no response to its previous comments. It therefore recalls the information provided to the Conference by the Government in June 2018 indicating that it was not able to submit instruments adopted by the Conference to the House of Representatives due to the ongoing conflict in Yemen. Noting the complex situation in the country, particularly the ongoing conflict, the Committee trusts that, when national circumstances permit, the Government will be in a position to provide information on the submission to the House of Representatives of the instruments adopted by the Conference at its 90th, 94th, 96th, 99th, 100th, 101st, 103rd, 104th and 106th Sessions, as well as on the submission of Recommendations Nos 191, 192 and 198, adopted by the Conference at its 88th, 89th and 95th Sessions. In addition, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the submission of the Violence and Harassment Convention (No. 190) and Recommendation (No. 206), 2019, adopted by the Conference at its 108th Session (June 2019).

Zambia

Serious failure to submit. Date of submission. The Committee notes with regret that the Government has once again not replied to its previous comments. It recalls that the constitutional obligation of submission is of the highest importance and is a fundamental element of the standards system of the ILO. It once again recalls the information provided by the Government in September 2010 indicating that 12 instruments adopted by the Conference from 1996 to 2007 had been submitted to the National Assembly. The Committee once again requests the Government to indicate the dates on which the above-mentioned instruments were submitted to the National Assembly. It also reiterates its request that the Government provide information on any action taken by the National Assembly in relation to the submissions, as well as with respect to the prior tripartite consultations that took place with the social partners. The Committee reiterates its request that the Government provide information on the submission to the National Assembly of the instruments adopted by the Conference at its 99th, 100th, 101st, 103rd, 104th and 106th Sessions (2010–17). In addition, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the submission of the Violence and Harassment Convention (No. 190) and Recommendation (No. 206), 2019, adopted by the Conference at its 108th Session (June 2019).

Appendix I. Reports requested on ratified Conventions registered as at 12 December 2020
(articles 22 and 35 of the Constitution)

Article 22 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organization provides that "each of the Members agrees to make an annual report to the International Labour Office on the measures which it has taken to give effect to the provisions of the Conventions to which it is a party. These reports shall be made in such form and shall contain such particulars as the Governing Body may request". Article 23 of the Constitution provides that the Director-General shall lay before the next meeting of the Conference a summary of the reports communicated to him by Members in pursuance of article 22, and that each Member shall communicate copies of these reports to the representative organizations of employers and workers.

At its 204th Session (November 1977), the Governing Body approved the following arrangements for the presentation by the Director-General to the Conference of summaries of reports submitted by governments under articles 22 and 35 of the Constitution:

(a) the practice of tabular classification of reports, without summary of their contents, which has been followed for several years in respect of reports subsequent to first reports after ratification, should be applied to all reports, including first reports;

(b) the Director-General should make available, for consultation at the Conference, the original texts of all reports received on ratified Conventions; in addition, photocopies of the reports should be supplied on request to members of delegations.

At its 267th Session (November 1996), the Governing Body approved new measures for rationalization and simplification.

Reports received under articles 22 and 35 of the Constitution appear in simplified form in a table annexed to the report of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations; first reports are indicated in parentheses.

Requests for consultation or copies of reports may be addressed to the secretariat of the Committee on the Application of Standards.

Appendix IV. Summary of information supplied by governments with regard to the obligation to submit the instruments adopted by the International Labour Conference to the competent authorities

Article 19 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organization prescribes, in paragraphs 5, 6 and 7 that Members shall bring the Conventions, Recommendations and Protocols adopted by the International Labour Conference before the competent authorities within a specific time period. Under the same provisions, the governments of Member States shall inform the Director-General of the International Labour Office of the measures taken to submit the instruments to the competent authorities, and also communicate particulars of the authority or authorities.

In accordance with article 23 of the Constitution, a summary of the information communicated by Member States in accordance with article 19 is submitted to the Conference.

At its 267th Session (November 1996), the Governing Body approved new measures to rationalize and simplify proceedings. As a result, the summarized information is presented in an appendix to the report of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations.

The following summary contains the most recent information on the submission to the competent authorities of the Protocol of 2014 to the Forced Labour Convention, 1930, and the Forced Labour (Supplementary Measures) Recommendation, 2014 (No. 203), adopted at the 103rd Session of the Conference (June 2014), the Transition from the Informal to the Formal Economy Recommendation, 2015 (No. 204), adopted at the 104th Session of the Conference (June 2015), as well as the Employment and Decent Work for Peace and Resilience Recommendation, 2017 (No. 205), adopted by the Conference at its 106th Session (June 2017), and the Violence and Harassment Convention, 2019 (No. 190), and the Violence and Harassment Recommendation 2019 (No. 206), adopted at the 108th Session of the Conference (June 2019).

The summarized information includes communications that were forwarded to the Director-General of the International Labour Office after the closure of the 108th Session of the Conference (June 2019) and which could not therefore be laid before the Conference at that session.

Appendix V. Information supplied by governments with regard to the obligation to submit Conventions and Recommendations to the competent authorities
(31st to 108th Sessions of the International Labour Conference, 1948–2019)

Note. The number of the Convention or Recommendation is given in parentheses, preceded by the letter "C" or "R" as the case may be, when only some of the texts adopted at any one session have been submitted. The Protocols are indicated by the letter "P" followed by the number of the corresponding Convention. When the ratification of a Convention was registered, that Convention and the corresponding Recommendation are considered as submitted.

Account has been taken of the date of admission or readmission of member States to the ILO for determining the sessions of the Conference whose texts are taken into consideration.

The Conference did not adopt any Conventions or Recommendations at its 57th Session (June 1972), 73rd Session (June 1987), 93rd Session (June 2005), 97th Session (June 2008), 98th Session (June 2009), 102nd Session (June 2013), 105th Session (June 2016) and 107th Session (June 2018).
