The Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations is an independent body composed of legal experts charged with examining the application of ILO Conventions and Recommendations by ILO member States. The annual report of the Committee of Experts covers numerous matters related to the application of ILO standards. The structure of the report, as modified in 2003, is divided into the following parts:

(a) The Reader's note provides indications on the Committee of Experts and the Committee on the Application of Standards of the International Labour Conference (their mandate, functioning and the institutional context in which they operate) (Part A, pages 1–4).

(b) Part I: the General Report describes the manner in which the Committee of Experts undertakes its work and the extent to which member States have fulfilled their constitutional obligations in relation to international labour standards, and it draws the attention to issues of general interest arising out of the Committee's work (Part A, pages 5–49).

(c) Part II: Observations concerning particular countries cover the sending of reports, the application of ratified Conventions (see section I), and the obligation to submit instruments to the competent authorities (see section II) (Part A, pages 51–741).

(d) Part III: Addendum to the General Survey, in which the Committee of Experts examines the state of the legislation and practice regarding a specific area covered by a given number of Conventions and Recommendations. This examination covers all member States regardless of whether or not they have ratified the given Conventions. The General Survey is published as a separate volume (Report III(Part B)) and this year it concerns the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122), the Vocational Rehabilitation and Employment (Disabled Persons) Convention, 1983 (No. 159), the Home Work Convention, 1996 (No. 177), the Vocational Rehabilitation and Employment (Disabled Persons) Recommendation, 1983 (No. 168), the Employment Policy (Supplementary Provisions) Recommendation, 1984 (No. 169), the Home Work Recommendation, 1996 (No. 184), the Employment Relationship Recommendation, 2006 (No. 198), and the Transition from the Informal to the Formal Economy Recommendation, 2015 (No. 204) (Part B).

Overview of the ILO supervisory mechanisms

Since its creation in 1919, the mandate of the International Labour Organization (ILO) has included adopting international labour standards, promoting their ratification and application in its Member States, and the supervision of their application as a fundamental means of achieving its objectives. In order to monitor the progress of Member States in the application of international labour standards, the ILO has developed supervisory mechanisms which are unique at the international level. [1]

Under article 19 of the ILO Constitution, a number of obligations arise for Member States upon the adoption of international labour standards, including the requirement to submit newly adopted standards to national competent authorities and the obligation to report periodically on the measures taken to give effect to the provisions of unratified Conventions and Recommendations.

A number of supervisory mechanisms exist whereby the Organization examines the standards-related obligations of Member States deriving from ratified Conventions. This supervision occurs both in the context of a regular procedure through periodic reports (article 22 of the ILO Constitution), [2] as well as through special procedures based on representations or complaints to the Governing Body made by ILO constituents (articles 24 and 26 of the Constitution, respectively). Moreover, since 1950, a special procedure has existed whereby complaints relating to freedom of association are referred to the Committee on Freedom of Association of the Governing Body. The Committee on Freedom of Association may also examine complaints relating to Member States that have not ratified the relevant freedom of association Conventions.

Role of employers' and workers' organizations

As a natural consequence of its tripartite structure, the ILO was the first international organization to associate the social partners directly in its activities. The participation of employers' and workers' organizations in the supervisory mechanisms is recognized in the Constitution under article 23, paragraph 2, which provides that reports and information submitted by governments in accordance with articles 19 and 22 must be communicated to the representative organizations.

In practice, representative employers' and workers' organizations may submit to their governments' observations on the reports concerning the application of international labour standards. They may, for instance, draw attention to a discrepancy in law or practice regarding the application of a ratified Convention. Furthermore, any employers' or workers' organization may submit observations on the application of international labour standards directly to the Office. The Office will then forward these to the government concerned, which will have an opportunity to respond before the observations are examined by the Committee of Experts except in exceptional circumstances. [3]

[1] For detailed information on all the supervisory procedures, see ILO Handbook of procedures relating to international labour Conventions and Recommendations, International Labour Standards Department, Geneva, 2019.

[2] Reports are requested every three years for the fundamental Conventions and governance Conventions, and from now on, every six years for other Conventions. In fact, at its 334th Session the Governing Body decided to expand the reporting cycle for the latter category of Conventions from five to six years (GB.334/INS/5). Reports are due for groups of Conventions according to subject matter.

Origins of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards and the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations

During the early years of the ILO, both the adoption of international labour standards and the regular supervisory work were undertaken within the framework of the plenary sitting of the annual International Labour Conference. However, the considerable increase in the number of ratifications of Conventions rapidly led to a similarly significant increase in the number of annual reports submitted. It soon became clear that the plenary sitting of the Conference would not be able to examine all of these reports at the same time as adopting standards and discussing other important matters. In response to this situation, the Conference in 1926 adopted a resolution [4] establishing on an annual basis a Conference Committee (subsequently named the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards) and requesting the Governing Body to appoint a technical committee (subsequently named the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations) which would be responsible for drawing up a report for the Conference. These two committees have become the two pillars of the ILO supervisory system.

Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations

Composition

The Committee of Experts is composed of 20 members, who are outstanding legal experts at the national and international levels. The members of the Committee are appointed by the Governing Body upon the recommendation of its Officers based on proposals by the Director-General. Appointments are made in a personal capacity from among impartial persons of competence and independent standing drawn from all regions of the world, in order to enable the Committee to have at its disposal first-hand experience of different legal, economic and social systems. The appointments are made for renewable periods of three years. In 2002, the Committee decided that there would be a limit of 15 years' service for all members, representing a maximum of four renewals after the first three year appointment. At its 79th Session (November–December 2008), the Committee decided that its Chairperson would be elected for a period of three years, which would be renewable once for a further three years. At the start of each session, the Committee would also elect a Reporter.

Work of the Committee

The Committee of Experts meets annually in November–December. In accordance with the mandate given by the Governing Body, [5] the Committee is called upon to examine the following:

- the periodic reports under article 22 of the Constitution on the measures taken by Member States to give effect to the provisions of the Conventions to which they are parties;
- the information and reports concerning Conventions and Recommendations communicated by Member States in accordance with article 19 of the Constitution;
- information and reports on the measures taken by Member States in accordance with article 35 of the Constitution. [6]

The task of the Committee of Experts is to indicate the extent to which each Member State's legislation and practice are in conformity with ratified Conventions and the extent to which Member States have fulfilled their obligations under the ILO Constitution in relation to standards. In carrying out this task, the Committee adheres to its principles of independence, objectivity and impartiality. [7] The comments of the Committee of Experts on the fulfilment by Member States of their standards-related obligations take the form of either observations or direct requests. Observations are generally used in more serious or long-standing cases of failure to fulfil obligations. They are reproduced in the annual report of the Committee of Experts, which is then submitted to the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June every year. Direct requests are not published in the report of the Committee of Experts, but are communicated directly to the government concerned and are available online. [8] In addition, the Committee of Experts examines, in the context of the General Survey, the state of the legislation and practice concerning a specific area covered by a given number of Conventions and Recommendations chosen by the Governing Body. [9] The General Survey is based on the reports submitted in accordance with articles 19 and 22 of the Constitution, and it covers all Member States regardless of whether or not they have ratified the concerned Conventions. This year's Addendum to the 2020 General Survey on promoting employment and decent work in a changing landscape presents complementary information to last year's Survey in light of the COVID-19 pandemic.

Report of the Committee of Experts

As a result of its work, the Committee produces an annual report. The report consists of two volumes.

The first volume (Report III (Part A)) [10] is divided into two parts:

- Part I: the General Report describes, on the one hand, the progress of the work of the Committee of Experts and specific matters relating to it that have been addressed by the Committee and, on the other hand, the extent to which Member States have fulfilled their constitutional obligations in relation to international labour standards.
- Part II: Observations concerning particular countries on the fulfilment of obligations in respect of the submission of reports, the application of ratified Conventions grouped by subject matter and the obligation to submit instruments to the competent authorities.

The second volume contains the General Survey (Report III(Part B)).

Committee on the Application of Standards of the International Labour Conference

Composition

The Conference Committee on the Application of Standards is one of the two standing committees of the Conference. It is tripartite and therefore comprises representatives of governments, employers and workers. At each session, the Committee elects its Officers, which include a Chairperson (Government member), two Vice-Chairpersons (Employer member and Worker member) and a Reporter (Government member).

Work of the Committee

The Conference Committee on the Application of Standards meets annually at the Conference in June. Pursuant to article 7 of the Standing Orders of the Conference, the Committee shall consider:

- measures taken to give effect to ratified Conventions (article 22 of the Constitution);
- reports communicated in accordance with article 19 of the Constitution (General Surveys);

[8] General Report, para. 117. Observations and direct requests are accessible through the NORMLEX database available at: www.ilo.org/normes.

[9] By virtue of the follow-up to the ILO Declaration on Social Justice for a Fair Globalization, 2008, a system of annual recurrent discussions in the framework of the Conference has been established to enable the Organization to gain a better understanding of the situation and varying needs of its members in relation to the four strategic objectives of the ILO, namely: employment; social protection; social dialogue and tripartism; and fundamental principles and rights at work. The Governing Body considered that the recurrent reports prepared by the Office for the purposes of the Conference discussion should benefit from the information on the law and practice of Member States contained in General Surveys, as well as from the outcome of the discussions of General Surveys by the Conference Committee. In principle, the subjects of General Surveys have therefore been aligned with the four strategic objectives of the ILO. The importance of the coordination between the General Surveys and recurrent discussions was reaffirmed in the context of the adoption of a five-year cycle of recurrent discussions by the Governing Body in November 2016. In the context of discussing measures to strengthen the supervisory system in November 2018, the Governing Body invited the Committee of Experts to make proposals on its possible contribution to optimizing the use made of article 19, paragraphs 5(e) and 6(d), of the Constitution, in particular by considering measures to improve the presentation of General Surveys, so as to ensure a user-friendly approach and format that maximizes their value for constituents (document GB.334/INS/5).

[10] This citation reflects the agenda of the International Labour Conference, which contains as a permanent item, item III relating to information and reports on the application of Conventions and Recommendations.

– measures taken in accordance with article 35 of the Constitution (non-metropolitan territories).

The Committee is required to present its report to the plenary sitting of the Conference.

Following the independent technical examination carried out by the Committee of Experts, the proceedings of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards provide an opportunity for the representatives of governments, employers and workers to examine together the manner in which States are fulfilling their standards-related obligations. Governments are able to elaborate on information previously supplied to the Committee of Experts, indicate any further measures taken or proposed since the last session of the Committee of Experts, draw attention to difficulties encountered in the fulfilment of obligations and seek guidance as to how to overcome such difficulties.

The Conference Committee on the Application of Standards discusses the report of the Committee of Experts, and the documents submitted by governments. The work of the Conference Committee starts with a general discussion based essentially on the General Report of the Committee of Experts. The Conference Committee then discusses the General Survey. It also examines cases of serious failure to fulfil reporting and other standards-related obligations. Finally, the Conference Committee examines a number of individual cases concerning the application of ratified Conventions which have been the subject of observations by the Committee of Experts. At the end of the discussion of each individual case, the Conference Committee adopts conclusions on the case in question.

In its report [11] submitted to the plenary sitting of the Conference for adoption, the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards may invite the Member State whose case has been discussed to accept a technical assistance mission by the International Labour Office to increase its capacity to fulfil its obligations, or may propose other types of missions. The Conference Committee may also request a government to submit additional information or address specific concerns in its next report to the Committee of Experts. The Conference Committee also draws the attention of the Conference to certain cases, such as cases of progress and cases of serious failure to comply with ratified Conventions.

The Committee of Experts and the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards

In numerous reports, the Committee of Experts has emphasized the importance of the spirit of mutual respect, cooperation and responsibility that has always existed in relations between the Committee of Experts and the Conference Committee. It has accordingly become the practice for the Chairperson of the Committee of Experts to attend the general discussion of the Conference Committee and the discussion on the General Survey as an observer, with the opportunity to address the Conference Committee at the opening of the general discussion and to make remarks at the end of the discussion on the General Survey. Similarly, the Employer and Worker Vice-Chairpersons of the Conference Committee are invited to meet the Committee of Experts during its sessions and discuss issues of common interest within the framework of a special session held for that purpose.

[11] The report is published in the Record of Proceedings of the Conference. Since 2007, it has also been issued in a separate publication. See, for the last report, Conference Committee on the Application of Standards: Extracts from the Record of Proceedings, International Labour Conference, 108th Session, Geneva, 2019.

Part I. General Report

I. Introduction

1. The Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, appointed by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to examine the information and reports submitted under articles 19, 22 and 35 of the Constitution by Member States of the International Labour Organization on the action taken with regard to Conventions and Recommendations, held its 91st Session from 25 November to 12 December 2020. The Committee has the honour to present its report to the Governing Body.

2. The Committee conducted its 91st Session virtually due to the mobility restrictions imposed in the context of the COVID-19 pandemic, making use of a web-based collaborative platform and an online conferencing facility. The Committee took note of the deferral of the 109th Session of the International Labour Conference to June 2021 and the consequent adaptation of the reporting cycle decided by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (March 2020). [1] As a result of this decision, the Committee had before it at its current session:

- Supplementary information on the article 19 reports submitted in 2019 on employment related instruments, highlighting relevant developments that might have occurred in the meantime; and
- Supplementary information on the article 22 and 35 reports submitted last year, highlighting relevant developments, if any, on the application of the provisions of Conventions under review that might have occurred in the meantime; certain reports requested and received in 2019 that could not be considered at its previous session; reports requested on the basis of a footnote adopted by the Committee requesting a report for this year; reports requested on the follow-up of failures to submit reports; and
- Information on submissions to the competent authorities under article 19 of the ILO Constitution.

3. The Committee accordingly submits:

- the Addendum to the General Survey entitled "Promoting employment and decent work in a changing landscape" which was released in 2020; and
- the present General Report and the Committee's observations concerning particular countries, most of which contain an update to the observations released in 2020.

Composition of the Committee

4. The composition of the Committee is as follows: Mr Shinichi AGO (Japan), Ms Lia ATHANASSIOU (Greece), Ms Leila AZOURI (Lebanon), Mr Lelio BENTES CORRÊA (Brazil), Mr James J. BRUDNEY (United States), Ms Graciela Josefina DIXON CATON (Panama), Mr Rachid FILALI MEKNASSI (Morocco), Mr Abdul G. KOROMA (Sierra Leone), Mr Alain LACABARATS (France), Ms Elena E. MACHULSKAYA (Russian Federation), Ms Karon MONAGHAN (United Kingdom), Mr Vitit MUNTARBHORN (Thailand), Mr Sandile NGCOBO (South Africa), Ms Rosemary OWENS (Australia), Ms Mónica PINTO (Argentina), Mr Paul-Gérard POUGOUÉ (Cameroon), Mr Raymond RANJEVA (Madagascar), Ms Kamala SANKARAN (India), Ms Deborah THOMAS-FELIX (Trinidad and Tobago) and Mr Bernd WAAS (Germany). Appendix I of the General Report contains brief biographies of all the Committee members.

[1] Governing Body, 338th Session (March 2020). Decision concerning Member States reporting obligations and the work of the CEACR and the Committee on the Application of Standards as a result of the deferral of the 109th Session of the International Labour Conference to 2021, Institutional Section Record of decisions.

5. During its session, the Committee functioned with a full composition of 20 members and welcomed the appointment of Mr Sandile Ngcobo by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (March 2020).

6. The Committee also noted that this was the final session for two of its most eminent members, Mr Abdul G. Koroma, former Chairperson of the Committee, and Mr Lelio Bentes Corrêa, former Chairperson of the Subcommittee on Working Methods, both of whom had joined the Committee in 2006 and reached the maximum term of 15 years. The Committee expressed its profound gratitude to the two Experts for their invaluable contribution and dedication to its work.

7. The Committee expressed its deep appreciation for the outstanding manner in which Judge Koroma carried out his duties throughout his 15 years of service on the Committee and, in particular, commended him warmly for the highly professional way in which he carried out the important and exacting task of leading the Committee during the six years (84th to 89th Sessions) he served as Chairperson of the Committee. Over the years, Judge Koroma worked in particular on Conventions related to employment as well as migrant workers and his contribution in these areas will remain long lasting.

8. The Committee also extended its special appreciation for the remarkable contribution Judge Bentes Corrêa brought to the Committee during his years of service and, in particular, commended him warmly for the visionary and creative way in which he carried out his duty as Chairperson of the Subcommittee on Working Methods over a number of years. During his time with the Committee, Judge Bentes Corrêa worked in particular on Conventions related to the elimination of the worst forms of child labour as well as on indigenous people's rights and brought his invaluable expertise on these thematics.

9. This year, Ms Graciela Dixon Caton continued her mandate as Chairperson and Ms Rosemary Owens was elected as Reporter.

Working methods

10. Consideration of its working methods by the Committee of Experts has been an ongoing process since its establishment. In this process, the Committee has always given due consideration to the views expressed by the tripartite constituents. In recent years, in its reflection on possible improvements and the strengthening of its working methods, the Committee of Experts directed its efforts towards identifying ways to adapt its working methods so as to perform its functions in the best and most efficient manner possible and, in so doing, assist Member States in meeting their obligations in relation to international labour standards and enhance the functioning of the supervisory system.

11. In order to guide the Committee's reflection on continuous improvement of its working methods, a Subcommittee on Working Methods was set up in 2001 with the mandate to examine the working methods of the Committee and any related subjects, in order to make appropriate recommendations to the Committee. This year, under the Chairpersonship of Mr Bernd Waas, the Subcommittee on Working Methods met for the 20th time. The Subcommittee focused its discussions on the follow up to the Governing Body's discussions concerning the work plan for the strengthening of the supervisory mechanism. In particular, the Subcommittee discussed progress made in the implementation of Information Technology (IT) enhancements enabling the Committee to work fully electronically for the preparation, review, adoption and publication of its report following a decision taken by the Governing Body at its 331st Session (October–November 2017). The Subcommittee noted that the introduction of these IT enhancements in 2020 enabled the Committee to hold this year's session remotely and overcome the limitations imposed by the COVID-19 pandemic. The new document and information management system has facilitated the Committee's work, by streamlining the previously paper-based processes, improving document management and expanding the Experts' ability to work remotely and collaborate online. Further IT enhancements will be introduced in 2021 in close consultation with the Experts.

12. The Subcommittee also took note of certain delays in the implementation of two decisions taken at its previous session with regard to urgent appeals and reports treated without comment, due to the adaptations introduced to the reporting cycle following the deferral of the 109th Session of the International Labour Conference and certain IT limitations.

13. The Subcommittee recalled that in the context of discussing measures to strengthen the supervisory system in November 2018, the Governing Body had invited the Committee of Experts to make proposals on its possible contribution to optimizing the use made of article 19, paragraphs 5(e) and 6(d), of the Constitution, [2] in particular by considering measures to improve the presentation of General

[2] As indicated in footnote No. 9 of the reader's note, which is reproduced here for ease of reference, by virtue of the follow-up to the ILO Declaration on Social Justice for a Fair Globalization, 2008, a system of annual recurrent discussions in the framework of the Conference has been established to enable the Organization to gain a better understanding of the situation and varying needs of its members in relation to the four strategic objectives of the ILO, namely: employment; social protection; social dialogue and tripartism; and fundamental principles and rights at work. The Governing Body considered that the recurrent reports prepared by Surveys, so as to ensure a user-friendly approach and format that maximizes their value for constituents. [3] Following up on this invitation, the Committee decided to introduce Executive Summaries providing a brief overview of the main elements examined in General Surveys so as to facilitate their discussion at the Conference. The Subcommittee looked forward to the feedback that the constituents might provide on the impact of this innovation, including the role of General Surveys in informing Recurrent Discussions at the International Labour Conference, so as to enable the Committee to continue its reflections on ways to optimize General Surveys.

Relations with the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards

14. A spirit of mutual respect, cooperation and responsibility has consistently prevailed over the years in the Committee's relations with the Committee on the Application of Standards of the International Labour Conference. In this context, the Chairperson of the Committee has been invited to participate in the general discussion of the Conference Committee at the 109th Session of the International Labour Conference which was initially scheduled in May–June 2020 and was deferred to June 2021 due to the COVID-19 pandemic.

15. The Chairperson of the Committee of Experts invited the Employer Vice-Chairperson (Ms Sonia Regenbogen) and the Worker Vice-Chairperson (Mr Marc Leemans) to participate in a special sitting of the Committee at its present session. They both accepted this invitation. An interactive and thorough exchange of views took place on matters of common interest. This year the discussion focused on two questions: the impact of COVID-19 on the world of work and the role of an authoritative supervisory mechanism in response to this challenge as this is emerging from the Centenary Declaration on the Future of Work.

16. In its introductory comments, the Committee of Experts shared its considerations on the devastating economic and human impact of the pandemic and emphasized the importance of building on the guidance provided by international labour standards and an authoritative supervisory mechanism in the context of building back better as provided for in the Centenary Declaration on the Future of Work. The Committee's considerations on this subject are reflected in a separate section of the General Report dedicated to COVID-19.

17. The Employer Vice-Chairperson observed that the world has experienced an historic public and economic upheaval due to the COVID-19 pandemic. Numerous governments have declared states of emergency to mitigate the spread of the virus and increased executive power by enacting emergency laws. Vigilance is necessary in the face of these expanding powers by certain governments. While they are necessary for public health, they risk having a serious impact on fundamental rights and freedoms.

18. COVID-19 caused many governments to encounter greater challenges in complying with ratified international labour standards in law and in practice. Factors such as lack of resources and funding issues, urgent health measures, or states of emergency might have translated into a temporary derogation of application of certain provisions. Although cases of non-compliance with ratified Conventions should be analysed and assessed on a case-by-case basis taking into account the national realities, COVID-19 should not be an excuse for violations of ratified Conventions, especially fundamental and governance Conventions. The assessment of compliance with these Conventions should be a priority under the current exceptional circumstances.

19. Employers' organizations brought to the attention of the Committee of Experts observations under article 23(2) of the ILO Constitution, on violations of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) and the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144) by a number of governments. They were also concerned at the increase in child labour, forced labour and discrimination in the workplace as a consequence of the global pandemic. The application in law and in practice of ratified Occupational Safety and Health Conventions should also be a priority along with the Maritime Labour Convention, 2006 (MLC, 2006), as amended, given the significant challenges faced by the global shipping industry to effect crew change and repatriate seafarers as a result of the measures taken to contain the COVID-19 pandemic, and their subsequent the Office for the purposes of the Conference discussion should benefit from the information on the law and practice of Member States contained in General Surveys, as well as from the outcome of the discussions of General Surveys by the Conference Committee. In principle, the subjects of General Surveys have therefore been aligned with the four strategic objectives of the ILO. The importance of the coordination between the General Surveys and recurrent discussions was reaffirmed in the context of the adoption of a five-year cycle of recurrent discussions by the Governing Body in November 2016.

[3] GB.334/INS/5.

adverse impact on seafarers' rights. A resolution by the ILO Governing Body on this subject was supported by her group.

20. The Employer Vice-Chairperson shared information on the drastic impact of the COVID-19 pandemic on economic activity, job creation and productivity as various necessary public health measures were needed to contain the spread of the virus. She also referred to the ways in which the global pandemic has accelerated the transformation of the world of work in particular through rapid digitalization. She expressed fears that unless more is done to invest in job creation and training opportunities, the world may be heading towards a jobless recovery and a larger gap in the digital divide.

21. The Employer Vice-Chairperson emphasized the importance of sustainable enterprises in creating employment, creating more opportunities for the vulnerable, and increasing prosperity and the quality of life for all people. She underlined that sustainable enterprises are part of the solution in tackling the impacts of the pandemic, addressing long term sustainability challenges and seeking positive recovery. She called for enhanced, strategic and determined collaboration between the public and the private sector which in her view is more important than ever to pave the path for an efficient, strong and resilient private sector led recovery and to build a better future. She also referred to countries which demonstrated that effective and inclusive social dialogue is the best approach to respond to the current situation and applauded these efforts.

22. The Employer Vice-Chairperson also emphasized that the challenge is how to mitigate the damage on businesses and livelihoods, rebuild the economy, and revive economic growth on a robust, resilient and sustainable path. She expressed the view that productive employment and decent work through sustainable enterprises is the way to build back a better world of work after the pandemic.

23. The Employer Vice-Chairperson stated that it is very important for the Committee of Experts to adopt a balanced, pragmatic and mindful approach in developing its report taking into account the needs of sustainable enterprises when assessing compliance with standards and in the update of the General Survey on employment instruments.

24. The Employer Vice-Chairperson emphasized the undisputed importance of an effective and authoritative supervision of standards in times of crisis, as this is emerging from the Centenary Declaration. There is also clear global tripartite consensus that the ILO Centenary Declaration should be the key framework for a sustainable and resilient recovery. The Declaration calls for international labour standards to respond to the "changing patterns of the world of work, protect workers and take into account the needs of sustainable enterprises". This requires supervisory bodies to be balanced and flexible to new innovative thinking, approaches, assessments and methodologies that are appropriate to meet the changing needs and realities at national level.

25. The Employer Vice Chairperson considered that in fully recognising the dramatic upheavals in the world of work, the Committee of Experts needs to listen actively to the tripartite constituents to understand their actual needs in the specific national contexts and to provide them with practical and effective policy guidance. The pandemic has created an opportunity for the ILO supervisory system to pause and ask itself whether the ILO regular supervision is effective, authoritative, relevant, impactful and is helping Member States ensure compliance with ratified Conventions in a sustainable manner in law and in practice. This is an opportunity for both the Committee of Experts and for the Committee on the Application of Standards, in the framework of the informal tripartite consultations on that Committee's working methods, to engage in a preliminary reflection. In this regard, she also called for Office assistance to build the capacities of employers' organizations and enable them to submit comprehensive observations to the Committee of Experts.

26. The Employer Vice-Chairperson emphasized that the success of standards supervision relies in large part on the open dialogue and strong cooperation of all the actors involved, namely the Conference Committee, the Committee of Experts, the Office and the tripartite constituents of the Member States. She referred to the need for continuous dialogue and cooperation across the board and noted in particular, that the ILO supervisory bodies must ensure that their non-binding assessments of compliance are aligned and are receptive to the views expressed by the tripartite constituents. The Employer Vice-Chairperson referred to the way in which the long-standing issue of "right to strike" has damaged dialogue and cooperation. Noting that no one benefits from this situation, she emphasized that the solution lies in the hands of the Conference Committee that managed to navigate turbulent times in the past, but also in the hands of the Committee of Experts and of course in the hands of the Office that provides the support. Past experience has demonstrated that alignment of views and recommendations from the Conference Committee and the Committee of Experts are likely to generate faster and better results and more positive responses from governments and social partners. The two supervisory bodies must continue to strive in this direction which is the key to a supervisory system that is effective and authoritative.

27. The Worker Vice-Chairperson recalled that in their separate but complementary roles, the two supervisory bodies form a part of an authoritative supervisory system that works for the effective implementation of international labour standards. He agreed with the Employer Vice-Chairperson on the need to ensure respect for international labour standards in the context of the COVID-19 pandemic. The latter should not be used as a pretext for non-observance by some governments of their international labour standards obligations.

28. The Worker Vice-Chairperson indicated that information provided by workers' organizations to the Committee this year refers to an increased incidence of anti-union discrimination, the adoption of emergency measures that undermine labour standards, the failure to provide social protection to informal economy and precarious workers who in many instances are denied the right to organize and collective bargaining, the failure to provide occupational safety and health protection and the necessary resources for effective labour inspections as well as inadequate arrangements regarding working hours including in the context of homework and telework.

29. The Worker Vice-Chairperson referred to the situation of seafarers, who are on the frontline of the pandemic response and require immediate repatriation as they have completed their original tours of duty and in some cases have been on board for months outside their duty tour. Clarifying and reinforcing in an authoritative statement the obligation to comply with the MLC, 2006 as amended and the need for enforcement, especially under these crisis conditions, is absolutely crucial. In this regard, he welcomed the ILO Governing Body's resolution on maritime labour issues and the COVID-19 pandemic as well as UN General Assembly resolution on International cooperation to address challenges faced by seafarers as a result of the COVID-19 pandemic to support global supply chains, adopted on 1 December 2020.

30. The Worker Vice-Chairperson noted that governments will be called upon to take measures to address massive levels of unemployment resulting from the economic impact of the pandemic and underlined that these should not be hasty or ideological measures contrary to obligations under ratified international labour standards. He also noted that the pandemic will put a heavy burden on upcoming collective bargaining, in particular at inter-professional level.

31. He recalled that it was in the midst of a similar economic and social crisis that the ILO was founded and is therefore best suited to support its Member States in order to recover and build resilience. He agreed with the Employer Vice-Chairperson on the importance of monitoring compliance with international labour standards in the midst of the pandemic to ensure conformity with the terms of ratified Conventions, which is more important than ever to ensure that the recovery is rights-based. He emphasized that the risk of non-observance reinforces the crucial role of supervision as a fundamental means of ensuring compliance with obligations under ratified Conventions and promoting the ILO's mandate under the Constitution and the Declaration of Philadelphia. As such, the work of the respective supervisory bodies in monitoring and supervising the progress of Member States in the application of international labour standards remains absolutely critical. The Worker Vice-Chairperson emphasized that the Committee of Experts therefore needs all the trust, respect and support to continue to execute its mandate with the independence, authority and professionalism that has always characterized its work. He expressed the workers' great respect for the neutral and principled manner in which the Committee of Experts has been conducting its work and assured the Committee of their continuous support.

32. The Worker Vice-Chairperson congratulated the Committee of Experts for its enormous and very complex work and noted that the Committee's 2020 report was again of high quality. The established practice of examining measures taken in the follow-up to the recommendations of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards and, tripartite committees under article 24 of the ILO Constitution as well as Commissions of Inquiry under article 26 of the Constitution ensures coherence in the supervisory system. Indeed, the Committee of Experts continues to be the backbone of the supervisory system.

33. The Worker Vice-Chairperson referred to information provided in the Committee's 2020 report on the first reports received after discussion in the Conference Committee in June 2019 on serious failures to report and the technical assistance provided by the Office. [4]This progress shows that continuous and effective collaboration between the Conference Committee, the Office and the Committee of Experts brings results and must be extended to other cases of serious failure to report.

34. He noted that in its last report the Committee of Experts selected only one double-footnoted case and asked for some feedback on the considerations that led the Committee of Experts to highlight only one case. He mentioned the Committee's statement on the disruptive impact of late submission of Article 22 reports on the supervisory mechanism [5] and asked whether an avenue to explore would be to capacitate the social partners to provide information to the Committee, especially where governments have failed to do so. He also welcomed the wide coverage given to the examination of technical Conventions in last year's report in view of the extension of the reporting cycle for technical Conventions from five to six years. Being aware that in these times of crisis guidance on the conditions of work which have been most impacted will be quite relevant, he asked for an acceleration of the examination of technical Conventions and the release of additional observations in technical areas such as working time and occupational safety and health. He highlighted the importance of information received through Article 22 reports on the application of Conventions in practice including information on national jurisprudence, statistics and labour inspection [6] and asked for the Office to continue to provide assistance to governments and the social partners in this direction.

35. Finally, while an accessible and transparent Report is in no doubt in the interest of all constituents, he expressed some concern about the shortening of the Report and the need to reflect therein the information sent to the Committee of Experts by workers' organizations. He emphasized that there is need for full visibility and consideration to be given to serious allegations, including on technical Conventions, even more so in times of crisis. Finally, he underlined that detail and clarity are indeed critical in order to guide the constituents in their dialogue over necessary measures for the effective application of international labour standards.

36. In response to the comments of the two Vice-Chairpersons, the Committee recalled that the two Committees were created in 1926 through the same resolution of the International Labour Conference and are the key pillars of the ILO supervisory mechanism. Over the years, the two sister bodies have always viewed each other in that light despite occasional differences. The technical quality of the Committee's report has being providing a solid basis for the work of the Conference Committee thereby helping to uphold the legitimacy and authority of the ILO supervisory mechanism. At the same time, the Conference Committee's deliberations which are of a more political nature have helped the constituents obtain a better understanding of their obligations under ratified Conventions. The Committee would have not produced the same results if its technical comments had not been enhanced by the political impact of the discussions in the Conference Committee. The Committee of Experts gives full consideration to the Conference Committee discussions on the way in which Member States fulfil their obligations and takes concrete follow up action. The relationship between the two committees is therefore synergetic.

37. The two Committees are distinct but interdependent. Indeed, the Committee of Experts' independent nature has been an important factor in maintaining a constructive dialogue and overcoming occasional differences over the years. Also, the Committee's work plays a role in ensuring that international labour standards, as the foundation of national labour law across the world, maintain their relevance over time through comments linking the provisions inscribed in Conventions to the way in which they are applied in each national setting and in a continuously changing environment.

38. Fruitful cooperation between the two bodies has led to many cases of progress over the years, for example, through the recent abolition of the sponsorship system in Qatar under the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29), and the abolition of children's forced labour in the annual cotton harvest in Uzbekistan under the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182). It is hoped that the positive complementarities between the two Committees will lead the Conference Committee to give impetus to the General Survey on promoting employment and decent work in a changing landscape along with this year's Addendum which contains the Committee's guidance on measures for COVID-19 recovery through inclusive social dialogue, sustainable enterprises and decent work.

39. Synergies with the Conference Committee extend to the area of double footnotes. Indeed, while signalling cases of serious failure may be helpful for the Constituents in deciding which cases should be discussed in the Conference Committee, such public discussion enhances in return the political impact of the Observations made by the Committee of Experts. As already said, this synergetic process ultimately results in the strengthening of the supervisory system as a whole. The Committee has adopted certain criteria for the use of footnotes which have evolved over time, with the invaluable contribution of the Constituents. These appear in the Committee's General Report. It should be emphasized in this regard that the decision to include – or not – a case in the list to be discussed by the Conference Committee is a prerogative of that Committee's Vice-Chairpersons exercised in a context of dialogue and sometimes taking into account political considerations that have no place in the technical work performed by the Committee of Experts. Therefore, the Committee exercises restraint in its recourse to 'double footnotes' in deference to the Conference Committee's decisions as to the cases it wishes to discuss. The Committee has also made specific efforts to spread more evenly the double footnotes among fundamental, governance and technical Conventions. Nevertheless, the number of comments from the social partners regarding technical Conventions has been relatively low until now and sometimes these comments arrive too late to be considered in the same year. The proposals made by both Vice-Chairpersons to build the capacities of the social partners so that they can provide inputs to the Committee's work is very welcome. The use of the prerogative provided for in article 23(2) of the ILO Constitution is an excellent way to add valuable information on the gaps found in practice with regard to the implementation of technical Conventions.

40. The Committee has given further consideration to the statements of the Vice-Chairpersons. The Committee shares the Vice-Chairpersons' interest in ongoing dialogue and cooperation, while also understanding the importance of adhering to its mandate, which calls for impartial and technical analysis of how the Conventions are applied in law and practice by Member States. The persuasive value of the Committee's non-binding opinions and recommendations, and their ability to guide the actions of national authorities, are built on continuing dialogue with those national authorities, taking into account information provided by employers' and workers' organizations.

41. In performing its duties, the Committee remains cognizant of different national realities and legal systems, acting based on the impartiality, experience, and expertise of its members. This will be especially needed during periods of crisis, such as the present pandemic, where rigorous supervision of, and effective compliance with, International Labour Standards are of utmost relevance. In doing so, the Committee of Experts recognizes the importance of the continuous collaboration with the Conference Committee, while at the same time understanding that our efforts must be consonant with our distinct responsibilities and modalities of operation.

42. In conclusion, the Committee of Experts reiterates the importance of the synergy built in its relations with the Conference Committee and assures the Vice-Chairpersons that it is, as always, willing to keep developing its methods of work in the interest of transparency.

Mandate

43. The Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations is an independent body established by the International Labour Conference and its members are appointed by the ILO Governing Body. It is composed of legal experts charged with examining the application of ILO Conventions and Recommendations by ILO Member States. The Committee of Experts undertakes an impartial and technical analysis of how the Conventions are applied in law and practice by Member States, while cognizant of different national realities and legal systems. In doing so, it must determine the legal scope, content and meaning of the provisions of the Conventions. Its opinions and recommendations are non-binding, being intended to guide the actions of national authorities. They derive their persuasive value from the legitimacy and rationality of the Committee's work based on its impartiality, experience and expertise. The Committee's technical role and moral authority is well recognized, particularly as it has been engaged in its supervisory task for more than 90 years, by virtue of its composition, independence and its working methods built on continuing dialogue with governments taking into account information provided by employers' and workers' organizations. This has been reflected in the incorporation of the Committee's opinions and recommendations in national legislation, international instruments and court decisions.

Application of International Labour Standards in times of crisis: the importance of international labour standards and effective and authoritative supervision in the context of the COVID-19 pandemic

Introduction: the COVID-19 crisis

44. The COVID-19 pandemic has presented the greatest public health crisis the world has seen during the ILO's centenary of existence and in its wake has followed a social and economic crisis of immense scale. Millions of people across the world have been exposed to the virus and to date almost 1.6 million people have died. To address the health crisis, many governments have adopted containment measures, including lockdowns and related restrictions in an effort to prevent the spread of the virus. These measures have had devastating impacts on the labour market. While demand has increased in certain sectors, such as in the health and food retail sectors, demand in other sectors, such as tourism, aviation and transport has all but collapsed. Millions of enterprises were closed and millions of jobs and livelihoods have been lost. While the crisis has affected enterprises in all sectors and of all sizes, micro, small and medium-size enterprises, lacking the necessary human and financial resources to weather a crisis of this magnitude, have been severely affected and many have simply closed their doors. [7]

[7] 2021 Addendum to the 2020 General Survey on promoting employment and decent work in a changing landscape.

45. According to the ILO Monitor of September 2020, [8] working hour losses are higher than previously estimated, amounting to 495 million full-time equivalent jobs. Predictably, specific groups in vulnerable situations have been the hardest hit by the socio-economic crisis, although the effects vary. For example, women, who in many countries have significantly higher rates of unemployment than men, have suffered greater rates of job loss generally. Moreover, women are also over-represented in high-risk sectors, such as in care work, where demand for their services has increased due to the pandemic. As a result, they have been required to work excessive hours while also continuing to shoulder the primary burden of unpaid care work. Other specific groups in vulnerable situations that have been severely affected in many countries include: young workers, migrant workers, persons belonging to racial, ethnic or linguistic minorities, older workers, domestic workers, indigenous and tribal peoples, people living with or affected by HIV or AIDS and rural workers. In addition to having been historically subject to discrimination and exclusion in employment and occupation, such groups are now also experiencing levels of violence, harassment, stigma and xenophobia. People belonging to these groups are generally concentrated in low-paid jobs in sectors most affected by the pandemic, and are often in precarious employment, including in the informal economy.

46. The ILO estimates that the crisis has devastated the employment and livelihoods of some 1.6 billion informal economy workers, representing 76 per cent of informal employment worldwide. [9] Physical distancing is frequently difficult, if not impossible for many informal economy workers, such as street and market vendors, domestic workers and home delivery workers. Many waste pickers might handle contaminated materials, while living and working in close proximity to others. If they continue to work, they usually have no access to personal protective equipment, sanitizing or hand-washing.

47. The measures adopted to contain the spread of the pandemic through quarantines, travel restrictions and lockdowns have resulted in a global recession and historical levels of unemployment. According to Word Bank estimates, [10] the impacts of the pandemic could push up to 150 million people into extreme poverty by 2021, causing the first increase in global poverty since 1998. Globally, acute hunger could double in 2020, affecting more than 260 million people, and the rise in extreme poverty is likely to reinforce disparities, magnify social and economic inequalities and generate new migration flows, a rise in stigma and discrimination and a widening digital divide. The crisis exposed the blind spots of pre-existing legal and policy frameworks exacerbating inequality and poverty and stalling, or even reversing, the progress made towards sustainable development and towards realizing the SDG8 vision of full, productive and freely chosen employment and decent work for all.

48. In this context, the ILO supervisory bodies, along with other human rights monitoring bodies, are called upon to offer guidance on the path to recovery and resilience as the custodians of human rights and the principle of leaving no one behind. [11] The central role of international labour standards as the tried-and-trusted foundation of the Decent Work agenda is to reaffirm the framework within which any response may be formulated in order to prevent regression and put recovery efforts on a stable footing, answering the call of the 2030 Development Agenda to leave no one behind. Standards and effective and authoritative supervision are a fundamental part of the solution to this crisis, in line with the guidance given in the Centenary Declaration on the Future of Work [12] for addressing the profound transformative changes of today's world of work.

General principles

49. The Committee, taking note of the statements of other supervisory bodies in the UN system on the impact of the COVID-19 pandemic on fundamental human rights guarantees, [13] underlines the following:

(i) The crisis does not suspend obligations under ratified international labour standards; any derogations should be exercised within clearly defined limits of legality, necessity, and proportionality and non-discrimination. Similarly, the obligation to report on measures taken to give effect to ratified and non-ratified standards under articles 19, 22 and 35 of the ILO Constitution is not suspended. Member States are invited to seek the support of the Office, which is now more necessary than ever, in order to ensure that rights at work are not sacrificed as a result of the crisis and that the ILO's normative system fulfils its primary purpose of providing much needed guidance towards building back better.

(ii) Consistent with lawful measures to protect the health of the public, every effort should be made to prevent a downward spiral in labour conditions and pursue a virtuous cycle of recovery and development with the support of the Office and development partners fully respecting rights at work. Recovery measures weakening the protection afforded by labour laws will only further undermine social cohesion and stability and erode citizens' confidence that policy-makers heard the call for public policies to be responsive to people's needs. This is simply the wrong solution. An open global economy as the driver of recovery, is more than ever linked to respect for rights at work.

(iii) Social dialogue is critically important in all aspects of the development, implementation, monitoring and review of COVID-19 policy responses to ensure that these are grounded in respect for rights at work, tailored to national circumstances and benefiting from local ownership. The inclusive human-centred approach called for by the ILO Centenary Declaration for the Future of Work is needed now more than ever to protect workers' rights and rescue businesses and economies devastated by the severe health and socio-economic shockwaves caused by the pandemic.

(iv) The ILO has developed comprehensive policy guidance to support the efforts of governments, social partners and society in addressing the economic and social impact of the crisis and to ensure that they "build back better". It has also joined partnerships within the United Nations system in promoting the UN framework for the immediate socio-economic response to COVID-19 and its Key Indicators for monitoring human rights implications of COVID-19. The Committee calls for the national socio-economic response plans supported by the UN Country Teams, to be fully informed by and compliant with international labour standards and the principles underpinning them, notably tripartism and social dialogue.

Key challenges for rights at work

50. At its current session, the Committee of Experts identified at least three key challenges emerging from the pandemic with regard to rights at work.

51. First, while the exponential accumulation of executive power in all countries is a natural consequence of the current circumstances, in order to safeguard national security and public health and while limitations on rights and freedoms serve a legitimate purpose to a large extent, they still need to comply with various parameters of international law, particularly:

(i) the principle of legality so that those constraints must not be arbitrary and must be based on law;

(ii) the principle of necessity requiring the Executive branch to prove that limitations are genuinely necessary according to the circumstances;

(iii) the principle of proportionality positing the need to test constraining measures as proportionate to the risks and exigencies of the situation;

(iv) the principle of non-discrimination against particular groups in society, while also respecting the corresponding requirements put forward in the respective human rights treaties.

52. With regard to civil liberties and freedom of association in particular, the Committee recalls its longstanding statement according to which crisis situations "cannot be used to justify restrictions on the civil liberties that are essential to the proper exercise of trade union rights, except in circumstances of extreme gravity and on condition that any measures affecting [their] application are limited in scope and duration to what is strictly necessary to deal with the situation in question". [14] The Committee has consistently recalled, in the context of an economic crisis, the importance, as also highlighted by the Committee on Freedom of Association, of maintaining permanent and intensive dialogue with the most representative workers' and employers' organizations in particular in the process of adopting legislation, which may have an effect on workers' rights, including those intended to alleviate a serious crisis situation. [15] The Committee finally refers to the statements and comments made on this subject by a group of human rights experts on 16 March 2020 [16] and by the UN Human Rights Committee on 29 July 2020. [17]

The statement provides that "emergency declarations based on the COVID-19 outbreak should not be used as a basis to target particular groups, minorities, or individuals. It should not function as a cover for repressive action under the guise of protecting health … and should not be used simply to quash dissent".

[17] UN International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, Human Rights Committee, General comment No. 37 (2020) on the right of peaceful assembly (article 21)*, CCPR/C/GC/37 (2020), para. 2, describes the fundamental human right of peaceful assembly as "a

The Committee reverts to this question in the section of its general report dedicated to collaboration with the UN.

53. The second challenge is maintaining the universality, indivisibility interdependence and interrelation of all human rights both civil and political as well as economic, social and cultural rights. Human rights and international labour standards embody the universality and indivisibility of rights and freedoms. The Declaration of Philadelphia calls for "conditions of freedom and dignity, of economic security and equal opportunity" thereby giving concrete expression in the ILO Constitution to what came to be known as the interconnectedness of civil and political along with economic, social and cultural rights. [18]

54. Thirdly, the pandemic has exacerbated the plight of many groups who were already vulnerable to discrimination and marginalization. This is especially so where different grounds of discrimination intersect. As indicated at the outset for example, many women are disadvantaged in their access to the labour market as a result of gender discrimination and are also marginalized because they belong to disadvantaged groups During the pandemic, it has also been evident that the scourge of racial discrimination is on the rise and cause for serious concern. While COVID-19 does not discriminate, its effects and consequences may well do so.

Occupational safety and health

55. The COVID-19 pandemic has presented an immense challenge to the protection of the safety and health of workers around the world, with certain sectors particularly hard hit. The national strategies adopted in this context have recognized that occupational safety and health (OSH) measures are a key pillar for successful public health responses and fundamental to decent work.

56. As the crisis unfolded, millions of workers continued to work and provided essential services for the community while facing significant personal occupational health risks. A stark dilemma has been that of working and consequently risking infection, or else, having no income nor food. The public health response to the pandemic has shone the spotlight on the right to health, but it has also exposed the strains on the "adequate protection for the life and health of workers in all occupations", called for in the Declaration of Philadelphia.

57. The crisis led to a rude awakening to the fact that the centrality of the right to health has not been given sufficient prominence in the policy discourse. The Committee wishes to defer to the UN Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, which has held that health is a fundamental human right indispensable for the exercise of other human rights. [19] The right to health encompasses safe and healthy working conditions as an underlying determinant of health. [20] Even in situations of public health emergency, certain core obligations must remain satisfied, including essential primary health care and the implementation of a national public health strategy that concerns the whole population and gives particular attention to all vulnerable or marginalized groups. [21]

58. The Committee notes that the pandemic has brought renewed recognition of the importance of international labour standards on OSH, including the Promotional Framework for Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 2006 (No. 187), and the Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981 (No. 155). The principles contained in these OSH standards have been shown to be more relevant than ever, such as: protecting workers from risks to their health, according to the principle of prevention, the highest priority; the importance of taking technical and organizational OSH measures; the necessity of providing personal protective equipment at no expenditure to the worker; the indispensability of adequate training and information; and the fundamental importance of assessing occupational risks.

59. The pandemic has further highlighted the key role of occupational health services, in the monitoring of workers' health and the provision of guidance for adapting workplaces procedures and practices and developing safety protocols. In this respect, the Committee recalls the important provisions of the Occupational Health Services Convention, 1985 (No. 161). The Committee also recalls that the Standards Review Mechanism Tripartite Working Group (SRM TWG), identified a gap in normative coverage in the area of biological risks which may lead to the possible inclusion of a standard setting item on this question on the agenda of a future session of the International Labour Conference.

60. Meaningful consultations with the most representative organizations of employers and workers for the development of OSH policies, systems and programmes are central to ILO OSH standards. National mechanisms for such consultations have proven to be essential for the development and implementation of tailored measures during times of crisis with the support of employers and workers. The pandemic has also reinforced the value of cooperation and consultation with workers and their representatives at the workplace level in ensuring safety and health and developing measures adapted to each undertaking.

61. The Committee wishes to emphasize that ILO OSH standards cover, in relation to work, both the physical and mental elements affecting health. The considerable changes to working conditions and the modalities of work in 2020 have introduced or intensified certain psychosocial risks, and the Committee accordingly underlines the critical importance, when designing and implementing measures to emerge and recover from the crisis, of taking into account workers' mental health, their physical health and general well-being.

Social security

62. The Committee observes the tremendous pressure placed by the COVID-19 pandemic on national health systems and the surge in demand for medical and allied care and services resulting from the spread of the virus, in all regions of the world. It also observes the significant impact of the crisis that followed on people's livelihoods, threatened by the economic slowdown and the restrictions put in place to curb the health crisis.

63. The fundamental role of universal social protection floors has become evidently clear from the outset of the pandemic. Only 29 per cent of the global population enjoys access to comprehensive social security, while the remaining 71 per cent are not at all, or only partially, protected.

64. Based on the information at its disposal, [22] the Committee observes that, from the early stages, social protection emerged as a fundamental component of the COVID-19 crisis response and a means to mitigate its economic and social impact. Understandably, countries with strong social protection systems, underpinned by a well-developed and robust healthcare system, have been able to cope with the consequences of the COVID-19 pandemic and to ramp up support to their impacted populations quickly and effectively. The response has been less consistent in countries with fragmented social protection systems, mostly found in the developing world. These have not shown the same level of preparedness in coping with the crisis, due to the absence of universal health coverage, unemployment insurance and sickness benefits for their populations, working mostly in the informal economy.

65. The Committee commends the governments concerned for having taken a vast array of measures (e.g. reinforcement of the health care system, provision of supplementary sickness and unemployment benefits and payments to workers and families in need, recognition of the occupational origin of COVID-19 to facilitate the compensation of persons infected in the course of their work). Moreover, these measures were taken within a short time frame, to increase the income and health protection of the population in face of the pandemic and to contain its devastating impact on people and on the economy.

66. The Committee notes that, while many of these measures go beyond the minimum standards set out in the Social Security (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1952 (No. 102), they tend to be aligned with the more advanced standards set out in other up-to-date social security Conventions, [23] and to implement, to some extent, the guidance provided by social security Recommendations, [24] as regards the scope of personal and material coverage achieved. The importance gained by these social security standards of the latest generation in the context of the COVID-19 pandemic highlights their continued relevance in guiding state action, even when not ratified or of a non-binding character.

67. It is to be expected that the effects of the pandemic will worsen in the immediate future, and be felt for some time. This may warrant extending or adjusting the scope of protection and duration of current measures or taking additional measures, as need be, to strengthen the social protection of all persons in need, in particular the most vulnerable, and enable societies to better cope with the impact of the crisis. Mindful of the costs associated with these measures, which are likely to be needed for quite some time, and of the challenge for member States to secure appropriate financing over time, the Committee recalls the principles of progressivity, social solidarity, solidarity in financing and economic, financial and fiscal sustainability, embedded in ILO social security standards.

68. The Committee further recalls the importance of social dialogue and tripartite participation, as well as consultations with representatives of other persons concerned, in the formulation and implementation of social security measures, including measures taken in response to the pandemic. Finally, the Committee hopes that ILO Member States, in collaboration with social partners and other stakeholders, will take this opportunity to strengthen their health care and social security systems, guided by international labour standards.

Employment policy

69. In its 2021 Addendum to the 2020 General Survey on promoting employment and decent work in a changing landscape, and in the general observation made in the Committee's 2021 report on the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122), the Committee highlights the added-value of the guidance contained in the body of ILO employment instruments to lay the foundations for an inclusive, sustainable response and recovery. In adopting the ILO Centenary Declaration for the Future of Work in June 2019, the International Labour Conference called for the ILO to further develop its human-centred approach to the future of work, through, inter alia, developing effective policies aimed at generating full, productive and freely chosen employment and decent work opportunities for all.

70. The Committee observes that the COVID-19 crisis presents both enormous challenges as well as valuable opportunities to shape a fairer, more inclusive and secure future of work through the adoption and effective implementation of policy measures based on international labour standards and the rule of law. It stresses, however, that governments cannot tackle these enormous challenges alone: social dialogue and tripartite consultation are essential tools to recovery. The social partners, with their in-depth knowledge of the needs and realities of both businesses and workers, can contribute to the development and adoption of effective preventive measures to limit the spread of COVID-19 in workplaces, as well as of comprehensive and targeted response and recovery measures that take into account the needs and perspectives of all parties concerned. Inclusive dialogue with individuals and groups concerned by measures to be taken, and with civil society organizations where appropriate, can go a long way to building a climate of trust and ensure the development, adoption, implementation and review of measures that are both evidence- and consensus-based and promote increased ownership among all stakeholders. The development of a new generation of gender-responsive inclusive policies and programmes based on the guidance provided in the employment instruments can help to ensure a sustainable recovery from the crisis that promotes and protects job growth and decent work, creates an enabling environment for sustainable enterprises and strengthens inclusive social dialogue processes. In doing so, the employment instruments can contribute to ensuring resilient societies, economies and institutions capable of building a brighter, more inclusive future of work.

Freedom of association

71. While recalling its general statement regarding civil liberties and freedom of association in times of crisis mentioned in paragraph 52, the Committee observes that in the context of the pandemic, physical distancing measures and restrictions on freedom of assembly have affected, directly or indirectly, the realization of the right to organize and to collective bargaining. [25]Situations of confinement made it more difficult for workers to have direct contact with their representatives, and at times impeded elections to renew the terms of office of union leaders and the processes of consultation and collective bargaining. In this regard, the Committee notes the proactive measures taken in some countries to facilitate the continued exercise of collective rights in the context of the constraints imposed by the pandemic, including: the extension of the mandates of trade union representatives; the adjustment of collective bargaining deadlines; the increased use of videoconferencing to ensure the continuity of the activity of social dialogue and collective bargaining bodies; and the adaptation of the facilities granted to unions in their dealings with teleworkers.

72. The Committee notes that in some countries, exceptional measures have led to temporary restrictions including the setting aside of collective bargaining mechanisms and the resulting agreements. The Committee considers that these exceptional measures are only admissible in the event of an acute crisis and that, by their nature, they must be limited in time, strictly adapted and proportionate to the objective constraints they address, include guarantees for the workers most affected and be consulted with the most representative organizations of employers and workers. At the same time, the Committee notes that in several countries collective bargaining mechanisms have played an important role in identifying responses to the crisis, for example through the signing of agreements defining the modalities of temporary reduction of working time and the preservation of workers' incomes.

73. In the context of the major economic difficulties generated by the pandemic, the Committee also notes the importance of carefully examining the effects of recent reforms establishing increased possibilities for derogation, by agreements at the enterprise level, of protective provisions set out in higher-level agreements. As indicated in a recent ILO study, "collective bargaining that takes into account the particular circumstances of specific enterprises or sectors is best placed to strike the right balance, and to re-evaluate the adequacy of wages in some mostly female-dominated low-paid sectors which have proved to be essential and of high social value during the current crisis". [26]

74. The Committee finally recalls that the COVID-19 crisis should not be used as a pretext for acts of anti-union discrimination.

75. In light of these developments and in line with the guidance provided by the Employment and Decent Work for Peace and Resilience Recommendation, 2017 (No. 205), the Committee underlines the importance of trade union and collective bargaining rights in providing fair and robust solutions to the current health, economic and social crisis and in ensuring, in this context, respect for all rights guaranteed by ILO standards.

Child labour including its worst forms

76. As indicated in the general observation made in the Committee's 2021 report on the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182), global estimates indicate that between 42 and 66 million children could fall into extreme poverty as a result of the pandemic, adding to the 386 million children who were already in extreme poverty in 2019. The Committee applauds the universal ratification of the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182), by all Member States, which has also been instrumental in bringing the ratification rate of Convention No. 138 to over 90 per cent. Nevertheless, the Committee is concerned that without special efforts to prevent children from being pushed into child labour and its worst forms in the midst of the pandemic, not only years of progress towards eliminating child labour and its worst forms may be reversed, but the very foundation of an inclusive long-term recovery be undermined. The Committee calls on ILO Member States to strive towards safeguarding the precious progress made since the adoption of Conventions Nos 138 and 182 and making the recovery an opportunity to build back better and stronger.

Forced labour

77. The pandemic exacerbates poverty in its many dimensions and exposes those living in poverty to coercion and the risk of falling victim to forced labour including trafficking in persons, debt bondage, and other forms of forced labour. It also contributes to worsening the situation of people who were already in situations of, or at risk of, forced labour before the COVID-19 outbreak including people trapped in slavery-like situations, discrimination, marginalization and limited or no social and labour protection.

78. The Committee wishes to recall that under human rights treaties, some rights, such as the right to life and freedom from slavery, including trafficking in persons, are non-derogable and cannot be constrained even in times of public emergency. [27] Even though Convention No. 29 allows for derogations in the event of an epidemic that would endanger the existence of the whole or part of the population, during these exceptional cases, the duration and extent of compulsory service, as well as the purpose for which it is used, should be limited to what is strictly required by the exigencies of the situation. Moreover, it may be appropriate to recall that the Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105), requires ratifying Members not to resort to any form of compulsory or forced labour for purposes of economic development, as a means of labour discipline, as a punishment for having participated in strikes, or as a means of racial, social, national or religious discrimination. The Convention also protects persons "holding or expressing political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system" from sanctions involving compulsory labour. Any such restrictions should only be implemented in circumstances of extreme gravity and should be limited in time and scope to what is strictly required to meet the specific emergency situation. [28]

Equality and non-discrimination

79. The consequences of the pandemic increase the risk of eliminating decades of progress on equality for women and men in the world of work. In this year's Addendum to the 2020 General Survey on promoting employment and decent work in a changing landscape, the Committee observes that the

[26] ILO Global Wage Report, 2020-21, 18–19.

[27] Article 4 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR).

[28] ILO, Key provisions of international labour standards relevant to the evolving COVID-19 outbreak, May 2020, 29–30.

pandemic has affected women and men differently, as working from home may impose a double burden on workers with family responsibilities, particularly on women, due to their unpaid care work. [29]

80. Women are over-represented in the health and social sector and have undoubtedly been more affected by job losses, including the loss of social security protection. The Committee highlights the need to develop policy responses that are both effective and inclusive, to promote and realize equality of opportunity and treatment for both women and men. [30]

81. As noted above, the context of the pandemic has also had a disproportionate impact on groups in vulnerable situations and highlighted that leaving no one behind is even more essential during a time of crisis. In emerging from the crisis and regenerating the world of work, it is imperative that progress is achieved in an inclusive manner.

82. Noting reports of a sharp increase in the incidence of violence and harassment as a result of the pandemic, the Committee welcomes the entry into force of the Violence and Harassment Convention, 2019 (No. 190). It hopes that legal and policy responses to the COVID-19 pandemic at all levels of the economy, adopted in consultation with the social partners and other stakeholders, will mainstream measures to promote and ensure equality and non-discrimination in employment and occupation and freedom from violence and harassment in the world of work.

Labour inspection

83. The Committee notes that a sharp decrease in the number of inspections has been reported as a result of the pandemic. Nevertheless, labour inspectorates continue to play an important role in national responses to COVID-19, by monitoring compliance with protective measures aimed at reducing transmission of the virus among employees; providing guidance to workers and employers; and creating hotlines for workers, trade unions, and the public to report concerns about workplace practices. The public health crisis is leading many inspectorates to redefine their regular priorities, in the process developing new operational procedures and making greater use of technology to continue functioning. Further, many have adopted important protective measures to ensure the safety and health of labour inspectors.

84. In a number of jurisdictions, the pandemic is resulting in a substantial reduction in inspection visits to workplaces. Most labour inspectorates have scaled back on planned activities due to the need to protect the safety and health of inspectors even though this is a time when their advisory and enforcement role is more needed than ever. However, the Committee emphasizes that moratoria imposed on labour inspections in certain cases or the exemption of certain types of enterprises from labour inspections are extremely disconcerting and risk undermining the rule of law. Going forward, inspection systems may be adversely affected by budgetary reductions linked to decreased public spending. The Committee recalls in this respect the important framework provided by ILO labour inspection Conventions Nos 81 and 129 for ensuring that labour inspectorates have an adequate number of staff, with appropriate conditions for hiring, training and service, with the necessary resources to perform their functions. It calls for the necessary resources, including personal protective equipment, to be made available to enable the labour inspectorate to accomplish its fundamental role in the governance of the labour market, including in the informal economy.

Wages

85. According to a recent ILO report, in the near future, the economic and employment consequences of the COVID-19 crisis are likely to exert massive downward pressure on workers' wages. Adequate and balanced wage policies, arrived at through strong and inclusive social dialogue, are needed to mitigate the impact of the crisis and support economic recovery. In planning for a new and better "normal" after the crisis, adequate minimum wages – statutory or negotiated – could help to ensure more social justice and less inequality. [31] In this context, the Committee wishes to reiterate the critical importance of those international labour standards that seek to ensure decent minimum wage levels and the protection of wages, particularly the Minimum Wage Fixing Convention, 1970 (No. 131), the Protection of Wages Convention, 1949 (No. 95), and the Protection of Workers' Claims (Employer's Insolvency) Convention, 1992 (No. 173). The Committee trusts that the crisis responses adopted or envisaged by governments in the field of income security will be fully consonant with the principles underlying these Conventions.

Working time

86. In this year's Addendum to the 2020 General Survey, the Committee observes the exponential increase in recourse to telework, platform work, home work, shift work and similar working modalities as

[29] 2021 Addendum to the 2020 General Survey on promoting employment and decent work in a changing landscape, para. 169.

[31] ILO Global Wage Report, 2020-21, 18–19.

measures to prevent the spread of the COVID-19 pandemic. Noting the range of challenges posed by telework, the Committee suggests in its conclusions that, to ensure that telework as a work modality meets the needs of both enterprises and workers and at the same time provides adequate protections and safeguards, the ILO constituents may wish to engage in further reflection to consider how best to address issues related to telework, such as working time and the right to disconnect from work, the allocation of rights and responsibilities with respect to the costs of teleworking, occupational safety and health requirements and privacy rights, among others. [32]

Frontline workers

87. Many frontline workers in healthcare and key workers ensuring continuity of functions critical to economic and national security (such as seafarers and other transport workers, rural workers, food supply workers or law enforcement workers) have continued to provide essential public goods during the pandemic. The Committee refers to the general observations made in its 2021 report on Convention No. 122, Convention No. 182 and the Maritime Labour Convention, 2006, as amended, as well as the 2021 Addendum to the 2020 General Survey on promoting employment and decent work in a changing landscape. It emphasizes the need to ensure that these categories of workers benefit from the full legal protection to which they are entitled under international law. [33]

Indigenous peoples

88. While recognizing the gravity of the impact of the pandemic on the population as a whole, and the efforts made by governments to address the resulting crisis, the Committee considers that the special vulnerability and socio-economic conditions faced by indigenous peoples should be taken into consideration.

89. While indigenous peoples have a high rate of participation in employment, they are more likely to be in the informal economy and the quality of their employment is often reflected by poor working conditions, low pay and discrimination. They are nearly three times more likely to be in extreme poverty compared to their non-indigenous counterparts. [34] Furthermore, they still experience barriers in accessing safe water, proper sanitation as well as public health systems and social protection programmes.

90. The Committee is concerned that these pre-existing barriers have contributed to indigenous and tribal communities being disproportionately affected by the health and socio-economic effects of the crisis [35] and this may lead to deepening the marginalization of members of these communities. The Committee considers that the vulnerable situation confronting indigenous peoples needs to be addressed as a matter of urgency. The Committee acknowledges that some countries have taken into consideration the specific and at the same time diverse realities of indigenous and tribal communities in their response to the COVID crisis. [36] It recalls that the full implementation of the rights recognized in the Indigenous and Tribal Peoples Convention, 1989 (No. 169), should guide governmental action in its response to the crisis. Indeed, Convention No. 169 provides the framework for the adoption of an inclusive approach that leaves no one behind. This includes ensuring, inter alia, that indigenous and tribal peoples are consulted when legislative or administrative measures may affect them; that their right to land and access to natural resources is fully recognized; that their cultural identity, customs and tradition are respected; that health services are effectively made available to them; and that they have access to information in their own indigenous language. In light of these considerations, the Committee calls on governments to strive to ensure that indigenous peoples benefit from effective and culturally appropriate protection against the COVID-19 pandemic and its consequences.

[32] 2021 Addendum to the 2020 General Survey on Promoting Employment and Decent Work in a Changing Landscape, Part IV, para. 299. In its 2018 General Survey, the Committee also observed that while telework and the platform economy may offer certain flexibility to workers, these working arrangements may also bring a number of disadvantages for workers, including encroachment on non-working time and rest periods, the unpredictability of working hours, income insecurity and stress associated with the (perceived) need to always be available for, or connected to, work and lost labour protections if they are classified as independent contractors. These stressors can have significant impacts on workers' well-being, including on their mental health, which may be compounded during the current period of global uncertainty arising from the pandemic and its aftermath. ILC Report III(Part B): General Survey concerning working-time instruments – Ensuring decent working time for the future, para. 758.

[33] The Committee also recalls in this regard the Domestic Workers Convention, 2011 (No. 189), the Home Work Convention, 1996 (No. 177), and the Nursing Personnel Convention, 1977 (No. 149).

Concluding remarks

91. The Committee would appreciate receiving information regarding the measures adopted by governments to meet the above obligations.

II. Compliance with standards-related obligations

A. Reports on ratified Conventions (articles 22 and 35 of the Constitution)

92. The Committee's principal task consists of the examination of the reports supplied by governments on Conventions that have been ratified by Member States (article 22 of the Constitution) and that have been declared applicable to non-metropolitan territories (article 35 of the Constitution).

Reporting arrangements

93. In accordance with the decision taken by the Governing Body at its 258th Session (November 1993), the reports due on ratified Conventions should be sent to the Office between 1 June and 1 September of each year. Due to the special circumstances prevailing this year, the Governing Body decided to exceptionally modify this deadline and invited Member States to send their reports from 15 September to 1 October 2020. [37]

94. The Committee recalls that detailed reports should be sent in the case of first reports (a first report is due after ratification) or when specifically requested by the Committee of Experts or the Conference Committee. Simplified reports are then requested on a regular basis. [38] The Committee also recalls that, at its 306th Session (November 2009), the Governing Body decided to increase from two to three years the regular reporting cycle for the fundamental and governance Conventions. At its 334th Session (October–November 2018) the Governing Body decided to increase the reporting cycle from five to six years for all other Conventions.

95. In addition, reports may be requested by the Committee outside of the regular reporting cycle. [39] Reports may also be expressly requested outside of the regular reporting cycle by the Conference Committee or the Governing Body. At each session, the Committee also has to examine reports requested in cases where a government had failed to send a report due for the previous period or to reply to the Committee's previous comments.

[37] Governing Body 338th Session (March 2020). Decision concerning Member States reporting obligations and the work of the CEACR and the Committee on the Application of Standards as a result of the deferral of the 109th Session of the International Labour Conference to 2021, Institutional Section Record of decisions.

[38] In 1993, a distinction was made between detailed and simplified reports. As explained in the report forms, in the case of simplified reports, information need normally be given only on the following points: (a) any new legislative or other measures affecting the application of the Convention; (b) replies to the questions in the report form on the practical application of the Convention (for example, statistics, results of inspections, judicial or administrative decisions) and on the communication of copies of the report to the representative organizations of employers and workers and on any observations received from these organizations; and (c) replies to comments by the supervisory bodies. At its 334th Session, the Governing Body adopted a new report form to facilitate reporting by governments when they are expected to provide simplified reports (document GB.334/INS/5).

[39] General Report, para. 123 et seq.

Compliance with reporting obligations

96. This year a total of 2,004 reports (1,796 reports under article 22 of the Constitution and 208 reports under article 35 of the Constitution) were requested from governments on the application of Conventions ratified by Member States, compared to 2,007 reports last year. At the end of the present session of the Committee, 859 reports were received by the Office corresponding to 42.9 per cent of the reports requested. [40] Last year, the Office received a total of 1,419 reports, representing 70.7 per cent. The Committee notes in particular that 5 of the 20 first reports due on the application of ratified Conventions were received by the time the Committee's session ended (last year, 45 of the 70 first reports due had been received).

97. The Committee observes that that there was a sharp decrease in the number of reports received by the deadline of 1 October this year in relation to previous years (531 reports representing 26.5 per cent of reports received, compared with 39.6 per cent at its previous session). This has been a challenging year for many governments resulting in a limited capacity to report. While noting the complexity of the situation prevailing across the world, the Committee recalls that the ILO Constitution does not provide for any circumstances in which the obligation to report under articles 19, 22 and 35 may be suspended.

98. The Committee would like to express its appreciation to the governments which made special efforts to ensure compliance with their reporting obligations in the midst of the pandemic and invites all Member States to make every effort to send the reports due under articles 19, 22 and 35 of the ILO Constitution including by seeking available ILO technical assistance to help them comply with their constitutional obligations.

99. The Committee recalls that at its previous session it decided to identify more clearly article 22 reports received after the deadline, the examination of which might be deferred due to their late arrival. This year, 322 out of 2,004 reports due (16.1 per cent) were received after this deadline.

100. As a general matter, the Committee wishes to recall that late submission of reports disturbs the sound operation of the supervisory mechanism as the examination of some of these reports in subsequent Committee sessions prevents the experts from fully focusing on the specific thematic areas due for discussion each year and also prevents governments and the social partners from obtaining timely feedback on their reports. The Committee is therefore bound to reiterate its request that Member States make a particular effort to ensure that their reports are submitted on time and in time next year and that they contain all the information requested so as to allow a complete examination by the Committee. It urges in particular those Member States who have received Office assistance in this regard, to make special efforts to ensure timely submission.

101. When examining the failure by Member States to respect their reporting obligations, the Committee adopts "general" comments (contained at the beginning of Part II (section I) of this report). It makes general observations when none of the reports due have been sent for two or more years; or when a first report has not been sent for two or more years. It makes a general direct request when, in the current year, a country has not sent the reports due, or the majority of reports due; or it has not sent a first report due.

102. None of the reports due have been sent for the past two or more years from the following 16 countries: Belize, Congo, Djibouti, Dominica, Equatorial Guinea, Grenada, Guyana, Lebanon, Madagascar, Netherlands: Aruba, Netherlands: Sint Maarten, Nigeria, Saint Kitts and Nevis, Saint Lucia, Sao Tome and Principe, United Republic of Tanzania – Tanganyika and Vanuatu. The Committee urges the Governments concerned to make every effort to supply the reports requested on ratified Conventions.

103. In particular, the Committee draws the attention of the following Governments to the fact that if the reports are not received in time for examination by the Committee at its next session, it may proceed to examine the application of the Conventions concerned on the basis of public information at its disposal: Dominica, Equatorial Guinea, Grenada and Saint Lucia.

104. Twelve countries have failed to supply a first report for two or more years:

[40] Appendix I to this Report provides an indication by country of whether the reports requested (under articles 22 and 35 of the Constitution) have been registered or not by the end of the meeting of the Committee. Appendix II shows, for the reports requested under article 22 of the Constitution, for each year since 1932, the number and percentage of reports received by the prescribed date, by the date of the meeting of the Committee of Experts and by the date of the session of the International Labour Conference.

| United Republic of Tanzania | – Since 2019: Convention No. 185 |

105. The Committee urges the governments concerned to make a special effort to supply the first reports due.

106. In particular, the Committee draws the attention of the following Governments to the fact that if the first report is not received in time for examination by the Committee at its next session, it may proceed to examine the application of the Convention in the countries concerned on the basis of public information at its disposal: Congo, Equatorial Guinea, Gabon, Maldives and Romania.

107. The Committee, like the Conference Committee, emphasizes the particular importance of first reports, which provide the basis on which the Committee makes its initial assessment of the application of the specific Conventions concerned. The Committee is aware that, where no reports have been sent for some time, it is likely that administrative or other problems are at the origin of the difficulties encountered by governments in fulfilling their constitutional obligations. This year, the COVID-19 pandemic has been an additional factor aggravating such difficulties. [41] The Committee would like to express its appreciation to the governments which submitted five first reports this year. It recalls the importance for governments to request assistance from the Office, and for such assistance to be provided rapidly, for the preparation of first reports.

108. This year all countries provided information concerning communication of reports to workers' and employers' organizations in all or the majority of their reports. The Committee recalls that, in accordance with the tripartite nature of the ILO, compliance with this constitutional obligation is intended to enable representative organizations of employers and workers to participate fully in supervision of the application of international labour standards. [42] If a government fails to comply with this obligation, these organizations are denied their opportunity to comment and an essential element of tripartism is lost. In the context of COVID-19, participation by employers' and workers' organizations in the supervision of international labour standards is even more important than in regular times. The Committee calls on all Member States to continue to discharge their obligation under article 23, paragraph 2, of the Constitution.

Replies to the comments of the Committee

109. Governments are requested to reply in their reports to the observations and direct requests made by the Committee. This year, they were asked moreover to provide supplementary information to last year's reports, taking into account developments which may have taken place in the meantime.

[41] In certain exceptional cases, the absence of reports is a result of more general difficulties related to the national situation, which prevents the provision of any technical assistance by the Office.

[42] General Report, para. 140 et seq.

110. This year, no information has been received as regards all or most of the observations and direct requests of the Committee to which a reply was requested for the following countries: Afghanistan, Antigua and Barbuda, Bangladesh, Barbados, Belize, Plurinational State of Bolivia, Chad, Congo, Djibouti, Dominica, Equatorial Guinea, Gabon, Grenada, Guinea-Bissau, Guyana, Haiti, India, Iraq, Kiribati, Kyrgyzstan, Lebanon, Liberia, Madagascar, Malawi, Maldives, Mauritius, Montenegro, Mozambique, Netherlands (Aruba and Sint Maarten), Nigeria, Papua New Guinea, Russian Federation, Rwanda, Saint Kitts and Nevis, Saint Lucia, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Sao Tome and Principe, Seychelles, Sierra Leone, South Sudan, Syrian Arab Republic, United Republic of Tanzania (Tanganyika), Tuvalu, Ukraine, Uganda, Vanuatu and Zambia.

111. The Committee notes with concern that the number of comments to which replies have not been received remains significantly high. The Committee underlines that the value attached by ILO constituents to the dialogue with the supervisory bodies on the application of ratified Conventions is considerably diminished by the failure of governments to fulfil their obligations in this respect. The Committee urges the countries concerned to provide all the information requested and recalls that they may avail themselves of the technical assistance of the Office in this regard.

Follow-up to cases of serious failure by Member States to fulfil reporting obligations mentioned in the report of the Committee on the Application of Standards

112. As the functioning of the supervisory system is based primarily on the information provided by governments in their reports, both the Committee and the Conference Committee considered that failure by Member States to fulfil their obligations in this respect has to be given the same level of attention as non-compliance relating to the application of ratified Conventions. The two Committees have therefore decided to strengthen, with the assistance of the Office, the follow-up given to these cases of failure. Due to the deferral of the 109th Session of the Conference, a discussion on the information contained in the Committee's 2020 report on this matter will take place at the next session of the Conference in June 2021.

113. The Committee accordingly reiterates paragraph 61 of its 2020 report according to which pursuant to the discussions of the Conference Committee in June 2019 and technical assistance provided by the Office, [43] seven out of 14 first reports on which urgent appeals were issued have been received. [44]

114. The Committee welcomes the fruitful collaboration that it maintains with the Conference Committee on this matter of mutual interest which is essential to the proper discharge of their respective tasks. It asks the Office to maintain the sustained technical assistance that it has been providing to Member States in this respect.

B. Examination by the Committee of Experts of reports on ratified Conventions

115. In examining the reports received on ratified Conventions and Conventions declared applicable to non-metropolitan territories, in accordance with its practice, the Committee assigned to each of its members the initial responsibility for a group of Conventions. The members submit their preliminary conclusions on the instruments for which they are responsible to the Committee in plenary sitting for discussion and approval. Decisions on comments are adopted by consensus.

116. The Committee wishes to inform Member States that it examined all reports that were brought to its attention.

Observations and direct requests

117. First of all, the Committee considers that it is worthy of note that in 81 cases it has found, following examination of the corresponding reports, that no further comment was called for regarding the manner in which a ratified Convention had been implemented. In other cases, however, the Committee has found it necessary to draw the attention of the governments concerned to the need to take further action to give effect to certain provisions of Conventions or to supply additional information on given points. As in previous years, its comments have been drawn up in the form of either "observations", which are reproduced in the report of the Committee, or "direct requests", which are not published in the Committee's report, but are communicated directly to the governments concerned and are available online. [45] Observations are generally used in more serious or long-standing cases of failure to fulfil obligations. They point to important discrepancies between the obligations under a Convention and the related law and/or practice of Member States. They may address the absence of measures to give effect to a Convention or to take appropriate action following the Committee's requests. They may also highlight progress, as appropriate. Direct requests allow the Committee to be engaged in a continuing dialogue with governments often when the questions raised are primarily of a technical nature. They can also be used for the clarification of certain points when the information available does not enable a full appreciation of the extent to which the obligations are fulfilled. Direct requests are also used to examine the first reports supplied by governments on the application of Conventions.

118. This year the Committee made 556 observations and 1,110 direct requests. The Committee's observations appear in Part II of this report, together with, for each subject, a list of direct requests. An index of all observations and direct requests, classified by country, is provided in Appendix VII to the report.

119. In addition, the Committee made three general observations on the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122), the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182), and the Maritime Labour Convention, 2006, as amended (MLC, 2006).

Follow-up to the conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards

120. The Committee examines the follow-up to the conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards as this information forms an integral part of the Committee's dialogue with the governments concerned. This year, the Committee has examined the follow-up to the conclusions adopted by the Committee on the Application of Standards during the last session of the International Labour Conference (108th Session, June 2019) in the following cases:

Follow-up of representations under article 24 of the Constitution and complaints under article 26 of the Constitution

121. In accordance with the established practice, the Committee also examines the measures taken by governments pursuant to the recommendations of tripartite committees (set up to examine representations under article 24 of the Constitution) and commissions of inquiry (set up to examine complaints under article 26 of the Constitution). The corresponding information forms an integral part of the Committee's dialogue with the governments concerned. The Committee considers it useful to indicate more clearly the cases in which it follows up on the effect given to the recommendations made under these constitutional supervisory procedures, as indicated in the following tables.

Special notes

123. As in the past, the Committee has indicated by special notes (traditionally known as "footnotes") at the end of its comments the cases in which, because of the nature of the problems encountered in the application of the Conventions concerned, it has deemed appropriate to ask the government to supply a report earlier than would otherwise have been the case and, in some instances, to supply full particulars to the Conference at its next session in June 2021.

124. In order to identify cases for which it inserts special notes, the Committee uses the basic criteria described below, while taking into account the following general considerations. First, the criteria are indicative. In exercising its discretion in the application of the criteria, the Committee may also have regard to the specific circumstances of the country and the length of the reporting cycle. Second, the criteria are applicable to cases in which an earlier report is requested, often referred to as a "single footnote", as well as to cases in which the government is requested to provide detailed information to the Conference, often referred to as a "double footnote". The difference between these two categories is one of degree. Third, a serious case otherwise justifying a special note to provide full particulars to the Conference (double footnote) might only be given a special note to provide an early report (single footnote) when there has been a recent discussion of the case in the Conference Committee. Finally, the Committee wishes to point out that it exercises restraint in its recourse to "double footnotes" in deference to the Conference Committee's decisions as to the cases it wishes to discuss.

125. The criteria to which the Committee has regard are the following:

– the seriousness of the problem; in this respect, the Committee emphasizes that an important consideration is the necessity to view the problem in the context of a particular Convention and to take into account matters involving fundamental rights, workers' health, safety and well-being, as well as any adverse impact, including at the international level, on workers and other categories of protected persons;

– the persistence of the problem;

– the urgency of the situation; the evaluation of such urgency is necessarily case specific, according to standard human rights criteria, such as life threatening situations or problems where irreversible harm is foreseeable; and

– the quality and scope of the government's response in its reports or the absence of response to the issues raised by the Committee, including cases of clear and repeated refusal on the part of a State to comply with its obligations.

126. In addition, the Committee wishes to emphasize that its decision not to double footnote a case which it has previously drawn to the attention of the Conference Committee in no way implies that it has considered progress to have been made therein.

127. At its 76th Session (November–December 2005), the Committee decided that the identification of cases in respect of which a government is requested to provide detailed information to the Conference would be a two-stage process: first, the expert initially responsible for a particular group of Conventions recommends to the Committee the insertion of special notes; second, in light of all the recommendations made, the Committee will, after discussion, take a final, collegial decision once it has reviewed the application of all the Conventions.

128. This year, the Committee has requested governments to supply full particulars to the Conference at its next session in 2021 in the following cases:

Cases of progress

130. Following its examination of the reports supplied by governments, and in accordance with its standard practice, the Committee refers in its comments to cases in which it expresses its satisfaction or interest at the progress achieved in the application of the respective Conventions.

131. At its 80th and 82nd Sessions (2009 and 2011), the Committee made the following clarifications on the general approach developed over the years for the identification of cases of progress:

(1) The expression by the Committee of interest or satisfaction does not mean that it considers that the country in question is in general conformity with the Convention, and in the same comment the Committee may express its satisfaction or interest at a specific issue while also expressing regret concerning other important matters which, in its view, have not been addressed in a satisfactory manner.

(2) The Committee wishes to emphasize that an indication of progress is limited to a specific issue related to the application of the Convention and the nature of the measures adopted by the government concerned.

(3) The Committee exercises its discretion in noting progress, taking into account the particular nature of the Convention and the specific circumstances of the country.

(4) The expression of progress can refer to different kinds of measures relating to national legislation, policy or practice.

(5) If the satisfaction relates to the adoption of legislation, the Committee may also consider appropriate follow-up measures for its practical application.

(6) In identifying cases of progress, the Committee takes into account both the information provided by governments in their reports and the comments of employers' and workers' organizations.

132. Since first identifying cases of satisfaction in its report in 1964, [46] the Committee has continued to follow the same general criteria. The Committee expresses satisfaction in cases in which, following comments it has made on a specific issue, governments have taken measures through either the adoption of new legislation, an amendment to the existing legislation or a significant change in the national policy or practice, thus achieving fuller compliance with their obligations under the respective Conventions. In expressing its satisfaction, the Committee indicates to governments and the social partners that it considers the specific matter resolved. The reason for identifying cases of satisfaction is twofold:

– to place on record the Committee's appreciation of the positive action taken by governments in response to its comments; and – to provide an example to other governments and social partners which have to address similar issues.

133. Details concerning these cases of progress are found in Part II of this report and cover 24 instances in which measures of this kind have been taken in 22 countries. The full list is as follows:

[46] Report of the Committee of Experts submitted to the 48th Session (1964) of the International Labour Conference, para. 16.

134. Thus the total number of cases in which the Committee has been led to express its satisfaction at the progress achieved following its comments has risen to 3,133 since the Committee began listing them in its report.

135. Within cases of progress, the distinction between cases of satisfaction and cases of interest was formalized in 1979. [47] In general, cases of interest cover measures that are sufficiently advanced to justify the expectation that further progress would be achieved in the future and regarding which the Committee would want to continue its dialogue with the government and the social partners. The Committee's practice has developed to such an extent that cases in which it expresses interest may encompass a variety of measures. The paramount consideration is that the measures contribute to the overall achievement of the objectives of a particular Convention. This may include:

- draft legislation that is before parliament, or other proposed legislative changes forwarded or available to the Committee;
- consultations within the government and with the social partners;
- new policies;
- the development and implementation of activities within the framework of a technical cooperation project or following technical assistance or advice from the Office;

[47] Report of the Committee of Experts submitted to the 65th Session (1979) of the International Labour Conference, para. 122.

– judicial decisions, according to the level of the court, the subject matter and the force of such decisions in a particular legal system, would normally be considered as cases of interest unless there is a compelling reason to note a particular judicial decision as a case of satisfaction; or
– the Committee may also note as cases of interest the progress made by a state, province or territory in the framework of a federal system.

136. Details concerning the cases in question are found either in Part II of this report or in the requests addressed directly to the governments concerned, and include 163 instances in which measures of this kind have been adopted in 79 countries. The full list is as follows:

Practical application

137. As part of its assessment of the application of Conventions in practice, the Committee notes the information contained in governments' reports, such as information relating to judicial decisions, statistics and labour inspection. The supply of this information is requested in almost all report forms, as well as under the specific terms of some Conventions. The Committee found information of this nature to be particularly useful this year in illustrating the impact of the COVID-19 pandemic on the world of work and the corresponding measures taken by governments as a response.

138. The Committee notes that approximately a quarter of the reports received this year contain supplementary information on the practical application of Conventions including information on national jurisprudence, statistics and labour inspection.

139. In the context of the COVID-19 pandemic such information is indispensable to complete the examination of national legislation and to help the Committee identify the issues arising from real problems of application in practice. The Committee wishes to emphasize to governments the importance of submitting such information and also encourage employers' and workers' organizations to submit clear and up-to-date information on the application of Conventions in practice.

Observations made by employers' and workers' organizations

140. At each session, the Committee recalls that the contribution by employers' and workers' organizations is essential for the Committee's evaluation of the application of Conventions in national law and in practice. Member States have an obligation under article 23, paragraph 2, of the Constitution to communicate to the representative employers' and workers' organizations copies of the reports supplied under articles 19 and 22 of the Constitution. Compliance with this constitutional obligation is intended to enable organizations of employers and workers to participate fully in the supervision of the application of international labour standards. In some cases, governments transmit the observations made by employers' and workers' organizations with their reports, sometimes adding their own comments. However, in the majority of cases, observations from employers' and workers' organizations are sent directly to the Office which, in accordance with the established practice, transmits them to the governments concerned for comment, so as to ensure respect for due process. For reasons of transparency, the record of all observations received from employers' and workers' organizations on the application of ratified Conventions since the last session of the Committee is included as Appendix III to its report. Where the Committee finds that the observations are not within the scope of the Convention or do not contain information that would add value to its examination of the application of the Convention, it will not refer to them in its comments. Otherwise, the observations received from employers' and workers' organizations may be considered in an observation or in a direct request, as appropriate.

In a reporting year

141. At its 86th Session (2015), the Committee made the following clarifications on the general approach developed over the years for the treatment of observations from employers' and workers' organizations. The Committee recalled that, in a reporting year, when observations from employers' and workers' organizations are not provided with the government's report, they should be received by the Office by 1 September at the latest, so as to allow the government concerned to have a reasonable time to respond, thereby enabling the Committee to examine, as appropriate, the issues raised at its session the same year. When observations are received after 1 September, they would not be examined in substance in the absence of a reply from the government, except in exceptional cases. Over the years, the Committee has identified exceptional cases as those where the allegations are sufficiently substantiated and there is an urgent need to address the situation, whether because they refer to matters of life and death or to fundamental human rights or because any delay may cause irreparable harm. In addition, observations referring to legislative proposals or draft laws may also be examined by the Committee in the absence of a reply from the government, where this may be of assistance for the country at the drafting stage.

Outside of a reporting year

142. At its 88th Session (2017), following its consideration of the Governing Body's review of the reporting cycle for technical Conventions from five to six years, the Committee indicated its willingness to consider the manner in which it might broaden the very strict criteria for breaking its cycle of review when receiving comments from workers' or employers' organizations on a specific country under article 23, paragraph 2, of the ILO Constitution and decided that inspiration in this regard could be drawn from those criteria used for "footnoting" cases and set out in paragraph 73 of that year's General Report.

143. In light of the November 2018 Governing Body decision (GB.334/INS/5) expanding the reporting cycle for technical Conventions from five to six years and expressing its understanding that the Committee would further review, clarify and, where appropriate, broaden the criteria for breaking the reporting cycle with respect to technical Conventions, the Committee proceeded with the review of the criteria mentioned above at its 89th Session (2018).

144. The Committee recalls that, in a non-reporting year, when employers' and workers' organizations send observations which simply repeat comments made in previous years, or refer to matters already raised by the Committee, such comments will be examined in the year when the government's report is due, in accordance with the regular reporting cycle. In this case, a report will not be requested from the government outside of that cycle.

145. Where the observations on a technical Convention meet the criteria set out in paragraph below, the Committee will request the office to issue a notification to governments that the article 23 observations received will be examined at its subsequent session with or without a response from the government. This would ensure that governments have sufficient notice while ensuring that the examination of matters of importance are not further delayed.

146. The Committee would thus review the application of a technical Convention outside of a reporting year following observations submitted by employers' and workers' organizations having due regard to the following elements:

– the seriousness of the problem and its adverse impact on the application of the Convention;

– the persistence of the problem; and – the relevance and scope of the government's response in its reports or the absence of response to the issues raised by the Committee, including cases of clear and repeated refusal on the part of a State to comply with its obligations.

147. With respect to any Convention (fundamental, governance or technical), recalling its well-established practice, the Committee will examine employers' and workers' observations in a non-reporting year in the year received in the exceptional cases set out in paragraph above, even in the absence of a reply from the government concerned.

148. The Committee emphasized that the procedure set out in the paragraphs above aims at giving effect to decisions taken by the Governing Body which have extended the reporting cycle and called for safeguards in that context, to ensure that effective supervision of the application of ratified Conventions is maintained. One of these safeguards consists in giving due recognition to the possibility afforded to employers' and workers' organizations to draw the attention of the Committee to matters of particular concern arising from the application of ratified Conventions, even in a year when no report is due. The approach above also pays particular attention to the importance of providing due notice to governments, except in exceptional circumstances, and in all cases the Committee will indicate its reasons for breaking the cycle.

149. The Committee notes that since its last session, it has received 757 observations (compared to 915 last year), 230 of which (compared to 297 last year) were communicated by employers' organizations and 527 (compared to 618 last year) by workers' organizations. The great majority of the observations received (695 compared to 721 last year) related to the application of ratified Conventions; [48] 243 of these observations (compared to 349 last year) concerned the application of fundamental Conventions, 75 (compared to 148 last year) related to governance Conventions and 377 (compared to 252 last year) concerned the application of other Conventions. Moreover, 62 observations were received in addition to the 194 received last year in relation to the 2020 General Survey on Promoting Employment and Decent Work in a Changing Landscape. The Committee notes that, 589 of the observations received this year on the application of ratified Conventions were transmitted directly to the Office. In 106 cases, the governments transmitted the observations made by employers' and workers' organizations with their reports. The Committee notes that in general the employers' and workers' organizations concerned endeavoured to gather and present information on the application of ratified Conventions in specific countries, both in law and in practice. The Committee recalls that observations of a general nature relating to certain Conventions are more appropriately addressed within the framework of the Committee's consideration of General Surveys or within other forums of the ILO.

Cases in which the need for technical assistance has been highlighted

150. The combination of the work of the supervisory bodies and the practical guidance given to Member States through development cooperation and technical assistance has always been one of the key dimensions of the ILO supervisory system.

151. The Committee notes that the Office reacted swiftly to the COVID-19 pandemic by providing much needed technical assistance for labour law reforms aimed at addressing the immediate impact of the pandemic and by supporting social dialogue processes in this framework. The Office reallocated resources to addressing the COVID-19 pandemic with special emphasis placed on international labour standards and social dialogue. Moreover, comprehensive partnerships have been established with major donors in support of Member States facing serious reporting and application gaps in Africa, Asia and Latin America. These projects draw upon the guidance of the ILO supervisory bodies in order to strengthen national capacities to engage in trade relationships based on respect for fundamental principles and rights at work, which are now more important than ever for sustainable recovery.

152. The Committee welcomes information according to which the ILO International Training Centre in Turin has swiftly reacted to the pandemic by converting its capacity-building programs and notably the International Labour Standards Academy into online courses to be delivered virtually. It also welcomes the new regional focus of the Academy which this year brought together close to 160 participants from Africa representing the ILO constituents, judges, law professors and other legal professionals and the media from across the continent. The Committee notes the ILS Academy's important contribution to building the reporting capacities of governments, employers' and workers' organizations including in countries facing serious weaknesses in this field.

153. In addition to cases of serious failure by Member States to fulfil certain specific obligations related to reporting, the cases for which, in the Committee's view, technical assistance from the Office would be particularly useful in helping Member States to address gaps in law and in practice in the [48] Appendix III to this Report.

C. Reports under article 19 of the Constitution

154. The Committee recalls that the Governing Body decided that the subjects of General Surveys should be aligned with those of the annual recurrent discussions in the Conference under the follow-up to the ILO Declaration on Social Justice for a Fair Globalization, 2008. This year, governments were requested to supply additional information to the reports submitted last year under article 19 of the Constitution as a basis for the General Survey on the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122), the Vocational Rehabilitation and Employment (Disabled Persons) Convention, 1983 (No. 159), the Home Work Convention, 1996 (No. 177), the Vocational Rehabilitation and Employment (Disabled Persons) Recommendation, 1983 (No. 168), the Employment Policy (Supplementary Provisions) Recommendation, 1984 (No. 169), the Home Work Recommendation, 1996 (No. 184), the Employment Relationship Recommendation, 2006 (No. 198), and the Transition from the Informal to the Formal Economy Recommendation, 2015 (No. 204). [49] An Addendum to last year's general survey has been prepared on the basis of a preliminary examination by a working party comprising seven members of the Committee in accordance with the practice followed in previous years.

155. The Committee notes with regret that, for the past five years, none of the reports on unratified Conventions and on Recommendations requested under article 19 of the Constitution have been received from the following 21 countries: Belize, Chad, Congo, Dominica, Grenada, Guyana, Haiti, Liberia, Maldives, Marshall Islands, Papua New Guinea, Saint Lucia, Sao Tome and Principe, Sierra Leone, Solomon Islands, Somalia, South Sudan, Timor-Leste, Tonga, Tuvalu and Yemen.

156. The Committee once again urges governments to provide the reports requested so that its General Surveys can be as comprehensive as possible and provide a complete picture of developments relevant to the impact of COVID-19 in areas that are particularly affected by the pandemic.

D. Collaboration with the United Nations

157. The Committee welcomes the Statement by the President of the UN Human Rights Council, calling upon States to ensure that all human rights are respected, protected and fulfilled while combatting the pandemic and that their responses to the COVID-19 pandemic are in full compliance with their human rights obligations and commitments. [50] It commends the many recommendations of the mandate holders of the UN Human Rights Council on a broad range of human rights issues, such as the right to health, the right to housing, poverty, freedom of expression, racism and discrimination, the right to water, the situation of older persons, domestic violence, the consequences of the state of exception, emergency measures or specific groups, communities and populations. [50] UN General Assembly, Human Rights Council, Statement by the President, PRST 43/...Human rights implications of the COVID-19 pandemic, A/HRC/43/L.42 (2020).

[51] UN Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights, COVID-19 and special procedures.

158. The Committee takes note of the statement on COVID-19 and economic, social and cultural rights released by the Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (CESCR) on 6 April 2020 providing comprehensive guidance on the measures that States parties to the Covenant should take to address the pandemic, including with regard to the need to mitigate its impact on the most vulnerable and marginalized groups. [52] The Committee welcomes the particular emphasis placed on occupational safety and health in this statement. It also recalls the CESCR statement that "the right to health is closely related to and dependent upon the realization of other human rights, as contained in the International Bill of Rights, including the rights to food, housing, work, education, human dignity, life, non-discrimination, equality, the prohibition against torture, privacy, access to information, and the freedoms of association, assembly and movement". [53]

159. The Committee also takes note of General Comment No. 37 published on 29 July 2020 by the UN Human Rights Committee. The latter emphasizes the indivisibility of civil, political, social, economic and cultural rights by describing the fundamental human right of peaceful assembly as "a valuable tool that can and has been used to recognize and realize a wide range of other rights, including economic, social and cultural rights". [54] In the same vein, the Committee welcomes the statement made on 16 March 2020, by a group of UN human rights experts that "emergency declarations based on the COVID-19 outbreak should not be used as a basis to target particular groups, minorities, or individuals. It should not function as a cover for repressive action under the guise of protecting health … and should not be used simply to quash dissent". [55]

160. The Committee notes that the UN issued comprehensive guidance on the socio-economic response to the COVID-19 pandemic which features international labour standards among the international human rights norms and standards guiding the UN Development System, thereby acknowledging the central role that rights at work can play as part of the recovery and for building back better. [56]

161. The Committee emphasizes the indivisible nature of human rights and the importance of both civil and political as well as economic, social and cultural rights as guideposts for COVID-19 recovery. It also underlines the complementarity of the supervisory and monitoring body comments in this framework. It draws attention to SDG indicator 8.8.2 which is the only indicator in the 2030 Agenda to draw upon the comments of supervisory bodies of the ILO in assessing progress towards meeting the goal of national compliance with labour rights and especially freedom of association and collective bargaining. Cooperation across supervisory and monitoring bodies in the UN system is now more necessary than ever in order to prevent regression in the realization of the 2030 Agenda and the advancement of human rights including labour standards, making the latter an integral part of COVID-19 response packages.

162. The Committee reiterates its hope that international labour standards and the comments of the supervisory bodies will be increasingly integrated in United Nations Sustainable Development Cooperation Frameworks (UNSDCFs) and Decent Work Country Programmes (DWCPs) to help Member States ensure respect for labour rights as an integral part of human rights in the context of immediate and long-term responses to the COVID-19 pandemic.

E. Submission of instruments adopted by the Conference to the competent authorities (article 19, paragraphs 5, 6 and 7, of the Constitution)

163. In accordance with its terms of reference, the Committee this year examined the following information supplied by governments of Member States pursuant to article 19 of the Constitution of the Organisation:

[52] UN Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, Statement on the coronavirus disease (COVID-19) pandemic and economic, social and cultural rights, E/C.12/2020/1 (2000).

[53] UN Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, General comment No. 14: The right to the highest attainable standard of health (article 12 of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights), Twenty-second session, E/C.12/2000/4 (2000).

[54] UN International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, Human Rights Committee, General comment No. 37 (2020) on the right of peaceful assembly (article 21), CCPR/C/GC/37 (2020), para. 2.

[55] UN Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights, COVID-19: States should not abuse emergency measures to suppress human rights – UN experts.

[56] UN Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights, COVID-19 Guidance.

(a) information on measures taken to submit to the competent authorities the instruments adopted by the Conference from June 1970 (54th Session) to June 2019 (108th Session) (Conventions Nos 131 to 190, Recommendations Nos 135 to 206 and Protocols); and

(b) replies to the observations and direct requests made by the Committee at its 90th Session (November–December 2019).

164. Appendix IV of Part II of the report contains a summary of the most recent information received indicating the competent national authorities to which the Protocol of 2014 to the Forced Labour Convention, 1930, and the Forced Labour (Supplementary Measures) Recommendation, 2014 (No. 203), adopted by the Conference at its 103rd Session, the Transition from the Informal to the Formal Economy Recommendation, 2015 (No. 204), adopted by the Conference at its 104th Session, the Employment and Decent Work for Peace and Resilience Recommendation, 2017 (No. 205), adopted by the Conference at its 106th Session, as well as the Violence and Harassment Convention (No. 190), and the Violence and Harassment Recommendation, 2019 (No. 206), adopted at the 108th Session of the Conference, were submitted and the date of submission. In addition, Appendix IV summarizes the information supplied by governments with respect to the instruments adopted in earlier years and submitted to the competent authorities in 2020.

165. Additional statistical information is found in Appendices V and VI of Part II of the report. Appendix V, compiled based on information provided by governments, shows where each Member State stands in terms of its constitutional obligation of submission. Appendix VI shows the overall submission status of each instrument adopted since the 54th Session (June 1970) of the Conference. All instruments adopted prior to the 54th Session of the Conference have been submitted. The statistical data in Appendices V and VI are regularly updated by the competent units of the Office and can be accessed in NORMLEX.

103rd Session

166. At its 103rd Session in June 2014, the Conference adopted the Protocol of 2014 to the Forced Labour Convention, 1930, and the Forced Labour (Supplementary Measures) Recommendation, 2014 (No. 203). The Committee notes with interest that the Protocol of 2014 to the Forced Labour Convention, 1930, which entered into force on 9 November 2016, has been ratified by 46 Member States: Argentina, Austria, Belgium, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Canada, Cyprus, Czechia, Côte d'Ivoire, Denmark, Djibouti, Estonia, Finland, France, Germany, Iceland, Ireland, Israel, Jamaica, Kyrgyzstan, Latvia, Lesotho, Lithuania, Madagascar, Malawi, Mali, Malta, Mauritania, Mozambique, Namibia, Netherlands, New Zealand, Niger, Norway, Panama, Poland, Russian Federation, Spain, Sri Lanka, Suriname, Sweden, Switzerland, Tajikistan, Thailand, United Kingdom, Uzbekistan and Zimbabwe. The Committee encourages all governments to continue their efforts to submit the instruments adopted by the Conference at its 103rd Session to their legislatures and to report on any action taken with regard to these instruments.

104th Session

167. At its 104th Session in June 2015, the Conference adopted the Transition from the Informal to the Formal Economy Recommendation, 2015 (No. 204). The 12-month period for submission of Recommendation No. 204 to the competent authorities ended on 12 June 2016, and the 18-month period (in exceptional circumstances) on 12 December 2016. The Committee notes that 96 governments have provided information on the submission to the competent authorities of Recommendation No. 204. It refers in this regard to Appendix IV of Part II of the report, which contains a summary of information supplied by governments on submission, including with respect to Recommendation No. 204. The Committee encourages all governments to continue their efforts to submit Recommendation No. 204 to their legislatures and to report on any action taken with regard to this instrument.

105th and 106th Sessions

168. The Committee recalls that no instrument was adopted at the 105th Session of the Conference (May–June 2016). At its 106th Session in June 2017, the Conference adopted the Employment and Decent Work for Peace and Resilience Recommendation, 2017 (No. 205). The 12-month period for submission of Recommendation No. 205 to the competent authorities ended on 16 June 2018, and the 18-month period (in exceptional circumstances) ended on 16 December 2018. The Committee notes that 73 governments have provided information on the submission of Recommendation No. 205 to the competent national authorities. The Committee welcomes the information provided to date and encourages all governments to submit Recommendation No. 205 to their legislatures and to report on any action taken with regard to this instrument.

107th and 108th Sessions

169. The Committee recalls that no instrument was adopted at the 107th Session of the Conference (May–June 2018). At its 108th Session in June 2019, the Conference adopted the Violence and Harassment Convention, 2019 (No. 190) and the Violence and Harassment Recommendation, 2019 (No. 206). The 12-month period for submission of Recommendation No. 205 to the competent authorities ended on 21 June 2020, and the 18-month period (in exceptional circumstances) will end on 21 December 2020. The Committee notes that 31 governments, Azerbaijan, Barbados, Belgium, Cameroon, Canada, Denmark, Estonia, Fiji, Finland, Guatemala, Iceland, Indonesia, the Islamic Republic of Iran, Israel, Japan, Kiribati, Latvia, Luxembourg, Morocco, Myanmar, Niger, Poland, Senegal, Slovakia, Slovenia, Togo, Trinidad and Tobago, Turkey, the United States of America, Uruguay and Uzbekistan, have provided information on the submission of Convention No. 190 and Recommendation No. 206 to the competent national authorities. The Committee welcomes the information provided to date and encourages all governments to submit Convention No. 190 and Recommendation No. 206 to their legislatures and to report on any action taken with regard to this instrument.

Cases of progress

170. The Committee notes with interest the information provided by the Government of: Kiribati. It welcomes the efforts made by Kiribati in overcoming significant delays in submission and taking important steps toward fulfilling its constitutional obligation to submit to its legislature the instruments adopted by the Conference over a number of years.

Special problems

171. To facilitate the work of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards, this report only mentions those governments that have not submitted the instruments adopted by the Conference to their competent authorities for at least seven sessions. These special problems are referred to as cases of "serious failure to submit". This timeframe begins at the 99th Session (2010) and concludes at the 108th Session (2019), bearing in mind that the Conference did not adopt any Conventions or Recommendations during its 97th (2008), 98th (2009), 102nd (2013) and 107th (2018) Sessions. Thus, this timeframe was deemed long enough to warrant inviting the governments concerned to a special sitting of the Conference Committee so that they could account for delays in submission. In addition, the Committee is also providing information in its observations concerning cases of "failure to submit", in relation to governments that have not submitted to the competent authorities the instruments adopted at the last six sessions of the Conference.

172. The Committee notes that, at the closure of its 91st Session on 12 December 2019, the following 48 (38 in 2016, 31 in 2017, 39 in 2018 and 36 in 2019) Member States were in the category of "serious failure to submit": Albania, Bahamas, Bahrain, Belize, the Plurinational State of Bolivia, Brunei Darussalam, Chile, Comoros, Congo, Croatia, Democratic Republic of the Congo, Dominica, El Salvador, Equatorial Guinea, Eswatini, Fiji, Gabon, Gambia, Grenada, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Haiti, Hungary, Kazakhstan, Kuwait, Kyrgyzstan, Lebanon, Liberia, Libya, Malaysia, Malta, Marshall Islands, Pakistan, Papua New Guinea, Rwanda, Saint Kitts and Nevis, Saint Lucia, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Seychelles, Sierra Leone, Solomon Islands, Somalia, Syrian Arab Republic, Timor-Leste, Tuvalu, Vanuatu, Yemen and Zambia.

173. The Committee is aware of the exceptional circumstances that have affected some of these countries for years, as a result of which some of them have been deprived of the institutions needed to fulfil their obligation to submit instruments. At the 108th Session of the Conference (June 2019), some Government delegations supplied information explaining why their countries had been unable to meet the constitutional obligation to submit Conventions, Recommendations and Protocols to their national legislatures. Following the concerns raised by the Committee of Experts, the Conference Committee also expressed great concern at the failure to respect this obligation. It pointed out that compliance with this constitutional obligation, which means submitting the instruments adopted by the Conference to national legislatures, is of the utmost importance in ensuring the effectiveness of the Organization's standards-related activities.

174. The above-mentioned countries have been identified in observations published in this report, and the Conventions, Recommendations and Protocols that have not been submitted are indicated in the statistical appendices. The Committee considers it worthwhile to alert the governments concerned so as to enable them immediately, and as a matter of urgency, to take appropriate steps to bring themselves up to date and into compliance with this obligation. The Committee recalls that governments may benefit from the measures the Office is prepared to take, upon their request, to assist them in taking the steps required for the rapid submission to their legislature of the pending instruments.

Comments of the Committee and replies from governments

175. As in its previous reports, the Committee makes individual observations in section II of Part II of this report on the points that should be brought to the special attention of governments. In general, observations are made in cases where there has been no information for five or more sessions of the Conference. Furthermore, requests for additional information on other points have been addressed directly to a number of countries (see the list of direct requests at the end of section II).

176. As the Committee has already pointed out, it is important that governments send the information and documents required by the questionnaire appended to the Memorandum adopted by the Governing Body in March 2005. The Committee must receive for examination a summary or a copy of the documents submitting the instruments to the legislative bodies, an indication of the date of submission, and be informed of the proposals made as to the action to be taken on the instruments submitted. The obligation of submission is discharged only once the instruments adopted by the Conference have been submitted to the legislature and a decision has been taken on them. The Office must be informed of this decision, as well as of the submission of instruments to the legislature. The Committee hopes to continue to note cases of progress in this matter in its next report. It again reminds governments that they may seek technical assistance from the ILO, particularly through the standards specialists in the field.

177. Lastly, recalling all the challenges posed by operating in a time when a pandemic is raging, the Committee would like to express its profound appreciation for the invaluable assistance rendered to it by the officials of the Office, whose competence and devotion to duty make it possible for the Committee to accomplish its complex task in a limited period of time.

Part II. Observations concerning particular countries

I. Observations concerning reports on ratified Conventions (articles 22 and 35 of the Constitution)

Observations on serious failure to report

Belize

The Committee notes with concern, that for the second year, the reports due on ratified Conventions have not been received. Twenty-two reports are now due on fundamental, governance and technical Conventions, most of which should have included information in reply to the Committee's comments. The Committee hopes that the government will soon submit all its reports in accordance with its constitutional obligation and that they will respond to the Committee's comments. The Committee reminds the Government that it may avail itself of the technical assistance of the Office in this regard.

Congo

The Committee notes with deep concern that the first report on the Seafarers' Identity Documents Convention (Revised), 2003 (No. 185), as amended, due since 2015, the first report on the Maritime Labour Convention, 2006, as amended (MLC, 2006), due since 2016, and the report on the Work in Fishing Convention, 2007 (No. 188), due since 2018, have not been received. The Committee notes that, for the third year, the reports due on ratified Conventions have not been received. Fifteen reports are now due on fundamental, governance and technical Conventions, most of which should have included information in reply to the Committee's comments. The Committee launched last year an urgent appeal to the Government to send its first reports concerning Convention No. 185 and the MLC, 2006. The Committee decided to examine the application of these Conventions at this Session on the basis of available information.

Recalling that technical assistance was provided last year on these issues by the ILO Decent Work Team for Central Africa, the Committee firmly hopes that the Government will soon submit all its reports in accordance with its constitutional obligation and that they will respond to the Committee's comments.

Djibouti

The Committee notes with deep concern that, for the third year, the reports due on ratified Conventions have not been received. Twenty-two reports are now due for this country on fundamental, governance and technical Conventions, most of which should have included information in reply to the Committee's comments. The Committee firmly hopes that the Government will soon submit all its reports in accordance with its constitutional obligation and that they will respond to the Committee's comments. The Committee reminds the Government that it may avail itself of the technical assistance of the Office in this regard.

Dominica

The Committee notes with deep concern that, for the eighth year, the reports due on ratified Conventions have not been received. Twenty-four reports are now due on fundamental, governance and technical Conventions, most of which should have included information in reply to the Committee's comments. The Committee firmly hopes that the Government will soon submit all its reports in accordance with its constitutional obligation and that they will respond to the Committee's comments. The Committee reminds the Government that it may avail itself of the technical assistance of the Office in this regard.

Equatorial Guinea

The Committee notes with deep concern that, for the last 14 years, the reports due on ratified Conventions have not been received. Fourteen reports are now due on fundamental and technical Conventions, most of which should have included information in reply to the Committee's comments.

Of these 14 reports, two are first reports on the application of the Food and Catering (Ships' Crews) Convention, 1946 (No. 68), and the Accommodation of Crews Convention (Revised), 1949 (No. 92), due since 1998. Noting that the Government has requested technical assistance for reporting on these two Conventions, the Committee firmly hopes that the Government will soon submit all its reports in accordance with its constitutional obligation and that they will respond to the Committee's comments.

Gabon

The Committee notes with deep concern that the first report on the Maritime Labour Convention, 2006, as amended (MLC, 2006), due since 2016, has not been received. The Committee launched last year an urgent appeal to the Government to send its first report concerning the MLC, 2006. Even in the absence of this first report, the Committee decided to examine the application of this Convention at this session on the basis of available information.

The Committee firmly hopes that the Government will soon submit this first report in accordance with its constitutional obligation and that it will respond to the Committee's comments. Recalling that technical assistance was provided on these issues by the International Training Centre of the ILO, the Committee hopes that the Government will soon submit all its reports in accordance with its constitutional obligation and that they will respond to the Committee's comments.

Grenada

The Committee notes with deep concern that, for the fourth year, the reports due on ratified Conventions have not been received. Thirteen reports are now due on fundamental, governance and technical Conventions, most of which should have included information in reply to the Committee's comments. The Committee firmly hopes that the Government will soon submit all its reports in accordance with its constitutional obligation and that they will respond to the Committee's comments. The Committee reminds the Government that it may avail itself of the technical assistance of the Office in this regard.

Guyana

The Committee notes with concern that, for the second year, the reports due on ratified Conventions have not been received. Fourteen reports are now due on fundamental, governance and technical Conventions, most of which should have included information in reply to the Committee's comments. The Committee hopes that Government will soon submit all its reports in accordance with its constitutional obligation and that they will respond to the Committee's comments.

Jamaica

The Committee notes with deep concern that the first report on the Domestic Workers Convention, 2011 (No. 189), due since 2018, has not been received. The Committee firmly hopes that the Government will soon submit this report in accordance with its constitutional obligation. The Committee reminds the Government that it may avail itself of the technical assistance of the Office in this regard.

Lebanon

The Committee notes with concern that, for the second year, the reports due on ratified Conventions have not been received. Twelve reports are now due on fundamental, governance and technical Conventions which should have included information in reply to the Committee's comments. The Committee hopes that the Government will soon submit all its reports in accordance with its constitutional obligation and that they will respond to the Committee's comments.

Madagascar

The Committee notes with concern that, for the second year, the reports due on ratified Conventions have not been received. Twelve reports are now due on fundamental, governance and technical Conventions most of which should have included information in reply to the Committee's comments. The Committee hopes that Government will soon submit all its reports in accordance with its constitutional obligation and that they will respond to the Committee's comments.

Maldives

The Committee notes with deep concern that the first report on the Maritime Labour Convention, 2006, as amended (MLC, 2006), due since 2016, has not been received. The Committee launched last year an urgent appeal to the Government to send its first report concerning the MLC, 2006. Even in the absence of this first report, the Committee decided to examine the application of this Convention at this session on the basis of available information.

The Committee firmly hopes that the Government will soon submit this report in accordance with its constitutional obligation. The Committee reminds the Government that it may avail itself of the technical assistance of the Office in this regard.

Netherlands

Aruba

The Committee notes with concern that, for the second year, the reports due on ratified Conventions have not been received. Thirteen reports are now due on fundamental, governance and technical Conventions most of which should have included information in reply to the Committee's comments. The Committee hopes that Government will soon submit all its reports in accordance with its constitutional obligation and that they will respond to the Committee's comments.

Sint Maarten

The Committee notes with concern that, for the second year, the reports due on ratified Conventions have not been received. Three reports are now due on governance and technical Conventions which should have included information in reply to the Committee's comments. The Committee hopes that the Government will soon submit all its reports in accordance with its constitutional obligation and that they will respond to the Committee's comments.

Nigeria

The Committee notes with concern that, for the second year, the reports due on ratified Conventions have not been received. Six reports are now due on fundamental and technical Conventions most of which should have included information in reply to the Committee's comments. Recalling that technical assistance will be provided on these issues by the International Training Centre of the ILO, the Committee hopes that the Government will soon submit all its reports in accordance with its constitutional obligation and that they will respond to the Committee's comments.

Romania

The Committee notes with deep concern that the first report on the Maritime Labour Convention, 2006, as amended (MLC, 2006), due since 2017, has not been received. The Committee firmly hopes that the Government will soon submit all its reports in accordance with its constitutional obligation and that they will respond to the Committee's comments. The Committee reminds the Government that it may avail itself of the technical assistance of the Office in this regard.

Saint Kitts and Nevis

The Committee notes with concern that, for the second year, the reports due on ratified Conventions have not been received. Five reports are now due on fundamental and technical Conventions which should have included information in reply to the Committee's comments. The Committee hopes that Government will soon submit all its reports in accordance with its constitutional obligation and that they will respond to the Committee's comments.

Saint Lucia

The Committee notes with deep concern that, for the last seven years, the reports due on ratified Conventions have not been received. Eighteen reports are now due on fundamental and technical Conventions, most of which should have included information in reply to the Committee's comments. The Committee firmly hopes that the Government will soon submit all its reports in accordance with its constitutional obligation and that they will respond to the Committee's comments. The Committee reminds the Government that it may avail itself of the technical assistance of the Office in this regard.

Sao Tome and Principe

The Committee notes with deep concern that, for the third year, the reports due on ratified Conventions have not been received. Eight reports are now due on fundamental, governance and technical Conventions, including the first report on the application of the Maternity Protection Convention, 2000 (No. 183), due since 2019. In addition, most of these reports should have included information in reply to the Committee's comments. The Committee firmly hopes that the Government will soon submit all its reports in accordance with its constitutional obligation and that they will respond to the Committee's comments. The Committee reminds the Government that it may avail itself of the technical assistance of the Office in this regard.

Sri Lanka

The Committee notes with concern that the first report on the application of the Maritime Labour Convention, 2006, as amended (MLC, 2006), due since 2019 has not been received. The Committee hopes that Government will soon submit this first report in accordance with its constitutional obligation.

Tunisia

The Committee notes with concern that the first report on the application of the Maritime Labour Convention, 2006, as amended (MLC, 2006), due since 2019 has not been received. The Committee hopes that Government will soon submit this first report in accordance with its constitutional obligation.

United Republic of Tanzania

The Committee notes with concern that the first report on the application of the Seafarers' Identity Documents Convention (Revised), 2003 as amended (No. 185), due since 2019 has not been received. The Committee hopes that Government will soon submit this first report in accordance with its constitutional obligation.

Tanganyika

The Committee notes with concern that, for the second year, the reports due on ratified Conventions have not been received. Three reports are now due on governance and technical Conventions some of which should have included information in reply to the Committee's comments. The Committee hopes that the Government will soon submit all its reports in accordance with its constitutional obligation and that they will respond to the Committee's comments.

Vanuatu

The Committee notes with concern that, for the second year, the reports due on ratified Conventions have not been received. Four reports are now due on fundamental and technical Conventions some of which should have included information in reply to the Committee's comments. The Committee hopes that the Government will soon submit all its reports in accordance with its constitutional obligation and that they will respond to the Committee's comments.

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1957)

The Committee notes the observations of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), received on 16 September 2020, denouncing the persistence of restrictions on the right of workers to establish trade unions through acts of retaliation, intimidation or even police abuse. Recalling that the 2019 ITUC observations had raised similar allegations, the Committee requests the Government to provide its comments on the 2019 and 2020 ITUC's observations.

The Committee notes with concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments.

The Committee notes the observations of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), received on 1 September 2019, which allege violations of trade union rights in practice. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments in this respect.

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments.

Article 2 of the Convention. Right to organize of foreign workers. With reference to section 70 of the Act on Foreigners (No. 108 of 2013), providing that foreign workers with a permanent residence permit shall enjoy economic and social rights on the same terms as nationals, the Committee had requested the Government to take all necessary measures to ensure that all foreign workers, whether with a permanent or temporary residence permit or without residence permit, can exercise trade union rights. The Committee notes the Government's position that articles 16(1), 46(1) and 50 of the Constitution of the Republic of Albania fully guarantee the rights of foreigners in this regard and that the Act on Foreigners provides foreigners with protection against any form of discrimination. The Committee requests the Government to confirm that all foreign workers, including those without a residence permit, may exercise trade union rights, and particularly the right to join organizations which defend their interests as workers. The Committee further requests the Government to provide information on foreign workers' exercise of this right in practice, and otherwise to take any necessary measures to ensure they can exercise these rights under the Convention.

Article 3. Right of organizations to organize their activities and formulate their programmes. For a number of years, the Committee has been requesting the Government to take measures to: (i) amend section 197/7(4) of the Labour Code concerning sympathy strikes; and (ii) ensure that all public servants who do not exercise authority in the name of the State are able to exercise the right to strike.

The Committee notes with satisfaction that the Government informs that Act No. 136 of 5 December 2016 on some supplements and amendments to the Labour Code, amends article 197/7 to provide that sympathy strikes shall be lawful provided that it supports a legal strike.

The Committee further notes that the Government informs that Act No. 152/2013 on the civil servants provides for the right to join unions and professional associations and for the right to strike to civil servants except as otherwise provided by law. The Government indicates that in any case the right to strike is not permitted in relation to essential services of state activity. The Committee recalls in this regard that prohibitions to the right to strike, which curtail the right of unions to organize their activities to defend the interest of workers, may only be imposed in relation to public servants exercising authority in the name of the State, essential services in the strict sense of the term (the interruption of which would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population) or in situations of acute national or local crisis (for a limited period of time and to the extent necessary to meet the requirements of the situation). The Committee observes that the list of essential services provided in article 35 of the Act on the civil servants includes services such as transport or public television, which may not be considered essential services in the strict sense of the term. The Committee requests the Government to indicate any further exceptions to the right to strike set out in the laws and to take any necessary measures to ensure that the legislation is amended in accordance with the above-mentioned principles.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1957)

The Committee notes the observations of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), received on 16 September 2020, denouncing anti-union discrimination acts in the mining sector, in particular the anti-union dismissal of the chairman of the Trade Union of United Mineworks of Bulquiza (TUUMB) following the establishment of the union. The Committee further notes that the ITUC alleges the lack of adequate protection against anti-union discrimination. Recalling that in its 2019 observations the ITUC had raised similar allegations, as well as severe obstacles to collective bargaining, the Committee requests the Government to ensure that all allegations of anti-union discrimination are subject to swift and effective investigations by an independent body and to provide its comments on the 2019 and 2020 ITUC observations.

The Committee notes with regret that the Government has not provided its report, due in 2019, and therefore urges the Government to send it before its next meeting. The Committee observes however that the Government's reports on the application of Labour Relation (Public Service) Convention, 1978 (No. 151) and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1981 (No. 154) provide information relevant to the application of the present Convention, which is therefore taken into consideration for the present observation.

Article 1 of the Convention. Adequate protection of workers against acts of anti-union discrimination. In its previous comments, the Committee had observed that despite the Labour Code providing for remedies in cases of anti-union discrimination, in the absence of a special jurisdiction, labour disputes were brought before ordinary courts, considerably delaying the procedures. On that occasion, the Committee had recalled that the existence of general legal provisions prohibiting acts of anti-union discrimination was insufficient unless they were accompanied by effective and rapid procedures to ensure their application in practice and urged the Government to take all necessary measures to ensure that adequate enforcement mechanisms be set up and operationalised expeditiously. While welcoming the fact that the Labour Code, as amended by law no. 136/2015: (i) recognizes union membership as a ground of discrimination (section 9 of the Labour Code) and; (ii) extends the protection provided to trade union representatives to one year after the expiration of their mandate (section 181 of the Labour Code), the Committee understands, based on the information provided by the Government in its report under Convention No. 151, that these amendments to the Labour Code have not modified the existing enforcement mechanisms to ensure access to more effective and rapid procedures against acts of anti-union discrimination. Bearing particularly in mind the reiterated ITUC denunciations of serious acts of anti-union discrimination and the alleged lack of adequate protection, the Committee requests the Government to inform of any development in this regard. It requests the Government to provide detailed information on the practical application of the remedies for anti-union discrimination set out in the law, in particular the availability and use of any applicable enforcement mechanisms, such as judicial actions before the courts, and the duration of proceedings.

Article 4. Promotion of collective bargaining. In its previous comments, noting that section 161 of the Labour Code provides that a collective agreement can only be concluded at the enterprise or branch level and that no collective agreements had been concluded at the national level, the Committee had invited the Government to pursue its efforts to promote voluntary collective agreements at all levels, including at national level, and to provide information on any measures taken and their impact on the promotion of collective bargaining. The Committee notes with interest that the Labour Code, as amended, provides for, in the context of the collective bargaining process, the right of trade union representatives to receive information from the employer on all matters related to the negotiations within a week (section 163/2). The Committee further notes the Government's indication, included in its report under Convention No. 154, that: (i) a national database for collective agreements, trade unions and collective disputes, established in December 2019 with the support of the Office, will be accessible to various government agencies, and that it will assist public authorities in designing policy measures aimed at promoting collective bargaining and implementing best practices; (ii) between 2019 and 2020, 16 collective agreements were concluded in the tourism, food, energy and oil sectors, covering 10 per cent of workers in the private sector; and (iii) the number of collective agreements reported by the Government may be influenced by the failure of private employers to file collective agreements at the corresponding labour offices, despite the legal obligation to do so arising from section 167 of the Labour Code. While taking due note of the information provided by the Government, the Committee observes however that no indication was made by the Government regarding the conclusion of collective agreements at the national level and that no amendments have been made to section 161 of the Labour Code. The Committee therefore requests the Government to continue providing information on any further measures adopted or envisaged to promote collective bargaining including at the national level when the parties so desire. It further requests the Government to continue providing information on the number of collective agreements that have been concluded and that are in force, the sectors covered, and the percentage of workers covered.

Algeria

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1962)

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020). The Committee proceeded with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the supplementary information received from the Government and the observations received from the social partners this year, as well as on the basis of the information at its disposal in 2019.

The Committee notes the observations received on 29 September and 9 October 2020 of the General and Autonomous Confederation of Workers in Algeria (CGATA) and the National Autonomous Union of Public Administration Personnel (SNAPAP), supported by the International Union of Food, Agricultural, Hotel, Restaurant, Catering, Tobacco and Allied Workers' Associations (IUF) and Public Services International (PSI). The aforementioned organizations complain of the closure of the CGATA headquarters in Algiers, the persecution of hundreds of union members in numerous wilayas, and the arrest, detention and the convictions by the courts against the following trade union delegates: (i) Mr Kaddour Chouicha, Coordinator of the Higher Education Teachers' Union (SESS); (ii) Ms Lalia Djaddour, Member of the National Committee of Women Workers and National Secretary of SNAPAP; and (iii) Mr Maaza Belkacem, Member of the National Federation of Justice Sector Workers.

The Committee also notes the observations received on 30 September 2020 from the Trade Union Confederation of Productive Workers (COSYFOP), supported by the IUF, PSI and IndustriALL Global Union. COSYFOP complains of the following incidents, which occurred in 2020: (i) the establishment of a clone COSYFOP bureau by a general assembly not attended by representatives of affiliated unions and whose supposedly elected representatives have never been members of the Confederation; (ii) the closure under seal of COSYFOP headquarters on 21 February 2020; (iii) a government campaign against organizations affiliated with COSYFOP; (iv) judicial harassment against the following trade union delegates: Mr Raouf Mellal, President of COSYFOP; Mr Hamza Kherroubi, President of the National Union of Personal-Care Workers (SNAS); Mr Ayoub Merine, President of the National Federation of Social Security Fund Workers; Mr Benzine Slimane, Member of the Board of COSYFOP; Mr Nasser Hamitouche, COSYFOP Delegate, wilaya of Alger; Ms Tym Kadri, President of the Education Sector Staff Federation; Mr Omar Harid, General Secretary of the wilaya of Guelma office of COSYFOP; and Mr Mohamed Essalih Bensdira, President of the COSYFOP National Committee for the Unemployed; (v) the observations submitted by COSYFOP on the draft amendment to Act No. 90-14 were ignored by the Government.

The Committee previously noted the observations of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), received on 1 September 2019, relating to legislative matters, most of which are already being examined by the Committee, and denouncing the persistence of violations of the Convention in practice. In particular, the ITUC alleges that the authorities are still making use of discretionary power to refuse the registration of certain unions. The Committee also noted the observations of the International Organisation of Employers (IOE), received on 30 August and 1 September 2019, containing the Employers' statements made before the 2019 Committee on the Application of Standards of the International Labour Conference. Lastly, the Committee noted the observations of COSYFOP, received on 28 August, 11 October and 13 November 2019 concerning serious obstacles to its freedom to organize its activities and making proposals for the current legislative reform in relation to the application of the Convention.

Given the seriousness of the alleged acts, the Committee urges the Government to provide its comments in reply to the observations which it refers to above, insofar as not already addressed in the Government's November 2020 reply which the Committee refers to below, and, in particular, to provide detailed information concerning the allegations of closure of union premises and the arrest and conviction of trade union delegates, as well as those of the COSYFOP concerning the difficulties encountered in establishing an affiliated union in an engineering and construction enterprise.

The Committee notes the following information provided by the Government in November 2020 in reply to certain comments: (i) the Government reports on the situation with regard to the registration of trade unions. The Committee refers to this information below; (ii) the Government indicates that the arrest of Mr Chouicha, Coordinator of the SESS, was not linked to his trade union activities but to activities disruptive to public order by the dissemination of destabilizing political pamphlets encouraging civil disobedience; he was subsequently released; (iii) the Government refers to the case of Mr Mellal, President of COSYFOP, recalling a decision handed down by the Supreme Court in October 2019 upholding his dismissal for professional misconduct. According to the Government, Mr Mellal practices a liberal profession and lost his credibility as a trade union representative because of his statements calling for political change by violence. The Committee observes that the professional situation of Mr Mellal was examined by the Committee on Freedom of Association, which made a number of recommendations (see 392nd Report, October 2020, Case No. 3210).

The Committee notes that the high-level mission called for by the Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2018 visited Algiers in May 2019. The mission subsequently submitted a report containing its analysis of the pending issues relating to the application of the Convention, and made recommendations. The Committee notes that the acceptance of the mission and manner in which it took place are a positive signal of the will of the Government to make progress in addressing the issues that have been pending for many years. The Committee has benefited from the information gathered by the mission during the meetings that it held, and from its conclusions and recommendations, all of which contribute to a more empirical understanding of the legal and practical difficulties relating to the exercise of freedom of association in the country.

Follow-up to the conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards (International Labour Conference, 108th Session, June 2019)

The Committee notes the discussion in the Conference Committee in June 2019 concerning the application of the Convention by Algeria. The Committee observes that, although the Conference Committee noted positively that the Government had accepted a high-level mission, it nevertheless expressed concern at the persistence of restrictions on the right of workers to establish and join trade union organizations, federations and confederations of their own choosing and the continued absence of tangible progress in bringing the legislation into compliance with the Convention. In its conclusions, the Conference Committee urged the Government to: (i) ensure that the registration of trade unions in law and in practice is in compliance with the Convention; (ii) process pending applications for the registration of free and independent trade unions, which have met the requirements set out by the law, and allow the free formation and functioning of trade unions; (iii) review the decision to dissolve the Autonomous National Union of Electricity and Gas Workers (SNATEGS); (iv) systematically and promptly provide trade union organizations with all necessary and detailed information to enable them to take corrective action or complete additional formalities for their registration; (v) amend section 4 of Act No. 90-14 in order to remove obstacles to the establishment by workers of organizations, federations and confederations of their own choosing, irrespective of the sector to which they belong; (vi) amend section 6 of Act No. 90-14 in order to recognize the right of all workers, without distinction whatsoever, to establish trade unions; (vii) take all appropriate measures to guarantee that, irrespective of trade union affiliation, the right to freedom of association can be exercised in normal conditions with respect for civil liberties and in a climate free of violence, pressure and threats; (viii) ensure impartial investigation and due process rights in order to guarantee the rule of law; (ix) reinstate employees of the Government terminated based on anti-union discrimination, where appropriate; and (x) ensure that the new draft Labour Code is adopted with no further delay and is in compliance with the text of the Convention. The Committee notes that, as requested, the Government subsequently provided in its report detailed information on the action taken on the recommendations of the Conference Committee.

Legislative issues

Amendment of the Act on the exercise of the right to organize and reform of the Labour Code. The Committee recalls that the Government has been referring since 2011 to the process of reforming the Labour Code with a view to responding to the Committee's concerns relating to the application of the Convention. The Committee notes that the Government informed the high-level mission of its intention to take a new initiative to respond rapidly to the comments calling for the amendment of sections 2, 4 and 6 of Act No. 90-14 on the exercise of the right to organize. This new initiative would consist of, during a first stage, revising the provisions referred to above and disassociating these amendments from the broader process of the revision of the whole of the Labour Code, which would be carried out during a second phase. However, the consultation procedures and time schedule remained to be determined. After noting from the meetings with workers' and employers' organizations that no discussions or consultations on the draft Labour Code had been held since 2017, the mission recommended the Government to engage without delay in the preparation of draft texts to amend the provisions of Act No. 90-14, in accordance with the Committee's recommendations, and to pursue the work of bringing the draft Labour Code into conformity with the technical comments provided by the Office in 2015, all in consultation with all of the social partners. In June 2019, the Government confirmed to the Conference Committee that it wishes to update the text revising the Labour Code in light of the amendments proposed by the Office and in consultation with all the economic and social partners.

The Committee notes the supplementary information provided by the Government indicating that the preliminary draft Bill to amend and supplement Act No. 90-14 has been prepared and submitted for their views to 47 workers' and employers' organizations and 27 ministerial departments. According to the Government, this preliminary draft Bill amends all the provisions on which the Committee has been commenting. Furthermore, the Government indicates that it was able to benefit from the Office's technical comments in February 2020 and that the latest version of the preliminary draft Bill takes due account thereof. The Government reports that the draft Bill is currently being discussed by the General Secretariat of the Government with a view to its adoption by the Government Council and then the Council of Ministers, prior to its transmission to Parliament. Furthermore, the Government refers to a new version of the Labour Code which includes the Office's 2015 comments. It indicates that the new text will be submitted for consultation with the economic and social partners and that the final version will then be submitted to the authorities with competence for its approval and enactment. The Committee welcomes the Government's indication that its comments have been taken into account in the text to amend Act No. 90-14 and that the new version, as well as the new version of the draft text revising the Labour Code have taken into account the Office's technical comments. With regard to the amendments to Act No. 90-14, the Committee refers to its comments below. In relation to the Labour Code, the Committee refers to the comments contained in its direct request. The Committee expects that the Government will take all the necessary measures to complete, without delay, the legislative reform called for by the Committee with a view to giving full effect to the provisions of the Convention and that it will rapidly be in a position to report progress in this regard.

Article 2 of the Convention. Right to establish trade union organizations. The Committee recalls that its previous comments related to section 6 of Act No. 90-14, which restricts the right to establish a trade union organization to persons who are originally of Algerian nationality or who acquired Algerian nationality at least ten years earlier. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the Bill includes an amendment to section 6 which removes the nationality requirement, which will permit foreign workers and employers to establish organizations and, under condition of three years' residence and in accordance with the terms and conditions established in the statutes, to become members of the executive and administrative bodies of trade unions. The Committee trusts that section 6 of Act No. 90-14 will be amended soon so that the right to establish a trade union organization and to take up positions in the management or administration thereof is recognized for all workers, irrespective of nationality.

Article 5. Right to establish federations and confederations. The Committee recalls its previous comments relating to sections 2 and 4 of Act No. 90-14, which, read jointly, have the effect of restricting the establishment of federations and confederations in an occupation, branch or sector of activity. The Committee previously noted the Government's indication that section 4 of the Act would be amended to include a definition of federations and confederations. The Committee notes that, in its report, the Government merely indicates that the draft text revising Act No. 90-14 clarifies the concepts of central organizations, federations and confederations with a view to permitting their establishment irrespective of the sectors covered by their member unions. The Committee welcomes the Government's indication that the most recent amendment to section 4 of the Act will allow trade union organizations to establish federations, unions and confederations irrespective of the occupation, branch or sector to which they belong. The Committee trusts that section 4 of Act No. 90-14 will be amended soon in order to remove any obstacles to the establishment of federations and confederations by workers' organizations, irrespective of their sector.

Article 3. Restrictions on access to trade union office. Finally, the Committee notes the observation made by the high-level mission concerning the application of section 2 of Act No. 90-14, which could in practice limit the full enjoyment and exercise of freedom of association. According to the mission, the use of the term "salaried employees" in section 2 of Act No. 90-14 could have the consequence in practice of limiting access to trade union office. The discussions held by the mission revealed that the dismissal of a trade union leader (or a founder member of an organization awaiting approval) in a specific enterprise or administrative body resulted in the loss of the status of salaried employee, and consequently de jure of the status of trade union officer under the terms of section 2 of Act No. 90-14. The mission observed that this situation was liable to prejudice the freedom of action of the organization and its right to elect its representatives in full freedom. In this regard, the Committee recalls that it considers that the requirement to belong to an occupation or to an enterprise in order to be able to hold trade union office is a requirement that infringes the right of organizations to draw up their constitutions and to elect their representatives in full freedom. It prevents trade unions from being able to elect qualified persons (such as full-time union officers or pensioners) or deprives them of the experience of certain officers when they are unable to provide enough qualified persons from among their own ranks. There is also a real risk of interference by the employer through the dismissal of trade union officers, which deprives them of their trade union office (see the 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 102). In light of the above, the Committee requested the Government to consult the social partners urgently on the measures to be taken to amend the requirements resulting from the application of section 2 of Act No. 90-14 so that trade union office in an enterprise or establishment is no longer restricted to persons employed by the enterprise or establishment, or to remove the requirement to belong to the occupation or to be an employee for at least a reasonable proportion of trade union officers. In the supplementary information provided, the Government indicates that genuine representation of workers before the employer, particularly through the union branch, which is democratically elected by members, is valuable not only because of its experience in the enterprise in question but also because it is familiar with the organization and culture of the enterprise. According to the Government, the definition of the term "worker" is linked with the matter of remuneration, paid in exchange for the effort made by the worker. This definition creates an employment relationship and a legal bond giving rise to rights and obligations for both parties to the employment relationship. Lastly, recalling that no trade union organization has raised the question of trade union representation, the Government indicates that the matter of the appointment by trade union organizations of persons from outside "employer bodies" could be envisaged under certain conditions and that a consultation on that issue will be held with the social and economic partners. The Committee expects that the Government will initiate without delay consultations with the social partners with regard to the granting of authorization for trade union representation to persons from outside the enterprise or establishment. It recalls the need to amend the requirements resulting from the application of section 2 of Act No. 90-14 so that trade union office in an enterprise or establishment is no longer restricted to persons employed by the enterprise or establishment in question, or to remove the requirement to belong to the occupation or to be an employee for at least a reasonable proportion of trade union officers.

Registration of trade unions in practice

The Committee recalls that it has been commenting for many years on the issue of the particularly long delays, sometimes amounting to several years, in the processing of applications for the registration of trade unions or the refusal by the authorities to register certain independent trade unions without giving reasons.

The Committee notes that the Government informed the high-level mission, as well as the Conference Committee, of the recent initiative by the Ministry of Labour to update the files on the establishment of unions and to invite organizations which wish to register or for which the applications are under examination to meet with the Ministry to bring up to date the administrative documents, and particularly those relating to their occupational situation. According to the Government's report and the supplementary information provided, this initiative resulted in the registration of 138 representative organizations (91 workers' organizations and 47 employers' organizations) by the month of March 2020.

The Committee also notes the following information provided by the Government concerning the registration of unions referred to in its previous comments: (i) the Autonomous National Union of Cleaning and Sanitation Workers (SNATNA) and the National Union of Mobilis Workers (SNTM) have been registered; (ii) the Autonomous Algerian Union of Transport Workers (SAATT) and the Autonomous Union of Attorneys of Algeria (SAAVA) have not yet responded to the communications from the Ministry requesting them to update their applications for registration. Efforts by the public authorities to contact these unions have been unsuccessful; (iii) the Government reports that the Higher Education Teachers Solidarity Union (SESS) was registered in February 2020; (iv) the processing of the files for the establishment of the Autonomous National Union of Paper and Packaging Manufacture and Transformation Workers (SNATFTPE), the Autonomous National Union of Wood and Derivative Manufacturing Workers (SNATMBD) and the Autonomous National Union of EUREST Workers of Algeria (SNATE) are the territorial responsibility of the wilaya or commune. According to the Government, efforts by the public authorities to contact these unions have been unsuccessful; (v) the file for the establishment of the Algerian Union of Employees of the Public Administration (SAFAP) is pending due to a dispute concerning a disagreement between the founding members relating to the presidency of the organization; a conciliation attempt is under way, however, and the Government will keep the Office informed on progress in this case; (vi) the Government reiterates that the General and Autonomous Confederation of Workers of Algeria (CGATA) has not provided documents concerning its establishment in accordance with the provisions of the Act as it is not composed of any legally established union, as required by the law, which requires any confederation to be established by a group of legally registered or established unions; and (vii) according to the Government, persons unrelated to the Trade Union Confederation of Productive Workers (COSYFOP) obtained possession of the registration receipt of the organization without the presence of any member or affiliate. However, the Government admits that the COSYFOP is composed of three legally constituted unions.

The Government adds that, to give effect to the recommendations of the Conference Committee, exchanges of communications and meetings with the representatives of unions seeking registration are now recorded in reports co-signed by the applicants. Finally, the Government indicates that it is currently engaged in the preparation of a manual on the procedures for the registration of unions.

The Committee welcomes the follow-up information provided by the Government and requests it to continue providing updated information on the processing of applications for the registration of trade unions. The Committee refers below to the specific situation of certain unions.

The Committee notes the points indicated below that the high-level mission raised concerning the registration of unions and which it considers to be particularly pertinent. In the first place, the mission observed that the legislative provisions setting out the conditions for the establishment of federations and confederations of unions covering different sectors appear to be interpreted in an inconsistent and very restrictive manner according to the organizations concerned. The mission accordingly noted the case of a confederation that was not provided with a receipt on the grounds that it groups together affiliates from several sectors while, in another case, it noted the registration of an employers' organization in February 2019 which has affiliates from four different sectors. The mission was also informed of the case of a trade union confederation with affiliates in several sectors. The mission therefore recommended that the Government adopt a consistent position in practice and to accept the possibility for organizations to be composed of affiliates from different occupations, branches and sectors, in line with the Committee's comments concerning the application of sections 2 and 4 of Act No. 90-14. The mission also therefore requested that the Government register any organizations in this situation which apply for registration. The Committee also notes that the mission observed inconsistencies in the content of the communications denying registration. In most cases, the administration's communication merely indicates that "the application to certify the establishment of the organization does not meet the conditions set out by Act

No. 90-14 of 2 June 1990 on the exercise of the right to organize and it requests the applicant to abide by that Act", without other comments. The mission therefore encouraged the Government to systematically and rapidly provide the organizations with all the necessary information to enable them to take corrective measures or to fulfil additional formalities for their registration.

In general, while welcoming the efforts made by the Government to clarify the manner in which the administration processes applications for the registration of unions, the Committee is nevertheless concerned by the fact that the registration of most of the federations and unions referred to in its comments, and particularly the CGATA, SAAVA and SAATT, remain pending. The Committee also notes the explanations provided on the denial of registration by the administration for the Confederation of Algerian Unions (CSA), COSYFOP and SAFAP, the representatives of which were able to meet with the high-level mission. The Committee notes that, taking into account the information provided both by the organizations themselves and by the authorities, the mission recommended the Government to proceed on an urgent basis with the registration of the CGATA, CSA and SAFAP.

The Committee notes with regret that the Government confines itself essentially to providing in its report and the supplementary information provided in 2020 the same explanations that it had previously furnished on the rejection of the applications for registration in the case of the organizations referred to above, most of which are based on a reading of the legislative provisions which, as recalled above by the Committee, are not in conformity with the Convention. The Government should also take into account the process of the amendment of these provisions which it has commenced in order to give effect to the Convention. The Committee therefore expects that the Government will take due account of the elements recalled above in reconsidering on an urgent basis the applications for the registration of the CGATA, CSA and COSYFOP. It also refers to the recommendations of the high-level mission and calls on the Government to register the SAFAP as soon as the internal dispute to which it refers is resolved. It expects the Government to be able to report, without further delay, tangible progress in the positive processing of these applications for registration which, in certain cases, have been pending for several years. The Committee also once again encourages the Government to provide systematically and rapidly to the organizations for which registration is denied by the administration all the necessary information to enable them to take corrective measures and to fulfil the additional formalities required for their registration.

With regard to the situation of the Autonomous National Union of Electricity and Gas Workers (SNATEG), the observations of which, received in July 2018, reported numerous obstacles to its freedom to organize its activities, the Committee recalls that SNATEG presented a complaint to the Committee on Freedom of Association, which once again ruled on the merits of the case (see 392nd Report, October 2020, Case No. 3210) and formulated recommendations including calling on the Government to conduct an independent investigation to determine the circumstances that led to the administrative decision recognizing voluntary dissolution of SNATEG, despite evidence presented by the union that no such voluntary dissolution had occurred. Referring to the recommendations made by the Conference Committee in June 2019, the Committee on Freedom of Association requested the Government to review the decision to dissolve SNATEG without delay. Lastly, that Committee urged the Government to implement its recommendations without delay in order to ensure an environment in the industrial energy enterprise concerned in which trade union rights are respected and guaranteed for all trade union organizations, and in which workers are able to join the union of their choice, elect their representatives and exercise their trade union rights without fear of reprisals and intimidation. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the measures taken to give effect to the recommendations of the Committee on Freedom of Association in this regard.

In general, in view of the measures that it is taking to address the legal and practical issues raised in relation to the implementation of the Convention, the Committee trusts that the Government will continue to avail itself of the technical assistance of the Office.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government that reiterates the content of its direct request adopted in 2019.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1962)

The Committee notes the observations received on 30 September 2020 from the Trade Union Confederation of Productive Workers (COSYFOP), supported by Public Services International (PSI), the International Union of Food, Agricultural, Hotel, Restaurant, Catering, Tobacco and Allied Workers' Associations (IUF), and IndustriALL Global Union (IndustriALL). As it has not received any supplementary information from the Government, the Committee proceeded with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the information at its disposal in 2019, as well as the observations of COSYFOP (see Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention below).

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Adequate protection against acts of anti-union discrimination and interference. The Committee notes the observations denouncing discrimination against trade union leaders and members, received between 2017 and 2019, from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), the Autonomous National Union of Electricity and Gas Workers (SNATEG), and COSYFOP. The Committee notes that this issue has also been addressed repeatedly by the Committee on the Application of Standards of the International Labour Conference (hereinafter the Conference Committee) during its discussion of the application of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), (discussions held in June 2017, June 2018 and June 2019), which has consistently requested the Government to report on the situation of trade union leaders and members who have been the victims of anti-union dismissal. The Committee further notes that the Committee on Freedom of Association has examined several cases relating to the harassment and dismissal of trade union leaders and members, as indicated in the observations of the trade union organizations. The Committee notes that, within the framework of the recommendations made by the Conference Committee in June 2018, a high-level mission visited Algiers in May 2019 and was able to gather information on the spot relating to the situation of the dismissed trade unionists. Finally, the Committee notes that the Government has regularly provided information in response to the observations received from the trade union organizations, as well as in response to the recommendations made by the Conference Committee.

The Committee recalls that in 2016 the ITUC and the CGATA provided observations on acts of anti-union discrimination against trade union leaders and the dismissal of trade union members following social protests in enterprises in various sectors and in the public sector (justice, postal services, public health, the national water agency). In this regard, it notes the information provided by the Government on the measures taken for the reinstatement of the workers dismissed in the public administration. The Committee notes that certain trade union leaders have still not been reinstated, in certain cases despite court rulings in their favour. The Committee therefore requests the Government to ensure, on the one hand, the immediate implementation of all court decisions ordering the reinstatement of trade union leaders and trade unionists in the public administration and on the other hand, to continue to provide information on other dismissed trade union leaders and trade unionists whose situation has not yet been resolved.

The Committee notes that the observations received from trade unions since 2017 relate largely to the mass dismissal of the members of SNATEG by an enterprise in the gas sector and interference in the activities of the union. The Government has provided information on the situation of the dismissed trade unionists, recently reporting measures for the reinstatement of most of the workers concerned, situations that are in the process of being resolved and dismissals that have been confirmed on the grounds of serious faults in the case of certain workers. In this regard, the Committee recalls that SNATEG has lodged a complaint with the Committee on Freedom of Association (CFA) and that the high-level mission gathered updated information in the field on the case from both the Government and trade union representatives. On this basis, the CFA once again issued an opinion on the merits of the case in its meeting in October 2020 and made recommendations calling on the Government to take the necessary measures to give effect, without further delay, to the court rulings and decisions of the Labour Inspectorate concerning the reinstatement of members of SNATEG, and to provide information on the allegations that the majority of the workers reinstated into the enterprise were obliged to give up their membership of SNATEG and to join another trade union within the enterprise (see 392nd Report of the CFA, Case No. 3210, October 2020). The Committee requests the Government to indicate the measures taken to follow up on the recommendations of the CFA and in particular those concerning the trade union leaders of SNATEG who have still not been reinstated.

The Committee notes the observations of COSYFOP on acts of discrimination against its members since the recent renewal of its executive body. The Committee notes that in May 2019 the high-level mission met the representatives of COSYFOP, who provided information on the harassment of its leaders, and particularly Mr Raouf Mellal, Mr Ben Zein Slimane and Mr Abdelkader Kouafi, and intimidation at work against Ms Haddad Racheda and Ms Sarah Ben Maich, which led to the latter giving up their trade union functions. The Committee also notes that Mr Mellal was subjected to physical violence during his detention as a result of his trade union activities and is regularly the subject of intimidation and abusive detention. In addition, the Committee notes that COSYFOP denounces the following measures of discrimination and interference against affiliated trade union organizations: (i) the dismissal in October 2019 of 17 leaders and members of the National Union of Workers of BATIMETAL-COSYFOP, and the threat by the enterprise not to reinstate them unless they leave the union. The reinstatement of the union delegates by the enterprise was effective only after they had left the union, and it was revealed that one of these former delegates has been, since February 2020, an office member of an union constituted by anti-union interference; (ii) threats of dismissal and criminal prosecution against members of the Workers' Union of the Commission for Electricity and Gas Regulation (STCREG); (iii) the dismissal of all the leaders of the National Union of the Higher Institute of Management and the refusal of the Labour Inspectorate to enforce the provisions for the protection of trade union delegates under section 56 of Act No. 90-14 on the terms and conditions of the exercise of the right to organize; and (iv) the circular of the Secretary General of the Ministry of Labour, inciting all the Social Solidarity Funds to dismiss all the members of the National Federation of Workers of the social security funds affiliated to COSYFOP, which led to the judicial harassment and dismissal of the President of the Federation, who had resigned from COSYFOP shortly after being reinstated in January 2020. The Committee notes with concern the seriousness of the allegations and urges the Government to take all the necessary measures to ensure that the competent authorities conduct the necessary investigations into acts of anti-union discrimination against the members of COSYFOP and its affiliated trade union organizations. The Committee expects the Government to take corrective measures to re-establish the rights of workers who are victims of anti-union discrimination and to obtain the cessation without delay of interference by employers and administrative authorities in the exercise of freedom of association. The Committee urges the Government to provide its comments and detailed information on this subject.

Revision of the legislation. With regard, in general, to the need to provide adequate protection to trade union leaders and members against acts of anti-union discrimination, the Committee refers to the concerns expressed by the high-level mission concerning delays in complying with court rulings ordering the reinstatement of trade union leaders, which have still not been given effect, and the excessive use of judicial action in relation to the respective procedures. The Committee also notes that the high-level mission identified difficulties in the application of Article 1 of the Convention to the founding members of unions. According to the high-level mission, under the current legislation and procedures, it would be possible for an employer to dismiss the founding members of a union during the period when it was applying for registration, which in practice can take several years, without the latter benefiting from the protection afforded by the legislation against anti-union discrimination. The Committee urges the Government to engage without delay, in consultation with the social partners, in an in-depth review of the whole of the legal framework and of practice in relation to protection against anti-union discrimination, with a view to the adoption of the necessary measures to ensure adequate protection to trade union leaders and members during the period when the union that has been established is applying for registration. It requests the Government to report any progress achieved in this respect, and trusts that the Government will avail itself of the technical assistance of the Office for this purpose.

Application of the Convention in practice. The Committee notes the statistics provided on the number of collective agreements registered by the Labour Inspectorate between 1990 and 2019, as well as the number of workers covered. The Committee invites the Government to continue providing any available statistics on the number of collective agreements registered and, where possible, to indicate the sectors and number of workers covered.

Angola

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1976)

Article 1 of the Convention. Adequate protection against acts of anti-union discrimination. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the observations of the National Trade Union of Teachers (SINPROF) and Education International (EI), received on 1 September 2017, alleging the existence of anti-union reprisals by the Government in several provinces of the country. In the absence of information received from the Government in this regard, the Committee recalls that it is the responsibility of the latter to take all necessary measures to ensure that the competent authorities conduct the necessary enquiries into these alleged acts of anti-union discrimination, and to take remedial measures and apply suitable penalties if the trade union rights recognized in the Convention are found to have been impaired. The Committee urges the Government to provide its comments in this regard.

Article 4. Measures to promote collective bargaining. Compulsory arbitration. The Committee recalls that for several years it has been requesting the Government to take the necessary measures to amend sections 20 and 28 of Act No. 20-A/92 on the right to collective bargaining, which impose compulsory arbitration in terms contrary to the indications of the Committee. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that section 273(2) of the General Labour Act No. 7/2015 establishes that collective labour disputes shall be resolved through mediation, conciliation and voluntary arbitration, without prejudice to specific legislation, and further noted that section 293 establishes that collective labour disputes shall be settled preferably through voluntary arbitration. Given that the General Labour Act of 2015 repeals any contrary provision, the Committee requested the Government to indicate whether sections 20 and 28 of Act No. 20-A/92, which impose compulsory arbitration on an array of non-essential services, had been repealed or whether these sections remained in force. The Committee notes that the Government indicates that there is indeed a contradiction between the two above-mentioned items of legislation and that the contradiction should be resolved when Act No. 20-A/92 is revised. Recalling that compulsory arbitration in the context of collective bargaining is only acceptable in relation to public servants engaged in the administration of the State (Article 6 of the Convention), essential services in the strict sense of the term (services the interruption of which would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population) and in the event of an acute national crisis, the Committee expects that sections 20 and 28 of Act No. 20-A/92 will be amended rapidly and requests the Government to provide information on any progress achieved in this regard.

Articles 4 and 6. Collective bargaining of public servants not engaged in the administration of the State. The Committee recalls that for several years it has been requesting the Government to take measures to ensure that the trade union organizations of civil servants who are not engaged in the administration of the State have the right to negotiate both wages and other terms and conditions of employment with their public employers. The Committee recalls that, under Article 6 of the Convention, a distinction has to be made between, on the one hand, public servants who, through their functions, are directly engaged in the administration of the State (for example, in certain countries, officials in government ministries and other similar bodies and their auxiliary personnel), who may be excluded from the scope of application of the Convention and, on the other hand, all other persons employed by the Government, public enterprises or autonomous public institutions, who should benefit from the guarantees set out in the Convention (for example, employees in public enterprises, employees in municipal services and employees in other decentralized bodies, as well as public sector teachers). The Committee notes that the Government confines itself to indicating that the collective bargaining rights of public servants not engaged in the administration of the State are safeguarded under the General Labour Act of 2015 and Act No. 20-A/92 on the right to collective bargaining. In this regard, the Committee observes that under the terms of sections 1(1) and 2(f) of the General Labour Act, the only public employees covered by the Act are those in public enterprises and that section 2 of Act No. 20-A/92, similarly, excludes officials in the central and local State public administration from the scope of its application, as well as workers in public services not organized as enterprises. In view of the foregoing, the Committee observes that the scope of application of the laws mentioned above does not appear to cover all categories of workers considered by the Committee to be public servants not engaged in the administration of the State. In the absence of other information made available to it, the Committee requests the Government to specify the provisions under which or the collective negotiation mechanisms through which the various categories of public servants not engaged in the administration of the State can negotiate their conditions of work and employment, and to provide detailed information on the various agreements concluded with organizations of public servants and public employees. The Committee further requests the Government to ensure that its recommendations are taken into account during the revision of Act No. 20-A/92 referred to by the Government and requests it to indicate any progress in this regard.

The Committee reminds the Government that it may seek technical assistance from the Office in connection with the revision of the laws relating to the application of the Convention.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Labour Relations (Public Service) Convention, 1978 (No. 151) (ratification: 2002)

The Committee notes with concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments.

Articles 4 and 5 of the Convention. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to take the necessary measures to grant civil servants and their organizations sufficient legal protection against anti-union discrimination and interference, and had requested the Government to provide information on cases concerning anti-union discrimination. The Committee notes the information contained in the Government's report that there are no cases to report with regard to anti-union discrimination and that the Antigua and Barbuda Constitution grants inalienable rights to citizens. The Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to grant civil servants and their organizations sufficient legal protection against anti-union discrimination and interference and requests the Government to provide information of any cases concerning anti-union discrimination (especially with respect to the procedures and sanctions imposed).

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Argentina

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government, in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020), reporting on the measures adopted in the context of the COVID-19 pandemic regarding social dialogue and the application of the Convention (such as the extension of the terms of office of union officers and representatives). The Committee welcomes the resumption of the activities of the standards subcommission of the Social Dialogue Commission, with a view to making progress on the tripartite processing of matters relating to the ILO supervisory bodies. In this regard, the Government states that the ILO has been invited to participate in the tripartite meetings and that forums are being opened to resolve differences between the provinces, the Government and the social actors.

The Committee also notes the observations of:

(i) the Industrial Confederation of Argentina (UIA), sent with the supplementary report, which underline the impetus given by the Government to social dialogue as a tool for reaching agreements to overcome the crisis and indicate that meetings have been held to move forward on pending issues;

(ii) the General Confederation of Labour of the Argentine Republic (CGT RA), received on 27 September 2020, which refer to the measures adopted to address the pandemic and affirm that the trade union movement has laid the foundations for a sustained dialogue with the Government and the employers (they emphasize the importance of setting up an economic and social council);

(iii) the Confederation of Workers of Argentina (CTA Autonomous), received on 30 September 2020, which denounce the Government's persistence in refusing to align the trade union legislation to the Convention. The CTA highlights the efforts of the International Department of the Ministry of Labour, Employment and Social Security to keep the Social Dialogue Commission and its subcommissions active. However, it expresses regret that nothing has been done in these bodies regarding the reform of the Trade Unions Act. CTA Autonomous also submits additional allegations of violations of the Convention in practice (concerning delays and the refusal to register or grant legal personality to trade unions, crackdowns on public demonstrations in September 2019, criminalization of a strike of drivers in October 2019, espionage and political harassment at a provincial trade union office, and acts of interference in two trade union election procedures). The Committee requests the Government to send its observations on these matters.

The Committee hopes that the additional issues raised in these supplementary observations will also be examined and addressed in a tripartite manner in the context of the standards subcommission of the Social Dialogue Commission. The Committee expresses the firm hope that specific measures will be taken in the same context to address issues raised in previous observations, including bringing the legislation referenced and alluded to in this observation into conformity with the Convention.

Furthermore, the Committee reiterates the content of its comments adopted in 2019, which are reproduced below.

The Committee notes the observations of the UIA, with the support of the International Organisation of Employers, received on 30 August 2019, welcoming the creation of the Social Dialogue Commission, and particularly its subcommission on specific cases. The Committee also notes the observations of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), received on 1 September 2019, and of the CGT RA and CTA Autonomous, both received on 3 September 2019, and of the Confederation of Workers of Argentina (CTA Workers), received on 10 September 2019. The Committee notes that some of the matters raised by the social partners are the subject of cases that are before the Committee on Freedom of Association (among others, Cases Nos 3229, 3257, 3272 and 3315). The Committee notes that the other observations relate to matters already raised, such as allegations of police repression and restrictions on the exercise of the right to strike and other violations of the Convention. The Committee hopes that the matters raised will be examined and addressed in a tripartite manner within the framework of the Social Dialogue Commission.

With regard to, and following up the matters raised in 2018, the Committee welcomes the information provided by the Government on the establishment and operation of the Social Dialogue Commission through Decision No. 225/2019. The Committee notes in particular: (i) its functions, including acting as an intermediary with the social partners to improve compliance with ratified Conventions: (ii) the creation of two subcommissions – one on labour standards (for the examination of subjects related to regular reporting under articles 12, 29 and 23 of the ILO Constitution, as well as representations under article 24), and the other on specific cases (for the examination of complaints relating to freedom of association); and (iii) its initial activities (two plenary meetings, three meetings of the subcommission on standards and two of the subcommission on cases, which examined two cases that are before the Committee on Freedom of Association). The Committee encourages the Government to continue to reinforce this social dialogue body and requests it to continue providing information on developments in its work.

Articles 2, 3 and 6 of the Convention. Trade union independence and the principle of non-interference by the State. The Committee recalls that for many years it has been requesting the Government to take measures to amend the following provisions of Act No. 23551 of 1998 on trade union associations (LAS) and of the corresponding implementing Decree No. 467/88, which are not in conformity with the Convention:

– Trade union status. (i) section 28 of the LAS, under which, in order to challenge an association's status, the petitioning association must have a "considerably larger" membership; and section 21 of implementing Decree No. 467/88, which qualifies the term "considerably larger" by providing that the association claiming trade union status must have at least 10 per cent more dues-paying members than the organization that currently has the status; (ii) section 29 of the LAS, under which an enterprise trade union may be granted trade union status only when no other organization with trade union status exists in the geographical area, occupation or category; and (iii) section 30 of the LAS, under which, in order to be eligible for trade union status, unions representing a trade, occupation or category have to show that they have different interests from the existing trade union or federation, and that the latter's status must not cover the workers concerned.

– Benefits deriving from trade union status. (i) section 38 of the LAS, under which the check-off of trade union dues is allowed only for associations with trade union status, and not for those that are merely registered; and (ii) sections 48 and 52 of the LAS, which afford special protection (trade union immunity) only to representatives of organizations that have trade union status.

The Committee has noted the rulings of the Supreme Court of Justice of the Nation and other national and provincial courts finding various provisions of the legislation referred to above unconstitutional, particularly with regard to trade union status and trade union protection. Similarly, the Committee welcomes a recent opinion of 27 August 2019 of the Public Prosecutor submitted to the Supreme Court of Justice indicating that the system of the check-off of trade union dues as set out in section 38 of the LAS is prejudicial to the freedom of association of organizations that are only registered and is therefore unconstitutional.

The Committee also notes that the CTA Autonomous and the CTA Workers once again emphasize the need to amend these provisions of the LAS, as well as sections 31(a) and 41(a), which are reported to have been found unconstitutional by the Supreme Court of Justice. The organizations denounce the lack of political will by the Government in this regard, indicating that it has not proposed any amendments to the LAS and has not supported any of the draft amendments that have been submitted for this purpose and that, although a standards subcommission has been established in the Social Dialogue Commission, the subject of the need to bring the national legislation into conformity with the Convention has not been included on its agenda. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the reform of the labour legislation has undoubtedly not been raised for discussion in the Social Dialogue Commission because the social partners themselves have not secured the minimum level of agreement required.

The Committee expresses the firm hope that all the necessary measures will be taken without further delay to bring the LAS and its implementing Decree into full conformity with the Convention. The Committee considers that structured tripartite dialogue in the Social Dialogue Commission should provide an appropriate forum to carry out an in-depth tripartite examination with a view to the preparation of draft amendments that take into account all of the matters raised. Recalling that it has been requesting the amendment of the legislation referred to above for over 20 years, and that many of the provisions concerned have been found to be unconstitutional in specific judicial procedures, the Committee hopes and expects that it will be able to note tangible progress in the near future.

Delays in procedures for the registration of trade unions and to obtain trade union status. For many years, the Committee has been requesting the Government to take the necessary measures to avoid unjustified delays in procedures for the registration of trade unions or the granting of trade union status. The Committee notes that the ITUC, CTA Workers and CTA Autonomous once again denounce the persistence of delays and refusals by the administrative authorities to recognize trade union status and to simply register trade unions. They allege that, although the latter procedures should be completed within 90 days, the authorities paralyze the procedure for years or set out requirements not envisaged in the law, obliging the organizations concerned to operate without legal status. The organizations once again provide long lists of cases in which trade union registration has not been granted (alleging unresolved delays of up to 16 years) as well as cases of trade union status (including the applications by the Federation of Energy Workers of the Argentine Republic (FeTERA) and the CTA Workers, for which the initial applications were submitted 19 and 15 years ago, respectively), and they denounce the fact that the Government has not taken any measures to resolve the situation. The Committee also notes the Government's indication that delays in the procedure for the registration of trade unions and the granting of trade union status are in the majority due to: (i) delays by the unions to comply with the requirements set out in the law; and (ii) the existence of pre-existing unions, which defend their position and lodge administrative and judicial appeals. The Committee recalls once again that such allegations of undue delays have been the subject of various cases brought before the Committee on Freedom of Association, both in recent complaints (Cases Nos 3331 and 3360) and more long-standing cases, and particularly the case relating to FeTERA, No. 2870, in which the Committee on Freedom of Association firmly urged the Government to take the necessary measures to grant the organization trade union status. The Committee once again firmly urges the Government to take the necessary measures to avoid unjustified delays or refusals in the procedures for the registration of trade unions or the granting of trade union status and to report any progress made in this respect. The Committee trusts that this issue will also be examined by the Social Dialogue Commission with a view to finding effective solutions which take into account the concerns of all the parties concerned.

Article 3. Right of trade unions to elect their representatives in full freedom and to organize their administration and activities. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the allegations made by workers' organizations concerning interference by the Government in trade union elections and delays in the registration of trade union officers. The Committee also noted with concern that some of these allegations had already been the subject of recommendations by the Committee on Freedom of Association (in particular, in Cases Nos 2865 and 2979). The CGT RA and the CTA Autonomous also referred to the publication of Provision No. 17-E/2017 by the National Directorate of Trade Union Associations, which ordered the exclusion from the trade union register of organizations that had not confirmed their operational activity within three years, in compliance with the periodic legal requirement set out in the LAS (the CTA Autonomous alleged that this Provision conferred immense discretionary power to sanction trade unions which were critical of the Government). The Committee welcomes the fact that Provision No. 17-E has been set aside by the governmental Decision No. 751/2019. The Committee also notes the Government's indication that: (i) the registration of officers is not subject to any time limits and the principal reason for delays is the submission of applications that are incomplete or lack documentation; and (ii) the procedure allows the examination of challenges to the electoral process, thereby guaranteeing the exercise of trade union democracy. The Committee also notes that the CTA Autonomous once again denounces: (a) interference with unions by the government authorities through the designation of delegates to assume administrative functions and to replace the representatives elected by the workers (although this has diminished over the past year, since December 2015, there has been interference of this type with 23 trade unions); and (b) the failure to issue, or delays in issuing, the accreditation of trade union officials, affecting their ability to avail themselves freely of the bank accounts of the unions and their capacity to operate, as well as other acts by the administrative authorities affecting the financing of unions, such as the failure to approve the document requiring the check-off of union dues. The Committee recalls once again the importance of ensuring non-interference by the administrative authorities in trade union elections and of avoiding undue delays in the accreditation of trade union officials, as well as ending any other interference that undermines the right of trade unions to elect their representatives in full freedom and to organize their administration and activities. In this regard, the Committee firmly hopes that the issues raised by the workers' organizations will be examined in the near future by the Social Dialogue Commission with a view to the adoption of appropriate measures, including at the legislative level where necessary, and it requests the Government to provide information on any developments in this respect.

Collective Bargaining Convention, 1981 (No. 154) (ratification: 1993)

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government in the light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020), which provides detailed and updated information on the state of collective bargaining and on the collective agreements approved in the country.

The Committee also notes (i) the observations of the Industrial Confederation of Argentina (UIA), communicated with the Government's supplementary report and relating to the role of collective bargaining in the management of the COVID-19 pandemic, alluding in particular to the adoption of bipartite protocols on action to prevent spread of the disease in workplaces; (ii) the observations of the General Confederation of Labour of the Argentine Republic (CGT RA), received on 27 September 2020, regarding the application of the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98). Those observations provide information on the situation of collective bargaining in the context of the pandemic, referring in particular to agreements between the CGT RA and the UIA in respect of a minimum wage floor and stability of employment, and recommending the automatic 60-day approval of the agreements concluded under section 223bis of the Labour Contracts Act and in accordance with the parameters agreed by the social partners. In that connection, those organizations allude to Ministerial Resolution No. 397/2020 which, as agreed, implements automatic approval of agreements; they report that certain sectoral agreements have been signed within this framework. The CGT RA adds that while most organizations postponed the formal start of 2020 negotiations, due to continued restrictions imposed by the pandemic, a number of unions began and completed their collective agreements; and (iii) the observations of the Confederation of Workers of Argentina (CTA Autonomous), received on 30 September 2020, also regarding collective bargaining in the context of the pandemic, and indicating that CTA Autonomous was not consulted in respect of the measures taken after the agreement between the CGT and the UIA, although the organization had asked to be included and had proposed measures to the authorities. It regrets that, in confronting the crisis, use had not been made of social dialogue through the Social Dialogue Commission. The observations also refer to the Supreme Court ruling of 3 September 2020, giving exclusive collective bargaining rights to workers' organizations with trade union status. The Committee notes that CTA Autonomous goes on to refer to observations by the Association of State

Workers (ATE), which affirm that: (i) not all provinces have legislation that specifically guarantees State workers' right to bargain collectively and that very few provinces have signed a collective labour agreement; and (ii) there is no guarantee of the existence of an impartial body that can act in cases of collective disputes between the State and its employees.

The Commission welcomes the use of collective bargaining in the management of the pandemic. The Committee also stresses the importance of a broad social dialogue with all representative workers' and employers' organizations when taking action to address crises affecting the interests of their members. The Committee requests the Government to communicate its observations regarding the issues raised in these supplementary observations.

The Committee reviewed the application of the Convention on the basis of the additional information received from the Government and the social partners this year (see Article 5 below), and the information at its disposal in 2019.

The Committee notes the observations of the Industrial Confederation of Argentina (UIA), received on 30 August 2019. The Committee also notes the observations of the Argentine Federation of the Judiciary (FJA), received on 27 August 2019, as well as of the General Confederation of Labour of the Argentine Republic (CGT-RA), received on 3 September 2019, and of the Confederation of Workers of Argentina (CTA Workers), received on 10 September 2019.

The Committee welcomes the creation of the Social Dialogue Committee and refers, in this respect, to its observation on the application of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87).

Article 5 of the Convention. Promotion of collective bargaining in the country. The Committee notes the detailed information provided by the Government concerning the collective bargaining situation in the country in 2017 (in which a total of 1,004 collective agreements and accords were signed, covering 4,180,000 workers), in 2018 (in which a total of 1,653 agreements and accords were signed, covering 4,300,000 workers) and in the first three months of 2019 (during which a total of 1518 approved agreements and accords were signed, covering 3,982,813 workers).

Collective bargaining of workers in the national judiciary. In its previous comments, the Committee urged the Government to take the necessary measures to guarantee the collective bargaining rights of workers in the national judiciary and the provinces. The Committee notes that, once again, the Government refers to the division of powers and recalls that the regulation of collective bargaining in the national judiciary falls within the exclusive competence of the Supreme Court and the legislative branch. The Government adds, in this respect, that two bills in that area had been submitted recently, which had lost parliamentary status without being addressed. Regarding the judiciaries of the different provinces, the Government indicates that progress has been made, reflected in intense bipartite negotiation activities, and indicates that collective bargaining is implemented in the Autonomous City of Buenos Aires, as well as in the provinces of Buenos Aires, Tucuman, Chaco, Rio Negro and Mendoza. The Committee also notes that the CGT RA states that the national judiciary continues to invoke its independence to evade the exercise of collective bargaining; and that the FJA reports that neither at the national level nor in 23 of the country's 28 provinces is the right of collective bargaining of workers in the judicial system respected. The Committee also recalls that these inadequacies in the promotion of collective bargaining of workers in the national judiciary have been the subject of various cases before the Committee on Freedom of Association (for example, Cases Nos 3078 and 3220). The Committee trusts that the Social Dialogue Committee will carry out an analysis of the necessary measures, adapted to national conditions, including legislation, which must be adopted to ensure the right to collective bargaining of workers in the national judiciary and in all the provinces of Argentina. The Committee encourages the Government to consider the possibility of inviting representatives of the judicial and legislative powers in question to engage with the Social Dialogue Committee for the purposes of this discussion. The Committee requests the Government to keep it informed of any developments in this respect.

Armenia

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 2006)

The Committee notes the observations of the Republican Union of Employers of Armenia (RUEA) and of the Confederation of Trade Unions of Armenia (CTUA) transmitted with the Government's report, which refer to the issues raised by the Committee below. The Committee further notes the CTUA observations received on 30 September 2020 referring to the issues raised by the Committee below and to the application of the Convention in practice. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments thereon.

Article 2 of the Convention. Right of workers and employers, without distinction whatsoever, to establish and join organizations. The Committee had previously requested the Government to take the necessary measures to amend the Constitution and the Law on Trade Unions so as to ensure that the following categories of workers could establish and join organizations of their own choosing: (i) employees of the Prosecutor's Office, judges and members of the Constitutional Court; (ii) civilians employed by the police and security service; (iii) self-employed workers; (iv) those working in liberal professions; and (v) workers in the informal economy. The Committee notes the Government's indication that constitutional amendments were adopted on 6 December 2015. The Committee notes with interest that pursuant to article 45, paragraph 1, of the amended Constitution everyone has the right to freedom of association, including the right to establish and join trade union organizations.

The Committee further notes the Government's indication that while the issue of amending the Law on Trade Unions will be discussed with the social partners, the right of civilian personnel in the police and security services to join trade unions is not restricted by section 6 of the Law on Trade Unions, by the Law on the Police Service or by the Law on the Service in the National Security Bodies. The Committee notes, however, that it stems from section 45 of the Law on Trade Unions, as amended in 2018, that only those with employment contracts can be members of a trade union and that pursuant to paragraph 3 of the same section, employees of the armed forces, police, national security, prosecutor's office, as well as judges, including judges of the Constitutional Court, cannot be members of a trade union organization. The Committee once again recalls that all workers, without distinction whatsoever, should have the right to establish and join organizations of their own choosing. It further recalls that the only authorized exceptions concern members of the police and the armed forces. It considers, however, that civilians employed in such services should be granted the right to establish and join organizations to further and defend their interests. The Committee therefore urges the Government to take the necessary measures to amend the Law on Trade Unions to ensure that employees of the Prosecutor's Office, judges (including of the Constitutional Court), civilians employed by the police and security services, self-employed workers, those working in liberal professions, and workers in the informal economy can establish and join organizations for furthering and defending their interests. It requests the Government to provide information on all progress made in this respect.

Minimum membership requirement. The Committee recalls that it had previously requested the Government to amend section 4 of the Law on Employers' Unions, providing for the number of employers required to form employers' organizations at the national level (over half of employers' organizations operating at the sectoral and territorial levels), sectoral level (over half of employers' organizations operating at the territorial levels) and territorial level (majority of employers in a particular administrative territory or employers' organizations from different sectors in a particular administrative territory); and to also amend section 2 of the Law on Trade Unions, setting out similar prerequisites for federations of trade unions at the territorial, sector and national levels, so as to lower the required minimum membership requirements. The Committee had considered that the minimum membership requirements as set out in the above legislative provisions are too high given that they would appear to ensure that in fact there is only one national level organization, one organization per sector and one territorial level organization per territory or a particular sector in the territory. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the Ministry of Labour and Social Issues has received draft amendments to the Law on Trade Unions and the Law on Employers' Unions. Recalling that it has been raising the issue of minimum membership requirement for the last ten years, the Committee expects that, in consultation with the social partners, both the Law on Trade Unions and the Law on Employers' Unions will be amended in the near future so as to lower the minimum membership requirements and to ensure that more than one organization can be established at various levels. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the developments in this regard.

Article 3. Right of organizations to organize their administration and activities in full freedom. The Committee recalls that it had previously requested the Government to amend:

- sections 13(2)(1) and 14 of the Law on Employers' Unions, which regulate in detail matters that should be decided upon by organizations themselves (such as the obligatory use of the words "employers' union" for all employers' organizations and "Armenia" for a national organization and the rights and responsibilities of the congress of an employers' organization);
- section 74(1) of the Labour Code, which requires a vote by two-thirds of an organization's (enterprise's) employees to declare a strike (or a vote by two thirds of employees of the subdivision if a strike is declared by a subdivision of an organization, as the case may be), so as to ensure that account is taken only of the votes cast, and that the required quorum and majority are fixed at a reasonable level; and
- section 77(2) of the Labour Code, according to which, minimum services are determined by the corresponding state and local self-governance entities, so as to ensure that social partners are able to participate in the definition of what constitutes a minimum service.

The Committee takes note of the Government's indication that in its view, sections 13(2)(1) and 14 of the Law on Employers' Unions are not inconsistent with Article 3 of the Convention and do not limit the right of the employers' unions to independently draft their regulations or by-laws, freely elect their representatives and organize their administration and activities. Recalling that the fundamental notion of Article 3 of Convention No. 87 is that workers and employers may decide for themselves the rules which should govern the administration of their organizations, the Committee once again requests the Government to consider amending the above-mentioned provisions in consultation with the social partners to ensure that only formal requirements are laid down by the national legislation with regard to the functioning of organizations.

The Committee further notes the Government's indication that the Labour Code is currently being reviewed to determine whether its above-mentioned sections should be amended. The Government informs, in particular, that it is suggested to amend section 74(1) of the Labour Code so as to require a favourable vote by the majority of employees who have participated in the closed ballot to call a strike if at least two-thirds of the total number of the employees of an organization/undertaking (or its subdivision) have participated in the ballot. The Government indicates that the question of acceptable quorum will be further discussed with the social partners. As regards section 77(2) of the Labour Code, the Committee notes that the Government's indication that a new proposal for amendments contains reference to the negotiation of minimum services between employers and workers' representatives. While welcoming the proposed amendments, the Committee recalls that the observance of a quorum of two-thirds of the total number of employees may also be difficult to reach and could restrict the right to strike in practice. It therefore requests the Government to ensure that the quorum and majority required for voting on a strike as well as to call a strike are fixed at a reasonable level. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the developments regarding the amendment of the Labour Code.

The Committee encourages the Government to pursue its efforts in addressing the issues raised above with the assistance of the ILO and in consultation with the social partners.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 2003)

The Committee notes the observations of the Confederation of Trade Unions of Armenia alleging violations of the Convention in practice received on 30 September 2020. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments thereon.

Article 4 of the Convention. Collective bargaining. The Committee had previously noted that pursuant to sections 23, 25, 45, 55 and 56 of the Labour Code, both trade unions and "workers' representatives" enjoyed the right to negotiate collective agreements at the enterprise level. Recalling that direct negotiation between the undertaking and its employees, bypassing representative organizations, where these exist, is detrimental to the principle that negotiation between employers and organizations of workers should be encouraged and promoted, the Committee had requested the Government to take the necessary measures to amend its legislation so as to bring it into conformity with the Convention. The Committee notes the Government's explanation that for the purpose of collective bargaining, a trade union is entitled to represent all workers of an undertaking if this union represents over half of the company's workers. A collective agreement signed by that union would apply to all workers of the enterprise in question. If a union represents less than half of all workers of an enterprise, it can only negotiate on behalf of its own members. In the absence of a trade union, the representation functions can be transferred to the relevant regional or sectoral trade union. Pursuant to section 23 of the Labour Code, if no trade union exists at an enterprise, or if the existing unions represent less than half of the employees of the undertaking, the staff meeting may elect other representatives. In the latter case, pursuant to section 56 of the Labour Code, the union which represents less than half of all workers of an enterprise bargains collectively through a joint representative body together with other elected representatives. The Government thus considers that there is no need to amend the Labour Code in this respect. The Committee recalls that, under the terms of the Convention, the right of collective bargaining lies with workers' organizations of whatever level, and that negotiation between employers or their organizations and representatives of non-unionized workers should only be possible when there are no trade unions at the respective level. The Committee emphasizes that where there exists a representative trade union and it is active within the enterprise or branch of activity concerned, the authorization for other workers' representatives to bargain collectively not only weakens the position of the trade union, but also undermines ILO rights and principles on collective bargaining (see the 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraphs 239–240). The Committee regrets that despite its numerous requests, section 23 of the Labour Code has not been amended. The Committee expects the Government to take immediate action to amend section 23 of the Labour Code and requests it to provide information on any progress made in this regard.

The Committee had previously noted that according to sections 59(4) and 61(2) of the Labour Code, if an enterprise is restructured or privatized, the collective agreement is considered to be unilaterally terminated, irrespective of its validity period. Recalling that neither the restructuring nor the privatization of an enterprise should in itself automatically result in the extinction of all the obligations resulting from the collective agreement, and that the parties should in any case be in a position to advocate the application of relevant clauses such as those concerning severance pay, the Committee had requested the Government to amend these provisions accordingly. The Committee notes the Government's indication that in case of a merger of two or more enterprises into one structure, maintaining a collective agreement would not be possible if all of the enterprises concerned had their own collective agreements, as each legal entity can have only one collective agreement. The Committee notes, on the one hand, that the situation described by the Government is only one of many possible situations covered by the above-mentioned provisions of the Labour Code, which deal with restructuring and privatization in general, and on the other, even in the situation referred to by the Government, a merger between two enterprises should not result in workers automatically losing all rights and guaranties obtained through collective bargaining. The Committee thus considers that before a new collective agreement can be negotiated and signed, the previous agreement shall remain in force. The Committee therefore reiterates its previous request and asks the Government to provide information on the progress made in this respect.

Collective bargaining in practice. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the number of collective agreements signed and in force in the country and to indicate the sectors and levels concerned as well as the number of workers covered.

The Committee reminds the Government that it can avail itself of the technical assistance of the Office.

Australia

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1973)

Articles 2, 3 and 5 of the Convention. Right of workers to form and join organizations of their own choosing without previous authorization and of these organizations to elect their officers, freely organize their activities and formulate their programmes without undue interference. In its previous comment, the Committee noted the deep and serious concern expressed by the ITUC regarding the attempt by the Government to pass the Fair Work (Registered Organisations) Amendment (Ensuring Integrity) Bill 2019 into law, which it considered was contrary to the Convention. Having noted with concern the numerous proposals raised in the Bill which would broaden the possibilities of intervention in the internal functioning of workers' organizations, the Committee had called upon the Government to review the proposals in the Bill with the representative workers' and employers' organizations concerned so as to ensure that any measures adopted were in full conformity with the Convention and to keep it informed in this regard. The Committee notes from the Government's report that, on 26 May 2020, the Prime Minister announced that the Government would not pursue a further vote in the Parliament on the Ensuring Integrity Bill. The Prime Minister indicated that this decision was made in good faith in order to maximise the opportunity for genuine negotiation, compromise and cooperation as part of an industrial relations reform process designed to create jobs and chart a path back to mutually beneficial prosperity following the COVID-19 pandemic. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in its future reports on any legislative developments or proposals concerning the industrial relations reform process.

Article 3. Right of organizations to freely organize their activities and to formulate their programmes. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to take all appropriate measures, in consultation with the social partners, to review: (i) the provisions of the Competition and Consumer Act prohibiting secondary boycotts; (ii) sections 423, 424 and 426 of the Fair Work Act (FWA) relating to suspension or termination of protected industrial action in specific circumstances; (iii) sections 30J and 30K of the Crimes Act prohibiting industrial action threatening trade or commerce with other countries or among states; and (iv) boycotts resulting in the obstruction or hindrance of the performance of services by the Government or the transport of goods or persons in international trade; and to provide detailed information on the application of these provisions in practice with a view to bringing them into full conformity with the Convention.

The Committee notes the Government's reiteration that the 2015 reports of all three independent bodies, which had examined the operation of secondary boycott provisions under the Competition and Consumer Act, found that a strong case remained for retaining their prohibition. As regards the Crimes Act, the Committee notes the Government's indication that there have been no referrals for prosecution of an offence contrary to section 30J since the 1980s and that there has only been one prosecution of an offence contrary to section 30K in 1988. The Government therefore does not consider that these offences are being used in a manner contrary to the right of workers' organizations and does not consider that a review of these provisions is necessary at this time.

While duly noting the absence of prosecution under the Crimes Act in recent times, the Committee, observing the chilling impact that these provisions may nevertheless have on the right of workers' organizations to organize their activities and carry out their programmes in full freedom, once again requests the Government, to continue to keep the above-mentioned provisions under review, in consultation with the social partners, so as to ensure that they are not applied in a manner contrary to this right. It further requests the Government to continue providing detailed information on the application of these provisions in practice.

In its 2019 report, the Government indicated that it considers the above provisions dealing with industrial action to be necessary, reasonable and proportionate to support the objects of the FWA, which is to provide a balanced framework for cooperative and productive industrial relations that promotes national economic prosperity and social inclusion for all Australians. While protected industrial action is legitimate during bargaining for a proposed enterprise agreement, there may be cases where the impact of that action on the parties or on third parties is so severe that it is in the public interest, or even potentially the interests of those engaging in the action, that the industrial action cease, at least temporarily. The Government adds that a variety of factors must be taken into account when considering an application under section 423 of the FWA and that such applications are rare, with two applications lodged in 2016–17 and one application lodged in 2017–18. As regards section 424, there have been relatively few applications with only nine in 2017–18, in contrast to 579 applications for a protected action ballot order during the same period. Finally, there were only two applications made under section 426 in 2017–18.

The Government indicates that no decisions were made under sections 423 and 426, while it provides some examples of decisions taken by the FWC under section 424 either to suspend or terminate protected industrial action or to refuse to issue such an order. Cases concerning the termination or suspension of industrial action included: (a) terminated action in an oil refinery that would cause significant damage to the Western Australian economy estimated at nearly AUD90 million per day as well as to the Australian economy as a whole; (b) suspension for two months of industrial action by employees of court security and custodial services where the action threatened to endanger the personal safety, health and welfare of part of the population; (c) the suspension in the form of an indefinite ban on a work stoppage in railway transport which threatened to endanger the welfare of a part of the population and threated to cause significant damage to the Sydney economy; and (d) termination of industrial action affecting the Australian Border Force. An application requesting termination of industrial action in independent schools was however refused noting that, while the action was causing "inconvenience", it was "not as yet causing significant harm".

The Committee appreciates the information transmitted by the Government concerning the practical application of these provisions in the FWA. The Committee notes that some of the services concerned in the cases where industrial action was either suspended or terminated (such as border control, court security and custodial services) may be understood to be essential services in the strict sense of the term or public servants exercising activity in the name of the State where strike action may be restricted. The Committee recalls however that it does not consider oil refinery or railway transport to constitute services in which this right may be fully restricted, although the Government may consider the establishment of negotiated minimum services.

In the light of the above comments, the Committee requests the Government to keep it informed of any steps taken within the framework of the overall industrial relations reform process to review these provisions of the FWA.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1973)

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020). The Committee proceeded with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the supplementary information received from the Government this year, as well as on the basis of the information at its disposal in 2019.

Article 4 of the Convention. Promotion of collective bargaining. Scope of collective bargaining. Fair Work Act (FWA). In its previous comments, the Committee noted that sections 186(4), 194 and 470–475 of the FWA exclude from collective bargaining as "unlawful terms" any terms relating to the extension of unfair dismissal benefits to workers not yet employed for the statutory period, the provision of strike pay, the payment of bargaining fees to a trade union, and the creation of a union's right to entry for compliance purposes more extensive than under the provisions of the FWA. It had observed the concerns expressed by the Australian Council of Trade Unions (ACTU) with respect to the restrictions in the FWA on the content of agreements and requested the Government to review these sections, in consultation with the social partners, so as to bring them into accordance with the Convention.

The Committee notes that the Government considers these provisions to be appropriate to Australia's national conditions (as permitted by Article 4) and that the formulation "matters pertaining to the employment relationship" in section 172(1) in relation to permissible content in enterprise agreements is a long-standing part of Australia's industrial relations framework developed through extensive tripartite negotiation and consultation with the social partners, including the ACTU. The Government adds that the post-implementation review of the FWA by an independent expert panel (the Review Panel) was informed by submissions from various stakeholders (including the social partners) and supported the FWA content rules. Finally, the Government concludes that the current provisions dealing with permitted matters in enterprise agreements are necessary, reasonable and proportionate to support the objects of the FWA.

Emphasizing that the measures adapted to the national conditions referred to in Article 4 of the Convention should aim to encourage and promote the full development and utilization of machinery for collective bargaining, and recalling that legislation or measures taken unilaterally by the authorities to restrict the scope of negotiable issues are often incompatible with the Convention, while tripartite discussions for the voluntary preparation of guidelines for collective bargaining are a particularly appropriate method of resolving such difficulties (see the 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 215), the Committee once again requests the Government to review the above-mentioned sections of the FWA, in consultation with the social partners, so as to leave the greatest possible autonomy to the parties in collective bargaining.

The Committee also notes the supplementary information provided by the State of Queensland that as part of the health workforce response to the COVID-19 pandemic, a set of industrial relations principles and supporting documents were developed in partnership between Queensland Health and the relevant unions. These principles form an overarching employment framework in addition to the existing Certified Agreements and Awards, to allow for the rapid and respectful consultation required to make rapid temporary changes, while ensuring that industrial obligations continue to be met. The principles enshrined a commitment to flexibility on both the part of the employer and staff and ensure that the union rights of entry and right to organize continued to be met throughout the pandemic in a safe manner. The Committee welcomes these efforts to ensure broad-ranged consultation and effective and safe union access to defend workers' interests in the challenging context of the COVID-19 pandemic.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Bahamas

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 2001)

Article 2 of the Convention. Right of workers and employers, without distinction whatsoever, to establish and join organizations. Noting that the Industrial Relations Act, 2012 (IRA) does not apply to the prison service (section 3), the Committee had previously requested the Government to specify the manner in which prison staff and the relevant organizations enjoy the rights and guarantees enshrined in the Convention. The Committee notes that the Government reiterates that the Bahamas Prison Staff Association allows for prison staff (denominated correctional officers under the national legislation) to have a public platform to address any concern that its members may have, yet also acknowledges that unfortunately prison and correctional officers do not benefit from all the rights and guarantees enshrined within Convention 87 based on their substantial employment position. The Committee recalls that it had previously expressed its concerns with regard to sections 39 and 40 of the Correctional Officers (Code of Conduct) Rules 2014, which limit the rights of association and representation to approved staff organizations on matters related to the conditions and welfare of the officers as a group. The Committee must emphasize that all workers and employers, without distinction whatsoever, have the right to establish and, subject only to the rules of the organization concerned, to join organizations of their own choosing without previous authorization, and that these organizations should enjoy all guarantees under the Convention. Recalling that the only exceptions from the application of the Convention concern the armed forces and the police, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures – including by revising section 3 of the IRA and the Correctional Officers (Code of Conduct) Rules, 2014 – with a view to ensuring that prison staff enjoy all rights and guarantees under the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any developments in this regard.

Right of workers and employers to establish organizations without previous authorization. In its previous comments the Committee noted that under section 8(1)(e) of the IRA, beyond consideration of the specific requirements for registration, the Registrar shall refuse to register a trade union if she/he considers, after applying the rules for the registration of trade unions, that the trade union should not be registered; and that according to section 1 of the First Schedule of the IRA, in applying the rules for the registration of trade unions, the Registrar shall exercise his/her discretion. Thus, the Committee had requested the Government to take the necessary measures to limit the Registrar's powers in relation to the registration of trade unions and employers' organizations. In this respect, the Committee recalls that conferring upon the competent authority a discretionary power to accept or refuse an application for registration can be tantamount in practice to imposing "previous authorization", which is incompatible with Article 2 of the Convention. Noting with regret that the Government has provided no information in this regard, the Committee once again requests the Government to revise section 8(1)(e) and the First Schedule of the IRA to ensure that, beyond the verification of formalities, the Registrar has no discretionary powers to refuse the registration of trade unions and employers' organizations.

Article 3. Right of workers' and employers' organizations to draw up their constitutions and rules and to elect their representatives in full freedom. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that section 20(2) of the IRA – which provides that the secret ballot for election or removal of trade union officers and for amendment of the constitution of trade unions shall be held under the supervision of the Registrar or a designated officer – is contrary to the Convention. The Committee had thus expressed the hope that specific measures would be taken for the amendment of said provision. Noting the Government's indication that section 20(2) of the IRA is presently under review by the National Tripartite Council, and recalling that the amendment of the above-mentioned provision is a long-standing issue, the Committee urges the Government to take all the necessary measures to amend section 20(2) of the IRA in the near future with a view to ensuring that trade unions can conduct ballots without interference from the authorities, and requests the Government to provide information on any progress achieved in this regard.

Right of organizations to freely organize their activities and to formulate their programmes. The Committee had previously noted that, when a strike is organized or continued in violation of the provisions concerning the trade disputes procedure, the IRA provides for excessive sanctions, including imprisonment for up to two years (sections 74(3), 75(3), 76(2)(b) and 77(2)). On that occasion it recalled that no penal sanctions should be imposed against a worker for having carried out peaceful strikes and that such sanctions could be envisaged only where, during a strike, violence against persons or property or other serious infringements of rights have been committed. Noting that the Government did not provide its observations thereon, the Committee urges the Government to amend the above-mentioned sections of the IRA to ensure that no penal sanctions may be imposed for having carried out a peaceful strike.

Article 5. Right to affiliate to an international federation or confederation. The Committee had previously noted that, under the terms of section 39 of the IRA, it is not lawful for a trade union to be a member of any body constituted or organized outside the Bahamas without a licence from the minister, who has discretionary power in this regard. While having further noted the Government's indication that these approvals are generally granted and do not represent a challenge, the Committee had requested the Government to take measures to align national legislation with such practice and to repeal section 39 of the IRA in order to give full effect to the right of workers' and employers' organizations to affiliate with international organizations of workers and employers. In this respect, the Committee recalls that international solidarity of workers and employers also requires that their national federations and confederations be able to group together and act freely at the international level (see the 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 163). Noting the Government's indication that section 39 of the IRA is under review by the National Tripartite Council and recalling that the Committee has been requesting the Government to address this matter since 2006, the Committee firmly expects that the Government will take all the necessary measures to ensure that this section will be repealed in the near future and requests the Government to provide information on any developments in this regard.

The Committee reminds the Government that it may avail itself of the technical assistance of the Office and hopes that it will be able to observe progress in the near future.

[The Government is asked to reply in full to the present comments in 2021.]

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1976)

Article 2 of the Convention. Adequate protection against acts of interference. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to take the necessary measures for the adoption of legislative provisions to protect workers' and employers' organizations against acts of interference by each other or each other's agents, accompanied by effective and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions. While noting that the Government acknowledges the concerns of the Committee with regard to the absence of legislative provisions providing for protection against acts of interference, the Committee observes that it does not provide information on the measures envisaged in this regard. Recalling that it has been addressing this matter since 2013, the Committee firmly expects that the Government will provide information on the measures taken with a view to giving effect to Article 2 of the Convention without further delay. It requests the Government to provide information on any developments in this regard.

Article 4. Representativeness. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that section 41 of the Industrial Relations Act (IRA) provides that in order for a trade union to be recognized for bargaining purposes, it must represent at least 50 per cent of workers of the bargaining unit, and recalled that under a system of designation of an exclusive bargaining agent, if no union represents the required percentage of workers to be declared the exclusive bargaining agent, collective bargaining rights should be granted to all the unions in the unit, jointly or separately, at least on behalf of their own members. While noting that the Government acknowledges the concerns of the Committee in this respect, it notes with regret that it does not provide any specific information on the measures taken or envisaged in order to align its legislation with the Convention. Recalling that it has been raising this issue since 2013, the Committee urges the Government to take all the necessary measures to review the IRA so as to bring it into line with the Convention. It requests the Government to provide information on any developments in this regard.

Right of prison guards to bargain collectively. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that sections 39 - 40 of the Correctional Officers (Code of Conduct) Rules 2014, allowed the Bahamas Prison Officers Association (BPOA) to make representations to the Commissioner of the Department of Correctional Services in matters relating to the conditions and welfare of officers as a group. Noting that these provisions did not appear to provide collective bargaining rights to the BPOA, the Committee requested the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure that prison guards can fully enjoy the rights and guarantees set out in the Convention. The Committee notes with regret the Government's indications that the above-mentioned provisions do not provide for the right of collective bargaining to the correctional officers and that there are no legislative discussions regarding the matter. Recalling once again that the right to bargain collectively also applies to prison staff, and that the establishment of a simple consultation procedures for public servants who are not engaged in the administration of the State is not sufficient, the Committee firmly expects that the Government will take the necessary measures, including legislative, to ensure that prison guards can fully enjoy the rights and guarantees set out in the Convention and provide information on any developments in this regard.

Collective bargaining in practice. The Committee further requests the Government to provide information on the number of collective agreements signed and in force in the country and to indicate the sector and the number of workers covered.

Bangladesh

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1972)

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government on 15 September 2020 in response to a complaint pending under article 26 of the ILO Constitution. In light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020), the Committee proceeded with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of this supplementary information received from the Government and the observations submitted by the social partners this year, as well as on the basis of the information at its disposal in 2019.

The Committee notes that the mentioned complaint under article 26 of the ILO Constitution – alleging non-compliance by Bangladesh with this Convention, as well as the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) – is pending before the Governing Body. At its 340th Session (October–November 2020), the Governing Body, in view of the information communicated by the Government on the situation of freedom of association in the country and taking due note both of the Government's commitment to continue to further improve the overall situation and to address the outstanding issues before the supervisory bodies: (i) requested the Government to develop, with the support of the Office and of the secretariat of the Workers' and Employers' groups, and in full consultation with the social partners concerned, a time-bound roadmap of actions with tangible outcomes to address all the outstanding issues mentioned in the complaint submitted under article 26 to the 108th Session of the International Labour Conference (2019); (ii) requested the Government to report on progress made in that regard to the Governing Body at its next session; and (iii) deferred the decision on further action in respect of the complaint until its 341st Session (March 2021).

The Committee notes the observations of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), received on 1 September 2019 and 15 September 2020, referring to matters addressed in this comment and alleging violent crackdown on strikes of garment workers, as well as continued retaliation against workers in connection with trade union activities and surveillance of trade unionists by the authorities.

The Committee notes the 2018 amendment of the Bangladesh Labour Act, 2006 (BLA) and the adoption of the 2019 Export Processing Zones Labour Act (ELA).

Civil liberties. In its previous comments, the Committee expressed deep concern at the continued violence and intimidation of workers and urged the Government to provide information on the remaining specific allegations of violence and intimidation and to take all necessary measures to prevent such incidents in the future and ensure that, if they occur, they are properly investigated. The Committee further notes the Government's general statement that: any case of grave allegations of violence and intimidation is investigated by the Department of Police or the Ministry of Home Affairs; preventive measures have been put in place, including awareness-raising, training and seminars for police personnel on human and labour rights; and 29 committees have been formed in eight labour-intensive districts, comprised of officials from the Department of Labour (DOL) and the Department of Inspection for Factories and Establishments (DIFE), with the aim of ensuring peaceful and congenial working conditions in ready-made garment (RMG) factories through a number of concrete activities, such as resolving adverse situations in consultation with workers' and employers' representatives, publicizing the helpline introduced by the DIFE, reporting to the Ministry on the prevailing labour situation, etc. According to the supplementary information provided by the Government, there are also proposals to further increase the manpower of the DIFE with additional 1,698 positions, including senior positions.

The Committee notes, however, with concern the allegations of violent suppression by the police of several workers' protests in 2018 and 2019 communicated by the ITUC, which denounce the use of rubber bullets, tear gas and water cannons, and the raiding of homes and destruction of property, as a result of which one worker was killed and more than a hundred injured, as well as the filing of false criminal complaints against hundreds of named unionists and thousands of unnamed persons. The Committee notes the Government's detailed reply thereto and observes that no information was provided in respect of: (i) the alleged injuries to 20 rickshaw drivers during suppression of protests in April 2018; (ii) the alleged injuries to 25 jute mill workers after dispersal of two protests in Chittagong in August 2018; (iii) the alleged injuries to ten garment workers during a protest over non-payment of wages in Gazipur in September 2018; and (iv) the alleged repression of export-processing zones (EPZs) workers for attempting to exercise their limited rights permitted under the law. The Committee further notes with concern the 2020 ITUC allegations referring to: (i) violent crackdowns on strikes in September 2019 and July 2020, resulting in injuries to the workers; (ii) continued anti-union retaliation against garment sector workers, including blacklisting and pending criminal charges against hundreds of workers in connection with the December 2018 and January 2019 minimum wage protests; and (iii) increased pressure and state surveillance of garment federations by a newly-formed unit in the Department of National Security, which resulted in at least 175 trade union leaders and active members being blacklisted and 26 of them facing criminal and civil charges. In this regard, the Committee recalls once again that a truly free and independent trade union movement can only develop in a climate free from violence, pressure and threats of any kind against the leaders and members of such organizations. The Committee notes that the Committee on Freedom of Association has also been examining allegations of mass retaliation, criminalization, continued surveillance and intimidation of workers for trade union activities, with 19 criminal cases pending against more than 520 workers, in relation to the December 2018 and January 2019 minimum wage protests (see 392nd Report, October 2020, Case No. 3263, paragraphs 266–287). The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the remaining specific allegations of violence and repression, as well as on the 2020 ITUC allegations, including to report on any investigations or prosecutions initiated and the results thereof.

The Committee encourages the Government to continue to provide all necessary training and awareness-raising to the police and other State agents to sensitize them about human and trade union rights with the aim of avoiding the use of excessive force and ensuring full respect for civil liberties during public assemblies and demonstrations, and requests the Government to take all necessary measures to prevent such incidents of violence and repression in the future and ensure that, if they occur, they are properly investigated.

Article 2 of the Convention. Right to organize. Registration of trade unions. In its previous comment, having observed that the number of rejected applications for registration remained high, the Committee requested the Government to continue to take all necessary measures to ensure that the registration process is a simple formality; to provide updated statistics as to the overall number of applications for registration received, accepted and rejected, and to clarify the status of the 509 applications submitted through the online system, which were not granted. The Committee notes the Government's indication that: (i) the Standard Operating Procedures (SOPs) have been incorporated in the 2018 amendment of the BLA as a new section and the concerned officials received training on the subject; (ii) after the adoption of the SOPs, the success rate in union registration has increased from 70 per cent in 2017 before the adoption of the SOPs to 81 per cent after their adoption, 82 per cent in 2018, 73 per cent in 2019 and 86 per cent in 2020 (the overall number of registered trade unions increased from 6,580 in December 2012 to 8,342 in August 2020, whereas the number of trade unions in the RMG sector grew from 132 to 945); (iii) although the rejection rate remains high it can be further reduced through training of concerned DOL officials and workers and, with support from the ILO, effort is being taken in this regard; (iv) if an application for registration is incomplete, the applicant may resubmit it after having complied with the Registrar's observations or appeal to the Labour Court within 30 days; sometimes, instead of taking legal action, the applicants submit repeated applications which can be a cause for repeated rejection; (v) if an application is incomplete due to non-fulfilment of the requirements or lacking information and the concerned parties are not able to meet the objection raised by the Registrar within 15 days, the application will be filed without any action; (vi) there are no cases of arbitrary refusal of registration but applications can be rejected for not meeting one of the requirements set out in the BLA and the decision is communicated to the applicant by registered post; (vii) the time limit for the DOL to register a trade union was reduced from 60 to 55 days and the time limit to communicate any objection to the applicant and for the applicant to reply was reduced from 15 to 12 days (section 182(1), (2) and (4)); (viii) on the basis of 546 applications granted between March 2015 and April 2018, the average time for registration is 45 days; (ix) the provisions for online registration are not yet mandatory according to the BLA and workers require intensive training on online registration, for which a request has been submitted to the ILO, Dhaka; (x) due to the huge volume of documents that have to be submitted and considering that the online registration is not yet mandatory, the applicants and the service providers follow a combination of the manual and online systems; (xi) due to the upgrading of the software the public database on registration is currently unavailable for a limited period; (xii) once the upgrade is complete, the database will include information on applications for registration accepted and rejected, registration of sectoral and national federations and confederations, trade union-related court cases, conciliation, election of collective bargaining agents, anti-union discrimination and information on participation committees; (xiii) as for the 509 applications for registration referred to previously, they were processed manually; (xiv) trade union registration functions of the DOL have been decentralized and there are now 16 offices mandated to give registration (head office, six divisional labour offices and nine regional labour offices); and (xv) the Government has completed the upgrade of the Directorate of Labour to a Department of Labour, which has resulted in an increase of manpower from 712 to 921, a considerable increase in the DOL budget, and the creation of two additional divisional labour offices.

The Committee takes note of the detailed information provided by the Government and welcomes the increase of manpower of the DOL, as well as the decentralization of registration, which have the potential to increase the rapidity and efficiency of the registration process. The Committee observes however, that despite the Government's efforts to simplify the process and ensure its transparency, registration seems to remain overly complicated, obliging the applicants to comply with stringent conditions and submit numerous documents, leading to the online registration not being fully functional. While duly noting the reported decrease in the rate of rejections of trade union registration applications (from 26 per cent reported in 2019 to 14 per cent reported in 2020), the Committee recalls that this number seems to refer only to the rejection of complete applications and does not include applications which the Registrar deems to be incomplete and which are then filed by the DOL without further action. The Committee also notes in this connection that, according to the ITUC, the registration process remains extremely burdensome, the SOPs fail to prevent arbitrary denial of applications, the Registrar routinely imposes conditions not based in the law or regulations and the Joint Director of Labour retains total discretionary power to refuse registration for false or fabricated reasons. In light of the above, while welcoming the decrease in the rate of rejections of trade union registration applications and noting the Government's commitment to a further reduction in the number of rejected trade union applications, the Committee encourages the Government to continue to take all necessary measures to ensure that registration is, both in law and practice, a simple, objective, rapid and transparent process, which does not restrict the right of workers to establish organizations without previous authorization. It encourages the Government to explore, in cooperation with the social partners, concrete ways of simplifying the registration process to make it more user-friendly and accessible to all workers, as well as to provide, where necessary, training to workers on submitting complete and duly documented applications for trade union registration. It also encourages the Government to provide comprehensive training to divisional and regional officers who, following the decentralization of the registration process, are responsible for registration of trade unions, so as to ensure that they have sufficient knowledge and capacities to handle applications for registration rapidly and efficiently. While further noting the technical difficulties currently encountered, the Committee trusts that both the online registration system and the publicly available database will be fully operational in the near future so as to ensure total transparency of the registration process. Regretting that the Government fails to provide full statistics on registration, the Committee requests it once again to provide updated statistics on the overall number of applications submitted, granted, filed and rejected, disaggregated by year and sector.

Minimum membership requirements. In its previous comments, the Committee urged the Government to continue to take the necessary measures to review sections 179(2) and 179(5) of the BLA without delay, in consultation with the social partners, with a view to truly reducing the minimum membership requirement. The Committee notes the Government's indication that: (i) through the 2018 BLA amendment, the minimum membership requirement to form a trade union and maintain its registration has been reduced from 30 to 20 per cent of the total number of workers employed in the establishment in which a union is formed; (ii) since this reduction, a total of 216 trade unions have been registered; (iii) section 179(5) of the BLA which limits the number of trade unions in an establishment or group of establishments to a maximum of three might require some time to amend; and (iv) both issues may be considered at the next revision of the BLA. While welcoming the reduction in the minimum membership requirement, the Committee observes that the 20 per cent threshold is still likely to be excessive, especially in large enterprises, and notes that, according to the ITUC, it does in practice constitute a hurdle for the workforce to organize in large companies. The Committee also observes that a trade union formed in a group of establishments (defined as more than one establishment in a particular area carrying out the same or identical industry) can only be registered if it has as members not less than 30 per cent of the total number of workers employed in all establishments, an excessive requirement that unduly restricts the right of workers to establish sectoral or industry unions. The Committee requests the Government to clarify whether, in handling applications for registration, the reduced minimum membership requirement is being applied even in the absence of adjustments to the Bangladesh Labour Rules (BLR) and, should this not be the case, to take the necessary steps without delay to apply these amendments so as to facilitate trade union registration and to indicate the results once it has been applied. The Committee also requests the Government to indicate whether the reduced minimum membership requirement has had any impact on the overall number of trade union registrations submitted and granted, especially in large enterprises. Noting the Government's openness to further reducing the threshold, the Committee expects the Government to engage in meaningful discussions with the social partners in order to: continue to review the BLA with the aim of reducing the minimum membership requirements to a reasonable level, at least for large enterprises and trade unions in a group of establishments; amend section 179(5); and repeal section 190(f) that allows for cancellation of a trade union if its membership falls below the minimum membership requirement.

With regard to the application of the BLA to workers in the agricultural sector, the Committee notes the Government's indication that the BLA is applicable to workers engaged in commercial agricultural farms where at least five workers are employed – they can participate in trade union activities and collective bargaining – and that small agricultural farms where less than five workers are employed are characterized by low productivity and subsistence farming and generally do not express any interest in trade union activities. While noting the Government's explanation, the Committee recalls that workers in small farms should also be allowed to form or at least join existing trade unions, even if in practice this may not result in a common occurrence. The Committee had also previously requested the Government to clarify, under this Convention and the Right of Association (Agriculture) Convention, 1921 (No. 11), whether Rule 167(4) of the BLR establishes a 400 minimum membership requirement to form an agricultural trade union and to provide information on its effects in practice and its impact on the right of agricultural workers to form trade union organizations of their own choosing. The Committee notes the Government's statement that workers in mechanized farms run for commercial purposes may organize according to the existing provisions of the BLA (the Government provides statistics on the number of existing trade unions in various agricultural sectors) and workers in family-based subsistence farms characterized by few workers can form groups of establishment under Rule 167(4). The Government further explains that Rule 167(4) erroneously referred to the requirement of 400 workers to form a trade union but that this requirement has been redefined through a gazette notification in January 2017. The Rule thus provides an opportunity for workers engaged in field crop production to form a group of establishments in every subdistrict or district, if there are at least five workers in each farm and a minimum of 400 workers unite (there are 18 such entities registered with the Department of Labour). According to the Government, since 77 per cent of the population lives in villages and agriculture represents the main source of livelihood, this membership requirement is not too high. Taking due note of the Government's clarification but observing that the requirement of 400 workers to form a group of establishments in one district might still be excessive, especially considering that, in order to reach the 400 threshold, a large number of small family farms would need to unite, the Committee requests the Government to endeavour to reduce this requirement, in consultation with the social partners, to a reasonable level so as not to unduly restrict the right to organize of agricultural workers.

Articles 2 and 3. Right to organize, elect officers and carry out activities freely. Bangladesh Labour Act. In its previous comments, the Committee had urged the Government to take the necessary measures, in consultation with the social partners, to continue to review and amend a number of provisions of the BLA in order to ensure that any restrictions on the exercise of the right to freedom of association are in conformity with the Convention. The Committee notes the detailed information provided on tripartite consultations held before the 2018 BLA amendment, as well as the Government's indication that reform in the labour sector has been a part of national political commitment. The Committee notes with satisfaction the following modifications introduced in the BLA: addition of section 182(7) instructing the Government to adopt SOPs for the processing of applications for registration of trade unions; repeal of section 184(2)–(4) imposing excessive restrictions on organizing in civil aviation; repeal of section 190(d) allowing cancellation of a trade union due to violation of any of the basic provisions of its constitution; repeal of section 202(22) providing for automatic cancellation of a union if, in an election for determination of collective bargaining agent, it obtains less than 10 per cent of the total votes cast; addition of section 205(12) stating that there is no requirement to form a participation committee in an establishment where there is a trade union; and addition of section 348(A) which provides for the establishment of a Tripartite Consultative Council to provide advice to the Government on matters related to law, policy and labour issues.

The Committee welcomes the clarification that workers in the informal sector do not need to provide identity cards issued by an establishment when unions apply for registration but can also use a national identity card or birth registration certificate (section 178(2)(a)(iii)), as well as the replacement of the obligation to obtain approval from the Government by an obligation to inform the Government of any funds received from any national or international source, except union dues (section 179(1)(d)). The Committee further welcomes the reduction of the requirement of support of two thirds of trade union members to call a strike to 51 per cent (section 211(1)). The Committee also notes that the 2018 amendments introduced section 196(4) providing for the adoption of SOPs for investigating unfair labour practices on the part of the workers and reduced by half the maximum prison sentence imposable on workers for a series of violations – unfair labour practices, instigation and participation in an illegal strike or a go-slow, participation in activities of unregistered trade unions and dual trade union membership (sections 291(2)–(3), 294–296, 299 and 300). However, the Committee observes that the sanctions still include imprisonment for activities that do not justify the severity of the sanction and recalls that it has been requesting the Government to eliminate such penalties from the BLA and to let the penal system address any possible criminal acts.

Taking due note of the above amendments introduced to improve compliance with the Convention, the Committee expects them to be applied in practice without delay so as to enhance the right to organize of workers and employers and requests the Government to indicate whether they are fully in force and applied or whether their application is dependent upon the issuance of a revised BLR.

The Committee regrets that many other additional changes it has been requesting for a number of years have either not been addressed or have been addressed only partially, including some that were previously announced by the Government for amendment. In this regard, the Committee emphasizes once again the need to further review the BLA to ensure its conformity with the Convention regarding the following matters: (i) scope of the law – restrictions on numerous sectors and workers remain, including, among others, Government workers, university teachers and domestic workers (sections 1(4), 2(49) and (65) and 175); (ii) one remaining restriction on organizing in civil aviation (section 184(1) – the provision should clarify that trade unions in civil aviation can be formed irrespective of whether they wish to affiliate with international federations or not); (iii) restrictions on organizing in groups of establishments (sections 179(5) and 183(1)); (iv) restrictions on trade union membership (sections 2(65), 175, 193 and 300); (v) interference in trade union activity, including cancellation of registration for reasons that do not justify the severity of the act (sections 192, 196(2)(b) read in conjunction with 190(1)(c), (e) and (g), 229, 291(2)–(3) and 299); (vi) interference in trade union elections (section 180(1)(a) read in conjunction with section 196(2)(d), and sections 180(b) and 317(4)(d)); (vii) interference in the right to draw up constitutions freely by providing overly detailed instructions (sections 179(1) and 188 (in addition, there seems to be a discrepancy in that section 188 gives the DOL the power to register and, under certain circumstances, refuse to register any amendments to the constitution of a trade union and its Executive Council whereas Rule 174 of the BLR only refers to notification of such changes to the DOL who will issue a new certificate)); (viii) excessive restrictions on the right to strike (sections 211(3)–(4) and (8) and 227(c)) accompanied by severe penalties (sections 196(2)(e), 291(2)–(3) and 294–296); and (ix) excessive preferential rights for collective bargaining agents (sections 202(24)(b), (c) and (e) and 204 (while noting the minor amendments to sections 202 and 204, the Committee notes that they do not address its concerns in that they limit the scope of action of trade unions other than the collective bargaining agents). Furthermore, the Committee previously requested the Government, under Convention No. 11, to indicate whether workers in small farms consisting of less than five workers can, in law and practice, group together with other workers to form a trade union or affiliate to existing workers' organizations (section 1(4)(n) and (p) of the BLA).

In light of the numerous provisions mentioned above which still need to be amended to bring the BLA fully in line with the Convention, the Committee encourages the Government to engage rapidly with the Tripartite Consultative Council (TCC) referred to in section 348(A) so as to pursue the legislative review of the BLA. It requests the Government to provide information on the composition, mandate and functioning in practice of the TCC and trusts that, in the next revision of the BLA, these comments will be duly taken into account to ensure that its provisions are in full conformity with the Convention.

Bangladesh Labour Rules. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to review a number of BLR provisions to bring them in line with the Convention and trusted that during the revision process its comments would be duly taken into account. The Committee notes the Government's indication that, following the amendment of the BLA, revision of the BLR is a priority action for the Government and a tripartite committee, composed of six representatives of the Government and three representatives of workers and employers each, has already been formed for this purpose and has met on three occasions. Welcoming this information, the Committee emphasizes the need to review the BLR to align it with the 2018 amendments of the BLA, as well as regarding the following matters previously raised: (i) Rule 2(g) and (j) contains a broad definition of administrative and supervisory officers who are excluded from the definition of workers under the BLA and thus from the right to organize; (ii) Rule 85, Schedule IV, sub-rule 1(h) prohibits members of the Safety Committee from initiating or participating in an industrial dispute; Rule 169(4) limits eligibility to a trade union executive committee to permanent workers, which may adversely affect the right of workers' organizations to elect their officers freely; (iii) Rule 188 provides for employer participation in the formation of election committees which conduct the election of worker representatives to participation committees in the absence of a union – this, according to the ITUC, could lead to management domination of participation and safety committees; the Government informs in this respect that election of worker representatives to participation committees without representation of employers is being piloted in two factories; (iv) Rule 190 prohibits certain categories of workers from voting for worker representatives to participation committees; (v) Rule 202 contains broad restrictions on actions taken by trade unions and participation committees; (vi) Rule 204, which restrictively determines that only subscription-paying workers can vote in a ballot to issue a strike, is not in line with section 211(1) of the BLA which refers to union members; (vii) Rule 350 provides for excessively broad powers of inspection of the Director of Labour; and (viii) the BLR lacks provisions providing appropriate procedures and remedies for unfair labour practice complaints. The Committee further notes, from the supplementary information provided by the Government, that the revision of the BLR, initially expected to be completed by September 2020, will be delayed due to the COVID-19 pandemic. While taking note of the challenging context of the current pandemic, the Committee expects the revision process to be concluded without delay so as to ensure that the 2018 BLA amendments introduced to improve compliance with the Convention are reflected in the BLR and its application, and to address other pending issues, as referred to above.

Right to organize in EPZs. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to continue to revise the draft EPZ Labour Act, 2016 and 2017 in consultation with the social partners, so as to provide equal rights of freedom of association to all workers and bring the EPZs within the purview of the Ministry of Labour and the Labour Inspectorate. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the draft EPZ Labour Act was formulated after a pragmatic and neutral analysis of the socio-economic conditions of the country and went through a long process of extensive and inclusive consultations and dialogue with all levels of stakeholders, including the ILO. The Government provides detailed information on the consultations that have taken place and informs that the Bangladesh ELA, adopted in February 2019, upholds the rights and privileges of the workers and includes comprehensive changes and measurable progress. The Committee notes with satisfaction the following amendments made, which address its previous observations: simplification of the formation and registration of workers' welfare associations (WWAs) – the institutional form given to workers' organizations in EPZs – through amendment of a number of provisions of the draft EPZ Labour Act, 2016 and repeal of section 96 establishing an excessive referendum requirement to constitute a WWA; section 16 of the EPZ Workers' Welfare Association and Industrial Relations Act, 2010 (EWWAIRA) prohibiting the establishment of a WWA in a new industrial unit for three months has not been included in the ELA; repeal of section 98 of the draft EPZ Labour Act prohibiting the holding of a new referendum to form a WWA during one year after a failed one; repeal of section 101 authorizing the Zone Authority to form a committee to draft a WWA constitution and to approve it; repeal of section 116 allowing deregistration of a WWA for a number of reasons, including at the request of 30 per cent of eligible workers even if they are not members of the association and prohibiting the establishment of a new association within one year after such deregistration; amendment of section 103(2) to remove the mandatory opening of election of Executive Council members to all workers and not only WWA members; repeal of section 103(5) of the draft EPZ Labour Act, 2017 restricting the right to elect and be elected to the Executive Council to workers who have worked at the enterprise for a specific period; and reduction of the requirement to issue a strike notice from three quarters of members of the Executive Council to two-thirds (section 127(2) of the ELA).

The Committee further welcomes the reduction in the minimum membership requirement to form WWAs but observes that the new requirement of 20 per cent (sections 94(2) and 97(5)) may still be excessive, especially in large enterprises, and considering that only permanent workers may apply to form a WWA. While also welcoming the addition of a provision allowing for the formation of higher-level organizations within a Zone (sections 2(50) and 113), the Committee observes that the conditions to form a federation are excessively strict – more than 50 per cent of WWAs in one Zone must agree to establish a federation – and that a WWA federation cannot affiliate or associate in any manner with another federation in another Zone or beyond the Zone (section 113(3)). In view of the above, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the application in practice of the new amendments, in particular the reduced minimum membership requirement to form WWAs and the possibility to create federations, including to indicate the practical implications of these amendments on the number of applications for WWAs and WWA federations submitted and registered. The Committee trusts that, in order to achieve full compliance with the Convention, the Government will continue, in consultation with the social partners concerned, to endeavour to further reduce, to a reasonable level, the minimum membership requirements to form a WWA, especially in large establishments, as well as federations and to allow WWAs and federations to associate with other entities in the same Zone and outside the Zone in which they were established, including with non-EPZ workers' organizations at different levels.

While taking due note of the above amendments and of the Government's efforts to address some of its previous observations, the Committee deeply regrets that most of the changes it requested have not been addressed despite the Government's assurance that it took the Committee's observations into the highest consideration. The Committee, therefore, emphasizes once again the need to further review the ELA to ensure its conformity with the Convention regarding the following matters: (i) scope of the law – specific categories of workers continue to be excluded from the law (workers in supervisory and managerial positions – sections 2(48)) or from Chapter IX dealing with WWAs (members of the watch and ward or security staff, drivers, confidential assistants, cipher assistants, casual workers, workers employed by kitchen or food preparation contractors and workers employed in clerical posts (section 93), as well as workers in managerial positions (section 115(2)); (ii) the imposition of association monopoly at enterprise and industrial unit levels (sections 94(6), 97(5) paragraph 2, 100 and 101); (iii) detailed requirements as to the content of a WWA's constitution which go beyond formal and may thus hinder the free establishment of WWAs and constitute interference in the right to draw up constitutions freely (section 96(2)(e) and (o)); (iv) limitative definition of the functions of WWA members despite the deletion of the word "mainly" from section 102(3); (v) prohibition to hold an election to the Executive Council during a period of six months (reduced from one year), if a previous election was ineffective in that less than half of the permanent workers of the enterprise cast a vote (section 103(2)–(3)); (vi) prohibition to function without registration and to collect funds for an unregistered association (section 111); (vii) interference in internal affairs by prohibiting expulsion of certain workers from a WWA (section 147); (viii) broad powers and interference of the Zone Authority in internal WWA affairs by approving funds from an outside source (section 96(3)), approving any amendment in a WWA constitution and Executive Council (section 99), arranging elections to the Executive Council of WWAs (section 103(1)) and approving it (section 104), ruling on the legitimacy of a transfer or termination of a WWA representative (section 121), determining the legitimacy of any WWA and its capacity to act as a collective bargaining agent (section 180(c)) and monitoring any WWA elections (section 191); (ix) interference by the authorities in internal affairs by allowing supervision of the elections to the WWA Executive Council by the Executive Director (Labour Relations) and the Inspector-General (sections 167(2)(b) and 169(2)(e)); (x) restrictions imposed on the ability to vote and on the eligibility of workers to the Executive Council (sections 103(2) and (4) and 107); (xi) legislative determination of the tenure of the Executive Council (section 105); (xii) broad definition of unfair labour practices, which also include persuasion of a worker to join a WWA during working hours or commencement of an illegal strike, and imposition of penal sanctions for their violation (sections 116(2)(a) and (f), 151(2)–(3) and 155–156); (xiii) power of the Conciliator appointed by the Zone Authority to determine the validity of a strike notice, without which a lawful strike cannot take place (section 128(2) read in conjunction with section 145(a)); (xiv) possibility to prohibit strike or lockout after 30 days or at any time if the Executive Chairman is satisfied that the continuance of the strike or lockout causes serious harm to productivity in the Zone or is prejudicial to public interest or national economy (section 131(3)–(4)); (xv) possibility of unilateral referral of a dispute to the EPZ Labour Court which could result in compulsory arbitration (sections 131(3)–(5) and 132, read in conjunction with section 144(1)); (xvi) prohibition of strike or lockout for three years in a newly established enterprise and imposition of obligatory arbitration (section 131(9)); (xvii) possibility of hiring temporary workers during a legal strike in cases where the Executive Chairman of the Zone Authority is satisfied that complete cessation of work is likely to risk causing serious damage to the machinery or installation of the industry (section 115(1)(g)); (xviii) excessive penalties, including imprisonment, for illegal strikes (sections 155 and 156); (xix) prohibition to engage in activities which are not described in the constitution as objectives of the association (section 178(1)); (xx) prohibition to maintain any linkage with any political party or organization affiliated to a political party or non-governmental organization, as well as possible cancellation of such association and prohibition to form a WWA within one year after such cancellation (section 178(2)–(3)); (xxi) cancellation of a WWA registration on grounds which do not appear to justify the severity of the sanction (sections 109(b)–(h), 178(3)); (xxii) limitation of WWA activities to the territorial limits of the enterprise thus banning any engagement with actors outside the enterprise, including for training or communication (section 102(2)) and, subject to the right to form federations under section 113, prohibition to associate or affiliate with another WWA in the same Zone, another Zone or beyond the Zone, including non-EPZ workers' organizations at all levels (section 102(4)); (xxiii) interference in internal affairs of a WWA federation – legislative determination of the duration of a federation (four years) and determination of the procedure of election and other matters by the Zone Authority (section 113); (xxiv) power of the Government to exempt any owner, group of owners, enterprise or group of enterprises, worker or group of workers from any provision of the Act making the rule of law a discretionary right (section 184); (xxv) excessive requirements to form an association of employers (section 114(1)); (xxvi) prohibition of an employer association to associate or affiliate in any manner with another association beyond the Zone (section 114(2)); (xxvii) excessive powers of interference in employers' associations' affairs (section 114(3)); and (xxviii) the possibility for the Zone Authority, with the approval of the Government, to establish regulations (section 204) – these could further restrain the right of workers and their organizations to carry out legitimate trade union activities without interference. The Committee further notes the Government's indication in its supplementary report that a committee will be formed to address the issue of any amendments to the ELA and that the necessary steps will be taken pursuant to its recommendations. The Government also informs that the Zone Authority is open to valuable suggestions, advice and technical assistance from the ILO so as to continue to improve its training programmes and to uplift workers' rights in EPZs. Taking due note of the fact that the ELA was adopted in February 2019 and of the Government's commitment to further improve and reform the existing provisions, but observing that an exceptionally large number of provisions still need to be repealed or substantially amended to ensure its conformity with the Convention, the Committee expects that discussion on the revision of the ELA will continue on a more urgent basis in the near future, in consultation with the social partners, so as to address the issues highlighted above (and others that may arise during discussion) in a meaningful manner and provide EPZ workers with all the rights guaranteed in the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to report in detail on progress in this regard.

The Committee further notes with interest the Government's indication that the inspection and administration system of EPZs have been brought in line with the BLA (Chapter XIV of the ELA), that section 168 allows the Chief Inspector and other inspectors appointed under the BLA to undertake inspections of EPZs and that several joint inspections have already taken place. The Committee observes, however, that for the DIFE to inspect EPZ establishments, an approval of the Executive Chairman is required and the Chairman retains ultimate supervision of labour standards in EPZs (sections 168(1) and 180(g)), which may hinder the independent nature and proper functioning of labour inspection. The Committee notes the Government's indication that consultations with the workers, investors and relevant stakeholders are ongoing to analyse how best the DIFE may be allied with the existing inspection system in EPZs, to develop an integrated inspection framework and to define the role of the DIFE in the factories in EPZs. Referring to its more detailed comments on this point made under Convention No. 81, the Committee encourages the Government to take steps to elaborate the aforementioned inspection framework in order to clarify the powers of the DIFE and the Zone Authority, as well as the functioning in practice of joint inspections or inspections conducted by the Labour Inspectorate of EPZ establishments. The Committee also requests the Government to continue to take further steps to ensure unrestricted access and jurisdiction over labour inspection activities in EPZs for DIFE inspectors.

Finally, the Committee notes the Government's indication, in its supplementary report, that the situation of the RMG sector, which is dependent on export, is critical as a result of the COVID-19 pandemic. The Government also informs that in order to uphold labour rights, the Ministry of Labour and Employment elaborated a roadmap in consultation with the tripartite partners, but that due to the current pandemic, many of its initiatives destined to be implemented have now been delayed or slowed down, including the labour reform. While taking due note of the impact of the current COVID-19 pandemic on the economy of the country, in particular in the RMG sector, as well as on the Government's efforts to pursue the labour reform, the Committee once again recalls the critical importance which it gives to freedom of association as a fundamental human and enabling right. In view of the Government's reiterated commitment to labour reform and to ensuring protection of the rights of workers, the Committee expresses its firm hope that significant progress will be made in the very near future to bring both the legislation and practice into conformity with the Convention. The Committee reminds the Government that it can avail itself of the technical assistance of the Office should it so desire in order to assist the national tripartite dialogue in determining further areas for progress.

[The Government is asked to reply in full to the present comments in 2022.]

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1972)

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government on 15 September 2020 in response to a complaint pending under article 26 of the ILO Constitution. In light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020), the Committee proceeded with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of this supplementary information received from the Government and the observations submitted by the social partners this year, as well as on the basis of the information at its disposal in 2019 (see Articles 1 and 3 below).

The Committee notes that the mentioned complaint under article 26 of the ILO Constitution – alleging non-compliance by Bangladesh with this Convention, as well as the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) and the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) – is pending before the Governing Body. At its 340th Session (October-November 2020), the Governing Body, in view of the information communicated by the Government on the situation of freedom of association in the country and taking due note both of the Government's commitment to continue to further improve the overall situation and to address the outstanding issues before the supervisory bodies: (i) requested the Government to develop, with the support of the Office and of the secretariat of the Workers' and Employers' groups, and in full consultation with the social partners concerned, a time-bound roadmap of actions with tangible outcomes to address all the outstanding issues mentioned in the complaint submitted under article 26 to the 108th Session of the International Labour Conference (2019); (ii) requested the Government to report on progress made in that regard to the Governing Body at its next session; and (iii) deferred the decision on further action in respect of the complaint until its 341st Session (March 2021).

The Committee notes the observations of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), received on 1 September 2019 and 15 September 2020, referring to matters addressed in this comment and further alleging anti-union dismissal of 3,000 garment workers in June 2020 as part of union busting in three garment factories in Gazipur and Dhaka. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments thereon.

The Committee notes the 2018 amendment of the Bangladesh Labour Act, 2006 (BLA) and the adoption of the 2019 Export Processing Zones Labour Act (ELA).

Articles 1 and 3 of the Convention. Adequate protection against acts of anti-union discrimination. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to provide detailed statistics on the number of complaints of anti-union discrimination received by the relevant authorities and their follow-up and to take the necessary measures, after consultation with the social partners, to increase the penalties envisaged for unfair labour practices and acts of anti-union discrimination, and to indicate the outcome of 39 mentioned complaints that gave rise to criminal cases. It also expressed its expectation that the measures taken by the Government would contribute to an expedient, efficient and transparent handling of anti-union discrimination complaints. The Committee notes with interest the addition of section 196(A) in the BLA explicitly prohibiting anti-union activities by the employer and providing for the establishment of standard operating procedures (SOPs) for investigating such acts. The Committee notes the Government's statement that in case of alleged anti-union activities at enterprise level, it generally intervenes through tripartite consultations, including by setting up dedicated committees for rapid and effective remedial measures, which proved effective in the national industrial relations context, and that in case of serious allegations, there is scope for on-site investigation and referral to the labour courts. It also notes the details provided by the Government on the procedure established under the SOPs to follow up complaints received, which consists of seven stages (written complaint, verification, communication with the employer, investigation, resolution, record with recommendations and referral to labour courts). The Committee further notes the Government's indication that: (i) following the adoption of the SOPs on anti-union discrimination, the handling of complaints has become easier and more transparent and the SOPs are referred to in the 2018 BLA amendment (sections 195(2), 196(4) and 196(A)); (ii) the upgrade of the Directorate of Labour (DOL) to a Department of Labour has been completed, resulting in an increase of manpower from 712 to 921, a considerable increase in the DOL budget, and the creation of two additional divisional labour offices; (iii) the software for the publicly available online database on anti-union discrimination is currently being upgraded and although the process is delayed due to recent reforms within the DOL and the COVID-19 pandemic, the database should be functional soon and once completed, it will include information on anti-union discrimination and unfair labour practices, conciliation, election of collective bargaining agents and information on participation committees; (iv) from 2013 to 2019, 270 complaints regarding anti-union discrimination and unfair labour practices were submitted to the labour office, of which 204 were addressed (52 cases referred to labour courts and 152 disposed of amicably through reinstatement, compensation, memorandums of understanding, arrear wages, etc.) and 66 are undergoing investigation; and (v) of 51 criminal cases referred to labour courts (39 in the previous report), 48 are pending and three were settled – two in favour of the employer and one in favour of the workers. The Committee also notes the details provided by the Government on the type of anti-union practices referred to in the complaints and the remedies applied, as well as information on training and capacity-building activities provided to the concerned stakeholders and workers, including through the workers' resource centre. Taking due note of the information provided, the Committee recalls that the existence of legal provisions prohibiting acts of anti-union discrimination is not enough if they are not accompanied by effective and rapid procedures to ensure their application in practice (see the 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 190). The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide detailed statistics on the number of complaints of anti-union discrimination received by the relevant authorities and their follow-up, including time taken to resolve the disputes, remedies imposed, the number of complaints settled amicably compared to those referred to labour courts, the results of judicial proceedings and the sanctions ultimately imposed following full proceedings. The Committee encourages the Government to continue to provide the necessary training to labour officials on dealing with anti-union and unfair labour practices complaints with a view to ensuring their efficient and credible handling and to inform about the functioning in practice of the workers' resource centre. While noting the technical challenges encountered, the Committee expects the online database on anti-union complaints to be fully operational in the near future so as to ensure transparency of the process and at the same time ensuring protection of personal data of the workers concerned.

The Committee regrets that despite its previous request to increase the penalties envisaged for unfair labour practices and acts of anti-union discrimination by employers, the applicable fines remained unchanged and, as a result, are not sufficiently dissuasive (a fine of maximum 10,000 Bangladeshi taka (BDT) which equals US$120 – section 291(1) of the BLA). The Committee further notes that the penalty of imprisonment has been reduced through the 2018 BLA amendment from two years to one year (section 291(1) of the BLA). While noting that the BLA has been recently amended, in order to ensure that acts of anti-union discrimination give rise to a just reparation and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions, the Committee requests the Government once again to take the necessary measures, after consultation with the social partners, to increase the amount of the fine imposable for acts of anti-union discrimination.

Helpline for submission of labour-related complaints. In its previous comment, the Committee requested the Government to continue to provide detailed updates on the functioning of the helpline for submission of labour-related complaints targeting the ready-made garment (RMG) sector in the Ashulia area and to clarify the status of the 1,567 complaints mentioned that had not been settled. The Committee notes the detailed information provided on the functioning of the helpline: complaints are received through the helpline by a tele consultant group and are then transferred to district offices of the Department of Inspection for Factories and Establishments (DIFE) and investigated by a labour inspector. Mitigation of the complaints is done in three ways: (1) through tripartite meetings (section 124A of the BLA); (2) communication of the complaint to the factory management, who then resolves the issue; or (3) legal action by the DIFE through filing of cases to labour courts. The Government informs that the DIFE received a total of 5,494 complaints between March 2015 and August 2020, of which 5,407 were resolved and 87 complaints are pending, and that the time for resolving the complaints depends on the nature and complexity of the issue. The Committee also notes the Government's indication in its supplementary report that another labour helpline has been introduced by the DIFE to receive complaints from workers and to ensure proper redress, and that this helpline will assist workers and employers in resolving issues regarding wages, retrenchments, gender-based violence and health and safety issues in accordance with the BLA. There are also proposals to further increase the manpower of the DIFE with additional 1,698 positions, including senior positions. Taking due note of the information, the Committee requests the Government to clarify the outcome of the 5,407 complaints that have been resolved, to indicate the number or the percentage of complaints specifically related to anti-union practices, and to provide information on whether any steps are taken to ensure anonymity of the complainants so as to prevent reprisals against helpline users. Observing that the RMG helpline has been in service since 2015 and that a new helpline aimed at resolving labour-related issues has been created, the Committee encourages the Government to continue to formally expand these procedures to other geographical areas and industrial sectors, in line with its previously expressed commitment.

Allegations of anti-union discrimination following the 2016 Ashulia incident and the 2018-2019 minimum wage protests. In its previous comment, the Committee requested the Government to ensure that any pending proceedings in relation to the Ashulia incident are concluded without delay, that all workers dismissed for anti-union reasons who wish to return to work are reinstated, and expressed its expectation that measures would be taken to prevent repeated and institutionalized acts of anti-union discrimination. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government that, in relation to the Ashulia incident, all those in custody were immediately released, no worker was imprisoned and after primary investigation, out of ten cases, eight were concluded without framing any charge against any worker and two cases are now pending. The Committee observes that the Committee on Freedom of Association had noted the Government's indication that no worker had been removed for participation in activities related to the Ashulia strike but that a number of workers resigned upon receipt of their due payments and that no contradictory or additional information in this regard has been received from the complainants (see 388th Report, March 2019, Case No. 3263, paragraph 202). With regard to the 2018-2019 minimum wage protests, the Committee notes the Government's indication that while the social partners provided a list of 12,436 workers dismissed from 104 factories, after primary verification by the Bangladesh Garment Manufacturers and Exporters Association (BGMEA) and the Bangladesh Knitwear Manufacturers and Exporters Association (BKMEA), it was found that 94 factories were involved and 4,489 workers were terminated from 41 factories. The Government clarifies that all terminated workers received benefits according to the existing provisions of the BLA, two factories were found closed, memorandums of understanding were signed between workers' federations and the employer in ten factories and collection of information from 12 factories is in progress. The Committee notes that the Committee on Freedom of Association also observed in relation to the January 2019 demonstrations that several memoranda of understanding had been signed between workers and employers in a number of enterprises providing for the payment of wages and other legal dues to dismissed or suspended workers (see 392nd Report, October 2020, Case No. 3263, paragraph 284). Noting with concern the massive dismissals of workers following their participation in the 2018-2019 minimum wage protests, the Committee observes that investigations into these allegations do not seem to be conducted by an independent entity but by employers' organizations concerned. In view of the above, the Committee requests the Government to clarify its involvement in the ongoing investigations into the massive dismissals of workers following the 2018-2019 minimum wage protests and to provide information on whether an investigation, by an independent entity, has taken place in this regard. The Committee firmly expects that any future investigations into concrete allegations of anti-union discrimination will be done in full independence and impartiality and that the Government will continue to take all necessary measures to prevent repeated and institutionalized acts of anti-union discrimination. Further recalling that in case of dismissal by reason of trade union membership or legitimate trade union activities, reinstatement should be included among the range of measures that can be taken to remedy such a situation and that, if compensation or fines are imposed, these should be sufficiently dissuasive, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the concrete remedies applied in all cases of termination of workers in the above incidents for which it has been found that they had occurred for anti-union reasons.

Case concerning dismissed workers in the mining sector. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to provide information on the outcome of the judicial proceedings concerning dismissed workers in the mining sector who were charged with illegal activities (case No. 345/2011) once the judgment of the District Sessions Court, Dinajpur has been rendered. Noting the Government's statement that no hearing has yet been held but observing that the case has been pending for several years, the Committee emphasizes the importance of ensuring expeditious examination of allegations of anti-union discrimination so as to ensure adequate protection against such acts in practice. The Committee expects the case to be completed rapidly and requests the Government to provide information on its outcome once the judgment of the District Sessions Court, Dinajpur has been rendered.

Protection of workers in export-processing zones (EPZs) against acts of anti-union discrimination. In its previous comment, the Committee requested the Government to provide clarification on several aspects of inspection and hearings conducted by the Bangladesh Export Processing Zones Authority (BEPZA or Zone Authority) and on the application of the RMG helpline to EPZ workers. It requested the Government to establish an online database for anti-union discrimination complaints specific to the EPZs and to continue to provide statistics on anti-union discrimination complaints. The Committee notes the Government's clarification that the RMG helpline established by the DIFE is not applicable to EPZ factories but that there is an individual helpline and independent help desk in eight EPZs where labour-related complaints can be easily submitted, and that the establishment of an online database for workers' complaints is in process. It also notes the detailed information provided on the inspection and monitoring of the working conditions, complaints and grievances of workers by BEPZA, which includes: spontaneous visits to enterprises; possibility to submit anonymous complaints to counsellor-cum-inspectors, industrial relation officers, general manager of the concerned zone or BEPZA executive office which are investigated neutrally; an enquiry option on the BEPZA official website where anyone can drop a message, query or complaint; a complaint box in each EPZ office where workers can drop a complaint and get assistance from the Zone Authority; and the possibility of posting updates and getting information on the social media website. Taking due note of the detailed information provided but observing that no statistics were submitted in this regard, the Committee requests the Government once again to provide detailed statistics on the number of anti-union discrimination complaints brought to the competent authorities, their follow-up and the remedies and sanctions imposed.

The Committee also previously requested the Government to bring the EPZs within the purview of the Ministry of Labour and the Labour Inspectorate. The Committee notes with interest the Government's indication that the inspection and administration system of EPZs have been brought in line with the BLA (Chapter XIV of the ELA), that section 168 of the ELA allows the Chief Inspector and other inspectors appointed under the BLA to undertake inspections of EPZs and that several joint inspections have already taken place. The Committee refers to its more detailed comments in this regard made under Conventions Nos 81 and 87.

While noting the Government's indication that radical changes have been made to bring the ELA in line with the BLA and improve protection against anti-union discrimination, the Committee observes that, in terms of ensuring adequate protection against acts of anti-union discrimination, there is a further need to continue to review the law to ensure its conformity with the Convention regarding the following matters: specific categories of workers continue to be excluded from the law (workers in supervisory and managerial positions – sections 2(48)) or from Chapter IX dealing with workers' welfare associations (WWAs), and thus from protection against anti-union discrimination (members of the watch and ward or security staff, drivers, confidential assistants, cipher assistants, casual workers, workers employed by kitchen or food preparation contractors and workers employed in clerical posts (section 93), as well as workers in managerial positions (section 115(2)); broad power of the Executive Chairperson to rule on the legitimacy of a transfer or termination of a WWA representative (section 121(3)-(4)); broad exception to protection against anti-union discrimination (section 121(2) paragraph 2); lack of specific measures to remedy acts of anti-union discrimination except in case of WWA officials covered by section 121; insufficiently dissuasive fines for unfair labour practices – a maximum of US$600 (section 151(1)) and for anti-union discrimination during an industrial dispute – a maximum of US$120 (section 157).The Committee further notes the Government's indication in its supplementary report that a committee will be formed to address the issue of any amendments to the ELA and that the necessary steps will be taken pursuant to its recommendations. The Government also informs that the Zone Authority is open to valuable suggestions, advice and technical assistance from the ILO so as to further improve its training programmes and to uplift workers' rights in the EPZs. Taking due note of the fact that the ELA has been adopted in February 2019 but observing that the above provisions need to be further amended to ensure their conformity with the Convention, the Committee expects that the discussion on the revision of the ELA will continue in the near future, in consultation with the social partners, to address the issues highlighted above in a meaningful manner so as to ensure that all workers covered by the Convention are adequately protected against acts of anti-union discrimination. The Committee trusts that the Government will be able to report progress in this regard.

Finally, the Committee observes with concern the allegations communicated by the ITUC referring to widespread anti-union practices in the country and illustrated by the dismissal of 36 workers in two EPZ factories in April 2019 following unsuccessful attempts at collective bargaining. The Committee requests the Government to provide its reply to these allegations.

Articles 2 and 3. Lack of legislative protection against acts of interference in the BLA and the ELA. The Committee previously emphasized the importance of providing for explicit provisions in the BLA granting full protection against acts of interference. While noting the Government's emphasis on the 2018 BLA amendments and noting that sections 195(1)(g) and 202(13) prohibit employer's interference in the conduct of elections for a collective bargaining agent and Rule 187(2) of the Bangladesh Labour Rules (BLR) prohibits interference in elections of workers' representatives to participation committees, the Committee observes that these provisions do not cover all acts of interference prohibited under Article 2 of the Convention, such as acts designed to promote the establishment of workers' organizations under the domination of the employer, to support workers' organizations by financial or other means with the objective of placing them under the control of an employer or an employers' organization, to exercise pressure in favour or against any workers' organization, etc. Similarly, while noting that the ELA contains certain provisions prohibiting acts of interference (sections 115(1)(f) and 116(3)), the Committee observes that they do not cover all acts of interference prohibited under Article 2 of the Convention. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take all necessary measures to broaden the current scope of protection against acts of interference in the BLA and the ELA, so as to ensure that workers' and employers' organizations are effectively protected against all acts of interference both in law and in practice. The Committee trusts that, in the meantime, efforts will be made to ensure that, in practice, workers' and employers' organizations will be protected from any acts of interference against each other.

Article 4. Promotion of collective bargaining. The Committee previously requested the Government to inform about the application in practice of section 202A(1) of the BLA providing for assistance from specialists in the context of collective bargaining. The Committee notes the Government's explanation that there is currently no uniform procedure for the use of experts in collective bargaining but that the issue may be considered during the revision of the BLR, that out of nine collective bargaining agreements concluded at the national level and seven at the sectoral level between 2017 and 2019, support of experts was used in five cases and that the assistance of experts facilitates decision-making on collective agreements with confidence.

The Committee also requested the Government to ensure that Rule 4 of the BLR giving the Inspector General total discretion to shape the outcome of service rules and determine their conformity with the law was not used to limit collective bargaining and to provide information on the application in practice of Rule 202, which prohibits certain trade union activities in a way that could impinge on the right to freedom of association and collective bargaining. In relation to Rule 4, the Government informs that the management of factories prepares service rules together with trade unions and in case of any objection, tripartite meetings are arranged to address the objection and only then does the DIFE verify the conformity of the service rules with the law, thus not hampering collective bargaining. It also states that amendment of Rule 202 may be discussed in the next revision of the BLR. The Committee encourages the Government to consider amending Rule 202, in consultation with the social partners, during the next revision of the BLR in order to ensure it does not unduly impinge on the right to collective bargaining.

Higher-level collective bargaining. The Committee previously requested the Government to consider amending sections 202 and 203 of the BLA to clearly provide a legal basis for collective bargaining at the industry, sector and national levels and to continue to provide statistics on the number of higher-level collective agreements concluded. While noting the amendments made to section 202 of the BLA, the Committee observes that these do not address its previous concerns about the lack of a legal basis for higher-level collective bargaining. The Committee notes the statistics provided by the Government on the number of collective agreements concluded, the number of workers covered and the sectors to which they relate but observes that these agreements appear to have been concluded at the level of the enterprise and not at sectoral or national levels. It recalls in this regard the need to ensure that collective bargaining is possible at all levels, both at the national level, and at enterprise level; it must also be possible for federations and confederations (see the 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 222). In view of the above, the Committee requests the Government to consider, in consultation with the social partners, to further revise sections 202 and 203 of the BLA so as to clearly provide a legal basis for collective bargaining at the industry, sector and national levels. Observing that the information provided by the Government lacks certain elements previously called for, the Committee requests the Government to continue to provide statistics on the number of higher-level collective agreements concluded and in force (at the sectoral and national levels), the sectors concerned and the number of workers covered by these agreements, as well as on any additional measures undertaken to promote the full development and utilization of collective bargaining under the Convention.

Collective bargaining in the agricultural sector. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government in reply to the Committee's comments made under the Right of Association (Agriculture)

Convention, 1921 (No. 11), in particular that, through bipartite or tripartite negotiations, trade unions and associations of agricultural workers conclude agreements with employers every three years concerning terms and conditions of work, welfare facilities, insurance, safety, security and other matters. The Committee requests the Government to indicate whether statistics are available on the number of collective agreements concluded in the agricultural sector, the type of activity concerned and the number of workers covered, and if so, to provide details in this regard. It also requests the Government to clarify the functioning in practice of tripartite negotiations in this sector.

Determination of collective bargaining agents. In its previous comment, the Committee requested the Government to provide clarification on the exact requirements for a trade union to become a collective bargaining agent. The Committee notes the Government's explanation that there has not yet been a situation where, among several existing unions, no union received the required percentage of votes (one third of the total number of workers employed in the establishment concerned) and recalls that the determination of the threshold of representativeness to designate an exclusive agent for the purpose of negotiating collective agreements which are destined to be applied to all workers in a sector or establishment is compatible with the Convention insofar as the required conditions do not constitute an obstacle to the promotion of free and voluntary collective bargaining in practice. The Committee wishes to clarify that it is not requesting the Government to remove the one third majority requirement for the acquisition of the exclusive bargaining agent status but recalls that if no union in a specific negotiating unit meets the required threshold of representativeness to be able to negotiate on behalf of all workers, the existing unions should be able to negotiate, jointly or separately, at least on behalf of their own members. The Committee therefore requests the Government to clarify whether, in case where no union reaches the required threshold to be recognized as the exclusive collective bargaining agent under section 202 of the BLA, the existing unions are given the possibility, jointly or separately, to bargain collectively, at least on behalf of their own members.

Promotion of collective bargaining in the EPZs. In its previous comment, the Committee requested the Government to provide information on any cases where the BEPZA Executive Chairperson rejected the legitimacy of a WWA and its capacity to act as a collective bargaining agent, to take the necessary measures to ensure that the determination of collective bargaining agents in EPZs is the prerogative of an independent body and to continue to provide statistics on the number of collective bargaining agreements concluded. The Committee notes the Government's statement that a WWA registered under the Act in an industrial unit is the collective bargaining agent for that industrial unit (section 119 of the ELA), that there has been no case of rejection of the legitimacy of a WWA and its capacity to act as a collective bargaining agent so far under section 180(c) and that this provision is a safeguard of legitimate WWAs and collective bargaining agents. Taking due note of the explanation, the Committee recalls, however, that the determination of bargaining agents should be carried out by a body offering every guarantee of independence and objectivity. The Government further informs that all 237 elected and registered WWAs are actively performing their activities with full freedom and that during the last five years they had submitted 521 charters of demands, all of which had been negotiated successfully and collective bargaining agreements or memorandums of understanding had been signed. Welcoming the Government's commitment to take the necessary measures to maintain yearly statistics in this regard, the Committee requests the Government to continue to provide statistics on the number of collective bargaining agreements concluded and in force in the EPZs, the sectors concerned and the number of workers covered by these agreements, , along with some sample agreements, as well as on any additional measures undertaken to promote the full development and utilization of collective bargaining under the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to endeavour to further amend section 180 of the ELA, in consultation with the social partners, to ensure that the determination of collective bargaining agents in EPZs is the prerogative of an independent body, such as the Department of Labour. The Committee also requests the Government to clarify the implications in practice of section 117(2) which does not allow any proceedings before a civil court for the purpose of enforcing or recovering damages for breach of any agreement.

Compulsory arbitration in the BLA and the ELA. The Committee welcomes the Government's indication, in response to its previous request, that the proposed amendment to section 210(10) of the BLA that would enable a conciliator to refer an industrial dispute to an arbitrator even if the parties do not agree was finally not included in the amended BLA. The Committee observes, however, that the ELA allows for unilateral referral of a dispute to the EPZ Labour Court which could result in compulsory arbitration (sections 131(3)–(5) and 132 read in conjunction with section 144(1)). Recalling that compulsory arbitration is only acceptable in relation to public servants engaged in the administration of the State (Article 6 of the Convention), or in essential services in the strict sense of the term or in cases of acute national crisis, the Committee expects that, during the next revision of ELA, the Government will address this issue in a meaningful manner, in consultation with the social partners.

Articles 4 and 6. Collective bargaining in the public sector. The Committee previously requested the Government to clarify what specific categories of workers in the public sector can bargain collectively, to indicate the criteria based on which this right is granted and to provide examples of collective agreements concluded in the public sector. The Committee notes the Government's indication that there are 408 public sector trade unions, including in various sector corporations, city corporations and municipalities, port authorities, secondary and higher secondary education boards, water development boards, energy sectors, various banks and financial institutions, power sectors, jute mills and sugar mills. Observing that the Government's reply refers to the right to form trade unions without indicating whether, in the various sectors mentioned, these organizations have the right to undertake collective bargaining, the Committee requests the Government to indicate whether this is indeed the case, and if so, to provide examples of collective bargaining agreements concluded in the public sector.

The Committee further observes the Government's statement that only staff of autonomous organizations have the right to form trade unions and not the officers, and that neither officers nor staff of public sector organizations other than public autonomous organizations have the right to form trade unions. The Committee recalls in this regard that, in accordance with Article 6, only public servants engaged in the administration of the State may be excluded from the scope of the Convention and that a distinction must thus be drawn between, on the one hand, this type of public servants and, on the other hand, all other persons employed by the Government, by public enterprises or by autonomous public institutions, who should benefit from the guarantees provided for in the Convention (see the 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 172). The Committee therefore requests the Government to provide a list of public sector services or entities where collective bargaining is not allowed. For those autonomous public sector organizations where collective bargaining is permitted, the Committee requests the Government to indicate the criteria used to distinguish between staff and officers for the purposes of collective bargaining.

Finally, the Committee notes the Government's indication in its supplementary report that the situation of the RMG sector, which is dependent on export, is critical as a result of the COVID-19 pandemic. The Government also informs that in order to uphold labour rights, the Ministry of Labour and Employment elaborated a roadmap in consultation with the tripartite partners but that due to the current pandemic, many of its initiatives destined to be implemented are now delayed or slowed down, including the labour reform. While taking due note of the impact of the current COVID-19 pandemic on the economy of the country, in particular in the RMG sector, as well as on the Government's efforts to pursue the labour reform, the Committee highlights the significant added-value of collective bargaining as a means of achieving balanced and sustainable solutions in times of crisis. The Committee expresses its firm hope that, as soon as feasible, significant progress will be made in the very near future to bring both the legislation and practice into conformity with the Convention and reminds the Government that it can avail itself of the technical assistance of the Office should it so desire in order to assist the national tripartite dialogue in determining further areas for progress.

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1967)

The Committee notes with concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments.

The Committee takes note of the observations of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) received on 10 September 2014, concerning matters examined under this comment, as well as other allegations of violations of the Convention in the law. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments in this respect. The Committee also takes note of the observations of the International Organisation of Employers (IOE) received on 1 September 2016, which are of a general nature.

The Committee recalls that it has been requesting the Government since 1998 to provide information on developments in the process of reviewing legislation regarding trade union recognition. The Committee notes that the Government indicates that there are no further developments in the process of reviewing legislation regarding trade union recognition, and that a number of the observations made by the ITUC refer to issues concerning trade union registration. Hoping that it will be able to observe progress in the near future, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on any development in the legislative review process and it recalls that the Government may avail itself of the technical assistance of the ILO in this regard.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1956)

The Committee notes the observations of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) and of the Belarusian Congress of Democratic Trade Unions (BKDP) received on 16 and 30 September 2020, respectively, and examined by the Committee below together with the Government's reply thereon.

Follow-up to the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry appointed under article 26 of the Constitution of the ILO

Civil liberties and trade union rights. The Committee notes the ITUC and BKDP allegations of extreme violence to repress peaceful protests and strikes, and detention, imprisonment and torture of workers while in custody following the presidential election in August 2020. The Committee notes that in its report, the Government indicates that the elections held in August 2020 were the most competitive and emotional in terms of public perception and reaction in the history of the State. The Government further indicates that following the vote counting, the political tensions that were fuelled from the outside resulted in a series of protests and events that were organized and held in violation of current legislation and aimed at destabilising the country. The Government points out that the exercise of rights and freedoms, including freedom of assembly, meetings, street processions, demonstrations and picketing, must be peaceful, respect the law of the land and not lead to violations of the law, the rights and legitimate interests of others, and threaten public and national security. The Government further points out that protest actions by some citizens to express their disagreement with the results of the presidential elections were purely political in nature and were organized without regard to the legislation establishing the procedure for their conduct and were not always peaceful. In the course of these actions, numerous offences were recorded; these included acts of resistance to the legitimate demands of law enforcement officers, associated with the manifestation of aggression, use of violence, damage to official transport, blocking the movement of vehicles, damage to infrastructure facilities. The Government indicates that the majority of persons referred to by the BKDP had been held administratively liable for organizing and/or actively participating in illegal protests or calling for participation in such protests. The Government considers that holding persons accountable for illegal acts cannot and should not be regarded as persecution of workers and trade unionists for the exercise of their civil rights and freedoms, including the rights to participate in sanctioned peaceful protests and lawful strikes. The status of a worker or trade union leader does not create additional advantages or immunity.

The Committee observes the statement by the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights at the Intersessional meeting of the Human Rights Council on the situation in Belarus on 4 December 2020, in which she pointed out that the monitoring and analysis of demonstrations since 9 August 2020 indicate that participants were overwhelmingly peaceful. The Committee expresses its deep concern over the serious allegations submitted by the ITUC and BKDP and the continued deterioration of the situation of human rights in the country, particularly with respect to the right of peaceful assembly, as noted by the UN High Commission for Human Rights at the most recent above-mentioned meeting. The Committee recalls that peaceful participation in strikes or demonstrations should not give rise to arrest or detention. No one should be deprived of their freedom or be subject to penal sanctions for the mere fact of organizing or participating in a peaceful strike or protest. The Commission recalls the International Labour Conference (ILC) 1970 Resolution concerning trade union rights and their relation to civil liberties, which emphasises that the rights conferred upon workers' and employers' organizations must be based on respect for civil liberties, as their absence removes all meaning from the concept of trade union rights. Among those liberties essential for the normal exercise of trade union rights are freedom of opinion and expression, freedom of assembly, freedom from arbitrary arrest and detention and the right to a fair trial by an independent and impartial tribunal. The Committee refers to Recommendation 8 of the Commission of Inquiry on Belarus, which considered that adequate protection or even immunity against administrative detention should be guaranteed to trade union officials in the performance of their duties or when exercising their civil liberties (freedom of speech, freedom of assembly, etc.). The Committee urges the Government to take all necessary measures to implement this recommendation of the Commission of Inquiry, to prevent the occurrence of human rights violations and ensure full respect for workers' rights and freedoms. The Committee further urges the Government to take measures for the release of all of trade unionists who remain in detention and the dropping of all charges related to participation in peaceful protests and industrial actions. The Committee also requests the Government to supply copies of the relevant court decisions upholding detention and imprisonment of workers and trade unionists and to provide a list of the affected persons.

Regarding the reported cases of violent mistreatment of workers participating in such protests, the Committee, deeply regretting that the Government provides no information in this regard, recalls that it is the responsibility of the Government to ensure a climate free from violence, threat or pressure against peacefully protesting workers. The Committee urges the Government to investigate without delay any alleged instances of intimidation or physical violence through an independent judicial inquiry, in order to shed light on the facts and circumstances surrounding these acts, and to identify those responsible, punish the guilty parties and thus prevent the repetition of similar events. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on all measures taken to this end. Further in this respect, the Committee, with reference to the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry, stresses the need to ensure impartial and independent judiciary and justice administration in general in order to guarantee that investigations into these grave allegations are truly independent, neutral, objective and impartial.

The Committee recalls that it in its previous comment it noted that activities aimed at giving effect to the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry continued in the country in collaboration with the ILO. In this respect, the Committee noted that a training course on international labour standards for judges, lawyers and legal educators took place in Minsk in June 2017 and that a tripartite conference "Tripartism and Social Dialogue in the World of Work" was held in Minsk on 27 February 2019. The Committee recalls that it had previously noted that one of the outcomes of a tripartite activity on dispute resolution held in 2016 was the common understanding of the need to continue working together towards building a strong and efficient system of dispute resolution, which could handle labour disputes involving individual, collective and trade union matters. The Committee noted with regret the BKDP's indication that the work on developing such a mechanism has been neglected completely. The Committee once again requests the Government to provide its comments thereon and invites it to continue to take advantage of ILO technical assistance in this regard.

Article 2 of the Convention. Right to establish workers' organizations. The Committee recalls that in its previous observations, it had urged the Government to consider, within the framework of the tripartite Council for the Improvement of Legislation in the Social and Labour Sphere (hereinafter, tripartite Council), the measures necessary to ensure that the matter of legal address ceases to be an obstacle to the registration of trade unions in practice. The Committee recalls that it requested the Government to provide its comments on the allegations of the BKDP and the ITUC of cases of refusal to register trade union structures of the Free Trade Union of Belarus (SPB) and of the Belarusian Union of Radio and Electronics Workers (REP union) in Orsha and Bobruisk. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the requirement to provide confirmation of legal address is not an obstacle to the registration of trade unions and that there were no cases of refusal to register trade unions or (associations of trade unions in 2019 and the first nine months of 2020. With regard to the refusal to register a REP primary trade union in Bobruisk, the Government confirms that on 5 July 2019, the Bobruisk city executive committee decided to refuse the registration of the primary trade union because its members were not bound by common interests by virtue of the nature of their work as required by section 1 of the Law on Trade Unions. The Government points out that the relevance and the validity of this requirement was confirmed at a meeting of the tripartite Council of 30 April 2009. Thus, according to the Government, the steps taken by the REP union to establish the so-called city primary organization, uniting citizens without association with any organization, industry or profession, did not meet the requirements of the Law on Trade Unions. Additional grounds for the decision to deny registration were the absence of a decision by the authorized trade union body to create an organizational structure and other shortcomings in the documents submitted for the registration. The decision of the Bobruisk city executive committee was not appealed in court. The Committee notes that a similar explanation is provided by the Government regarding the refusal to register a primary trade union in Orsha. The Government points out that a refusal to register does not amount to a ban on the establishment of a trade union or its organizational structure as once all of the shortcomings have been remedied, the documents for the state registration can be resubmitted. The Committee recalls that it had previously taken note of the decision regarding the requirement of section 1 of the Law on Trade Unions, agreed upon by all members of the tripartite Council's sitting of 30 April 2009.

Regarding the Committee's previous request to discuss the issue of registration of trade unions by the tripartite Council, the Committee notes the Government's indication that the possibility of implementing the Committee's proposal may be considered when the tripartite Council resumes its work once the epidemiological situation in the country has improved. The Government points out, however, that the comments of the Committee of Experts are publicly available and that members of the tripartite Council can freely consult them and, if they deem it necessary, put the consideration of the Committee's comments on the agenda of the tripartite Council. The Government reiterates that the agenda for meetings is set on the basis of proposals from the parties and organizations represented on the Council, taking into account the relevance of the issues raised, and with the agreement of the Council's members. To that end, the information should be submitted to the Council's secretariat (the Ministry of Labour and Social Protection) with an explanation as to why that particular issue is problematic and merits consideration by the Council. The Government indicates that in 2016–20, there had been no submissions for discussion of issues relating to the legal address requirement. The Committee expects the Government, as a member of the tripartite Council, to submit the Committee's comments on the issue of registration for the Council's consideration at one of its meetings as soon as possible. The Committee requests the Government to inform it of the outcome of the discussion.

The Committee observes with concern that during his televised meeting with the chairperson of the Federation of Trade Unions of Belarus (FPB) President Lukashenko urged that trade unions be set up at all private enterprises by the end of 2020 under the threat of liquidation of those private companies which did not organize trade unions upon FPB demand. In his remarks, he underlined the State position supporting the FPB trade unions. The Committee recalls that the principal objective of Convention No. 87 is to protect the autonomy and independence of workers' and employers' organizations in relation to the public authorities, both in their establishment and in their functioning and dissolution (see the 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 55). The Committee considers that the spirit of Convention No. 87 calls for impartial treatment of all trade union organizations by the authorities, even if they criticize the social or economic policies of national or regional executives, as well as avoidance of reprisals for pursuing legitimate trade union activities. The issuance of a statement by a high public authority that would favour one union over another or even use its authority to create unions within a designated trade union federation undermines the right of workers to establish and join organisations of their own choosing.

The Committee recalls that the 1952 ILC Resolution concerning the independence of the trade union movement emphasizes that a stable, free and independent trade union movement is an essential condition for good industrial relations and that it is essential for the trade union movement in each country to preserve its freedom and independence so as to be in a position to carry forward its economic and social mission irrespective of political changes. The Resolution recalls that governments, in seeking the cooperation of trade unions to carry out their economic and social policies, should recognize that the value of this cooperation rests to a large extent on the freedom and independence of the trade union movement as an essential factor in promoting social advancement and should not attempt to transform the trade union movement into an instrument for the pursuit of political aims, nor should they attempt to interfere with the normal functions of a trade union movement.

The Committee urges the Government to refrain from showing favouritism towards any given trade union and to put an immediate stop to the interference in the establishment of trade union organizations. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on all measures taken to that end.

Articles 3, 5 and 6. Right of workers' organizations, including federations and confederations, to organize their activities. Legislation. The Committee recalls that the Commission of Inquiry had requested the Government to amend Presidential Decree No. 24 of 28 November 2003 on Receiving and Using Foreign Gratuitous Aid. The Committee further recalls that it had considered that the amendments should be directed at abolishing the sanctions imposed on trade unions (liquidation of an organization) for a single violation of the Decree and at widening the scope of activities for which foreign financial assistance can be used so as to include events organized by trade unions. The Committee recalls that Decree No. 24 had been superseded by Presidential Decree No. 5 of 31 August 2015 on Foreign Gratuitous Aid and the ensuing Regulations on the Procedures for the Receipt, Recording, Registration and Use of Foreign Gratuitous Aid, the Monitoring of its Receipt and Intended Use, and the Registration of Humanitarian Programmes. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the national legislation does not prohibit trade unions from receiving gratuitous foreign aid, including from international trade union organizations. At the same time, the legislation defines the objectives and conditions for the use of foreign gratuitous aid and stipulates that such aid must be registered in accordance with the established procedure, which, according to the Government, is not complicated and rapid. The Government indicates that Decree No. 5 has been replaced by Decree No. 3 of 25 May 2020. The Committee notes with regret that just as previously under Decrees Nos 24 and 5, the foreign gratuitous aid cannot be used to organize or hold assemblies, rallies, street marches, demonstrations, pickets or strikes, or to produce or distribute campaign materials, hold seminars or carry out other forms of activities aimed at "political and mass propaganda work among the population", and that a single violation of the Regulation bears the sanction of possible liquidation of the organization. The Committee notes the Government's indication in this respect that the ban on receiving and using foreign donations for purposes involving political and mass propaganda work among the population is conditioned by the national security interests, the need to exclude opportunities for destructive influence and pressure from external forces (foreign states, international organizations and associations, foundations, etc.) aimed at destabilising the socio-political and socio-economic situation in the country. The Government emphasizes that this procedure applies to all legal entities, including trade unions, and further points out that there are no cases of trade unions being denied foreign gratuitous aid and that there are no cases of trade unions being liquidated for violation of the procedure for its use. Further in this respect, the Government considers that the issue of procedure established for receiving foreign gratuitous aid is unjustifiably linked to Articles 5 and 6 of the Convention.

While taking note of the above, the Committee observes that the broad expression "political and mass propaganda work among the population" when applied to trade unions may hinder the exercise of their rights as it is inevitable and sometimes normal for trade unions to take a stand on questions having political aspects that affect their socio-economic interests, as well as on purely economic or social questions. As to the link with Articles 5 and 6 of the Convention, the Committee draws the Government's attention to paragraph 624 of the report of the Commission of Inquiry where it was observed that the right recognized in these Articles "implies the right to benefit from the relations that may be established with an international workers' or employers' organization. Legislation which prohibits the acceptance by a national trade union or employers' organization of financial assistance from an international workers' or employers' organization, unless approved by the Government, and provides for the banning of any organization where there is evidence that it has received such assistance, is not in conformity with this right. Although there were no specific allegations as to the practical application of [the] Decree, the Commission reiterates the conclusions made by [the] supervisory bodies that the previous authorization required for foreign gratuitous aid and the restricted use for such aid [...] is incompatible with the right of workers' and employers' organizations to organize their own activities and to benefit from assistance that might be provided by international workers' and employers' organizations".

Further in this connection, the Committee recalls that the Commission of Inquiry had requested the Government to amend the Law on Mass Activities. The Committee recalls that under the Law, which establishes a procedure for mass events, the application to hold an event must be made to the local executive and administrative body. While the decision of that body can be appealed in court, the Law does not set out clear grounds on which a request may be denied. A trade union that violates the procedure for organizing and holding mass events may, in the case of serious damage or substantial harm to the rights and legal interests of other citizens and organizations, be liquidated for a single violation. In this context, "violation" includes a temporary cessation of organizational activity or the disruption of traffic, death or physical injury to one or more individuals, or damage exceeding 10,000 times a value to be established on the date of the event. The Committee had requested the Government to amend the legislation, in particular by abolishing the sanctions imposed on trade unions or trade unionists for a single violation of the Law and setting out clear grounds for the denial of requests to hold trade union mass events, bearing in mind that any such restriction should be in conformity with freedom of association principles.

In its previous observation, the Committee noted the Government's indication that the Law on Mass Activities was amended on 26 January 2019. The Government indicated that the revised Act sets out a number of additional measures and requirements that need to be complied with by the organizers in order to ensure the law and order and public safety during mass events. The Committee noted with deep regret that the Law on Mass Activities was not amended along the lines of its previous requests. It also noted with concern the BKDP's allegation that the amendments to the Law were not discussed with the social partners. The Committee also noted the BKDP's indication that among the novelties in the Law is the notification procedure for street action, which applies to mass events to be organized at "permanent places" designated as such by local authorities. Thus, according to the BKDP, the format of an event is imposed on the organizers, as rallies and pickets are possible in the squares designated as "permanent places", but processions and demonstrations are not. The Committee requested the Government to provide its comments thereon.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that because a violation of the procedure for organizing and/or holding a mass event may entail a serious threat to public order, the national legislation establishes certain liability, including liquidation of an organization for a single violation if the mass event results in serious damage or substantial harm to the rights and legal interests of other citizens and organizations. The Government points out that the above should not be interpreted as a deterrent to the exercise by citizens and trade unions of their right to freedom of peaceful assembly. The Government adds that the decision to terminate activities of an organization may only be taken by the Supreme Court. The Government indicates that to date, there have been no decisions on the liquidation of trade unions for violation of the procedure for organizing and conducting mass events.

With regard to the information provided by the BKDP that the introduction of notification procedures for the organization and holding of mass events in permanent locations imposes on the organizers the format of the event, the Government indicates that the organizers have the right to determine the format of the planned event themselves. Thus, if the planned format allows the event to be held in one of the specially designated permanent locations, the organizers may use the notification procedure, if not - the organizers need to receive a permission to hold the mass event. The above is aimed not at restricting the organizers in choosing the format of the event, but rather at eliminating excessive interference of state bodies in the process and thus at creating additional guarantees for the realization by citizens of the right to assembly. At the same time, certain restrictions on individual rights and freedoms are a means of legal protection of public order and public safety, morality, public health and the rights and freedoms of other persons. Thus, the Government considers that the legislation in force is in conformity with the principles of freedom of association and freedom of assembly.

While taking note of the above, the Committee recalls that it had previously noted with regret the adoption by the Council of Ministers (pursuant to the Law on Mass Activities) of the Regulation on the procedure of payment for services provided by the internal affairs authorities in respect of protection of public order, expenses related to medical care and cleaning after holding a mass event (Ordinance No. 49, which entered into force on 26 January 2019). The Committee noted that according to the Regulation, once a mass event is authorized, the organizer must conclude contracts with the relevant territory internal affairs bodies, health services facilities and cleaning facilities regarding, respectively, protection of public order, medical and cleaning services. The Regulation provides for the fees in relation to protection of public services as follows: three base units – for an event with the participation of up to ten people; 25 base units – for an event with the participation of 11 to 100 people; 150 base units – for an event with the participation of 101 to 1,000 people; 250 base units – for an event with the participation of more than 1,000 people. The Committee notes that the current base unit is set at BYN27 (US$11). If the event is to take place in an area which is not a "permanent designated area," the above fees are to be multiplied by a coefficient of 1.5. In addition to the above fees, the Regulation provides for the expenses of the specialized bodies (medical and cleaning services) that must be paid by the organizer of the event. According to the Regulation, these shall include: salary of employees engaged in the provision of services taking into account their category, number and time spent in the mass event; mandatory insurance contributions; the cost of supplies and materials, including medicine, medical products, detergents; indirect expenses of specialized bodies; taxes, fees, other obligatory payments to the republican and local budgets provided by law. The Committee notes with deep regret that the Regulation was amended on 3 April 2020 by the Ordinance of the Council of Ministers No. 196 so as to provide that the above-mentioned various contracts have to be concluded by an organizer prior to filing a request for authorization to hold an event. The Committee notes with deep concern that according to the most recent observations of the BKDP, the new amendment deprives trade unions of the possibility to carry out their public activities.

Reading these provisions alongside those forbidding the use of foreign gratuitous aid for the conduct of mass events, the Committee considers that the capacity for carrying out mass actions would appear to be extremely limited if not non-existent in practice. The Committee notes with regret that at this stage, the Government considers it not advisable to change the existing procedure for receiving and using foreign gratuitous aid. The Committee therefore once again urges the Government, in consultation with the social partners, to amend the Law on Mass Activities and the accompanying Regulation in the very near future and requests the Government to provide information on all measures taken in this respect as soon as possible. The Committee recalls that the amendments should be directed at abolishing the sanctions imposed on trade unions or trade unionists for a single violation of the respective legislation; at setting out clear grounds for the denial of requests to hold trade union mass events, bearing in mind that any such restriction should be in conformity with freedom of association principles; and at widening the scope of activities for which foreign financial assistance can be used. Furthermore, considering that the right to organize public meetings and demonstrations constitutes an important aspect of trade union rights, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary steps in order to repeal the Ordinance of the Council of Ministers No. 49, as amended, which makes the exercise of this right nearly impossible in practice. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on all measures taken to that end and invites the Government to avail itself of ILO technical assistance in this respect.

Practice. The Committee recalls that it has been noting the allegations of repeated refusals to authorize the BKDP, the BNP and the REP union to hold demonstrations and public meetings for a number of years and in this respect, it had previously urged the Government, in working together with the above-mentioned organizations, to investigate all cases of refusals to authorize the holding of demonstrations and meetings, and to bring to the attention of the relevant authorities the right of workers to participate in peaceful demonstrations and meetings to defend their occupational interests. In this respect, the Committee had noted that according to the Government, in 2016–19, the following were the most common reasons to deny an authorization to hold a mass event: the application did not contain the information required by the law; another mass event was being held in the same place at the same time; the event was to take place in a location not allowed for such a purpose; the documents submitted did not indicate the precise location of the event; and the event was announced in the mass media prior to receiving authorization. The Government indicated that when a permission to hold a mass event was not granted, the organizers, having rectified the shortcomings, could re-submit their application. Finally, a decision prohibiting the holding of a mass event may be appealed in court. The Government referred to several examples where the permission to hold such events was granted to the BKDP. While taking note of this information, the Committee noted the 2019 BKDP's allegations that executive authorities in Minsk, Mogilev, Vitebsk, Zhlobin, Borisov, Gomel, Brest and Novopolotsk refused to grant a permission to hold mass events and requested the Government to provide its detailed comments thereon. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the decision to allow or prohibit a mass event is made taking into account the date, place, time, number of participants, weather conditions and a number of other circumstances directly affecting public order and safety and that both the rights of citizens to freedom of association and freedom of assembly and the principle of the priority of the public interest, according to which, the exercise of rights should not undermine public benefit and safety, damage the environment, historical and cultural values, and infringe on the rights and interests of other persons, are taken into account. The Committee further notes the detailed information provided by the Government in reply to the 2019 BKDP allegations. The Committee notes, in particular, that with the exception of one case where a permission to hold a mass event was granted, others were denied on account of the following: the event was to take place in a location not allowed for such a purpose; the failure to provide information on the source of funding and information on contracts for medical care and cleaning of the territory; the application did not contain the information required by the law; and another mass event was being held in the same place at the same time. The Committee observes from the information provided by the Government that it would indeed appear that the application of the legislation in practice hinders the right of workers to carry out their activities without interference. In view of the continuing difficulties experienced by the BKDP unions, the Committee urges the Government to engage with the social partners, including in the framework of the tripartite Council, with a view to addressing and finding practical solutions to the concerns raised by the unions in respect of organizing and holding mass events. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on concrete steps taken in this respect and the outcome of such discussions. The Committee further requests the Government to provide statistical information on the requests submitted and permissions granted and denied, segregated by the trade union centre affiliation.

The Committee recalls the 2019 BKDP and ITUC allegations regarding the cases of Messrs Fedynich and Komlik, leaders of the REP union, found guilty, in 2018, of tax evasion and use of foreign funds without officially registering them with the authorities as per the legislation in force. They were sentenced to four years of suspended imprisonment, restriction of movement, a ban on holding senior positions for five years and a fine of BYN47,560 (over US$22,500 at that time). The Committee noted that the particulars of these cases were being considered by the Committee on Freedom of Association in the framework of its examination of the measures taken by the Government to implement the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry. In this connection, the Committee also noted the BKDP allegation that the equipment seized during searches in the REP union and BNP premises had not been returned and requested the Government to provide information thereon.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that according to the Investigative Committee, computer equipment, mobile phones and other equipment seized during searches of the REP union and BNP administrative premises were returned to their official representatives in October 2019, except for the hard drives and flash drives containing information on financial and economic transactions of these organizations. The data storage devices have not been returned and are kept together with the corresponding material in the criminal case of tax evasion by the leaders of the REP union Messrs Fedynich and Komlik. The Government indicates that the information contained therein will be used to conduct further investigations into possible similar crimes committed by these persons in the period from 2012 to 2018 with the assistance of the BNP employees. In this connection, the Minsk City Investigation Committee Department has appointed an additional tax audit of the REP union, which is yet to be initiated. Upon the completion of the tax audit, the leading criminal authority will take a decision on the future fate of the seized information storage devices. While noting this information, the Committee observes that the data contained in the storage devices could have been copied and returned to the union thereby avoiding the situation where a union is deprived of administrative and financial information necessary for the conduct of its activities. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the outcome of a new investigation.

Right to strike. The Committee recalls that it had been requesting the Government for a number of years to amend the following sections of the Labour Code as regards the exercise of the right to strike: sections 388(3) and 393, so as to ensure that no legislative limitations can be imposed on the peaceful exercise of the right to strike in the interest of rights and freedoms of other persons (except for cases of acute national crisis, or for public servants exercising authority in the name of the state, or essential services in the strict sense of the term, i.e. only those, the interruption of which, would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population); 388(4) so as to ensure that national workers' organizations may receive assistance, including financial assistance, from international workers' organizations, even when the purpose is to assist in the exercise of freely chosen industrial action; 390, by repealing the requirement of the notification of strike duration; and 392, so as to ensure that the final determination concerning the minimum service to be provided in the event of disagreement between the parties is made by an independent body and to further ensure that minimum services are not required in all undertakings but only in essential services, public services of fundamental importance, situations in which strikes of a certain magnitude and duration could cause an acute crisis threatening the normal conditions of existence of the population, or to ensure the safe operation of necessary facilities.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that the right to strike is not expressly provided for in the Instrument of the ILO; rather, the ILO supervisory bodies derive the right to strike from Article 3 of Convention No. 87, despite the fact that the legality of this interpretation has been questioned by the Employers' Group on several occasions and that under Article 37 of the ILO Constitution, any question or dispute concerning the interpretation of conventions shall be referred to the International Court of Justice, the only body which has the right to interpret Conventions. The Committee further notes that the Government refers to the national constitutional and legislative provisions enshrining the right to strike. It further notes the Government's indication that the exercise of the right to strike requires the existence of a collective labour dispute and that national legislation does not provide for the possibility of organizing and holding political strikes. The law may impose restrictions on the exercise of the right to strike to the extent necessary in the interests of the national security, public order, public health and the rights and freedoms of others. The Government points out that pursuant to section 393 of the Labour Code, in the event of a real threat to national security, public order, public health, the rights and freedoms of other persons and in other cases provided for by law, the President of the Republic of Belarus has the right to postpone or suspend a strike, but not for more than three months. The Government further points out that legal provisions containing certain restrictions or conditions on the exercise of the right to strike are due to the very nature of the right. According to the Government, the right to strike is fundamentally different from other human rights due to a number of specific following features: it is not an end in itself, but a tool to achieve an end, a way to protect the interests of workers; the right to strike is not inherent and inalienable as it may be restricted; it must be balanced with the rights of other human rights when the health and safety of others are affected or essential services are impacted; and while it is an individual right, the possibility of its realization depends on the agreement of other parties. For the reasons expressed above, the Government disagrees with the calls of the Committee for the amendment of the legislation, in particular as regards section 388(4) of the Labour Code.

At the outset and in reply to the Government's general remarks, the Committee recalls that its opinions and recommendations derive their persuasive value from the legitimacy and rationality of the Committee's work based on its impartiality, experience and expertise. The Committee's technical role and moral authority is well recognized, particularly as it has been engaged in its supervisory task for more than 90 years, by virtue of its composition, independence and its working methods built on continuing dialogue with governments taking into account information provided by employers' and workers' organizations. This has been reflected in the incorporation of the Committee's opinions and recommendations in national legislation, international instruments and court decisions. It is within this mandate that it has been dealing with the questions pertaining to the right to strike.

The Committee requests the Government to take measures to revise the above-mentioned legislative provisions, which negatively affect the right of workers' organizations to organize their activities in full freedom, in consultation with the social partners, and to provide information on all measures taken or envisaged to that end.

The Committee recalls that it had previously requested the Government to provide its reply to the BKDP allegations of violation of the right to strike in practice. The Committee notes the Government's indication that a strike is a measure of last resort to which workers represented by a trade union have the right to resort if all other constructive ways of resolving a collective labour dispute (conciliation, mediation and arbitration) have been exhausted. The Government points out that the need to comply with the procedure for resolving collective labour disputes should not be considered as a practice contradicting provisions of the Convention regarding the right of workers' organizations to freely exercise their activities. The Committee notes with regret that while the Government confirms that the decision by members of the SPB at an enterprise in Polotsk to call a rolling strike from 1 November to 31 December 2017 was declared illegal by the court, it does not indicate the reasons therefor.

The Committee notes with concern detailed allegations of numerous cases of arrests, detention of and fines imposed on trade unionists for having organized and participated in strikes following the August 2020 events. The Committee notes the Government's indication that attempts to organize strikes at various enterprises were in no way connected with the resolution of collective labour disputes, as per the requirement set by the Labour Code; rather the purpose of these protests was to draw public attention to the civil position and political demands of some employees against the country's leadership, without due regard to the interests of other members of the workforce who do not share the same political views, as well as the economic interests of enterprises and of the State. The Committee notes that pursuant to the definition of the word "strike" set out in section 388 (1) of the Labour Code, as referred to by the Government, strikes are permitted only in relation to a collective labour dispute. The Committee considers that strikes relating to the Government's economic and social policies, including general strikes, are legitimate and therefore should not be regarded as purely political strikes, which are not covered by the principles of the Convention. In its view, trade unions and employers' organizations responsible for defending socio-economic and occupational interests should be able to use, respectively, strike action or protest action to support their position in the search for solutions to problems posed by major social and economic policy trends which have a direct impact on their members. Moreover, noting that a democratic system is fundamental for the free exercise of trade union rights, the Committee considers that, in a situation in which they deem that they do not enjoy the fundamental liberties necessary to fulfil their mission, trade unions and employers' organizations would be justified in calling for the recognition and exercise of these liberties and that such peaceful claims should be considered as lying within the framework of legitimate trade union activities, including in cases when such organizations have recourse to strikes (see the 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 124). The Committee therefore further requests the Government to amend section 388(1) of the Labour Code, in consultation with the social partners, to ensure that workers can exercise their right to strike to defend their occupational and economic interests, which do not only concern better working conditions or collective claims of an occupational nature, but also the seeking of solutions to economic and social policy questions. The Committee requests the Government to indicate all measures taken or envisaged to that end.

Consultations with the organizations of workers and employers. The Committee recalls that in its previous comment it had noted that the BKDP alleged lack of consultations in respect of the adoption of new pieces of legislation affecting rights and interest of workers. The Committee notes in this respect the Government's indication that the development of draft legislation regulating social and labour issues is carried out with the direct involvement of the social partners. The obligation to consult the social partners and the procedure therefor are reflected in the tripartite General Agreement for 2019-21. In addition, and as a follow-up to the Law "On Normative Legal Acts", a Regulation on the Procedure for Public Discussion of Draft Normative Legal Acts was approved by the Council of Ministers on 28 January 2019. The Regulation describes the procedures and means of public consultation with regard to legislative drafts. Furthermore, pursuant to Regulation of the Council of Ministers No. 193 of 14 February 2009, draft legislation affecting labour and socio-economic rights and interests of citizens is submitted to the FPB as the most representative organization of workers for possible comments and/or proposals. In addition, both the FPB and the BKDP are represented in the National Council on Labour and Social Issues (NCLSI), as well as in the tripartite Council. Both tripartite advisory bodies have certain functions with regard to draft legislation affecting social and labour issues. The Government indicates that it had consulted with trade unions and employers' organizations with regard to the amendments to the Labour Code and that discussions in this regard were held at meetings of the NCLSI held on 28 June 2018 and 31 May 2019.

While taking note of this information, the Committee understands that the FPB, as an organization with a higher overall number of members, has preferential rights in the processes of consultation on legislation affecting rights and interest of workers. The Committee considers that both the number of members and independence from the authorities and employers' organizations are essential elements for consideration in determining the representativeness of an organization. In light of the above-noted publicly expressed support by the State authorities at the highest level for the FPB, the Committee is bound to reiterate its previous comments made in 2007, which recalled the importance of ensuring an atmosphere in which trade union organizations, whether within or outside the traditional structure, are able to flourish in the country before establishing the notion of representativeness. The Committee therefore requests the Government to ensure that the BKDP and the FPB, as members of both the NCLSI and the tripartite Council, enjoy equal rights in consultations during the preparation of legislation and to that end to take the necessary measures to amend Regulation of the Council of Ministers No. 193. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on all steps taken in this regard. The Committee further once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures in order to further strengthen the role of the tripartite Council for the Improvement of Legislation in the Social and Labour Sphere, which should, as its title indicates, serve as a platform where consultations on the legislation affecting rights and interests of the social partners can take place.

Further in this respect, the Committee notes the Government's indication that the tripartite Council was set up with the advice of the ILO to consider issues related to the implementation of the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry as well as other issues that may arise between the Government and its social partners, including the consideration of complaints received from trade unions. The Committee welcomes the Government's expressed readiness to either work to further improve the Council's function or to create another structure. The Committee also notes that the Government also expresses its concern over the issue of representation at the Council and the willingness of the parties to accept the decisions that will be made within this tripartite body. The Government indicates, in particular, that in its experience, representatives of the BKDP are not prepared to support Council's decisions that differ from the BKDP predetermined position or declare that they do not have the necessary authority to adopt a position of the Council. The Government indicates that it would like to count on the advice of the Office in this respect once the Council resumes its work, which has been temporarily suspended due to the epidemiological situation caused by the widespread of COVID-19. Taking all the above into account, the Committee expects that the Government will fully engage with the social partners, the ILO, as well as relevant national institutions and bodies, with a view to improving the functioning, procedures and the work of the tripartite Council aimed at enhancing its impact in addressing the issues stemming from the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry and other ILO supervisory bodies.

The Committee considers that the current situation in Belarus remains far from ensuring full respect for freedom of association and the application of the provisions of the Convention. The Committee regrets to observe that the recent developments as examined above appear to indicate steps backward on some of the previously achieved progress in implementing the Commission of Inquiry's recommendations. The Committee therefore urges the Government to pursue its efforts and expects that the Government, with the assistance of the ILO and in consultation with the social partners, will take the necessary steps to fully implement all outstanding recommendations without further delay.

In light of the situation described, the Committee is obliged to note that there has been no meaningful progress towards full implementation of the 2004 Commission of Inquiry recommendations, and notes with concern that the recent developments referred to in detail above would appear to indicate a retreat on the part of the Government from its obligations under the Convention.

[The Government is asked to supply full particulars to the Conference at its 109th Session and to reply in full to the present comments in 2021.]

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1956)

The Committee notes of the observations of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) and of the Belarusian Congress of Democratic Trade Unions (BKDP) received on 16 and 30 September 2020, respectively. The Committee notes that these organizations allege acts of anti-union discrimination, through non-renewal of employment contracts, and interference in trade union internal affairs, through either non-recognition of primary trade unions established at the enterprise level or pressure exercised on workers to leave the union. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments thereon.

The Committee further notes the BKDP indication that it was not part of the working group established to prepare changes to the General Agreement in force (2019-21), in light of the amendment of the Labour Code, which entered into force in January 2020. Referring to the amendment of section 365 of the Labour Code, which now makes a distinction between clauses of a collective agreement that apply to all workers and those that could apply only to those workers who are members of a trade union, which had negotiated and signed a collective agreement, the BKDP indicates that this reform unduly favours the Federation of Trade Unions of Belarus (FPB) to the detriment of independent unions. The Committee notes that in its report on the application of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), the Government indicates that the BKDP assertion that its representatives were not invited to participate in the preparation of amendments to the General Agreement are not true. The Government explains that, following the decision of the National Council on Labour and Social Issues of 5 February 2020, the Ministry of Labour and Social Protection began preparing draft amendments to the 2019–21 tripartite General Agreement. To that end, on 12 February 2020, it sent a letter to the BKDP requesting it to: (1) nominate its representative to the working group for the preparation of the draft amendments to the General Agreement; and (2) provide proposed drafts amendments, which take into account the amendment to section 365 of the Labour Code. According to the Government, while the BKDP nominated its representative, it did not submit any proposals; it was nevertheless informed of the proposals made by other members of the working group, which basically involved clarification of certain terms used in the General Agreement, taking into account the amendments made to the Labour Code.

Regarding the amendment of section 365 of the Labour Code, which deals with the scope of collective agreements, the Committee notes the Government's explanation that the amendment aimed at eliminating legal uncertainty that arose in practice. The Government explains in this regard that under the previous section 365, provisions of a collective agreement applied to all employees, including those who are not members of the trade union party to a collective agreement. The practice has nevertheless developed when at some undertakings, the collective agreement was applied to all employees and in others – only to employees who are trade union members. The main innovation of the amended section of the Labour Code is that it now clearly defines the provisions of the collective agreement, which must be applied to all employees, regardless of whether they are members of a trade union or not. These include the most important norms that define working conditions: working and rest hours, internal labour regulations, labour standards, wages, procedure for wage indexation, labour safety, guarantees and compensations provided in accordance with the law. Provisions of a collective agreement regulating other matters will apply to employees who are not members of the trade union if they agree to this in writing. Should a collective agreement provide other procedure for the application of provisions regulating other than the most important norms, the procedure provided for in the collective agreement will apply. The Governments considers that there are no elements of discrimination in this approach. While taking note of this explanation, the Committee recalls that for a number of years, in accordance with the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry and the Committee on Freedom of Association, it has maintained a dialogue with the Government with a view to encourage it to put an end to various measures, taken in law and in practice, to eliminate independent trade union organizations and obstruct trade union pluralism. The Committee refers to its observation on the application of Convention No. 87 where it noted that the FPB, the largest workers' organization in the country, enjoys full support of the State. Taking into account the situation of trade union rights in Belarus and observing that the FPB is a signatory to almost all collective agreements in force, the Committee questions the impact that the amendment of section 365 of the Labour Code could have in practice on the freedom of workers to join trade unions not belonging to the FPB structures, including for the purpose of collective bargaining. The Committee requests the Government to bring the issue of application of this provision in practice to the attention of the tripartite Council and to provide information on the outcome of the discussion in its next report.

Not having received other supplementary information, the Committee, noting with concern the above allegations, which could indicate a fall back on some of the previously achieved progress, as highlighted under Article 4 of the comments below, reiterates its comments adopted in 2019 and reproduced below taking into account certain new information provided by the Government in its 2020 report on the application of Convention No. 87 (see Article 4).

Follow-up to the 2004 recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry appointed under article 26 of the Constitution of the ILO

The Committee notes of the observations of the BKDP received on 30 August 2019 and alleging violations of the Convention in practice. The Committee examines them below.

The Committee notes the 385th and the 390th reports of the Committee on Freedom of Association on the measures taken by the Government of the Republic of Belarus to implement the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry.

Articles 1–3 of the Convention. Adequate protection against acts of anti-union discrimination and interference. The Committee recalls that it had previously requested the Government to reply to the BKDP observations containing allegations of dismissals of trade unionists Ms Oksana Kernozhitskaya and Mr Mikhail Soshko. The Committee notes the Government's indication that these workers were not dismissed, rather, their contract of employment has expired. The Government explains that the termination of employment upon the expiry of a fixed-term employment contract cannot be considered dismissal by the employer. The Government further explains that under the law, the employer is not obliged to justify his or her unwillingness to extend an employment relationship upon the expiry of a contract. Thus, according to the Government, the expiry of a contract is already in itself sufficient grounds for its termination; there are no legal means of compelling an employer to conclude a new contract with a worker. The Committee considers that the legal framework as described by the Government does not currently provide for an adequate protection against non-renewal of a contract for anti-union reasons. It recalls in this respect that the non-renewal of a contract for anti-union reasons constitutes a prejudicial act within the meaning of Article 1 of the Convention. It also recalls that since inadequate safeguards against acts of anti-union discrimination, including against non-renewal of contracts for anti-union reasons, may lead to the actual disappearance of primary level trade unions, composed only of workers in an undertaking, additional measures should be taken to ensure fuller protection for leaders and members of trade unions, against any such acts. As one of the additional measures to ensure the effective protection against anti-union discrimination, the adoption of provision for laying upon the employer, in the case of any alleged discriminatory dismissal or non-renewal of contract, the burden of proving that such action was in fact justified. The Committee requests the Government to take, in consultation with the social partners, the necessary measures in order to adopt specific legislative provisions affording an adequate protection against cases of non-renewal of contracts for anti-union reasons. It requests the Government to provide information on all steps taken to that end.

The Committee recalls that it had also noted the BKDP allegation that the management of the Belaruskali promoted the primary trade union affiliated to the FPB at the expense of the BKDP-affiliated union and pressured the members of the latter to leave the union. The Committee notes the Government's explanation that primary organizations of trade unions in Belarus are affiliated to either the FPB or the BKDP. A number of enterprises have several primary trade union organizations. At Belaruskali, there are two primary trade union organizations: the primary organization of the Belarusian Union of Chemical, Mining and Oil Industries Workers (Belkhimprofsoyuz), affiliated to the FPB, and the Independent Trade Union of Miners (NPG) of Belaruskali, which is a primary organization of the Belarusian Independent Trade Union (BNP), affiliated to the BKDP. The presence in one enterprise of the organizational structures of two different trade unions naturally gives rise to competition for members. The trade unions use various methods and means to strengthen their own position, retain existing members and attract new ones. As provisions of Belkhimprofsoyuz' by-laws do not permit simultaneous membership in two trade unions, the trade union committee of the Belkhimprofsoyuz primary trade union organization at the undertaking decided to bring its structure into line with the existing rules and to take steps to eliminate dual trade union membership. To that end, it proposed to workers with dual membership (690 workers) to choose between the two unions. According to the Government, an overwhelming majority of workers decided in favour of Belkhimprofsoyuz primary trade union organization; as a result, the BNP-affiliated union membership fell down. Thus, the Government concludes that the sharp fall in membership of the primary trade union was mainly a consequence of the choice made by workers. The Government also indicates that retirement of workers as well as the termination of employment was also a factor in the decline of the union membership. The Government points out that the tripartite Council for the Improvement of Legislation in the Social and Labour Sphere (hereinafter, tripartite Council) received no information about specific instances of members of the BNP primary trade union organization being pressured by the enterprise management to leave the BKDP-affiliated trade union. Workers who believe that they have been subject to anti-union discrimination or pressure by may apply to a court for measures to end the discrimination.

The Committee notes the new allegations submitted by the BKDP regarding interference by enterprise managers in trade union affairs. According to the BKDP, enterprise managers, for the most part, are still members of the FPB. It alleges, in addition, that at most enterprises, employees, when hired, are first sent to the trade union committee, where they are urged to write an application for affiliation to the official trade union to get a job. A citizen is thus deprived of the right to freely choose a union and members of independent trade unions are forced to quit their union organizations. The BKDP refers, in particular, to the situation at the above-mentioned Belaruskali where the director general has joined the Belkhimprofsoyuz to become its official and head the anti-union campaign against the independent union. The BKDP alleges that as a result, between 1 January and 1 April 2019, 596 workers were forced to renounce their NPG membership. The BKDP further refers to a similar situation at the Remmontazhstroy company where the independent union lost 180 members within the same period. The BKDP further alleges threats of termination of contract suffered by Mr Drazhenko, the head of primary trade union at the Borisov "Autohydraulic booster" plant for his active trade union position. The Committee requests the Government to provide its detailed comments on the above.

The Committee had previously welcomed the Government's indication that a training course on international labour standards for judges, lawyers and legal educators was to take place with ILO support in 2017 and requested the Government to provide information on the outcome of this activity. The Committee notes the Government's indication that this course allowed judges, lawyers and legal educators to increase their knowledge of the practical application of international labour standards, which they are now applying in their professional work.

In this connection, the Committee recalls that it had also expected that the public authorities, in particular the Ministry of Justice, the Office of the Prosecutor-General and the judiciary, together with the social partners, as well as other stakeholders (for example, the Belarusian National Bar Association) would continue working together towards building a strong and efficient system of dispute resolution which could deal with labour disputes involving individual, collective and trade union matters. The Committee notes with regret the BKDP indication that the work on developing an effective mechanism for resolving non-judicial disputes which could deal with labour disputes, including individual, collective and trade union disputes, is neglected completely. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments thereon. The Committee invites the Government to continue to take advantage of ILO technical assistance in this regard.

Article 4. Right to collective bargaining. The Committee had previously noted that a collective bargaining procedure at enterprises with more than one trade union had been agreed upon and included in clause 45 of the General Agreement between the Government and the national organizations of employers and trade unions for 2016–18. Pursuant to this provision, a single body comprising representatives of all unions active at an enterprise would negotiate a collective agreement to which all trade unions could become a party. The Committee notes with interest that the same provision is now included in the General Agreement for 2019–2021 (clause 49).

The Committee recalls the BKDP allegation that this procedure was not respected by the management of a glass fibre company in Polotsk, an enterprise producing tractor parts in Bobruisk and a company producing tractors in Minsk. The Committee notes the Government's indication that as regard the first enterprise, the primary trade union of the Belarusian Free Trade Union (SPB) did not name any representatives for the inclusion in the collective bargaining committee. The Government points out that the collective agreement for 2014–17 applied to all of the enterprise's workers. On 28 January 2016, the enterprise received a written request for collective bargaining from the SPB primary organization. Pursuant to the legislation in force, it was requested to confirm that it had members at the enterprise and that it was authorized to represent their interests. As no such confirmation followed, the union could not initiate collective bargaining process. The Government indicates that the latest collective agreement was concluded for 2017–20 by representatives of the primary organization of Belkhimprofsoyuz. As regards Bobruisk plant, the Government indicates that a collective agreement was concluded on 26 March 2016 by the chairperson of the primary organization of the Belarusian Automobile and Agricultural Machinery Workers Union. Representatives of the SPB primary trade union did not participate in the work of the committee established for the purposes of collective bargaining, as the competence of this primary organization had not been confirmed in the proper manner. As regards the Minsk plant, the Government indicates that according to the enterprise management, neither the Belarusian Union of Radio and Electronics Workers (REP), nor the trade union group established by this union in February 2016, stated that they wished to join the collective agreement concluded at the enterprise for 2014–16, and no documents were provided confirming that it represented workers at the enterprise.

The Committee notes that the BKDP alleges several other instances where clause 45 of the previous General Agreement was not respected. In this connection, the Committee notes the Government's indication that taking into account the complaints received from the BKDP, the issue of compliance with the procedure for collective bargaining where more than one trade union exist, as specified in the General Agreement for 2016–18, has been examined a number of times within the framework of the tripartite Council. The tripartite Council drew the attention of all social partners to the need to comply with clause 45 of the General Agreement. Upon the proposal by the BKDP, this issue was once again examined on 6 March 2018. On that occasion, the tripartite Council requested both the employer and the worker members to provide assistance and to carry out work among its member associations to explain and clarify the issues arising from clause 45 of the General Agreement for 2016–18. The Council concluded that clause 45 applies exclusively to representatives of trade union organizations that are actually operating at an organization (enterprise) and that have members from among the workers of that organization (enterprise). The Committee trusts that any issues of compliance with the General Agreement will continue to be brought to the attention of the Council where they can be examined in the tripartite setting.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that the tripartite Council operates effectively in Belarus and is the main forum for stakeholders to discuss issues relating to the implementation of the Commission of Inquiry's recommendations. The Council also decides on proposals of areas of collaboration with the ILO. The Government informs in this respect, that on the basis of such proposals, a meeting of the tripartite Council held with the participation of the ILO representatives in February 2019, discussed the issue of collective bargaining at various levels. It was agreed that the work in this respect would continue with the ILO support with the view to improving legislation and practice in this area. The Committee notes that in its report on the application of Convention No. 87, the Government informs that a follow-up meeting of the tripartite Council was held in November 2019 to discuss proposals on the issue of collective bargaining elaborated in collaboration with the ILO. The Government believes the proposals and recommendations are a good basis for the tripartite parties to develop solutions acceptable to all. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on all developments in this regard.

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1983)

The Committee notes with concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments.

Article 3 of the Convention. Compulsory arbitration. The Committee recalls that in its previous comments it had requested the Government to amend the Settlement of Disputes in Essential Services Act 1939 (SDESA), as amended on several occasions, which empowers the authorities to refer a collective dispute to compulsory arbitration, to prohibit a strike or to terminate a strike in services that cannot be considered essential in the strict sense of the term, including the banking sector, civil aviation, port authority, postal services, social security scheme and the petroleum sector. The Committee notes with regret from the information provided by the Government that while the Schedule to the SDESA was amended twice in 2015, the long-standing comments of the Committee were not addressed. Instead, the two amendments expanded the field of application of the SDESA and added to its Schedule the "port services involving the loading or unloading of a ship's cargo", which are also services that do not constitute essential services in the strict sense of the term – that is those the interruption of which would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole of part of the population. The Committee requests the Government to amend the Schedule to the SDESA so as to permit compulsory arbitration or a prohibition on strikes only in services that are essential in the strict sense of the term, and to provide information on all progress made in this regard.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1983)

The Committee notes with concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments.

The Committee had noted the observations of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in 2014. The Committee notes with regret that the Government has not yet replied to these observations and requests it once again to provide its comments in this respect.

Articles 1 and 3 of the Convention. Protection against acts of anti-union discrimination. In its previous comments, following the 2011 ITUC observations regarding those two sectors, the Committee had requested the Government to provide statistics on the number of acts of anti-union discrimination that are reported to the authorities in the banana plantation sector and in export processing zones and on the outcomes of the denunciations in this respect. The Committee notes that the Government indicates that during the reporting period (July 2013 to June 2017) no acts of anti-union discrimination were denounced to the authorities in these sectors. Highlighting that the absence of anti-union discrimination complaints may be due to reasons other than an absence of anti-union discrimination acts, and recalling the specific allegations raised by the ITUC, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that, on the one hand the competent authorities take fully into account in their control and prevention activities the issue of anti-union discrimination, and that on the other hand, the workers in the country are fully informed of their rights regarding this issue. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on measures taken in this regard, as well as any statistics concerning the anti-union discrimination acts reported to the authorities.

Article 4. Promotion of collective bargaining. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to take measures to amend section 27(2) of the Trade Unions and Employers' Organizations (Registration, Recognition and Status) Act (TUEOA), which provides that a trade union may be certified as the bargaining agent if it is supported by at least 51 per cent of employees, as this requirement of an absolute majority may give rise to problems given that, if this percentage is not attained, the majority union would be denied the possibility of bargaining. In its latest comment, the Committee noted the Government's indication that: (i) the Tripartite Body and the Labour Advisory Board had engaged in discussions on a possible amendment to the Act; and (ii) based on these consultations, it had been recommended to reduce to 20 per cent the trade union membership threshold required to trigger a poll, while retaining the requirement of a 51 per cent approval of those employees voting and to require a turnout at the poll of at least 40 per cent of the bargaining unit. The Committee notes that the Government indicates that section 27(2) of the TUEOA has not been amended but that discussion continues among the social partners in this regard. The Committee requests the Government to continue promoting social dialogue in order to bring section 27(2) of the TUEOA into conformity with the Convention and to provide information on any developments in this respect. The Committee reminds the Government that it may avail itself of technical assistance from the Office.

Promotion of collective bargaining in practice. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the number of collective agreements concluded and in force, the sectors concerned and the number of workers covered by these agreements.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Bosnia and Herzegovina

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1993)

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020). The Committee proceeded with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the supplementary information received from the Government this year, as well as on the basis of the information at its disposal in 2019.

The Committee takes note of the Government's reply to the 2016 observations from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC).

Article 2 of the Convention. Scope of application. In its previous comment, on the basis of section 6 of the Labour Act of the Federation of Bosnia and Herzegovina, 2016 (the FBiH Labour Act), section 5 of the Labour Act of the Republika Srpska, 2016 (the RS Labour Act) and section 2(5) of the Labour Act of the Brčko District of Bosnia and Herzegovina, 2006 (the BD Labour Act), the Committee requested the Government to indicate whether specific categories of workers – workers without an employment contract, domestic workers, workers in the informal economy and self-employed workers – enjoy, in law and practice, the rights guaranteed by the Convention, and if not, to take the necessary measures to amend the relevant labour legislation in this regard. The Committee notes the Government's indication that: (i) in the Federation of Bosnia and Herzegovina, the right to associate is primarily enjoyed through the Act on Associations and Foundations in the Federation of Bosnia and Herzegovina (the FBiH Act on Associations and Foundations) which gives all persons without discrimination the right to form associations in order to proclaim or protect their rights and interests, irrespective of whether they are employees or not; (ii) while the specific protection of employees to organize in trade unions is separately provided by the provisions of the FBiH Labour Act, this does not prevent persons who are not employees to associate and protect their interests in accordance with the FBiH Act on Associations and Foundations; (iii) it is not necessary to review the existing labour legislation and no measures have been taken in order to expand the right to organize to persons outside the definition of worker (natural person employed on the basis of an employment contract – section 6 of the FBiH Labour Act); and (iv) in Republika Srpska, the legislation makes a distinction between trade unions and all other types of formal or informal associations of workers or citizens: all persons having the status of workers under section 5 of the RS Labour Act can form trade unions, whereas the persons who do not have the status of a worker formally or legally can establish organizations, by virtue of the Act on Associations and Foundations of the Republika Srpska, 2001 (the RS Act on Associations and Foundations) with a view to improving their position and protecting their interests, thus exercising the rights guaranteed by the Convention. The Committee observes, however, that the FBiH Act on Associations and Foundations and RS Act on Associations and Foundations do not provide the same guarantees to workers in terms of the right to organize and associated rights, and that both in the Federation of Bosnia and Herzegovina and in the Republika Srpska, specific categories of workers are thus not covered by all the guarantees of the Convention. The Committee notes that no information has been provided in respect of this issue in the Brčko District. The Committee further understands from the information provided by the Government under this Convention and the Right of Association (Agriculture) Convention, 1921 (No. 11), that the distinction between employees, who benefit from the rights granted by the Convention, and other workers is also applicable to the agricultural sector. Recalling that the right to organize should be guaranteed to all workers without distinction or discrimination of any kind, including to workers without an employment contract, domestic workers, agricultural workers, workers in the informal economy and self-employed workers, the Committee once again encourages the Government to revise the relevant legislation in the three entities to ensure that the above categories of workers enjoy, in law and in practice, all the rights guaranteed by the Convention.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Botswana

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1997)

The Committee takes note of the observations of the Botswana Federation of Trade Unions (BFTU) received on 1 October 2020 relating to matters examined in the present comment. It notes that the observations of the BFTU also allege dismissals of workers because of industrial action following the adoption on 9 April 2020 of an Emergency Powers Act, which included a clause that restricted workers and employers from taking part in industrial action. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments thereon.

Not having received other supplementary information, the Committee reiterates its comments adopted in 2019 and reproduced below.

The Committee notes the Government's reply to the observations made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) and the Trainers and Allied Workers Union (TAWU) in 2013 and 2014.

Legislative developments. The Committee recalls that, following the recommendations made by the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards (Conference Committee) in 2017 and 2018: (i) the Government had embarked on a labour law review process; (ii) a tripartite Labour Law Review Committee (LLRC) was established; and (iii) the LLRC decided to focus the review on the Employment Act and the Trade Unions and Employers Organisations (TUEO) Act, the Public Service Act of 2008 (PSA) and the Trade Disputes Act of 2016 (TDA). In its last observation, the Committee had noted that both the Government and the Botswana Federation of Trade Unions (BFTU) had indicated that the work by the LLRC was ongoing and that progress was being made with respect to the implementation of the Conference Committee's recommendations. The Committee had also noted the Government's indication that, given that a review of the list of essential services was of critical importance to workers, a task team had been formed to review such list under section 46 of the TDA.

In its last report, the Government indicates that, while the labour law review is still ongoing, on 8 August 2019, the Parliament passed the TDA (Amendment) Act 2019, which amends the list of the essential services. The Committee notes with satisfaction that, in line with its recommendations, the following services have been deleted from the list of essential services: diamond sorting, cutting and selling services; teaching services; government broadcasting services; the Bank of Botswana; vaccine laboratory services; railways operation and maintenance services; immigration and customs services; transportation and distribution services of petroleum products; sewerage services; public veterinary services; and services necessary to the operation of any of these services.

The Committee takes note that, accordingly, the list of essential services under section 46 of the TDA (Amendment) Act 2019 contains the following services: air traffic control services; fire services; the provision of food to pupils of school age and the cleaning of schools; electrical services (electricity teams for generation, transmission and distribution); water and sanitation services; and health services as well as transport and telecommunication services required for the provision of any of the previously mentioned services. The Committee notes the Government's indication that such ancillary transport and telecommunication services have been included in light of the particular circumstances prevailing in the country and considering, for instance, the need for ambulances or the services of operators who take note and transmit the details of patients in cases of accidents for paramedics to attend to the scene.

The Committee recalls that, in its previous comments, it had also requested the Government to take the following legislative measures:

– amend section 2(1)(iv) of the TUEO Act and section 2(11)(iv) of the TDA, which exclude employees of the prison service from their scope of application, as well as section 35 of the Prison Act, which prohibits members of the prison service from becoming members of a trade union or anybody affiliated to a trade union. The Committee notes that the Government indicates that while it considers that prison staff perform a security function, the LLRC with ILO assistance is engaging the relevant stakeholders on this matter;

– amend section 43 of the TUEO Act, which provides for inspection of accounts, books and documents of a trade union by the Registrar at "any reasonable time". The Committee notes the Government's indication that this matter is being considered in the labour law review process;
– amend section 48B(1) of the TUEO Act, which grants certain facilities (such as access to premises or representation of members in case of complaint, etc.) only to unions representing at least one third of the employees in the enterprise. The Committee notes the Government's indication that this matter is being considered in the labour law review process.

Trusting that all pending matters in relation to the above-mentioned Acts will be addressed in the framework of the ongoing labour law review process, the Committee urges the Government to take measures to ensure that such Acts are amended, in consultation with the social partners, so as to bring them into full conformity with the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on any progress achieved in this regard and to provide a copy of the amended Acts once adopted.

The Committee had previously taken note that the labour law review process had been extended to include the PSA and had requested the Government to provide information on the progress made in this regard. Noting that the Government has not provided information in this respect, the Committee reiterates its previous request to the Government to provide information on the progress made in the review of the PSA and to provide a copy of the amended Act, once adopted.

The Committee reminds the Government that it may continue to avail itself of technical assistance from the ILO with respect to all issues raised in its comments.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government, which reiterates the content of its previous request adopted in 2019.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1997)

The Committee takes note of the observations of the Botswana Federation of Trade Unions (BFTU) received on 1 October 2020 relating to issues examined in the present comment. It notes that the BFTU, in its observations, also alleges repeated acts of anti-union discrimination, including anti-union dismissals, in the mining sector, as well as violations of the right to collective bargaining in the private sector. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments in response to these allegations.

Not having received other supplementary information, the Committee reiterates its comments adopted in 2019 and reproduced below.

Legislative issues. The Committee recalls that for many years it has been requesting the Government to take the following legislative measures:

(a) amend section 2 of the Trade Disputes Act (TDA), section 2 of the Trade Union and Employers' Organizations (TUEO Act), and section 35 of the Prisons Act so as to ensure that prison staff are afforded all the guarantees provided under the Convention;
(b) adopt specific legislative provisions ensuring that all union committee members, including those of unregistered trade unions, enjoy an adequate protection against anti-union discrimination;
(c) adopt specific legislative provisions ensuring adequate protection against acts of interference by employers coupled with effective and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions;
(d) repeal section 35(1)(b) of the TDA, which permits an employer or employers' organization to apply to the Commissioner to withdraw the recognition granted to a trade union on the grounds that the trade union refuses to negotiate in good faith with the employer;
(e) amend section 20(3) of the TDA (this section read together with section 18(1)(a) and (e) allows the Industrial Court to refer a trade dispute to arbitration, including where only one of the parties made an urgent appeal to the Court for determination of the dispute) so as to ensure that the recourse to compulsory arbitration does not affect the promotion of collective bargaining;
(f) take the necessary legislative measures so as to ensure that if no union reaches the required threshold to be recognized as a bargaining agent, i.e., one third of the employees in a bargaining unit (section 48 of the TUEO Act read with section 32 of the TDA), the existing unions are given the possibility, jointly or separately, to bargain collectively, at least on behalf of their own members; and
(g) take the necessary legislative measures so as to ensure that the limitation imposed in the Public Service Act on the scope of collective bargaining for public sector workers not engaged in the administration of the State will fully comply with the Convention.

The Committee had previously expressed the hope that the above-mentioned legislative measures would be taken in the framework of the ongoing labour legislation review process to ensure the full conformity of the above-mentioned Acts with the Convention. The Committee notes that the Government indicates that the Committee's comments and concerns have been considered in the ongoing labour legislation review process which is being conducted with the assistance of the Office. It also notes the Government's indication that on 8 August 2019, the Parliament passed the TDA (Amendment) Act 2019.

The Committee observes, however, that while the said Act refers to issues related to the application of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), it does not address the questions raised by the Committee in the present comment. The Committee therefore recalls its previous request to the Government and expresses its firm hope that the necessary measures will be taken in the framework of the ongoing labour legislation review process so as to ensure the full conformity of the above-mentioned Acts with the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the progress made in this respect.

Article 4 of the Convention. Collective bargaining in practice. The Committee recalls that it has previously requested the Government to reply to observations made by the Trainers and Allied Workers Union (TAWU) in 2013 concerning violations of the right to collective bargaining in practice. While noting that the Government has not provided a reply to the said allegations, the Committee observes, from the information provided in the report, that out of the 40 collective agreements concluded between 2017 and 2019, three were negotiated by the TAWU. The Committee further notes that the 40 collective agreements were negotiated in a broad variety of sectors, including mining, retail, education, health, hotel, communication and services. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the number of collective agreements signed and in force in the country and to indicate the sectors and the number of workers covered.

The Committee reminds the Government that it may continue to avail itself of technical assistance from the Office with respect to all issues raised in its present comments.

Brazil

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1952)

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020). The Committee has updated its examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the supplementary information received from the Government and the social partners this year, as well as the information at its disposal in 2019.

The Committee takes note of: (i) the observations of the National Confederation of Industry (CNI) received on 24 September 2020, in which it reiterates its previously expressed position on matters examined by the Committee in this comment; and (ii) the observations of the International Organization of Employers (IOE) received on 1 October 2020, in which the IOE reiterates its observations from the previous year and supports the observations of the CNI.

The Committee also notes: (i) the joint observations of the Single Confederation of Workers (CUT) the Confederation of Brazilian Trade Unions (CSB), and Union Forces, received on 12 June 2020; (ii) the observations of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), received on 16 September 2020; (iii) the observations of Public Services International (PSI), received on 29 September 2020; (iv) the observations of the CUT, received on 1 October 2020; and (v) the observations of the National Confederation of Education Workers (CNTE), received on 1 October 2020. The Committee notes that these observations relate to subjects examined in the present comment, as well as allegations of violations of the Convention in practice, concerning which the Government has provided its comments. In this regard, the Committee notes, in the first place, the observations of the ITUC and CUT denouncing a ruling of the Higher Labour Court of September 2020 suspending the postal enterprise collective agreement and the Government's response that there has been no violation of collective bargaining, but merely a ruling by the higher court setting aside the decision by the court of first instance issued in 2019 in the context of the ongoing collective dispute in that sector. In light of the above, the Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on the continuation of collective bargaining in the postal enterprise. The Committee also notes the allegations by the ITUC concerning acts of violence and intimidation by the police against workers and their representatives during several strikes and workers' assemblies. The Committee notes the Government's indications in this regard that: (i) there were three isolated cases for which the information provided by the ITUC does not on its own offer proof of the occurrence of abuses by the police or the judicial authorities; (ii) it is not possible to ascertain what actually happened without a detailed analysis of the action by the police; and (iii) the Brazilian legal system offers adequate judicial remedies to deal effectively with this type of situation. Emphasizing the importance of workers' organizations being able to exercise their lawful activities in defence of the interests of their members in general and of collective bargaining in particular in a context free from violence, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the results of the investigations concerning the cases referred to by the ITUC.

COVID-19 pandemic and the application of the Convention. The Committee notes the allegations by the CUT, CSB, Union Forces and PSI that provisional measures No. 927 (MP No. 927, published on 22 March 2020) and No. 936 (MP No. 936, published on 1 April 2020), adopted in response to the COVID-19 pandemic, severely prejudice the right to collective bargaining by ensuring that individual agreements between the employer and the worker prevail over collective bargaining machinery. The Committee notes that the trade union confederations allege in particular that: (i) section 2 of MP No. 927 provides for the possibility of establishing by individual agreement the adaptations necessary for the maintenance of the labour contract in the context of the health crisis, with the individual agreement prevailing over all other legislative and collective sources of labour law, with the sole exception of constitutional guarantees; (ii) MP No. 927 grants the employer the unilateral power to decide whether or not to extend the application of collective accords that have expired and which cannot be renewed due to the health crisis; (iii) MP No. 936 (relating to temporary measures for the reduction of working time and the suspension of labour contracts during the health crisis and providing for the payment of compensatory benefits to the employees concerned from public funds) gives preference to the implementation of this arrangement by individual agreement as it only envisages its activation by collective accord for a small proportion of the employed labour force and does not grant the same financial compensation for reduced working time negotiated collectively; and (iv) as MPs Nos 927 and 936 do not make the activation of the emergency measures for the reduction of working time and the suspension of labour contracts subject to the demonstration by enterprises of their necessity, they establish the conditions for a real state of emergency.

The Committee notes that the Government, while emphasizing the need for rapid and effective responses to the situation of emergency caused by the pandemic, refutes any violation of the Convention and indicates in particular that: (i) MP No. 927 has made it possible to safeguard immediately jobs that are endangered by the crisis, in a situation of great uncertainty, including the possibility to engage in collective bargaining in a context of physical distancing; (ii) MP No. 927 has enabled employers to take various temporary measures in such areas as remote working, the dates of holidays and the organization of working time; (iii) MP No. 927 did not prohibit collective bargaining during the period for which it was in force and, although section 2 gave preference to individual agreements over collective and legislative sources of labour law, the requirement to comply with labour rights endowed with constitutional protection offered substantial guarantees surrounding individual agreements; (iv) during the period that it was in force, the Federal Supreme Court, called upon to examine the constitutionality of MP No. 927, refused to order its temporary suspension, particularly because it contributed to the imperative of safeguarding jobs during a situation of emergency; and (v) it was envisaged that, in the absence of legislative approval, MP No. 927 would expire on 19 July 2020 at the latest; as a result of the absence of action by the Congress, the MP has thus no longer formed part of Brazilian legal rules since that date.

With respect to MP No. 936, the Committee takes note that the Government indicates that: (i) the MP introduced an emergency programme for the maintenance of jobs and incomes with a view to mitigating the impact of the public emergency situation; (ii) MP No. 936 provides, through individual or collective agreements, for the temporary possibility, during the situation of public emergency, to either reduce working time and remuneration in a proportional manner, or to suspend the labour contract, with such agreements giving rise, on the one hand, to a guarantee of the maintenance of the job during the period under consideration and, on the other, the payment by the Government of a job and income preservation compensation benefit calculated on the basis of the level of unemployment insurance to which the worker would be entitled; (iii) access to these emergency measures is not subject to the need to demonstrate a reduction in activity by the enterprise with a view to making the process more flexible and saving as many jobs as possible; (iv) the appeal by the trade union confederations challenging the constitutionality of MP No. 936 was also rejected; (v) MP No. 936, which has allowed over 10 million jobs to be saved, was unanimously transformed into a legislative instrument by the two chambers of the Congress through Act No. 14.020 of 2020; (vi) in contrast with the allegations of the trade union confederations, the mechanisms set out in MP No. 936 and Act No. 14.020 can be set in motion through collective bargaining for all employees, irrespective of their earnings level; (vii) however, it is only for workers whose salary is between 3,135 and 12,102 reais that the reduction in working time or the suspension of their contract must necessarily be determined through a collective accord as, under the terms of the mechanism that has been established, they are the ones who have a lower replacement rate of their salary than those at a lower remuneration scale; (viii) there is no differentiation in the level of earnings compensation benefit provided depending on whether the decision to reduce working time or suspend the contract is made by individual or collective agreement, but only the general rule that no compensation is payable for reductions in working time of under 25 per cent; and (ix) finally, to promote collective bargaining, MP No. 936 has reduced the applicable waiting periods by half and the measures taken by the executive authorities have made it possible to engage in virtual bargaining.

The Committee takes due note of the information provided by the Government and the trade union confederations. The Committee fully recognizes the exceptional circumstances experienced by the country due to the pandemic and the absolute necessity to adopt urgent measures to mitigate the economic and social effects of the resulting crisis. At the same time, the Committee recalls its general position that measures adopted during an acute crisis which set aside the application of the collective agreements that are in force must be of an exceptional nature, limited in time and provide guarantees for the workers most affected. The Committee also emphasizes that the Employment and Decent Work for Peace and Resilience Recommendation, 2017 (No. 205), underlines the importance of social dialogue in general and collective bargaining in particular in responding to crisis situations by encouraging the active participation of employers' and workers' organizations in planning, implementing and monitoring measures for recovery and resilience.

The Committee observes that MP No. 927 which, with a view to safeguarding employment, established the temporary primacy of individual agreements over collective accords and empowered the employer to take a certain number of unilateral decisions, including whether to extend or not the application of collective accords that expire during the pandemic, is no longer in force. The Committee nevertheless requests the Government to specify whether the clauses of collective agreements that may have been temporarily set aside by individual agreements concluded between the employer and the worker or by unilateral decisions of the employer taken under the terms of MP No. 927 are once again fully applicable.

With regard to MP No. 936, converted by the Congress into Act No. 14.020, the Committee understands that its objective is to allow the reduction of working time or the temporary suspension of the labour contract during the period of public emergency and to establish a temporary mechanism for the compensation of income from public funds. The Committee observes in this regard that, under the terms of the instruments referred to: (i) in the event of the reduction of working time, the hourly wage must be maintained; (ii) access to these mechanisms can be initiated either through a collective accord or an individual agreement for workers with low or very high incomes, but recourse to a collective accord is compulsory for workers with salaries in an intermediate range (around 11 per cent of the labour force, according to the Government); and (iii) when a collective accord is concluded, it prevails over individual agreements, except where the latter are more favourable to the employee. While recalling that it is the responsibility of the State under the terms of the Convention to promote collective bargaining machinery that applies to all workers irrespective of their income level, the Committee understands that the income protection mechanisms in the event of the reduction of activity established by MP No. 936 and Act No. 14.020 are not intended to set aside collective agreements and accords that are in force, but to establish a temporary system for reduced activity and income compensation that can be set in motion by individual agreement or collective accord. In these conditions, and on the basis of the principles referred to above, while duly noting the substantial efforts made by the Government to attenuate the loss of income by workers, the Committee encourages the Government to reinforce dialogue with the representative organizations of employers and workers with a view to assessing the impact of the implementation of Act No. 14.020, ensuring the application of collective agreements and accords that are in force and promoting, for all the workers covered by the Convention, the full utilization of collective bargaining machinery as a means of achieving balanced and sustainable solutions in a time of crisis. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on this subject.

The Committee also notes the allegations by the ITUC that the combined effect of the economic crisis caused by the pandemic and the possibility, arising out of the reform of labour legislation in 2017, of setting aside through collective bargaining a significant proportion of the protective provisions of the labour legislation could lead workers to accept lower terms and conditions of work and remuneration to keep their jobs. The Committee notes in this regard the Government's reply refuting these claims and emphasizing both the guarantees and the flexibility offered by the new labour legislation with a view to preserving employment. While noting these indications, the Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report on the number and content of the agreements and accords concluded during the period of public emergency, with an indication of the frequency of the exemptions from the protective provisions of the labour legislation that they may contain.

The Committee also notes the following observations received in 2019 relating to matters examined by the Committee in the present comment: (i) the observations of the CUT, received on 20 May 2019; (ii) the joint observations of the ITUC, the Building and Wood Workers International (BWI), Education International (EI), IndustriALL Global Union (IndustriALL), the International Transport Workers' Federation (ITF), the International Union of Food, Agriculture, Hotel, Restaurant, Catering, Tobacco and Allied Workers' Associations (IUF), PSI and UNI Global Union, received on 1 September 2019; (iii) the observations of the CNI and the National Confederation of Transport (CNT), both received on 1 September 2019; (iv) the observations of the NCST, received on 10 September 2019; and (v) the joint observations of the CUT and ITUC received on 18 September 2019.

The Committee also notes the observations of the IOE, received on 30 August 2019, containing the interventions made by employers during the Committee on the Application of Standards of the International Labour Conference in 2019 (hereinafter the Conference Committee).

Follow-up to the conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards (International Labour Conference, 108th Session, June 2019)

The Committee notes the discussions in the Conference Committee in June 2019 on the application of the Convention by Brazil. The Committee notes that the Conference Committee requested the Government to: (i) continue to examine, in cooperation and consultation with the most representative employers' and workers' organizations, the impact of the reforms and to decide if appropriate adaptations are needed; and (ii) prepare, in consultation with the most representative employers' and workers' organizations, a report to be submitted to the Committee of Experts in accordance with the regular reporting cycle.

Article 1 of the Convention. Adequate protection against anti-union discrimination. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, in the context of various complaints examined by the Committee on Freedom of Association (Cases Nos 2635, 2636 and 2646) alleging acts of anti-union discrimination, the Government had indicated that, "although freedom of association is protected under the Constitution, the national legislation does not define anti-union acts, and this prevents the Ministry of Labour and Employment from taking effective preventive and repressive measures against conduct such as that reported in the present case". In its previous comments, based on the information provided by the Government, the Committee expressed the hope that, in the context of the Labour Relations Council (CRT), it would be possible to prepare draft legislation explicitly establishing remedies and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions against acts of anti-union discrimination.

The Committee notes the Government's indication, in its 2019 report and the supplementary information provided in 2020, that: (i) freedom of association is protected by the Constitution; (ii) although the ordinary legislation does not contain a section on anti-union acts, it does have a section on the rights of trade union members; (iii) within this part, section 543 of the Consolidation of Labour Laws (CLT) establishes the employment stability of trade union representatives and section 543(6) establishes an administrative penalty for any employer that prevents a worker from exercising her or his trade union rights, without prejudice to the right to compensation that could be obtained by the latter; and (iv) section 199 of the Penal Code criminalizes the use of threats or violence to prevent a person from joining a union. The Committee also notes the indication by the CNT that new section 510-B of the CLT attributes the function to the committees of workers' representatives of ensuring the prevention of any discrimination, including anti-union discrimination in the enterprise. The Committee takes note of this information. It observes in this regard that: (i) by virtue of Provisional Measure No. 905 of November 2019 (MP No. 905) administrative penalties applicable in the event of non-compliance with section 543(6) of the CLT were those imposed in relation to labour law violations in general; and (ii) MP No. 905 is no longer in force as it has not been confirmed by the Congress of the Republic. Recalling the fundamental importance of ensuring effective protection against anti-union discrimination, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the legislation explicitly establishes specific and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions against all acts of anti-union discrimination. The Committee requests the Government to report any developments in this regard.

Article 4. Promotion of collective bargaining. Relationship between collective bargaining and the law. In its 2017 and 2018 comments, the Committee noted that, under the terms of Act No. 13467, adopted on 13 November 2017, new section 611-A of the CLT introduced the general principle that collective agreements and accords prevail over the legislation, and it is therefore possible through collective bargaining to derogate from the protective provisions of the legislation, with the sole limit of the constitutional rights referred to in section 611-B of the CLT. The Committee recalled that it considered that, while targeted legislative provisions covering specific aspects of conditions of work and providing, in a circumscribed and reasoned manner, for the possibility of their replacement by means of collective bargaining may be compatible with the Convention, a legal provision providing for a general possibility to derogate from labour legislation by means of collective bargaining would be contrary to the purpose of promoting free and voluntary collective bargaining established in Article 4 of the Convention. On this basis, the Committee requested the Government, in consultation with the representative social partners, to take the necessary measures for the revision of sections 611-A and 611-B of the CLT so as to specify more precisely the situations in which clauses derogating from the legislation may be negotiated collectively, as well as the scope of such clauses.

The Committee notes the joint observations of the ITUC, BWI, EI, IndustriALL, ITF, IUF, PSI and UNI Global Union, which denounce the harmful effects deriving from the general possibility to derogate through collective bargaining from the protective provisions of the legislation. The Committee notes that the international trade union organizations consider that the new relationship between collective bargaining and the law established by Act No. 13467: (i) radically undermines the pillars on which collective bargaining machinery is established and constitutes a frontal attack on free and voluntary collective bargaining, as guaranteed by the Convention; (ii) creates the conditions for a race to the bottom between employers for the reduction of workers' rights; and (iii) has a dissuasive effect on the exercise of collective bargaining which is reported to have resulted in a decrease of 39 per cent in the coverage rate of collective bargaining in the country. The Committee also notes the observations of the CUT, which indicates that: (i) the measures that make it possible to lower working conditions through negotiation do not promote the utilization of collective bargaining; and (ii) the reform has given rise to a significant fall in the number of collective agreements and accords concluded. The Committee also notes the observations of the NCST in this respect.

The Committee further notes the observations of the CNT and CNI, according to which sections 611-A and 611-B of the CLT: (i) offer great freedom to determine conditions of work that are favourable for all the parties through collective bargaining; (ii) are in conformity with the provisions of the Brazilian Constitution, in providing for the possibility to derogate from certain rights through a collective accord, as well as with the case law of the Supreme Federal Court, which emphasizes the need to respect agreements concluded by the social partners; and (iii) are in accordance with ILO Conventions on the subject, as indicated by the examination of the Conference Committee, which did not find any grounds for incompatibility with the Convention.

The Committee notes the information provided by the Government, which essentially reiterates the positions expressed in previous reports. The Committee notes the Government's indication that: (i) the 2017 legislative reform reinforces the role and value of collective bargaining by increasing its material scope, which is fully in conformity with the purposes of ILO Conventions on this subject, and particularly necessary in the context of excessively detailed labour legislation; (ii) the primacy recognized for collective agreements and accords over the law reinforces the legal security of collective bargaining, which is essential in view of the traditional interference by the Brazilian judicial authorities and responds to a historical demand by the Brazilian trade union movement; (iii) section 611-A of the CLT does not in any event require unions to conclude accords which set aside protective legal provisions, and the social partners can choose to continue to be governed by these legal provisions, when that is in the interests of the parties; (iv) the fact that section 611-A of the CLT establishes a non-exhaustive list of subjects on which collective agreements and accords may not derogate from the provisions of the legislation is intended to ensure the necessary flexibility for the social partners in their negotiations; (v) the reform also ensures the protection of 30 rights set out in section 611-B of the CLT, which cannot be set aside by collective bargaining; (vi) none of the 30 legal actions initiated at the national level against Act No. 13467 have been related to collective bargaining; (vii) a situation in which collective bargaining could only lead to additional benefits for workers would discourage employers from participating in such bargaining; (viii) following a reduction of 13.1 per cent in 2018, the number of collective agreements and accords began to rise over the first four months of 2019 to come close to the levels prior to the reform; and (ix) as found by a detailed study carried out by the Institute of Economic Research Foundation (FIPE), the agreements negotiated are favourable to workers and cover more areas than before, which shows that the alleged dissuasive effect of section 611-A on collective bargaining has not occurred; and (x) the reform of the labour legislation has been welcomed by the World Bank, the Organisation of Economic Co-operation and Development, and the International Monetary Fund. Finally, the Committee notes the Government's statements that: (i) there is no textual basis for the position of the Committee that this Convention, as well as the Labour Relations (Public Service) Convention, 1978 (No. 151), and the Collective Bargaining Convention, 1981 (No. 154), have the general objective of promoting more favourable conditions of work than those set out in the legislation; and (ii) the reference by the Committee to the preparatory work for the Conventions is inappropriate.

The Committee notes the various elements referred to by the Government and the national and international social partners and notes that, in the supplementary information provided in 2020, the parties reiterate their previously expressed positions. The Committee notes, in the first place, the Government's indication that, contrary to the view expressed by the trade unions, the number of collective agreements and accords concluded is in the process of reaching the levels prior to the 2017 legislative reform. The Committee emphasizes the importance of continuing to have available full information on this subject, both on the number of agreements and accords concluded and their content. The Committee also notes the reiterated view by the Government and employers' organizations that sections 611-A and 611-B of the CLT promote collective bargaining within the meaning of the Convention by ensuring greater freedom to the negotiating parties and at the same time guaranteeing that many rights cannot be set aside through collective bargaining.

The Committee recalls in this respect that, on the basis of the detailed information provided by the Government, the Committee noted in its previous comments that: (i) the possibility of setting aside the protective provisions of the legislation through collective bargaining introduced by Act No. 13467 is indeed not absolute, as section 611-B of the CLT establishes a limitative list setting out 30 rights, based on the provisions of the Constitution of Brazil, which cannot be set aside through collective agreements or accords; and (ii) the possibilities for derogation from the legislation through collective bargaining opened up by section 611-A are however very extensive insofar as, on the one hand, the section refers explicitly to 14 points covering many aspects of the employment relationship and, on the other, this list, in contrast with the list set out in section 611-B, is solely indicative ("inter alia"), with the possibility of setting aside the protective provisions of the legislation through collective bargaining thereby being established as a general principle.

The Committee recalls that it considers that, while targeted legislative provisions covering specific aspects of conditions of work and providing, in a circumscribed and reasoned manner, for the possibility of their replacement by means of collective bargaining may be compatible with the Convention, a legal provision providing for a general possibility to set aside the protective provisions of labour legislation by means of collective bargaining would be contrary to the objective of promoting free and voluntary collective bargaining, as set out in Article 4 of the Convention. While emphasizing the importance of obtaining, insofar as possible, tripartite agreement on the basic rules of collective bargaining, the Committee therefore once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures, in consultation with the representative social partners, for the revision of sections 611-A and 611-B of the CLT so as to specify more precisely the situations in which clauses derogating from the legislation may be negotiated, as well as the scope of such clauses. Moreover, noting the Government's indications concerning the increase in the number of collective agreements and accords concluded during the first four months of 2019, the Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on developments in the number of collective agreements and accords concluded in the country, including on the agreements and accords which contain clauses derogating from the legislation, specifying the nature and scope of such derogations.

Relationship between collective bargaining and individual contracts of employment. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the conformity with the Convention of section 444 of the CLT, under the terms of which workers who have a higher education diploma and receive a wage that is at least two times higher than the ceiling for benefits under the general social security scheme may derogate from the provisions of the applicable collective agreements in their individual contracts of employment.

The Committee notes the Government's indication in this regard that Article 4 of the Convention does not refer to individual contracts of employment and that it reiterates in the supplementary information received in 2020 that section 444 of the CLT concerns a very small group of workers, generally higher managerial personnel, representing only around 0.25 per cent of the population. The Committee also notes the position of the employers' organizations, the CNI and CNT, which consider that the provisions of section 444 extend the possibilities for negotiation available to the workers concerned. The Committee finally notes the position expressed by the national and international trade union organizations, which call for the repeal of the provision.

The Committee recalls once again that the obligation to promote collective bargaining set out in Article 4 of the Convention requires that the individual negotiation of the terms of the contract of employment cannot derogate from the rights and guarantees provided in the applicable collective agreements, on the understanding that contracts of employment can always set out more favourable terms and conditions of work and employment. The Committee also reiterates that this principle is explicitly set out in Paragraph 3 of the Collective Agreements Recommendation, 1951 (No. 91). While emphasizing once again that collective bargaining machinery can take into account the specific needs and interests of different categories of workers who may, if they so wish, be represented by their own organizations, the Committee recalls that the present Convention is fully applicable to the workers covered by section 444 of the CLT insofar as, under the terms of Articles 5 and 6, only the armed forces and the police (Article 5) and public servants engaged in the administration of the State (Article 6) may be excluded from the scope of application of the Convention. The Committee therefore reiterates that the Convention does not allow for an exclusion from its scope of application on the basis of the level of remuneration of the workers. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government, after consultation with the representative social partners concerned, to take the necessary measures to ensure the conformity of section 444 of the CLT with the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any progress achieved in this respect.

Scope of application of the Convention. Autonomous and self-employed workers. In its comments adopted in 2017 and 2018, based on the allegations made by the trade unions that the extension of the definition of self-employed workers as a result of new section 442-B of the CLT would have the effect of excluding a significant category of workers from the rights set out in the Convention, the Committee invited the Government to hold consultations with all the parties concerned with a view to ensuring that all autonomous and self-employed workers are authorized to participate in free and voluntary collective bargaining, and to identify the appropriate adaptations to be introduced into collective bargaining procedures to facilitate their application to these categories of workers.

The Committee recalls that, irrespective of the definition of autonomous and self-employed workers stemming from section 442-B of the CLT, all workers, including autonomous and self-employed workers, are covered by the provisions of the Convention. In this respect, in 2019 the Committee welcomed the Government's indications that, under the terms of section 511 of the CLT, which recognizes the right to organize of autonomous workers, these workers are also covered by the right to engage in collective bargaining. The Committee also noted in this regard the similar position expressed by the CNT and CNI. At the same time, the Committee notes: (i) the call made by the ITUC and seven international trade union federations in 2019 for all measures to be taken to ensure the effective access of autonomous and self-employed workers to free and voluntary collective bargaining; (ii) the indication by the CUT in its observations in 2020 that, although section 511 of the CLT recognizes the right of autonomous workers to organize, this provision does not however grant them the possibility to have access to collective bargaining machinery, particularly in view of the absence of a counterpart and, in practice, the fact that the transition from the status of employee to that of autonomous worker under the terms of section 442-B would have the effect of excluding the workers concerned from the coverage of the collective agreements in force; and (iii) the indication by the Government in its supplementary information provided in 2020 that the emergence of various non-standard forms of work is an additional challenge for collective bargaining in all countries, particularly in view of the low unionization rate. In light of the above, noting the broad scope of section 511 of the CLT, the Committee invites the Government to: (i) provide examples of collective agreements or accords negotiated by organizations representing autonomous or self-employed workers or, at the least, of which the scope of application would cover these categories of workers; and (ii) engage in consultations with all the parties concerned with the objective of identifying appropriate modifications to be introduced into collective bargaining machinery to facilitate its application to autonomous and self-employed workers. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the progress achieved in this respect.

Relationship between the various levels of collective bargaining. The Committee previously noted that, under the terms of section 620 of the CLT, as amended by Act No. 13467, the conditions established in collective labour accords (which are concluded at the level of one or more enterprises) always prevail over those contained in collective labour agreements (which are concluded at a broader level, such as a sector of activity or an occupation). In this regard, the Committee requested the Government to indicate the manner in which respect for the commitments made by the social partners in the framework of agreements concluded at the level of the sector of activity or occupation is guaranteed and to provide information on the impact of section 620 of the CLT on recourse to the negotiation of collective agreements and collective accords, and on the overall coverage rate of collective bargaining in the country.

The Committee notes that the Government confines itself to indicating in this regard that the objective of section 620 of the CLT is to allow the conclusion of accords that are closer to the everyday reality of workers and the enterprise. The Committee also notes that the CNI and CNT consider that the primacy accorded in all cases to collective accords over collective agreements, of which the scope of application is broader, is fully in accordance with the provisions of the Convention, insofar as the latter does not establish any order of preference or hierarchy between the various bargaining levels.

The Committee recalls once again that, in accordance with Article 4 of the Convention, collective bargaining must be promoted at all levels and that, in conformity with the general principle set out in Paragraph 3(1) of Recommendation No. 91, collective agreements should bind the signatories thereto and those on whose behalf the agreement is concluded. Noting the absence of replies by the Government in this regard, the Committee once again requests the Government to: (i) indicate the manner in which respect for the commitments made by the social partners in the framework of agreements concluded at the level of the sector of activity or occupation is guaranteed; and (ii) provide information on the impact of section 620 of the CLT on recourse to the negotiation of collective agreements and collective accords, and on the overall coverage rate of collective bargaining in the country.

Article 4. Promotion of free and voluntary collective bargaining. Subjection of collective agreements to financial and economic policy. The Committee recalls that for many years it has been emphasizing the need to repeal section 623 of the CLT, under the terms of which the provisions of an agreement or accord that are in conflict with the standards governing the Government's economic and financial policy or the wage policy that is in force shall be declared null and void. In this regard, emphasizing that Article 4 of the Convention requires the promotion of free and voluntary collective bargaining, the Committee recalled that: (i) the public authorities may establish machinery for discussion and the exchange of views to encourage the parties to collective bargaining to take voluntarily into account considerations relating to the Government's economic and social policy and the protection of the public interest; and (ii) restrictions on collective bargaining in relation to economic matters should only be possible in exceptional circumstances, that is in the case of serious and insurmountable difficulties in preserving jobs and the continuity of enterprises and institutions. The Committee notes that, in the supplementary information provided in 2020, the Government indicates that: (i) section 623 of the CLT, adopted in 1967, is not in accordance with the objectives of the Constitution of 1988 and is therefore no longer applied; and (ii) the only limitation that is currently in force concerns the prohibition of the automatic adjustment of wages on the basis of the price index to prevent an increase in inflation, which places no restriction on wage negotiations on the basis of other factors. While taking due note of the Government's indications, the Committee observes that the 2017 reform of the labour legislation did not remove section 623 of the CLT.

The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend the legislation as indicated above and to provide information in its next report on any measures adopted in this regard.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Bulgaria

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1959)

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020). The Committee proceeded with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the supplementary information received from the Government and the social partners this year (see last paragraph, concerning section 51 of the Railway Transport Act), as well as on the basis of the information at its disposal in 2019.

The Committee also notes the observations of the Confederation of Independent Trade Unions in Bulgaria (CITUB), transmitted with the Government's report in 2019 and alleging that sections 44 to 46 of the Civil Servants Act are insufficient to guarantee in practice the right to organize of civil servants, as well as of other workers under a labour relation; and affirming that the Civil Servants Act, together with the Ministry of Interior Act and the Judiciary Act, should be amended to fully guarantee all rights under the Convention to these workers and their organizations. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations in this respect.

The Committee further notes the observations of the Bulgarian Industrial Association (BIA), transmitted with the Government's supplementary report and alleging that certain sectoral regulations – namely the Forestry Act, the Act on Wine and Alcoholic Beverages, the Act on Tobacco and Related Products – interfere in the freedom of association of employers, in particular as to the autonomy and operation of branch associations of producers and traders, which at the same time perform functions to protect the interests of employers in the respective industry. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations in this respect.

The Committee finally notes the observations of the Union for Private Economic Enterprise (UPEE) and the Confederation of Labour (PODKREPA), concerning the supplementary information provided by the Government and transmitted with its report.

Article 3 of the Convention. Right of workers' organizations to organize their administration and activities and to formulate their programmes. The Committee recalls that for a number of years it had been raising the need to amend section 47 of the Civil Servants Act (CSA), which restricted the right to strike of public servants. The Committee takes note with satisfaction that section 47 of the CSA has been amended to recognize the right to strike of civil servants. The Committee notes that the Government indicates that: (i) the right is applicable to all civil servants with the exception of managing senior civil servants, that is those holding the positions of Secretary-General, Municipal Secretary, Director General of the Directorate-General, Director of a Directorate and Head of Inspectorate; and (ii) section 47 also provides that participation of civil servants in a legal strike is counted as official length of service, for the time during which they participate in a legal strike civil servants have a right to compensation, and it is explicitly prohibited to seek disciplinary action or liability for civil servants participating in a legal strike.

The Committee further recalls its comments concerning the need to amend section 11(2) of the Collective Labour Disputes Settlement Act (CLDSA), which provides that the decision to call a strike shall be taken by a simple majority of the workers in the enterprise or the unit concerned; and section 11(3), which requires the strike duration to be declared in advance. The Committee notes the Government's indication, on the requirement of support by a majority of the workers that: (i) the requirement is justified as it creates certainty that the objectives pursued by the strike are common for most of the workers and employees, and not just for a small part of them; (ii) the CLDSA provides for the possibility that the simple majority is taken only by the workers and employees in a particular division of the enterprise; (iii) the CLDSA does not explicitly specify the manner in which the decision to strike should be taken, so that it is not necessary to bring all workers and employees together in one place at the same time; and (iv) workers and employees who have expressed their consent to strike are not bound by the obligation to participate in it and it is not uncommon in practice for the number of those effectively striking to be smaller than the number of workers and employees who have given their consent to the strike. While noting these explanations from the Government, the Committee must recall again that requiring a decision by over half of all the workers involved in the enterprise or unit in order to declare a strike is excessive and could unduly hinder the possibility of calling a strike, particularly in large enterprises, and that if a country deems it appropriate to require a vote by workers before a strike can be held, it should ensure that account is taken only of the votes cast and that the required quorum and majority are fixed at a reasonable level (see the 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 147). As to the requirement to indicate the duration of the strike, the Committee notes that the Government indicates that: (i) prior notice of the duration of the strike is aimed at determining the period during which the parties make efforts to settle the dispute definitively through direct negotiation, mediation or any other appropriate means, and that the requirement seeks to encourage the parties to make every effort possible to resolve the dispute; and (ii) the CLDSA does not restrict the right to strike, as it does not prohibit workers and employees from continuing their strike actions by making a decision to do so. In this respect, the Committee must recall once again that workers and their organizations should be able to call a strike for an indefinite period if they so wish without having to announce its duration. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any developments concerning sections 11(2) and 11(3) of the CDLSA, and to indicate what are the requirements for continuing a strike action beyond its initially determined duration, in particular whether a new vote and decision by the workers concerned must take place, or whether instead a decision by the trade union calling the strike is enough.

In its previous comments, the Committee has also been raising the need to amend section 51 of the Railway Transport Act (RTA), which provides that, where industrial action is taken under the Act, the workers and employers must provide the population with satisfactory transport services corresponding to no less than 50 per cent of the volume of transportation that was provided before the strike. The Committee welcomed the Government's indication that the Ministry of Labour and Social Policy recalled to the Ministry of Transport, Information Technologies and Communications (MTITC) the need for amendment of the aforementioned section 51 of the RTA in order to be in compliance with the Convention; and that the MTITC expressed readiness to take the necessary steps to amend the aforesaid section. The Committee notes that in its supplementary report the Government informs of a proposal to amend section 51 of the RTA submitted by the MTITC, which: (a) introduces a new paragraph 2 providing that workers, employers and railway authorities have to agree in the collective agreement which of the railway routes for passenger transport declared in the annual train schedule shall constitute the percentage under paragraph 1 (i.e. no less than 50 per cent), as well as the type and number of personnel required to carry out these services; (b) introduces a new paragraph 3, according to which in case of disagreement the parties may seek assistance for settlement of the dispute through mediation and/or voluntary arbitration by the National Institute for Conciliation and Arbitration; but (c) maintains in paragraph 1 the obligation to provide no less than 50 per cent of the amount of transport services (to which it adds the precision that this will be in relation to the transport services "at the time" of taking strike actions). The MTITC notes that section 51 has not been an obstacle for the exercise of the right to strike by employees of the national railway infrastructure company and its subsidiaries (referring to concrete examples of its use in 2011) and defends the need for such provision by referring to the rights of passengers, arguing that they should be able to travel by rail transport regardless of the interests of the trade union organizations. While welcoming that the draft amendment being considered provides for the participation of social partners in definition of the minimum services, as well as for a mechanism for the resolution of disputes when agreement cannot be reached, the Committee observes that it does not fully address its previous comments. In this respect, the Committee recalls that while a minimum service may be established in services of fundamental importance such as railway transportation, in order to ensure adequate respect of the right of workers' organizations to organize their activities, such minimum service must be limited to the operations strictly necessary to meet the basic needs of the population or the minimum requirements of the service, while maintaining the effectiveness of the pressure brought to bear by the strike; and that the establishment of too broad a minimum service (like no less than 50 per cent) restricts one of the essential means of pressure available to workers to defend their economic and social interests. The Committee notes in this regard the observations of PODKREPA, alleging that the "no less than 50 per cent" requirement is too large, noting that currently the negotiation of minimum services is practically impossible, and proposing that the percentage subject to settlement through collective bargaining be up to 20 per cent, so as to both allow for the right to strike and ensure the provision of minimum services. The Committee requests the Government to revise section 51 of the RTA, in consultation with the most representative organizations, in order to ensure that it does not unduly restrict the right of workers' organizations to organize their activities through collective action while also covering no more than operations strictly necessary to meet the basic needs of the population or the minimum requirements of the service. The Committee recalls that the Government may avail itself of the technical assistance of the Office in this regard and requests the Government to provide information on any progress on the matter.

Burundi

Right of Association (Agriculture) Convention, 1921 (No. 11) (ratification: 1963)

The Committee notes the Government's report, received during the first half of 2020, as well as the supplementary information provided in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020). It also notes the observations of the Trade Union Confederation of Burundi (COSYBU), received in August 2019 and August 2020, concerning the matter addressed in the present comment, as well as the Government's reply.

In its previous observations, the Committee had expressed the hope that the Government would make every effort to take the necessary steps, in the near future, to amend or repeal Legislative Decree No. 1/90 of 25 August 1967 on rural associations, which provides that, in the event of a public donation, the Minister of Agriculture may establish rural associations (section 1), membership of which is compulsory (section 3), and that the Minister determines their statutes (section 4), which, inter alia, oblige members to provide services for the common enterprise, pay a single or regular contribution, provide agricultural or livestock products and observe rules respecting cultural discipline and other matters (section 7), under penalty of the seizure of the member's property (section 10). The Committee notes that the Government states in its report that the Legislative Decree is no longer taken into consideration and that it agrees that it needs to be amended or repealed. It notes the Government's indication that steps will be taken to this effect in the near future. The Committee also notes that, in its observations, COSYBU asks the Government to accelerate the process to repeal the Legislative Decree, in consultation with the social partners. The Committee trusts that the necessary measures to amend or repeal Legislative Decree No. 1/90 of 25 August 1967 will be taken without delay and requests the Government to provide information on any developments in this respect.

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1993)

The Committee takes note of the Government's report received in the first half of 2020 and the supplementary information provided by the Government in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020). It also notes the observations of the Trade Union Confederation of Burundi (COSYBU) received in August 2019 and August 2020 on the issues examined in the present comment, as well as the Government's response thereon.

Revised Labour Code. The Committee notes the Government's indication that a revised Labour Code has been adopted by the National Assembly and the Senate but has not yet been promulgated. Because the text of this revised Labour Code has not been sent to the Office, the Committee is not in a position to assess its conformity with the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide a copy of the adopted Labour Code.

Article 2 of the Convention. Right of workers, without distinction whatsoever, to establish and join organizations. Public officials. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the absence of regulations concerning the exercise of the right to organize of magistrates, which was behind the difficulties experienced in the registration of the Trade Union of Magistrates of Burundi (SYMABU). The Committee notes the Government's indication that magistrates in Burundi are subject to the Magistrates' Regulations, which do not contain any legal provisions providing a basis for how magistrates might organize. The Government states that, in order to rectify this regulatory gap, the Minister of Justice is due to set up a committee to revise the regulations, incorporating provisions relating to the exercise of the right to organize. The Committee requests the Government to ensure that the above-mentioned committee is established in the near future, to keep it informed of all progress made on the revision of the Magistrates' Regulations in order to ensure that judges enjoy the guarantees provided for by the Convention, and to send a copy of the revised regulations once they have been adopted.

Minors. The Committee previously raised the question of the conformity of section 271 of the Labour Code – which provides that minors under 18 years of age may not join a trade union of their own choosing without the explicit authorization of their parents or guardians – with the Convention. The Committee notes that the Government does not provide any information on this matter in its report. It also notes that COSYBU indicates in its observations that the above-mentioned section is still in force. The Committee recalls that it emphasizes the need to guarantee that minors who have reached the minimum legal age for admission to employment, both as workers and as apprentices, can exercise their trade union rights without parental authorization (see the 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 78). The Committee requests the Government to take all necessary steps to amend section 271 of the Labour Code as part of the revision thereof.

Article 3. Election of trade union officers. The Committee recalls that it previously requested the Government to amend section 275(3) of the Labour Code, which provides that persons shall be barred from trade union office if they have been sentenced to more than six months' imprisonment without suspension of sentence, even if their conviction is for an act which does not call into question their integrity and implies no real risk for the performance of trade union duties. The Committee also requested the Government to amend section 275(4) of the Labour Code – which provides that trade union leaders must have belonged to the occupation or trade for at least one year – to make the legislation more flexible by allowing persons who had previously worked in the occupation to stand for office or by lifting this requirement for a reasonable proportion of trade union officers. The Committee welcomes the Government's statement that it recognizes the need to lift the requirement of belonging to the occupation for a reasonable proportion of trade union officers and that it will hold tripartite discussions on this subject. The Committee also notes COSYBU's indication that the Government has not yet responded to these issues. The Committee once again requests the Government to take all necessary steps to amend section 275(3) and (4) of the Labour Code as part of the revision thereof. Hoping that it will be in a position to observe progress in this regard in the near future, the Committee requests the Government to keep it informed of the results of tripartite discussions on the subject of belonging to the occupation and any follow-up measures adopted.

Right of organizations to organize their activities and to formulate their programmes in full freedom. Procedures for the exercise of the right to strike. The Committee previously urged the Government to adopt and send the text of the regulations implementing the Labour Code in relation to procedures for exercising the right to strike. It also requested the Government to amend section 213 of the Labour Code, which provides that strikes are lawful when they are called with the approval of a simple majority of the employees of the workplace or enterprise (if a country deems it appropriate to require a vote by workers before a strike can be held, it should ensure that account is taken only of the votes cast, and that the required quorum and majority are fixed at a reasonable level). The Committee also noted that a decree-law prohibiting the exercise of the right to strike and also the right to demonstrate throughout the national territory during election periods had still not been repealed following the elections (trade unions must be able to fully exercise their right to organize in full freedom without interference from the public authorities). The Committee notes that the Government does not provide any information on these issues in its report. It also notes that COSYBU, which indicates that the Government has still not responded, continues to call for the adoption of the regulations implementing the Labour Code in relation to procedures for exercising the right to strike. Recalling once again the importance of the right to strike for promoting and defending the interests of unionized workers, the Committee expects the Government to take the necessary steps in the near future to adopt and communicate the regulations implementing the Labour Code in relation to procedures for exercising the right to strike, to amend section 213 of the Labour Code and to repeal the above-mentioned decree-law.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1997)

The Committee notes the Government's report received during the first half of 2020, as well as the supplementary information provided by the Government in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020).

The Committee also notes the observations of the Trade Union Confederation of Burundi (COSYBU), received in August 2019 and August 2020, relating to various elements examined in the context of the present comment, and also the Government's reply in this regard. The Committee notes that the observations of COSYBU also refer to the alleged discrimination arising from non-application of an arbitration award to workers belonging to the Union of Workers of the University of Burundi (STUB). The Committee requests the Government to send its comments on this matter.

Draft revised Labour Code. The Committee notes the Government's indication that a draft revised Labour Code has been submitted to Parliament for adoption. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any new developments regarding the draft revised Labour Code and to send a copy of it once it has been adopted.

Articles 1, 2 and 3 of the Convention. Adequate protection against acts of anti-union discrimination and interference. In its previous comments, the Committee emphasized the non-dissuasive nature of the sanctions established by the Labour Code for acts of anti-union discrimination and interference and expressed the hope that the respective provisions would be amended as part of the revision of the Labour Code. The Committee notes the Government's indication that effect is given to the principles protected by the Convention in sections 268 and 269 of the Labour Code and in sections 5 and 6 of Act No. 1/28 of 23 August 2006 issuing the General Civil Service Regulations. The Government also emphasizes that the protection of workers against dismissal features in the draft of the new Labour Code being drawn up. The Committee also notes that COSYBU in its observations: (i) calls for the adoption of additional measures to ensure the protection that is particularly necessary for trade union leaders; (ii) calls for the inclusion in the national legislation of specific provisions against acts of anti-union interference and discrimination, of quick appeal procedures, and of effective penalties that act as a deterrent; (iii) states that, in the security services and telecommunications sectors, trade union leaders are constantly victims of acts of intimidation leading to suspensions, dismissals and imprisonment; and (iv) in the education and health sectors, acts of interference are practised by certain supervisors in the administration, who either give their backing to trade unions or interfere in their management. The Committee recalls that the protection afforded to workers and trade union leaders against acts of anti-union discrimination and acts of interference is an essential aspect of freedom of association, as such acts may result in practice in a denial of freedom of association and of the guarantees laid down in Convention No. 87, and also consequently of collective bargaining (see the 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 167). The Committee expects that the Government will take all the necessary steps to ensure adequate protection against all acts of anti-union discrimination and interference, whether it involves dismissals or any other prejudicial acts, especially by providing for quick appeal procedures and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions in the draft revised Labour Code being adopted, and requests the Government to provide information on any developments in the situation in this respect. The Committee also requests the Government to send its comments on the observations of COSYBU alleging acts of intimidation in the security services sector and acts of interference in the education and health sectors.

Article 4. Promotion of collective bargaining. In a previous comment, the Committee asked the Government to send its comments on an allegation from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) that section 227 of the Labour Code enables the authorities to interfere in collective bargaining and section 224 of the Code authorizes collective agreements with non-unionized workers. The Committee notes that the Government has still not provided any reply in this regard and that COSYBU, in its observations of 2020, also calls for the two above-mentioned sections to be revised. The Committee once again requests the Government to send its comments on this subject and expresses the hope that the revised Labour Code will give full effect to Article 4 of the Convention.

The Committee previously asked the Government to provide information on the specific measures taken to promote collective bargaining, and to supply practical data on the status of collective bargaining in the country. The Committee notes the Government's indication that it has facilitated and supported the setting up of social dialogue committees in the following branches of activity: health, education, transport, justice, agriculture, information and communication technologies, commerce, energy and mining, public works, agri-industry, security services, hotels and tourism, and art and handicrafts. It notes that these committees, whose task is to undertake social dialogue and launch collective negotiations, are bipartite and each composed of ten members (five employers and five workers) and are present in the 18 provinces of Burundi. The Committee also notes that the Government emphasizes that in the private sector certain enterprises have launched negotiations with representatives of the employees in the context of human resources management reforms. The Committee further notes that COSYBU: (i) states that since 2012 collective agreements have not been concluded in all sectors; (ii) denounces the suspension of bonuses and allowances linked to the economy which are established by the national inter-occupational collective agreement of 3 April 1980 regulating long-service bonuses; and (iii) asserts that an agreement signed with the Government on 23 February 2017 to re-establish the regulatory texts concerning the exercise of freedom of association and collective bargaining has still not been implemented. The Committee also notes the Government's indication in its reply that it is currently examining ways and means to implement the agreement signed on 23 February 2017. Recalling that mutual respect for commitments made in collective agreements is an important element in the right of collective bargaining, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on any developments concerning the implementation of the agreement of 23 February 2017 and to respond to the allegations of COSYBU concerning the suspension of bonuses and allowances linked to the economy which are established by the national inter-occupational collective agreement of 3 April 1980. Also noting the divergent appraisals of the Government and COSYBU regarding the implementation in practice of the right to engage in collective bargaining, the Committee also requests the Government to continue providing information on measures to encourage and promote collective bargaining and their impact. The Committee further requests the Government to continue providing detailed information, including in the private sector, on collective agreements which have been concluded, the sectors concerned and the number of workers covered.

Articles 4 and 6. Right of collective bargaining for public servants not engaged in the administration of the State. In its previous comments, the Committee asked the Government to continue providing information on the measures taken or envisaged to ensure that organizations of public servants not engaged in the administration of the State have at their disposal mechanisms which allow them to bargain collectively on the terms and conditions of their employment, including wages. The Committee also asked the Government to provide information on any agreement on conditions of work and employment, including wages, concluded in the public sector. The Committee notes the Government's indications that: (i) in the context of drawing up the national wage policy, the Ministry of Labour has set up a tripartite committee, which includes representatives of all public servants, including those not engaged in the administration of the State, to steer and give technical guidance to this work; (ii) the principal agreement concluded in the public sector is concerned with granting the wage adjustment allowance, it was signed at the end of 2015 and it came into force in 2018 for public servants not engaged in the administration of the State; and (iii) collective agreements covering more than 80 per cent of public servants have been concluded in the health, education and justice sectors. The Committee also notes that COSYBU asks: (i) for the committee on the drafting of the national wage policy to be given fresh impetus to finalize this policy; and (ii) for the relevant legal provisions to be amended so that organizations of public servants and public employers not engaged in the administration of the State can negotiate their pay and other conditions of work. Noting the divergent appraisals of the Government and COSYBU regarding the access of public servants not engaged in the administration of the State to the right of collective bargaining, the Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information on the measures taken to promote collective bargaining for this category of workers, including in the context of the national wage policy. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on all collective agreements concluded in the public sector.

Cambodia

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1999)

The Committee notes the observations of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), received on 21 September 2020, alleging that the amendments to the Law on Trade Unions (LTU) adopted in December 2019, which are examined in this comment, failed to bring the LTU into conformity with the Convention.

The Committee further notes the observations of Education International received on 1 October 2020, denouncing the arrest of five trade unionists in connection with their activities, including the President of the Cambodian Confederation of Unions (CCU), as well as an attack against the President of the Cambodian Independent Teachers' Association (CITA) on 10 August 2020. Recalling that trade union rights can only be exercised in a climate that is free from violence and intimidation, and within the framework of a system that guarantees the effective respect of civil liberties, the Committee requests the Government to provide its comments on these serious allegations.

The Committee proceeded with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the observations received from the social partners this year (see legislative issues), as well as on the basis of the information at its disposal in 2019.

The Committee takes note of the comments of the Government in reply to the 2016 and 2017 ITUC observations, including the indication that the provisions in the draft Law on Minimum Wage that had been questioned by the ITUC as prohibiting legitimate trade union activities were subsequently removed from the promulgated law. The Committee further notes the observations submitted by the ITUC received on 1 September 2019, concerning matters examined in this comment, as well as alleging violent repression of strikes by hired criminals and the detention of union leaders organizing strike action in the garment sector. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments in this respect.

Trade union rights and civil liberties

Murders of trade unionists. With regard to its long-standing recommendation to carry out expeditious and independent investigations into the murders of trade union leaders Chea Vichea and Ros Sovannareth (in 2004) and Hy Vuthy (in 2007), the Committee notes that the Government indicates once again that the relevant ministries and institutions have been working on the cases but that their long-standing nature, coupled with the lack of cooperation from Mr Vichea's family, renders the investigation even more complicated. The Government further states that in order for the investigation to conclude, all relevant parties, especially the families of victims, need to cooperate fully, and indicates that the investigation was brought up to the annual meeting of the National Commission on Reviewing the Application of the International Labour Conventions ratified by Cambodia (NCRILC). The Committee must express once again its deep concern with the lack of concrete results concerning the investigations, even bearing in mind the suggested lack of cooperation of victims' families, and the Committee refers to the conclusions and recommendations of the Committee on Freedom of Association in its examination of Case No. 2318 (see 391st Report, October 2019). Recalling the need to conclude the investigations and to bring to justice the perpetrators and the instigators of these crimes, the Committee urges once again the competent authorities to take all necessary measures to expedite the process of investigation.

Incidents during the January 2014 demonstrations. Concerning the trade unionists facing criminal charges in relation to incidents during the January 2014 demonstrations, the Committee notes with interest the Government's indication that the six trade union leaders that had initially been sentenced to a suspended three years and six months imprisonment and collective payment of compensation equivalent to US$8,750 were acquitted of all charges on 28 May 2019 by the Court of Appeal after the initial judgment was appealed with legal support from the Ministry of Labour and Vocational Training (MLVT) and the Ministry of Justice (MoJ). The Committee further notes the Government's indication that: (a) as to other trade unionists under judicial procedures, the MLVT and the MoJ have established a working group, which requested trade unions to provide information on their cases, so that the two ministries could follow up with the court in order to expedite the settlement (80 per cent of the criminal cases against trade unionists have been settled so far); (b) out of a total of 121 criminal cases identified as involving trade unionists, 71 cases have been settled (with verdicts issued for 27 cases, filing without processing by the prosecutor for 13 cases and charges dropped by the investigating judge for 23 cases); 33 cases remain under judicial proceedings and 17 cases are not related to freedom of association or labour rights but have also been settled; and (c) out of the 19 civil cases, 11 have been settled (verdicts issued for nine cases and charges dropped for two cases), and eight cases are under court proceedings (two of which are not related to freedom of association or labour rights). The Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on these procedures, in particular on any verdicts issued, as well as undertaking all necessary efforts to ensure that no criminal charges or sanctions are imposed in relation to the peaceful exercise of trade union activities.

Training of police forces in relation to industrial and protest action. In its previous comment, recalling that the intervention of the police should be in proportion to the threat to public order and that the competent authorities should receive adequate instructions so as to avoid the danger of excessive force in trying to control demonstrations that might undermine public order, the Committee encouraged the Government to consider availing itself of the technical assistance of the Office in relation to the training of police forces, with a view, for example, to the development of guidelines, a code of practice or a handbook on handling industrial and protest action. The Committee notes the Government's indication that: (i) the MLVT has cooperated with the Ministry of Interior to produce documents for the training of police forces to ensure full respect of trade union rights; (ii) in December 2018, the MLVT sent a letter to the ILO requesting technical assistance to provide a training course for police forces; and (iii) in April 2019, its representatives met with ILO officials to prepare the training for the national police and agreed to organize four courses of training of trainers, in cooperation with the Ministry of Interior and the Officer of the High Commissioner for Human Rights to take place in the second semester of 2019. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on developments in this regard, including with respect to completion of the four training courses, their duration, number of participants, and particular subjects covered.

Legislative issues

The Committee takes due note of the information provided by the Government on the process to prepare amendments to the LTU in consultation with the social partners. The Government indicates that: (i) the MLVT submitted a first draft amendment for tripartite consultation; (ii) workers' and employers' organizations submitted written comments; (iii) two national tripartite consultative workshops took place on 25 April 2019 and on 2 August 2019, with the technical support of the ILO and during which the social partners could provide additional inputs; (iv) on 9 August 2019 a final draft was submitted to the Council of Ministers, with a view to its further submission to the National Assembly for review and adoption by the end of 2019; and (v) in the meantime, a number of regulations (prakas) have been adopted to simplify the implementation of the LTU, including on the subjects of registration of unions, federations and confederations. The Committee observes that the draft law was approved by the National Assembly on 26 November 2019 and promulgated on 19 December 2019.

Article 2 of the Convention. Rights of workers and employers, without distinction whatsoever, to establish and join organizations. In its previous comments the Committee urged the Government to take appropriate measures, in consultation with the social partners, to ensure that civil servants – including teachers – who are not covered by the LTU are fully ensured their freedom of association rights under the Convention, and that the legislation is amended accordingly. The Committee notes that, while in the Progress Report for the Roadmap on Implementation of ILO Recommendations concerning Freedom of Association submitted to the ILO in June 2019, the Government had indicated that it continued to organize consultative workshops and to finalize draft legislative amendments, no amendments have been drafted in this respect. In its report to the Committee the Government only reiterates that it considers that freedom of association is guaranteed to all workers through two pieces of legislation: (i) the LTU, applicable to the private sector – including domestic workers (the amendments will introduce an explicit reference to domestic workers in section 3 of the LTU on the scope of the law), teachers who are not civil servants, and workers in the informal economy meeting the LTU's requirements to form a union; and (ii) the Law on Associations and Non-Governmental Organizations (LANGO) providing for the right to organize of civil servants, including teachers who now have such status.

The Committee must recall once again that some provisions in the LANGO contravene freedom of association rights of civil servants under the Convention, as it lacks provisions recognizing civil servants' associations' right to draw up constitutions and rules, the right to elect representatives, the right to organize activities and formulate programmes without interference of the public authorities, and the right to affiliate to federations or confederations, including at the international level, and subjects the registration of these associations to the authorization of the Ministry of Interior. In addition, the Committee had noted that workers' organizations and associations expressed deep concern at: (i) the lack of protection of teachers' trade union rights (referring in particular to sanctions and threats to teachers seeking to organize); and (ii) the difficulties faced by domestic workers and workers in the informal economy in general seeking to create or join unions, since the LTU provides for an enterprise union model, whose requirements are often very difficult to meet by these workers, and does not allow for the creation of unions by sector or profession. Similarly, the Committee had taken note of the ITUC's claim that the absence of any structure for sectoral representation results in the exclusion from the right to organize of hundreds of thousands of workers in the informal sector. Regretting the continuing absence of progress in this respect, the Committee must once again urge the Government to take appropriate measures, in consultation with the social partners, to ensure that civil servants – including teachers – who are not covered by the LTU are fully ensured their freedom of association rights under the Convention, and that the legislation is amended accordingly. The Committee further encourages the Government to promote the full and effective enjoyment of these rights by domestic workers and workers in the informal economy and, to this effect, submit to tripartite consultations the possibility of allowing the formation of unions by sector or profession.

Article 3. Right to elect representatives freely. Requirements for leaders, managers, and those responsible for the administration of unions and of employer associations. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to take the necessary measures to amend sections 20, 21 and 38 of the LTU – requiring those wishing to vote, to stand as a candidate for election, or be designated to leadership or management positions in unions or employer associations to meet a minimum age requirement (18), minimum literacy requirements and make a declaration that they have never been convicted for any criminal offence. On the one hand, the Committee notes with satisfaction that the 2019 amendments to the LTU removed the requirements of making a declaration that they have never been convicted of any criminal offense and, as to Khmer nationals, the literacy requirement. However, the Committee observes that the amended sections 20 and 21 still impose literacy requirements on foreign nationals. Moreover, the Committee observes that the 2019 amendments to the LTU did not modify section 38, on the election of worker representatives in the enterprise or establishment. As the Committee had noted in its previous comments, this section presents similar issues of compatibility with the Convention. Recalling its previous comments the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend sections 20, 21 and 38 of the LTU to remove the requirement to read and to write Khmer from the eligibility criteria of foreigners. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any developments in this respect.

Article 4. Dissolution of representative organizations. In its previous comments the Committee had requested the Government to amend paragraph 2 of section 28 of the LTU, providing that a union is automatically dissolved in the event of a complete closure of the enterprise or establishment. The Committee observes that the 2019 amendments to the LTU retained under paragraph 2 of section 28 the automatic dissolution of a union in the event of a complete closure of its enterprise or establishment, but included an additional condition: complete payment of workers' wages and other benefits. In this respect, the Committee considers that, while the payment of wages and other benefits may be one of the reasons why a union may have a legitimate interest to continue to operate after the dissolution of the enterprise concerned, there may be other legitimate reasons for it to do so (such as defending other legitimate claims). Recalling that the dissolution of a workers' or employers' organization should only be decided under the procedures laid down by their statutes, or by a court ruling, the Committee requests once again the Government to take the necessary measures to amend section 28 of the LTU accordingly by fully removing its paragraph 2.

Grounds to request dissolution by Court. In its previous comments the Committee had requested the Government to take the necessary measures to amend section 29 of the LTU, which affords any party concerned or 50 per cent of the total of members of the union or the employer association the right to file a complaint to the Labour Court to request a dissolution. Observing that the 2019 amendments to the LTU did not modify the provision in question, and noting that members can always decide to leave the union, the Committee must recall once again that the manner in which members may request dissolution should be left to the organization's by-laws. The Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend section 29 of the LTU to leave to the unions' or employers' associations own rules and by-laws the determination of the procedures for their dissolution by their members.

The Committee had further requested the Government to take the necessary measures to remove paragraph (c) of section 29 of the LTU, which provided that a union or an employers' association shall be dissolved by the Labour Court in cases where leaders, managers and those responsible for the administration were found guilty of committing a serious act of misconduct or an offence on behalf of the union or the employer association. The Committee had recalled that if it is found that trade union officers have committed serious misconduct or offences through actions going beyond the limits of normal trade union activity – including actions carried out on behalf of the trade union – they may be prosecuted under the applicable legal provisions and in accordance with ordinary judicial procedures, without triggering the dissolution of the trade union and depriving it of all possibility of action. The Committee observes with satisfaction that the 2019 amendments removed from the LTU the above-mentioned paragraph.

Application of the Convention in practice

Independent adjudication mechanisms. In its previous comments the Committee had recalled the importance of ensuring the effectiveness of the judicial system as a safeguard against impunity, and an effective means to protect workers' freedom of association rights during labour disputes, as well as to address the serious concerns raised on the independence of the judiciary and its impact on the application of the Convention. The Committee had welcomed the Government's commitment to strengthen the Arbitration Council (AC) and trusted that the AC would continue to remain easily accessible and to play its important role in the handling of collective disputes, and that any necessary measures would be undertaken to ensure that its awards, when binding, are duly enforced. The Committee notes that the Government informs that it revoked the draft law on procedure of the labour courts and further notes with interest that the MLVT agreed to continue to provide financial support to the AC and study the possibility and launch a pilot on the settlement of individual labour rights disputes by the AC in 2020. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information in this respect, including as to any measures undertaken to ensure that the AC awards, when binding, are duly enforced.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1999)

The Committee notes the observations of the ITUC, received on 21 September 2020, alleging that the December 2019 amendments to the Trade Unions Law failed to bring it in conformity with the Convention and arguing in particular that anti-union discrimination sanctions remain far too low to be dissuasive. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments in this respect.

Not having received other supplementary information, the Committee reiterates its comments adopted in 2019 and reproduced below.

The Committee notes the observations of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 1 September 2019 referring to matters examined in this comment.

The Committee takes note of the comments of the Government in reply to the 2016 and 2017 ITUC observations. Concerning the allegations of extended use of short-term contracts to terminate employment of trade union leaders and members and weaken active trade unions, the Government states that the Law on Trade Unions (LTU) provides remedies for both dismissal or non-renewal of fixed-term contracts due to anti-union discrimination and, if verified, the labour inspectors instruct the employer to reinstate the workers or impose a substantial fine. The Government adds that, to avoid misinterpretation of legal provisions concerning fixed-term contracts, the Ministry of Labour and Vocational Training (MLVT) conducted consultations with the social partners and other actors, such as the Arbitration Council, and that a common understanding was reached that the maximum duration of fixed-term contracts would be four years and, if exceeding this maximum period, the contract would be considered as having unfixed duration. This was reflected in an Instruction on determination of the type of employment contract, issued by the MLVT on 17 May 2019. While taking due note of the information provided, the Committee requests the Government to ensure that all measures are taken to monitor, in consultation with the social partners, that fixed-term contracts are not used for anti-union purposes, including through their non-renewal, and to continue to provide information in this respect.

Articles 1 and 3 of the Convention. Adequate protection against anti-union discrimination. For many years, several workers' organizations, in particular the ITUC – including in its most recent observations, have been denouncing serious and numerous acts of anti-union discrimination in the country. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in this regard that the MLVT: (i) issued an administrative letter on 31 May 2019 to all employers and their associations to ensure strict and effective implementation of the provisions relating to anti-union discrimination; (ii) invited employers' representatives from 50 companies to disseminate information on the special protections against anti-union discrimination; and (iii) met with the representative of the Cambodia Labour Confederation (CLC) on two different occasions (13 June and 18 July 2019) to follow-up on its 44 cases before the courts (the Government informs that 11 of these were resolved with acquittal of charges and that the MVLT is working closely with the Ministry of Justice to review the remaining cases). While welcoming the steps undertaken for the effective implementation of the protections against anti-union discrimination, the Committee observes that, other than the reference to two meetings with the CLC, it has not received more detailed information on the numerous and grave allegations of anti-union discrimination laid out in previous observations of workers' organizations. The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information on the handling of the allegations of anti-union discrimination laid out in the observations of the ITUC in 2014, 2016 and 2019, and recalls the need to take all necessary measures to ensure that anti-union discrimination allegations are investigated by independent organs that enjoy the confidence of the parties and that, whenever such allegations are verified, adequate remedies and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions are applied.

Furthermore, in its previous comments, the Committee urged the Government to ensure that national legislation provided adequate protection against all acts of anti-union discrimination, such as dismissals and other prejudicial acts against trade union leaders and members, including sufficiently dissuasive sanctions. The Committee had taken note, in this respect, of the ITUC's observations that penalties provided for under the LTU for anti-union practices by employers were too low (a maximum of 5 million Cambodian riels (KHR), equivalent to US$1,250) and may not be sufficiently dissuasive. The Committee was of the view that fines for unfair labour practices provided for in the LTU may be a deterrent for small and medium-sized enterprises, but would not appear to be so for high-productivity and large enterprise cases. The Committee had thus invited the Government to assess, in consultation with the social partners, the dissuasive nature of sanctions in the LTU or any other relevant laws. The Committee notes that the Government replies by affirming that the existing legal mechanisms set out adequate protection against anti-union discrimination. The Government indicates that: (i) in addition to the application of the provisions and remedies in the LTU concerning anti-union discrimination (chapter 15), the LTU itself acknowledges (section 95) that other criminal laws may be applied to punish these actions (violence and discrimination against worker unions being criminal offences under sections 217 and 267 of the Penal Code) and that the employer could thus even face imprisonment, for example if the actions entailed violence; (ii) in addition to the fines imposed by the LTU, those affected can also claim compensation; (iii) the MLVT has never received complaints or grievances from trade unionists regarding existing sanctions; and (iv) the Government is committed to further strengthening the capacity of labour inspectors and raising the awareness of workers on their rights. The Committee observes, on the other hand, that, while several consultation meetings were held on the review and amendment of the LTU, the Government does not indicate that, as recommended by the Committee, these tripartite fora were used to assess the effective and dissuasive nature of the protections against anti-union discrimination. Moreover, the Committee notes that the ITUC observations, in addition to the concrete cases noted above, denounce in general a lack of action and adequate protection against rampant anti-union discrimination. The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed statistical information on the application of the different mechanisms to protect against anti-union discrimination, including as to sanctions and other remedies effectively imposed, for example reinstatement or compensation. The Committee further requests the Government to assess, in light of such data, and in consultation with the social partners, the appropriateness of existing remedies, in particular the dissuasive nature of sanctions; and to provide information on any development in this regard.

Article 4. Recognition of trade unions for purposes of collective bargaining. In its previous observation, noting that the Government's statement that by lowering the most representative organisation threshold to 30 per cent, the law encouraged the increase of collective agreements, the Committee had invited the Government to assess the impact of the implementation of the LTU by providing statistics on: (a) the number of representative organizations identified based on their having secured at least 30 per cent of workers' support without an election, and the number of collective agreements concluded by these representative organizations; and (b) the number of separate elections organized based on no union having secured 30 per cent support, and the number of collective agreements concluded by the organizations so elected. The Committee notes that the Government provides the following information: (i) the number of representative organizations having secured at least 30 per cent of workers' support without election were four unions in 2018 (all in the garment sector, covering 3,226 workers) and 15 unions in 2019 (11 in the garment sector, covering 11,070 workers and four in the hotel sector, covering 890 workers); and (ii) the number of collective bargaining agreements concluded in 2018 and 2019 was seven (in 2018, four collective bargaining agreements were concluded between the employer and the shop steward; and, in 2019, three collective bargaining agreements between the employer and a most representative status union). The Government indicates that the information concerning point (b) above will be provided in its next report. The Committee further observes that the March 2017 direct contacts mission (DCM) recommended the Government to take the necessary measures, including issuing instructions to the competent authorities, to ensure that most representative status are recognized without delay and without the exercise of arbitrary discretion to workers' organizations or coalitions of organizations meeting the minimum threshold. In this respect, while noting that the Government indicates that it issued an Instruction on the Facilitation for the Most Representative Status Certification and that one of the objectives of the amendments to the LTU is to facilitate the requirements to obtain most representative status, the Committee observes that the number of organizations having secured at least 30 per cent of workers' support without election, as well as the number of collective bargaining agreements concluded, for 2018 and 2019, were very low. The Committee requests the Government to keep on providing information on the number of organizations recognized as having the most representative status, and the number of collective agreements in force, indicating the parties that concluded the agreement (in particular, if a most representative union, a bargaining council or a shop steward), the sectors concerned and the number of workers covered by these agreements; as well as information on any additional measures undertaken to address the issues noted by the DCM concerning the recognition of most representative status organizations, and to promote the full development and utilization of collective bargaining under the Convention.

Articles 4, 5 and 6. Right to collective bargaining of public servants not engaged in the administration of the State. In its previous comments the Committee had urged the Government to take the necessary measures, in consultation with the social partners, to ensure that public servants not engaged in the administration of the State, including teachers, who are governed by the Law on the Common Statute of Civil Servants and the Law on Education with regard to their right to organize, enjoy collective bargaining rights under the Convention. The Committee notes that, in its reply, the Government indicates that civil servants, including teachers, can form associations in accordance with the Law on Associations and Non-Governmental Organizations (LANGO), but does not provide any information on measures to ensure that public servants not engaged in the administration of the State can exercise the right to collective bargaining. Regretting the lack of progress in this respect, the Committee urges once again the Government to take the necessary measures, in consultation with the social partners, to ensure that public servants not engaged in the administration of the State, including teachers, enjoy collective bargaining rights under the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to report on any measures taken or envisaged in this regard and recalls that it may avail itself of the technical assistance of the Office.

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee notes the observations on the application of the Convention in practice, submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) on 16September 2020, which contain allegations that the authorities favour non-representative organizations. The Government is requested to communicate its comments in that regard. The Committee also takes note of the observations of the General Union of Workers of Cameroon (UGTC) received on 5 November 2020 that relate to issues examined in the present comment.

The Committee notes the general information provided by the Government in response to the observations of the International Transport Workers' Federation (ITF), in particular with respect to the suppression by the police of strike action by dockers in the port of Douala in June 2018, and the numerous arbitrary arrests that followed. The Committee notes the Government's statement that the police intervened as a result of violence against non-striking dockers and disturbance of public order. In that regard, the Committee wishes to recall that the authorities should only resort to the use of force in exceptional circumstances and in situations where there is a serious threat of public disorder, and that such use of force must be proportionate to the circumstances (see the 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 149).

The Committee notes with regret that the Government has still not provided information in response to the observations of the ITUC of 1 September 2016, concerning repeated police violence against strikers (in the construction sector), as well as interference in trade union elections by the authorities (in the agriculture, construction and health sectors), vandalism on the premises of a trade union and anti-union harassment (banking sector). The Committee urges the Government to provide detailed information in respect of all these issues.

In its previous comments on the failure to register eight public sector teachers' unions subsequent to Education International's (EI) observations of 2016, the Committee had noted, according to the Government, that the situation was linked to the fact that the post of registrar had not been filled. The Government now indicates that, while a registrar of trade unions had been appointed by decree in February 2015, the registration certificates issuance process had been suspended with the aim of "cleaning up the trade union file", an operation which allowed the Government to have a clearer view of the trade union landscape, by sector and branch of activity. Recalling that the right to establish trade union organizations must be guaranteed without previous authorization and that any procedure for registration must be a mere formality, the Committee urges the Government to take the measures necessary for the registration of the public sector teachers' organizations.

Article 3 of the Convention. Act on the suppression of terrorism. With reference to its earlier comments relative to the Act on the suppression of terrorism (Act No. 2014/028 of 23 December 2014), the Committee again wishes to draw the Government's attention to the drafting of section 2(1), under which "the death penalty shall be imposed on anyone who [...] commits or threatens to commit any act that may cause death, endanger physical safety, result in bodily injury or property damage or harm natural resources, the environment or the cultural heritage with the intention of (a) intimidating the public, causing a situation of terror or forcing a victim, the Government and/or a national or international organization to carry out or refrain from carrying out a given act, adopting or renouncing a particular position or act according to certain principles; (b) disrupting the normal operation of public services or the delivery of essential public services, or creating a public crisis [...]". The Committee reiterates its deep concern regarding the fact that some of these situations could apply to acts related to the legitimate exercise of activities by trade unions or employers' representatives in accordance with the Convention. The Committee refers in particular to protest action and strikes that would have direct repercussions for public services. The Committee also recalls that, in light of the penalty that may be imposed, such a provision could be particularly intimidating for trade union or employers' representatives who speak out or take action within the context of their duties. While noting the Government's repeated indication that an activity cannot be considered a trade union activity if it is not of such a nature as to discharge the legal functions of trade unions, or if its aim is to spread fear, intimidation and violence, or of it is characterized by the use of arms, and that such activities may be reclassified accordingly by the competent courts, the Committee urges the Government to take the measures necessary to amend section 2 of the Act on the suppression of terrorism to ensure that it does not apply to the legitimate activities of workers' and employers' organizations, which are protected under the Convention. In the meantime, the Committee urges the Government to continue providing information on the measures taken to ensure that: (i) the implementation of this Act does not have harmful consequences on officials and members engaged in their functions, and performing trade union or employer activities pursuant to Article 3 of the Convention; and (ii) the Act is enforced in such a way that it is not perceived as a threat or intimidation towards trade union members or the whole trade union movement.

Articles 2 and 5. Legislative reform. For many years, the Committee has been recalling the need to: (i) amend Act No. 68/LF/19 of 18 November 1968 (under the terms of which the legal existence of a trade union or occupational association of public servants is subject to prior approval by the Minister of Territorial Administration); (ii) amend sections 6(2) and 166 of the Labour Code (which lay down penalties for persons establishing a trade union which has not yet been registered and acting as if the said union had been registered); and (iii) repeal section 19 of Decree No. 69/DF/7 of 6 January 1969 (under the terms of which trade unions of public servants may not affiliate to an international organization without obtaining prior authorization). Noting once again with deep regret that, according to the information provided by the Government, the process of revising the Labour Code has still not been completed, the Committee is bound once again to urge the Government to finalize the legislative revision process, without further delay, so as to give full effect to the provisions of the Convention on the above-mentioned points. The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

[The Government is asked to reply in full to the present comments in 2021].

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1962)

The Committee takes note of the observations of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), received on 16 September 2020, which concern the application of the Convention in practice, and which are dealt with in the present comment. It also takes note of the observations of the General Union of Workers of Cameroon (UGTC) received on 5 November 2020, which contain allegations of anti-union discrimination against several members of an affiliated organisation (SNEGCBEFCAM) within the National Social Welfare Fund (CNPS). The Committee requests the Government to comment on this matter.

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Adequate protection against acts of anti-union discrimination and interference. In its earlier comments, the Committee had noted the observations of the ITUC denouncing anti-union discrimination against trade union leaders and trade unionists in the banking sector, and interference by the employer and the authorities in the elections of a trade union in the agriculture sector. It also noted the 2016 observations of the Cameroon Workers' Trade Union Confederation concerning interference by an enterprise in the activities of a trade union in the wood industry and the dismissal by the enterprise in question of more than 150 workers on the sole grounds of their trade union affiliation. The Committee notes with regret that the Government has still not provided the information requested and that it restricts itself to indicating that it ensures the promotion of international labour standards in the country. Finally, the Committee notes the ITUC's observations received in September 2020, which contain new allegations of suspensions and arbitrary dismissals of trade union leaders, especially in the brewery sector. The Committee once again notes with concern the serious nature of the alleged facts and the persistent denunciations of anti-union practices in numerous sectors. The Committee reminds the Government of its responsibility to take all measures needed to ensure that the competent authorities, in particular the labour inspectorate, carry out the necessary inquiries into the reported cases of anti-union discrimination and interference, to take the corrective measures without delay and issue appropriate sanctions if it is found that the trade union rights provided by the Convention have been violated in certain administrations or enterprises. The Committee urgently requests the Government to provide its comments and detailed information in this regard.

With reference to the observations received from the UGTC in October 2016 on the worsening of trade union discrimination against the leaders of SNEGCBEFCAM within the CNPS, the Committee notes a court decision handed down in favour of the workers, who had been dismissed, but that the CNPS has appealed the decision. The Committee requests the Government to provide all relevant information in this regard.

Article 4. Right to collective bargaining in practice. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government to the effect that since 2017, nine collective agreements have been signed. With reference to its earlier comments, it notes in particular that the revised collective agreement for security services was signed on 7 May 2019. Moreover, the Committee had noted the 2016 observations of the of the Cameroon Workers' Trade Union Confederation (CSTC) denouncing unilateral appointment by the Ministry of Labour of the workers' representatives in the bargaining committees for national collective agreements, without taking into account the representativeness of the organizations in the sectors concerned. In that regard, the Committee notes the observations of the ITUC, received in September 2020, alleging that unrepresentative organizations are appointed in the institutions, in the place of representative organizations, and that such practices prevent the genuine representation of workers and their interests both in enterprises and in tripartite institutions and social dialogue. The Committee requests the Government to comment on the observations of the CSTC and the ITUC, and also to indicate the measures taken by the authorities to encourage and promote collective bargaining, under Article 4 of the Convention, and to specify sectors concerned. The Committee also requests the Government to continue to provide statistical information on the number of collective agreements signed and in force, both in the public and private sectors, also indicating the number of sectors and of workers covered by the agreements.

Canada

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1972)

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020). The Committee proceeded with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the supplementary information received from the Government (mainly concerning the Government of Alberta) and the Canadian Labour Congress (CLC) this year, as well as on the basis of the information at its disposal in 2019.

The Committee notes that in its supplementary observations the CLC points out that the COVID-19 pandemic has disproportionately impacted low-income workers and already marginalized groups and has reemphasized the relevance of freedom of association rights and the essential role unions play in providing workers with a voice in their workplace. It further notes the CLC's indication that since the beginning of the pandemic, a large number of non-unionized workers have reached out to unions and begun organizing their workplaces.

Article 2 of the Convention. Right to organize of certain categories of workers. Province of Alberta. The Committee recalls that it had previously requested the Government to provide information on the outcome of the technical discussions with respect to the application of the Labour Relations Code (LRC) to agricultural workers, as well on the outcome of the review of the LRC and the Post-secondary Learning Act with respect to architects, dentists, land surveyors, lawyers, doctors, engineers, domestic workers, nursing personnel and higher educational staff in Alberta.

– With respect to nursing personnel, the Committee notes with satisfaction that following a decision of the Alberta Labour Relations Board, on 25 November 2019, which declared that the exclusion of nursing practitioners from the right to associate was unconstitutional under the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, the Government passed in July 2020 the Restoring Balance in Alberta's Workplaces Act to remove the exclusion of nurse practitioners from the LRC.
– As to the extension of full associational and collective bargaining rights to academic staff at Alberta's post-secondary institutions, the Committee notes that following the review of the Post-secondary Learning Act, five professions have been included in academic bargaining units, giving them a statutory right to organize and enjoy freedom of association rights.
– Concerning agricultural workers, the Committee notes that in 2018 the Enhanced Protection for Farm and Ranch Workers Act came into force, granting waged, non-family farm and ranch employees the same statutory rights as most of the employees in Alberta including the opportunity to be represented by a bargaining agent. Nevertheless, the Committee notes with concern the Government's indication that following province-wide consultations with agricultural industry stakeholders, the Alberta Farm Freedom and Safety Act, 2019, reinstated the farm and ranch sector exemption from the LRC, effective in January 2020.
– With regard to provincial public service employees, the Committee notes that the enactment of the Ensuring Fiscal Sustainability Act, in December 2019, amended the Public Service Employee Relations Act (PSERA). This amendment resulted in the exclusion of budget officers, systems analysts, and auditors from the scope of application of the PSERA, which recognizes freedom of association rights to other public service employees.
– Regarding the exclusion of certain categories of professional employees such as architects, dentists, land surveyors, lawyers, doctors and engineers the Government indicates that: (i) in public sector, the PSERA does not totally exclude professional employees (i.e. medical, dental, architectural, and engineering) from the provisions of the legislation and, according to its section 13(2), the Labour Relations Board may direct these employees to be members of a bargaining unit if the majority wishes so; (ii) a review of the Post-secondary Learning Act resulted in five professions (medical, dental, architectural, engineering and legal) being included in academic bargaining units, as provided under section 58.1(4) of the LRC; and (iii) some categories of professional employees, such as architects, have also the opportunity to be covered under the provisions of the Professions and Occupations Registration Act, which establishes the means by which professional associations in the province manage their affairs and the conduct of their professional members.

– Regarding domestic workers the Government indicates that nothing prevents them from associating and organizing.

With respect to agricultural workers and budget officers, systems analysts, and auditors working in the public sector, noting the Government's indication that these categories are excluded either from the LRC or from the PSERA, the Committee requests the Government to indicate the manner in which these workers can enjoy their right to organize and all guarantees under the Convention. As regards domestic workers, the Committee requests the Government to specify under which legislative provisions this category of workers may enjoy their right to organize and all guarantees under the Convention. Regarding specific professional categories of workers, such as architects, dentists, land surveyors, lawyers, doctors and engineers, in view of the information provided by the Government, the Committee requests the Government to confirm that all the above categories, from both public and private sector, can exercise all freedom of association rights under the Convention.

Province of Ontario. The Committee notes that the Agricultural Employees' Protection Act (AEPA) was amended in order to expand its scope to ornamental horticulture starting on 3 April 2019. As to the exclusion of agricultural workers from the Labour Relations Act (LRA), the Government once again indicates that the AEPA protects the right of agricultural workers in Ontario to form and join associations. The Committee notes however that, according to the Changing Workplaces Review final report (CWR), commissioned by the Ministry of Labour and released in 2017, the AEPA does not clearly state that such employees have the right to join a trade union and participate in lawful activities, and neither does it provide agricultural workers with the right to strike nor any alternative dispute resolution. The Committee further notes that the Government once again indicates that it does not have any statistics on the number of workers represented by an employee association or trade union. Recalling the value of statistical information for assessing the effective implementation in practice of the Convention, the Committee requests the Government to gather and provide information on the number of workers represented by an employee association or trade union under the AEPA. It also requests the Government to take any additional measures to guarantee that agricultural workers enjoy the right in law and in practice to establish and join organizations of their own choosing, as well as other rights recognized in the Convention. With respect to the other excluded categories of workers (architects, dentists, land surveyors, lawyers, doctors, engineers, principals and vice-principals in educational establishments, community workers and domestic workers), the Committee had previously noted that the above exclusions of the LRA were going to be considered by the ongoing review of Ontario's labour and employment legislation. In this respect, the Committee notes that despite the recommendations of the Special Advisers leading the CWR with regard to the repeal of those exclusions, no changes were made during the 2016–19 period. The Committee notes, furthermore, the Government's indication that labour laws are not appropriate for non-industrial settings, such as private homes and professional offices. While taking due note of the final report of the CWR and the Government's statement on the inadaptability of the labour laws to non-industrial settings, the Committee invites the Government to take all necessary measures, in consultation with social partners, to ensure that the above categories have the right in law and in practice to establish and join organizations of their own choosing, as well as other rights recognized under the Convention.

Province of New Brunswick. The Committee notes that the Government acknowledges the negative effect of excluding domestic workers from the scope of the Employment Standards Act and that consultations were held in September 2016 regarding possible amendments to the aforementioned Act, which encompasses repealing the exclusion. The Government further informs that it is currently conducting a technical review of the Domestic Workers Convention, 2011 (No. 189). The Committee hopes that the consultations and the technical review will be finalized in the near future and that all necessary measures will be taken to ensure that domestic workers enjoy the right to organize and other guarantees under the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to keep it informed on any development in this regard.

Other provinces. Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and Saskatchewan. With regard to the exclusion of architects, dentists, land surveyors, doctors and engineers, the Committee notes that: (i) in Nova Scotia, although no legislative changes were made, doctors are de facto represented by Doctors Nova Scotia, an association bargaining with the Government on behalf of doctors and residents; (ii) in Prince Edward Island, no information was provided by the Government regarding the above exclusions; and (iii) in Saskatchewan, the above categories are not explicitly excluded from being certified as a bargaining unit and therefore do have the right to organize, for example, lawyers at the provincial Legal Aid Commission are unionized. With regard to the exclusion of domestic workers in Saskatchewan, the Committee notes the Government's indication that some categories of workers, including domestic workers, face a practical limitation on organizing as a result of the definition of "employer", defined as "an employer who customarily or actually employs three or more employees", with the purpose of ensuring viability of the bargaining unit. While noting that nothing impedes architects, dentists, land surveyors, doctors, and engineers from associating and organizing, the Committee requests the Government to specify under which legislative provisions the above-mentioned categories enjoy their trade union rights as well as other rights recognized in the Convention. Regarding the practical limitation to unionization faced by domestic workers, the Committee invites the Government to take all necessary measures, in consultation with social partners, to ensure that domestic workers enjoy, in law and in practice, the right to organize, as well as other rights under the Convention.

Article 3. Right of employers' and workers' organizations to organize their activities and to formulate their programmes. Essential services. Economic Action Plan (Bill C-4). In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that the adoption of the Economic Action Plan Act in 2013 permitted the federal government the exclusive power to determine and designate unilaterally the essential services for the safety and security of the public and impose arbitration as the dispute resolution mechanism in cases where 80 per cent or more of the positions in a bargaining unit were deemed essential. The Committee notes with satisfaction that on 26 November 2018, Bill C-62 "An Act to Amend the Federal Public Sector Labour Relations Act and Other Acts" received royal assent and, as a result, the employer no longer has the exclusive right to determine which services are essential and designate positions necessary to deliver these services. The Committee further notes that, as a result, when a conciliation/strike has been selected by the bargaining agent as the dispute resolution mechanism in collective bargaining, the employer and the bargaining agent must collectively negotiate essential services and conclude an Essential Services Agreement.

Province of Saskatchewan. Employment Act. In its previous observations, the CLC expressed concern that the Saskatchewan Employment Act increased the number of employees not eligible for trade union membership by declaring their job duties confidential. On that occasion, the Committee pointed out that the definition of "employee" excluded anyone exercising authority and performing managerial or confidential functions, and that the term "union", "labour organization" and "strike" were defined in the Act with reference to the term "employee". The Committee notes the Government's indication that there were extensive consultations in 2012 when considering the labour relations sections (Part IV) of the Employment Act and that some provisions in the Act required a review within a revolving ten-year period and therefore another review of the labour relations provision would occur around 2024. The Committee refers to its previous recommendations, in which it reminded the Government that although it is not necessarily incompatible with Article 2 to deny workers who perform managerial functions or are employed in its confidential capacity to belong to the same trade unions as other workers, this category should not be defined so broadly as to weaken the organizations of other workers in the enterprise or branch of activity by depriving them of substantial proportion of their present or potential membership. The Committee hopes that the Government will take all appropriate measures in a near future to ensure the review of The Saskatchewan Employment Act, in consultation with social partners, with a view to bringing it into full conformity with the above-mentioned considerations. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the number of employees declared "confidential" and thus not eligible for trade union membership, disaggregated by enterprises or branches of employment.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Central African Republic

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1960)

Revised Labour Code. The Committee notes the Government's indication that a draft revised Labour Code has been submitted to Parliament for adoption. As this draft text has not been transmitted to the Office, the Committee is not able to examine the conformity of its provisions with the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any developments concerning the draft revised Labour Code and to transmit a copy once it has been adopted.

Articles 2, 3, 5 and 6 of the Convention. Labour Code. In its previous comments, the Committee highlighted the need to amend the following provisions of the Labour Code:

- section 17, which limits the right of foreign nationals to join trade unions by imposing conditions of residence (two years) and reciprocity;
- section 24, which limits the right of foreign nationals to be elected to trade union office and executive functions by imposing a condition of reciprocity;
- section 25, which renders non-eligible for trade union office persons sentenced to imprisonment, persons with a criminal record or persons deprived of their right of eligibility under national law, even where the nature of the relevant offence is not prejudicial to the integrity required for trade union office;

– section 26, under which the union membership of minors under 16 years of age may be opposed by parents or guardians despite the minimum age for admission to employment being 14 years under section 259 of the Labour Code; and
– section 49(3), under which no confederation may be established without the prior existence of occupational or regional federations.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that the Committee's requests have been taken into account within the tripartite revision process of the Labour Code, with the exception, it appears, of that relating to section 26. The Committee hopes that the revised version of the Labour Code, as adopted by Parliament, will ensure full conformity of all the provisions described above with the requirements under the Convention, and requests the Government to indicate all progress achieved in this regard.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Draft revised Labour Code. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the draft revised Labour Code has been submitted to Parliament for adoption and that the Government's replies to the Committee's previous requests refer to the content of the draft Labour Code and several of its articles. As the text of this draft has not been transmitted to the Office, the Committee is not in a position to examine the conformity of its provisions with the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any developments concerning the draft revised Labour Code and to transmit a copy once it has been adopted.

Article 2 of the Convention. Adequate protection against acts of interference. In its previous comments, the Committee considered that section 30(2) of the Labour Code does not cover all of the acts of interference prohibited by Article 2 of the Convention. The Committee also noted the Government's indications that implementing regulations would be adopted to cover all of the acts of interference and that these regulations would also specify the penalties applicable in that regard.

The Committee notes that, according to the Government, the Committee's comments on protection against acts of interference were not incorporated into specific implementing regulations but were eventually taken into account in the Bill issuing the revised Labour Code, particularly in sections 31 to 45. The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information on the progress achieved at the legislative level aimed at expanding protection against acts of interference and to communicate the content of the provisions in question once they have been adopted by Parliament.

Article 4. Promotion of collective bargaining. Section 40 of the Labour Code. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, in accordance with section 40 of the Labour Code, collective agreements must be discussed by the delegates of employers' and workers' organizations belonging to the occupation or occupations concerned. Having also observed that no provision of the Labour Code appears to explicitly recognize the right of federations and confederations to conclude collective agreements, the Committee requested the Government to provide copies of collective agreements negotiated and concluded by federations or confederations.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that section 41 of the Bill issuing the revised Labour Code charges the federations' representatives with assisting trade union delegates in negotiating the collective agreements based on occupation. Recalling that the level of bargaining should normally be a matter for the social partners themselves, the Committee requests the Government to specify whether, beyond the function of assisting the trade union delegates mentioned by the Government, the new provisions of the revised Labour Code explicitly recognize the right of federations and confederations to themselves conclude collective agreements, and to communicate, where relevant, copies of all collective agreements negotiated and concluded by the federations and confederations.

Sections 197 and 198 of the Labour Code. For several years, the Committee has been drawing the Government's attention to the fact that, under the terms of sections 197 and 198 of the Labour Code, representatives of trade union organizations and occupational groupings of workers (non-unionized) are on an equal footing in relation to collective bargaining, even though the negotiation of collective agreements by occupational groupings of workers should only be possible where no trade union exists. Regretting the absence of information on this matter, the Committee trusts that the current draft reformed Labour Code will finally contain provisions to ensure that occupational groupings of workers can only negotiate collective agreements with employers where no trade union exists in the bargaining units concerned. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in this regard.

Sections 367 to 370 of the Labour Code. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to envisage amending sections 367 to 370 of the Labour Code, which appear to establish a procedure whereby all collective disputes are subject to conciliation and, failing resolution, to arbitration.

Regretting, once again, the absence of information in this regard and recalling that, by virtue of the principle of the promotion of free and voluntary collective bargaining set out in Article 4 of the Convention, recourse to compulsory arbitration in the case of disagreement between the parties to collective bargaining is only acceptable in relation to public servants engaged in the administration of the State (Article 6 of the Convention), essential services in the strict sense of the term or in the event of an acute national crisis, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the progress achieved at the legislative level in this regard.

Articles 4 and 6. Right to collective bargaining of public servants not engaged in the administration of the State. Section 211 of the Labour Code. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, under section 211 of the Labour Code, the possibility of concluding collective agreements in the public sector concerns only personnel in public services, enterprises and establishments not governed by specific conditions of service and requested the Government to specify to what extent, and based on which text, public servants not engaged in the administration of the State who are subject to specific conditions of service enjoy the right to collective bargaining. The Committee recalls that, in accordance with Articles 4 and 6 of the Convention, public servants not engaged in the administration of the State, a category that includes employees in public enterprises, employees in municipal services and employees in other decentralized bodies, public sector teachers and employees of the public transport sector, must be accorded the right to collectively negotiate their conditions of work and employment. The Committee requests the Government to specify, firstly, the list of public services and establishments not subject to specific legislative or regulatory conditions of service and, secondly, whether, in law or practice, the public servants subject to such conditions of service can participate in genuine mechanisms to collectively negotiate their conditions of work and employment. The Committee also requests the Government to indicate whether the provisions of section 211 are affected by the draft revised Labour Code submitted to Parliament for adoption and to provide any relevant information in this regard.

Right to collective bargaining in practice. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government that several collective agreements have been identified for a possible review, such as the 1994 collective agreement on logging and the 1961 collective agreement on the catering industry. The Committee invites the Government to continue providing information on the ongoing review processes specifying the manner in which these are initiated and carried out. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the measures aimed at encouraging and promoting collective bargaining, in accordance with Article 4 of the Convention, and to specify the sectors concerned. The Committee also requests the Government to provide statistical information on the number of collective agreements concluded and in force, in both the public and private sectors, and to indicate the sectors and number of workers covered by these agreements.

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee notes with concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments.

The Committee notes the observations of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), received on 1 September 2019, which allege violations of the trade union rights in law and in practice, as well as the Government's response thereto, dated 11 October 2019.

The Committee notes the observations of the International Organisation of Employers (IOE), received on 1 September 2016, which are of a general nature. It also notes the observations of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), received on 1 September 2016, relating to: (i) the legal procedures governing the right to strike; (ii) cases of serious violations of trade union and fundamental rights; and (iii) the determination of essential services. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments in this regard.

Articles 2 and 3 of the Convention. Labour Code. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to take measures to amend section 294(3) of the Labour Code, under the terms of which minors under 16 years of age may join a union, unless their father, mother or guardian objects, with a view to recognizing the trade union rights of minors who have reached the statutory minimum age to enter the labour market in accordance with the Labour Code (14 years), either as workers or apprentices, without the intervention of their parents or guardians. The Committee also drew the Government's attention to the need to take the necessary measures to amend section 307 of the Labour Code, to ensure that monitoring by the public authorities of trade union finances does not go beyond the obligation of organizations to submit periodic reports. The Committee noted the Government's indication that this provision has never been applied and that it was removed in the draft revision of the Labour Code. The Committee notes the Government's statement that the concerns of the Committee have been taken into account in the revision of the Act issuing the Labour Code, even though the latter has not yet been promulgated. The Committee trusts that the Labour Code will be promulgated in the near future and that it will give full effect to the provisions of the Convention on the points recalled above. It requests the Government to provide a copy of the text as adopted.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1999)

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020) relating to the measures adopted in the context of the COVID-19 pandemic with regard to the application of the Convention. In this respect, the Committee welcomes the measures indicated by the Government with a view to extending the mandates of trade union executives during the state of emergency (with the possibility for the organizations to elect their representatives if they considered that the conditions existed for holding elections), and to ensuring that workers engaged in telework are informed of the existence of unions in the enterprise, and other measures to facilitate the action and consultation of workers' organizations on measures related to the pandemic, such as their participation in agreements for the reduction of working hours as a consequence of the health emergency, and their capacity to defend their members in the event of any flaws in the suspension of employment relations.

The Committee also notes the observations of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), received on 15 September 2020, alleging the violent repression of the protest against an anti-union reform at the end of 2019, including the temporary detention and injuries suffered by various trade union leaders, as well as the attempt to break into the headquarters of the Single Central Organization of Workers of Chile (CUT). The Committee also notes the observations of the CUT, received on 6 October 2020, also alleging limitations on the exercise of the right to demonstrate and on trade union activities, and the arbitrary and unjustified detention of 24 trade union leaders in several cities, as well as the death of a trade union leader of artisanal fishers (challenging the official version of suicide as the cause of his death), raids on and attempts to enter trade union premises (in particular the CUT headquarters, also alleged by ITUC), and spying on and monitoring trade union leaders. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments on these serious allegations.

The Committee notes that, as to the complaint made under article 26 of the ILO Constitution alleging failure to comply with this and other ILO Conventions by the Republic of Chile, made by a Worker delegate to the International Labour Conference in 2019, the Governing Body: (i) decided not to refer the matter to a Commission of Inquiry and to close the procedure under article 26; and (ii) invited the Government to continue reporting to the ILO regular supervisory system on measures taken to apply in law and practice the Conventions concerned.

As to other pending matters, the Committee reiterates the content of its previous comments adopted in 2019 and reproduced below.

The Committee notes the observations on the application of the Convention in law and practice (including allegations of violations in the public, food, transport and copper sectors) provided by the following organizations: the National Association of Fiscal Employees (ANEF), received on 29 August 2019; the Confederation of Copper Workers (CTC), the General Confederation of Public and Private Sector Workers (CGTP), and the World Federation of Trade Unions (WFTU, taking up the observations of the CGTP), all received on 30 August 2019; the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), received on 1 September 2019; as well as the observations of the Federation of Workers' Unions of Chile (FESINTRACH), received on 2 September 2019, the No. 1 Promoter CMR Falabella Enterprise Union, received on 20 September 2019, and the Single Central Organization of Workers of Chile (CUT), received on 26 October 2019. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments in this regard. Noting that the Government has not replied to the various requests made in its previous comments, including with regard to the multiple observations made by social partners in 2016, the Committee trusts that it will receive the missing information in the next report.

Articles 2 and 3 of the Convention. Legislative matters not covered by the reform of the Labour Code. In its previous comment, while noting with satisfaction the amendment or repeal of various provisions of the Labour Code which were not in conformity with the Convention, the Committee observed that the following provisions had not yet been brought into conformity with the Convention:

– Amendment of article 23 of the Political Constitution, which provides that the holding of trade union office is incompatible with active membership of a political party and that the law shall establish penalties for trade union officials who engage in party political activities. In its previous comments, the Committee welcomed the submission of a draft constitutional amendment in October 2014 to remove these restrictions, but noted that the draft had not been approved.
– Amendment of section 48 of Act No. 19296, which grants broad powers to the Directorate for Labour for the supervision of the accounts and financial assets and property of associations. In its previous comment, the Committee noted the Government's indication that the approach adopted by the Directorate for Labour in that regard is consistent with the principles of freedom of association and leaves it to organizations to control their own accounts, financial assets and property; and that a protocol agreement had been agreed between the Government and the public sector round-table of 2014 which included the commitment to address possible amendments to Act No. 19296.

– Repeal of section 11 of Act No. 12927 on the internal security of the State, which provides that an interruption or strike in certain services may be penalized with imprisonment or banishment, and the amendment of section 254 of the Penal Code, which establishes criminal penalties in the event of the interruption of public services or public utilities or dereliction of duty by public employees. In its previous observation, the Committee noted the Government's indication that these provisions had not been applied and recalled that no penal sanction should be imposed on a worker for participating peacefully in a strike, which is merely exercising an essential right, and therefore that sentences of imprisonment or fines should not be imposed.

The Committee observes that in its latest report the Government has not provided any further information on the application, amendment or repeal of these provisions, and that the observations of the various social partners continue to denounce the incompatibility of these provisions with the Convention. The Committee once again expresses the hope that the Government will take the necessary measures in the very near future to bring these provisions into conformity with the Convention and requests it to report any developments in this regard.

Article 3. Right of organizations to organize their activities and to formulate their programmes. Exclusion from strike action of enterprises declared to be strategic. Section 362 of the Labour Code, under the heading of the determination of enterprises in which the right to strike may not be exercised, provides that a strike may not be called for workers providing services in corporations or enterprises, irrespective of their nature, purpose or function, which provide services of public utility or the cessation of which would cause serious damage to health, the national economy, the provision of supplies to the population or national security. In its previous comment, the Committee recalled that this definition of enterprises in which the right to strike cannot be exercised, to be approved jointly by various ministries and subject to appeal to the Court of Appeal, potentially covers services which go beyond the definition of essential services in the strict sense of the term (those the interruption of which may endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population). Recalling that the prohibition of strikes relating to the services provided should be limited to essential services in the strict sense of the term, the Committee reiterated that the concepts of public utility and of damage to the economy are broader than that of essential services. The Committee also observed that "services of public utility" would already be covered by the system of minimum services established in section 359, which is distinct from the concept of essential services in the strict sense of the term. Observing that the Government has not provided the requested information on the application of this provision in practice, the Committee notes that, according to the indications of the ITUC, under the terms of this provision a list was approved in August 2017 of 100 enterprises considered to be strategic and excluded from the exercise of the right to strike, which include enterprises in the health and energy sectors, and that 14 unions have lodged appeals in this regard with the Court of Appeal. The Committee also notes that in August 2019 a new list was published of enterprises considered to be strategic and excluded from the exercise of the right to strike (43 enterprises were removed from the former list of 100 enterprises, and 15 new enterprises were added). While considering that section 362 of the Labour Code should be amended to ensure that the prohibition of the right to strike can only cover essential services in the strict sense of the term, the Committee once again requests the Government to provide information on the application in practice of section 362 of the Labour Code, with an indication of the various categories of services provided by the enterprises excluded from the exercise of the right to strike, and the action taken in relation to any complaints lodged in this respect. The Committee recalls that, without calling into question the right to strike of the large majority of workers, a negotiated minimum service may be established for public services of fundamental importance that are not essential services in the strict sense of the term.

Replacement of workers. In its previous comment, while on the one hand the Committee noted with satisfaction the introduction in the Labour Code of a prohibition to replace striking workers, as well as the sanctions in the event of such a replacement (sections 345, 403 and 407) on the other hand, it noted that, according to the CGTP, other recently introduced provisions could undermine or introduce uncertainty into such prohibition to replace striking workers. The CGTP referred, in particular, to the possibility envisaged in new section 306 of the Labour Code for an enterprise that has subcontracted work or services to another enterprise to carry out directly or through a third party the subcontracted work or services interrupted due to a strike (in this regard, the CGTP alleged that over 50 per cent of workers in the country work in subcontracting enterprises). The Committee requested the Government to provide its comments on the observations of the CGTP and to report on the application in practice of sections 306, 345, 403 and 407, including the sanctions imposed for the replacement of striking workers, and on the impact of the hiring of workers under section 306 on the workers or services interrupted due to a strike. The Committee notes that the Government reports various legal opinions issued by the Directorate for Labour concerning these provisions, including an opinion that it is not in accordance with the law for an enterprise providing temporary services to provide workers to a principal enterprise for the performance of work or services which have been interrupted due to a strike by workers in the enterprise contracted to perform them. The Committee welcomes these clarifications, while noting that the Government has not provided further information on the application in practice of the above-referred provisions. The Committee also notes that the issue of the replacement of workers is the subject of additional observations by the social partners. In this respect, the CTC indicates that section 403 of the Labour Code supports the internal replacement of striking workers, and the CGTP denounces the fact that the authorities have allowed the replacement of striking workers in the public passenger transport sector in Santiago de Chile. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments on the observations of the social partners on these matters, and to provide further information on the application in practice of sections 306, 345, 403 and 407, including on the sanctions applied for the replacement of striking workers, and on the impact of the hiring of workers under section 306 on striking workers or services interrupted due to a strike.

Exercise of the right to strike beyond the framework of regulated collective bargaining. In previous comments, the Committee noted that, in general terms, the exercise of the right to strike is regulated exclusively within the framework of regulated collective bargaining. In this respect, the Committee referred to the recommendations made to the Government by the Committee on Freedom of Association (CFA), in which: (i) given that existing legislation does not permit strike action outside the context of the collective bargaining process, the CFA requested the Government, in consultation with workers' and employers' organizations, to take all necessary steps to amend the legislation in line with the principles of freedom of association (see 367th Report, March 2013, Case No. 2814, paragraph 365); and (ii) recalling the principle that the occupational and economic interests that workers defend through the right to strike do not only concern better working conditions or collective claims of an occupational nature, but also the seeking of solutions to economic and social policy questions and problems facing the enterprise which are of direct concern to the workers, the CFA requested the Government to take all the necessary measures, including legislative measures if necessary, to uphold this principle, and to submit the legislative aspects of the case to the Committee of Experts (see 371st Report, March 2014, Case No. 2963, paragraph 238).

In this regard, certain social partners (see for example, the observations of the ITUC in 2016, the CGTP in 2016 and 2019, and the CTC in 2019) have been denouncing the failure to protect the right to strike outside the framework of regulated collective bargaining. The Committee also noted that a ruling of 23 October 2015 of the Court of Appeal of Santiago held that the sole fact that the law regulates strike action in one instance, that is in the context of regulated collective bargaining, cannot lead to the conclusion that outside that context strikes are prohibited, based on the understanding that matters that the legislature has failed to regulate or define cannot be held to be prohibited (the Committee refers to other recent rulings along these same lines, such as the ruling by the Labour Court of Antofagasta of 6 August 2019, finding that the right to strike is an essential right regulated by the Convention and that the Supreme Court has found that the right to strike is guaranteed even outside the framework of collective bargaining procedures). In light of the judicial decisions referred to above, the Committee once again requests the Government to provide its comments on the observations of the social partners denouncing the failure to protect the right to strike outside the framework of regulated collective bargaining and to provide information on any measures taken in relation to the recommendations referred to in this regard.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government, which reiterates the content of its previous request adopted in 2019.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1999)

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020) relating to the measures adopted in the context of the COVID-19 pandemic. The Committee has taken due note of this information in its observation on the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87). The Committee also notes the observations of the Single Central Organization of Workers of Chile (CUT), received on 6 October 2020, relating to the application of the Convention in practice. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments in this regard.

The Committee notes that, as to the complaint made under article 26 of the ILO Constitution alleging failure to comply with this and other ILO Conventions by the Republic of Chile, made by a Worker delegate to the International Labour Conference in 2019, the Governing Body decided not to refer the matter to a Commission of Inquiry and to close the procedure under article 26; and invited the Government to continue reporting to the ILO regular supervisory system on measures taken to apply in law and practice the Conventions concerned.

As to other pending matters, the Committee reiterates the content of its comments adopted in 2019 and reproduced below.

The Committee notes the observations relating to the application of the Convention in law and practice (including allegations of violations in the public, financial, transport, food and copper sectors) provided by the following organizations: the Confederation of Copper Workers (CTC), the General Confederation of Public and Private Sector Workers (CGTP) and the World Federation of Trade Unions (WFTU, taking up the observations of the CGTP), all received on 30 August 2019; the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), received on 1 September 2019; and the observations of the Federation of Workers Unions of Chile (FESINTRACH), received on 2 September 2019, the No. 1 Promotion CMR Falabella Enterprise Union, received on 20 September 2019, and the Single Central Organization of Workers of Chile (CUT-Chile), received on 26 October 2019. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments in this regard. Observing that the Government has not replied to the various requests made in its previous comments, including in relation to the many observations provided by the social partners in 2016, the Committee trusts that it will receive the missing information in the next report.

Article 1 of the Convention. Anti-union discrimination. In its previous comment, the Committee, welcoming the provisions adopted to broaden and strengthen protection against anti-union discrimination, requested the Government, in the light of the considerations outlined by the Committee on Freedom of Association, and the observations of the social partners, to provide information on the impact in practice of the new provisions, evaluating in particular their effective application and dissuasive effect. The Committee notes the Government's response to the observations of the CGTP and the ITUC in this respect: (i) referring to the applicable provisions of the Labour Code on anti-union and unfair practices (sections 289–292 and 403–406), and recalling that the resolution of complaints is the responsibility of the labour courts, the Government indicates that as a result of the labour reform introduced through Act No. 20940, the legislation establishes distinctions based on the size of the enterprise, with a heavier system of sanctions for medium-sized and large enterprises, and places emphasis on the objective nature of anti-union acts, irrespective of whether they are intentional or not; (ii) the Government indicates that a register is maintained of convictions for anti-union or unfair practices in collective bargaining and the list of enterprises and organizations that are non-compliant is published every six months, with an indication of the acts penalized and fines imposed; the Government refers in this regard to the data on the rulings issued between 2016 and the first half of 2019 (which show that on average there were over 42 convictions each year); (iii) with regard to the legislative requirement to indicate the name of all workers who are members of a union, the Government indicates that, rather than facilitating anti-union discrimination, the provision has a protective purpose by giving effect to the trade union protection enjoyed by such workers under section 309 of the Labour Code (from ten days prior to the submission of the draft collective agreement until 30 days following its conclusion, and that if during this period the workers in question are dismissed, the Directorate for Labour has a special investigation procedure with the purpose of requiring reinstatement); in this regard, it emphasizes the need to know which workers are engaged in collective bargaining; it is also based on other considerations (for example, in order to identify the workers concerned by the collective bargaining process in the event of tacit acceptance by the employer of the union's proposal), and it specifies that, once the protection afforded for collective bargaining has expired, section 294 of the Labour Code provides for a procedure for setting aside any anti-union dismissal; and (iv) with reference to claims concerning the existence of obstacles and the lack of mechanisms and means to denounce and penalize anti-union practices, the Government indicates that, during the first half of 2019, there were 26 rulings penalizing anti-union or unfair practices in collective bargaining which were given effect and, in 23 of these cases, fines were imposed of between 20 and 300 monthly tax units (approximately equivalent to between US$1,350 and $20,400); and that a total of 6,992 complaints of anti-union and unfair practices were made between 2013 and March 2018 to the Directorate for Labour, of which 352 related to unlawful individual reinstatement (abandoning a strike to individually negotiate labour conditions) or the replacement of striking workers (with 62 per cent of the complaints relating to reinstatement and replacement being upheld). The Committee also notes that the observations of the social partners include new allegations of anti-union discrimination, and claims that the system of protection against anti-union discrimination is still ineffective and not dissuasive (indicating, for example, that even the maximum penalty of 300 monthly tax units is not dissuasive for a multinational enterprise). While welcoming the detailed explanations and information provided by the Government, the Committee invites it to engage in dialogue with the most representative organizations on the evaluation of the system of protection against anti-union discrimination described above, with an assessment in particular of its application in practice providing information in this regard.

Article 4. Promotion of collective bargaining. Workers' organizations and negotiating groups. In its previous comment, the Committee noted that: (i) the Constitutional Court found that it would be unconstitutional to provide that workers can only negotiate through unions, considering that, in accordance with the Chilean Constitution, collective bargaining is the right of each and every worker and that this Convention and the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) ratified by Chile do not require negotiating groups to be excluded from domestic legislation; and (ii) the Government indicated that only collective bargaining with trade unions is regulated by the Labour Code, and that this situation was being assessed with the social partners, and that the Government trusted that a satisfactory solution would be reached in accordance with the Workers' Representatives Convention, 1971 (No. 135). The Committee notes the Government's indication in its latest report that: (i) in view of the ruling of the Constitutional Court, the Directorate for Labour issued Opinion No. 3938/33, of 27 July 2018, supplementing and partially reconsidering the previous approach relating to agreements concluded by negotiating groups, and indicating that these agreements constitute a collective instrument recognized explicitly by the Labour Code, which have to be registered by the labour inspectorate; (ii) various trade unions lodged an appeal for protection of their rights against this Opinion with the Court of Appeal of Santiago, which was upheld by the Court, although an appeal was then made to the Supreme Court, which set aside the ruling; and (iii) if a trade union considers that the establishment of a negotiating group or the benefits granted by the employer to a negotiating group imply any act of discrimination, action can be taken in the courts as an anti-union practice, and the corresponding administrative complaint can be made to the Directorate for Labour. The Committee also notes the observations of the CTC, CGTP and WCTU, which once again allege that the recognition of collective bargaining rights to these groups is contrary to the Convention, that this right was set out by Opinion No. 3938/33, referred to above, and that they consider that its purpose is to weaken trade unions and undermine collective bargaining. The Committee also observes that negotiating groups are not defined in the Labour Code.

The Committee is bound to recall once again that, without prejudice to the fact that Chilean legislation recognizes that each and every worker has the right to engage in collective bargaining, this is a collectively exercised right and the Convention, in the same way as other ILO Conventions ratified by Chile, recognizes in this respect the preponderant role of trade unions and workers' organizations over other methods of association. The concept of workers' organizations recognized in ILO Conventions is broad (covering a range of organizational forms), and the distinction therefore applies in relation to methods of association that do not fulfil the minimum guarantees and requirements to be considered organizations established with the objective and capacity to further and defend workers' rights independently and without interference. It is from this perspective that the Convention recognizes, in Article 4, as the parties to collective bargaining, employers or their organizations, on the one hand, and workers' organizations, on the other, in recognition that the latter offer guarantees of independence that other forms of association may lack. The Committee has therefore always considered that direct negotiation between the enterprise and groups of workers, without organizing in parallel with workers' organizations, where they exist, is not in accordance with the promotion of collective bargaining, as set out in Article 4 of the Convention, and that groups of workers should only be able to negotiate collective agreements or contracts in the absence of workers' organizations. In addition, it has noted in practice that the negotiation of terms and conditions and work by groups which do not fulfil the guarantees to be considered workers' organizations can be used to discourage freedom of association and weaken workers' organizations that are able to defend independently the interests of workers through collective bargaining. The Committee requests the Government to adopt, through social dialogue, measures that effectively recognize the fundamental role and the prerogatives of representative organizations of workers and of their representatives, and establish mechanisms to prevent the involvement of a negotiating group in collective bargaining in the absence of a trade union from undermining the function of workers' organizations or weakening the exercise of freedom of association.

State enterprises. With regard to the request to amend or repeal section 304 of the Labour Code (which does not allow collective bargaining in State enterprises dependent on the Ministry of National Defence, or which are connected to the Government through this Ministry, and in enterprises in which it is prohibited by special laws, or in public or private enterprises or institutions in which the State has financed 50 per cent or more of the budget in either of the last two calendar years, either directly or through duties or taxes), the Committee notes that the Government reiterates that this section has not been amended with respect to enterprises and institutions financed in part by the fiscal budget. In this regard, the Committee is bound to recall once again that the Convention is compatible with special methods of application for public service workers and reiterates that, in accordance with the terms of Articles 5 and 6 of the Convention, only the armed forces, the police and public servants engaged in the administration of the State may be excluded from collective bargaining. The Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to guarantee, in law and practice, that the categories of workers referred to previously can participate in collective bargaining, and to report any developments in this regard.

Article 6. Scope of application of the Convention. Public employees not engaged in the administration of the State. In its previous comment, the Committee noted that the reform of the Labour Code which entered into force in 2017 had not given effect to the request to amend section 1 (which provides that the Labour Code does not apply to officials of the National Congress or the judiciary, or to workers in state enterprises or institutions, or those to which the State contributes or in which it holds shares or is represented, on condition that such officials or workers are subject by law to special regulations). The Committee requested the Government to provide detailed information on the manner in which public servants and employees who are not engaged in the administration of the State (for example, employees of public enterprises and decentralized entities, public sector teachers and transport sector staff) enjoy the guarantees of the Convention. The Committee notes that the Government has not replied to the issue raised and reiterates the information provided in its previous report, indicating that the reform only covers the private sector and that the public employees concerned by this provision, together with public employees of the centralized and decentralized administration, are part of the public sector, in respect of whom the State complies with and applies the Labour Relations (Public Service) Convention, 1978 (No. 151). Recalling that, pursuant to Article 6 of the Convention, only public servants engaged in the administration of the State are exempt from the application of the Convention, the Committee once again requests the Government to provide detailed information on the manner in which public servants and employees who are not engaged in the administration of the State (for example, employees of public enterprises and decentralized entities, public sector teachers and transport sector staff) enjoy the guarantees of the Convention. The Committee also once again requests the Government to provide, in its next report on Convention No. 151, clarifications regarding the application of the guarantees of that Convention to all workers in the public administration.

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (notification: 1997)

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020). The Committee proceeded with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the supplementary information received from the Government and the social partners this year, as well as on the basis of the information at its disposal in 2019.

The Committee notes the observations of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) and the Hong Kong Confederation of Trade Unions (HKCTU) received on 15 and 30 September 2020 respectively, concerning the application of the Convention and alleging police repression and arrests made in connection to public protests carried out in 2019, including the arrest of Mr Lee Cheuk Yan, general secretary of the HKCTU, who was later released on bail pending a court hearing. The HKCTU states that his arrest dissuaded trade unionists from staging public protests and exercising their right to peaceful assembly. The Committee also takes note of the ITUC's allegation that the authorities have started to use the National Security Law, adopted on 30 June 2020 and to which the Committee refers in this observation, to crack down on legitimate and peaceful assemblies. The Committee takes note of the Government's reply to the ITUC and HKCTU's observations which indicates that the level of violence and damage caused by the public protests in 2019 and 2020 was alarming and that the Police have a statutory duty to safeguard public order and public safety. While taking due note of these indications, the Committee requests the Government to ensure that trade unionists are able to engage in their activities in a climate free of violence and intimidation and within the framework of a system that guarantees the effective respect of civil liberties. The Committee also reiterates its request to the Government to provide its comments on the 2016 ITUC observations, including the alleged arrest of Mr Yu Chi Hang, organizing secretary of the HKCTU; and the alleged dismissal of all workers (coach drivers) prior to an announced strike coupled with the hiring of replacement labour.

Articles 2, 3, 5 and 8 of the Convention. Legislative developments. National Security Law. For a number of years, the Committee has noted the proposals to implement article 23 of the Basic Law which, among others, would allow for the proscription of any local organization which was subordinate to a mainland organization, the operation of which had been prohibited on the grounds of protecting the security of the State; and had considered that those proposals could impede the right of workers and employers to form and join the organizations of their own choosing and to organize their administration and activities free from interference by the public authorities. The Committee had also noted the Government's indication that while it had a constitutional responsibility to legislate pursuant to article 23 of the Basic Law in order to safeguard national security, it would carefully consider all relevant factors, act prudently and continue its efforts to create a favourable social environment for the legislative work. The Government further stated that it would listen to public views earnestly and explore ways to enable the society to respond positively to the constitutional requirement. In its last comment, the Committee had expressed the firm hope that the Government would ensure that any new legislation to implement article 23 of the Basic Law would take due account of its comments and be in line with the Convention. The Committee requested the Government to provide information on any developments in this regard, including on consultations held with the social partners.

The Committee notes that in its supplementary report the Government informs that on 28 May 2020, the National People's Congress adopted a decision on establishing and improving the legal system and enforcement mechanisms for the Hong Kong Special Administrative Region (HKSAR) to safeguard national security. The Committee also takes note of the ITUC's and HKCTU's indication that on 30 June 2020, China's top legislature unanimously passed the National Security Law for Hong Kong, which entered into force the same day.

The Committee takes note of the various allegations and concerns raised by the ITUC and the HKCTU with respect to the National Security Law, which include the following: (i) the law was passed just weeks after it was first announced, bypassing Hong Kong's local legislature; (ii) the law is dangerously vague and broad and virtually anything could be deemed a threat to "national security" under its provisions; (iii) under the law "secession", "subversion", "terrorism" and "collusion with foreign forces" incur maximum penalties of life imprisonment; (iv) authorities have at their disposal a broad range of powers with absolutely no checks and balances to ensure the rule of law, respect for fundamental rights and due process and suspects can be removed to mainland China, handled within the mainland's criminal justice system and tried under mainland law; (v) although the law includes a general guarantee to respect human rights, other provisions of the law could override these protections; (vi) article 62 provides the law with a prevailing status to override all other local laws of Hong Kong; and (vii) article 29 of the law poses threats to the right of trade unions in Hong Kong to freely associate and pursue solidarity activities with international organizations as it criminalises "directly or indirectly receiving instructions, control, funding or other kinds of support from a foreign country or an institution" to commit certain acts with a view to, inter alia, "seriously disrupting the formulation and implementation of laws or policies by the Government of the Hong Kong Special Administrative Region or by the Central People's Government, which is likely to cause serious consequences".

The Committee notes that, in its reply to the ITUC and HKCTU's observations, the Government indicates that the situation since June 2019 had evolved to such a state that the Central Authorities had no alternative but to step in and take action, with the HKSAR Government having failed for the past 23 years to enact its national security laws as required by Article 23 of the Basic Law to safeguard national security. The Committee takes note that the Government indicates that: (i) "different countries have their own national security laws and their law is no different; (ii) it is misleading to say that the adoption of the National Security Law "bypassed" article 23 of the Basic Law because, as indicated by article 7 of the National Security Law, the HKSAR still has the obligation to complete as early as possible legislation for safeguarding national security as stipulated under article 23 of the Basic Law; (iii) before adopting the law, the Standing Committee of the National People's Congress had, through different channels, gauged the views of the HKSAR Government and various sectors of the community in Hong Kong, (iv) the establishment of the mechanism for safeguarding national security in the HKSAR will not undermine or replace the HKSAR's existing legal system, and the judicial system continues to be protected by the Basic Law; (v) article 4 of the law mandates that human rights shall be respected and protected in safeguarding national security in the HKSAR, and that the rights and freedoms enjoyed by the HKSAR residents (including the right to freedom of association and to form and join trade unions under article 27 of the Basic Law of the HKSAR and Article 8 of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights and Article 22 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights as applied to Hong Kong) shall be protected in accordance with the law; and (vi) Hong Kong is an international city having close contact and communication with other countries, regions and relevant international organizations; these normal interactions and activities are protected by the Basic Law and local laws of the HKSAR; what the National Security Law seeks to prevent, suppress and punish is only the collusion with foreign and external forces to carry out activities of secession, subversion, infiltration and sabotage - for example, activities such as begging for foreign sanctions that severely damage the interests of Hong Kong are distinctly different from normal interactions (including normal associations between trade unions in Hong Kong and international organizations)."

The Committee takes due note of the Government's indications. It recalls that Article 8 of the Convention sets out both that: (i) in exercising the rights provided for in the Convention workers and employers and their respective organizations, like other persons or organized collectivities, shall respect the law of the land; and that (ii) the law of the land shall not be such as to impair, nor shall it be so applied as to impair, the guarantees provided for in this Convention. In this respect, the Committee further recalls that workers' and employers' organizations should have the right to organize their activities in full freedom and to formulate their programmes with a view to defending the occupational interests of their members, while respecting the law of the land. This includes in particular the right to hold trade union meetings, the right of trade union officers to have access to places of work and to communicate with management, the right to organize protest action, as well as certain political activities (such as expressing support for a political party considered more able to defend the interests of members), and having close contact and communication with international organizations of workers and employers. In turn, the authorities should refrain from any interference which would restrict freedom of association and assembly or impede the lawful exercise thereof, provided that the exercise of these rights does not cause a serious and imminent threat to public order (see the 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 115). Emphasizing that international trade union solidarity constitutes one of the fundamental objectives of any trade union movement, the Committee expects that the Government will ensure as it has stated that normal trade union interactions and activities are indeed protected by the law.

Having noted the concerns expressed by the ITUC and the HKCTU on the possible negative effects that the application of the National Security Law may have on the rights enshrined in the Convention, the Committee requests the Government, in consultation with the social partners, to monitor and provide information on the impact that the Law has already had and may continue to have on the application of the Convention.

The Committee welcomed the statistics supplied by the Government according to which, as of 31 May 2019, the number of trade unions was 914, representing an increase of 13.1 per cent in the last ten years.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (notification: 1997)

The Committee notes the observations of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) received on 16 September 2020 reiterating matters raised in its observations sent in 2019 and addressed in the present comment. It also notes the observations of the Hong Kong Confederation of Trade Unions (HKCTU) received on 30 September 2020 referring to matters addressed in the present comment and denouncing violations of the Convention in practice, including anti-union transfers and demotions in the context of public protests. The Committee takes note of the reply of the Government in connection to the ITUC and HKCTU's observations. It notes that the reply mostly concerns matters examined within the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87). The Committee thus requests the Government to provide its comments on the 2020 HKCTU's allegations of violations of the present Convention in practice as well as on the 2016 observations from the ITUC and the HKCTU, which also contain allegations of violations of the Convention in practice.

The Committee also notes the Government's supplementary report provided in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020), which does not provide new information on pending issues. The Committee therefore reiterates the content of its observation adopted in 2019 and reproduced below.

Article 1 of the Convention. Adequate protection against acts of anti-union discrimination. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted the Government's reference to the drafting of an amendment that would empower the Labour Tribunal to make an order of reinstatement/re-engagement in cases of unreasonable and unlawful dismissal without the need to secure the employer's consent. The Committee had expressed its expectation that the Bill, which had been under examination for 17 years, would be adopted without any further delay so as to give legislative expression to the principle of adequate protection against acts of anti-union discrimination and would be effectively enforced in practice. The Committee notes with interest the Government's indication that, by virtue of the Employment (Amendment) (No. 2) Ordinance, 2018, which amends the Employment Ordinance (EO), the Labour Tribunal and the courts are now empowered, in case of an unreasonable or unlawful dismissal (among others, dismissal by reason of exercising the right to trade union membership or participation in trade union activities), to make a compulsory order for reinstatement or re-engagement without having to secure the agreement of the employer. The Committee observes, however, that, according to the ITUC and the HKCTU, the amended ordinance allows for discretion in ordering reinstatement and the penalty for the employer's failure to observe a reinstatement is not sufficiently dissuasive to ensure such compliance (three months of the worker's average salary and not exceeding 72,500 Hong Kong Dollars (HKD) (US$9,300)). The Committee also notes the Government's statement that it accords high priority to investigating complaints on suspected anti-union discrimination but observes that, according to the ITUC and the HKCTU, only two prosecutions of anti-union discrimination resulted in reinstatement since 1974, as it is difficult to prove the employer's covert intent in criminal proceedings. In light of the above, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the application in practice of the amended EO, in particular to inform about its impact on the number of reinstatement orders issued by the courts and effectively implemented by the employers. Bearing in mind the allegations made by the ITUC and the HKCTU with regard to anti-union dismissals and threats of dismissals in the context of public protests, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to investigate any allegations of anti-union discrimination and to impose sufficiently dissuasive sanctions to avoid the occurrence of such acts in the future. The Committee further requests the Government to provide updated statistics on the number and nature of complaints of anti-union discrimination filed to the competent authorities, their follow-up and outcome.

Article 4. Promotion of collective bargaining. The Committee recalls that it had previously referred to the need to strengthen the collective bargaining framework in the light of the low levels of coverage of collective agreements, which were not binding on the employer, and the absence of an institutional framework for trade union recognition and collective bargaining. In its previous comment, the Committee requested the Government, in consultation with the social partners, to step up its efforts to take effective measures, including of a legislative nature, in order to encourage and promote free and voluntary collective bargaining in good faith between trade unions and employers and their organizations. The Committee notes the Government's indication that: (i) collective bargaining compelled by law is not conducive to voluntary negotiation and there is no consensus on introducing compulsory bargaining in the legislation; (ii) the Labour Department, making use of its conciliation services, encourages employers and employees to draw up agreements on the terms and conditions of employment, which has contributed to harmonious industrial relations; (iii) collective agreements have been reached in certain industries including printing, construction, public bus transport, air transport, food and beverage processing, pig-slaughtering and elevator maintenance; (iv) the Government has been taking numerous measures appropriate to local conditions, both at the enterprise and industry levels, to encourage and promote voluntary negotiation and effective communication between employers and employees or their respective organizations, including through the industry-based tripartite committees; and (v) all the above efforts help foster an environment conducive to voluntary bipartite negotiation between employers and employees or their respective organizations.

While taking due note of the information provided, including on the promotional measures and activities undertaken, the Committee observes the concerns raised by the ITUC and the HKCTU that there is still no legal framework to regulate the scope, protection and enforcement of the agreements and that less than one per cent of workers are covered by collective bargaining. The Committee recalls in this regard that collective bargaining is a fundamental right which members States have an obligation to respect, promote and to realize in good faith and that the overall aim of Article 4 of the Convention is to promote good-faith collective bargaining between workers or their organizations on the one hand, and employers or their organizations, on the other hand, with a view to reaching an agreement on terms and conditions of employment. The Committee also emphasizes that it has not been requesting the Government to impose compulsory collective bargaining, as under the terms of Article 4 of the Convention, collective bargaining must be free and voluntary but that it has been pointing to the need to strengthen the collective bargaining framework. The Committee also reiterates, as regards the tripartite committees established at the industry-level, that the principle of tripartism, which is particularly appropriate for the regulation of questions of a larger scope (drafting of legislation and formulating labour policies), should not replace the principle enshrined in the Convention of autonomy of workers' organizations and employers (or their organizations) in bipartite collective bargaining on conditions of employment. The Committee also recalls that, whatever the type of machinery used, its first objective should be to encourage by all possible means free and voluntary collective bargaining between the parties, allowing them the greatest possible autonomy, while establishing a legal framework and administrative structure to which they may have recourse, on a voluntary basis and by mutual agreement, to facilitate the conclusion of a collective agreement under the best possible conditions (see the 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 242). Considering the above, the Committee requests the Government, in consultation with the social partners, to step up its efforts to take effective measures, including of a legislative nature, to strengthen the legislative framework for collective bargaining so as to encourage and promote free and voluntary collective bargaining in good faith between trade unions and employers and their organizations. The Committee requests the Government to provide statistics on the number of collective agreements concluded, the sectors to which they apply and the number of workers covered.

Article 6. Collective bargaining in the public sector. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to ensure that public servants not engaged in the administration of the State, including teachers and employees in public enterprises, enjoy the right to collective bargaining. The Committee regrets to observe that the Government simply reiterates that every civil servant, irrespective of grade or rank, is a part of the civil service and contributes to the administration of the Government, and that all civil servants are thus excluded from the application of Article 6 of the Convention. It also observes the concerns expressed by the ITUC and the HKCTU that civil servants are excluded from the enforcement of the Convention without distinction of rank and job. While further noting the Government's explanation that there are sufficient avenues for staff representatives to participate in the process for determining the terms and conditions of employment, including through an elaborate three-tier staff consultation mechanism and independent bodies which provide impartial advice on matters of conditions of employment, the Committee reiterates that a distinction must be drawn between, on the one hand, public servants who by their functions are directly employed in the administration of the State (for example, in some countries, public servants in government ministries and other comparable bodies, and ancillary staff), who may be excluded from the scope of the Convention and, on the other hand, all other persons employed by the Government, by public enterprises or by autonomous public institutions, who should benefit from the guarantees provided for in the Convention. It recalls that the establishment of simple consultation procedures for public servants instead of real collective bargaining procedures is not sufficient. The Committee therefore urges the Government to take the necessary measures, in consultation with the social partners, to ensure that public servants not engaged in the administration of the State, including teachers and employees in public enterprises, enjoy the right to collective bargaining. The Committee trusts that the Government will be able to report progress in this regard in the near future.

Macau Special Administrative Region

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (notification: 1999)

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020). The Committee proceeded with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the supplementary information received from the Government this year as well as on the basis of the information at its disposal in 2019.

In its previous comment, the Committee noted the observations of representative organizations of workers communicated with the Government's report and collected through the Standing Committee for the Coordination of Social Affairs, whose members are appointed from the most representative workers' and employers' organizations (currently the Macao Chamber of Commerce and the Macao Federation of Trade Unions). These observations referred to the need to adopt specific laws on freedom of association. The Committee further noted the observations of the Macau Civil Servants' Association received on 6 August 2019, also referring to the need to legislate on matters of freedom of association and collective bargaining, and the Government's general reply thereto. The Committee also noted the Government's additional reply to the 2014 observations of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC).

Articles 2 and 3 of the Convention. Right to organize of all categories of workers. Right of organizations to organize their activities. The Committee recalls that it had previously noted the Government's indication that freedom of association, procession and demonstration, as well as the right and freedom to form and join trade unions and to strike, are guaranteed to all Macao residents by section 27 of the Basic Law of the Macao Special Administrative Region, and that in line with section 2(1) of the Regulation on the Right of Association (Law No. 2/99) everyone can form associations freely and without obtaining authorization. The Committee had also noted that the draft Law on Fundamental Rights of Trade Unions, which was meant to give effect to the right to organize and collective bargaining, had been pending adoption since 2005.

In its previous comment, the Committee noted the Government's indication that the draft Law on Fundamental Rights of Trade Unions had been submitted to the legislative council and vetoed for the tenth time. In April 2019, those who oppose the draft law considered that many substantive and procedural laws already exist to protect workers and that the social situation had changed since the first draft was submitted, as a result of which the draft law does not reflect the needs of the current society. While the Government did not oppose the enactment of the trade union law at an appropriate time, it considered that it had to listen to the opinions of all members of society and the relevant stakeholders to respond to the societal situation and tailor the law and regulations accordingly. The Government indicated that since 2016, a research study had been ongoing on the essential social conditions for the discussion of the draft Law on Fundamental Rights of Trade Unions. The Government expected this study to be finalized in the second half of 2019. The Committee also noted that, in their observations, the representative organizations of workers had considered that the absence of a law on trade unions and collective bargaining constituted a severe legislative loophole and they remained in favour of enacting a set of concrete and specific laws to truly guarantee and protect the right to form, join and represent trade unions. Bearing in mind the views expressed by workers' organizations and recalling that the draft Law on Fundamental Rights of Trade Unions had been pending adoption for more than a decade, the Committee urged the Government to intensify its efforts to achieve consensus on the draft Law and to bring about its adoption in the near future, and to inform the Committee of the results of the above-mentioned study.

The Committee notes the Government's indication in its supplementary report that the study, finalized in 2019, advised the Government to review and improve the labour policy on a gradual basis to better adapt to the socio-economic environment of the region and to undertake such review in accordance with the Basic Law and international conventions. The Government further indicates that, to improve the labour legislation on a gradual basis and take into account the long term development of society, it will begin the early stage of the legislation process of the Trade Union Law and is planning to undertake a public consultation in the third quarter of 2020 to allow ample discussion to find a consensus that takes minority opinions into account, and thus provide a foundation for formulating a Law that is responsive to the societal needs.

While taking due note of the Government's indications, the Committee is bound to note with regret that the draft Law on Fundamental rights of Trade Unions has been pending adoption for fifteen years. The Committee therefore once again urges the Government to intensify its efforts to achieve consensus on the draft Law and to bring about its adoption in the near future. The Committee also reiterates its expectation that this Law will explicitly grant the rights enshrined in the Convention to all categories of workers (with the only permissible exception of the police and the armed forces), including domestic workers, migrant workers, self-employed workers and those without an employment contract, part-time workers, seafarers and apprentices, so as to ensure that freedom of association, including the right to strike, can be effectively exercised. The Committee requests the Government to inform of all developments in that regard.

In the same vein, the Committee also previously requested the Government to provide information on developments regarding the adoption of legislative frameworks regulating rights of specific categories of workers, as provided for in section 3(3) of the Labour Relations Law. The Committee noted in this regard that: (i) the draft Part-Time Labour Relations Law was submitted to the Standing Committee in 2018 but due to the need for a more comprehensive discussion, the Government resubmitted the draft law again for further comments from workers' and employers' representatives; and (ii) the draft Seafarers' Labour Relations Law was still under discussion to ensure its compatibility with the relevant international Conventions. The Committee had further noted the Government's reiteration that while these draft laws are specialized regulations to address the specific characteristics of labour relations in the above sectors, the basic regulations concerning these workers are contained in the Labour Relations Law and workers in all industries, including seafarers and part-time workers, are entitled to freedom of association, organization and the right to participate in trade unions.

Taking due note of the Government's prior explanation and the absence of any updated information, the Committee once again requests the Government to continue to provide information on developments regarding the adoption of legislative frameworks regulating rights of specific categories of workers, including part-time workers and seafarers, and to indicate whether these instruments include any provisions on the promotion and protection of the rights granted in the Convention. The Committee expects that any legislative frameworks regulating rights of specific categories of workers will be in full conformity with the Convention.

Application of the Convention in practice. In its previous comment the Committee noted the statistics provided by the Government on the number of trade unions (408 registered workers' organizations, out of which 49 involve civil servants as of April 2019), as well as the detailed information on dispute settlement of labour disputes involving more than ten workers. The Committee also took note of the measures that the Government indicated to have taken to protect workers' freedom of association and assembly and improve labour conditions as well as the Government's statement that, in order to formalize the employment agency system, it had proposed the Employment Agency Bill to the legislative council. The Committee welcomes the updated statistics provided by the Government on the number of trade unions and observes that by May 2020, there were 440 registered workers' organizations, which shows that, in comparison to the numbers of 2019, and as indicated by the Government, the number of registered worker-related associations continued to rise. The Committee also takes note of the detailed updated information on dispute settlement of labour disputes involving more than ten workers. The Committee encourages the Government to continue to provide statistics as well as other relevant data in relation to the application of the Convention in practice.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (notification: 1999)

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020). The Committee proceeded with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the supplementary information received from the Government this year (see legislative developments and Articles 1 and 2 below), as well as on the basis of the information at its disposal in 2019.

In its previous comment, the Committee noted the observations of representative organizations of workers communicated with the Government's report and collected through the Standing Committee for the Coordination of Social Affairs, whose members are appointed from the most representative workers' and employers' organizations (currently the Macao Chamber of Commerce and the Macao Federation of Trade Unions). These referred to the need to adopt specific laws on freedom of association and point to anti-union practices in some enterprises. The Committee further noted the observations of the Macau Civil Servants' Association received on 6 August 2019, also referring to the need to legislate on matters of freedom of association and collective bargaining, and the Government's general reply thereto. The Committee also noted the Government's additional reply to the 2014 observations of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) but observed that the Government had failed to address the concrete allegations of unfair dismissals of union members and teachers. The Committee reiterates its request to the Government to provide its comments on those specific allegations.

Legislative developments. The Committee previously referred to its comments made under the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), in which it recalled that while the Labour Relations Law adopted in 2008 contained some provisions that prohibit anti-union discrimination and provided sanctions for such acts, it did not include a chapter on the right to organize and collective bargaining, and that the draft Law on Fundamental Rights of Trade Unions, which would give effect to these rights, had been pending adoption since 2005. Referring to its comments made under Convention No. 87, the Committee strongly encouraged the Government to intensify its efforts in order to achieve the adoption, in the near future, of a legislation that would explicitly grant the various rights enshrined in the Convention and address the Committee's pending comments.

The Committee notes the Government's indication in its supplementary report that a research study, initiated in 2016 to understand the social conditions required for initiating a discussion on a Trade Union Law, was finalized 2019. The Government indicates that, in light of the study's recommendations, it will begin the early stage of the legislation process of the Trade Union Law and is planning to undertake a public consultation to allow ample discussion and provide a foundation for formulating a Law that is responsive to the societal needs.

While taking due note of the Government's indications, the Committee recalls that the draft Law on Fundamental rights of Trade Unions has been pending adoption for fifteen years. Referring to its more detailed comments made in this regard under Conventions No 87, the Committee urges the Government to intensify its efforts to achieve the adoption, in the near future, of a legislation that will explicitly grant the various rights enshrined in the Convention and address the Committee's pending comments. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any developments in this regard.

The Committee also previously requested the Government to provide information on any developments regarding the adoption of legislative frameworks regulating the rights of seafarers and part-time workers and expressed the expectation that any such instruments would, in full conformity with the Convention, allow these categories of workers to exercise their right to organize and to bargain collectively. The Committee takes due note of the information provided by the Government and refers to its more detailed comments made under Convention No. 87.

Article 1 of the Convention. Adequate protection against acts of anti-union discrimination. Having previously noted that fines imposed by section 85(1)(2) of the Labour Relations Law for acts of discrimination against workers due to their union membership or the exercise of their rights might not be sufficiently dissuasive, particularly for large enterprises (from 20,000 to 50,000 Macau patacas (MOP) equivalent to US$2,500–6,200), the Committee requested the Government to take the necessary measures to strengthen the existing pecuniary sanctions applicable to acts of anti-union discrimination in order to ensure their sufficiently dissuasive character. It also requested the Government to provide clarification on the use, if any, of sanctions provided for in the Penal Code, to which the Government made reference. The Committee notes the Government's indication that: (i) heavy penalties are already imposed for illegal acts violating workers' rights and the Government will continue to carefully review and improve the laws and regulations in the field of labour; (ii) violations of the Labour Relations Law are divided into administrative violations and "minor violations", which are more serious, have a criminal nature and to which the Penal Code applies; (iii) in case an employer deters an employee from exercising his or her rights or subjects the employee to any adverse treatment for exercising such rights (section 10(1) of the Labour Relations Law) and the act constitutes a criminal offence, the Labour Affairs Bureau will actively follow-up, institute a punishment procedure and impose a fine; and (iv) upon refusal by the employer to pay the fine, judicial proceedings will be initiated, in which the court can impose a fine under the provisions of the Penal Code. While taking due note of the information provided, the Committee observes that there do not seem to have been any concrete measures taken to increase the penalties foreseen for acts of anti-union discrimination, which therefore, still appear to be insufficiently dissuasive, particularly for large enterprises. The Committee notes in this regard that representative organizations of workers also emphasize the need to increase the amount of penalties and fines for anti-union discrimination in order to enhance the deterrence of such acts. They further consider that there is evidence of anti-union practices in some enterprises in which enterprise regulations require employees who join trade unions and assume trade union functions to inform the management. In light of the above, the Committee requests the Government once again to take the necessary measures, in consultation with the social partners, to strengthen the pecuniary sanctions applicable to acts of anti-union discrimination in order to ensure their sufficiently dissuasive character. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any progress in this regard.

The Committee also previously noted the 2014 ITUC observations, that section 70 of the Labour Relations Law, which allows rescission of contract without just cause accompanied by compensation, was in practice used to punish union members when they take part in union activities or industrial actions, and requested the Government to take the necessary measures, including legislative, if necessary, to ensure that this provision is not used for anti-union purposes. In its previous comment the Committee noted that the Government stated that between 2014 and May 2019, the Labour Affairs Bureau had not received any complaints of anti-union dismissals but did not elaborate on any measures taken to address the ITUC concerns. The Committee notes the Government's indication in its supplementary report that between June 2019 and May 2020 the Labour Affairs Bureau did not receive any complaint of antiunion dismissals. Recalling that anti-union acts may not, in practice, always result in the filing of complaints to the competent authorities, the Committee requests the Government once again to take the necessary measures, including of a legislative nature, to ensure that termination of employment contract under section 70 of the Labour Relations Law is not used for anti-union purposes.

Article 2. Adequate protection against acts of interference. The Committee had previously noted that sections 10 and 85 of the Labour Relations Law did not explicitly prohibit all acts of interference as described in Article 2 of the Convention, or guarantee adequate protection by means of dissuasive sanctions and rapid and effective procedures. In its previous comment, it therefore requested the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the relevant legislation includes express provisions to this effect. The Committee notes that the Government reiterates the procedure explained above relating to obstruction by the employer of the exercise of employees' rights and states that it will continue its efforts to work towards the goals set by the Convention. Recalling once again that the applicable legislation (sections 10 and 85 of the Labour Relations Law and section 4 of the Regulation on the Right of Association) do not explicitly prohibit all acts of interference as described in Article 2 of the Convention, the Committee emphasizes the need for legislation to explicitly protect workers' and employers' organizations against any acts of interference by each other or each other's members, including, for instance, acts which are designed to promote the establishment of workers' organizations under the domination of employers or employers' organizations, and to make express provisions for rapid appeals procedures against such acts, coupled with effective and dissuasive sanctions. In light of these considerations, the Committee requests the Government once again to take the necessary measures to include in the relevant legislation provisions explicitly prohibiting acts of interference and providing for sufficiently dissuasive sanctions and rapid and effective procedures against such acts.

The Committee also previously requested the Government to provide statistical information on the functioning, in practice, of the Labour Affairs Bureau and the Labour Tribunal, including the number of cases of anti-union discrimination and interference brought before them, the duration of the proceedings and their outcome. In its previous comment, the Committee noted the Government's indication that between June 2016 and May 2019 one case was opened on the allegations that an employee had been suspended for participating in a procession but it was later found that it was due to poor performance, and that no decisions were found before the courts that would deal with cases of discrimination or interference. The Committee notes the Government's indication in its supplementary report that between June 2019 and May 2020 the Labour Affairs Bureau did not receive any complaints concerning the suspension of employees because of participation in demonstrations. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide statistical information on the functioning, in practice, of the Labour Affairs Bureau and the Labour Tribunal with regard to allegations of anti-union discrimination and interference brought before them, the duration of the proceedings and their outcome.

Articles 1, 2 and 6. Protection of public servants not engaged in the administration of the State against acts of anti-union discrimination and interference. The Committee previously observed that the General Provisions on the Personnel of the Public Administration in Macao did not contain any provisions against anti-union discrimination and interference and that the Government did not indicate any other specific provisions that would explicitly provide protection to public servants against acts of anti-union discrimination and interference. The Committee requested the Government to take the necessary measures to amend the legislation so that it explicitly prohibits acts of anti-union discrimination and interference and grants public servants not engaged in the administration of the State adequate protection against such acts. The Committee notes that the Government reiterates that protection of civil servants against discrimination or interference for participating in trade union activities is guaranteed but observes once again that it does not point to any specific legislative provisions to this effect. In these circumstances, recalling that the scope of the Convention covers public servants not engaged in the administration of the State, the Committee requests the Government once again to take the necessary measures, including of a legislative nature, to explicitly prohibit acts of anti-union discrimination and interference and grant public servants not engaged in the administration of the State adequate protection against such acts.

Articles 4 and 6. Absence in legislation of provisions on collective bargaining for the private sector and public servants not engaged in the administration of the State. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the full application of Article 4 of the Convention both for the private sector and public servants not engaged in the administration of the State, whether through the adoption of the draft Law on Fundamental Rights of Trade Unions or any other legislation. The Committee notes the Government's statement that it always conducts discussions and consultations with the social partners, either through the tripartite consultation platform of the Standing Committee for the Coordination of Social Affairs in the private sector, which has become an essential platform to communicate, negotiate and reach consensus and helps construct stable and harmonious employer–worker relations, or through the permanent consultation mechanism established by the Civil Service Pay Review Council to formulate standards and procedures for pay adjustment in the civil service. The Government indicates that several laws and regulations on the conditions of work of civil servants are currently being revised and that through the different consultation channels, civil servants can express their opinions on relevant matters. Recalling that the Convention tends to essentially promote bipartite negotiations of terms and conditions of employment and that the establishment of simple consultation procedures instead of real collective bargaining procedures is not sufficient, the Committee requests the Government once again to take the necessary measures in the very near future to ensure the full application of Article 4 of the Convention both for the private sector and public servants not engaged in the administration of the State, whether through the adoption of the draft Law on Fundamental Rights of Trade Unions or any other legislation, and to provide information on any developments in this regard.

Collective bargaining in practice. The Committee notes that the Government has not conducted any relevant statistical analysis on collective agreements reached. The Committee requests the Government once again to provide statistics as to the number of collective agreements concluded, specifying the sectors concerned, their level and scope, as well as the number of enterprises and workers covered.

Colombia

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1976)

The Committee notes the observations of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), received on 16 September 2020, and the joint observations of the Confederation of Workers of Colombia (CUT) and the Confederation of Workers of Colombia (CTC), received on 1 October 2020, as well as the corresponding comments of the Government. The Committee notes that these various observations relate to matters examined by the Committee in its present observation, as well as allegations of violations of the Convention in practice.

The Committee also notes the observations of the National Employers Association of Colombia (ANDI), communicated by the International Organisation of Employers on 1 October 2020, which refer to matters examined in the present observation.

Trade union rights and civil liberties. The Committee recalls that for many years it has been examining, in the same way as the Committee on Freedom of Association, allegations of violence against trade unionists and the situation of impunity in this regard. The Committee notes with deep concern that the ITUC, CUT and CTC continue to report the persistence of the situation of anti-union violence in the country. In this regard, the Committee notes that the ITUC, after referring to the particularly heavy impact of anti-union violence in the education, transport, mining and energy sectors, specifically denounces: (i) the murder between January 2019 and March 2020 of 14 trade union leaders; (ii) during the same period, four attempted murders, one case of forced disappearance and 198 cases of death threats against members of the union movement; (iii) the murder on 26 July 2020 of a union leader in the agricultural sector; (iv) the following and spying upon, by army agents, of various trade union and social leaders, including the Vice-President of the National Union of State and Public Service Workers of Colombia (UTRADEC) and the Human Rights Secretary of the General Confederation of Labour (CGT), Mr Humberto Correa between February and December 2019; and (v) the incapacity of the Government to provide specific and adequate protection for trade unionists who are victims of death threats, or to make progress in processing the many historical cases of murders and other violent crimes and resolve the majority of the most recent cases.

The Committee also notes the affirmation by the CUT and the CTC that an intense situation of anti-union violence persists, with sectoral and territorial characteristics similar to those described in 2019, and that the resurgence of anti-union violence in the rural sector is especially noteworthy, particularly in areas formerly controlled by the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia (FARC). The trade union confederations emphasize that paramilitary forces and new criminal groups, which in some areas are related to local economic and political power bases, are the principal source of threats to trade unionism. They add that the unions worst affected by anti-union violence are in agriculture, education, the mining and energy sector, the public sector and transport.

The Committee notes the specific allegations by the CUT and CTC that: (i) three years after the conclusion of the Peace Agreement, between 2016 and May 2020, there were 998 cases of violations against the life and safety of trade union leaders (including 119 murders); (ii) between August 2019 and May 2020, there were another 141 documented acts of anti-union violence, including 18 murders and 101 death threats, with a trend for an increase in murders over the past four years; (iii) 44 per cent of the acts of anti-union violence are attributable to paramilitary groups, and 52 per cent are of unknown origin; (iv) the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights has recorded 55 massacres in the country since January 2020, compared with 36 in 2019, and although these acts are not directly targeted against unions, they reduce the possibilities for workers' organizations to engage freely in their activities through fear of reprisals against them; (v) the national strike in November 2019 against the Government's economic and social policy and calling for compliance with the Peace Agreement gave rise to disproportionate police responses; and (vi) as a result of their leading role in the strike, leaders of the Colombian Federation of Education Workers (FECODE) and the CUT, including the President of the CUT, Mr Diógenes Orjuela, have received death threats from paramilitary groups, and there has been no progress in the corresponding investigations.

With reference to protection measures for trade union leaders who are at risk, the Committee notes the allegations by the CUT and CTC of their slowness, delays and ineffectiveness. The trade union confederations allege specifically that: (i) only 38 per cent of all the requests made for protection measures by members of the union movement during 2019 and 2020 were examined; (ii) in a context of a decreasing budget allocation for the protection of members of the union movement, the protection measures that were discontinued in 2019 amount to a little over 50 per cent of the measures that have been maintained; and (iii) the real and effective participation of trade unions in the process of the determination of protection measures has been diminishing, especially in the context of the Committee for the Assessment of Risks and the Recommendation of Measures (CERREM).

The Committee notes that the ANDI once again emphasizes the significant efforts made by public institutions both for the protection of members of the trade union movement and to take action against impunity, and the substantial results achieved in this regard.

The Committee also notes the information provided by the Government concerning the scourge of anti-union violence and the action taken by institutions to address it. The Committee notes that, in general terms, the Government indicates that: (i) while substantial progress has been achieved in relation to security, it continues to face many serious challenges caused by changes in criminal organizations and their capacity for adaptation, and the persistence of conditions that are conducive to their multiplication and strengthening; (ii) as a result of the huge efforts made by public institutions, the State of Colombia has managed to achieve a significant reduction in acts of violence against members of the union movement, as the number of homicides of trade unionists fell by 84 per cent between 2001 and 2019; (iii) similarly, the State has managed to break the impunity that previously reigned, and there are now 966 convictions related to acts of anti-union violence, compared with a single conviction in 2001; and (iv) while it condemns any act of violence against unionized workers, many of the homicides of trade unionists are not related to the union activities of the victims, but are the consequence of the generalized situation of violence that still persists in the country.

The Committee notes that, with reference to the institutional initiatives taken to achieve the results outlined above, the Government once again places emphasis on the Appropriate Action Plan (PAO) adopted in 2018 for the coordination of the protection programmes and resources of all the Government institutions with responsibility for ensuring the protection of trade union and social leaders and human rights defenders. The Committee also notes the emphasis placed by the Government on the relevance of the role played by the Inter-institutional Commission for the Promotion and Protection of the Human Rights of Workers, led by the Ministry of Labour, which brings together all the relevant public institutions and the social partners. The Government indicates that, in its meeting on 23 July 2020, the Inter-institutional Commission discussed many subjects related to prevention and protection against acts of anti-union violence, penalties, and relations between workers' federations and the police in relation to the exercise of social protest. The Government adds that 80 per cent of the action agreed upon in that meeting has already been implemented, all intended to protect the human rights of workers.

The Committee further notes the specific information provided by the Government concerning the protection of members of the union movement who are at risk, according to which: (i) during the course of 2018, a total of 447 risk evaluations were undertaken for members of the trade union movement, with 280 cases of extraordinary risk being identified, one of extreme risk and 167 cases of ordinary risk; (ii) in 2019, a total of 332 risk evaluations were undertaken for members of the trade union movement, with 206 cases of extraordinary risk being identified, one of extreme risk and 125 cases of ordinary risk; (iii) from 1 January to 31 August 2020, 190 risk assessments were carried out on members of the trade union movement, determining 109 cases of extraordinary risk, three of extreme risk and 78 of ordinary risk; (iv) the National Protection Unit (UNP) is currently providing protection for 298 trade union leaders and activists; and (v) the estimated cost of protection measures for members of the union movement was 42,889,000,054 Colombian pesos in 2018 (approximately US$12,081,623) and 39,986,188,070 pesos in 2019 (approximately US11,262,552). The Committee also notes that, in response to the observations of the CUT and the CTC, the Government indicates that: (i) not all requests for protection result in an exhaustive evaluation of the level of risk, since the UNP first verifies that the requests comply with the minimum requirements established by Decree 1066 of 2015; (ii) in 2019, 87 per cent of the security measures established the previous year were maintained; and (iii) the inter-institutional spaces for protection, such as the CERREM, where the trade union confederations are invited, continue to be fully operational. The Committee finally notes the Government's indication that the emergence of new sources of threats resulted, during the course of 2019, in the need to strengthen protection measures and strategies for social leaders and human rights defenders.

With regard to the action taken to combat impunity, the Committee notes the Government's specific indications that: (i) the Office of the National Public Prosecutor is continuing to follow its strategy of the investigation and prosecution of crimes against trade unionists through cases being taken up and followed by the Elite Group established in 2016; (ii) simultaneously, the Office of the Public Prosecutor, based on Directive 002 of 30 November 2017, has been implementing a strategy for the investigation and prosecution of crimes against human rights defenders, which has been strengthened since 2020 with greater human, logistical and scientific capacity, as there is an interrelationship between the two strategies given that a unionized worker engaged in human rights activities is considered a human rights defender); (iii) of the 216 cases of homicides of members of the union movement investigated between 2011 and 2020, the Office of the Public Prosecutor has a rate of resolving 42.59 per cent of the cases (a total of 60 convictions have been handed down in 44 cases, while 30 cases are being prosecuted, charges have been brought in 10 cases, six cases are under investigation with arrest warrants issued and two cases are out of time); and (iv) Colombian courts have issued a total of 966 convictions in relation to acts of anti-union violence, of which 815 are for homicides of members of the union movement (525 of which were handed down between 2011 and 2020).

The Committee also notes the information provided by the Government concerning the 34 homicides committed in 2018 and denounced by the ITUC in 2019, in which it indicates that: (i) 21 cases are under investigation, eight are being prosecuted, convictions have been handed down in four cases and one case has been shelved; and (ii) of the 34 cases denounced, 19 are registered under the strategy for the investigation and prosecution of crimes against human rights defenders (of which nine are recorded as trade union leaders). The Committee requests the Government to continue providing detailed information on the progress made in the investigation of these cases.

The Committee also takes note of the Government's comments on the observations of the CUT and the CTC regarding the authorities' response to the national strike of November 2019 and the anti-union acts that affected several union leaders active in the context of the aforementioned strike. The Committee notes that the Government indicates that: (i) the Government has always been respectful of the right to protest, and a statement reiterating the constitutional right to peaceful protest was signed at the plenary session of the Permanent Commission for Agreement on Wages and Labour Policies; (ii) the Government created spaces for dialogue with the various promoters of the strike; (iii) despite the guarantees provided by the Government, there were some outbreaks of violence aimed at destabilizing the security of citizens; (iv) following the attack to which he was subjected on 9 February 2020, the ex-president of FECODE, Mr Carlos Rivas, received complete emergency personal security measures as of 19 February 2020; and (v) the President of the CUT, Mr José Diógenes Orjuela also has complete personal security measures.

The Committee once again acknowledges the significant efforts made by the public authorities, both with regard to the protection of members of the trade union movement who are at risk and in the investigation and punishment of acts of anti-union violence. The Committee once again particularly welcomes in this respect the active commitment of the various relevant State bodies, and the initiatives taken to improve the effectiveness of State action through inter-institutional coordination and the consultations held with the social partners in the context of the Inter-Institutional Human Rights Commission. In particular, the Committee notes the 815 convictions handed down in relation to the homicide of members of the trade union movement since 2001 and the substantial increase in their numbers since 2016.

Nevertheless, the Committee expresses deep concern at the persistence of many homicides of members of the trade union movement and other acts of anti-union violence in the country, as well as the death threats against national and local trade union leaders in a context of the growing number of attacks against social leaders in general. The Committee takes special note of the indications by the trade union confederations that unions in agriculture, education, energy and mining are particularly affected, and the references by the Government and the trade union confederations to the current changes in the origins of anti-union violence. While being aware of the complexity of the challenges faced by the institutions responsible for criminal investigation, the Committee is once again bound to note the absence of data on the number of convictions of the instigators of acts of anti-union violence and it once again emphasizes in this regard the essential importance of the identification and conviction of the instigators of these crimes in order to break the cycle of anti-union violence. In view of the magnitude of the challenges described, and acknowledging the significant action taken by the public authorities, the Committee urges the Government to continue strengthening its efforts and the resources allocated for the provision of adequate protection for all trade union leaders and members who are at risk, and for their organizations, with full attention and the necessary resources being directed at the sectors most affected by anti-union violence. Emphasizing the significant increase in the number of convictions, the Committee also urges the Government to continue taking all the necessary measures to ensure that all acts of anti-union violence, including homicides and other acts, occurring in the country are investigated and that the instigators and perpetrators are convicted. The Committee particularly hopes that all the necessary further measures will be taken and the necessary resources will be allocated to significantly improve the effectiveness of the investigations and criminal proceedings undertaken for the identification and punishment of the instigators of acts of anti-union violence. The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information on this subject. The Committee finally requests the Government to provide information on the allegations made by the trade union confederations concerning the alleged acts of "espionage" (such as surveillance) against a series of trade union leaders.

Collective compensation measures for the trade union movement. In its previous comment, the Committee noted with interest the establishment of the Standing Dialogue Forum for collective compensation for the trade union movement (hereinafter the Forum). The Committee requested the Government to continue providing information on the work of the Forum and on the implementation in practice of collective compensation measures for the trade union movement in view of the violence committed against it. The Committee notes the Government's indications that: (i) on 29 November 2019, a second session of the Forum was held to discuss its operation and the action necessary to make progress in the process of the Office of the Public Defender taking a statement from the trade union movement, which is an essential stage to allow the entry of the collective measures in the Single Record of Victims; (ii) the Office of the People's Defender, the CUT, CGT, CTC and FECODE met in December 2019 to review the information at the disposal of the trade union movement for inclusion in the statement; (iii) at the request of the trade union movement, the third session of the Forum was postponed on two occasions so that another preparatory meeting could be held by the trade union movement with the Office of the People's Defender and the Victims Unit; (iv) the third meeting of the Forum took place virtually on 23 April and 4 May 2020 with the leadership of the Victims Unit; (v) as agreed at the 3rd meeting of the Forum, two technical meetings were subsequently held with the trade union movement in July and September 2020 to review the progress made in the systematization of information; (vi) the various meetings above-mentioned made it possible to recruit the necessary technical personnel to go forward with the process and (vii) the Victims Unit has been managing the 4th meeting of the Forum since October 2020, awaiting a response from the trade union movement to set a date. The Committee notes that the Government reiterates its political will to provide compensation to the trade union movement, and emphasizes the importance of the latter making the statement referred to above to the Office of the People's Defender so that the legal procedures can go forward.

The Committee also notes the allegations by the CUT and the CTC that: (i) following the adoption of the protocol for the establishment of the Forum, it has not met since and has not made progress with any of the action assigned to it after a year of existence due to the lack of initiative and political will by the Government; (ii) despite the pandemic, the process could have continued virtually; (iii) the necessary technical personnel have not been recruited to carry forward the process; and (iv) the Forum also has to make progress in facilitating the submission by the trade unions of the formal statement by the union movement to the Office of the People's Defender.

Taking note of the respective positions of the Government and the trade union confederations concerning the work carried out by the Forum in 2020, the Committee expects that the collective compensation measures for the trade union movement, in view of the violence committed against it, will be implemented in the near future. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing information in this regard.

Section 200 of the Penal Code. In its previous comment, the Committee noted the information provided by the Government on the impact of the legislative and institutional initiatives adopted to facilitate the application of section 200 of the Penal Code, which establishes penal sanctions for a series of acts that are contrary to freedom of association and collective bargaining. The Committee previously noted in particular that, as a result of the special expedited criminal procedure established by Act No. 1826 of 12 January 2017 and the joint work plan developed since August 2016 by the Office of the Public Prosecutor and the Ministry of Labour, the examination had been concluded of 86 per cent of the 2,530 cases of alleged violations of section 200. However, the Committee also noted the allegations of the CUT, CTC and CGT that there is complete impunity in relation to the enforcement of section 200 as there have been no convictions. It also noted the Government's reply in this respect indicating that ten cases were before the courts, as an illustration of the absence of impunity.

The Committee notes that the Government and the ANDI provide updated data on the outcome of investigations into alleged violations of section 200 of the Penal Code. The Government indicates that, of the 2,727 cases of potential violations of section 200 of the Penal Code referred to the Office of the Public Prosecutor between 2011 and 20 October 2020, investigations have been concluded for 91.02 per cent and only 8.98 per cent are still under investigation. The Government adds that the conclusion of the cases is due to: (i) the shelving of criminal prosecutions (1,363 cases, establishing in 61,78 per cent of such cases that the criminal conduct had not existed); (ii) the ending of prosecution due to cases being time barred or the withdrawal of charges (520 cases); (iii) the withdrawal of charges by the worker or trade union (441 cases); and (iv) conciliation (158 cases, the number of which has increased significantly since August 2016). The Committee also notes the Government's indication that it does not agree with the allegations made by the trade union confederations concerning impunity in respect of violations of section 200, as more than 90 per cent of the investigations have been completed and the outcomes indicated above have been presented to the Inter-institutional Human Rights Commission, which is led by the Ministry of Labour and in which the trade union confederations participate.

The Committee notes the indication by the CUT and CTC that the figures provided by the Government do not include data on the charges brought and the prosecution of cases, which is necessary to assess the effectiveness in practice of investigations into crimes committed in violation of section 200 of the Penal Code. The trade union confederations add that the enforcement of section 200 has not been referred to the trade union movement for consideration in 2020 as no meetings have been held on the subject.

While once again welcoming the increase in the number of cases resolved through conciliation and noting that, in its responses to the observations of the CUT and the CTC, the Government refers to the existence of eight cases currently before the courts, the Committee continues to note the absence of convictions for violations of section 200 of the Penal Code despite the very high number of criminal charges brought in this respect since 2011. In light of the above, the Committee once again requests the Government to engage, together with the Office of the Public Prosecutor and the social partners, in an assessment of the effectiveness of section 200 of the Penal Code and its enforcement and to report the outcome and any action taken as a result.

Articles 2 and 10 of the Convention. Trade union contracts. With reference to trade union contracts, the contractual concept envisaged in Colombian legislation under which one or more unions undertake to provide services or perform work through their members for one or more enterprises or employers' organizations, the Committee recalls that in previous years it requested the Government to provide its comments on the observations of the CUT and CTC according to which trade union contracts perpetuate and extend unlawful employment mediation and undermine trade union action through the creation of false unions.

The Committee recalls in this respect that, in its most recent comment, it noted: (i) the Government's indication that trade union contracts are a legal concept the validity of which has been confirmed by the high courts of the country and which enable unions to participate in employment generation, and that guarantees exist to prevent the abuse of trade union contracts by false unions as a result of the provisions of Decree No. 0636 of 2016 and supervision by the labour inspection services in relation to employment mediation; (ii) the similar position of the ANDI, which also emphasizes the importance of respecting the independence of trade unions as to whether or not they conclude trade union contracts; (iii) the reiterated position of the CUT and CTC in their allegations that trade union contracts undermine the purpose and independence of trade unions, are an obstacle to the effective exercise of trade union rights by workers and permit the maintenance of unlawful employment mediation in the health sector; and (iv) the position of the CGT that, although trade union contracts may be a valid precept for strong trade unions, in practice a substantial number of associated work cooperatives have been converted into false unions to conclude trade union contracts, particularly in the health sector.

The Committee recalls that, on the basis of the elements noted above, it previously: (i) observed that within the framework of the very specific precept of trade union contracts, through which a trade union takes direct responsibility, through its members, for a productive activity on behalf of an enterprise, the union is responsible for organizing the work of its members and for providing them with the benefits corresponding to the work performed; (ii) noted that both the Government and the three trade union confederations (the CUT, CTC and CGT) agree that over 98 per cent of trade union contracts are concentrated in the health sector; and (iii) observed with deep concern that the three trade union confederations consider that associated work cooperatives, which previously engaged in unlawful employment mediation in the health sector, have taken on the form of false unions so as to be able to continue such activities through trade union contracts. On the basis of the above, the Committee emphasized that the exercise by a workers' union of the power of management and decision-making concerning the employment of its members is likely to generate a conflict of interests with its function of defending the claims of its members. The Committee therefore requested the Government to conduct a detailed assessment of the use of trade union contracts, particularly in the health sector, and to take the necessary measures to ensure that the precept of trade union contracts does not undermine the trade union rights of workers.

The Committee notes that the Government reiterates the comments made in 2019, indicating that: (i) trade union contracts enable trade unions to participate in the management of enterprises and to promote employment; (ii) within the framework of trade union contracts, two types of relations arise: the first is between the enterprise and the trade union, which is a manifestation of collective relations, as governed by collective labour standards; the other arises between union members and the union, which is a special relationship that benefits from special protection through the minimum guarantees and basic constitutional principles governing labour, without constituting a labour relationship, as trade union contracts did not emerge for the purpose of transforming trade unions into a new type of employer; (iii) workers covered by a trade union contract are already covered by a collective agreement concluded between the employer and the union; (iv) the various provisions of Decree No. 036 of 2016, and particularly the rule that a trade union contract cannot be concluded unless a trade union has been established for at least six months before the conclusion of the contract, prevents a trade union from being created for the sole purpose of the immediate conclusion of trade union contracts; (v) the Ministry of Labour exercises control over cases that are denounced as unlawful employment mediation, which include cases of the undue use of trade union contracts; (vi) the Ministry of Labour is in the process of adopting the plan of action of the Public Policy for the prevention, inspection, supervision and control of labour: Undertakings for Decent Work 2020-30, adopted on 20 February 2020, which includes action intended to reinforce trade union freedoms involving supervision of the use of trade union contracts; (vii) there were 567 trade union contracts in force between January and June 2020, of which 95.8 per cent were in the health sector; (viii) 11 disputes were recorded concerning the undue use of trade union contracts (seven are at the preliminary investigation stage, charges are being prepared in three cases and one case is at the notification stage); (ix) with reference to inspections focussing on the supervision of trade union contracts, current trade union contracts were classified by economic sector, focussing on health, manufacturing and agriculture; (x) with a view to inspecting 20 per cent of the trade union contracts in force, the main focus was on export sectors; and (xi) as a result of the pandemic, it was decided to suspend the inspections, for which reason there is no data on inspections of trade union contracts between January and June 2020. The Committee further notes that the ANDI continues to express a position similar to that of the Government, once again emphasizing that it is necessary to respect the independence of trade unions to conclude trade union contracts, as the CGT trade union confederation, for example, has done.

The Committee finally notes that the CUT and CTC reiterate in their most recent observations that the concept of trade union contracts, which involve an enterprise providing additional finance to the trade union: (i) blurs the purpose for which trade unions are established; and (ii) places constraints on their independence in relation to the enterprise and disguises the nature of the true employer. The Committee notes that the two trade union confederations also consider that: (i) the proliferation of trade union contracts is persisting since, between January and June 2020, it was reported that 567 trade union contracts were registered; (ii) up to now the Government has not undertaken any reform of the rules to limit their use, and has certainly not proposed any reform for their elimination from Colombian legislation; (iii) the labour inspection services have been reluctant to consider the investigation of trade union contracts as unlawful means of employment mediation and, when carrying out inspections, they confine themselves to formal requirements concerning the conclusion and validity of the trade union contract; and (iv) up to the present, there is no indication that any penalties have been imposed against any of the over 1 700 trade union contracts in existence in the country, which are concluded with supposedly independent unions that are not known to the real trade union movement.

The Committee takes due note of the information provided by the Government and the social partners with regard to the precept of trade union contracts. The Committee observes that the various actors reiterate their respective positions and notes that there have not been specific changes in law or practice. The Committee notes in particular that the use of trade union contracts continues to be concentrated in 95 per cent of cases in the health sector. In this regard, while being fully aware of the great obstacles to labour inspection activities arising out of the COVID-19 pandemic, the Committee observes that the Government does not refer to any priority in planning action to supervise the use of trade union contracts in the sector. In light of the above, once again emphasizing that the attribution to a workers' union of the power of management and decision-making concerning the employment of its members is likely to generate a conflict of interest and may therefore endanger its capacity to fulfil the specific functions of trade unions to support and defend independently the claims of their members in relation to employment and terms and conditions of work, the Committee requests the Government to: (i) plan and conduct in the near future a detailed assessment of the use of trade union contracts, in particular in the health sector; and (ii) after sharing the results of this assessment with the social partners, take the necessary measures, including legislative measures where necessary, to ensure that the precept of trade union contracts does not undermine the trade union rights of workers and is not used for purposes that are incompatible with Article 10 of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on all progress achieved in this regard.

Article 4. Judicial cancellation of trade union registration. In its previous comment, the Committee requested the Government to provide its comments on the statements made by the CUT and CTC that the expedited procedure set out in section 380(2) of the Substantive Labour Code for the cancellation of the registration of trade unions does not offer adequate procedural safeguards.

The Committee notes the Government's description of the various stages and time limits of the expedited procedure for the cancellation of the registration of trade unions established by the Substantive Labour Code. The Government indicates in this respect that: (i) this judicial procedure, which recognizes the right to contest and appeal the decision of the court of first instance, which suspends the decision, sets out constitutional guarantees of due process; (ii) with regard to the allegations that certain enterprises take advantage of this procedure to undermine freedom of association, the courts rule independently based on an examination of each individual case, for which reason it cannot be inferred that there are systematic cancellations of the registration of trade unions; and (iii) in its ruling C-096/93, the Constitutional Court considered that section 380 of the Substantive Labour Code complied with Article 4 of the Convention, which prohibits the administrative dissolution or suspension of trade union organizations. The Committee notes that the CUT and CTC: (i) allege once again that the very short time limits set out in section 380(2) of the Substantive Labour Code do not provide adequate procedural guarantees to unions; (ii) various recent cases show that certain enterprises make use of the expedited procedures to endeavour to try and eliminate trade unions in reprisal for engaging in allegedly unlawful work stoppages; and (iii) call for a review of the Substantive Labour Code to limit the current possibility to dissolve trade unions for reasons and through procedures that are incompatible with the Convention.

The Committee takes due note of the elements advanced by the Government concerning the procedure established by section 380(2) of the Substantive Labour Code, and particularly the existence of a right of appeal with suspensive effect. The Committee also notes that the trade union confederations refer in their observations to court procedures on the basis of section 380(2), but not to dissolution decisions under the procedure. The Committee also observes that: (i) the time limits set out in section 380(2) for trade unions subject to action for their dissolution to put forward their defence and possibly to appeal against a decision adopted by a court of first instance are extremely short (five days in each case); and (ii) the CUT and CTC also denounce the reasons for which the expedited procedure for the judicial dissolution of a trade union may be set in motion, and particularly alleged unlawful work stoppages. Recalling once again that the cancellation of trade union registration constitutes an extreme form of interference that must be confined to serious violations of the law after exhausting other less drastic means of action for the organization as a whole and that it is important for such measures to be accompanied by all the necessary guarantees that can only be ensured by normal judicial procedures, the Committee requests the Government to indicate, on the one hand, the reasons that could justify the application of the very short procedural time limits set out in section 380(2) of the Substantive Labour Code and, on the other, the extent to which a work stoppage that is considered to be unlawful can constitute a reason for the dissolution of a trade union.

Articles 3 and 6. Right of workers' organizations to organize their activities and to formulate their programmes. Legislative issues. The Committee recalls that for many years it has been referring to the need to adopt measures to amend the legislation in relation to: (i) the prohibition of strikes by federations and confederations (section 417(i) of the Substantive Labour Code) and in a very broad range of services that are not necessarily essential in the strict sense of the term (section 430(b), (d), (f) and (h); section 450(1)(a) of the Substantive Labour Code; Taxation Act 633/00 and Decrees Nos 414 and 437 of 1952, 1543 of 1955, 1593 of 1959, 1167 of 1963, and 57 and 534 of 1967); and (ii) the possibility to dismiss workers who have intervened or participated in an unlawful strike (section 450(2) of the Substantive Labour Code), including in cases in which the unlawful nature of the strike is a result of requirements that are contrary to the provisions of the Convention.

With reference to the prohibition of strikes in a series of services that are not necessarily essential in the strict sense of the term, the Committee notes that the Government states, firstly, that the right to strike, even though it is a fundamental right of trade union organizations, is not an absolute right, and that it may therefore be subject to limitations as in the case of areas where essential public services are provided. The Commission further notes that the Government reports on the examination by the House of Representatives of Bill No. 071 of 2019 amending the Substantive Labour Code with a view to harmonizing the right to strike with the Conventions on freedom of association of the International Labour Organization, which was transmitted to the House of Representatives on 24 July 2019 and had its first reading on 17 February 2020. The Government indicates that, in its explanations introducing the Bill, the Ministry of Labour considered it necessary to define essential public services and that the Bill was discussed by the Standing Committee for Dialogue on Wage and Labour Policies. In this regard, the Committee notes that the Government states that there is currently no tripartite consensus to carry out the legislative amendments requested by the workers' federations with regard to strikes and that, on this point, it is appropriate to take into account both the position of the trade union organizations and that of the employers' organizations. The Committee notes that the Government finally describes in detail ruling No. SL 1680-2020 of 24 June of 2020 of the Supreme Court of Justice respecting a strike in the health sector and emphasizes that it: (i) indicates that strikes are not prohibited in the whole health sector, but strictly and exclusively in those services the interruption of which would really endanger the life or health of the population; (ii) changes its criteria and considers that the procedure established in sections 444 and 445 of the Substantive Labour Code, which establishes a series of requirements for the exercise of the right to strike, only applies to contractual strikes seeking the conclusion of collective agreements; and (iii) considers that the procedure cannot be applied to other types of strikes, such as those attributable to employers, protesting against policy or sympathy strikes, as sections 444 and 445 were adopted prior to the 1991 Constitution at a time when the legislator had not considered types of strikes other than contractual strikes.

The Committee notes that the ANDI, after expressing the view that the right to strike is not covered by the Convention, once again expresses the opinion that Colombian legislation and case law on strikes in essential services are fully satisfactory and that the country has an independent judicial system which examines each case in the event of disputes between employers and workers. The Committee finally notes that the CUT and CTC also refer in their observations to ruling No. SL 1680-2020, in which respect they emphasize in particular that the Supreme Court: (i) recognizes the right to strike as a fundamental human right; and (ii) takes as a basis the position of the supervisory bodies of the ILO in examining whether, in the specific case before it, the work stoppage effectively and directly endangered the life, health or personal safety of the population. The Committee notes that the CUT and CTC also affirm that: (i) the ruling only applies between the parties and, as it was issued by a court of cassation, does not affect the standing of the legislative provisions on the subject; (ii) up to now, there has been no legislative proposal by the Government to amend the legislative provisions that restrict and are in violation of the right to strike; and (iii) although the examination is continuing of Bill No. 071 of 2019, proposed by the trade union confederations to bring the national legislation on the right to strike into conformity with international ILO standards, the Government majority has prevented discussion of the Bill and a vote on it with the aim of shelving it for a second time.

The Committee takes due note of the observations made by the Government and the social partners. The Committee notes with interest ruling No. SL 1680-2020 of the Supreme Court, provided by the Government and the trade union confederations, which is based on the fundamental nature of the right to strike for the application and interpretation of legal provisions establishing the conditions for its exercise and setting its limits. In this regard, the Committee recalls that in its previous comment it noted that both the Constitutional Court, in relation to the oil sector, and the Supreme Court, with regard to the various services defined as essential in the legislation, have called for a revision of the legislation to better limit the restrictions imposed on the exercise of the right to strike. However, the Committee continues to note that no specific progress has been made with the legislative reforms requested by the Committee in relation to strikes in essential services. The Committee recalls that in its previous comment it indicated in this regard that it considers that: (i) essential services in which the right to strike may be restricted or prohibited are those the interruption of which would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population; and (ii) although the concept of essential services is not absolute, the Committee has considered that sectors such as oil and public transport do not constitute essential services in the strict sense of the term, but are public services of overriding importance in which the maintenance of a minimum service may be required. The Committee therefore firmly expects that the Government will take the necessary measures in the near future to revise the legislative provisions referred to previously respecting essential services as indicated in its comments. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any progress made in this regard and reminds it that it may have recourse to the technical assistance of the Office.

With reference to section 417 of the Substantive Labour Code, which prohibits federations and confederations from calling strikes, the Committee notes the Government's indication that the role of federations and confederations is not essentially to take up a position in relation to a labour dispute concerning a specific enterprise or economic activity, but to represent and promote trade union interests in general, without the intention of exercising the right to strike. The Committee notes that both the Government and the ANDI also refer once again to rulings Nos C-797 of 2000 and C-018 of 2015, in which the Constitutional Court emphasized that federations and confederations discharge the functions of providing advisory services to their member organizations and that, in the context of an economic dispute with an employer based on a set of claims, it is constitutionally justified for federations and confederations to be excluded from a decision to call a strike.

On the other hand, noting the persistent criticisms made by national and international trade union confederations concerning the prohibitions established in section 417 of the Substantive Labour Code, the Committee recalls once again that, under the terms of Article 6 of the Convention, the guarantees of Articles 2, 3 and 4 apply fully to federations and confederations, which must therefore be able to determine their programmes in full freedom. The Committee also recalls that, in accordance with the principle of trade union independence as set out in Article 3 of the Convention, it is not for the public authorities to determine the respective roles of first-level unions and of the federations and confederations to which they are affiliated. Finally, the Committee emphasizes that, as indicated in ruling No. 1680 of 2020 of the Labour Chamber of the Supreme Court, which is broadly described by the Government in its report, the right to strike is not limited to collective disputes relating to the negotiation of an enterprise collective agreement, and therefore in situations in which the defence of the collective interests of workers goes beyond the scope of a single enterprise it is especially important for federations and confederations to be accorded all the guarantees envisaged in the Convention. In light of the above, the Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures in the near future to amend section 417 of the Substantive Labour Code, which prohibits the right to strike of federations and confederations. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any developments in this regard.

Finally, the Committee notes the information provided by the Government on the examination by the international affairs subcommittee of the Standing Committee for Dialogue on Wage and Labour Policies of some of the subjects raised in the present comment. The Committee once again hopes that the work of the subcommittee will facilitate the adoption of the various measures requested by the Committee to give full effect to the Convention. The Committee recalls that the Government may request the technical assistance of the Office in this regard.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1976)

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020). The Committee proceeded to update the examination of the application of the Convention carried out in 2019 on the basis of the supplementary information received from the Government and the social partners this year (see Articles 1, 2 and 4 below).

The Committee notes the observations of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), received on 1 September 2019 and 16 September 2020, the joint observations of the Single Confederation of Workers of Colombia (CUT) and the Confederation of Workers of Colombia (CTC), received on 1 September 2019 and 1 October 2020, the observations of the General Confederation of Labour (CGT), received on 5 September 2019, and the joint observations of the ITUC, the Trade Union Confederation of the Americas, CUT and CTC, received on 1 September 2017. The Committee notes that these various observations relate to matters examined by the Committee in the present observation, as well as allegations of violations of the Convention in practice, and in particular allegations of anti-union dismissals in the private sector. The Committee notes the replies of the Government in this regard.

The Committee also takes note of the joint observations of the Colombian Association of Civil Aviators (ACDAC), the ITUC and the CTC, received on 22 March 2019 and the Government's reply thereto. The Committee also takes note of the observations of the International Transport Federation (ITF) and its affiliated organizations: ACDAC, the Colombian Association of Flight Attendants (ACAV) and the Union of Air Transport Workers of Colombia (SINTRATAC) received on 4 September 2019, which concern, on the one hand, facts related to Case No. 3316 before the Committee on Freedom of Association and, on the other hand, issues addressed in this comment.

The Committee finally notes the joint observations of the International Organisation of Employers (IOE) and the National Employers' Association of Colombia (ANDI), received on 30 August 2019 and the observations of the ANDI forwarded by the IOE on 1 October 2020, relating to matters examined within the context of the present observation.

Article 1 of the Convention. Adequate protection against anti-union discrimination. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the allegations by the CUT, CTC and CGT concerning the absence of mechanisms to provide effective protection against anti-union discrimination, and particularly: (i) the slowness and ineffectiveness of the examination by the Ministry of Labour of administrative labour disputes; (ii) the absence, with the exception of the procedure for the lifting of trade union protection, applicable solely to trade union leaders, of any expeditious judicial means of protection against acts of anti-union discrimination and interference; and (iii) the lack of protection from the Office of the Public Prosecutor in relation to the application of section 200 of the Penal Code, which criminalizes a series of anti-union acts. In view of the above, the Committee invited the Government, in consultation with the social partners, to launch a comprehensive examination of the means of protection against anti-union discrimination with a view to the adoption of the necessary measures to ensure adequate protection in this regard.

In this regard, the Committee notes that, in their observations of 2019, the national trade union confederations reiterate their previous allegations and that the CUT and CTC specifically allege that: (i) the time taken by the labour administration to examine administrative labour disputes is excessively long, and in certain cases over 1,400 days have passed before the administration takes action; (ii) such long delays can be especially harmful for the protection of trade union rights since, under the terms of section 52 of the Code of Administrative Procedure and Administrative Disputes, the powers of the authorities to impose penalties expires after three years; and (iii) the recently adopted National Development Plan contains provisions that are likely to weaken even further the effectiveness of action by the labour inspection services. The Committee also notes that the CUT and CTC state in their 2020 observations that, of the requests submitted to the labour administration in 2020 by trade unions or by workers, less than 5 per cent are being investigated and only 1 per cent have progressed towards penalties for the employer's conduct.

The Committee notes the information provided by the Government on the institutional initiatives adopted to combat anti-union violence and on the application of section 200 of the Penal Code, which are examined within the context of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87). The Committee also notes that the Government adds in its comments to the 2019 observations of the workers' organizations that: (i) in order to improve the procedures and time frames for administrative investigations by labour inspectors, technical inspection tools were designed to promote the standardization of investigation and sanctioning procedures; and (ii) the recently adopted provisions modifying the administrative sanctioning procedure in labour matters and that are criticized by the trade union confederations are intended to decongest administrative labour actions by suspending the administrative procedure when those investigated undertake to implement the required corrective measures within a reasonable time. The Committee also notes that the Government, in its supplementary information of 2020, provides data on the functioning of the labour inspectorate in general regarding information systems used by the labour inspectorate to record and organize its investigations and ensure the enforcement of fines, and also information on virtual training initiatives for inspectors. The Committee finally notes that, in its comments on the 2020 observations of the CUT and the CTC, the Government denies that there is any inefficiency in the performance of the labour inspectorate in the area of anti-union discrimination, since significant progress has been made in the protection of these rights through the corresponding administrative investigations. The Government states in this respect that, between 1 January and 15 October 2020, 47 administrative labour complaints have been filed regarding anti-union acts, all of which are currently in the preliminary investigation phase.

While duly noting this information, the Committee observes that the Government provides limited information concerning the concrete results achieved by the labour administration in response to complaints of anti-union discrimination, that it does not provide comments on the role of the labour courts in this respect, and that it does not refer to the conduct of a comprehensive examination of the existing means of protection against anti-union discrimination. Recalling the fundamental importance of protection against anti-union discrimination for the effective exercise of freedom of association, the Committee urges the Government, in consultation with the social partners, to launch in the near future a comprehensive examination of the means of protection against anti-union discrimination with a view to the adoption of the necessary measures to ensure rapid imposition of effective sanctions in the event of the commission of anti-union acts. The Committee trusts that the Government will report any developments in this regard in its next report.

Articles 2 and 4. Collective accords with non-unionized workers. The Committee recalls that it has been requesting the Government to take measures since 2003 to ensure that collective agreements with non-unionized workers (collective accords) can only be concluded in the absence of trade union organizations. The Committee notes that the Government indicates once again in its various reports that, in accordance with the legislation and the case law of the Constitutional Court: (i) both collective accords (concluded with non-unionized workers) and collective agreements (concluded with trade unions) are instruments of collective bargaining, on the understanding that the recognition of the right to collective bargaining should not exclude non-unionized workers; (ii) employers are free to conclude collective accords with non-unionized workers, except where there is a union representing at least one-third of the personnel (section 481 of the Substantive Labour Code); and (iii) the terms and conditions negotiated in collective accords and agreements have to be equal to prevent any anti-union discrimination and any breach of the principle of equality. The Committee notes that the Government adds in the information provided in 2019 that: (i) there were 639 collective accords in force in the country in 2019; (ii) the number of collective accords concluded per year has been reduced by 53 per cent between 2015 (372 accords created) and 2018 (198); (iii) 115 collective accords were deposited from January to September 2019; (iv) Resolution 3783 of 29 September 2017 of the Ministry of Labour granted functions to the Special Investigation Unit of the Ministry of Labour to investigate the misuse of collective accords; and (v) the Special Investigation Unit had undertaken 27 investigations into the improper use of collective accords, with 22 cases at the stage of preliminary investigation, while charges have been brought in three cases, in one of which the charges were upheld and in another a conviction was handed down. The Committee also notes that the ANDI agrees with the Government's indication and considers that workers must be free to choose the form of association that they wish to have for the purposes of negotiating collectively. The ANDI also emphasizes that collective accords cannot be used to elude trade union membership. The Committee also notes in this regard the updated information supplied by the Government in its supplementary report of 2020 and in the replies to the observations of the trade union confederations. In particular, the Government indicates that: (i) the Special Investigation Unit of the Ministry of Labour is currently conducting seven investigations into the improper use of collective accords (one at the stage of upholding of charges, three at the stage of preliminary investigation, and three at the stage of notification of the first decision); and (ii) a total of 141 investigations on this subject are under way at the regional departments of the Ministry of Labour.

The Committee also notes the indication by the CGT that: (i) although collective accords are governed by the same provisions of the Substantive Labour Code as collective agreements in terms of the collective bargaining process, in most cases there is no such bargaining, as the accord is drawn up directly by the enterprise or its trusted personnel; (ii) collective accords are usually promoted to prevent the independent organization of workers in a union and their conclusion usually has the effect of drastically reducing the number of unionized workers; and (iii) despite the case law of the Constitutional Court in this regard, the labour administration and the Office of the Public Prosecutor fail to investigate complaints of anti-union practices in which collective accords are known as "voluntary benefit plans", an assertion denied by the Government in its comments to the observations of the trade union confederations. Finally, the Committee notes that the CUT and CTC: (i) stated in their 2019 observations that 68 administrative complaints were lodged for the improper use of collective accords between 2014 and 2017, of which 35 have been shelved, 24 are still under investigation, and sanctions have been imposed in only nine cases; (ii) stated in their 2020 observations that a major increase had been recorded in 2019 in the number of collective accords concluded (222) by comparison with 2018 (198) and 2017 (141) and that the number of administrative sanctioning procedures for misuse of collective accords being handled by the Special Investigation Unit of the Ministry of Labour is derisory if compared with the number of collective accords filed in recent years; and (iii) referred to the Supreme Court ruling SL 3597-2020 of 16 September 2020 in which the Supreme Court condemned an airline company for anti-union acts committed against the company union and asserted that this court decision highlights how collective accords or voluntary benefit plans entered into with non-unionized workers would be used to violate freedom of association.

Noting that there has been no progress in giving effect to its comments, the Committee is bound to recall once again that in Article 4 the Convention recognizes, as the parties to collective bargaining, employers or their organizations, on the one hand, and workers' organizations, on the other, in recognition that the latter offer guarantees of independence that may be absent in other forms of association. The Committee has therefore always considered that direct bargaining between the enterprise and unorganized groups of workers, in avoidance of workers' organizations, where they exist, is not in accordance with the promotion of collective bargaining, as envisaged in Article 4 of the Convention. Moreover, based on the situation in various countries, the Committee has observed that in practice the negotiation of terms and conditions of employment and work by groups that do not offer sufficient guarantees to be considered as workers' organizations can be used to undermine the exercise of freedom of association and weaken the existence of workers' organizations with the capacity to defend the interests of workers independently through collective bargaining. In light of the above, the Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the conclusion of collective accords with non-unionized workers (pactos colectivos) can only be possible in the absence of trade union organizations. The Committee requests the Government to report any developments in this regard.

Article 4. Personal scope of collective bargaining. Apprentices. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the remuneration of apprentices is not excluded by law from the scope of collective bargaining. The Committee notes the Government's indication that: (i) Act No. 789 of 2002, which establishes the figure of the apprenticeship contract, clearly states that apprentices are students and not workers; (ii) therefore, an apprenticeship contract is not a contract of employment, but is a special contract under labour legislation subject to its own rules, and not the provisions of the substantive Labour Code; and (iii) in ruling C-038 of 2004, the Constitutional Court found that apprentices are not workers in the strict sense and the exclusion of their remuneration from the scope of collective bargaining is a proportional restriction to the requirement imposed by law for enterprises to recruit a certain number of apprentices. Observing that, according to the ruling referred to above, apprentices are able to negotiate their remuneration on an individual basis, and recalling once again that the Convention does not exclude apprentices from its scope of application and that the parties to collective bargaining should therefore be able to decide to include the subject of their remuneration in their collective agreements, the Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the remuneration of apprentices is not excluded by law from the scope of collective bargaining.

Subjects covered by collective bargaining. Exclusion of pensions. The Committee recalls that, in the same way as the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 2434, it has had the occasion to comment on several occasions on the impact of the reform of Article 48 of the Constitution of Colombia by Legislative Act No. 01 of 2005 on the application of the present Convention, as well as on the Collective Bargaining Convention, 1981 (No. 154). In its previous comment, recalling that the establishment by law of a general compulsory pensions scheme is compatible with collective bargaining by means of a complementary system, the Committee requested the Government to take the necessary measures so that the parties to collective bargaining, in both the private and the public sectors, are not prohibited from improving pensions through supplementary benefits.

The Committee notes the Government's indication in this regard that Legislative Act No. 1 of 2005 prohibits, from the entry into force of the Legislative Act, the establishment in accords, collective labour agreements, awards or any legal acts of pension conditions that differ from those set out in the laws governing the General Pensions System, although this prohibition does not prevent the parties to collective bargaining from being able, in both the private and the public sectors, to improve pensions through supplementary benefits based on voluntary savings, which do not give rise to different pension conditions from those set out by the General System, but increase the capital necessary to obtain a better pension through individual efforts. The Committee takes due note of these indications and requests the Government to provide specific examples of collective agreements which provide for supplementary pension benefits.

Promotion of collective bargaining in the public sector. The Committee notes with satisfaction the Government's indication of the conclusion with all the confederations in the country of a new National State Agreement covering 1,200,000 workers in the public sector, which provides for a wage rise of 1.32 per cent above the inflation rate for 2019 and 2020, as well as a series of other improvements at the national and sectoral levels. The Committee notes that the three national trade union confederations (although the CUT and CTC indicate certain difficulties in relation to local bodies) welcome the significant progress in collective bargaining in the public sector, which is due to the existence of multi-level bargaining with an erga omnes effect at the national level. According to the trade union confederations, this mechanism should be extended to collective bargaining in the private sector.

Promotion of collective bargaining in the private sector. The Committee recalls that, in its previous comments, it noted with concern the very low level of coverage of collective bargaining in the private sector, as indicated by the national trade union confederations. The Committee also noted the indication by the trade union confederations that a series of both legal and practical obstacles and inadequacies resulted in the complete absence of collective bargaining above the enterprise level, which in turn contributed to the very low coverage of collective bargaining in the private sector. The Committee requested the Government to take the necessary measures to promote the use of collective bargaining, in accordance with the Convention.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that: (i) according to data from trade union registers, detailed by sector of activity and regions, there are 781 collective agreements in force in the private sector; (ii) the number of collective agreements deposited between January and September 2019 was 268; between 1 January and 15 October 2020, a total of 158 collective agreements were deposited; (iii) the Ministry of Labour does not yet have a system enabling it to determine the coverage rate of collective bargaining but, with the support of Canada and the Office, it is developing a system for the registration of collective accords, trade union contracts and collective agreements which will provide such information by the end of 2019; (iv) the provisions of the Substantive Labour Code relating to the extension of collective agreements show that it is possible to bargain at the sectoral level; (v) although there is no text specifically regulating bargaining at the branch level, there is a successful case of collective bargaining in the country in the banana sector in the Urabá region covering 15,000 of the 17,600 workers concerned; and (vi) with technical assistance from the Platform of Social Organizations for Decent Work and the ILO, the CUT and the CTC began a major project to disseminate multilevel collective bargaining in the country at the end of the second half of 2018. The Committee also notes the Government's indication that, with a view to ensuring that unions have a strong capacity for negotiation and guaranteeing that these procedures are flexible and effective, it is proposed to amend Decree No. 089 of 2014, which promotes unified bargaining within the enterprise, to make it compulsory to submit unified claims and establish a single negotiating committee composed of members of all the trade unions. The Committee notes the Government's indication that, after referring the proposed amendment to the Office for comments, tripartite consultations are being held on its content.

The Committee also notes the indication by the CUT and CTC in their 2019 observations that: (i) according to the estimates of the National Trade Union School, only 1.75 per cent of the economically active population and 3.67 per cent of employees are covered by collective agreements; (ii) the absence of regulations governing collective bargaining at the branch level in the private sector renders it impossible in practice, which makes a decisive contribution to the very low coverage level; and (iii) the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD) Employment, Labour and Social Affairs Committee has requested the Government to promote a system of bargaining on two levels and to include provisions for sectoral bargaining in the Labour Code.

Noting with regret that, according to the data provided by the trade union confederations, the level of coverage of collective bargaining in the private sector continues to be very low, the Committee notes a significant contrast in this regard with the situation in the public sector. The Committee recalls that: (i) under the terms of Article 4 of the Convention, it is the responsibility of the Government to take measures appropriate to national conditions, where necessary, to encourage and promote the full development and utilization of machinery for voluntary negotiation between employers or employers' organizations, on the one hand, and workers' organizations, on the other, with a view to the regulation of terms and conditions of employment by means of collective agreements; and (ii) in accordance with Article 5(2)(d) of Convention No. 154, which has been ratified by Colombia, the Government is required to ensure that collective bargaining is not hampered by the absence of rules governing the procedure to be used or by the inadequacy or inappropriateness of such rules.

While welcoming the Government's initiative to provide a framework for more flexible collective bargaining procedures at the enterprise level in a context of trade union pluralism, the Committee considers it necessary for the Government to address in the near future, in consultation with the social partners, all of the aspects which could hamper the effective promotion of collective bargaining in the private sector, as indicated in the Committee's comments concerning the Convention. Encouraged by the results achieved in the public sector, the Committee requests the Government, in consultation with the social partners, to take all measures in the near future, including legislative measures where appropriate, to promote the use of collective bargaining in the private sector at all appropriate levels. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the progress achieved in this regard and recalls that it may have recourse to the technical assistance of the Office.

Settlement of disputes. Committee for the Handling of Conflicts referred to the ILO (CETCOIT). The Committee notes the information provided in 2019 and 2020 by the Government and the ANDI and in 2020 by the CUT and CTC on the activities of the CETCOIT, a tripartite body for the resolution of disputes relating to freedom of association and collective bargaining. The Committee notes with interest the Government's indication that: (i) between 2012 and 2017, the CETCOIT examined 191 cases, reaching 123 agreements; (ii) following the unanimous appointment of a new facilitator in April 2018, the CETCOIT is continuing its work effectively, and examined 24 cases in 2018, reaching 14 agreements; (iii) from 2012 to 2019, the CETCOIT has achieved the conclusion of agreements in 63 per cent of the cases examined; and (iv) in the context of the COVID-19 pandemic, the CETCOIT has continued to meet, achieving in particular in the 18 meetings held in 2020 the conclusion of 11 agreements and seven follow-up protocols. Lastly, the Committee notes that: (i) the ANDI, CUT and CTC indicate that the CETCOIT is an example of good practice in social dialogue which reflects the will of all the tripartite partners to make progress in seeking solutions to disputes; and (ii) at the same time, the CUT and CTC add that workers may be demotivated because of not feeling the necessary support for the agreements achieved and because of the lack of any penalties associated with this kind of extrajudicial mechanism in the event of non-compliance. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing information in this regard.

Observing that, in its report on Convention No. 87, the Government indicated that the international affairs subcommittee of the Standing Committee for Dialogue on Wage and Labour Policies will follow-up on the examination of the comments made by the Committee of Experts on the application of the Conventions ratified by Colombia, the Committee hopes that the work of the subcommittee will facilitate the adoption of the various measures requested by the Committee to give full effect to the Convention. The Committee recalls that the Government may request technical assistance of the Office in this regard.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

[The Government is asked to reply in full to the present comment in 2021.]

Comoros

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1978)

The Committee notes that the Government's report contains no reply to its previous comments. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments.

The Committee notes the observations of the Workers' Confederation of Comoros (CTC), received on 1 August 2017, relating to matters examined by the Committee in the present observation, and it requests the Government to provide its comments in this regard. The Committee notes that, in response to the observations of the CTC in 2013, the Government indicates that the trade union leaders who had been dismissed have been reinstated. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments on the other matters raised by the CTC, and particularly the allegations of employer pressure against trade union leaders of the CTC, the Union of Health and Education Workers and a new trade union in a communications enterprise to persuade them to end their trade union activities.

Articles 4 and 6 of the Convention. Promotion of collective bargaining in the private and public sectors (employees of public enterprises and public servants not engaged in the administration of the State). In its previous comments, the Committee once again regretted the absence of progress in relation to collective bargaining which, according to the CTC, was not structured and had no framework at any level, and particularly that joint bodies in the public service had still not been established. The Committee notes that the CTC in its 2017 observations makes particular reference to decrees and implementing orders covering the Higher Council of the Public Service, the Joint Commission and the Medical Commission established to provide a framework for bargaining, but which have still not been signed following their preparation in 2015, thereby opening the way for regulations and measures which are not in conformity with the law to the prejudice of employees of the public service. While taking note of the request made by the Government in its report for technical assistance, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to promote collective bargaining in both the private and the public sectors (employees of public enterprises and public servants not engaged in the administration of the State). The Committee requests the Government to provide information on this subject.

The Committee notes the adoption of the Act of 28 June 2012 repealing, amending and supplementing certain provisions of Act No. 84-108/PR issuing the Labour Code.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Congo

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee notes with deep concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments. The Committee informs the Government that, if it has not supplied replies to the points raised by 1 September 2021, then it may proceed with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the information at its disposal at its next session.

The Committee notes the Government's reply to the allegations made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in 2014 concerning a strike by teachers that reportedly resulted in: (i) the arbitrary arrest of teachers who are trade unionists by the Directorate-General for Territorial Surveillance (DGST); and (ii) the abduction in June 2013 of Mr Dominique Ntsienkoulou, a member of the Dialogue Group for the Redevelopment of the Teaching Profession (CRPE), by officials of the Provincial Directorate for Territorial Surveillance (DDST) and his subsequent disappearance. The Committee notes that, according to the Government: (i) the Directorate-General of the Police (and not the DGST) summoned the leaders of the CRPE to explain the reasons for their excessive action during the strike; and (ii) Mr Ntsienkoulou left his home on his own initiative and was never arrested, abducted or investigated by the national police services. In light of the divergent information provided by the ITUC and the Government, the Committee wishes to recall that the public authorities must not interfere in the legitimate activities of trade union organizations by subjecting workers to arrest or arbitrary detention, and that the arrest and detention of trade unionists, without any charges being brought or without a warrant, constitute a serious violation of the trade union rights enshrined in the Convention. The Committee trusts that the Government will ensure that these principles are fully respected and urgently requests it to further investigate the situation of Mr Ntsienkoulou, particularly as to his safety and whereabouts and to provide information in this respect.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee expects that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Costa Rica

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020) which concerns matters addressed in the direct request, which accompanies this observation.

The Committee also notes the observations of the Costa Rican Federation of Chambers and Associations of Private Enterprise (UCCAEP) transmitted by the Government, as well as the observations of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), received on 16 September 2020, the Confederation of Workers Rerum Novarum (CTRN) and the National Association of Nursing Professionals (ANPE), both received on 30 September 2020, all relating to the matters raised by the Committee in its direct request. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments in relation to the observations of the CTRN, ITUC and ANPE, as well as in relation to the observations of the CTRN of 2019.

The Committee reiterates the content of its observation adopted in 2019, which is repeated below.

In its latest comment, the Committee took note of the adoption of the Labour Proceedings Reform Act No. 9343 and noted with satisfaction that the Act amended the percentage of workers required to declare a strike. The Committee notes the Government's indication that, in November 2017, Executive Decree No. 40749 was issued, which regulates the call to vote required in order to exercise the right to strike, in accordance with the provisions of the Labour Proceedings Reform Act.

Pending legislative issues. Articles 2 and 4 of the Convention. The Committee recalls that for years its comments have referred to the following issues:

– Registration of trade unions and acquisition of legal personality. The Committee indicated to the Government the need to amend section 344 of the Labour Code to establish a short, specific period for the administrative authority to reach a decision on the registration of trade unions, after which, in the absence of a decision, they are deemed to have obtained legal personality. In this regard, the Committee notes the Government's indication that, although this situation has been remedied both in practice and in administrative law, the Committee's comments will be taken into account.

– Right of organizations freely to elect their representatives. Obligation for the trade union assembly to appoint the executive board each year (section 346(a) of the Labour Code). The Committee has drawn the attention of the Government to the need to amend section 346(a) of the Labour Code, which requires the executive board of trade unions to be appointed every year. In this regard, the Committee notes the Government's indication that although this article has not been amended, the Register of Civil Organizations does not apply this provision and the Ministry of Labour and Social Security, in practice, guarantees organizations full autonomy in determining the term of their executive boards.
– Prohibition on foreigners from holding office or exercising authority in trade unions (article 60(2) of the Constitution and section 345(e) of the Labour Code). The Committee indicated to the Government the need to amend article 60(2) of the Constitution and section 345(e) of the Labour Code, which prohibit foreigners from holding office or exercising authority in trade unions. The Committee recalls that a proposed constitutional reform had been submitted to the plenary of the Legislative Assembly to resolve this issue (legislative file No. 17804). The Committee notes the Government's indication that the above-mentioned proposed constitutional reform was shelved on 17 October 2018. The Government indicates that this decision followed a decision made by the Speaker of the Legislative Assembly, who ordered that bills that had exceeded the four-year deadline on that date should be shelved, in conformity with section 119 of the Regulations of the Legislative Assembly. The Government also indicates that it will undertake an assessment to consider the submission of a new constitutional reform proposal in the terms referred to by the Committee. The Government adds that, in practice, the Department of Civil Organizations in the Ministry of Labour and Social Security registers the appointment of foreigners to the executive bodies of trade unions when it is demonstrated that they comply with the legal requirements.

Observing that no specific progress has been made in relation to the matters indicated, the Committee once again requests the Government to take all necessary measures to amend the above-mentioned provisions of the Labour Code and the Constitution in conformity with the Convention, as well as with the practice followed by the authorities. It requests the Government to provide information on developments in this respect.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee notes the observations of the Workers' Union of Banco Popular (SIBANPO), the Confederation of Workers Rerum Novarum (CTRN), as well as the joint observations of Juanito Mora Porras Trade Union Federation (CSJMP) and the National Association of Nursing Professionals (ANPE) received on 29 and 30 September, and 1 October 2020 respectively. The Committee notes that, in addition to addressing the matters examined in this comment, the observations refer to the impact that Act No. 9635 on strengthening public finances, in force since July 2019, and Bill No. 21336 on public employment would have on the exercise of the rights guaranteed by the Convention. Noting the repeated observations of trade union organizations denouncing the restrictions that run counter to the Convention to the right to collective bargaining of public servants not engaged in the administration of the State, the Committee requests the Government to provide its comments in this respect. It also requests it to provide information on the development of the aforementioned Bill on public employment and trusts that within its framework the guarantees of the Convention will be taken fully into account.

As it has not received supplementary information from the Government, the Committee reiterates the content of its comment adopted in 2019 and repeated as follows:

The Committee notes the Government's replies to the 2014 observations of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) and the 2016 observations of the CTRN. The Committee also notes the detailed observations of the CTRN, received on 31 August 2019, related to matters addressed by the Committee in the present comment. The Committee further notes the joint observations of the Costa Rican Federation of Chambers and Associations of Private Enterprise (UCCAEP) and the International Organisation of Employers (IOE), received on 2 September 2019, and notes the Government's reply to those observations.

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Adequate protection against acts of anti-union discrimination and interference. In its most recent comment, the Committee noted with satisfaction that Act No. 9343 on reforming labour procedures, which entered into force in July 2017, introduced amendments with the objective of making judicial procedures relating to acts of anti-union discrimination more expeditious and effective. The Committee notes the Government's indication that this Act introduced a special, expedited and preventive procedure for cases of anti-union discrimination, which are dealt with as a matter of priority and following a specific procedure, both by the administrative and judicial authorities. The Committee notes the statistical data provided by the Government and notes that: (i) between 2016 and 2019, the labour inspectorate processed a total of 67 cases of anti-union harassment or unfair labour practices; (ii) the procedures for these cases were before the administrative authorities for 104 days on average; (iii) between July 2017 and May 2019, a total of 207 files related to special protection cases were submitted to the judicial authorities, 59 of which were for anti-union discrimination; and (iv) on average, procedures for anti-union discrimination cases were before the judicial authorities for 128 days, from the submission of the file until the ruling of the Second Chamber of the Supreme Court of Justice. Recalling that, in previous years, the Committee noted that the slowness of procedures in cases of anti-union discrimination resulted in a period of not less than four years being required to obtain a final court ruling, the Committee notes with satisfaction the statistical information provided by the Government, which bears witness to the practical impact of the procedural reform. The Committee also notes that the Government hopes to be able to provide information on the nature of the penalties and compensation at a later date. The Committee, encouraged by the developments regarding the length of procedures, requests the Government to continue providing statistics on the number of cases of discrimination examined and the length of the procedures, and also to provide information on the nature of the penalties and compensation imposed.

Article 4. Collective bargaining in the public sector. Public servants not engaged in the administration of the State. The Committee recalls that, for many years, it has been expressing concern with regard to the frequent use of legal actions for unconstitutionality to challenge the validity of collective agreements concluded in the public sector. In its last comment, the Committee had taken note that the Office of the Comptroller General of the Republic had lodged a legal action for unconstitutionality against a collective agreement of a public sector bank and that the legal action was still pending. The Committee notes that this issue was examined recently by the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 3243 and refers to the recommendations made by that Committee in its 391st report of October 2019. The Committee also notes the Government's indication that it is continuing to implement the policy for the revision of collective agreements in the public sector, initiated in 2014, with the objective of avoiding recourse to legal procedures and seeking, through social dialogue, to streamline and adapt them to the country's fiscal reality and austerity policy. The Government further indicates that the parties, after denouncing their collective agreements, renegotiate a new agreement, in line with the parameters of reasonableness and proportionality established by the Constitutional Chamber, which diminishes the possibility of the collective agreements being challenged later through constitutional action. In this regard, the Government reports that, during 2018 and until May 2019, the Department of Labour Relations of the Directorate of Labour Affairs approved 19 collective agreements in the public sector. The Committee also notes that, in its observations, the CTRN denounces a series of violations to the right of public servants to negotiate collectively their terms and conditions of employment. The Committee notes that the issues to which the CTRN refers to in its observations, coincide with the issues that are the subject of a representation made under article 24 of the ILO Constitution, which is pending.

The Committee emphasizes that, for many years it has been examining a number of obstacles to the full implementation of Article 4 of the Convention in the country's public sector. The Committee recalls, in this regard, that all workers in the public sector who are not engaged in the administration of the State (for example, employees in public enterprises, municipal employees and those in decentralized entities, public sector teachers and transport sector personnel) shall enjoy the right to collective bargaining, including with respect to wages, and that while the special characteristics of the public service require some flexibility, there are mechanisms through which compliance with budgetary limitations can be reconciled with the recognition of the right to collective bargaining.

Recalling its previous observations, the Committee trusts that the Government, in consultation with the representative trade unions in the sector, will take the measures at its disposal to strengthen the right to collective bargaining of public servants not engaged in the administration of the State. The Committee requests the Government to report on any action taken in this regard.

Direct agreements with non-unionized workers. In its previous comments, the Committee noted with concern that, while the number of collective agreements in the private sector remained very low, the number of direct agreements with non-unionized workers was very high. The Committee also noted Ruling No. 12457-2011, which confirmed that direct agreements could not prejudice the negotiation of collective agreements and, consequently, the exercise of freedom of association. In this respect, the Committee notes the Government's indication that compliance with this ruling is mandatory, for both the administrative and judicial authorities and that, accordingly, on 2 May 2012, the labour inspectorate issued Circular No. 018-12, addressed to all the officials of the labour inspectorate, indicating that, in the event that there is a trade union organization and a permanent workers' committee, the inspector shall ensure that there is no violation of freedom of association, and in the event of any conflict or discord that warrants any type of negotiation or conciliation, the inspector shall inform the Directorate of Labour Affairs so that it may follow the applicable procedure under the terms of Ruling No. 12457-2011. The Committee takes note of the statistical data provided by the Government and notes that: (i) between 2014 and April 2019, an average of 30 collective agreements per year were concluded in the private sector and 80 collective agreements per year in the public sector; and (ii) in the period from 2014 to August 2018, an average of 160 direct agreements per year were concluded. The Committee also notes that, while in 2018 some 83 collective agreements were concluded in the public sector and 33 collective agreements in the private sector, covering 153,037 and 14,346 workers respectively, in the same year, 180 direct agreements were concluded, covering 48,239 workers. The Commission further notes that the number of direct agreements has increased over the years: from 118 direct agreements in 2014, to 180 direct agreements in 2018. The Committee recalls that it has always considered that direct bargaining between the enterprise and unorganized groups of workers, in avoidance of workers' organizations, where they exist, is not in accordance with the promotion of collective bargaining, as set out in Article 4 of the Convention. The Committee has also noted that in practice the negotiation of terms and conditions of employment and work by groups which do not fulfil the guarantees required to be considered workers' organizations can be used to undermine the exercise of freedom of association and weaken the existence of workers' organizations with the capacity to defend the interests of workers independently through collective bargaining. Noting that the number of direct agreements has increased considerably in comparison to the number of collective agreements in the private sector, the Committee requests the Government to take all necessary measures, including of a legislative nature, to step up the promotion of collective bargaining with trade union organizations within the meaning of the Convention. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the impact of Circular No. 018-12 of the Labour Inspectorate, as well as any other measures adopted in light of Ruling No. 12457-2011.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1991)

The Committee takes note of the Government's report and the supplementary information provided in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020). The Committee takes due note of the information provided by the Government on measures undertaken to assist the economy and mitigate the social and economic consequences of the COVID-19 pandemic. It further notes that the Government indicates that these measures were adopted in intense dialogue with trade unions and employers' associations and that no changes were introduced to the labour legislation. According to the Government, protection of workers and trade unions has thus remained unchanged and measures taken did not diminish the rights deriving from the Convention. The Committee also notes the information concerning the use of collective bargaining in the context of the COVID-19 pandemic, elements of which are being examined in the present comments.

The Committee had previously noted the observations of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) received on 1 September 2018, according to which private and public sector employers would undermine the collective bargaining process by delaying negotiations, promoting negotiations with yellow unions and concluding agreements directly with works councils, as well as the Government's reply thereto. The Committee requested the Government to provide details on the relationship between the companies' working regulations and the collective agreements negotiated with trade unions. The Committee notes the Government's assertion that: (i) according to the legislation, the employer has an obligation to consult the works council in the process of adopting the company's working regulations; (ii) working regulations are an added value for the protection of workers, especially in sectors with low trade union density (small and medium sized companies) where they constitute the only possibility for workers to regulate their working conditions; (iii) the existence of working regulations does not have any negative impact on the collective bargaining process and trade unions can negotiate with the employer conditions more favourable than those established in the working regulations; and (iv) according to section 160 of the Labour Act, written agreements concluded between the employer and the works council on legal rules governing employment matters do not regulate remuneration, working hours and other matters which are as a rule regulated by a collective agreement. The Committee takes note of this information. It also observes that under section 26 of the Labour Act all employers with at least 20 employees must adopt company working regulations which govern, among other things, questions of remuneration and organization of work, as well as any other issues of importance for the workers of the company, if these issues are not regulated by a collective agreement. The Committee understands from the foregoing elements that while the legislation recognizes, where these exist, the primacy of collective agreements concluded with trade unions, both agreements concluded with works councils and working regulations, subject to consultation with works councils, have a material scope which may coincide with that of collective agreements. Recalling that direct negotiation between the company and its employees aimed at bypassing sufficiently representative organizations, where they exist, may undermine the principle of promoting collective bargaining, as enshrined in the Convention, the Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information on the respective number of company collective agreements concluded with trade unions and agreements concluded with works councils, specifying in each case the number of workers covered.

Article 1 of the Convention. Adequate protection against acts of anti-union discrimination. Rapid appeal procedures. In its previous comments, the Committee observed with concern that the judicial resolution of anti-union discrimination cases was characterized by excessive delays and urged the Government to take, jointly with the competent authorities, effective measures to significantly accelerate the judicial proceedings in cases of anti-union discrimination. The Committee notes the Government's indication that, at the beginning of 2019, there were 20 pending and seven new civil cases related to anti-union discrimination, out of which eight were resolved during the year (one proceeding lasted up to 12 months while seven lasted more than a year). As a result, there were 19 unresolved cases related to anti-union discrimination at the end of 2019. The Government also states that the amendments to the Civil Procedure Act adopted in 2019 aim at harmonizing case law and will contribute to dispute resolution. The Committee trusts that the 2019 amendments to the Civil Procedure Act will contribute to significantly accelerating judicial proceedings in cases of anti-union discrimination and requests the Government to continue providing information on the average duration of the resolution of anti-union discrimination cases.

Articles 4 and 6. Collective bargaining of public servants not engaged in the administration of the State. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to provide updated information on the collective agreements negotiated and signed in the public sector, and to indicate whether the 2 per cent increase in wages of civil and public servants since 2017 was the result of collective bargaining. The Committee notes that the Government indicates that all civil servants (workers employed in the State administration at the central, local and county levels or in other State bodies established to render a civil service) and public servants (workers in State-financed public services both at the central or local levels) are covered by collective agreements. The Government further mentions that, in addition to a basic collective agreement applicable to public servants, specific agreements were concluded in the following sectors: social care; health and health insurance; elementary schools and high schools; science and higher education; cultural institutions financed from the State budget; the Croatian Employment Service and the Croatian Pension Insurance Institute. The Committee welcomes this information and further notes that 83 collective agreements were concluded with the municipality, the town or the county as one of the parties and that most of the state-owned companies are also covered by collective agreements.

As for the 2017 increase in wages, the Committee notes that the Government clarifies that while the increase for civil servants was agreed to in a collective agreement, the raise for public servants was determined by a special Decision based on the Act on Salary Base in Public Services, since there was no agreement between the Government and the unions in the public sector. The Government further indicates that: i) at the end of 2018, an additional increase in salary was agreed to in collective bargaining agreements for both categories of workers; (ii) in 2019, trade unions representing civil and public servants agreed to a further increase in salaries for 2020; (iii) in the context of the COVID-19 pandemic, trade unions in public services agreed to conclude an Annex to the Basic Collective Agreement which states that the increase of the basic salary will be postponed to 2021; and (iv) trade unions in the civil service also agreed to the same postponement in their collective agreement.

The Committee takes due note of this information and invites the Government to continue to encourage collective bargaining in the public sector, especially for public servants not engaged in the administration of the State, including with respect to remuneration.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Djibouti

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1978)

The Committee notes with concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments.

The Committee notes the observations of the General Union of Djibouti Workers (UGTD) and the Labour Union of Djibouti (UDT), received on 23 August 2019, and of Education International (EI), received on 20 September 2019, containing grave allegations of anti-union repression. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments in this respect.

Article 3 of the Convention. Right of workers' organizations to organize their administration and activities in full freedom. In its previous comments, the Committee asked the Government to indicate the reasons for the arrest at Djibouti airport in May 2014 of Mr Adan Mohamed Abdou, Secretary-General of the Labour Union of Djibouti (UDT), who was to attend the 103rd Session of the International Labour Conference (May–June 2014) as an International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) observer, and whose travel documents and luggage were confiscated. The Government merely indicated that it does not recognize Mr Mohamed Abdou's status as a worker representative as he is an elected Member of Parliament. In its last report, the Government indicates that it is in the process of gathering the necessary information to explain why Mr Mohamed Abdou was prohibited from leaving the country. The Committee recalls that leaders of organizations of workers and employers should enjoy appropriate facilities for carrying out their functions, including the right to leave the country when their activities on behalf of the persons they represent so require; moreover, the free movement of these representatives should be ensured by the authorities. Noting with regret the failure to provide the requested information more than three years after the events, the Committee expects that the Government will indicate without delay the reasons why Mr Mohamed Abdou was prohibited from leaving the country, which prevented him from participating in the International Labour Conference in May and June 2014, and specify whether this prohibition has been lifted.

Trade union situation in Djibouti. The Committee also notes the conclusions of the Credentials Committee at the 106th Session of the International Labour Conference (June 2017) regarding an objection concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegation of Djibouti. In this respect, the Committee notes with concern the Credentials Committee's indication that confusion continues to reign over the trade union landscape in Djibouti. The Credentials Committee particularly refers to the information provided by the appealing organizations indicating that the situation of trade unions has deteriorated and that the phenomenon of "clone unions" (trade unions established with the Government's support) now also affects primary unions. In this respect, the Committee recalls that the trade union situation in Djibouti has been the subject of concerns expressed by the supervisory bodies, including the Committee on Freedom of Association, since many years. Noting that the Conference Committee calls upon the ILO supervisory bodies to take all necessary measures to provide, with the cooperation of the Government, before the next session of the Conference, a reliable, comprehensive and up-to-date assessment of the situation of trade union movements and freedom of association in Djibouti, the Committee expects that the Government will ensure the development of free and independent trade unions in conformity with the Convention and that it will take all necessary measures to allow for an evaluation of the trade union situation in Djibouti, with the technical assistance of the Office if it so desires.

Legislative issues. The Committee recalls that its comments have focused, for many years, on the need to take measures to amend the following legislative provisions:

– section 5 of the Act on Associations, which requires organizations to obtain authorization prior to their establishment as trade unions; and – section 23 of Decree No. 83-099/PR/FP of 10 September 1983, which confers upon the President of the Republic broad powers to requisition public officials.

Noting with regret that the Government confines itself to indicating that it is planning a revision of the Labour Code, the Committee expects that the Government will take the necessary measures to amend the above provisions and that it will indicate in its next report specific progress in this regard.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Dominican Republic

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1956)

The Committee notes the joint observations of the National Confederation of Trade Union Unity (CNUS), the Autonomous Confederation of Workers' Unions (CASC) and the National Confederation of Dominican Workers (CNTD), received on 1 October 2020, which allege that practical difficulties persist in obtaining the registration of trade union organizations, particularly in the tourist transport sector. The Committee requests the Government to send its comments on this matter.

The Committee also takes note of the supplementary report sent by the Government in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020), which does not add any information on the outstanding issues. The Committee therefore reiterates the content of its observation adopted in 2019, which is reproduced below.

The Committee notes the observations of the CNUS, the CASC and the CNTD, of 3 September 2018 and 5 September 2019, addressed in the present observation.

Application of the Convention in practice. The Committee duly notes that the Government, in its responses to the observations of 2013 of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) relating to acts of violence and threats against leaders of the National Union of Workers of Frito Lay Dominicana (SINTRALAYDO), indicates that: (i) the investigations conducted did not establish the existence of acts of violence or threats against trade union leaders; (ii) the charges against the company were never reported on the various occasions that the union and company participated in round table negotiations led by the Directorate of Mediation and Arbitration; and (iii) the Labour Inspectorate did, in fact, note unfair practices in the sector and imposed the appropriate penalties. With respect to the 2016 observations of the CASC, CNUS and CNTD on the practical obstacles to obtaining legal personality for trade unions, the Government indicates that in 2013 all registration applications were granted and that between 2014 and 2016 the registration applications of three trade unions were rejected as they did not comply with substantive criteria (they did not corroborate their members' worker status or comply with the minimum number of 20 workers).

Legislative issues. The Committee recalls that for a number of years it has been requesting the Government to take the necessary steps to amend the following legislative provisions which are not in conformity with Articles 2, 3 and 5 of the Convention:

– section 84(I) of the regulations implementing the Civil Service and Administrative Careers Act (Decree No. 523-09), which maintains the requirement to affiliate at least 40 per cent of the total number of employees enjoying the right to organize in the institution concerned, in order to be able to establish an organization of civil servants;

– section 407(3) of the Labour Code, which requires at least 51 per cent of workers' votes in the enterprise in order to call a strike; and – section 383 of the Labour Code, which requires federations to obtain the votes of two-thirds of their members to be able to establish confederations.

The Committee also recalls that in its previous comments, it had noted that the Commission for Reviewing and Updating the Labour Code, established in 2013, was at that time engaged in discussions and consultations, that the amendments proposed had been discussed by the Labour Advisory Committee and that on 1 July 2016 a tripartite agreement was signed in order to establish a Round Table on Matters relating to International Labour Standards, the main objective of which is to ensure observance of international labour standards. The Committee notes that, according to the Government, meetings have been held by the Ministry of Labour and the Ministry of Public Administration in the public sector aimed at bringing legislation governing this sector into line with international conventions; that the Commission for Reviewing and Updating the Labour Code is continuing with consultations and discussions in the private sector; and that tripartite meetings have been held with a view to possibly reforming the Code. The Committee also notes that, in their observations of 2018 and 2019, the CASC, CNUS and CNTD criticize the functioning both of the Commission for Reviewing and Updating the Labour Code and the Round Table on Matters relating to International Labour Standards, questioning their effectiveness and claiming that there is a reluctance to engage in dialogue.

The Committee refers to its observation within the framework of the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144), relating to the functioning of the Commission for Reviewing and Updating the Labour Code and the Round Table on Matters relating to International Labour Standards. The Committee expresses the strong hope that, through effective social dialogue, the new Labour Code and new legislation governing workers in the public sector will be adopted in the very near future and that, taking into account the Committee's comments, these legislative revisions will be in full conformity with the provisions of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on all progress made in this respect and recalls that the Government may, if it so wishes, seek technical assistance from the Office.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1953)

The Committee notes the joint observations of the National Confederation of Trade Union Unity (CNUS), the Autonomous Confederation of Workers' Unions (CASC) and the National Confederation of Dominican Workers (CNTD), received on 1 October 2020, which denounce ongoing anti-union acts, particularly anti-union dismissals, as well as acts of interference in two enterprises in the poultry sector and the tourist transport sector. In addition, the above-mentioned trade union organizations denounce the standstill of the Roundtable on Matters relating to International Labour Standards and the non-compliance with collective agreements in certain enterprises owing to the COVID-19 pandemic. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments in this respect.

The Committee also takes note of the supplementary report provided by the Government in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020), which does not add new elements to the matters pending within the framework of the application of the present Convention. The Committee therefore repeats the content of its observation adopted in 2019, which read as follows.

The Committee notes the observations of the CNUS, the CASC and the CNTD, dated 31 August 2018 and 3 September 2019, which refer, firstly, to issues addressed in this observation and, secondly, to allegations of repeated acts of anti-union discrimination during the negotiation process of a collective agreement and the lack of material resources of labour inspectors. Noting the repeated nature of the allegations of anti-union discrimination, the Committee requests the Government to provide its comments in this respect.

The Committee notes the replies of the Government to the observations of the CNUS, the CASC and the CNTD of 2016. The Committee notes that some of these issues were examined by the Committee on Freedom of Association in Cases Nos 2786 and 3297. The Committee also notes the Government's replies regarding the allegations of the obstruction of collective bargaining in two enterprises.

With respect to the establishment of the Roundtable on Matters relating to International Labour Standards, the Government reports that the Roundtable has been operating regularly since June 2018, with the objective of gaining a knowledge of the cases and finding a solution to which all parties agree. The Committee also notes the observations of the CNUS, the CASC and the CNTD of 2018 alleging that the Roundtable is ineffective. The Committee refers to its observation under the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144) and trusts that the matters addressed in the present observation will be taken into account in the discussions that take place at the Roundtable.

(a) Application of the Convention in the private sector

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Effective and rapid application of dissuasive penalties against acts of anti-union discrimination and interference. In its previous observations, the Committee noted the establishment of the Commission for Reviewing and Updating the Labour Code and the procedural difficulties faced by the magistrates' courts in the application of the penalties envisaged in sections 720 and 721 of the Labour Code, and requested the Government to adopt procedural and substantive reforms to enable the effective and rapid application of penalties and to provide statistics concerning the length of judicial proceedings. The Government indicates, in relation to the length of judicial proceedings, that on average: (i) in the first instance a case is heard within six months; (ii) an appeal is heard within six further months; and (iii) in the event that the case is subject to a cassation appeal, the ruling is handed down within approximately one year. The Committee further notes the observations of the CNUS, the CASC and the CNTD in relation to the delays in the cases regarding anti-union discrimination, which may be before the courts for between six and seven years. While noting the absence of information from the Government on the procedural difficulties faced by the magistrates' courts in the application of sections 720 and 721 of the Labour Code, as well as the diverging opinions expressed by the Government and the trade union organizations in relation to the duration of judicial proceedings, the Committee recalls that the existence of legal provisions prohibiting acts of anti-union discrimination is not enough if they are not accompanied by effective and rapid procedures to ensure their application in practice (see the 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 190). In light of the foregoing, the Committee once again expresses the firm hope that procedural and substantive reforms will be adopted in the near future to enable the effective and rapid application of penalties as a deterrent against acts of anti-union discrimination and interference. Furthermore, the Committee once again requests the Government to send detailed statistics concerning the length of judicial proceedings relating to anti-union acts and to provide information on the application of penalties in practice, and on the deterrent effect thereof (number of fines imposed and number of enterprises concerned), as well as on the number of union leaders reinstated under sections 389 to 394 of the Labour Code.

Article 4. Promotion of collective bargaining. Majorities required for collective bargaining. For many years, the Committee has been referring to the need to amend sections 109 and 110 of the Labour Code, which stipulate that, in order to engage in collective bargaining, a trade union must represent an absolute majority of the workers in an enterprise or a branch of activity. In this respect, the Government indicates once again that the Commission for Reviewing and Updating the Labour Code is in the process of reviewing the Labour Code and the content of sections 109 and 110 will be discussed in the context of these tripartite consultations. Noting that several years have passed since the review process of the Labour Code began, the Committee firmly hopes that this process will give rise in the near future to the amendment of sections 109 and 110, in accordance with the Committee's previous observations. The Committee requests the Government to report any developments in this respect.

(b) Application of the Convention in the public service

Articles 1, 2 and 6. Protection of public servants not engaged in the administration of the State against acts of anti-union discrimination and interference. In its previous comments, the Committee, noting that Act No. 41-08 on the public service only covers a union's founders and a number of its leaders, requested the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure that public servants not engaged in the administration of the State fully enjoy specific protection against acts of interference from their employer, providing for sufficient dissuasive penalties against acts of discrimination and interference. The Committee notes with regret the absence of specific information from the Government in this respect and firmly hopes that the Government will take the necessary measures to ensure that public servants not engaged in the administration of the State enjoy adequate protection against acts of discrimination and interference.

Articles 4 and 6. Right to collective bargaining of public servants not engaged in the administration of the State. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that there was no reference to the right to collective bargaining in Act No. 41-08 on the public service or its implementing regulations and requested the Government to take the necessary measures without delay to secure recognition in law of the right to collective bargaining of public servants who are not engaged in the administration of the State. The Committee notes the Government's indication that joint meetings have been planned with officials from the Ministry of Public Service in order to examine the possibility of recognizing in law the right to collective bargaining of public servants who are not engaged in the administration of the State. The Committee firmly hopes that the Government will take the necessary measures to secure recognition in law of the right to collective bargaining of public servants who are not engaged in the administration of the State and requests the Government to provide information on any developments in this respect.

The Committee reminds the Government that it may avail itself of technical assistance of the Office if it so wishes.

Ecuador

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1967)

The Committee notes the Government's response to the observations of Public Services International in Ecuador (PSI-Ecuador) of August 2019.

The Committee also notes the observations of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), received on 16 September 2020, as well as the Government's reply thereon.

The Committee further notes the observations of PSI-Ecuador received on 25 September 2020, as well as the joint observations submitted by the Trade Union Association of Agricultural, Banana and Peasant Workers (ASTAC) and the Ecuadorian Confederation of Unitary Class Organizations of Workers (CEDOCUT), received on 1 October 2020. The Committee notes that these observations apply in large part to the issues examined in the present comment.

Technical assistance

In its last comment, the Committee welcomed the Government's request to the ILO for technical assistance regarding the process of legislative reform, with a view to addressing the observations and recommendations of the ILO supervisory bodies. For that reason, the Committee's comment was restricted to a brief summary of the issues that remained to be resolved, having expressed trust that the technical assistance provided would enable the Government to take the necessary measures regarding those issues. The Committee takes note of the report of the technical assistance mission carried out in Ecuador from 16 to 20 December 2019. In that regard, it notes that the Mission: (i) presented a roadmap to the tripartite constituents, which aimed at reflecting the principal subjects discussed in the meetings and which foresaw that the parties would engage in tripartite dialogue, starting in March 2020, with the technical assistance of the ILO. The dialogue would seek to adopt concrete measures to address the comments of the ILO supervisory bodies, and (ii) encouraged the tripartite constituents to finalize the roadmap as fast as possible and invited them to continue the dialogue with a view to finding tangible and sustainable results. The Committee regrets to observe that the Government's report makes no reference either to the technical assistance mission or to the roadmap. In that connection, it notes the allegations of PSI-Ecuador that the Government has failed to fulfil its commitment to the Mission to convene a further tripartite meeting in January 2020 to sign the roadmap.

The Committee recalls below the points it highlighted in its previous comments, which call for the implementation of concrete measures to bring the legislation into full conformity with the Convention.

Application of the Convention in the public sector

Article 2 of the Convention. Right of workers to establish organizations of their own choosing without previous authorization. Organizations of public servants other than the committees of public servants. The Committee observed that the Basic Reform Act, reforming the legislation governing the public sector (Basic Reform Act), adopted on 19 May 2017, established the concept of the "committee of public servants" with the purpose of guaranteeing certain prerogatives to the most representative organization of public servants in every public institution (comprising 50 per cent plus one of the staff). The Committee noted that even though section 11 of the Basic Reform Act does not prohibit the possibility of establishing several trade unions at the same public institution, it does envisage and regulate the exercise of various collective rights of public servants only by the committee of public servants, since there can only be one such body in a public institution in view of its obligation to comprise "50 per cent plus one" of the staff. Recalling that under Article 2 of the Convention, trade union pluralism must be possible in all cases, the Committee requested the Government to provide information on the manner in which organizations of public servants other than committees of public servants are able to represent and defend the interests of their members. In that connection, the Committee notes the Government's indication that the Basic Reform Act recognises the right of public servants to organize for the defence of their rights, to improve the provision of public services, and to exercise the right to strike. The Committee observes however, that (i) the second transitional provision of the Basic Reform Act establishes that the Ministry of Labour issues the Ministerial Decisions required to implement the provisions of the Act; (ii) on 5 February 2018, the Ministry issued Ministerial Decision MDT-2018-0010 regulating the right to organize of public servants; (iii) section 21 of that Ministerial Decision provides that committees of public servants are responsible for defending the rights of public servants, for improving provision of public services and for the exercise of the right to strike; and (iv) section 24 of the Ministerial Decision indicates that a strike may only be declared by the committees of public servants of public institutions. The Committee once again recalls that under Article 2 of the Convention trade union pluralism must be possible in all cases. It also recalls that the most representativity should not result in the trade union that obtains such status being granted privileges which go beyond priority in representation for the purposes of collective bargaining, consultation by the authorities or the appointment of delegates to international bodies. The Committee therefore again requests the Government to indicate the means available to the organizations of public servants, other than the committees of public servants, within the framework of the Basic Reform Act and the Ministerial Decision, of defending the occupational interests of their members, of organizing their administration and activities, and of formulating their programmes, in conformity with the Convention.

Articles 2, 3 and 4. Registration of associations of public servants and their officers. Prohibition of the administrative dissolution of such associations. The Committee asked the Government to take the measures necessary so that the rules of Decree No. 193, which retains engagement in party-political activities as grounds for administrative dissolution, do not apply to associations of public servants whose purpose is to defend the economic and social interests of their members. In that connection, the Committee notes the Government's indication that, in compliance with section 226 of the Constitution, the institutions, agencies, departments and men and women public servants of the State, as well as those persons acting on behalf of a State authority, exercise only the powers and prerogatives conferred on them by the Constitution and the law. Recalling once more that the defence of the interests of their members requires associations of public servants to be able to express their views on the Government's economic and social policy, and that Article 4 of the Convention prohibits the administrative suspension or dissolution thereof, the Committee again requests the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure that the rules referred to in Decree No. 193 do not apply to associations of public servants whose purpose is to defend the economic and social interests of their members.

Administrative dissolution of the National Federation of Education Workers (UNE). In its previous comments, following up the conclusions of the International Labour Conference Committee on the Application of Standards of June 2017, the Committee expressed its deep concern at the administrative dissolution of the UNE and urged the Government to take all necessary steps as a matter of urgency to revoke that decision so that the UNE could immediately resume its activities. In its last comment, the Committee expressed that it was encouraged by the initiation of dialogue between the Government and the UNE as well as by the repeal of Decree No. 16, which constituted one of the legal bases for the dissolution of the UNE. The Committee noted that the repeal of this decree allowed for the revocation of the dissolution of several social organizations and expressed the expectation that the Government would soon be in a position to report the revocation of the dissolution of the UNE so that this organization could immediately resume its activities to defend the occupational interests of its members. The Committee notes that the Committee on Freedom of Association refers to this issue when examining Case No. 3279 and, on that occasion, trusted that the necessary measures would be taken to ensure that the UNE could register as a trade union with the Ministry of Labour, if the organization so requested. The Committee further urged the Government to take all necessary measures to ensure the full return of the property seized from the organization as well as the elimination of any other consequences resulting from the administrative dissolution of the UNE (see 391st Report, October 2019, Case No. 3279). The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that: (i) the dissolution and liquidation of UNE complied with due process; (ii) all legal actions filed by UNE against the administrative dissolution were overturned by the competent courts; and (iii) during the June 2019 to June 2020 period, five social organizations related to the UNE had been constituted, including the National Union of Education Workers – National Federation of Educational Personnel (UNTE-UNE), and registered in July 2020. While duly noting the registration of the UNTE-UNE, an organization of social nature related to the UNE, the Committee requests the Government to take the steps necessary to ensure the registration of the UNE as a trade union organization with the Ministry of Labour, if the organization so requests. It also asks the Government to ensure the full return of the property seized from the organization as well as the elimination of any other consequences resulting from the administrative dissolution of the UNE, and to inform of all developments in that regard.

Application of the Convention in the private sector

Article 2 of the Convention. Excessive number of workers (30) required for the establishment of workers' associations, enterprise committees or assemblies for the organization of enterprise committees. The Committee asked the Government, in consultation with the social partners, to take the necessary steps to revise sections 443, 449, 452 and 459 of the Labour Code in such a way as to reduce the minimum number of members required to establish workers' associations and enterprise committees and also to enable the establishment of primary-level unions comprising workers from several enterprises. In that regard, the Committee notes the Government's indication that the purpose of fixing a minimum number of workers and of limiting associations to the level of an enterprise for the establishment of a trade union is not intended to discourage or restrict the creation of that type of organization, but to seek to ensure the representativeness, cohesion and agreement of the trade union organization in its relations with the employers. The Committee further observes that the Committee on Freedom of Association dealt with this issue in its most recent examination of Case No. 3148 (see 391st Report, October 2019), and on that occasion, the Government reported that: (i) on 13 March 2018 a proposal was made to reform Ministerial Decision No. 0130 of 2013 (article 2(2) of which sets the minimum number of members to form a trade union at 30), replacing the number 30 with an indication that the minimum membership would be established by the Labour Code; and (ii) the National Labour and Wage Board, a tripartite body, would have the responsibility for defining the minimum number of members and the criteria for defining it. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in that regard and urges the Government, in consultation with the social partners, to take the necessary steps to amend sections 443, 449, 452 and 459 of the Labour Code in such a way as to reduce the minimum number of members required to establish workers' associations and enterprise committees and also to enable the establishment of primary-level unions comprising workers from several enterprises.

Article 3. Compulsory time limits for convening trade union elections. The Committee asked the Government to amend section 10(c) of Ministerial Decision No. 0130 of 2013, regulating labour organizations, which provides that trade union executive committees shall lose their powers and competencies if they do not convene elections within 90 days of the expiry of their mandate, as set out in their respective union constitutions, so as to ensure that, subject to the observance of democratic rules, the consequences of any delay in holding elections shall be determined by the union constitutions themselves. The Committee notes the Government's indication that several labour organizations and trade union federations took part in the approval of the Labour Organization Regulations, with the aim of solving the problem faced by workers' organizations when the absence of leadership makes it impossible to convene new elections, and establishing an agile, simplified mechanism, based on the principles of participation, transparency and democracy. The Committee recalls that, under Article 3 of the Convention, trade union elections are an internal matter for the organizations and should be regulated primarily by their constitutions. The Committee therefore requests the Government to amend article 10 of the Labour Organization Regulations No. 0130 of 2013 to provide that, in compliance with any democratic rules, the consequences of any delay in convening trade union elections are set out in the constitutions of the organizations themselves.

Article 3. Requirement of Ecuadorian nationality to be eligible for trade union office. The Committee recalls that in its 2015 observation it noted with satisfaction that section 49 of the Labour Justice Act had amended section 459(4) of the Labour Code and removed the requirement of Ecuadorian nationality to be eligible for trade union office. The Committee observes, nevertheless, that according to the comments of ASTAC and CEDOCUT section 49 of the Labour Justice Act has been declared unconstitutional under decision 002-18-SIN-CC of 21 March 2018. The Committee recalls that the national legislation must allow foreign workers to serve as trade union officials, at least after a reasonable period of residence in the host country. The Committee requests the Government to explain the consequences of the above decision of the Constitutional Court on the right of foreign workers to serve as trade union officials.

Elections as officers of enterprise committees of workers who are not trade union members. The Committee notes that, in the public administration, the Basic Reform Act provides that only members of the committee of public servants may become enterprise committee officers. In that regard, the Committee again expects that the Government will take the necessary steps to amend section 459(3) of the Labour Code in such a way that workers who are not enterprise committee members may stand for office only if the enterprise committee's own statute envisages that possibility.

Article 3 of the Convention. Right of workers' organizations and associations of public servants to organize their activities and to formulate their programmes. Prison sentences for the stoppage or obstruction of public services. The Committee asked the Government to take the measures required to amend article 346 of the Basic Comprehensive Penal Code (COIP), which provides for imprisonment of one to three years for obstructing or stopping the normal provision of a public service, so as to prevent the imposition of criminal penalties on workers engaged in a peaceful strike. In that regard, the Committee notes from the Government's report that the request to amend the COIP is to come before the relevant State institutions, for consideration as to whether to proceed with the amendment. The Committee requests the Government to inform in this connection.

The Committee notes with regret that, having made available the technical assistance requested, there has been no discernible progress to the present date in respect of measures necessary to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention. The Committee most particularly regrets that it has received no information from the Government relating to the follow-up given to the Office's December 2019 mission. The Committee urges the Government to intensify its efforts to adopt the necessary measures regarding the points raised in the Committee's comments. In that regard, noting the Government's indication that the Ministry of Labour envisaged holding round-table dialogues with certain employers' and workers' organizations at the end of 2020, the Committee urges the Government to facilitate constructive dialogue with all representative employers' and workers' organizations with a view to obtaining tangible and sustainable results. The Committee requests the Government to inform in that regard.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

[The Government is asked to reply in full to the present comments in 2021.]

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1959)

The Committee notes the Government's response to the observations of Public Services International in Ecuador (PSI-Ecuador) of August 2019.

The Committee also notes the observations of the Trade Union Association of Agricultural, Banana and Peasant Workers (ASTAC), received on 24 January 2020, and the observations of PSI-Ecuador, received on 25 September 2020, and the joint observations of ASTAC and the Ecuadorean Confederation of Unitary Class Organizations of Workers (CEDOCUT), received on 1 October 2020. The Committee notes that these observations refer to, in addition to the issues examined in the context of the present comment, allegations of anti-union dismissals and a number of administrative and legislative measures adopted by the Government during the pandemic that were not subject to tripartite consultation, such as the Basic Act on humanitarian support to combat the COVID-19 health crisis, of 22 June 2020, which the organizations claim introduced regressive reforms to the Labour Code with regard to the rights of public sector workers in addition to new violations of collective bargaining rights. The Committee requests the Government to send its comments in this regard.

Technical assistance. In its previous comment, the Committee welcomed the Government's request for technical assistance from the ILO in relation to the legislative reform process and with a view to following up on the observations and recommendations made by the ILO supervisory bodies. For this reason, the Committee's observation was limited to a brief summary of the issues to be addressed, having expressed trust that the technical assistance would enable the Government to adopt the necessary measures in this regard. The Committee notes the report of the technical assistance mission carried out in Ecuador from 16–20 December 2019. In this regard, it notes that: (i) the mission submitted to the tripartite constituents a draft roadmap to address the priority issues discussed in the meetings, which provided that the constituents would in March 2020, with ILO technical assistance, commence tripartite dialogue with a view to adopting specific measures to address the comments of the ILO supervisory bodies; and (ii) the mission encouraged the tripartite constituents to finalize the roadmap as soon as possible and invited them to continue the dialogue with the aim of achieving tangible and sustainable outcomes. The Committee regrets to observe that the Government's report omits all reference to the technical assistance mission and the draft roadmap. The Committee notes in this regard the allegations of PSI-Ecuador that the Government failed to act on its commitment to the mission to hold a new tripartite meeting in January 2020 to sign the roadmap.

The Committee recalls below the points it has emphasized in its previous comments and which require the adoption of specific measures to bring the legislation into full conformity with the Convention.

Application of the Convention in the public sector

Articles 1, 2 and 6 of the Convention. Protection of public sector workers who are not engaged in the administration of the State against acts of anti-union discrimination and interference. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the protections against anti-union discrimination and interference set out in the Basic Act reforming the legislation regulating the public service (Basic Reform Act). It also observed that Ministerial Order No. MDT-2018-0010, which regulates the exercise of the right to organize of public servants, seemed to be limited to acts of interference. Recalling the importance of effective and dissuasive penalties in this regard, the Committee requested the Government to provide information on: (i) the penalties and compensation applicable to acts of anti-union discrimination and interference committed in the public sector; (ii) whether, in addition to the leadership of the Civil Service Committee, the leaders of organizations of public servants also benefit from additional protection against the elimination of positions or benefit from other similar measures, including in the event of recourse to the "purchase of compulsory redundancy" mechanism; and (iii) the outcome of a legal action to have the above mechanism declared unconstitutional that, according to PSI–Ecuador and the National Federation of Education Workers (UNE), had been submitted. In this regard, the Committee notes the Government's indication that: (i) the second general provision of the Basic Reform Act specifies that in the event of dismissal due to retrenchment and the purchase of compulsory resignation with compensation or unfair dismissal of members of the Civil Service Committee, the provisions of the Labour Code that regulate "dismissal without effect" as provided for in section 195.2 of the Labour Code are applicable; (ii) sections 187 and 195(1) and (2) of the Labour Code provide that the unfair dismissal of trade union leaders is considered to be without effect; and (iii) section 195.3 of the Labour Code provides that, when dismissal is declared to be without effect, the employment relationship is considered not to have been interrupted and outstanding wages are ordered to be paid with a 10 per cent supplement; and if the worker decides not to continue the employment relationship, he or she shall receive compensation equivalent in value to the yearly wage the worker had been receiving, in addition to compensation for unfair dismissal. The Committee observes, however, that it is not clear from the above whether there are any provisions applicable to the public sector that explicitly protect leaders of organizations of public servants who are not part of the leadership of the Civil Service Committee. In this context, the Committee requests the Government to adopt the measures necessary to ensure that the legislation applicable to the public sector contains provisions that explicitly protect the leaders of all organizations of public servants against acts of anti-union discrimination and interference and that set forth dissuasive penalties for these acts. In addition, the Committee once again requests the Government to provide information on the outcome of the legal action that, according to PSI-Ecuador and the UNE, had been brought to have the "purchase of compulsory resignation" mechanism declared unconstitutional.

Articles 4 and 6. Collective bargaining for public sector workers who are not engaged in the administration of the State. In its previous comments, the Committee observed that the Basic Reform Act and Ministerial Order No. MDT-2018-0010 do not recognize the right to collective bargaining for public servants and that only public sector workers, who are regulated by the Labour Code, may engage in collective bargaining. The Committee also noted that the constitutional amendments of 2015, which excluded the entire public sector from the scope of collective bargaining, had been nullified by the Constitutional Court (ruling No. 018-18-SIN-CC of 1 August 2018). The Committee previously urged the Government to reopen an in-depth discussion with the trade unions concerned with a view to establishing an adequate collective bargaining mechanism for all categories of public employees covered by the Convention. In this regard, the Committee notes the Government's indication that although dialogue has been maintained with public sector trade unions, the lack of cohesion between the representative trade unions and their divergent criteria and interests has made discussions difficult. The Committee also notes that, according to allegations made by the ASTAC and CEDOCUT in their observations, despite the fact that on 4 December 2019 the Ministry of Labour issued Ministerial Order No. 373 giving effect to Constitutional Court ruling No. 018-18-SIN-CC of 2018, a high percentage of public sector institutions have not complied with the Order. They also allege that even individuals who entered employment after the amendments were declared unconstitutional remain in a legal limbo, being considered neither public employees nor public sector workers, and that as a result they are not allowed to be members of existing trade unions or engage in collective bargaining. The Committee once again recalls that under the terms of Articles 4 and 6 of the Convention, all workers in the public sector who are not engaged in the administration of the State (such as employees in public enterprises, municipal service employees and those in decentralized institutions, teachers in the public sector and personnel in the transport sector) are covered by the Convention (see the 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 172) and should therefore be permitted to collectively bargain their conditions of employment, including wage conditions, and that mere consultation of the unions concerned is not sufficient to meet the requirements of the Convention in this respect (see the 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 219). The Committee once again urges the Government to intensify its efforts to reopen an in-depth debate with the trade unions concerned with a view to establishing an adequate collective bargaining mechanism for all categories of workers in the public sector covered by the Convention. It also requests the Government to adopt the necessary measures to ensure the full implementation of Ministerial Order No. 373 in the various State institutions and to provide information in this regard.

Application of the Convention in the private sector

Article 1. Adequate protection against acts of anti-union discrimination. The Committee once again recalls that it has been commenting for many years on the need to include provisions in the legislation guaranteeing protection against acts of anti-union discrimination in access to employment. In this regard, the Committee notes the Government's indication that it has no current plans to adopt specific legislation on this issue, since the labour legislation in force provides adequate guarantees and protection for workers to exercise their right and freedom to organize when they deem it necessary. In this regard, the Committee emphasizes the need to include the above-mentioned provisions in the legislation and requests the Government to provide information in its next report on any measures adopted in this respect.

Article 4. Promotion of collective bargaining. The Committee previously observed that, in accordance with section 221 of the Labour Code, collective labour agreements must be concluded with the works council, or, if one does not exist, with the organization with the largest number of worker members, provided that it represents over 50 per cent of the enterprise's workers. The Committee previously requested the Government, in consultation with the social partners, to adopt the necessary measures to amend section 221 so that if there is no organization that represents more than 50 per cent of the workers, minority trade unions can, either separately or jointly, negotiate at least on behalf of their own members. In this respect, the Committee notes the Government's repeated indication that it does not plan to amend section 221 of the Labour Code, since its provisions are strictly aligned with the principles of democracy, participation and transparency insofar as the benefits obtained in the collective agreement apply to all workers in the employing enterprise or institution. The Committee is bound to once again recall in this regard that, while it is acceptable for the union which represents the majority or a high percentage of workers in a bargaining unit to enjoy preferential or exclusive bargaining rights, the Committee considers that in cases where no union meets these conditions, or does not enjoy such exclusive rights, minority trade unions should at least be able to conclude a collective or direct agreement on behalf of their own members (see the 2012 General Study, paragraph 226). The Committee therefore urges the Government, in consultation with the social partners, to finally adopt the necessary measures to amend section 221 of the Labour Code so that, where there is no organization that represents over 50 per cent of the workers, minority trade unions can, either separately or jointly, negotiate at least on behalf of their own members. The Committee also once again requests the Government to provide information on the number of collective agreements signed and in force in the country, and on the sectors and the number of workers covered by these agreements.

Ministerial Orders establishing new forms of contract for banana plantation workers and agricultural workers. The Committee previously requested the Government to provide its comments regarding the allegations made by the ASTAC that Ministerial Orders Nos. MDT-029-2017, MDT-074-2018 and MDT-096-2018, which establish new forms of contract for banana plantation workers and agricultural workers, would obstruct the effective exercise of the right to collective bargaining in those sectors. In this regard, the Committee notes the Government's indication that: (i) the forms of contract issued by the Ministry of Labour are not intended for a specific group of people and do not specifically cover certain jobs; and (ii) the form of contract is for temporary jobs, which are common in all economic activities and particularly in the banana sector, but that it was precisely this fact that had allowed contractual relationships in the banana sector to be regularized and enabled workers to benefit from all their labour rights. The Committee also notes that, according to the Government's indications, during the June 2019–June 2020 period, a total of four collective agreements were signed and in force in the agricultural sector and three in the banana sector. The Committee notes this information and requests the Government, in the context of the statistics requested in the preceding paragraph, to continue providing detailed information on the existing collective agreements in the above-mentioned sectors, and on the number of workers covered.

The Committee regrets to observe that, although it has made available the requested technical assistance, it has not to date observed any progress in the adoption of the necessary measures to bring the legislation into line with the Convention. The Committee particularly regrets that it has not received information from the Government on the follow-up to the ILO mission of December 2019. The Committee urges the Government to intensify its efforts to adopt the necessary measures in relation to the points emphasized in its comments and, to this end, to hold a constructive dialogue with all representative employers' and workers' organizations with the aim of achieving tangible and sustainable results. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any progress made in this respect.

Egypt

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1957)

The Committee takes note of the observations made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) received on 25 September and 13 October 2020, in relation to the application of the Convention in law and in practice. It further notes the observations made by Public Services International (PSI) on behalf of its affiliates the Real Estate Taxes Authority Union (RETA), the Bibliotheca Alexandrina Staff Union (BASU) and the Egyptian Ambulance Organization Employees Syndicate, as well as its partner organization, the Center for Trade Union Workers' Services (CUTWS), received on 22 October 2020.

Follow-up to the conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards (International Labour Conference, 108th Session, June 2019)

In its previous comments, the Committee recalled the conclusions of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2019 concerning the application of the Convention. In particular, the Committee observed that the Conference Committee called upon the Government to: (i) ensure that there are no obstacles to the registration of trade unions, in law and practice, in conformity with the Convention; (ii) act expeditiously to process pending applications for trade union registration; (iii) ensure that all trade unions are able to exercise their activities and elect their officers in full freedom, in law and in practice, in accordance with the Convention. It further called upon the Government (iv) to amend the Trade Union Law to ensure that: the level of minimum membership required at the enterprise level, as well as for those forming general unions and confederations, did not impede the right of workers to form and join free and independent trade union organizations of their own choosing; and that workers were not penalized with imprisonment for exercising their rights under the Convention; and (v) to transmit copies of the draft Labour Code to the Committee of Experts before its session in November 2019. Finally, the Conference Committee invited the Government to accept ILO technical assistance to assist in implementing these recommendations.

Article 2 of the Convention. Right of workers to establish and join organizations of their own choosing. Application in law and in practice. The Committee recalls from its previous comments the Government's indication that the Minister of Manpower created a legal and technical committee reporting directly to him mandated with examining all problems facing union organizations that had failed to regularize and then to offer the required technical support. The ministerial committee had examined the submissions and informed the organizations of some legal and procedural restrictions on 27 August 2019. The Government added that 11 new union committees (only ten different names were provided by the Government) were created during the months of July and August and one new general union was formed bringing the number of such unions established according to the 2011 Ministerial Declaration on Freedom of Association to five general unions, including two that were not members of a higher union federation. The Committee had noted the subsequent indication by the Government that the ministerial committee had further reviewed registration papers submitted by the following 11 new trade union committees and was finalizing the procedures so that they could receive certificates of legal personality: (Trade Union Committees of Workers in Real Estate Tax in Kafr Al Sheikh, Giza and Beni Sewaif; Trade Union Committee of Workers in the Water and Sanitation Company in Qena; Trade Union Committee of Sanitation Workers in Gharbeya; Trade Union Committee of Representatives of associations and private institutions; Trade Union Committee of Workers in Hunting in Giza; Trade Union Committee of Workers in Transportation and Transport in Giza; Trade Union Committee of Workers in Cement in Suez; Trade Union Committee for Workers in Transportation and Transport in Damietta; Trade Union Committee for Workers in Telecommunications in Qena).

The Committee notes the information provided by the ITUC that since the dissolution of all independent unions in 2018, workers and their representatives have sought the re-registration of their unions but still face an arduous and arbitrary process and in practice the authorities still impose excessive and absurd registration requirements, such as obtaining the employer's approval and stamp. As regards the eleven trade union committees in particular for which the Government had indicated the procedures for recognition were being finalised, the ITUC and the PSI indicate that three of the eleven - the Trade Union Committees of Workers in Real Estate Tax in Kafr Al Sheikh and Giza, the Trade Union Committee of Workers in the Water and Sanitation Company in Qena and the Trade Union Committee of Sanitation Workers in Gharbeya - were still awaiting registration. They further refer to the Trade Union Committee of Quality Assurance in Giza, which has been awaiting registration for over a year. They add that no tangible progress has been made by the technical committee mandated to review the obstacles to trade union registration and that, since March, no meeting has been organized, even virtually. The ITUC and the PSI submit a list of 19 trade union organizations that have yet to be registered, despite their complying with the administrative requirements, and another ten organizations that had adjusted their legal status based on the new administrative requirements yet continued to be refused the necessary papers for their operation.

The Committee takes due note of the Government's reply that the Ministry already meets with the trade union organizations seeking to be constituted and helps them to resolve all of their problems and guarantees them all of their entitlements pursuant to the applicable law. According to the Government, the Ministry has succeeded in surmounting many of the obstacles facing them, although the events that have affected the world, including Egypt, as a result of the repercussions of the coronavirus crisis have prevented this from being completed at the speed hoped for. On the one hand, workers in the Ministry and in the municipalities were granted exceptional leave and on the other hand, representatives of the trade union organizations were obliged to isolate at home for periods of time as a precautionary measure and informed the Ministry officially thereof. More generally, the Government indicates that the time taken for the completion of the registration process varies with the extent of awareness of the organization, which submits the legally required documents. In the case of completion of documents, the legal representative shall be given the minutes of submission within approximately two days. In the case of incompletion of documents, the organization submitting the documents shall be informed of the required documents to be submitted, and the manner of getting them. In the case that the documents submitted are found to be incorrect or insufficient, the competent administrative body shall have the right, within thirty days as of the date on which the documents were deposited, to notify the legal representative of the organization thereof by means of a recommended letter. If a trade union organization does not rectify its documents or procedures, which are the subject of notification, or complete the documents or procedures within thirty days as of the date on which the notification was received, the competent administrative body shall have the right to object to the establishment of the trade union organization before the competent labour tribunal. Numerous trade union organizations, which exercised their activity in accordance with the Ministerial Declaration of 2011, succeeded in regulating their status or in submitting the incorporation documents, and became integrated under a legal umbrella, which regulates their status on an equal basis with organizations established under the previous law. The Government adds that it has received approximately 67 incorporation applications to date. It reaffirms its belief that full compliance with international labour standards especially freedom of association and collective bargaining is one of the most important pillars for the stability of industrial relations, its regularity, and its positive impact on production and economic growth. The Government adds that there are numerous challenges and difficulties encountering the three social partners, especially since the new trade union movement in Egypt is a nascent trade union movement that should be fostered and provided with all relevant support. The Government emphasizes that the technical assistance project to be implemented on "Strengthening labour relations and its institutions in Egypt" provides a real opportunity to raise awareness on freedom of association and the role of the social partners in observing international labour standards and in overcoming any difficulties. The Ministry has set up a standing committee to examine complaints submitted by trade union organizations and to provide them with the necessary technical assistance by virtue of Ministerial Decision No. 162 of 2020, published in the Egyptian Official Gazette in order to ensure its sustainability. During the month of November, the standing committee held four sessions and examined twenty-six cases. To date, ten union committees were given certificates of legal personality. Other trade union committees were completing their papers.

The Government further indicates that it has reached out to the three trade union committees in the above list that had not yet finalised their registration. According to the Government, two had not replied to its invitation while one indicated that it was finalising its papers. The Government has also reached out or will reach out to the 19 trade union committees mentioned in the most recent communication from the workers' organizations, four of which have already received their certificate of registration. As regards the ten trade union committees that had completed the registration process but not received the necessary papers for their operation, the Government indicates that four of them now have their certificates of registration, two have taken the matter to the courts (one has won the appeal while the other is in the process), three will be invited to the Ministry to resolve any outstanding issues and one has simply not set up its executive board.

While welcoming the steps taken by the Government to engage with unions requesting registration and to assist them in the completion of this process, the Committee expects that the Government will take all necessary measures to ensure the elimination of excessive registration requirements, such as obtaining the employer's approval and stamp, so that they may be registered without further delay. Given the numerous challenges to registration that continue to be raised, the Committee trusts that, on the basis of the 2019 amendments which had lowered the minimum membership requirement, the remaining organizations will receive their certificates of legal personality without delay so that they will be able to exercise their activities fully, in accordance with the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide detailed information on the number of trade union registration applications received, the number of registrations granted, the reasons for any refusals to grant, as well as information on the average time taken from filing to registration.

Minimum membership requirements. In its previous comments, the Committee noted with interest the adoption on 5 August 2019 of Law No. 142 lowering the minimum membership requirement to 50 workers for the formation of a trade union committee at enterprise level, to ten union committees and 15,000 members for a general union and to seven general unions and 150,000 members for the establishment of a trade union federation (that is, a confederation). The Committee notes the ITUC observation indicating that the thresholds are still too high and in a context of intimidation and continued repression of union activities, workers and their representatives may be severely hampered in their efforts to gather such high numbers, especially in small and medium-sized establishments and in small industries or sectors. While noting the Government's indication that the amendments were submitted to, and adopted by the Supreme Council for Social Dialogue, which deemed the numbers to be appropriate for the labour force in Egypt and proportionate to the number of establishments, the Committee once again recalls that the minimum membership requirement should be fixed in a reasonable manner so that the establishment of organizations is not hindered in respect of all levels of formation (see the 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 89). The Committee once again requests the Government to continue to review these requirements with the social partners concerned so as to ensure that all workers are able to form and join the organizations of their own choosing and that their organizations can establish and join federations and confederations freely.

Article 3. Right of workers' organizations to organize their administration without interference and to enjoy the benefits of international affiliation. In its previous comments, the Committee noted with interest that Law No. 142 amended sections 67, 68 and 76 so as to eliminate all references to imprisonment and establishing uniquely the payment of a fine. The Committee requested the Government to keep the application of these provisions under review and to inform of any penalties imposed, with specific reference to section 67. While noting the Government's indication that section 67 is restricted to acts of any entity which uses- without any right to do so- in its communications, posters or ads etc., the name of a trade union organization, or exercises a union activity which is restricted to the members of the boards of directors of the trade union organization, thus aimed at the protection of trade union organizations from other entities, the Committee notes with concern from the information provided by the ITUC and PSI that this section was precisely used against the President of the Trade Union Committee of workers in Education in the Qena Governorate who was fined for leading a non-registered trade union without possessing the necessary letters to operationalize the organization. The ITUC and PSI add that this trade union committee deposited its application in May 2018 and obtained a receipt from the Directorate of Labour but did not succeed in getting a stamped procès-verbal. The Committee recalls in this respect that although the official recognition of an organization through its registration constitutes a relevant aspect of the right to organize, as it is the first measure to be taken so that organizations can fulfil their role effectively, the exercise of legitimate trade union activities should not be dependent upon registration (see the 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 83). The Committee requests the Government to review this case in light of its own explanation as to the aim of section 67 and indicate the measures taken or envisaged to ensure that these broadly worded sections are not used to penalise trade unions for carrying out their activities even if the final stages of the registration process have yet to be completed. It further requests the Government to inform it of any further penalties imposed under these provisions and the reasons for such penalties.

The Committee had also observed that the Trade Union Law set out certain specific conditions for trade union office (section 41.1 and 41.4) which it considered interfered with the right of workers' organizations to elect their representatives in full freedom, in particular the requirement to read and write and matters related to military service. The Committee notes the Government's indication that representatives of trade union organizations had agreed on the importance of these conditions for those who nominate themselves to the administrative and financial management of the organization since the board of directors is the executive authority. With respect to military service, the Government indicates that the provision does not specify the condition of having completed the military service, but it sets down the requirement of indicating the status vis-à-vis the military service. According to the Government, the reason for this is that if the candidate is doing his military service, this will conflict with his carrying out his trade union duties. While the ITUC alleges that the military service requirement specifically implies that migrant workers cannot stand for office, the Committee takes due note of the Government's observation that section 41(1) calls for a candidate to trade union office to have performed or have been legally exempt from military service, the latter of which would be the case for migrant workers who would therefore not be subject to this condition. The Committee nevertheless considers that such stipulations should be the prerogative of trade union by-laws rather than being set by the legislation concerning trade unions. The Committee once again requests the Government to review these requirements with the social partners concerned with a view to bringing them into conformity with the Convention.

Further comments by the ITUC. The Committee further notes that the ITUC objects to a number of other provisions of Law No. 213 of 2017. In particular, the ITUC considers that section 5 of Law, which provides that a trade union may not be founded on a religious, ideological, political, partisan or ethnic basis runs counter to Article 2 of the Convention. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the purpose of this provision is precisely to protect workers from discrimination and to ensure that they are not deprived of trade union membership on these grounds. In this regard, the Committee recalls that it has previously noted that the right of organizations to draw up their constitutions and rules must be subject to the need to respect fundamental human rights and that this means that it would not be inconsistent with the requirements of the Convention to require that union rules not discriminate against members or potential members on grounds of race, colour, sex, religion, political opinion, national extraction or social origin.

The ITUC further refers to detailed provisions in sections 30 and 35, which set out the competencies of executive committees and election procedure for general assemblies and section 42, which imposes detailed rules on the membership of executive committees and circumscribing their functions. The Committee notes the Government's indication that these sections are purely regulatory to support and organize the work of the trade union movement. Finally, the Committee notes the ITUC's observations that section 58 makes the accounts of organizations subject to the control of a central accounting body amounting to interference in their administration while the Government indicates that this body audits free of charge in order to protect workers and provide support for the organizations. The Committee recalls that legislative provisions which regulate in detail the internal functioning of workers' and employers' organizations pose a serious risk of interference which is incompatible with the Convention. Where such provisions are deemed necessary, they should simply establish an overall framework within which the greatest possible autonomy is left to the organizations for their functioning and administration. Moreover, as the autonomy and financial independence are essential elements of the right of organizations to organize their administration in full freedom, any legislative intervention in this respect merits the attention of the Committee. While it accepts legislative requirements that the constitutions of organizations should contain provisions relating to their internal financial administration or which provide for external supervision of financial reports, with a view to ensuring the conditions for honest and effective administration, it considers that other interventions are incompatible with the Convention. For example, the Committee considers that such supervision is compatible with the Convention when: the supervision is limited to the obligation of submitting annual financial reports; verification is carried out because there are serious grounds for believing that the actions of an organization are contrary to its rules or the law and is limited to cases in which a significant number of workers (for example, 10 per cent) call for an investigation of allegations of embezzlement or lodge a complaint. However, the Committee considers that such supervision is incompatible with the Convention if the law tends to over-regulate matters that should be left to the trade unions themselves and their by-laws, including providing for financial supervision of the accounts by the public authorities (see the 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraphs 108–110). Finally, the Committee observes that section 7 empowers in vague and broad terms the Minister to request the competent labour court to hand down a decision to dissolve the administrative board of a trade union organization if there is a violation of the law or a perpetration of gross financial or administrative violations. The Committee requests the Government to review these provisions and their application with the social partners concerned with a view to bringing them into conformity with the Convention.

Labour Code. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the draft Labour Code transmitted by the Government and which was being debated in the Manpower Committee of the Parliament. It welcomed the Government's statement that all provisions of the draft Labour Code would continue to be reviewed and that the Committee's comments would be presented to the Parliament. In reply to the Committee's considerations in relation to the right to strike, the Committee notes the Government's reaffirmation that the right to strike is a constitutional right and that its provisions are formulated through consultation and dialogue with both workers' and employers' representatives. In respect of the Government's reiteration that the obligation to declare the duration of the strike does not specify a maximum period or periods of a strike action, which may be extended or renewed for similar periods, thus safeguarding the aim of a strike action as a legitimate means of pressure, the Committee recalls that workers and their organizations should be able to call a strike for an indefinite period if they so wish (see the 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 146). As for the prohibition of strike action in strategic or vital establishments in which the suspension of work will result in a breach of national security, or in main or vital services, which are provided to citizens, the Government recalls that the identification of such facilities and the rules governing strike action will be issued by the Prime Minister. As regards the reference to a specific trade union organization in section 78 of the draft Labour Code, the Committee notes the Government's indication that this was an error and that the Manpower Committee has been contacted to rectify it. Recalling that restrictions on the right to strike should be limited to public servants exercising authority in the name of the State, essential services in the strict sense of the term and situations of acute national crisis, the Committee expresses the firm expectation that the Labour Code will be adopted without delay and that it, along with any implementing decrees, will be fully in line with the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the progress made in this regard and to transmit a copy of the Labour Code as soon as it has been adopted, as well as relevant regulations that may have been issued thereunder.

As regards the work on a Law regulating domestic work, the Committee notes the Government's indication that the new draft law is still under preparation and an initial societal dialogue was held on its first draft with the social partners, experts and specialists and numerous members of Parliament. The Government adds that the Trade Union Law applies to domestic workers who will have the right to form trade unions to defend their interests. Recalling that the draft Labour Code excludes domestic workers from its coverage, including the chapters relating to collective labour relations, the Committee once again requests the Government to provide a copy of the law regulating domestic work as soon as it is adopted, as well as a copy of the model employment contract. It further requests the Government to indicate the names of any trade unions of domestic workers that have been registered and the dates on which registration was approved.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1954)

The Committee takes note of the observations made by Public Services International (PSI) on behalf of its affiliates the Real Estate Taxes Authority Union (RETA), the Bibliotheca Alexandrina Staff Union (BASU) and the Egyptian Ambulance Organization Employees Syndicate, as well as its partner organisation, the Center for Trade Union Workers' Services (CUTWS), received on 22 October 2020, on matters concerning the application of the Convention in law and in practice. The Committee also takes note of the Government's comments to these observations.

The Committee updated its 2019 examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the elements mentioned in the previous paragraph.

Articles 1, 2 and 3 of the Convention. Adequate protection against anti-union discrimination and interference. With reference to its comments under the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), the Committee notes that Trade Union Law No. 137 prohibits generally in section 3 any discrimination for the formation of a trade union or the exercise of trade union activity. It further notes that the draft Labour Code currently before the Manpower Committee of Parliament prohibits under section 138 dismissal on the basis of trade union membership or activity. In the draft sent by the Government, however, any section on sanctions, penalties or remedies was missing. Recalling that Article 1 of the Convention calls for protection against anti-union discrimination not only in respect of dismissal but also as regards any act that would prejudice workers in their employment, including at the time of hiring, and other forms of prejudice such as demotion, transfer, benefits, etc., and that Article 2 provides that workers' and employers' organisations shall be protected against acts of interference by each other, the Committee requests the Government to indicate the legislative provision which ensures full protection in respect of such acts and the sanctions, penalties and remedies provided for this purpose.

The Committee further notes the concerns raised by the PSI and other organisations regarding a specific case of alleged anti-union discrimination. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the unionist in question was carrying out his trade union activity in accordance with the provisions of the Trade Union Organisations Law and that the labour administration provided him assistance in his appeal to the courts concerning the alleged acts.

Article 4. Promotion of collective bargaining. As regards the comments it has been making for several years on Labour Code No. 12 of 2003, the Committee notes the Government's indication that the draft has eliminated any references to the role of higher-level organisations in the negotiation process of lower-level organisations. It further notes the Government's explanation that the draft law provides for optional arbitration based on the will and desire of both parties without any coercion. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any further developments in the draft Code and to supply a copy as soon as it has been adopted.

Articles 4 and 6. Collective bargaining for public servants not engaged in the administration of the State. As regards the exclusion from the scope of application of the draft Labour Code, and thus of the right to collective bargaining, of civil servants of state agencies, including local government units, the Committee notes the Government's indication that Act No. 81 on the civil service was adopted on 1 November 2016 and Executive Regulations were issued by Decree from the Prime Minister No. 126/2017. The Committee notes that Act No. 81 establishes, on the one hand, a Civil Service Council which has an advisory role on various issues related to the Civil Service and, on the other hand, for each public department, human resources committees. The Committee also notes that, under section 3 of Act No. 81 and section 4 of its Executive Regulations, the Civil Service Council and the human resources committees, composed mainly of representatives of the administration, include a trade union representative whose appointment is mainly the responsibility of the Egyptian Trade Union Federation. At the same time, the Committee notes that the Act and its Executive Regulations make no mention of other ways of representing public service employees and of mechanisms enabling them to collectively negotiate their working and employment conditions.

In its response to the observation of the trade unions, the Government adds that there is nothing that prevents public servants from exercising collective labour rights (such as social dialogue, collective bargaining, the right to strike, etc.). Section 4 of the draft Labour Code specifies their exemption "unless another text provides otherwise" and in this respect it should be noted that they are covered by the provisions of the Trade Union Organizations Law, section 2 of which specifies that they have the right to all collective labour rights as well as the right to strike in sections 14, 15, and 16.

Observing that the Trade Union Organizations Law does not establish mechanisms and procedures for the engagement in collective bargaining, the Committee recalls that Article 4 of the Convention provides that measures appropriate to national conditions shall be taken, where necessary, to encourage and promote the full development and utilisation of machinery for voluntary negotiation between employers or employers' organisations and workers' organisations, with a view to the regulation of terms and conditions of employment by means of collective agreements.

In this respect, the Committee recalls that civil servants not engaged in the administration of the State must be able to collectively negotiate their working and employment conditions beyond mere consultation mechanisms. The Committee therefore requests the Government to specify the mechanisms enabling the civil servants not engaged in the administration of the State to collectively negotiate their employment conditions, as well as the manner in which the organisations representing them are designated.

[The Government is asked to reply in full to the present comments in 2021.]

El Salvador

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 2006)

The Committee notes the observations of the National Business Association (ANEP), supported by the International Organisation of Employers (IOE), received on 13 October 2020 (which also refer to the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) and which the Committee is addressing here with regard to the present Convention), which report that the President of the Republic and other higher Governmental bodies have failed to recognize, slandered and intimidated the new President of ANEP, who was elected on 29 April 2020, preventing dialogue between public servants and ANEP or its President, thereby publicly denigrating the most representative employers' organization and fuelling rejection of its President by the public, in violation of the Convention and the most fundamental civil liberties. The Committee expresses its concern at these serious allegations and requests the Government to provide its comments on the matter.

The Committee also notes that the Committee on Freedom of Association referred the legislative aspects of Case No. 3321 to this Committee, trusting that the Government would take the measures necessary to ensure full respect of the right to organize of prison staff (see 392nd Report, October 2020). Recalling its request that the necessary measures be taken in order to recognize the right to organize of State employees, with the sole possible exception of the armed forces and the police (see the legislative reforms pending below), the Committee requests the Government to keep it informed of any developments in this respect.

As regards the other pending issues, the Committee reiterates the content of its comments adopted in 2019, reproduced as follows.

The Committee notes the Government's replies to the previous observations of ANEP and the IOE, as well as of the National Confederation of Salvadoran Workers (CNTS).

Trade union rights and civil liberties. Murder of a trade unionist. With regard to the murder of Mr Victoriano Abel Vega in 2010, the Committee notes that the Government emphasizes the need to accelerate the investigation and punish the perpetrators, and it details the steps it is taking periodically to request updated reports from the Attorney-General of the Republic, with the most solid line of investigation being that the murder was committed mistakenly by a group of gang members. The Committee notes that the details provided by the Government on the investigation process have already been examined by the Committee on Freedom of Association and that recent updates show that the case is still under investigation. The Committee therefore refers once again to the recommendations of the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 2923 (see 388th Report, March 2019).

Article 3. Freedom and autonomy of workers' and employers' organizations to appoint their representatives. Reactivation of the Higher Labour Council. The Committee notes with interest that, according to the Government, the Higher Labour Council, after having been inactive since 2013, was set up as of 16 September 2019. In this connection, the Committee refers to its comments on the application of the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144).

Articles 2 and 3. Legislative reforms pending. For several years, the Committee has been requesting the Government to take the necessary measures to amend the following legislative and constitutional provisions:

- articles 219 and 236 of the Constitution of the Republic and section 73 of the Civil Service Act (LSC), which exclude certain categories of public servants from the right to organize (members of the judiciary, public servants who exercise decision-making authority or are in managerial positions, employees with duties of a highly confidential nature, private secretaries of high-ranking officials, diplomatic representatives, assistants of the Public Prosecutor, or auxiliary agents, assistant prosecutors, labour prosecutors and delegates);
- section 204 of the Labour Code, which prohibits membership of more than one trade union, so that workers who have more than one job in different occupations or sectors are able to join trade unions;
- sections 211 and 212 of the Labour Code (and the corresponding provision of the LSC on unions of public service employees), which establish, respectively, the requirement of a minimum of 35 members to establish a workers' union and a minimum of seven employers to establish an employers' organization, so that these requirements do not hinder the establishment of workers' and employers' organizations in full freedom;
- section 219 of the Labour Code, which provides that, in the process of registering the union, the employer shall certify that the founding members are employees, so as to ensure that the list of the applicant union's members is not communicated to the employer;
- section 248 of the Labour Code, by eliminating the waiting period of six months required for a new attempt to establish a trade union when its registration has been denied;
- article 47(4) of the Constitution of the Republic, section 225 of the Labour Code and section 90 of the LSC, which establish the requirement to have attained the age of majority and to be a national of El Salvador by birth in order to hold office on the executive committee of a union, which are excessive restrictions of the right of the workers freely to elect their representatives;
- article 221 of the Constitution of the Republic so as to limit the prohibition of the right to strike in the public service to officials exercising authority in the name of the State and those who perform their duties in essential services in the strict sense of the term (while recalling that it is also possible to restrict the exercise of the right to strike through the establishment of minimum services in public services of fundamental importance);
- section 529 of the Labour Code so that when a decision is taken to call a strike, only the votes cast are taken into account, and also that the principle is recognized of the freedom to work of non-strikers and the right of employers and managerial staff to enter the premises of the enterprise or establishment, even where the strike has been decided upon by an absolute majority of the workers; and

– section 553(f) of the Labour Code, which provides that strikes shall be declared unlawful "where inspection shows that the striking workers do not constitute at least 51 per cent of the personnel of the enterprise or establishment," which is inconsistent with section 529(3) of the Labour Code and which restricts excessively the right of workers' organizations to organize their activities in full freedom and to formulate their programmes.

In this respect, the Committee notes that the Government duly notes the above-mentioned recommendations, indicates that consideration could not be given to proposals for reform owing to the inactivity of the Higher Labour Council over six years, and states that, with the reactivation of the latter, these, and other proposals for labour legislation reform, will be submitted to it. The Committee duly notes that, as specified by the Government, ILO technical assistance has been requested in this regard. Hoping to be able to note progress in the near future on these long-pending legislative reform matters, the Committee urges the Government, following tripartite consultation, to take the necessary measures to ensure conformity of the above provisions with the Convention.

Equatorial Guinea

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 2001)

The Committee notes with deep concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments. The Committee informs the Government that, if it has not supplied replies to the points raised by 1 September 2021, then it may proceed with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the information at its disposal at its next session.

The Committee again recalls that it has been asking the Government for a number of years to: (i) amend section 5 of Act No. 12/1992, which provides that employees' organizations may be occupational or sectoral – so that workers may, if they so desire, establish enterprise trade unions; (ii) amend section 10 of Act No. 12/1992, which provides that for an occupational association to obtain legal personality it must, inter alia, have a minimum of 50 employees – so as to reduce the number of workers required to a reasonable level; (iii) confirm that, as a result of a revision of the Fundamental Act in 1995 (Act No. 1 of 1995), the right to strike is recognized in public utilities and is exercised under the conditions laid down by law; (iv) provide information on the services deemed to be essential, and on how the minimum services to be ensured are determined, as provided for in section 37 of Act No. 12/1992; and (v) state whether public servants who do not exercise authority in the name of the State enjoy the right to strike (section 58 of the Fundamental Act).

The Committee again urges the Government to take the necessary steps to amend the legislation in order to bring it into full conformity with the provisions of the Convention and to send information in its next report on any measures taken or contemplated in this respect. The Committee expresses the strong hope that the Government will take all possible steps without delay to resume a constructive dialogue with the ILO.

Furthermore, the Committee had noted the comments of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) on the application of the Convention and the persistent refusal to register various trade unions, namely the Trade Union of Workers of Equatorial Guinea (UST), the Independent Services Union (SIS), the Teachers' Trade Union Association (ASD) and the Agricultural Workers' Organization (OTC). The Committee recalls once again that the discretionary power of the competent authority to grant or reject a registration request is tantamount to the requirement for previous authorization, which is not compatible with Article 2 of the Convention (see the 1994 General Survey on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 74). Under these conditions, the Committee once again urges the Government to register without delay those trade unions which have fulfilled the legal requirements and to provide information in this respect in its next report.

The Committee expects that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 2001)

The Committee notes with deep concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments. The Committee informs the Government that, if it has not supplied replies to the points raised by 1 September 2021, then it will proceed with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the information at its disposal at its next session.

Article 4 of the Convention. Collective bargaining. The Committee noted the previous comments by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), on the repeated refusal to recognize a number of trade unions, namely the Workers' Union of Equatorial Guinea (UST), the Independent Service Union (SIS), the Teachers' Trade Union Association (ASD) and the Rural Workers' Organization (OTC), and the lack of a legal framework for the development of collective bargaining. The Committee again stresses that the existence of trade unions established freely by workers is a prerequisite for the application of the Convention. The Committee urges the Government once again to adopt the necessary measures without delay to create appropriate conditions for the establishment of trade unions that are able to engage in collective bargaining with a view to regulating conditions of employment.

Article 6. Right of public servants not engaged in the administration of the State to engage in collective bargaining. The Committee notes that, according to ITUC's comments, the right of workers in the public administration to establish trade unions has still not been recognized in law, despite the fact that section 6 of the Act on trade unions and collective labour relations, No. 12/1992, provides that the right to organize of employees in the public administration shall be regulated by a special law. The Committee notes that the ITUC also indicates that the legal framework for collective bargaining is deficient and ambiguous. The Committee urges the Government to indicate whether a special law has been adopted and whether it establishes the right to organize and to collective bargaining of workers in the public administration, and asks it to send detailed information on the application of the Convention to public servants not engaged in the administration of the State. The Committee reminds the Government that it may seek technical assistance on this matter from the Office, and expresses the firm hope that it will take without delay all measures within its reach to resume constructive dialogue with the ILO.

Application of the Convention in practice. The Committee asks the Government to send statistics of the number of employers' and workers' organizations, the number of collective agreements concluded with these organizations and the number of workers and the sectors covered.

The Committee expects that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Eritrea

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 2000)

The Committee notes with concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments.

Civil liberties. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to provide information on how it ensures the rights of trade unions to organize their administration and activities and to hold public meetings and demonstrations in practice. In this respect, the Government reiterates earlier statements regarding provisions available under the Labour Proclamation of 2001, and indicates that in March 2017, the National Confederation of Eritrean Workers (NCEW) held its seventh congress and elected its representatives in full freedom. Furthermore, a basic workers' association was recently established in Bisha Mining Share Company, where the parties were engaged in a process of collective bargaining. The Government indicates that the latter development demonstrates that the NCEW has extended its coverage to new sectors. While taking note of this information, the Committee regrets that the Government provides no information on any measures taken in the last several years to ensure protection for the exercise of the right to hold demonstrations and public meetings in law and in practice. Recalling that the right of trade unions to hold public meetings and demonstrations is an essential aspect of freedom of association, the Committee reiterates its request.

Article 2 of the Convention. Right of workers, without distinction whatsoever, to establish and join organizations. Compulsory national service. The Committee notes that pursuant to sections 19 and 30 of the National Service Proclamation (No. 82/1995), those performing work within the framework of national service are subject to martial law and regulations and that section 3 of the Labour Proclamation excludes members of the military, police and security forces from the scope of the labour law. The Committee further notes the discussions that took place in the Conference Committee for the Application of Standards (CAS) concerning the application of the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29), and its 2015 and 2018 conclusions which make reference to large-scale and systematic practice of imposing compulsory labour on the population for an indefinite period of time within the framework of programmes related to the obligation of national service. This practice has also been reported extensively by the Commission of Inquiry on Human Rights in Eritrea established by the United Nations Humans Rights Council, as well as the Special Rapporteur on the Situation of Human Rights in Eritrea (Special Rapporteur) appointed by the same Council. The Committee notes with deep concern that large numbers of Eritrean nationals have been denied the right to organize for indefinite periods of their active life while they were forced to perform work as part of their obligation of compulsory national service. The Committee recalls that the exception in Article 9(1) of the Convention is justified on the basis of the responsibility of the police, security and armed forces for the external and internal security of the State. This exception must be construed in a restrictive manner, so as to apply only to purely military and policing functions and not to the whole active population mobilized for work in non-military areas as diverse as agriculture, construction, civil administration and education for indefinite periods of time under martial law that denies them the right to organize. In view of the above considerations, and noting the end of "no war no peace situation" that had lasted since the 1998–2000 border war with Ethiopia and the formal restoration of relations between the two countries in July 2018, the Committee urges the Government to end the general mobilization of the population for indefinite periods of time under martial law and to revoke or amend the National Service Proclamation accordingly, so as to ensure that Eritrean nationals are not denied the right to organize beyond the legally restricted period of military service, during which they would perform work of purely military character.

Civil servants. The Committee recalls that in its 2014 observation, it had observed with concern that the Government had been referring to the imminent adoption of the Civil Servants' Proclamation for the last 12 years, and had urged the Government to take all the necessary measures to expedite the adoption process of the Proclamation so as to grant without further delay the right to organize to all civil servants in accordance with the Convention, and that it repeated the same observation with concern in 2016 and 2017. The Committee notes with deep concern that the Government once again indicates that the drafting process of this Act is still at its final stage for approval. In this respect, the Committee notes that in her latest report, the Special Rapporteur informed the UN Human Rights Council that there was still no parliament in Eritrea where laws could be discussed and questions of national importance debated (A/HRC/38/50 of 25 June 2018, paragraph 28). The Committee is bound to note that the institutional standstill described in the Special Rapporteur's report does not favour the imminent adoption of new legislation. Recalling that civil servants, like all other workers with the only exception of armed forces and the police, should enjoy the right to establish and join organizations of their own choosing, the Committee urges the Government to take all the necessary measures to ensure that the adoption process of the Civil Servants' Code is concluded and the right to organize is guaranteed to all civil

The Committee notes with concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments.

Legislative issues. The Committee recalls that since its first examination of the application of the Convention in Eritrea in 2002 it had focused on a number of legislative issues and requested the Government to amend the legislation or adopt additional laws and regulations in order to address the following matters:

– Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Protection against anti-union discrimination and acts of interference. The Committee had noted that the 2001 Labour Proclamation does not provide for an adequate protection against anti-union discrimination and acts of interference in terms of period of protection, the persons protected and the sanctions and remedies provided in law, and had requested the Government to amend the Proclamation so as to strengthen the protection against anti-union discrimination and acts of interference.

– Articles 1, 2 and 4. Domestic workers. The Committee had noted that the Labour Proclamation does not explicitly grant the rights set out in the Convention to domestic workers as section 40 thereof entitles the Minister to determine by regulation the provisions of the Proclamation that apply to these workers. The Committee had expressed the hope that the guarantees enshrined in the Convention will soon be explicitly afforded to domestic workers by way of a regulation.

– Article 6. Public sector. The Committee had noted that the civil servants in the Central Personnel Administration who are not engaged in the administration of the State are excluded from the scope of the Labour Proclamation and had requested the Government to explicitly recognize their rights to protection against anti-union discrimination and acts of interference, as well as their right to negotiate collectively their conditions of employment in the new Civil Service Proclamation.

The Committee notes that the Government: (i) recognizes that legislative measures should be taken as requested by the Committee in order to ensure adequate protection against anti-union discrimination and acts of interference but that the amendment process has not yet been finalized and the Ministry of Labour and Human Welfare intends to conduct a tripartite workshop aiming at finalizing the drafting process; (ii) with regard to domestic workers, indicates that giving effect to section 40 of the Labour Proclamation requires sufficient time and skill, and the new Civil Code contains certain provisions linked with the rights of domestic workers servants under the Convention, without however providing the text of the relevant provisions of the new Civil Code; and (iii) states that the draft Public Service Code has not been enacted yet either. The Committee notes that the Government replies concerning the legislative issues highlighted in the Committee's comments reveal institutional shortcomings that have hindered the conclusion of drafting and enactment process of new legislation for many years. The Committee notes in this regard that the United Nations Commission of Inquiry on Human Rights in Eritrea had found that "since there is no legislation that regulates law-making procedures, codes, decrees and domestic legislation is prepared and adopted in the absence of a clear, transparent, consultative and inclusive process. Nobody really knows the procedure leading to the enactment of legislation or the author of a specific decree" (A/HRC/29/CRP.1, 5 June 2015, paragraph 299). The Committee further notes that in her latest report, the Special Rapporteur on the Situation of Human Rights in Eritrea, appointed by the United Nations Human Rights Council, informs the Council that there is still no parliament in Eritrea where laws could be discussed and questions of national importance debated (A/HRC/38/50, 25 June 2018, paragraph 28). The Committee notes that the institutional standstill described in the Special Rapporteur's report does not favour the imminent adoption of new legislation. The Committee therefore urges the Government to take all the necessary measures so that the processes of drafting and enacting new legislation with a view to ensuring the conformity of Eritrean law with the Convention can be successfully brought to conclusion. The Committee further encourages the Government to seek the technical assistance of the Office with a specific focus on the issues raised in this observation.

Articles 4, 5 and 6. Promotion of collective bargaining. Compulsory national service. The Committee notes that pursuant to articles 19 and 30 of the National Service Proclamation (No. 82/1995), the Eritrean nationals performing work within the framework of national service are subject to martial law and regulations and that article 3 of the Labour Proclamation of Eritrea excludes members of the military, police and security forces from the scope of labour law. The Committee notes that it stems from the conjunction of the different provisions mentioned that the persons performing work within the national service are not covered by the Labour Proclamation provisions related to collective bargaining. The Committee further notes the discussions that took place in the International Labour Conference Committee for the Application of Standards (CAS) concerning the application of Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29), and the conclusions of the CAS in this regard in June 2015 and 2018 respectively, where reference was made to a systematic and large-scale practice of requiring Eritrean citizens to perform work for an indefinite period of time within the framework of programmes related to the obligation of national service involving numerous civilian activities such as construction and agriculture. The Committee recalls that the only restrictions to the scope of application of the Convention refer to the armed forces and the police as well as to the public servants engaged in the administration of the State (Articles 5 and 6 of the Convention). The Committee further highlights that the exception in Article 5 of the Convention, like the one embodied in Article 9 of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organize Convention, 1948 (No. 87), is justified on the basis of the responsibility of the police and armed forces for the external and internal security of the State. This exception must therefore be restrictively interpreted, applying only to purely military and policing functions. As a result, persons engaged, under martial law, in activities such as agriculture, construction, civil administration and education that do not fall within military or policing activities or the administration of the State should be able to bargain collectively their conditions of employment. In view of the above legal and factual considerations, the Committee notes with concern that large numbers of Eritrean nationals are being denied the right to collective bargaining for indefinite periods of their active life while they are performing civilian activities that fall under the scope of the Convention as part of their obligation of compulsory national service. Noting the end of the "no war no peace situation" enduring since the 1998–2000 border war with Ethiopia and the formal restoration of relations between the two countries in July 2018, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures so as to ensure that Eritrean nationals are not denied the right to bargain collectively beyond the scope of the exceptions set out in Articles 5 and 6 of the Convention.

Promotion of collective bargaining in practice. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the number of collective agreements concluded and in force, the sectors concerned and the number of workers covered by these agreements.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Eswatini

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1978)

The Committee notes the observations received on 1 September 2019 from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) alleging violence by the security forces against peaceful protest actions between August and October 2018 and in September and October 2019, as well as the Government's reply thereon, both of which are addressed in this comment.

The Committee notes the observations of the Trade Union Congress of Swaziland (TUCOSWA) denouncing similar acts of police violence and disruption against peaceful demonstrations. TUCOSWA further alleges other violations of the Convention, including: (i) the refusal of a number of companies to recognise the Amalgamated Trade Union of Swaziland (ATUSWA) despite various Arbitration Awards in its favour, thus impairing its ability to develop programmes and activities; (ii) the unilateral declaration by the Police Commissioner of an industrial action as unlawful in September 2018; (iii) the refusal to allow a member of the Swaziland Nurses Association to represent the union during negotiations with the Government on the basis that he is no longer employed, thus violating the right of workers to elect their representatives in full freedom; and (iv) the intimidation and victimization of leaders of the Swaziland National Association of teachers (SNAT) and the Swaziland Electricity Supply Maintenance and Allied Workers Union (SESMAWU). The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments thereon.

Civil liberties and trade union rights. Police violence against peaceful demonstrations. The Committee notes that the ITUC alleges the following incidents during protest actions: (i) in September 2018, members of the ATUSWA were arrested and beaten up by the police during protests in five garment and textile factories involving more than 10,000 workers. According to the ITUC, the police resorted, without provocation, to disperse the workers using tear gas and beating them up; (ii) in October 2018, armed police invaded the Hlatikhulu Government Hospital during a lawful and peaceful protest by nurses. The strike came after a series of protests and rallies violently disrupted by the police; (iii) in September 2019, during a peaceful demonstration of civil servants organized by the SNAT, the National Association of Public Service and Allied Workers Union (NAPSAW) and the Swaziland National Government Accounting Personnel (SNAGAP), members of the police fired teargas, rubber bullets and water cannons at protesters during a march to deliver petitions to the Eswatini Royal Police Services Headquarters, the Ministry of Public Service and the Ministry of Education and Training. According to the ITUC, police intervened and began assaulting the protestors when the crowd diverged from their authorized protest route; and (iv) in October 2019, during a protest march of 8,000 workers in Manzini, the police fired live ammunition into groups of protesters injuring ten workers, including the Secretary General for NAPSAWU's Manzini Branch (Dumisani Nkuna). According to the ITUC, further violence erupted as the protestors reached the Manzini Regional Education Office and at least 30 workers were injured. The Government resorted to the National Industrial Relations Court to have the strike declared illegal under reasons of posing "threats to national interest." The Court handed down an interim order halting the strike action.

The Committee notes that, in reply to the observations of the ITUC, the Government informs of the setting up, in September 2019, of an Investigation Committee composed of four members, led by a senior judicial officer. The Investigation Committee was appointed to give effect to the recommendation of the Committee on Freedom of Association to initiate an independent investigation to determine the justification of the action of the police denounced by the ITUC (see 388th Report, March 2019, Case No. 2949). Otherwise, the Government recalls that the statutory Labour Advisory Board (LAB), being a tripartite advisory structure established in terms of Part III of the Industrial Relations Act, had initiated its own investigations with regard to the industrial action matters of September 2018 denounced by the ITUC. The LAB held meetings in November and December 2018 to listen to submissions from affected stakeholders including TUCOSWA, ATUSWA and SNAT, affected employers and the Police, in an effort to obtain and examine the detailed facts surrounding the conduct of these industrial actions in terms of compliance with the established legislative procedures. While the LAB was scheduled to issue findings in early 2019, this was overtaken by the decision of the Government to appoint the Independent Investigation Committee. Legal Notice No.183 of 2019 (Government Gazette of 12th September 2019) listed the functions of the Independent Investigation Committee which include: (i) determining compliance of all the industrial actions mentioned by the ITUC and TUCOSWA in their letter of complaint of September 2018, as well as the extent and justification for the involvement of the security forces in the industrial actions; (ii) investigating the alleged conduct by the police invading Hlathikhulu Government Hospital; (iii) interviewing witnesses, conducting site inspections and examining any documentary, electronic and other forms of evidence to prove or dispel elements of violence or intimidation incidental to the industrial actions mentioned by the ITUC in its letters of September 2018 and September 2019; and (iv) making findings on the conduct of the industrial actions and make recommendations on any gaps regarding the law which impact on the regulation and conduct of industrial action. On 28 September 2019, the Independent Investigation Committee extended invitation to all interested persons and stakeholders to indicate their interest to make submission. The Government states that the swift establishment of the Investigation Committee demonstrates its engagement to promote the application of the Convention.

The Government further denies the ITUC allegation that police brutality against striking workers is still prevalent and underlines that the industrial actions which took place within the period August to October 2018 are not a reflection of the general behaviour of the police against industrial actions in the country – if it is assumed that these industrial actions were characterised by police brutality. The Government indicates that during 2018 over ten other industrial actions organized by various trade unions all over the country weren't disrupted by acts of violence or brutality from the police.

The Committee must express its concern over the serious allegations of recurrent violent attacks and disruption by security forces against peaceful trade union gatherings, including alleged violent attacks occurring after the establishment of the new Investigating Committee by the Government to improve the handling of trade union gatherings in public places. In this respect, the Committee recalls that the exercise of trade union rights is incompatible with violence or threats of any kind. It is therefore important that all allegations of violence against workers who are organizing or otherwise defending workers' interests be thoroughly investigated with a view to establishing the facts, determining violations and responsibilities, punishing the perpetrators and preventing the recurrence of such acts. The Committee welcomes the decision of the Government to set up the Independent Investigation Committee and to extend its mandate to cover the industrial actions referred to by the ITUC in its communications of September 2019, and the police firing of live ammunition into groups of protesters in October 2019, along with those listed in the ITUC communication of September 2018. The Committee notes that the Investigation Committee was given an extended period until March 2021 to submit a report with findings and the Government's intention to transmit the outcome of the investigations. The Committee requests the Government to provide information with regard to the outcome of the Independent Investigation Committee, as well as any measures taken by the Government as a follow-up. With reference to its previous comments, the Committee also requests the Government to provide the results of legal and mediation proceedings in cases where the unions had subsequently resorted to the Conciliation Mediation and Arbitration Commission (CMAC) and the Industrial Court.

The Government informs of the adoption of the Police Service Act (No. 22 of 2018), noting that it contains enhanced provisions in line with the promotion of the exercise of the right to freedom of association and includes provisions so that the abuse of power by members of the police may lead to disciplinary action (Section 49(1)(I)). The Government stresses the relevance of having included such provisions in the law regulating the discipline of police officers, so as to ensure the highest exercise of restraint by police officers in their line of duty for the maintenance of public safety and public order during industrial and protest actions.

Furthermore, the Government reports on the technical assistance of the Office in 2019 for the dissemination programme of the Code of Good Practice for Industrial and Protest Actions (Legal Notice No. 202 of 2015), the Code of Good Practice on Gatherings (Legal Notice No. 201 of 2017) and the Public Order Act of 2017, as a capacity-building strategy of the various stakeholders on how industrial and protest actions can be well managed in the country, in order to minimise unwarranted confrontations between protestors and members of the law enforcement agencies and Municipal Councils. Special sessions are planned for members of Parliament, Cabinet Ministers and executive leaders of trade unions. The Committee reiterates its hope that this dynamic will contribute to a conducive climate free from violence, pressure and threats of any kind on the occasion of peaceful demonstrations by workers. Noting the Government's intention to report on the impact of the dissemination programme of the Codes of good practices, the Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on measures taken to ensure that trade union rights to engage in protest and industrial action in defence of occupational interests are indeed protected, both in law and practice, including information on violations identified and penalties imposed pursuant to section 49(1) of the Police Service Act, No.22 of 2018.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 2002)

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020). The Committee proceeded with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the supplementary information received from the Government and the social partners this year, as well as on the basis of the information at its disposal in 2019.

The Committee notes the observations of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) received on 1 September 2019 and 15 September 2020 and of the Fiji Trades Union Congress (FTUC) received on 23 May and 13 November 2019, denouncing violations of civil liberties and lack of progress on the legislative reform. The Committee notes the Government's general reply thereto, as well as to the 2017 and 2018 FTUC observations, and requests it to provide further details on the specific incidents of alleged violations of civil liberties reported by the FTUC.

Follow-up to the conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards (International Labour Conference, 108th Session, June 2019)

The Committee notes the discussion that took place in the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards (hereafter the Conference Committee) in June 2019 concerning the application of the Convention. It notes that the Conference Committee observed serious allegations concerning the violation of basic civil liberties, including arrests, detentions and assaults, and restrictions of freedom of association and noted with regret the Government's failure to complete the process under the Joint Implementation Report (JIR). The Conference Committee called upon the Government to: (i) refrain from interfering in the designation of the representatives of the social partners on tripartite bodies; (ii) reconvene the Employment Relations Advisory Board (ERAB) without delay in order to start a legislative reform process; (iii) complete without further delay the full legislative reform process as agreed under the JIR; (iv) refrain from anti-union practices, including arrests, detentions, violence, intimidation, harassment and interference; (v) ensure that workers' and employers' organizations are able to exercise their rights to freedom of association, freedom of assembly and speech without undue interference by the public authorities; and (vi) ensure that normal judicial procedures and due process are guaranteed to workers' and employers' organizations and their members. The Conference Committee also requested the Government to report on progress made towards the implementation of the JIR in consultation with the social partners by November 2019 and called on the Government to accept a direct contacts mission to assess progress made before the 109th Session of the International Labour Conference. While duly noting the context of the current COVID-19 pandemic, the Committee trusts that the direct contacts mission requested by the Conference Committee will be able to take place as soon as the situation so permits and, if possible, before the next International Labour Conference.

Trade union rights and civil liberties. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to respond in full detail to the FTUC allegations of continued harassment and intimidation of trade unionists, in particular with respect to its National Secretary, Felix Anthony. The Committee notes the Government's general statement that Mr Anthony has been able to organize and carry out trade union activities without any interference from the Government and that the arrest, search and detention of persons previously alleged by the ITUC and the FTUC were not intended to harass or intimidate trade unionists but to allow the Commissioner of Police to conduct investigations into alleged violations of applicable laws. The Government also affirms that the Commissioner of Police and the Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions are both independent and neither the entities nor their decisions are subject to the direction or control of the Government. The Committee notes, however, the 2020 ITUC allegations that Mr Anthony is currently charged with one count of malicious acts under the Public Order Act, 1969 in relation to his trade union activities following the mass termination of 2,000 workers' contracts by the Fiji Water Authority in April 2019, which led to protests and the arrest of trade unionists and union members, including Mr Anthony. The ITUC alleges that Mr Anthony was to appear before the court on 1 September 2020 and if convicted, he could receive a fine of up to US$2,500 or be imprisoned for up to three years. The Committee notes the Government's reply that the arrest and subsequent criminal prosecution of Mr Anthony are not a targeted attack but a matter that is criminal in nature and that the presiding court will make a determination on the criminal charges and penalties imposed, if any. The Committee further notes with concern the ITUC and FTUC allegations of continued intimidation by the police, arrests, detention, interrogation and the filing of criminal charges against trade unionists, as well as prolonged confiscation of personal and union property and violent dispersal of gatherings between April and June 2019. Recalling the interdependence between civil liberties and trade union rights and emphasizing that a truly free and independent trade union movement can only develop in a climate free from violence, pressure and threats of any kind against the leaders and members of such organizations, the Committee requests the Government to make serious efforts to ensure that state entities and their officials refrain from anti-union practices, including arrests, detentions, violence, intimidation, harassment and interference in trade union activities, so as to contribute to an environment conducive to the full development of trade union rights. The Committee requests the Government to consider issuing instructions to the police and the armed forces in this regard and to provide training to ensure that any actions taken during demonstrations respect the basic civil liberties and fundamental labour rights of workers and employers. Furthermore, the Committee firmly expects that any charges against Mr Anthony related to the exercise of his trade union activities will be immediately dropped.

Appointment of members to and the functioning of the Employment Relations Advisory Board to review labour legislation. In its previous comments, having observed the FTUC concerns that the Government had systematically dismantled tripartism by removing or replacing the tripartite representation on a number of bodies with its own nominees, the Committee requested the Government to provide detailed information on the manner in which it designated individuals to these bodies and the representative nature of the organizations that appeared therein. The Committee notes the detailed reply provided by the Government on the appointment of members to the ERAB, the Fiji National Provident Fund, the Fiji National University, the Wages Council and the Air Terminal Service (Fiji) Limited. The Committee also notes the Government's clarification that, in addition to the ERAB, the National Occupational Health and Safety Advisory Board (NOHSAB) and the National Employment Centre Board (NECB) also have tripartite membership. The Government further indicates, with regard to the ERAB, that: (i) the Minister for Employment is the appointing authority and representatives of workers and employers are appointed from persons nominated by workers' and employers' organizations; (ii) appointment of members is undertaken through a consultation process to allow expanded representation of workers from various organizations; (iii) there is no interference from the Government in the designation of representatives of the social partners; and (iv) as the current ERAB membership ended in October 2019, the social partners were invited to submit nominees and both the Fiji Commerce and Employers Federation (FCEF) and the FTUC have already done so at the end of October 2019. The Committee observes, however, that, according to the FTUC, there is no indication as to when the appointment of ERAB members will take place, despite the urgency of the situation, and that the ITUC remains concerned about government manipulation of national tripartite bodies, thus curtailing the possibility of genuine tripartite dialogue. The Committee trusts that the Government will refrain from any undue interference in the nomination and appointment of members to the ERAB and to other tripartite bodies, and will ensure that the social partners can freely designate their representatives. The Committee expects the appointment of ERAB members to take place without delay so as to allow this mechanism to reconvene and meet regularly in order to pursue the labour law review and meaningfully address all outstanding matters in this regard.

Progress on the review of labour legislation as agreed in the Joint Implementation Report. The Committee previously noted with regret the apparent lack of progress on the review of the labour legislation as agreed in the JIR and urged the Government to take the necessary measures with a view to rapidly bringing the legislation into line with the Convention. The Committee notes the Government's indication that several meetings took place with the tripartite partners and the ILO between June 2018 and August 2019, in which it was agreed that a number of matters under the JIR have already been implemented and that the tripartite partners are making good progress on the outstanding matters concerning the review of labour laws and the list of essential services and industries, despite the FTUC's boycott and withdrawal from the tripartite dialogue within the ERAB in June 2018, February and August 2019. The Committee notes that, according to the FTUC, the Government's reference to boycott clearly reveals that there remain issues in the appointment process of ERAB members and shows the Government's lack of genuine commitment to previously agreed timelines that had led to the boycott. The Committee notes from the resolutions adopted at the 48th biennial delegates conference of the FTUC provided by the Government in its supplementary report that: (i) the FTUC maintains its position on boycotting participation in any tripartite forums until its role as an important stakeholder with sincere engagement is recognized; and (ii) the FTUC expresses concern about the Government's failure to uphold its commitment to engage in genuine social dialogue and to take any positive action to review the labour legislation, and denounces the way in which the Ministry of Employment, Productivity and Industrial Relations has handled the review process. The Committee further observes that the ITUC calls on the Government to return to the negotiating table with the social partners to fully implement the JIR and to grant safeguards and guarantees to those participating in the dialogue. Finally, the Committee welcomes the Government's indication in its supplementary report that a detailed Plan of Action with timelines was elaborated with the ILO Country Office in September 2020 to give guidelines to the tripartite partners and the Plan of Action enumerates issues to be addressed in order to implement recommendations of the ILO supervisory mechanisms, including the reconvening of the ERAB, the ERA matrix, the reform of the essential services list, training and sensitization of the police on civil liberties and freedom of association, as well as the organization of the direct contacts mission. In light of the above, the Committee urges the Government to take all necessary measures to continue to review the labour legislation within the reconvened ERAB, as agreed in the JIR and the September 2020 Plan of Action, with a view to rapidly bringing it into line with the Convention, taking into account the Committee's comments below.

Article 2 of the Convention. Right of workers to establish and join organizations of their own choosing. The Committee had previously noted that the following issues were still pending after the adoption of the Employment Relations (Amendment) Act, 2016: denial of the right to organize to prison guards (section 3(2)); and excessively wide discretionary power of the Registrar in deciding after consultation whether or not a union meets the conditions for registration under the Employment Relations Promulgation, 2007 (ERP) (hereinafter, ERA, section 125(1)(a) as amended). The Committee notes, on the one hand, the Government's indication that the tripartite partners met in August 2019 to discuss the proposed amendments and all clauses in the ERA matrix but observes, on the other hand, the ITUC and the FTUC allegation that no progress has been achieved since then and the matrix agreed by the tripartite partners is still pending with the Solicitor General's office. In the absence of any substantial progress in this regard, the Committee urges the Government to finalize the process of review on the basis of the tripartite-agreed matrix so that the necessary amendments for bringing the legislation into full conformity with the Convention may be rapidly submitted to Parliament and adopted.

Article 3. Right of organizations to elect their representatives in full freedom, organize their activities and formulate their programmes. The Committee had previously observed that, pursuant to section 185 of the ERA as amended in 2015, the list of industries considered as essential services included: (i) the services listed in Schedule 7 of the ERP; (ii) the essential national industries declared under the former Essential National Industries (Employment) Decree, 2011 (ENID) (financial industry, telecommunications industry, civil aviation industry and public utilities industry), and the corresponding designated companies; and (iii) the Government, statutory authorities, local authorities and government commercial companies (following the adoption of the Public Enterprise Act, 2019, these are now referred to as public enterprises – an entity controlled by the State and listed in Schedule 1 of the Act or designated as such by the Minister).

The Committee welcomes the Government's indication that, as agreed in the JIR and with the technical assistance of the Office, a workshop was held on 16 and 17 October 2019 with the participation of the tripartite partners to consider, gauge and determine the list of essential services and industries. The Committee also welcomes that, as a result of the workshop, the tripartite parties agreed on a time-bound plan of action to review the existing list of essential services within the ERAB and to engage in discussion with the aim of restricting limitations on the right to strike to essential services in the strict sense of the term and public servants exercising authority in the name of the State. The Government informs that it has received proposals for amendments from representatives of workers and employers and is currently considering them. The Committee notes, however, the concerns expressed by the FTUC that due to the Minister's absence from the workshop, all decisions had to be referred to the Solicitor General's office and that the timelines continue to be ignored without any justification for the delay in convening meetings to finalize the essential national industries list and the ERA matrix.

The Committee wishes to reiterate that while some essential industries are defined in line with the Convention, namely those which had been initially included in Schedule 7 of the ERP, other industries where strikes may now be prohibited due to the inclusion of the ENID in the ERA do not fall within the definition of essential services in the strict sense of the term, including: statutory government authorities; local, city, town or rural authorities; workers in managerial positions; the financial sector; radio, television and broadcasting services; civil aviation industry and airport services (except air traffic control); public utilities industry in general; pine, mahogany and wood industry; metal and mining sector; postal services; and public enterprises in general. The Committee also wishes to emphasize that provisions which prohibit the right to strike on the basis of potential detriment to public interest or economic consequences are not compatible with the principles relating to the right to strike. The Committee recalls, however, that for services which are not considered essential in the strict sense of the term, but in which strikes of a certain magnitude and duration could cause an acute crisis threatening the normal conditions of existence of the population or in public services of fundamental importance in which it is important to deliver the basic needs of users, a negotiated minimum service, as a possible alternative to fully restricting industrial action through imposed compulsory arbitration, could be appropriate. The right to strike may also be restricted for public servants but only those exercising authority in the name of the State. Given the extensive breadth of the services where workers' rights to take industrial action may be prohibited, as noted above, the Committee urges the Government to meaningfully engage with the social partners without further delay to review the list of essential services, as agreed in the JIR and the October 2019 and the September 2020 action plans, so as to restrict limitations on the right to strike to essential services in the strict sense of the term and public servants exercising authority in the name of the State. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the progress achieved in this regard.

In addition, the Committee has been requesting for a number of years that the Government take measures to review numerous provisions of the ERA. In the absence of any progress reported in this regard, the Committee recalls that the following issues in the ERA are still pending: obligation of union officials to be employees of the relevant industry, trade or occupation for a period of not less than three months (section 127(a) as amended); prohibition of non-citizens to be trade union officers (section 127(d)); interference in union by-laws (section 184); excessive power of the Registrar to request detailed and certified accounts from the treasurer at any time (section 128(3)); provisions likely to impede industrial action (sections 175(3)(b) and 180); compulsory arbitration (sections 169 and 170, section 181(c) as amended, new section 191BS (formerly 191(1)(c)); penalty in form of a fine in case of staging an unlawful but peaceful strike (sections 250 and 256(a)); provisions likely to impede industrial action (section 191BN); penalty of imprisonment in case of staging a (unlawful or possibly even lawful) peaceful strike in services qualified as essential (sections 191BQ(1), 256(a), 179 and 191BM); excessively wide discretionary powers of the Minister with respect to the appointment and removal of members of the Arbitration Court and appointment of mediators, calling into question the impartiality of the dispute settlement bodies (sections 191D, 191E, 191G and 191Y); and compulsory arbitration in services qualified as essential (sections 191Q, 191R, 191S, 191T and 191AA). In this regard, the Committee observes, from the resolutions adopted at the 48th biennial delegates conference of the FTUC provided by the Government in its supplementary report, the concerns expressed by the FTUC about the inefficiency of the Arbitration Court and the Employment Tribunals, as well as the need to improve the current dispute resolution system in order to reduce considerable delays in resolving disputes. The Committee therefore urges the Government to take measures to review the above provisions of the ERA, in accordance with the agreement in the JIR and in consultation with the representative national workers' and employers' organizations, with a view to their amendment, so as to bring the legislation into full conformity with the Convention.

Public Order (Amendment) Decree (POAD). With regard to its previous comments concerning the practical application of the POAD, the Committee notes that the Government simply reiterates that the POAD facilitates the maintenance of public order and that prior permission is required to ensure the carrying out of administrative functions and the provision of law enforcement officers to maintain order. While further noting that the Government points to two instances, in October 2017 and January 2018, in which the FTUC obtained a permit and undertook marches, the Committee observes that, according to the FTUC, its recent requests to march from May, August and November 2019 were all refused. The ITUC and the FTUC denounce that permission for union meetings and public gatherings continues to be arbitrarily refused and that section 8 of the POAD has been increasingly used to interfere in, prevent and frustrate trade union meetings and assemblies. The Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to bring section 8 of the POAD into line with the Convention by fully repealing or amending this provision so as to ensure that the right to assembly may be freely exercised.

Political Parties Decree. The Committee had previously noted that, under section 14 of the 2013 Political Parties Decree, persons holding an office in any workers' or employers' organization are banned from membership or office in any political party and from any political activity, including merely expressing support or opposition to a political party; and that sections 113(2) and 115(1) of the Electoral Decree prohibit any public officer from conducting campaign activities, and any person, entity or organization that receives any funding or assistance from a foreign government, intergovernmental or non-governmental organization to engage in, participate in or conduct any campaign (including organizing debates, public forums, meetings, interviews, panel discussions, or publishing any material) that is related to the election. In its previous comments, the Committee further observed that the Political Parties Decree was unduly restrictive in prohibiting membership in a political party or any expression of political support or opposition by officers of employers' or workers' organizations, and requested the Government once again to take measures to amend the above provisions, in consultation with the representative national workers' and employers' organizations. Observing that the Government does not provide any new information and noting the ITUC concerns about the restrictive effect of the Political Parties Decree on legitimate trade union activities, the Committee reiterates its request in this respect.

Article 4. Dissolution and suspension of organizations by administrative authority. The Committee notes the ITUC allegations that in February 2020, the Government suspended five trade unions for failing to submit their annual audited reports and indicated that they faced penalties and deregistration if they continued to fail to comply with the legislation (the Hot Bread Kitchen Employees Trade Union, the Fiji Maritime Workers Association, the Viti National Union of I-taukei Workers, BPSS Co Limited Workers and Carpenters Group of Salaries Association and the I-taukei Land Trust Board Workers Union). According to the ITUC, such arbitrary measures represent a clear attempt at quashing independent trade unions and the legislation does not provide for sufficient guarantees for trade unions to operate without undue interference by the authorities, as demonstrated by section 128(3) of the ERA, which gives the Registrar excessive power to request detailed and certified accounts from the treasurer at any time. The Committee notes that the Government refutes this allegation as baseless and untrue and asserts that any suspension of trade union activity is done in accordance with section 133(2) of the ERA. With regard to the mentioned trade unions, the Government informs that: (i) in June 2019, the Registrar issued notices to 11 unions for failure to submit their annual returns under section 129 of the ERA; in August 2019, the Registrar issued a follow-up notice; and in September 2019, seven trade unions, which had not rectified their breach, were issued a notice of suspension; (ii) the notice of suspension provided the unions two months to show cause as to why their registration should not be suspended; (iii) despite the notice, four unions failed to rectify their breach and in June 2020, the Registrar published a notice of cancellation concerning the four unions; and (iv) the unions were again given two months to rectify their breach and the Registrar only cancelled the registration of those unions that failed to respond to the notice, whereas the remaining three suspended unions were able to submit their annual reports. The Government adds that there are currently 46 active unions in Fiji, which freely conduct their activities and the Registrar does not have the authority to dictate how they operate or function under their constitution, thus ensuring absolute freedom for trade unions to deal with their affairs. The Committee takes due note of the steps taken by the Registrar before suspending or cancelling the registration of the above trade unions and recalls that under section 139 of the ERA, a trade union may appeal a decision against suspension or cancellation of registration to the competent court. Further recalling however that the dissolution and suspension of trade union organizations constitute extreme forms of interference and should be reserved for serious breaches of the law after exhausting other possibilities with less serious effects for the organizations, and observing the ITUC's allegations that these measures constitute an attempt at quashing independent trade unions, the Committee requests the Government to consider, in consultation with the most representative organizations, any measures that are appropriate to ensure that the procedures for suspension or cancellation of trade union registration are, both in law and in practice, in full accordance with the guarantees set out in the Convention.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1974)

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020). The Committee proceeded with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the supplementary information received from the Government this year (see Article 4 below), as well as on the basis of the information at its disposal in 2019.

The Committee notes the observations of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) received on 1 September 2019 and of the Fiji Trades Union Congress (FTUC) received on 23 August 2018, and 23 May and 13 November 2019, denouncing massive dismissals of workers, including members of the National Union of Workers (NUW), restrictions on collective bargaining, especially in the public sector and essential services, and lack of progress on the legislative reform. The Committee notes the Government's reply thereto. In its previous comment, the Committee also requested the Government to provide a reply to the 2016 observations from Education International and the Fiji Teachers' Union (FTU) concerning the lack of consultation in regard to wages and terms and conditions of employment. The Committee notes the Government's reply that it has been continuously meeting with representatives of the FTU and the Fijian Teachers' Association (FTA) in relation to the terms and conditions of employment, including in November 2018 and February 2019.

Article 1 of the Convention. Adequate protection against acts of anti-union discrimination. With reference to the long-standing dispute in relation to the Vatukoula Mining Company (concerning the refusal to recognize a union and the dismissal of striking workers over 20 years ago), the Committee recalls that, in its previous comments, it had noted the Government's indication that the Vatukoula Social Assistance Trust Fund (VSATF) had been established to benefit around 800 recipients through money grants and assistance for relocation, small and micro-enterprise development and education for dependants. The Committee noted the completion of a mediation process and requested the Government to supply detailed information on its outcome and the follow-up measures taken to compensate the persons concerned, as well as in relation to the VSATF fund. The Committee notes the Government's indication that, following the mediation process and keeping in mind that it does not have any legal obligation to compensate the concerned workers, it is considering making an ex gratia payment to the workers in view of resolving their grievances but that this will require Cabinet approval. The Committee observes, however, that the Government does not provide any details as to the actual outcome of the mediation or the use of the VSATF fund. Recalling that this long-standing dispute has caused great hardship to the dismissed workers, the Committee expects that it will be finally and equitably resolved through the implementation of a mutually satisfactory settlement. The Committee requests the Government to supply information on the outcome of the mediation process and any compensation granted to the concerned workers, including any recourse to the VSATF fund. It also invites the Fiji Mine Workers' Union (FMWU) to provide information on any developments in this regard.

Article 4. Promotion of collective bargaining. In its previous comment, the Committee welcomed the repeal of the Essential National Industries (Employment) Decree, 2011 (ENID) through the adoption of the Employment Relations (Amendment) Act, 2015, as well as the removal of the concept of bargaining units from the Employment Relations Promulgation, 2007 (hereinafter Employment Relations Act (ERA)) through the Employment Relations (Amendment) Act, 2016. The Committee noted with regret however that the abrogation by ENID of the collective agreements in force which it had considered contrary to Article 4, had not been addressed and requested the Government to engage in consultations with the representative national workers' and employers' organizations with a view to exploring a mutually satisfactory solution in this respect. The Committee notes the Government's indication that it has provided the necessary conditions under section 149 of the ERA for trade unions and employers' organizations to engage in good faith employment relations. It indicates that, between 2016 and 2018, there has been successful bargaining between employers and workers resulting in the signing of 63 collective agreements and 59 amendments to collective agreements and that, between August 2019 and September 2020, the Ministry of Employment, Productivity and Industrial Relations registered 20 collective agreements and processed 46 disputes filed by trade unions, including on allegations of failure to engage in negotiations or to implement collective agreements and unfair dismissal of trade union representatives. The Committee observes, however, that, according to the FTUC: (i) all negotiations have been reverted to zero instead of using the abrogated agreements as a basis for discussion; (ii) the topics that can be negotiated in the local Government sector are severely restricted; and (iii) there is a continued refusal of the Government to engage in collective bargaining in the public sector. The FTUC also denounces that all Government-owned entities, including those employing teachers, nurses and civil servants, insist on imposing individual fixed-term contracts without any consultation with the unions, as a way of undermining the right of workers to bargain collectively and achieving the goals of the abrogated ENID. In light of the above, the Committee requests the Government to continue to take concrete measures to facilitate negotiations and promote collective bargaining between workers and employers or their organizations in the public sector so as to create an enabling environment for collective agreements to be concluded in replacement of those abrogated by ENID. It also requests the Government to continue to provide information on the number of collective agreements concluded and in force, the sectors concerned and the number of workers covered by these agreements, as well as on any additional measures undertaken to promote the full development and utilization of collective bargaining under the Convention.

Compulsory arbitration. In its previous comment, the Committee noted that sections 191Q(3), 191(R), 191(S) and 191AA(b) and (c) of the ERA, as amended in 2015, allowed for compulsory conciliation or arbitration and requested the Government to take measures to review the above provisions with a view to their amendment so as to bring the legislation into full conformity with the Convention. The Committee notes the Government's statement that the Minister for Employment, Productivity and Industrial Relations conducts compulsory arbitration only where he or she considers that the dispute may be resolved by conciliation and that one such dispute has been resolved through compulsory conciliation in 2018. The Government informs that the Employment Relations Advisory Board (ERAB) will review the relevant laws and consider any appropriate amendments. The Committee recalls once again that compulsory arbitration is contrary to the voluntary nature of collective bargaining and is only acceptable in relation to public servants engaged in the administration of the State (Article 6 of the Convention) or in essential services in the strict sense of the term or in cases of acute national crisis. The Committee expects that the above provisions of the ERA will be reviewed within the ERAB, in accordance with the agreement in the Joint Implementation Report and in consultation with the representative national workers' and employers' organizations, with a view to their amendment so as to bring the legislation into full conformity with the Convention.

Gambia

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 2000)

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020). The Committee proceeded with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the supplementary information received from the Government this year, as well as on the basis of the information at its disposal in 2019.

Trade union rights and civil liberties. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to provide comments on the observations of the International Trade Union Confederation received on 1 September 2017, which contained allegations of arbitrary arrests of several leaders of the Gambian National Transport Control Association (GNTCA), the death of Mr Sheriff Diba, one of the arrested leaders, while in detention, and the ban imposed on the activities of the GNTCA. The Committee had regretted that the Government had not provided any concrete information on these grave allegations and their investigation and only indicated that the case involving the leaders of the said Association had been discontinued before the High Court of The Gambia and that the parties had been discharged. The Committee recalled the need to make every effort to investigate the alleged grave violations of trade union rights, with a view to apportioning responsibility and punishing the perpetrators. The Committee takes note of the Government's indication that an investigation into the facts surrounding the death of Mr Sheriff Diba could be conducted by the Truth, Reconciliation and Reparation Commission (TRRC), an independent institution mandated to conduct research and investigations into human rights violations committed between July 1994 and January 2017 by the former regime. The Government further indicates that the GNTCA's matter was discharged by the High Court and that it is the responsibility of the GNTCA to re-engage the Government to review their case for consideration. The Committee expresses its firm hope that the death of Mr Diba as well as the alleged arbitrary arrests of several leaders of the GNTCA will be duly investigated by the TRRC without delay and requests the Government to provide updated information in this respect. It requests the Government to ensure that the GNTCA is informed about the necessary procedures to obtain a review of its case and also requests that the Government provide a copy of the mentioned High Court order.

Article 2 of the Convention. Right of employers and workers to establish and join organizations of their own choosing without previous authorization. Civil servants, prison officers and domestic workers. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that the Labour Act of 2007 excludes civil servants, prison officers and domestic workers from its scope (sections 3(2)(a), (c) and (d), respectively). The Committee had also noted the Government's statement that the Labour Act was in the process of being reviewed to allow these categories of workers to enjoy the rights established by the Convention. The Committee takes note of the Government's indication that the review of the Labour Act is still ongoing, and its further indication that separate statutes and regulations cover civil servants and prison officers, and that new regulations could cover domestic workers. Recalling the need to take all necessary measures to ensure that civil servants, domestic workers and prison officers enjoy the right to establish and join organizations of their own choosing, the Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information on any developments in this respect, including any revisions in the Labour Bill to extend the right to these three groups, and the specific terms of any other laws or regulations that ensure the right is accorded to each of the three groups.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 2000)

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020). The Committee proceeded with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the supplementary information received from the Government this year, as well as on the basis of the information at its disposal in 2019.

Scope of the Convention. Civil servants not engaged in the administration of the State, prison officers and domestic workers. For a number of years, the Committee has been requesting the Government to indicate if the excluded employees under section 3(2) of the Labour Act (prison officers, domestic workers and civil servants not engaged in the administration of the State) were afforded the right to collective bargaining as well as adequate protection against acts of anti-union discrimination and interference. The Committee recalls that the Government had previously indicated that while the excluded employees under section 3(2) of the Labour Act 2007 are not afforded the right to collective bargaining, they are accorded equal rights under the General Order (GO), Public Service Commission Regulations and the Terms and Conditions of Service for Men and Officers in the Military. The Government had also indicated that it aimed to adopt a new Trade Union Bill 2019 in which the exclusion of these categories of workers may be reviewed to take into consideration Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. The Committee notes that the Government has not provided information on any developments regarding the adoption of the Trade Union Bill. Recalling that, according to Articles 5 and 6, only members of the armed forces and the police, as well as public servants engaged in the administration of the State may be excluded from the guarantees set out in the Convention, the Committee requests the Government to provide information regarding the adoption of the Trade Union Bill and firmly expects that the rights afforded by the Convention will be ensured for prison officers, domestic workers and civil servants not engaged in the administration of the State.

Article 4. Measures to encourage and promote the full development and utilization of machinery for voluntary negotiation between employers or their organizations and workers' organizations. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that according to section 130 of the Labour Act, in order to be recognized as a sole bargaining agent, a trade union should represent a certain percentage of employees under a contract of service (30 per cent in the case of a single union and at least 45 per cent if the establishment in question employs at least 100 people; in this case, the bargaining agent could be composed of two or more trade unions). The Committee recalled that if no union in a specific negotiating unit meets the required threshold of representativeness to be able to negotiate on behalf of all workers, minority trade unions should be able to negotiate, jointly or separately, at least on behalf of their own members. Having noted that section 131 of the Act provides that an employer may, if he or she wishes, organize a secret ballot to establish a sole bargaining agent, the Committee recalled that the determination of the representative status of organizations for the purposes of bargaining should be carried out in accordance with a procedure that offers every guarantee of impartiality, by an independent body that enjoys the confidence of the parties (see the 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 228). On this basis, in its previous comments, the Committee underlined that the organization of a ballot for determining representativeness should be carried out by the authorities or an independent party upon a request presented by a union. The Committee therefore requested the Government to provide information on any developments in bringing the legislation into conformity with the Convention. The Committee takes note of the Government's indication that the review of the Labour Act is still ongoing and that this matter would be put before the stakeholders for consideration to be incorporated in the new Bill. Welcoming the Government's indication, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the progress achieved in this respect.

Promotion of collective bargaining in practice. While taking note of the information provided by the Government on two company-level collective agreements concluded in the private sector in 2014 and 2017, the Committee requests the Government to inform on the measures taken to promote collective bargaining in all sectors covered by the Convention and to provide information on the number of collective agreements concluded and in force in the country, the sectors concerned and the number of workers covered by these agreements.

Guatemala

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1952)

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government in the light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020). The Committee proceeded with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the supplementary information received from the Government and from the social partners this year, as well as the information at its disposal in 2019.

The Committee notes the observations of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) received on 1 September 2019 and on 16 September 2020. The Committee also notes the joint observations submitted by the Autonomous Popular Trade Union Movement and the Global Unions of Guatemala on 16 October 2020. The Committee takes note of the Government's replies to these observations which refer to matters examined in the present comment and to complaints of violations of the Convention in practice.

The Committee also notes the observations of the Coordinating Committee of Agricultural, Commercial, Industrial and Financial Associations (CACIF), supported by the International Organisation of Employers (IOE), received on 1 September 2019, also referring to matters examined by the Committee in the present comment.

COVID-19 pandemic and application of the Convention. The Committee notes that the Autonomous Popular Trade Union Movement and the Global Unions of Guatemala allege that: (i) as a result of the prohibition of public meetings due to the health emergency, a number of trade union organizations are without leadership, as the time-limit for the holding of their executive committees has elapsed; (ii) accordingly, they have repeatedly requested the Ministry of Labour to issue a Ministerial Order extending the period of the executive committees beyond their expiry date to the end of the crisis; (iii) in the absence of action by the Government, the confederations sent the Minister of Labour a draft Ministerial Order, proposing that the Ministry availed itself of the Office's assistance; (iv) on 1 October 2020, at the end of the state of emergency, when it became again possible to hold public meetings, they asked the Ministry of Labour for guidance for the trade unions that were without leadership, but obtained no reply; and (v) the limbo created by Government inaction rendered the workers and their organizations defenceless, in a context characterised by many anti-union acts. Emphasizing that distancing measures following the pandemic should not affect the capacity of trade unions to represent their members and noting that the Government does not refer to this issue in its comments on the observations of the national trade union confederations, the Commission requests the Government to enter into a dialogue with the trade unions concerned as soon as possible in order to resolve the difficulties raised. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments on these matters.

Follow-up to the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 334th Session concerning the closure of the complaint submitted under article 26 of the ILO Constitution alleging non-observance of the Convention

The Committee notes the discussions which took place during the 340th Session (October–November 2020) of the Governing Body concerning additional measures taken to ensure a sustained and comprehensive implementation of the road map adopted in 2013 as part of the follow-up to the complaint submitted in 2012 under article 26 of the ILO Constitution alleging non-observance of the Convention.

The Committee notes that the Governing Body: (i) welcomed the ILO technical cooperation programme "Strengthening of the National Tripartite Committee on Labour Relations and Freedom of Association in Guatemala for the effective application of international labour standards" and called for funding for its implementation; and (ii) requested the Office to report annually on its implementation at its October–November sessions for the duration of the three-year programme.

Trade union rights and civil liberties

The Committee notes with regret that since 2005 it has been examining, in the same way as the Committee on Freedom of Association, allegations of serious acts of violence against trade union leaders and members, including numerous murders, and the related situation of impunity. The Committee notes in this regard: (i) the information provided by the Government in its reports from 2019 and 2020 on the application of the Convention; and (ii) the information contained in the reports presented to the Governing Body in September 2019 by the Government, on the one hand, and by the Guatemalan Autonomous Trade Union and People's Movement and the Global Unions of Guatemala, on the other. The Committee further notes, from the Government's supplementary report of 2020, that the Government submits the document, formulated in a tripartite manner by the National Tripartite Committee on Labour Affairs and Freedom of Association (hereinunder the National Tripartite Committee), which was communicated to the Governing Body in September 2020, and which sets out the position of each of the tripartite constituents vis-à-vis the state of application of the 2013 road map.

The Committee also notes that the Committee on Freedom of Association, at its meeting in October 2019, examined Case No. 2609, which groups together the complaints of acts of anti-union violence, including 90 murders of members of the trade union movement recorded between 2004 and 2018 (see 391st Report, October 2019, Case No. 2609, paragraphs 270–302).

The Committee notes that the Government provides information on the institutional initiatives taken to counter anti-union violence. The Committee notes that the Government indicates specifically that: (i) with the aim of reducing the backlog and providing prompt and effective justice, in 2019 the Public Prosecutor established a unit for the investigation of crimes against judicial officials and trade unionists; (ii) the unit has a directors' office, a unit for crimes against judicial officials and a unit for crimes against trade unionists, and had at its disposal for the 2020 financial year a budget of Q4,918,412.00 (approximately US$618,500); (iii) with a view to preventing delay in the handling of cases, the Office of the Public Prosecutor has introduced an integrated case management system; (iv) the National Tripartite Committee held a meeting in February 2020 with the Chief Public Prosecutor during which, on the basis of the recommendations of the Committee on Freedom of Association, the Prosecutor was presented with a request to expedite investigations into 35 murder cases; (v) on 6 August 2020, the Government and the social partners approved the technical cooperation programme prepared by the Office and the action to be taken to strengthen the State's response to anti-union violence; and (vi) the National Tripartite Committee's plan of work for 2020-2021 provides for high level meetings with the Supreme Court, the Public Prosecutor and the Ministry of the Interior to seek solutions to the anti-union violence. The Committee further notes that, during the discussion at the 340th Session of the Governing Body, the Government referred to a joint statement of 22 October 2020 by the Ministry of Labour, the Ministry of the Interior and the Public Prosecutor's Office on anti-union violence, in which the above-mentioned institutions committed themselves to : (i) agile inter-institutional coordination to guarantee the fundamental rights of trade union leaders and trade unionists; (ii) to seek to increase and strengthen institutional capacities to achieve this objective; and (iii) to energise the spaces for dialogue with representatives of labour rights defenders and with the National Tripartite Commission.

The Committee also notes the updated data provided by the Government regarding investigations into the 90 murders of trade unionists, according to which: (i) 24 judgments have been delivered (19 convictions and 5 acquittals), and one security and corrective measure; (ii) two cases are currently at the public oral hearing stage; (iii) arrest warrants have been issued in seven cases; (iv) six cases have been dismissed, and (v) during the course of 2020, progress has been made with respect to investigations into 13 murders. The Government also states that the investigations led by the Public Prosecutor's Office are currently subject to the preventive measures adopted to address the COVID-19 pandemic.

The Committee further notes from the Government's report that between 1 January 2019 and July 2020, 109 requests for protection measures were received for members of the trade union movement and that, with respect to those: (i) 86 perimeter security measures have been established for a period of six months, three personal security measures for the same length of time, and 12 measures consisting of providing a telephone number, in view of the low level of risk identified; and (ii) eight requests remain pending; and (iii) a total of 5 members of the trade union movement now have personal security measures in place, as compared to two in 2019.

The Committee also notes from the CACIF's contribution to the National Tripartite Committee's document that the CACIF: (i) refers to the growing difficulty of clarifying events that occurred many years earlier; proposes concentrating the investigation on cases where it is possible to establish the facts and convict the perpetrators; and (iii) states that preventive and protective actions in respect of freedom of association should be reviewed by the National Tripartite Committee to assess the appropriateness of amending one or more or its components.

The Committee further notes from the ITUC's observations from 2019 and 2020 that it reports: (i) the murder in November 2018 of the leader of the Union of Secondary-Level Distance Education Workers of Santa Rosa; (ii) the murders of six trade union leaders between 2 February and 2 June 2020: and (iii) a number of attempted murders and threats against prominent national and local trade union leaders. The Committee also notes that the Autonomous Popular Trade Union Movement and the Global Unions of Guatemala, at the same time as alleging regression in the Ministry of the Interior's protection policy, report the murders of 12 trade union leaders and members between 1 January and 22 September 2020, as well as three attempted murders. The Committee notes the statement by the trade union confederations that a total of more than 100 trade union members have now been murdered. The Committee notes with deep concern these and other reports of numerous acts of anti-union violence and especially the growing number of murders reported over the past year. The Committee recalls once more in this regard that trade union rights can only be exercised in a climate free of violence, pressure or threats of any kind against trade unionists, and it is incumbent on governments to guarantee respect for this principle.

In that regard, in light of the information provided by the Government and the social partners, the Committee observes that: (i) although three additional convictions of perpetrators of murders committed in 2017 and 2018 were handed down between July 2019 and September 2020, the vast majority of the numerous reported murders of members of the trade union movement remain unpunished; and (ii) although the number of members of the trade union movement accorded protection measures has increased from 2 to 5 in the past year, such measures remain very infrequent in view of the high recorded numbers of murders and other acts of anti-union violence against members of the trade union movement.

In view of the above, while duly noting the action still being taken by the Government, the results reported and the difficulty involved in resolving the oldest murder cases, the Committee can only express its deep concern at the persistence of a high level of impunity, and at the growing number of murders of members of the trade union movement reported last year. The Committee therefore once again urges the Government to continue to take and to intensify, as a matter of urgency, all necessary and time-bound measures: (i) to investigate all acts of violence against trade union leaders and members with a view to promptly determining responsibilities and punishing the perpetrators and instigators of such acts, taking the trade union activities of the victims fully into consideration in the investigations; and (ii) to provide prompt and effective protection for all trade union leaders and members who are at risk. With regard to the specific action required to achieve those objectives, the Committee refers to the recommendations made by the Committee on Freedom of Association in the context of Case No. 2609.

Legislative issues

Articles 2 and 3 of the Convention. The Committee recalls that for many years it has been asking the Government to take measures to amend the following legislative provisions:

- section 215(c) of the Labour Code, which requires a membership of "50 per cent plus one" of the workers in the sector to establish a sector trade union (in its previous comment, the Committee noted with concern the trade unions' indication that the combination of the impossibility of establishing sector trade unions under the requirements of section 215(c) and the impossibility in small enterprises, which account for almost all Guatemalan companies, to meet the Labour Code requirement of 20 workers for the establishment of a trade union, meant that most of the country's workers were unable to exercise the right to join a trade union);
- sections 220 and 223 of the Labour Code, which establish the requirement to be of Guatemalan origin and to work in the relevant enterprise or economic activity to be eligible for election as a trade union leader;
- section 241 of the Labour Code, under the terms of which, in order to be lawful, strikes have to be called by a majority of the workers and not by a majority of those casting votes;
- section 4(d), (e) and (g) of Decree No. 71-86, as amended by Legislative Decree No. 35-96 of 27 March 1996, which provides for the possibility of imposing compulsory arbitration in non-essential services and establishes other obstacles to the right to strike; and
- sections 390(2) and 430 of the Penal Code and Decree No. 71-86, which establish labour, civil and criminal penalties in the event of a strike by public officials or workers in certain enterprises.

The Committee also recalls that for many years it has been asking the Government to take measures to ensure that various categories of public sector workers (hired under item 029 and other items of the budget) enjoy the guarantees afforded by the Convention.

In its comment adopted in 2018, the Committee noted with interest the tripartite agreements concluded in February and August 2018 relating to various aspects of the reforms needed to bring the legislation into line with the Convention. The Committee expressed the hope that, on the basis of the above, the Government would soon be in a position to report the adoption, requested for many years, of legislation which fully complies with the obligations contained in the Convention.

The Committee notes that the Government recalls that: (i) it previously submitted Bill No. 5199 with the purpose of bringing the legislation into line with the Convention and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98); and (ii) it asked the President of the National Congress Working Committee to defer the discussion in plenary of the Congress of Bill No. 5199 in order to facilitate a tripartite consensus on the above-mentioned reforms; consequently, since August 2017, the National Congress has been awaiting the consensus of the social partners. The Committee notes that the Government, in its supplementary report, also refers to: (i) the important legislative approach of the technical cooperation programme prepared by the Office and supported by the country's tripartite constituents; and (ii) the support currently provided by a consultant hired by the ILO to the National Tripartite Committee by means of a study to update the Guatemalan labour legislation in the perspective of the reforms requested by this Committee in relation to the present Convention, which will lead to meetings with the tripartite constituents in November 2020.

The Committee notes that the CACIF reiterates its commitment to the implementation of the road map and its legislative reform component. While supporting the stance adopted by the Employers' group in the various ILO bodies, maintaining that the right to strike is neither contained in nor derived from any ILO Convention, the CACIF indicates its continued willingness to work on a tripartite basis to adopt a reform proposal that satisfies national interests in the matter.

The Committee also notes that the Guatemalan Autonomous Trade Union and People's Movement and the Global Unions of Guatemala state that in the last two years no progress has been made on the legal reforms contained in the road map and specifically that: (i) the initiatives put forward in the National Tripartite Committee, including by ILO officials, were met with lack of interest on the part of the employers and the Government; and (ii) as a result, it is still not accepted that individuals have the right to organize in sector or industry trade unions, or that foreign citizens have the right to freedom of association or that the persons directly concerned can take the decision to go on strike.

While noting the continued technical assistance of the Office, the Committee notes with regret that it can be seen from the above-mentioned elements that since 2018 no real progress has been made on the drafting or adoption of legislation that would bring the existing laws into line with the Convention. Emphasizing the importance of the tripartite agreements reached in 2018, the need to finally resolve the major discrepancies identified for decades between the legislation and the Convention, and the Government's ultimate responsibility for the application of the Convention, the Committee trusts that, with the support of the Office through the technical cooperation programme, the tripartite constituents will conclude the dialogue initiated in 2018 on the issues still pending in the very near future. The Committee urges the Government to take the necessary steps, taking the outcome of the above-mentioned dialogue into consideration, to adopt legislation that fully complies with the Convention. The Committee firmly expects that the Government's next report will contain indications of major progress.

Application of the Convention in practice

Registration of trade unions. In its previous comments, having made special note of the registration of trade unions, the Committee asked the Government to intensify the dialogue with the trade unions on revising and accelerating the trade union registration procedure. The Committee notes the Government's indication that, further to the recommendations made by the Committee on Freedom of Association in October 2015 in the context of Case No. 3042, there are no obstacles to the free registration of trade union organizations. Specifically, the Government states that: (i) from the total of 36 applications for registration received in 2018, 34 trade unions were registered; (ii) between 1 August 2019 and 31 August 2020, 47 trade union organizations were registered in the Public Trade Union Register, while registration applications from 34 trade union organizations were refused or shelved on the basis of legal requirements, and 60 trade union organizations had to fulfil preconditions to be able to pursue the registration procedure; (iii) the Ministry of Labour prepared and disseminated a "trade union information pack", after presenting this "pack" at a tripartite meeting in December 2018, in order to provide effective information to workers who wish to establish a trade union; (iv) in May 2019, an invitation was issued to the workers' sector to participate in talks on the process of establishing trade unions; and (v) the technical cooperation programme prepared by the Office envisages measures to simplify procedures and reduce requirements for registration of trade unions.

The Committee also notes, however, that the Autonomous Popular Trade Union Movement of Guatemala and the Global Unions of Guatemala state that: (i) Guatemala remains the Latin American country with the lowest rate of trade union membership (1.5 per cent); (ii) according to the figures supplied by the Government itself in its report to the Governing Body, there has been a significant decrease in new trade union registrations in 2018 and 2019 compared with previous years; (iii) a substantial proportion of trade union organizations that applied for registration between August 2019 and August 2020 were not registered by the labour administration; and (iv) the figures supplied by the Government demonstrate that the labour administration is going too far in its practice of insisting on amendments to trade union constitutions as a precondition to registration and continues to impose registration requirements which are complex and legally dubious. Noting the latest figures regarding the registration of trade unions and the divergent views of the Government and the trade unions in this regard, the Committee encourages the Government and the trade unions to take major steps forward in their dialogue on accelerating the process of trade union registration. Underlining the opportunity that the technical cooperation programme prepared by the Office presents, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on all progress made in this respect.

Settlement of disputes relating to freedom of association and collective bargaining. With regard to the functioning of the Mediation and Dispute Settlement Subcommittee of the National Tripartite Committee, the Committee refers to its observations on the application of Convention No. 98.

Awareness-raising campaign on freedom of association and collective bargaining. In its previous comments, after noting a series of initiatives that had been taken or envisaged, the Committee urged the Government, in collaboration with the social partners, to ensure that the awareness-raising campaign on freedom of association and collective bargaining, provided for in the 2013 road map, was given real visibility in the national mass media. The Committee notes the Government's observation that the technical cooperation programme prepared by the Office and approved by the national tripartite constituents envisages the "approval, dissemination and implementation of a campaign to promote collective bargaining". The Committee also notes that the Guatemalan trade union federations claim that no progress has been made in the implementation of awareness-raising and dissemination campaigns relating to freedom of association.

The Committee notes with regret that since its last comment no significant progress has been made in the implementation of the awareness-raising campaign on freedom of association and collective bargaining. Emphasizing the major contribution that the National Tripartite Committee and its tripartite members should make in this respect and the responsibility that ultimately lies with the Government for ensuring that the commitments made in the road map are effectively implemented, the Committee once again urges the Government to take the necessary steps, with the support of the social partners and of the technical cooperation programme prepared by the Office, to ensure that the awareness-raising campaign on freedom of association and collective bargaining is given real visibility in the national mass media.

Observing the absence of significant progress in the past two years, the Committee urges the Government, in collaboration with the National Tripartite Committee and the support of the technical cooperation programme prepared by the Office to take all the necessary measures to remedy in the very near future the serious violations of the Convention noted for many years by the Committee.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1952)

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020). The Committee updated the 2019 examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the supplementary information received from the Government and the social partners this year.

The Committee notes the observations of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) received on 1 September 2019 and 16 September 2020, as well as the joint observations of the Autonomous Popular Trade Union Movement and the Global Unions of Guatemala received on 16 October 2020.

The Committee also notes the observations of the Coordinating Committee of Agricultural, Commercial, Industrial and Financial Associations (CACIF), received on 1 September 2019, referring to matters examined by the Committee in the present comment.

Lastly, the Committee notes the Government's replies to the different observations made by the ITUC and the national trade union federations, which included among others, allegations of anti-union discrimination and obstruction of collective bargaining in both the public and private sectors. These replies were taken into consideration by the Committee in its examination of the various issues raised in the present comment.

COVID-19 pandemic and application of the Convention. The Committee notes that the national trade union federations allege that, as a result of the COVID-19 pandemic, both the Ministry of Labour premises and the national labour courts were shut down, leaving workers completely unprotected to file complaints for violations of fundamental labour rights. While acknowledging the great challenges posed by the pandemic, the Committee requests the Government to provide its comments on the matter.

In its 2019 comments, the Committee had noted the closure by the Governing Body of the complaint made in 2012 under Article 26 of the ILO Constitution, concerning non-observance of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87). The Committee recalls that in the follow-up to the above-mentioned complaint and in the road map adopted by the Government in 2013 in the context of the complaint, several issues had been raised with regard to the implementation of this Convention.

The Committee takes note of the discussions that took place during the 340th Session of the Governing Council (October-November 2020) concerning the additional measures taken to achieve a sustainable and comprehensive implementation of the afore-mentioned road map.

The Committee notes that the Governing Body (i) welcomed the technical cooperation project "Strengthening of the National Tripartite Committee on Labour Relations and Freedom of Association in Guatemala for the effective application of international labour standards" (hereinafter the technical cooperation program) and requested that its implementation be funded, and (ii) requested the Office to present an annual report on the implementation of the project at its October-November meetings, during the projected three-year project duration.

Article 1 of the Convention. Protection against anti-union discrimination. Activities of the labour inspectorate. In its previous comments, the Committee noted with satisfaction that Legislative Decree No. 7/2017 had restored the power of the labour inspectorate to impose penalties and asked the Government to provide information on the impact of the new Legislative Decree regarding protection against acts of anti-union discrimination.

The Committee notes that the Government, in its 2019 report and its 2020 supplementary information, indicates that: (i) between January 2018 and April 2019, the total number of penalties notified by the labour inspectorate was 1,233, and between January 2018 and 10 August 2020, 783 fines were paid by the infringing companies; (ii) in this early phase of implementation of Decree No. 7/2017, it is not yet possible to disaggregate and isolate information on the penalties applied for violations of trade union rights and of collective bargaining; (iii) however, the Labour Inspectorate (IGT) is developing an electronic system in order to have disaggregated information on, inter alia, the reasons for the penalties and the action taken to comply with them, and the IGT gives a firm undertaking in this respect to provide the requested information in the very near future; (iv) nevertheless, the IGT was able to report that between 2017 and April 2019 it handled 1,179 complaints from trade unions, including, in particular, 333 allegations of reprisals against trade union leaders; and for the entire year 2019, a total of 539 complaints related to acts that could be classified as anti-union discrimination were received at the national level, and they are being addressed; and (v) the Government has initiated the procedures to adopt the Ministerial Agreement that will render operational the IGT Tripartite Advisory Council. The latter being the appropriate forum for the IGT and the social partners to exchange views on improving the implementation of Decree No. 7/2017.

The Committee welcomes the efforts to develop a comprehensive information system that enables follow-up action to be taken in relation to penalties imposed in matters concerning freedom of association and collective bargaining hopes that the IGT Tripartite Advisory Council will start its activities without further delay. While recalling its previous comments on the content of Legislative Decree No. 7/2017 in the context of monitoring the application of the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), the Committee once again underlines the vital importance of labour inspection in achieving adequate protection against acts of anti-union discrimination, especially in a context of numerous complaints on this matter. In view of the above, the Committee requests the Government to reinforce the measures taken to ensure that infringements of trade union rights and collective bargaining are given priority treatment by the Labour Inspectorate and to ensure that an effective system of information on the follow-up given to inspections in this regard is established. The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information in this respect, including the statistics requested in its previous comment. The Committee recalls that the Government may avail itself of the technical assistance of the Office, especially in the context of the start of the technical cooperation program developed by the latter.

Effective judicial proceedings. In its previous comments, the Committee expressed concern at the many complaints alleging the persistent slowness of judicial procedures in relation to anti-union discrimination and the high level of non-compliance with reinstatement orders. While welcoming the initiative to adopt a reform of the judicial labour proceedings, the Committee emphasized the need for this initiative to include as one of its priorities the adoption of effective judicial procedural rules to ensure that all cases of anti-union discrimination are examined by the courts in summary proceedings and that the respective court rulings are implemented rapidly. The Committee notes in this regard that the Government provides updated data on the procedural status of relocation proceedings, according to which, between 1 January 2019 and 7 September 2020: (i) the country's labour courts received 6257 reinstatement complaints (6123 for the public sector and 134 for the private sector); (ii) of the 6257 requests for reinstatement, 1794 have already resulted in a judicial decision, 148 were dismissed or resulted in a withdrawal and 4315 are ongoing; (iii) of 1501 reinstatement rulings ordered during that period, 385 were executed, 918 resulted in an objection by the employer and 198 were not possible for practical reasons (incorrect address and so on); (iv) during the same period, 1390 appeals were lodged in respect of the reinstatements (1323 in relation to the public sector and 67 to the private sector); (v) the Public Ministry issued 344 certified reports in respect of the reinstatement proceedings (343 for the public sector and one for the private sector); and (vi) 55 per cent of the amparo proceedings examined by the Supreme Court of Justice relate to labour issues. The Committee further notes the Government's indication that Bill No. 5809 submitted by the Supreme Court of Justice, which provides for the approval of the Labour and Social Security Procedural Code, is about to be presented in plenary session to the Congress of the Republic. This code will allow for agile and effective judicial proceedings in labour-related matters. The Committee finally notes that the Government indicates that the Subcommittee, in compliance with the road map of the National Tripartite Committee, is examining the failure of two municipalities and two other public institutions to comply with reinstatement orders as a matter of priority.

In the light of the above, the Committee observes that: (i) the general statistics supplied by the Government on the judicial processing of reinstatement requests in the context of collective disputes continue to show a substantial accumulation of cases pending before the labour courts and before the Public Prosecutor's Office and a very high level of non-compliance with judicial reinstatement orders; (ii) the ITUC and the national trade union federations continue to denounce the lack of progress on judicial protection against anti-union discrimination acts; (iii) CACIF emphasizes that, according to the data supplied by the judiciary, the public sector is where most reinstatements are requested; and (iv) even though the draft reform of the judicial procedural rules on labour matters prepared by the Supreme Court, is intended to expedite labour judicial proceedings in general, it does not appear from the information provided, that the project contains specific provisions aimed at ensuring the summary and effective resolution of cases of anti-union discrimination.

The Committee notes with concern that the details provided above reveal a lack of progress regarding the judicial response to the cases of anti-union dismissals, an issue which has been raised in its comments on the application of the Convention by Guatemala since 2001. In this regard, the Committee emphasizes that: (i) anti-union discrimination represents one of the most serious violations of freedom of association, since it can endanger the very existence of trade unions; (ii) the persistent failure to comply with a high proportion of reinstatement orders in cases of anti-union dismissals has been highlighted in the recent Governing Body discussions on the application of the road map adopted in 2013; and (iii) in two recent cases, the Committee on Freedom of Association once again urged the Government, in consultation with the social partners, to carry out a thorough review of the procedural rules of the relevant labour regulations in order to ensure that the judiciary provides appropriate and effective protection in cases of anti-union discrimination (see 392nd Report, October 2020, Case No. 2869, paragraph 633 and 386th Report, June 2018, Case No. 3188, paragraph 340).

In view of the above, the Committee urges once again the Government to address as a matter of priority the need to provide an effective judicial response to the cases of anti-union discrimination. The Committee especially urges the Government: (i) to take measures as soon as possible, in coordination with all the competent authorities, to overcome the obstacles to effective compliance with the reinstatement orders handed down by the courts; and (ii) to take the necessary steps to ensure that, in consultation with the social partners, new procedural rules are adopted so that all cases of anti-union discrimination are examined by the courts in summary proceedings and the respective court rulings are implemented rapidly. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in this respect.

Article 4. Promotion of collective bargaining. In its previous comments, the Committee noted with growing concern the low and ever-decreasing number of collective agreements that had been signed and approved. The Committee therefore asked the Government to make use of the new National Tripartite Committee on Industrial Relations and Freedom of Association to examine with the social partners the obstacles, both legislative and practical, to the effective promotion of collective bargaining with a view to taking measures to foster collective bargaining at all levels.

The Committee notes the information provided by the Government indicating that approval was given to: (i) 17 collective agreements in 2017 (11 in the public sector, six in the private sector); (ii) 14 collective agreements in 2018 (six in the public sector, eight in the private sector); (iii) 12 collective agreements between 1 January and 18 September 2019 (eight in the public sector and four in the private sector); and (iv) six collective agreements between August 2019 and 31 August 2020. The Committee takes note in this regard of the allegations of the ITUC and the national trade union federations, based on the statistics provided by the Government, that there is a serious decline in collective bargaining in the country.

The Committee notes with concern that the already extremely low number of collective agreements agreed and approved continues to decline, also recalling that, to date, collective agreement are negotiated and concluded on a decentralized basis, at the level of enterprises and public institutions, which suggests, in the absence of statistics in this respect, extremely low coverage in terms of collective bargaining in the country. The Committee also recalls that, in its 2018 comment, it noted with interest that the tripartite agreement concluded by the national constituents in November 2017 identified, among the objectives of the legislative reform due to be submitted to the Congress of the Republic, the mechanisms and requirements applicable to sectoral collective bargaining. In this regard, the Committee notes the Government's 2019 indication that, in the context of the discussions on the legislative reforms contemplated in the road map of 2013 and the agreement of 2017, the national constituents agreed in August 2018 on a set of principles on which the future legislation should be based, principles that include the right to collective bargaining of industry trade unions. While noting the absence of concrete progress on the development of legislative instruments based on the principles agreed upon in 2018, the Committee notes that the Government indicates in its supplementary information that: (i) the technical cooperation project developed by the Office contains activities relating to the promotion of collective bargaining; and (ii) a consultant hired by the ILO is providing support to the National Tripartite Committee by carrying out a study to update Guatemalan labour legislation in the light of the reforms requested by this Committee, assistance which would lead to meetings with the tripartite constituents in November 2020.

The Committee requests the Government to make use, with the support of the technical cooperation program developed by the Office, of the National Tripartite Committee on Industrial Relations and Freedom of Association to examine with the social partners the obstacles, both legislative and practical, to the effective promotion of collective bargaining so that it is able to take measures to promote collective bargaining at all levels. In this regard, the Committee expresses the firm hope that the agreement of August 2018 concerning the principles on which the reform of the labour legislation should be based will soon be reflected in the adoption of legislation in the very near future. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in that regard.

Articles 4 and 6. Promotion of collective bargaining in the public sector. In its previous comments, noting the observations of the ITUC and various national trade union federations and recalling that Guatemala has ratified the Collective Bargaining Convention, 1981 (No. 154), which covers the public sector, the Committee asked the Government to take steps to facilitate the process of the approval of collective agreements in the public sector and ensure that any refusal to approve a collective agreement was on grounds compatible with the Convention. The Committee also asked the Government to send its comments on the trade union observations denouncing the prohibition on wage negotiation in the public sector and the legal proceedings instituted by the Public Prosecutor's Office against 14 collective agreements. Lastly, the Committee asked the Government to take the necessary steps, in consultation with the trade union organizations concerned, to ensure that collective bargaining in the public sector takes place in a clear and balanced regulatory framework.

With regard to the approval of public sector collective agreements and the possibility of negotiating wages in the public administration, the Committee notes the 2019 Government's indications that: (i) section 96 of the Act on the general budget (revenue and expenditure) of the State for the 2019 financial year and section 19 of the "Annual plan of wages and regulations for the Administration" (Government Order No. 245-2018) recognize the possibility of pay negotiations in government entities, taking account of the financial conditions of the State, such information being provided by the Ministry of Finance; (ii) the Ministry of Labour issued a circular dated 25 January 2019 to expedite the process of approval of collective agreements; (iii) in late 2018, the Ministry of Labour submitted to the National Tripartite Committee a draft government order for the purpose of establishing the formal requirements for approval of collective agreements in the public administration; tripartite consolidation of the text is pending; and (iv) the collective agreement on conditions of work of the Education Workers' Union of Guatemala has already been approved and is now in force. The Committee notes that, in the additional information provided in 2020, the Government informs that, in addition to the six collective agreements approved between August 2019 to August 2020, 15 additional applications for approval were requested in the same period, the labour administration is examining 14, and a file has been returned to the applicants for completion. In this regard, the Committee also notes the recurrent allegations by the national trade union federations according to which the labour administration would have used the approval process to hinder collective bargaining in the public sector. Stressing the importance of strengthening the regulatory framework applicable to the approval of collective bargaining agreements in the public sector, the Committee notes with concern the very long periods to which public sector collective bargaining agreements are still subject before approval. The Committee requests the Government to, in consultation with the representative trade union organizations of the sector, identify appropriate measures to remedy this situation and to report on any progress in this regard.

With regard to the claims of the trade union organizations concerning investigations and legal proceedings launched by the Public Prosecutor's Office against a number of collective agreements in the public sector, the Committee notes the Government's statement that the Public Prosecutor's Office does not systematically challenge the benefits granted through collective bargaining but seeks to ensure that the principle of legality prevails in the exercise of the right to collective bargaining. The Committee once again considers that a practice whereby the authorities almost systematically challenge the benefits awarded to public sector workers on the basis of considerations related to "rationality" or "proportionality" with a view to their cancellation (by reason, for example, of their cost deemed to be excessive) would seriously jeopardize the very institution of collective bargaining and weaken its role in the settlement of collective disputes. However, if the collective agreement contains provisions that are contrary to fundamental rights (e.g. non-discrimination), the judicial authority could nullify these provisions so as to ensure respect of higher standards (see the 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 207). The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to take all possible steps to promote the negotiated, consensual settlement of any disputes that arise regarding the supposedly excessive nature of certain clauses in collective agreements in the public sector.

Application of the Convention in practice. Maquila sector. In previous comments, having noted with concern that the unionization rate in the sector was below 1 per cent and that the approval of only one collective agreement covering a maquila (export processing) enterprise was known in recent years, the Committee asked the Government to examine with the social partners, in the new National Tripartite Committee on Industrial Relations and Freedom of Association, the obstacles to the exercise of trade union rights and collective bargaining in the maquila sector and to intensify initiatives for the effective promotion of these rights in the sector. The Committee notes that in its complementary information, the Government states that from 2013 to 16 March 2020, five registered unions were counted in this sector. In the absence of additional information, the Committee is bound to repeat its previous requests and hopes that the Government will provide information on specific initiatives to promote collective bargaining in the maquila sector in its next report.

Application of the Convention in municipal authorities. In its comment published in 2018, in view of the large number of allegations of violations of the Convention at the municipal level, the Committee urged the Government to take all the necessary measures to ensure compliance with the Convention in municipalities. The Committee notes the Government's indication that, in the context of the entry into office of the new municipal authorities resulting from the municipal elections of June 2019, the Ministry of Labour had submitted to the National Tripartite Committee a proposal for a statement concerning the need to avoid anti-union dismissals in municipal authorities. The Ministry is still awaiting comments on this matter from the worker members of the National Tripartite Committee.

The Committee also notes the Government's detailed replies to the observations of the ITUC, the Guatemalan Autonomous Trade Union and People's Movement and the Global Unions of Guatemala concerning specific situations within municipalities. The Committee notes with concern that the information supplied shows that both labour inspections and court decisions are often insufficient to resolve situations involving violations of the Convention, especially in relation to cases of anti-union dismissals of municipal workers.

Underlining the need for effective mechanisms to ensure that municipal authorities comply with the rule of law and that an exhaustive analysis is carried out of the reasons for the high degree of conflict in this sector, the Committee urges the Government to take all the necessary measures, including the adoption of legislation if necessary, to ensure the application of the Convention in the municipal authorities. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on progress made in this respect.

Tripartite dispute settlement in relation to freedom of association and collective bargaining. In its comment on the present Convention, published in 2018, the Committee noted with interest that the tripartite agreement signed on 2 November 2017 provided that the new National Tripartite Committee on Industrial Relations and Freedom of Association will incorporate the functions of the tripartite Dispute Settlement Committee, established in 2016 for the purpose of resolving disputes concerning freedom of association and collective bargaining by means of voluntary conciliation. In the above comment, and in its comment on the application of the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), published in 2019, the Committee, noting the large number of disputes referred to the ILO, encouraged the Government and the social partners to devote the necessary efforts to ensure that the new Dispute Settlement Subcommittee can contribute very quickly to a better application of the Conventions on freedom of association and collective bargaining ratified by Guatemala.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that the Subcommittee began to function effectively and that a direct agreement was reached between the Ministry of Environment and Natural Resources and the unions of the mentioned Ministry. The Committee also notes that the national trade union federations, for their part, claim that the Subcommittee does not function because of a lack of tripartite spirit and the unwillingness of the employers who were invited to the Subcommittee. The federations allege that the agreement referred to by the Government was reached outside the Subcommittee and that it was breached by the employer, leading to the outbreak of the collective conflict.

Stressing the important role that the Dispute Settlement Subcommittee can play in a context of numerous allegations of anti-union discrimination and noting that the technical cooperation programme developed by the Office provides for its strengthening, the Committee hopes that the Government will be able to report on the progress made in its activities.

Noting the lack of significant progress the Committee urges the Government to take all necessary steps, with the participation of the National Tripartite Committee and with the support of the technical assistance program developed by the Office, to remedy as soon as possible the serious violations of the Convention that the Committee has been raising for many years.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1966)

The Committee notes with concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments.

In its previous observation, the Committee referred to the recognition of only those unions claiming 40 per cent support of the workers, as set out in the Trade Union Recognition Act. The Committee takes note of the Government's statement that, at the request of the Trades Union Congress, the Trade Union Recognition Act provided for the recognition of unions that were recognized prior to the Act without having to prove that they had majority support (section 32). All unions benefited from this provision which the Government says is no longer applicable as all certificates applicable under this section have been issued. Given that the representativeness of unions might change, the Committee recalls once again that, if no union covers more than 40 per cent of the workers in the bargaining unit, collective bargaining rights should be granted to all the unions in the unit, at least on behalf of their members (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 241). The Committee hopes that significant progress respecting this issue will be made in the near future and requests the Government to provide information on the results of the consultative process.

Collective bargaining in practice. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken, in conformity with Article 4 of the Convention, to promote collective bargaining as well as to provide information on the number of collective agreements concluded and in force in the country, indicating the sectors concerned and the number of workers covered.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1979)

The Committee takes note of the observations on the application of the Convention in practice submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) on 24 September 2020, which include allegations of violations of the right to organize in export processing zones. The Committee also takes note of the comments of Education International received on 1 October 2020, which denounce a challenge to the right of organizations to freely carry out their activities in the education sector. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments in this respect.

The Committee notes with deep concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments. The Committee informs the Government that, if it has not supplied replies to the points raised by 1 September 2021, then it may proceed with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the information at its disposal at its next session.

The Committee notes the observations of the Confederation of Public and Private Sector Workers (CTSP), received on 1 September 2019, on matters covered by the present comment, as well as allegations of violations of trade union rights in practice. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments in this respect.

The Committee notes the Government's communication received on 30 October 2018 in which it informs the Committee that, further to the conclusions of the Conference Committee, it has requested ILO technical assistance with a view to helping in the presentation of the reports due, strengthening the inspection services, consolidating social dialogue for the continuation of social reforms, and addressing the other points raised by the Conference Committee. The Government adds that it hopes to receive the requested assistance before the next session of the International Labour Conference. The Committee hopes that this technical assistance will be provided without delay.

The Committee notes the observations of the Association of Haitian Industries (ADIH) received on 31 August 2018. It also notes the observations of the Confederation of Public and Private Sector Workers (CTSP) and the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), received on 1 September 2018, as well as the observations of the Trade Union Federation of Haiti (CSH), received on 29 August 2018, which relate to the application of the principles of freedom of association in practice.

The Committee notes the observations of the Confederation of Public and Private Sector Workers (CTSP) and the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), received on 30 August and 1 September 2017, respectively, which relate to the application of the principles of freedom of association in practice. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments in this respect.

The Committee recalls that for many years it has been requesting the Government to amend the national legislation, and particularly the Labour Code, to bring it into conformity with the provisions of the Convention. The Committee recalls that its comments principally concerned:

Article 2 of the Convention. Right of workers, without distinction whatsoever, to establish and join organizations of their choosing:

– the need to amend sections 229 and 233 of the Labour Code in order to ensure that minors who have reached the statutory minimum age for admission to employment are allowed to exercise their trade union rights without parental authorization;

– the need to amend section 239 of the Labour Code so as to allow foreign workers to serve as trade union officials, at least after a reasonable period of residence in the country;
– the need to guarantee for domestic workers the rights laid down in the Convention (section 257 of the Labour Code provides that domestic work is not governed by the Labour Code, and the Act adopted by Parliament in 2009 to amend this provision – the Act has not yet been adopted, but the Government referred to it in its previous reports – also does not recognize the trade union rights of domestic workers).

Article 3. Right of workers' organizations to organize their activities and formulate their programmes:

– the need to revise the provisions of the Labour Code on compulsory arbitration in order to ensure that recourse to the latter is only possible to bring an end to a collective labour dispute or a strike in certain circumstances, namely: (1) when the two parties to the dispute so agree; or (2) when a strike may be restricted or prohibited, namely: (a) in the context of disputes involving officials who exercise authority in the name of the State; (b) in disputes in essential services in the strict sense of the term; or (c) in situations of acute national or local crisis, although only for a limited period and solely to the extent necessary to meet the requirements of the situation.

The Committee expects that with the technical assistance that it is receiving, particularly in view of the resumption of tripartite dialogue for the reform of the Labour Code, the Government will be in a position in its next report to indicate that progress has been achieved in the revision of the national legislation to bring it into full conformity with the Convention.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee expects that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary measures in the near future.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1957)

The Committee takes note of the observations of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 24 September 2020, as well as those of Education International dated 1 October 2020. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments in this respect.

The Committee notes with deep concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments. The Committee informs the Government that, if it has not supplied replies to the points raised by 1 September 2021, then it may proceed with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the information at its disposal at its next session.

The Committee notes the observations of the Confederation of Public and Private Sector Workers (CTSP), received on 1 September 2019, on matters covered by the present comment, as well as allegations of violation of the Convention in practice. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments in this respect.

The Committee notes the Government's communication received on 30 October 2018 in which it informs the Committee that, further to the conclusions of the Conference Committee, it has requested ILO technical assistance with a view to helping in the presentation of the reports due, strengthening the inspection services, consolidating social dialogue for the continuation of social reforms, and addressing the other points raised by the Conference Committee. The Government adds that it hopes to receive the requested assistance before the next session of the International Labour Conference. The Committee hopes that this technical assistance will be provided without delay.

The Committee notes the observations of: (i) the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) received on 1 September 2018 denouncing the absence of collective bargaining in the country as a result of the alleged opposition from employers; (ii) the Confederation of Public and Private Sector Workers (CTSP) received on 29 August 2018 and related to elements examined by the Committee in its previous comment; and (iii) the Trade Union Federation of Haiti (CSH), received on 1 September 2018 alleging acts of anti-union discrimination. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments thereon.

The Committee finally notes the observations from the Association of Haitian Industries (ADIH) received on 31 August 2018.

The Committee recalls the observations of the Confederation of Public and Private Sector Workers (CTSP), received on 30 August 2017, concerning allegations of grave violations of freedom of association in both the public and the private sectors, and particularly in several enterprises in textile export processing zones, where some 200 unionized workers and trade union leaders have been dismissed following a strike called in May 2017 in support of an increase in the minimum wage. The Committee notes in this respect the campaign launched in July 2017 by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) and the Trade Union Confederation of the Americas (TUCA) denouncing violations of freedom of association. The Committee expresses deep concern at this information. It notes that these issues are being followed-up by the Better Work programme, a partnership between the ILO and the International Finance Corporation (IFC), a member of the World Bank Group, which has been present in Haiti since 2009. Recalling that acts of harassment and intimidation carried out against workers or their dismissal by reason of trade union membership or legitimate trade union activities is a serious violation of the principles of freedom of association enshrined in the Convention, the Committee expects that the Government will take the necessary measures to ensure respect for these principles and requests it to provide information on any investigations ordered by the Ministry of Social Affairs and Labour (MAST), and any judicial procedures in this regard.

Article 1 of the Convention. Adequate protection against acts of anti-union discrimination. The Committee recalls that its previous comments concerned the need to adopt a specific provision establishing protection against anti-union discrimination in recruitment practices, and the need to adopt provisions generally affording adequate protection to workers against acts of anti-union discrimination (on the basis of trade union membership or activities) during employment, accompanied by effective and rapid procedures and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions. In this regard, the Committee recalls that, in accordance with section 251 of the Labour Code, "any employer who, in order to prevent an employee from joining a trade union, organizing a trade union or exercising his or her rights as a trade union member, dismisses, suspends or demotes the employee or reduces his or her wages, shall be liable to a fine of 1,000 to 3,000 Haitian gourdes (approximately US$15–45) to be imposed by the labour tribunal, without prejudice to any compensation to which the employee concerned shall be entitled". The Committee requests the Government to ensure that, in the context of the renewal of tripartite dialogue for the reform of the Labour Code, the penalties provided for in the event of anti-union discrimination during employment are increased substantially in order to ensure that they are sufficiently dissuasive. It also requests the Government to ensure the adoption of a specific provision establishing protection against anti-union discrimination at the time of recruitment.

Article 4. Promotion of collective bargaining. The Committee once again recalls the need to amend section 34 of the Decree of 4 November 1983, particularly in relation to its provisions empowering the Labour Organizations Branch of the Labour Directorate of the MAST "to intervene in the drafting of collective agreements and in collective labour disputes with regard to all matters relating to freedom of association". The Committee expects that the Government will draw on the technical assistance provided by the Office to amend section 34 of the Decree of 4 November 1983 in order to ensure that the Labour Organizations Branch can only intervene in collective bargaining at the request of the parties.

Right to collective bargaining of public servants not engaged in the administration of the State and public employees. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the legislative provisions relating to this subject.

Right to collective bargaining in practice. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, following the tripartite training course organized by the Office in 2012 in Port-au-Prince for the interested parties in the textile sector, the participants emphasized the need to establish a permanent forum for bipartite dialogue in order to strengthen dialogue between the actors in the sector. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on this subject, including in light of the most recent events in the textile sector in May 2017. The Committee notes with concern that, according to the CTSP, there are only four collective agreements in force in the country and some of them are not signed by the lawful representatives of workers. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments on this subject and to supply information on the measures adopted or envisaged to promote collective bargaining in the country.

The Committee expects that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Honduras

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1956)

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020). The Committee proceeded with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the supplementary information received from the Government and the social partners this year, as well as the information at its disposal in 2019.

The Committee notes the supplementary observations of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) received on 16 September 2020, and the joint observations of the General Confederation of Workers (CGT) and the Workers' Confederation of Honduras (CTH), received on 5 October 2020. The Committee also notes the observations of the Honduran National Business Council (COHEP), received on 1 October 2020. The Committee notes the Government's replies to these various observations, which refer to matters examined by the Committee in the present observation.

Follow-up to the conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards (International Labour Conference, 108th Session, June 2019)

The Committee notes the discussion which took place in June 2019 in the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards (hereinafter: the Conference Committee) concerning the application of the Convention by Honduras. The Committee observes that the Conference Committee, after noting with serious concern the allegations of acts of anti-union violence, including the allegations of physical aggression and murders, and the prevailing climate of impunity, and after also noting the ILO direct contacts mission that took place in May 2019 and the resulting tripartite agreement, asked the Government to apply the tripartite agreement, including with respect to: the establishment of a national-level committee by June 2019 to combat anti-union violence; the establishment of a direct line of communication between trade unions and relevant public authorities; the provision of prompt and effective protection to at-risk trade union leaders and members; the prompt investigation of anti-union violence with a view to arresting and charging those responsible, including the instigators; the transparency of the complaints received through biannual reporting; the need for awareness-raising in relation to protective measures available to trade unionists and human rights defenders; the reform of the legislative framework, and in particular the Labour Code and the Penal Code, in order to ensure compliance with the Convention; and the adoption of the operating regulations of the Sectoral Committee for the Handling of Disputes referred to the ILO (MEPCOIT) without prejudice to the complainants' right to file complaints with the ILO supervisory bodies.

Direct contacts mission of May 2019 and follow-up action

The Committee takes due note of the direct contacts mission that took place in May 2019 on the basis of the conclusions adopted by the Conference Committee in June 2018. The Committee notes with interest the tripartite agreement signed on 24 May 2019 at the end of the mission, covering the three following matters: (i) anti-union violence; (ii) legislative reforms; and (iii) reinforcement of the Economic and Social Council (CES) with regard to freedom of association. In this regard, the Committee also notes the technical assistance mission carried out by the Office in September 2019 with a view to initiating support for the implementation of the tripartite agreement, and the various activities carried out with the assistance of the Office in September 2019 (training workshop on freedom of association and the application of international labour standards in judicial rulings; bipartite and tripartite workshop on Convention 87 and the legislative reforms to the Labour Code; and support workshop for the MEPCOIT).

Trade union rights and civil liberties

In its previous comments, after expressing concern at the high number of reported cases of anti-union violence, in particular the murder of 14 members of the trade union movement, and at the limited progress in the corresponding investigations, the Committee firmly urged the Government to intensify its efforts to: (i) investigate all acts of violence against trade union leaders and members, with the aim of identifying those responsible and punishing both the perpetrators and the instigators of these crimes; and (ii) provide prompt and effective protection to at-risk trade union leaders and members. In this regard, the Committee recalls especially that it urged the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that all the competent authorities tackle in a coordinated manner, and as a priority, the acts of anti-union violence; that account is fully and systematically taken in investigations of the possible anti-union nature of murders of members of the trade union movement; that the exchange of information between the Public Office of the Prosecutor and the trade union movement is improved; and that the budget is increased for both investigations into acts of anti-union violence and protection schemes for members of the trade union movement.

The Committee notes the information from the Office of the Public Prosecutor supplied by the Government in 2019 concerning 22 cases of alleged anti-union violence, including 16 murders. The Committee observes that this information indicates that: (i) seven cases are being investigated (murders of Sonia Landaverde Miranda, Alfredo Misael Ávila Castellanos, Evelio Posadas Velásquez, Juana Suyapa Posadas Bustillo, Maribel Sánchez, Fredy Omar Rodríguez and Roger Abraham Vallejo); (ii) five cases are before the courts (with regard to the murders of Alma Yaneth Díaz Ortega, Uva Erlinda Castellanos Vigil, José Ángel Flores and Silmer Dionisio George, the corresponding arrest warrants are due to be served; with regard to the murder of Claudia Larissa Brizuela, the perpetrator has been convicted but has appealed against the conviction); (iii) five cases have been shelved or concluded (the judicial proceedings relating to the murders of Manuel Crespo and Ilse Ivania Velásquez Rodríguez have been concluded, while the investigations into the threats against Miguel López, Nelson Nuñez and Víctor Manuel Crespo Murcía have been shelved); and (iv) five cases have not been registered because no legal complaints have been filed in relation to them (deaths of Martin Florencio and Félix Murillo López; alleged abduction of Moisés Sánchez; alleged assault against Hermes Misael Sánchez; and alleged threats against Miguel López).

The Committee also notes that, in its 2019 report, Government emphasized that the tripartite agreement of May 2019 provided for the establishment, within the CES, of a Committee on Anti-Union Violence comprising representatives from the authorities of the Secretariat-General for Government Coordination, the Ministry of Labour and Social Security and the Secretariat of Human Rights, and social partners represented in the CES, with actors in the judicial system also invited to participate. The Committee observes that, according to the tripartite agreement, the main functions of the Committee on Anti-Union Violence are to: (i) establish a direct line of communication between the trade unions and the State regarding anti-union violence; (ii) ensure the participation of trade unions in mechanisms for the protection of human rights defenders; and (iii) promote effective support for investigations into acts of anti-union violence. The Committee also observes that the tripartite agreement, signed on 24 May 2019, provided for a period of 30 days to establish the Committee on Anti-Union Violence, which would provide a status report to the CES. The Committee notes that in its supplementary report the Government indicates that the Committee on Anti-Union Violence was formally established on 18 September 2019, and that on 25 February 2020 it issued its first report on the establishment and action undertaken by this Committee of the CES. The Government also provides information on the various activities undertaken by the Committee, including: (i) two meetings with workers' representatives to discuss the mechanism for the protection of human rights defenders; (ii) a meeting with representatives of three unions at risk to review and prioritize the action of the protection mechanism; and (iii) the holding of extraordinary meetings to examine the murder of the trade union leader Jorge Acosta and the situation of other unionists whose physical safety is endangered, and to ensure that the necessary investigations are carried out by the competent institutions.

With regard to the protection measures for at-risk members of the trade union movement, the Committee recalls that in its 2019 report the Government indicated that: (i) a tripartite workshop was held within MEPCOIT on the National Protection System, which provides protection to all human rights defenders in the country, with the aim of publicizing it among the social partners; (ii) since 2015, a total of 427 requests for protection measures have been processed; (iii) 210 persons are currently under the responsibility of the Directorate-General for the National Protection System; and (iv) four trade unionists have been the recipients of protection measures (Miguel Ángel López, Moisés Sánchez, Nelson Geovanny Núñez (who are currently out of the country) and Martha Patricia Riera (whose case file has now been shelved)).

The Committee notes the ITUC's indications in its 2019 observations that: (i) the Network against Anti-Union Violence verified the occurrence of 109 acts of anti-union violence in Honduras between January 2015 and February 2019; (ii) 38 acts of violence against trade unionists, including 11 death threats, were recorded in 2018 alone; (iii) the use of violence by the authorities has increased, as shown by the deployment of the armed forces in a crackdown on protests by teachers and doctors in June 2019; (iv) with regard to the numerous reported murders of members of the trade union movement, only one conviction is known to have been handed down, and this is currently the subject of an appeal; (v) the Office of the Public Prosecutor has not taken any action to formalize mutual cooperation to ensure that these cases are investigated; and (vi) the trade union movement is not represented on the National Council for the Protection of Human Rights Defenders, which is the body responsible for formulating preventive national policies for the protection of the life and integrity of at-risk population groups, including trade unionists.

The Committee notes with deep concern that in its supplementary observations the ITUC reports the murder of Jorge Alberto Acosta, leader of the Workers' Union of the Tela Railroad Company (SITRATERCO) on 16 November 2019, and its allegations that the National Protection Mechanism for human rights defenders, journalists, social communicators and actors in the justice system is not effective and that, despite the reiterated calls by the trade unions, the Mechanism has not investigated threats or provided adequate protection measures for trade unionists who are under threat. The ITUC also denounces the judicial persecution of the Secretary General of the Union of Workers in Agroindustry and Allied Trades (STAS), who had previously been abducted, and emphasizes that since 2019 he has once again received death threats. The Committee further notes the supplementary observations of the CGT and the CTH in which they indicate that, despite the fact that the Committee on Anti-Union Violence has held some information and follow-up meetings on various subjects, it has not made any progress in implementing practical solutions, which raises questions about its effectiveness.

The Committee notes that, in its 2019 and 2020 observations, the COHEP indicates, with reference to the measures adopted concerning anti-union violence, that: (i) the Committee on Anti-Union Violence was not established within the 30-day period following the signature of the agreement; (ii) despite the fact that the Committee on Anti-Union Violence provided for the participation of several institutions, including the Office of the Public Prosecutor, the Office of the Attorney General of the Republic and the National Commissioner for Human Rights, their participation has been limited and certain institutions, and particularly the Office of the Public Prosecutor, have not attended the meetings despite their invitations to do so; (iii) up to now, there has been no formal exchange of information between the Office of the Public Prosecutor and the social partners; and (iv) no information has yet been received on the coverage by the National Protection System of members of the trade union movement. The COHEP considers that, to improve the operation of the Committee on Anti-Union Violence, it is necessary to implement the ILO's recommendations, particularly with regard to the training of officials who receive complaints of anti-union violence in the Office of the Public Prosecutor, the rules of procedure of the Committee on Anti-Union Violence and the tripartite determination of anti-union practices. The COHEP urges the Government to investigate whether the acts of violence referred to previously were committed for anti-union reasons and to increase the budget allocated to investigations of acts of anti-union violence.

The Committee notes the Government's indication, in reply to the supplementary observations of the ITUC, that since 25 April 2018, Mr Acosta and ten other members of the executive committee of SITRATERCO benefited from protection measures, which were regularly reassessed. The Committee notes the Government's indication that, following the murder of the trade unionist, the Secretariat of Labour and the Committee on Anti-Union Violence called on the Office of the Public Prosecutor, the Investigator General, the Secretary of State for Security and the Human Rights Secretariat to undertake an investigation to elucidate the facts, punish those responsible and ensure the protection of the other members of the executive committee of the SITRATERCO. With regard to the trade union leader Moisés Sánchez, the Government indicates that both he and his brother, the trade unionist Misael Sánchez, as well as the President of SINTRASEMCA, Ms Lucidia Isela Juárez, are currently covered by various protection measures and that priority is being given to the investigation of the death threats that they have received.

The Committee notes that the Government, in its reply to the supplementary observations of the COHEP, CGT and CTH, recognizes the great challenge that it is facing in relation to violence against trade unionists, and emphasizes that the Committee on Anti-Union Violence is in the process of being established and structured, and the Government further indicates that over a short period it has taken significant action and while it acknowledges that it has faced and continues to face significant limitations, its efforts in relation to the violence will gradually be strengthened.

The Committee takes due note of the various items of information supplied by the Government and the social partners. The Committee expresses deep concern at the murder of Jorge Acosta, the persistent allegations of numerous acts of anti-union violence and also at the very low number of judicial convictions up to now for murders of members of the trade union movement.

The Committee recalls that in its comment the previous year, noting the report of the direct contacts mission and the establishment of the Committee on Anti-Union Violence, it emphasized the urgent need for the various State institutions to finally respond to the situation of anti-union violence that reigns in the country by undertaking the coordinated and priority action that the gravity of the situation requires. In this regard, the Committee requested the Government to take specific and rapid measures in relation to the following six points: (i) ensure due compliance with all elements in the tripartite agreement concerning action against anti-union violence; (ii) ensure the active involvement of all the relevant authorities in the Committee on Anti-Union Violence, especially the Secretariat of Human Rights, the Office of the Public Prosecutor and the judiciary; (iii) institutionalize and make effective the participation of the representative trade unions in the National Council for the Protection of Human Rights Defenders; (iv) draw up a special investigation protocol to enable the Office of the Public Prosecutor to examine systematically and effectively any anti-union motives behind the acts of violence affecting members of the trade union movement; (v) ensure that the criminal courts give priority treatment to cases of anti-union violence; and (vi) ensure adequate and prompt protection for all at-risk members of the trade union movement. The Committee observes that, since the establishment of the Committee on Anti-Union Violence, meetings have been held with workers' representatives to discuss the protection mechanism for human rights defenders, dialogue has been promoted between the representatives of trade unions that are at risk and the Committee on Anti-Union Violence on improving the effectiveness of the protection measures, and meetings have been held to discuss the cases of trade unionists who are at risk and the murder of the trade union leader Jorge Acosta.

Nevertheless, the Committee observes that both workers' organizations and employers express concern regarding: the absence of practical solutions in the Committee on Anti-Union Violence to bring an end to violence against trade unionists; the limited participation of actors in the justice system (the Office of the Public Prosecutor and the judicial authorities) and other institutions in the Committee on Anti-Union Violence; and the lack of adequate and rapid protection measures for members of the trade union movement. Expressing deep concern at the low number of trade unionists who have benefited from protection measures in comparison with the very high number of acts of anti-union violence reported by national and international trade unions, the ineffectiveness of the protection measures, the persistence of acts of anti-union violence and the lack of progress in their investigation, the Committee once again urges the Government and all the competent authorities to take the necessary measures in the near future, including budgetary allocations, to give effect to the six points the Committee had enumerated in its previous comment and has reiterated above. Aware of the efforts made by the Government and the additional obstacles resulting from the COVID-19 pandemic, the Committee recalls that the Office has made its technical assistance available to the Government and it requests the Government to report any progress achieved in this respect.

The Committee also requests the Government to continue providing detailed information on criminal investigations and proceedings relating to acts of violence against members of the trade union movement, including the murder of the trade unionist Jorge Acosta.

Legislative issues

Articles 2 et seq. of the Convention. Establishment, autonomy and activities of trade unions. The Committee recalls that it has been requesting the Government for many years to amend the following provisions of the Labour Code to bring them into conformity with the Convention:

(a) the exclusion from the rights and guarantees of the Convention of workers in agricultural and stock-raising enterprises which do not permanently employ more than ten workers (section 2(1));
(b) the prohibition of more than one trade union in a single enterprise (section 472);
(c) the requirement of at least 30 workers to establish a trade union (section 475);
(d) the requirement that the officers of a trade union must be of Honduran nationality (sections 510(a) and 541(a)), be engaged in the corresponding activity (sections 510(c) and 541(c)) and be able to read and write (sections 510(d) and 541(d));
(e) the prohibition on strikes called by federations and confederations (section 537);
(f) the requirement of a two-thirds majority of the votes of the total membership of the trade union organization in order to call a strike (sections 495 and 563);
(g) the authority of the competent minister to end disputes in oil industry services (section 555(2));
(h) government authorization or a six-month period of notice for any suspension of work in public services that do not depend directly or indirectly on the State (section 558); and

(i) the referral to compulsory arbitration, without the possibility of calling a strike for as long as the arbitration award is in force (two years), of collective disputes in public services that are not essential in the strict sense of the term (sections 554(2) and (7), 820 and 826).

The Committee notes that the tripartite agreement of 24 May 2019 provides that "in the context of the CES and on the basis of the relevant pronouncements of the ILO supervisory bodies", the tripartite constituents in the country "shall agree to undertake a broad process of discussion and tripartite consensus which, subject to the existence of appropriate conditions, will make it possible to align the labour legislation with the Convention". The Committee also notes that, in its report, the direct contacts mission observed that "some aspects of the reforms called for by the ILO supervisory bodies raise issues for one or other of the social partners".

The Committee also notes the observations of the social partners concerning the process of the revision of the labour legislation in order to bring it into line with the Convention. In the first place, the Committee notes COHEP's indication that: (i) it is in favour of amending sections 2, 472, 475, 510 and 541 of the Labour Code, as requested by the Conference Committee in June 2018; (ii) it is still waiting for a reform proposal from the Government; (iii) account should be taken of the content of the discussions on the comprehensive reform of the Labour Code held between 1993 and 1995 with the support of the Office and which gave rise to broad consensus (except on the right to strike and solidarity associations); (iv) any reform should be the subject of tripartite dialogue and supported by technical assistance from the Office; and (v) expresses its view that, in the context of social dialogue, the need must be recognized for a Labour Code which adapts industrial relations to the modern and future world of work..

The Committee further notes the ITUC's indication that: (i) there is a total absence of effective social dialogue in the country and this obstructs the reaching of tripartite consensus on legislative reform; and (ii) the situation described above raises fears among the national trade unions that the process of reforming the Labour Code may lead to the adoption of legislation which represents a backward step in terms of labour rights and freedom of association.

The Committee finally notes the Government's indication that: (i) it is seeking ways to achieve tripartite consensus on the reform of the Labour Code; (ii) to this end, a tripartite workshop was held in the CES on 11 September 2019; (iii) on 26 September 2019, the Government asked the social partners to specify their official position regarding the legislative reforms by 25 October 2019, but only received a reply from the employers; and (iv) the discussions on the reform of the Labour Code have been taken up again since February 2020.

Recalling its observation in its previous comment that the establishment of tripartite social dialogue on the reform of the labour legislation, as envisaged in the tripartite agreement of May 2019, would call for a special effort in terms of building trust between the parties, the Committee notes with regret the absence of tangible progress in this respect. While it is aware of the obstacles that the COVID-19 pandemic may have raised in this regard, the Committee firmly expects the Government to move forward as rapidly as possible, with the technical support of the Office, in the implementation of the process of tripartite discussions envisaged in the agreement of May 2019 so that it will be able to report progress in the preparation of the reforms that have been requested for many years.

New Penal Code. The Committee recalls that in its previous comments it noted the repeal of section 335B of the Penal Code concerning the advocacy, glorification or justification of terrorism and, observing that the direct contacts mission had been informed of the adoption of a new Penal Code, it requested the Government to provide information on the entry into force of the new Penal Code and on any amendments made to the definition of the crime of terrorism. The Committee notes that, in its supplementary information, the Government reports the entry into force of the new Penal Code on 25 June 2020, as set out in Legislative Decree No. 130-2017. In this regard, the Committee notes that, in his 2019 report on his visit to Honduras, the Special Rapporteur on the situation of human rights defenders, while noting the repeal of section 335B of the Penal Code, expressed concern regarding certain penal provisions respecting association for terrorist purposes, unlawful occupation, unlawful assembly and demonstration, slander and libel which, as they are broad in scope, could result in the criminalization of human rights defenders and have a dissuasive effect on their activities (A/HRC/40/60/Add.2). The Committee also notes that the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights, in its 2020 report on the situation of human rights in Honduras, expresses concern at the negative impact that the Penal Code could have on freedom of expression and assembly, and calls for the implementation of an open, transparent and comprehensive consultation process to review the provisions of the Penal Code that do not comply with international and regional human rights norms and standards (A/HRC/43/3/Add.2). In light of the concerns raised in relation to the scope of certain crimes, including the crime of terrorist association, and the impact of certain provisions of the new Penal Code on freedom of expression and assembly, which are fundamental for the effective exercise of freedom of association, the Committee requests the Government, in consultation with the most representative organizations of employers and workers, to assess the impact of the provisions of the Penal Code on the free exercise of trade union activities. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in this respect.

Application of the Convention in practice. The Committee notes the Government's indication that: (i) legal personality was granted to seven trade union organizations in 2017 (three in the public sector, four in the private sector), eight in 2018 (seven in the private sector, one in the public sector), and eight between January and August 2019 (all in the private sector); and (ii) pursuant to the Labour Inspection Act adopted on 23 January 2017, a total of 13 fines for violations of freedom of association were imposed between 1 January 2018 and August 2019 (out of an overall total of 261 fines). The Committee also notes that: (i) the CGT and the CTH state in their observations that the Labour Inspection Act is still not being applied in a satisfactory manner on account of the inaction of the Office of the Attorney-General in this regard; (ii) the COHEP indicates in its supplementary observations that the Office of the Attorney-General has issued a preliminary report on the cases in which fines are being collected, that an inter-institutional agreement has been signed between the Office of the Attorney-General and the Ministry of Labour and Social Security, and that there is a pilot proposal to commence a process of the collection of fines focussing on the application of the Labour Inspection Act; and (iii) the direct contacts mission indicates in its report that it received from trade union federations numerous allegations of violations of freedom of association in practice, especially in the agri-export and education sectors.

Lastly, the Committee notes that the tripartite agreement of May 2019, in its section on strengthening the CES with regard to freedom of association, provides for the operation of the MEPCOIT as the dispute settlement body in the area of labour relations, and for the promotion of the good practices of the bipartite committee for the maquila (export processing) sector in other sectors of the economy. The Committee observes in this regard that a technical assistance mission of the Office carried out in September 2019 enabled an exchange of experience with the moderator of the conflict resolution body of Panama. The Committee notes in this regard that, in its supplementary observations, the COHEP regrets that, since the meetings held in September 2019 in the MEPCOIT, there has been no further significant progress.

Noting the supplementary information provided, the Committee once again requests the Government, in the process of applying in practice the Labour Inspection Act, to pay special attention to respect for trade union rights in the agri-export and education sectors. The Committee requests the Government to provide specific information in this regard. While it is aware of the obstacles that may have been raised in this respect by the COVID-19 pandemic, the Committee once again hopes that the MEPCOIT will start its dispute settlement activities in the very near future, so that it can examine the alleged violations of freedom of association reported by the trade union federations to the direct contacts mission. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on this subject and on the promotion of the good practices of the bipartite committee for the maquila sector in other sectors of the economy.

Recalling that in its previous comment it welcomed the commitments made in the tripartite agreement signed at the end of the direct contacts mission and that it took due note of the technical assistance provided by the Office to contribute to its implementation, the Committee hopes that it will soon be able to note significant progress in the resolution of the serious violations of the Convention which have been recorded for a number of years.

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1965)

The Committee notes the observations of the Rentai Union Suginami, the Rentai Workers' Union, Itabashi-ku Section, the Apaken Kobe (Casual/Temporary/Part-time Non-regular Workers' Union) and the Union Rakuda (Kyoto Municipality Related Workers' Independent Union) received on 25 August and 25 September 2020, and the reply of the Government thereto. The Committee also notes the observations of the Japan Business Federation (NIPPON KEIDANREN) transmitted by the Government on 30 September 2020.

Not having received other supplementary information, the Committee proceeded with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the observations received from the social partners this year and the Government's reply thereto (see Article 3), as well as on the basis of the information at its disposal in 2019.

The Committee notes the observations made by the Japanese Trade Union Confederation (JTUC–RENGO), transmitted with the Government's report, and the Government's reply thereto. JTUC–RENGO indicated that it was hopeful at the outset that the Government would address the issues of implementation of the Convention as an enforcement of the "Resolution on Japan's increased contribution to the ILO" adopted on 26 June 2019 by the Diet on the occasion of the Centenary of the Organization. In the Resolution, the Diet noted that "given the role it should be playing to attain the ILO's Fundamental Principles, International Labour Standards, tripartism and reach the goal of decent work is becoming greater and greater, it recognizes a new importance of the role the country should be playing in the ILO, and resolve in the future to continue contributing maximally to the pursuit and actualization of these principles together with the other Member States worldwide …". However, JTUC–RENGO regrets that the report of the Government reveals an apparent lack of will to resolve issues within the current legal system. The Committee also notes the observations of the Rentai Union Suginami, the Apaken Kobe (Casual/Temporary/Part-time Non-regular Workers' Union), the Rentai Workers' Union, Itabashi-ku Section; and the Union Rakuda (Kyoto Municipality Related Workers' Independent Union), received on 19 July 2019, in relation to the right to organize of local public service employees and their unions. The Committee notes the observations of the International Organisation of Employers (IOE) and the NIPPON KEIDANREN, received on 30 August 2019, and the Government's reply thereto.

Article 2 of the Convention. Right to organize of firefighting personnel. The Committee recalls its long-standing comments concerning the need to recognize the right to organize for firefighting personnel. For the past years, the Government had been referring to the operation of the Fire Defence Personnel Committee (FDPC) system, which was presented as an alternative. The role of the FDPC was to examine proposals on working conditions by the personnel and to submit its conclusions to the chief of the fire department. The Government further indicated that surveys, directed to fire defence headquarters, were regularly conducted to gather information on the deliberations and results of the FDPC. The Government also mentioned a specific survey, conducted in January 2018, aiming at assessing the operation of the FDPC system and eventually seeking improvement. The results of the survey were discussed in the Fire and Disaster Management Agency. While the outcome of this survey was that the FDPC system is operated properly, the workers representatives in the Fire and Disaster Management Agency called for improvement in the operation of the FDPC, including procedural transparency, and a more conducive environment for personnel to provide their opinions to the FDPC. The Government indicates that a new implementation policy of the FDPC was consequently developed with the social partners and came into force in April 2019. The Fire and Disaster Management Agency had notified all fire defence headquarters of the new policy requesting them to hold information sessions on the amendments to the policy. Moreover, the Government indicates that, since January 2019, the Ministry of Internal Affairs and Communications held three consultations with the workers representatives where it discussed the Government's opinion that fire defence personnel are considered as police in relation to the implementation of the Convention. The Government indicates that the Fire and Disaster Management Agency will continue to hold regular consultations in this regard.

The Committee notes the observations of JTUC–RENGO indicating that in discussions held with the All-Japan Prefectural and Municipal Workers' Union (JICHIRO), the Government reaffirmed its views that firefighters are considered as police. The Committee also notes the view of NIPPON KEIDANREN that the reporting line, the organizational managerial order, and the cooperative relationship of fire defense personnel with workers' organizations may affect the residents' trust in firefighting, the nation's safety, and security. Therefore, according to NIPPON KEIDANREN, it is necessary to continue carefully reviewing the granting of the right to organize to firefighters.

The Committee however notes the concerns raised by JTUC–RENGO that the Government has not responded directly to the Conference Committee's conclusions from 2018, and that no time-bound action plan was developed with social partners as requested by the Conference Committee. The only development that could be noted is the intention to proceed in consultations between the Ministry of Internal Affairs and Communications and JICHIRO, which have been conducted since July 2018. JTUC–RENGO regrets that the Government continues to allude to old reports of the Committee on Freedom of Association (CFA), which predated the Government's ratification as justification for the status quo, and recalls that the CFA's June 2018 examination of these issues called on the Government to fully grant to firefighters the rights to organize and to collective bargaining.

While it appreciates the information on the new implementation policy for the FDPC, the Committee wishes to emphasize that this policy remains distinct from the recognition of the right to organize under Article 2 of the Convention. The Committee notes the developments in relation to consultations with JICHIRO initiated in January 2019 and the intention of the Government to maintain this dialogue. The Committee once again expresses its firm expectation that continuing consultations will contribute to further progress towards ensuring the right of firefighting personnel to form and join an organization of their own choosing to defend their occupational interests. The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information on any developments in this regard.

Article 2. Right to organize of prison staff. The Committee recalls its long-standing comments concerning the need to recognize the right to organize of prison staff. The Committee notes that the Government reiterates its position that prison officers are included in the police. The Government also reiterates that this view is accepted by the Committee on Freedom of Association in its 12th and 54th Reports. According to the Government, granting the right to organize to the personnel of penal institutions would pose difficulty for the appropriate performance of their duties and the proper maintenance of discipline and order in the penal institutions. However, taking into account the Committee's previous comments, the Government decided to grant meaningful opportunities for the personnel of penal institutions to express their opinions by the following measures: (i) the Ministry of Justice organized meetings for executive officials and representatives of the personnel from each penal institution to the Regional Correctional Headquarters (RCH) to exchange opinions on the improvement of work environments and recreational activities for the personnel; (ii) in the framework of the agenda on "improvement of workplace to prevent resignation", female personnel will be interviewed and their opinions will be examined and reflected in measures for improvement of their work conditions; and (iii) inspectors from the Ministry of Justice and the RCH will provide opportunities to the personnel to express their opinions on their working conditions. The Government recalls that contact persons are designated in penal institutions to hear proposals from the personnel on their proposal to improve their working conditions, and that a Penal Institution Visiting Committee is established in each penal institution to hear the personnel on matters such as the administration of the penal institution, working conditions, work–life balance, paid leave, etc. Finally, the Government asserts that in cases where any emergency occurs in a penal institution, and that it is required to promptly and properly bring the situation under control, by force if necessary, granting the right to organize to the personnel of penal institutions could pose a problem for appropriate performance of their duties and the proper maintenance of discipline and order.

The Committee notes the observations from NIPPON KEIDANREN supporting the Government's view that prison officers should be considered as part of the police under Article 9 of the Convention.

The Committee also notes the observations from JTUC–RENGO regretting that the Government did not follow up on the Committee's previous comments to consider the different categories of prison officers in determining, in consultation with the social partners, whether they are part of the police. JTUC–RENGO is of the view that: (i) the different measures described by the Government to provide opportunities to the personnel of penal institutions to express their opinions on their working conditions are irrelevant to union rights, including the right to organize. Since they merely constitute exchange of views with individual employees, they cannot be considered as negotiation; (ii) these measures described by the Government serve as substitutes for a meaningful discussion on granting the right to organize to the personnel of penal institutions; (iii) the carrying and use of weapons and administration of judicial police work, as motives for denying the right to organize to prison officers, does not constitute a logical argument. The right to organize is recognized for labour standards inspectors, authorized fisheries supervisors and other employees designated as special judicial police officials similarly to prison officers. Furthermore, the right to organize is recognized for narcotics agents, despite the fact that they are special judicial police officials and are granted the authority to carry and use weapons; and (iv) the increased utilization of private finance initiative (PFI) techniques for correctional institutions and the private consignment of a variety of work, and the fact that the Government is not questioning the right to organize of private sector workers, contradicts the argument put forward by the Government not to grant the right to organize to prison staff because of the need for this category of workers to be able to maintain control in cases of emergency situation. Finally, JTUC–RENGO observes that regulations granting the right to organize to the private sector workers receiving these consignments has not been disputed. Consequently, for the union, the argument of the Government that it is not appropriate to give the personnel of penal institutions the right to organize, because it poses a problem for appropriate performance of duties and proper maintenance of discipline and order in case of an emergency situation, falls short due to the Government's own policy on private sector consignment in penal institutions.

The Committee considers it useful to recall that, in previous reports, the Government referred to the following distinction among staff in penal institutions: (i) prison officers with a duty of total operations in penal institutions, including conducting security services with the use of physical force, who are allowed to use small arms and light weapons; (ii) penal institution staff other than prison officers who are engaged directly in the management of penal institutions or the treatment of inmates; and (iii) penal institution staff designated, by virtue of the Code of Criminal Procedure, to carry out duties of the judicial police officials with regard to crimes which occur in penal institutions and who have the authority to arrest, search and seize. While appreciating the information provided by the Government in its report on the new initiatives to give opportunities to the personnel of penal institutions to provide their opinions on various aspects, including on their working conditions, the Committee emphasizes that these measures remain distinct from the recognition of the right to organize under Article 2 of the Convention. The Committee further observes that the Government has not engaged, despite reiterated calls from this Committee and the Conference Committee, in any consultation with the social partners to consider the different categories of prison officers. The Committee therefore urges the Government to take, in consultation with the national social partners and other concerned stakeholders, the necessary measures to ensure that prison officers other than those with the specific duties of the judicial police may form and join an organization of their own choosing to defend their occupational interests, and to provide detailed information on the steps taken in this regard.

Article 3. Denial of basic labour rights to public sector employees. The Committee recalls its long-standing comments on the need to ensure basic labour rights for public service employees, in particular that they enjoy the right to industrial action without risk of sanctions, with the only exception being public servants exercising authority in the name of the State and workers employed in essential services in the strict sense of the term. The Committee notes the general information provided by the Government on its overall approach, which remains to continue to hear opinions from employee organizations. The Committee also notes that, according to the Government, the number of employees in Governmental Administrative Agencies has diminished from 807,000 in March 2003 to 299,000 in March 2019, leaving fewer workers in the public sector without their basic labour rights.

Furthermore, the Committee recalls that the Government refers to the procedures of the National Personnel Authority (NPA) as a compensatory guarantee for public service employees deprived of their basic labour rights. Noting the persistent divergent views on the adequate nature of the NPA as a compensatory measure, the Committee requested the Government to consider, in consultation with the social partners, the most appropriate mechanism that would ensure impartial and speedy conciliation and arbitration. In its report, the Government indicates that the NPA held 213 official meetings with employees' organizations in 2018. The Government also reiterates that these compensatory measures maintain appropriately the working conditions of public service employees. The Committee notes the observations from NIPPON KEIDANREN supporting the Government's intention to continue to review carefully measures for an autonomous labour–employer relations system (which in the past the Government had indicated would grant to national public service employees in the non-operational sector the right to negotiate working conditions and to conclude collective agreements).

The Committee also notes the observations from the JTUC–RENGO regretting that the Government's position on the autonomous labour–employer relations system has not evolved and the Government's failure to take action as requested by the ILO supervisory bodies. JTUC–RENGO regrets that, despite assertion to the ILO that it would take into consideration the recommendation of the Conference Committee, in a meeting in March 2019, the Government merely gave the same response it has been repeating to employees' organizations for the last three years, that "there are wide-ranging issues regarding autonomous labour–management relations systems, so while exchanging views with employees organizations, it would like to consider this carefully". Consequently, JTUC–RENGO expresses its deep concern at the apparent lack of intention on the part of the Government to reconsider the legal system with regard to the basic labour rights of public service employees, and once again requests that the ILO investigate these matters through a mission to the country.

The Committee urges the Government to indicate any measures taken or envisaged to ensure that public service employees, who are not exercising authority in the name of the State, enjoy fully their basic labour rights, including the right to industrial action. It further urges the Government to indicate any consultation with the social partners concerned for the review of the current system with a view to ensuring effective, impartial and speedy conciliation and arbitration procedures, in which the parties have confidence and can participate at all stages, and in which the awards, once made, will be fully and promptly implemented. In the meantime, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the public departments and divisions that are no longer classified as Governmental Administrative Agencies since March 2003, accounting for the reduction in the number of workers in the public sector without their basic labour rights. It also requests the Government to continue to provide detailed information on the functioning of the NPA recommendation system.

Furthermore, the Committee notes the observations of Rentai Union Suginami, Rentai Workers' Union, Union rakuda and Apaken Kobe referring to the adverse impact of the entry into force of the revised Local Public Service Act in April 2020 on their right to organize, and stating that: (i) non-regular local public service employees and their unions are not covered by the general labour law that provides for basic labour rights and their ability to appeal to the labour relations commission in case of alleged unfair labour practice; (ii) the new system, which aimed at limiting the use of part-time staff on permanent duties, has the effect of increasing the number of workers stripped of their basic labour rights; (iii) the conditional yearly employment system in place has created job anxiety and weakens union action and (iv) these situations further call for the urgent restoration of basic labour rights to all public service employees. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the legal amendments ensure proper appointment of special service personnel and temporary appointment employees, and clarify the framework of appointment of regular service part-time staff. The amendments guarantee the status of these personnel and employees along with the introduction of some allowances due to them. According to the Government, the change of basic labour rights condition is therefore the consequence of the guarantee of originally expected appointment form to them. Consequently, in the Government's view, the statement from Rentai Union Suginami that the amendments deprive temporary and part-time officials of their basic labour rights is not accurate. While noting the Government's reiteration that the change of status improves the treatment of part-time employees, the Committee observes that these amendments have the effect of broadening the category of public sector workers whose rights under the Convention are not fully ensured. The Committee therefore urges the Government to expedite its consideration of the autonomous labour relations system so as to ensure that municipal unions are not deprived of their long-held trade union rights through the introduction of these amendments. It requests the Government to provide detailed information on the measures taken or envisaged in this regard.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that it is examining carefully how to respond to the conclusions and recommendations formulated by the Conference Committee in 2018 and the various concerns regarding measures for the autonomous labour-employer relations system, while continuing to hear opinions from the social partners. The Government intends to regularly provide information on initiatives taken in this regard in good faith. Recalling the Conference Committee conclusions, including the lack of meaningful progress in taking necessary measures regarding the autonomous labour-employer relations system, the Committee once again strongly encourages the Government to indicate any measures taken or envisaged to elaborate, in consultation with the social partners concerned, a time-bound plan of action to implement the recommendations made above and to report on any progress made in this respect.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1968)

The Committee notes the observations of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) received on 24 September 2020 concerning various matters examined by the Committee in its previous comments. The Committee notes that the ITUC also denounces: (i) the arrest and detention of members of the Jordanian Teachers' Association (JTA) between 25 July and 23 August 2020; (ii) the filing of criminal charges against the JTA and its President; and (iii) the closure by the Government of the JTA offices for two years from 25 July 2020, which effectively deprives teachers and education staff of representation. Recalling that teachers are fully covered by the Convention and that the exercise of the rights to organize and to bargain collectively requires that trade union organizations be able to freely carry out their activities to defend the interests of their members, the Committee requests the Government to provide its comments on the ITUC's allegations and to ensure compliance with the Convention in all the sectors covered, including the education sector.

The Committee also notes the report of the Government (not requested) received on 16 September 2020 relating to the various points raised by the Committee in its last observation but not referring to the measures taken against the JTA contained in the observations of the ITUC. The Committee will consider the content of this report as part of the regular cycle. In this regard, the Committee requests the Government to provide any other information relating to the application of the Convention, as well as a copy of the amendments to national legislation referred to in the above-mentioned report.

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 2000)

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020). The Committee proceeded with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the supplementary information received from the Government and the social partners this year, as well as on the basis of the information at its disposal in 2019.

The Committee notes the observations of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), received on 8 and 16 September 2020, and of the Confederation of Employers of the Republic of Kazakhstan (KRRK), received on 1 October 2020, referring to the issues raised by the Committee below.

The Committee recalls that in their 2019 observations, the ITUC and the Federation of Trade Unions of Kazakhstan (FPRK) denounced the imprisonment, on 16 October 2019, of Mr Erlan Baltabay, the leader of the Independent Oil and Energy Workers' Union. Expressing its concern over this allegation, the Committee had requested the Government to provide its comments thereon. The Committee notes that in its 2020 observations, the ITUC recalls that Mr Baltabay was sentenced to seven years of imprisonment in July 2019 for the alleged misappropriation of approximately US$28,000 of union dues. According to the ITUC, Mr Baltabay was released in August 2019 after being pardoned by the President and given a fine of US$4,000 in exchange for his remaining prison sentence. Mr Baltabay insisted on his innocence, refused to pay the fine or recognize the presidential pardon, and argued in court that criminal charges of large-scale misappropriation of funds levied against him were politically motivated and unfounded. The ITUC further indicates that on 16 October 2019, Mr Baltabay was given a new prison sentence of five months and eight days imprisonment for union-related activities and for not paying the fine; while Mr Baltabay was released from jail on 20 March 2020, he is still banned from any public activity, including trade union activities, for the next seven years, as per the previous sentence.

The Committee further notes the ITUC indication that Ms Larisa Kharkova, the Chairperson of the now liquidated Confederation of Independent Trade Unions of Kazakhstan (KNPRK), who was sentenced to four years of restriction on her freedom of movement and a five-year ban on holding any position in a public or non-governmental organization, continued to serve her sentence.

The Committee notes that the Government does not dispute the facts as outlined by the ITUC, but indicates that judicial decisions in the case of Mr Baltabay were made in respect of ordinary crimes and were not related to his participation in legal trade union activities.

The Committee further notes that the cases of Mr Baltabay and Ms Kharkova continue to be examined by the Committee on Freedom of Association (CFA) in the framework of Case No. 3283 (see 392nd Report, October 2020). The Committee refers to the conclusions and recommendations of the CFA and urges the Government to provide detailed information on the cases of Mr Baltabay and Ms Kharkova.

The Committee recalls that it had previously noted with deep concern the ITUC 2018 allegation of assault and injuries suffered by the chairperson of a trade union of workers of the fuel and energy complex in the Karaganda region and urged the Government to investigate the matter without delay and to bring the perpetrators to justice. The Committee had noted the information provided by the Government confirming the assault of the chairperson of the Trade Union of Workers in the Fuel and Energy Complex of Shakhtinsk, Mr Dmitry Senyavsky, by unknown persons on 10 November 2018. The Government indicated that pre-trial proceedings were opened under section 293(2)(1) of the Criminal Code (disorderly conduct). According to a forensic medical report, Mr Senyavsky suffered mild damages to his health. The Committee notes that in its 2020 observation, the ITUC indicates that two years after the assault, no suspects have been identified. The Committee notes that the Government reiterates in its supplementary report that the pre-trial investigation has been suspended pursuant to section 45(7)(1) of the Criminal Procedure Code (failure to identify the person who committed a crime) until new circumstances (evidence) come to light. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the developments in this case.

Follow-up to the conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards (International Labour Conference, 108th Session, June 2019)

The Committee notes the discussion that took place in the Conference Committee in June 2019 concerning the application of the Convention. The Committee observes that the Conference Committee regretted the persistent lack of progress since the last discussion of the case in June 2017, in particular with regard to the serious obstacles to the establishment of trade unions without previous authorization in law and in practice, and the continued interference with the freedom of association of employers' organizations. The Conference Committee took note of the ILO high-level tripartite mission (HLTM) that took place in May 2018 and the resulting road map. The Committee notes that the Conference Committee called upon the Government to: (i) amend the provisions of the Law on Trade Unions consistent with the Convention, on issues concerning excessive limitations on the structure of trade unions which limit the right of workers to form and join trade unions of their own choosing; (ii) refrain from imposing restrictions on the right to hold elected positions in trade unions and the right to freedom of movement for engaging in legitimate trade union activities; (iii) ensure that the allegations of violence against trade union members are investigated, and where appropriate, impose dissuasive sanctions; (iv) review, in consultation with the social partners, the existing law and practice regarding re registration of trade unions with a view to overcoming the existing obstacles; (v) amend, in consultation with the most representative, free and independent employers' organizations, the provisions of the Law on the National Chamber of Entrepreneurs (NCE), and related regulations, in a manner that would ensure the full autonomy and independence of free and independent employers' organizations, without any further delay. In particular remove the provisions on the broad mandate of the NCE to represent employers and accredit employers' organizations by the NCE; (vi) ensure that the Confederation of Independent Trade Unions of Kazakhstan (KNPRK) and its affiliates enjoy the full autonomy and independence of a free and independent workers' organization, without any further delay, and are given the autonomy and independence needed to fulfil their mandate and to represent their constituents; (vii) confirm the amendment to legislation to permit judges, firefighters and prison staff, who do not occupy a military rank, to form and join a workers' organization; (viii) adopt legislation to ensure that national workers' and employers' organizations are not prevented from receiving financial assistance or other assistance by international organizations. In this regard, provide information on the legal status and contents of its recommendation regarding the authorization of workers' and employers' organizations to receive financial assistance from international organizations; and (ix) implement the 2018 road map in consultation with the social partners as a matter of urgency. The Conference Committee decided to include its conclusions in a special paragraph of the report.

The Committee notes that the Law on Trade Unions, the Labour Code, the Law on the NCE, the Criminal Code, the Code of Criminal Procedure and the Law on Public Associations were amended by virtue of adoption, in May 2020, of the Law on amendments and additions to some legislative acts of the Republic of Kazakhstan on labour issues. The Committee notes that in its conclusions and recommendations in Case No. 3283 (see 392nd Report, October 2020), the Committee on Freedom of Association referred the examination of these legislative amendments to the Committee. The Committee examines them below.

Article 2 of the Convention. Right to establish organizations without previous authorization. The Committee recalls that following the entry into force of the Law on Trade Unions in 2014, all existent unions had to be re-registered. It recalls in this respect that the KNPRK affiliates were denied registration/re-registration, which ultimately led to its liquidation. Recalling the ITUC allegation of denials to register organizations, which previously formed the KNPRK, the Committee requested the Government to provide information on the current status of the KNPRK and to ensure that the KNPRK and its affiliates enjoyed the full autonomy and independence of a free and independent workers' organization, without any further delay, and were given the autonomy and independence needed to fulfil their mandate and to represent their constituents.

The Committee notes that the ITUC indicates that the Congress of Free Trade Unions (KSPRK) (the name under which the successor of the KNPRK had last tried to re-register) remains unregistered and that the Industrial Trade Union of Employees of the Fuel and Energy Sector is still waiting for its re-registration, while being unable to formally appoint a new chairperson.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that in the event that the registering authority (Ministry of Justice) identifies shortcomings, it issues a reasoned refusal, citing the applicable legislative provision, as per section 11 of the Law on the State Registration of Legal entities and the Official Registration of Branches and Representative Offices. The Government further indicates that the KSPRK has also received a reasoned refusal and that the Ministry of Labour and Social Protection of the Population (MLSPP) has held a series of meetings with the representatives of the Congress regarding the refusal to register it. The Government points out that if the trade union in question rectifies the indicated shortcomings, the Ministry of Justice stands ready to re-examine the application for registration. The Government further indicates that an explanation was provided to the applicant for registration of the Industrial Trade Union of Employees of the Fuel and Energy Sector as to the body the application for registration and the accompanying documents should be submitted to. However, according to the Government, the applicant is yet to address the relevant registering authority. Having duly noted the information provided by the Government, the Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the status of registration of the KSPRK and the Industrial Union of Employees of the Fuel and Energy Sector.

The Committee further recalls that it had previously noted that several pieces of legislation regulated registration and that some trade unions were denied re-registration because their by-laws were found not to be in conformity with either one or all of the applicable laws. The Committee had therefore requested the Government to engage with the social partners to review the difficulties identified by trade unions seeking registration with a view to finding appropriate measures, including legislative, to fully give effect to Article 2 of the Convention and to ensure the right of workers to establish organizations without previous authorization.

The Committee notes the Government's explanation that trade unions may be established without previous authorization. Primary trade unions do not need to register. However, if a trade union wishes to become a legal entity (which entitles it to open a bank account), it must register with the justice authorities. The latter have the following powers to determine the status of trade unions: (1) to verify compliance with the legislation of documents submitted for registration; and (2) to issue certificates of state registration. In the case of refusal to register a trade union, the registering authority identifies shortcomings and issues a reasoned refusal. If the trade union in question rectifies these shortcomings, it may re-submit its application for registration, appending all necessary documents. The Government points out that the documents can be re-submitted an unlimited number of times. The Government indicates that it has made every effort to provide guidance on registration to all trade unions and informs that it has developed a step-by-step algorithm outlining the procedure for registration of trade unions (from the moment of preparing the necessary paperwork to the moment of registration). Furthermore, new rules of state services concerning state registration of entities with and without legal personality were approved in May 2020. The Committee welcomes that by virtue of the new rules the time frame for registration by the authority was reduced from 10 to five business days. The Committee notes the Government's indication that there are currently three national associations of trade unions in the country, 49 sectoral, 44 territorial and 348 local trade union organizations, which bring together around 3 million workers - or half of all employees in Kazakhstan. The Government points out that following the amendment of the Law on Trade Unions, one sectoral, nine local trade unions and six structures of sectoral trade unions were established in the country, and that there have been no reported problems with registration of trade unions. The Government further indicates that the new general agreement for 2021-23 will provide for protection against acts of interference in internal affairs of organizations. The Committee requests the Government to continue engaging with the social partners on the issues concerning the registration process.

Right to establish and join organizations of their own choosing. The Committee had previously requested the Government to amend the following sections of the Law on Trade Unions so as to ensure the right of workers to freely decide whether they wish to associate or become members of a higher-level trade union structure and to lower threshold requirements to establish higher-level organizations:

– sections 11(3), 12(3), 13(3) and 14(4), which required, under the threat of deregistration pursuant to section 10(3), the mandatory affiliation of sector-based, territorial and local trade unions to a national trade union association within six months following their registration, so as to ensure the right of workers to freely decide whether they wish to associate or become members of a higher-level trade union structure; and
– section 13(2), which required a sector-based trade union to represent no less than half of the total workforce of the sector or related sectors, or organizations of the sector or related sectors, or to have structural subdivisions and member organizations on the territory of more than half of all regions, cities of national significance and the capital, with a view to lowering this threshold requirement.

The Committee notes with satisfaction that sections 11, 12, 13 and 14 of the Law on Trade Unions were amended so as to remove the mandatory affiliation of trade unions to a higher-level association of trade unions. The Committee further notes that section 10 of the Law on Trade Unions was amended so as to extend the time limit for the confirmation of a trade union status as a national, sectoral or regional organization from six months to one year. If, after the expiration of one year, the organization has not confirmed it status, its functioning can be suspended for a period of three to six months so as to give it additional time to confirm its status, whereas previously, it was subject to liquidation.

Law on the National Chamber of Entrepreneurs (NCE). The Committee had previously urged the Government to amend the Law on the NCE and any other relevant legislation so as to ensure the full autonomy and independence of the free and independent employers' organizations. The Committee recalls, in particular, that the Law calls for the mandatory affiliation to the NCE (section 4(2)). The Committee had further noted the difficulties encountered by the KRRK in practice, which stem from the mandatory membership and the NCE monopoly, and in particular, that the accreditation of employers' organizations by the NCE and the obligation imposed in practice on employers' organizations to conclude an annual agreement (a model contract) with the NCE, meant, for all intents and purposes, that the latter approved and formulated the programmes of employers' organizations and thus intervened in their internal affairs. In this respect, the Committee had noted that there was an agreement to amend section 148(5) of the Labour Code so as to delete reference to the NCE's authority to represent employers in the social dialogue at the national, sectoral and regional levels and that the road map provided for the measures to be taken to address the above concerns culminating with the submission of the draft law to amend various pieces of legislation, including the Law on the NCE to Parliament in November 2018. In this respect, the Committee had noted the Government's indication that the accreditation by the NCE was an internal procedure, which took place on a voluntary basis. The Government stressed that this procedure was not an authorization procedure and did not prevent employers' organizations from operating. Moreover, the compulsory NCE membership was not imposed on associations. The Government reiterated that following the amendment of the Labour Code, as outlined above, the NCE would withdraw from the National Tripartite Commission on Social Partnership and the Regulation of Social and Labour Relations, sectoral commissions (20 sectors) and regional commissions (16 regions). Accordingly, the NCE would no longer be a signatory to the General Agreement between the Government and national associations of employers and workers, sectoral agreements and regional agreements. The Committee had further noted the proposed amendment to section 9 of the Law on the NCE, which would exclude explicitly from the definition of the representative functions of the NCE the right to represent entrepreneurs in the system of social partnership as set out in the Labour Code. The Committee expected that section 148(5) of the Labour Code as well as section 9 of the Law on the NCE would be amended without further delay thereby ensuring that the NCE and its structures at the national, sectoral and regional levels were no longer employers' representatives in social dialogue.

The Committee notes with satisfaction that section 148 (5) of the Labour Code and section 9 of the Law on the NCE have been amended as previously indicated. The Committee further notes the Government's indication that currently there are 120 employers' associations operating in the country and that at the September 2020 meeting of the Republican tripartite commission on social partnership and regulation of social and labour relations, the employers' associations at all levels were asked to decide on their representatives to the social dialogue bodies at various levels, as well as on the signatories to the tripartite agreements.

Further in this respect, the Committee notes the KRRK's indication that the NCE no longer participates in the social dialogue and will not be signing the 2021-23 national tripartite agreement as this became a prerogative of employers' organizations and that the agreement will be signed by the KRRK. The KRRK indicates that it is being invited by the MLSPP to meetings addressing issues of social dialogue and expresses its trust that the dialogue will be further enhanced in the future. The KRRK provides detailed information on the relationship between the NCE and employers' organizations following legislative amendments and queries about the impact of the accreditation system on the independence of employers' organizations and their right to participate in the social dialogue processes. The Committee takes due note of the Government's detailed reply on the KRRK observations. The Committee notes, in particular, the Government's detailed explanation of the aims and functioning of the NCE as compared to the role of employers' organizations. The Government stresses that the role of the NCE is linked to business development and promotion of entrepreneurship, whereas the purpose of employers' organizations is to further and defend the rights of their members in the labour and social spheres through the participation in various social dialogue mechanisms, collective bargaining and consultations regarding labour legislation. The Government points out that despite the fact that some of the employers' organizations are accredited in the NCE, they remain independent of each other in their respective roles.

Article 3. Right of organizations to organize their activities and to formulate their programmes. The Committee had previously requested the Government to provide information on the status of its proposal to amend section 176(1)(1) of the Labour Code regarding the right to strike. The Committee notes with interest that the above provision has been amended so as to provide that a strike remains possible with respect to certain "vital" services (electricity, heating, water and gas supply services; aviation, railway, automobile, public and water transport; communication and health services) so long as the necessary minimum level of services, previously agreed upon by the workers' representatives and the local executive authorities, is maintained during the strike.

The Committee recalls that it had previously noted with concern that trade union leaders have been convicted and sentenced in application of section 402 of the Criminal Code (2016), according to which an incitement to continue a strike declared illegal by the court was punishable by up to one year of imprisonment and in certain cases (substantial damage to rights and interest of citizens, mass riots, etc.), up to three years of imprisonment. The Committee notes that this provision has been amended so as to categorize the deeds described in section 402 as delinquent acts (and no longer as criminal acts), and to lower the penalties (both fines and imprisonments) accordingly. The Committee notes, in particular, that the imprisonment for up to one year, and three years in specific cases described above, is to be replaced by an arrest for the duration of up to 50 days and two years of imprisonment, respectively. While welcoming the proposed amendments aimed at reducing the penalties, the Committee is nevertheless of the opinion that simply calling for a strike action, even one declared illegal by the courts, should not result in arrest for up to 50 days and that in general, sanctions should be envisaged only where, during a strike, violence against persons or property, or other serious infringements of penal law have been committed. The Committee requests the Government to further review section 402 of the Criminal Code taking into account the above and requests the Government to provide information on all developments in this regard.

Article 5. Right of organizations to receive financial assistance from international organizations of workers and employers. The Committee had previously welcomed the intention to amend the Law on Trade Unions by adding provisions on the right of trade unions to cooperate with international trade union organizations and, jointly with international organizations, to organize and conduct activities, as well as to carry out projects aimed at defending the rights and interests of workers in accordance with the legislation of Kazakhstan. The Committee notes with interest that section 6 of the Law on Trade Union has been amended to that effect. The Committee notes the Government's reference to its Ordinance No. 177 of 9 April 2018 "On the adoption of a list of international and state organizations, foreign and Kazakhstani non-governmental organizations and funds which can provide grants", which determines 98 international organizations allowed to provide grants to physical and legal persons in Kazakhstan. The Committee welcomes the Government's indication that the MLSPP is ready to examine the possibility of including in that list the ITUC and the International Organisation of Employers if a request to that effect is made. The Committee trusts that the list contained in the Ordinance will be amended to include international workers' and employers' organizations and requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken to that end.

Kyrgyzstan

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1992)

The Committee takes note of the observations of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) and the Kyrgyzstan Federation of Trade Unions (FPK) received on 16 and 30 September 2020, respectively. The Committee notes that the ITUC and the FPK express their concern at the provisions of the draft Law on Trade Unions, which had been initiated by several members of Parliament and passed the second reading. According to both organizations, the draft law establishes a single trade union system, regulates in detail the organizational detail and functioning of trade unions and sets out broad criteria for dissolution of trade union organizations. Furthermore, the ITUC and the FPK allege reprisals against FPK leaders and interference in FPK financial activities thereby paralyzing its work. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments thereon.

In the absence of supplementary information from the Government, the Committee reiterates its comments adopted in 2019 and reproduced below.

The Committee takes note of the draft Law on Trade Unions. It notes with concern that in addition to regulating in detail the internal functioning of unions by imposing excessive mandatory requirements for trade union by-laws and elections, it imposes a trade union monopoly. The Committee notes the Government's indication that it has prepared, for submission to Parliament, its comments on the draft Law outlining provisions, which, in its opinion, are not in conformity with national legislation and the Constitution and international labour standards. The Committee requests the Government to make every effort to ensure that the Law on Trade Unions when adopted is in full conformity with the Convention and to provide information on all developments in this regard. The Committee further requests the Government to ensure that the social partners are fully consulted in the process of adoption of legislation affecting their rights and interests.

The Committee reminds the Government of the possibility to avail itself of ILO technical assistance.

Liberia

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1962)

The Committee notes the observations of the National Health Workers' Union of Liberia (NAHWUL), received on 1 October 2020, alleging the Government's failure to grant it legal recognition, which it considers even more detrimental in the context of the COVID-19 pandemic, as well as infringements of the right to strike. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments in this respect.

The Committee notes with deep concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments. The Committee informs the Government that, if it has not supplied replies to the points raised by 1 September 2021, then it may proceed with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the information at its disposal at its next session.

The Committee notes the observations of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) received on 1 September 2017 concerning issues that have been raised since 2012 and which are examined in the present observation, as well as matters that are being dealt with by the Committee on Freedom of Association in the framework of Cases Nos 3081 and 3202.

Legislative developments. The Committee recalls that for many years it has been commenting on the need to amend or repeal the following provisions of Title 18 of the Labour Act, which are not in conformity with the Convention: (i) section 4506, prohibiting workers in state enterprises and the public administration from establishing trade unions; (ii) section 4601-A, prohibiting agricultural workers from joining industrial workers' organizations; and (iii) section 4102(10) and (11), providing for the supervision of trade union elections by the Labour Practices Review Board. The Committee notes with satisfaction that, as indicated by the Government in its report, Title 18 of the Labour Practices Law has been repealed by the Decent Work Act 2015 (the Act) which came into force on 1 March 2016. The Committee wishes to raise the following points with respect to the Act.

Scope of application. The Committee notes that section 1.5(c)(i) and (ii) of the Act excludes from its scope of application work falling within the scope of the Civil Service Agency Act. The Committee recalls, in this respect, that in its previous comment, it had noted the Government's indication that the legislation guaranteeing the right of public employees to establish trade unions (the Public Service Ordinance) was being revised with the technical assistance of the Office. The Committee notes that no new information has been provided by the Government in that respect. The Committee expects that the revision of the Ordinance will make it possible to give full effect to the Convention in relation to public employees and requests the Government to report any developments in this regard.

The Committee notes that section 1.5(c)(i) and (ii) of the Act also excludes from its scope of application, officers, members of the crew and any other persons employed or in training on vessels. Noting that no information has been provided by the Government on the legislation guaranteeing the right to establish and join organizations to those working on vessels, the Committee requests the Government to indicate how maritime workers, including trainees, are ensured the rights enshrined in the Convention, including any laws or regulations adopted or envisaged covering this category of workers.

Article 1 of the Convention. Right of workers, without distinction whatsoever, to establish and join organizations. The Committee notes that section 2.6 of the Act provides that all employers and workers, without distinction whatsoever, may establish and join organizations of their own choosing without prior authorization, and subject only to the rules of the organization concerned. The Committee also notes that section 45.6 of the Act recognizes the right of foreign workers to join organizations. The Committee requests the Government to indicate whether, in addition to the right to join organizations, foreign workers are entitled to establish organizations of their own choosing.

Article 3. Determination of essential services. The Committee notes that the National Tripartite Council (established by virtue of section 4.1 of the Act) has the function to identify and recommend to the Minister services that are to be considered essential (section 41.4(a) of the Act). The Committee notes with interest that essential services are defined in section 41.4 of the Act as services which, if interrupted, would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or any part of the population. The section also provides that the President shall, upon considering the recommendations of the National Tripartite Council, decide whether or not to designate any part of a service as an essential service and publish a notice of designation of that essential service in the Official Gazette. The Committee notes that the final decision on the determination of a service as essential rests with the President, who is neither bound by nor obliged to follow the recommendations of the National Tripartite Council. The Committee requests the Government to indicate whether, in determining services which are to be considered essential, the President is bound by the definition of essential services set out in section 41.4 of the Act. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on how section 41.4 has operated in practice with respect to the designation of essential services.

The Committee expects that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1962)

The Committee notes the observations of the National Health Workers' Union of Liberia (NAHWUL), received on 1 October 2020, containing allegations of violations of trade union rights in the context of the COVID-19 pandemic and which are considered under the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87).

The Committee notes with deep concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments. The Committee informs the Government that, if it has not supplied replies to the points raised by 1 September 2020, then it may proceed with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the information at its disposal at its next session.

The Committee notes the observations of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) received on 1 September 2017 concerning issues examined in the present observation as well as matters that are being dealt with by the Committee on Freedom of Association in the framework of Cases Nos 3081 and 3202.

Legislative developments. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the Decent Work Act adopted in 2015 came into force on 1 March 2016 and that it ensures the rights enshrined in the Convention. The Committee recalls that for many years it has been commenting on the need to adopt legal provisions guaranteeing: (i) adequate protection against anti-union discrimination at the time of recruitment and during the employment relationship, accompanied by sufficiently effective and dissuasive sanctions; (ii) adequate protection for workers' organizations against acts of interference by employers and their organizations, including sufficiently effective and dissuasive sanctions; and (iii) the right to collective bargaining for employees in state-owned enterprises and public servants who are not engaged in the administration of the State.

Scope of the Convention. The Committee notes that section 1.5(c)(i) and (ii) of the Decent Work Act of 2015 (the Act) excludes from its scope of application work falling within the scope of the Civil Service Agency Act. The Committee recalls, in this respect, that in its previous report, the Government had indicated that the legislation guaranteeing the right of collective bargaining of public servants and employees in state enterprises (Ordinance on the public service) was under revision with the technical assistance of the Office. The Committee notes that no information has been provided by the Government in that respect. The Committee expects that the revision of the Ordinance on the public service will make it possible to give full effect to the Convention in relation to employees in state enterprises and public servants not engaged in the administration of the State and requests the Government to report any developments in this regard.

The Committee notes that section 1.5(c)(i) and (ii) of the Act also excludes from its scope of application, officers, members of the crew and any other persons employed or in training on vessels. Noting that no information has been provided by the Government on legislation guaranteeing the right of collective bargaining to maritime workers, the Committee requests the Government to indicate how the rights enshrined in the Convention apply to these workers, including any laws or regulation, adopted or envisaged, covering them.

Article 1 of the Convention. Adequate protection against anti-union discrimination. The Committee recalls that for many years it has been requesting the Government to take measures to introduce in the legislation provisions that would ensure an effective protection against anti-union discrimination. The Committee notes that section 2.6 of the Act provides that the right to form organizations and to bargain collectively are fundamental rights and that section 2.7 prohibits discrimination in the exercise of the rights conferred by the Act. The Committee also notes that section 2.11 of the Act provides for the protection of workers' freedom of association (stipulating, inter alia, that no person may prejudice or threaten to prejudice a worker because of past, present or anticipated membership of an organization of workers) and that section 2.12 of the Act provides for the protection of employers' freedom of association. The Committee notes that sections 2.11 and 2.12 provide that they operate in addition to, and to the fullest extent possible together with section 2.7 of the Act, under which discrimination overall is prohibited. The Committee notes that, while the Act does not expressly prohibit termination of employment based on anti-union discrimination, section 14.8 prohibits termination because of the exercise of rights conferred by the Act. It also notes that complaints for the violation of the rights guaranteed in the Act can be lodged to the Ministry and that the Ministry's decisions can be appealed before the Labour Court (Chapters 9 and 10 of the Act). Emphasizing the importance of ensuring effective protection against acts of anti-union discrimination and of providing for sufficiently dissuasive sanctions in this regard, the Committee requests the Government to provide further information on the sanctions applied in cases of acts of anti-union discrimination. It also requests the Government to provide statistics on the number of cases of discrimination examined, the duration of the procedures and the type of penalties and compensation ordered.

Article 2. Adequate protection against acts of interference. The Committee recalls that for many years it has been requesting the Government to take measures to introduce in the legislation provisions guaranteeing adequate protection for workers' organizations against acts of interference by employers and their organizations, including sufficiently effective and dissuasive sanctions. The Committee notes with regret that the Act still contains no specific provisions on protection against interference. The Committee recalls that under the terms of Article 2 of the Convention, workers' and employers' organizations shall enjoy adequate protection against any acts of interference by each other or each other's agents or members in their establishment, functioning or administration (see the 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 194). The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to introduce in the legislation a prohibition of acts of interference as well as rapid appeal procedures and dissuasive sanctions against such acts. It requests the Government to report on any development in this regard.

Article 4. Promotion of collective bargaining. The Committee notes that section 37.1(a) of the Act provides that trade unions that represent the majority of the employees in an appropriate bargaining unit are able to seek recognition as exclusive bargaining agents for that bargaining unit. It also notes that a trade union that no longer represents the majority of the employees in the bargaining unit must acquire majority within three months, if not, the employer shall withdraw recognition from that trade union (section 37.1(k)). The Committee recalls that while it is acceptable that the union which represents the majority or a high percentage of workers in a bargaining unit should enjoy preferential or exclusive bargaining rights, it considers that in cases where no union meets these conditions, or does not enjoy such exclusive rights, minority trade unions should at least be able to conclude a collective or direct agreement on behalf of their own members (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 226). The Committee requests the Government to indicate whether, if no union represents the majority of the employees in an appropriate bargaining unit, the minority unions in the same unit enjoy collective bargaining rights, at least on behalf of their members.

Settlement of disputes affecting national interest. The Committee notes that section 42.1 of the Act provides that if the President considers it in the national interest, the President may: (i) request the Minister to appoint a conciliator to conciliate any dispute, or potential dispute, between employers and their organizations on the one hand and employees and their trade unions on the other hand; or (ii) in consultation with the National Tripartite Council, appoint a panel of persons representing the interests of employers, employees and the State to investigate any industrial conflict or potential conflict for the purpose of reporting and making recommendations to the President. Recalling that, pursuant to Article 4 of the Convention, the settlement of collective disputes must be consistent with the promotion of free and collective bargaining, the Committee requests the Government to provide additional information with respect to the prerogatives under section 42.1 of the Act, and to indicate the extent to which this provision provides the parties with complete freedom of collective bargaining and does not alter the principle of voluntary arbitration.

The Committee expects that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87)

The Committee notes the observations of the Sint Maarten Hospitality and Trade Association (SHTA) received on 30 September 2020, which allege that the Chamber of Commerce and Industry (COCI), a governmental agency, has established the Soualiga Employer Association (SEA), an umbrella organization to represent employers, including at the tripartite Socio Economic Council (SER). The SHTA alleges that through the COCI and the SEA, the Government is attempting to establish an employer representative organization that is more in line with the Government's position and does not reflect actual diligent representation and that this appears to be an attempt to marginalize the existing employer representative groups. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments on these serious allegations.

The Committee also requests the Government to reply in full to other pending comments under the Convention adopted in 2017.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1952)

The Committee takes note of the observations of the International Transport Workers' Federation (ITF) received on 2 July 2020 denouncing anti-union measures by the Pakistan International Airlines (PIA), including in May 2020 the unilateral de-recognition of the Pakistan Airline Pilots' Association (PALPA) and other employees' associations in the company, as well as the termination of all working agreements with immediate effect. According to the ITF, the airline company argued their non-legal status as collective bargaining agents under the Industrial Relations Act, and the situation is characterised by the repression against the expression of any worker concerns. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments on these serious allegations.

The Committee also requests the Government to reply in full to other pending comments under the Convention adopted in 2018.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1976)

The Committee notes with concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments.

Legislative matters. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted the Government's indication that the new Industrial Relations Bill (IRB 2014) was undergoing a vetting process at the Government Executive Committee and the Central Agency and Consultative Council to harmonize it with other relevant legislation and that the revised Bill should be presented to Cabinet before November 2016 or early 2017 and consultations on the matter should be held in the national Tripartite Consultative Council. Noting that the last information sent by the Government through an anticipated report dates back to 5 January 2017 and that its 2018 report was not received, the Committee hopes that the Government will provide in its next report information on the outcome of these consultations and whether the IRB 2014 has been enacted.

Article 1 of the Convention. Adequate protection against acts of anti-union discrimination. The Committee had previously requested the Government to provide information on the measures taken to ensure effective implementation of the prohibition of anti-union discrimination in practice and to provide statistics on the number of anti-union discrimination complaints brought before the competent authorities, their follow-up, sanctions and remedies imposed. Noting that the Government did not provide specific information in this regard, the Committee reiterates its previous request.

Article 4. Promotion of collective bargaining. Power of the Minister to assess collective agreements on the grounds of public interest. The Committee had previously requested the Government to take the necessary measures to bring section 50 of the Industrial Relations Bill (2011) into conformity with the principle that the approval of a collective agreement may only be refused if it has a procedural flaw or does not conform to the minimum standards laid down by general labour legislation. While observing once again that the Government does not provide a copy of the Bill, the Committee takes note of the Government's indication that section 50 of the IRB 2014 has been amended and that under the revised version the Attorney General is not entitled to appeal against the making of an award on the grounds of public interest.

Compulsory arbitration in cases where conciliation between the parties has failed. While recalling that it had noted the conformity of section 78 of the IRB 2014, as described by the Government, with the Convention, the Committee notes that the Government has still not clarified the content of section 79 of the IRB 2014.

The Committee trusts once again that the Government, taking into account the Committee's comments, will ensure the full conformity of any revised legislation with the Convention. In this regard, the Committee encourages the Government to avail itself of the technical assistance of the Office, if it so wishes and requests it to provide detailed information on the process of revision of the Industrial Relations Bill.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1953)

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020). The Committee proceeded with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the supplementary information received from the Government and the social partners this year, as well as on the basis of the information at its disposal in 2019.

The Committee notes the observations of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) received on 1 September 2019 and 15 September 2020, of the International Transport Workers' Federation (ITF) received on 3 September 2019 and of Education International (EI) received on 20 September 2019, referring to matters addressed below, as well as the Government's detailed reply thereto. The Committee also notes the joint observations of EI, the Alliance of Concerned Teachers (ACT) and the National Alliance of Teachers and Office Workers (SMP-NATOW) received on 1 October 2020, denouncing extra-judicial killings of trade unionists and other serious violations of civil liberties, as well as challenges in the application and implementation of the right to freedom of association. The Committee requests the Government to provide its reply thereto.

Follow-up to the conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards (International Labour Conference, 108th Session, June 2019)

The Committee noted the discussion that took place in the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards (Conference Committee) in June 2019 concerning the application of the Convention. The Committee observed that the Conference Committee called upon the Government to: (i) take effective measures to prevent violence in relation to the exercise of workers' and employers' organizations legitimate activities; (ii) immediately and effectively undertake investigations into the allegations of violence in relation to members of workers' organizations with a view to establishing the facts, determining culpability and punishing the perpetrators; (iii) operationalize the monitoring bodies, including by providing adequate resources, and provide regular information on these mechanisms and on progress on the cases assigned to them; and (iv) ensure that all workers without distinction are able to form and join organizations of their choosing in accordance with Article 2 of the Convention. The Conference Committee also called on the Government to accept a high-level tripartite mission before the next International Labour Conference. While noting the Government's request to defer the high-level tripartite mission, the Committee expressed the hope that the Government would take the necessary arrangements to enable the high-level tripartite mission requested by the Conference Committee to take place before the next International Labour Conference. The Committee notes that, in its supplementary report, the Government indicates that it addressed the points raised by the Conference Committee in its 2019 report, that it continues to make reforms and to take measures with the social partners to ensure conformity with ratified labour standards and that it stands ready to accept an ILO mission in the coming years but requires further clarification as to what constitutes "effective measures" to prevent violence against workers; what constitutes "immediate and effective investigation" that would ensure compliance with the Convention; and what measures the Government should take to satisfy the Conference Committee's request to ensure workers' right to self-organization. The Committee notes the Government's request for guidance on giving effect to the conclusions of the Conference Committee. The Committee trusts that its past and present detailed comments will provide useful guidance, in consultation with the social partners, in determining appropriate and effective measures to ensure compliance with the Convention; and that the high-level tripartite mission requested by the Conference Committee will be able to provide specific guidance on giving effect to the Conference Committee's conclusions. The Committee therefore trusts that, as soon as the situation so permits, the Government will receive a high-level tripartite mission, as requested by the 2019 Conference Committee. The Committee also reminds the Government that, in the meantime, it can avail itself of the technical assistance of the Office, including in order to elaborate a plan of action, detailing progressive steps to be taken to achieve full compliance with the Convention.

Civil liberties and trade union rights

2016 ITUC observations. The Committee notes the Government's reply to earlier observations from the ITUC, providing an update on the status of the investigations into the alleged assassination of two trade union leaders in 2016 and clarifying that the activities conducted in Compostela Valley, Mindanao were visits under the Community Support Programme of the Armed Forces of the Philippines (AFP). The Committee further notes the Government's general statement that the policy and programme reforms on freedom of association and collective bargaining implemented by the Government contributed to reduced incidence of labour disputes and labour related violence since 2011 and that this decline can also be attributed to the continuous efforts towards raising awareness and strengthening the capacity of all relevant Government institutions.

New allegations of violence and intimidation. The Committee notes, however, with deep concern the grave allegations of violence and intimidation of trade unionists communicated by the ITUC and EI in 2019, including: (i) assassination of 23 trade union leaders in 2018 and 2019, as well as several attempted assassinations documented by the Center for Trade Union and Human Rights (CTUHR); (ii) death threats targeting trade union leaders in the education sector in January and February 2019, as well as profiling, surveillance, harassment and red-tagging by the Philippine National Police (PNP) and AFP officials; (iii) violent dispersal of a number of workers' strikes and protests in Marilao, Bulacan in June and July 2018, resulting in serious injuries, arrests, multiple charges (later dropped) and a week-long detention; (iv) violent dispersal of a strike by workers of a fruit-exporting company in Compostela Town in Compostela Valley in October 2018 and the murder of a trade union activist; (v) assassination of nine sugar cane workers during a protest at Hacienda Nene in Sagay, Negros Occidental; and (vi) suspected arson attack of a labour leader's home during a strike in a banana-packing plant in December 2018. The Committee further notes with deep concern the serious allegations of violence reported by the ITUC in its latest communication, including: (i) extra-judicial killings of two trade unionists in November 2019 and August 2020; (ii) joint military and police raids against trade unions, civil society groups, human rights activists and women's groups in Manila and Bacolod City in October 2019, the arrest of 57 people and the filing of false criminal charges against many of them; (iii) deaths threats, persecution, fabricated charges and profiling of ACT members, as well as an attempted murder against a trade unionist in October 2019 and harassment of two union leaders by the military in July 2020; and (iv) union busting and dispersal of a peaceful demonstration at Coca Cola company in San Fernando, Pampanga province in April 2020, as well as red-tagging of the union at the plant in Bacolod City and threats against a union leader in October 2019. The Committee notes that, in its supplementary report, the Government provides information on the measures taken to address the above allegations from 2019 and 2020, including on any issuing of guidelines, investigating, monitoring or judicial proceedings initiated in relation thereto. The Committee trusts that all of the above allegations will be duly investigated and that any pending proceedings will be concluded without delay, so as to establish the facts, determine culpability and punish the perpetrators, with the aim of effectively preventing and combating impunity.

The Committee further observes with deep concern the serious allegations of violence reported by EI, the ACT and the SMP-NATOW in their 2020 observations, in particular: (i) intimidation of NATOW leaders, as well as arrests and branding of unionists as part of the communist movement; (ii) extra-judicial killings of eight unionists in the education sector and two attempted murders between July 2019 and August 2020; (iii) 18 incidents of death threats, red-tagging, intimidation and harassment of ACT leaders; (iv) 36 documented cases of illegal police profiling; and (v) false criminal charges and four cases of long-term detention of ACT members. While noting that some aspects of these allegations have been incorporated in the 2020 ITUC communication and thus briefly addressed by the Government in its reply thereto, the Committee observes that the joint observations of EI, the SMP-NATOW and the ACT contain more specifics as to the concrete incidents, allowing the Government to provide detailed replies in this regard. The Committee therefore requests the Government to provide a detailed reply to these serious allegations, including on any investigating or other procedures initiated, so as to establish the facts, determine culpability, and punish the perpetrators, and trusts that it will continue to take appropriate measures, adapted to national circumstances, to prevent and promptly address any future allegations of violence and intimidation of trade unionists.

Pending cases of alleged killings of trade union leaders. The Committee previously requested the Government to provide detailed information on the progress achieved on the prosecution and judicial investigations relating to three cases of alleged killings of trade union leaders previously reported by the ITUC. The Committee notes the update provided by the Government that the case of Rolando Pango should be reviewed by regional police for possible refiling, that the case of Florencio "Bong" Romano has not yet been deliberated on due to the non-reactivation of the Administrative Order (AO) 35 Inter-Agency Committee (IAC) and that in the case of Victoriano Embang, a case of murder was filed and an arrest warrant issued against suspects who are at large. In its supplementary report, the Government reiterates that the three cases are currently being handled and investigated through the regular process of criminal investigation and prosecution but clarifies that progress in this regard may be affected by a number of circumstances, such as the lack of material witnesses and evidence. While taking due note of the Government's indication, the Committee regrets to observe that even after numerous years, none of these cases have yet been fully concluded and expresses the firm hope that the investigations into the serious allegations of killings of the above trade union leaders, as well as the ongoing judicial proceedings in this regard, will be completed in the very near future with a view to shedding full light, at the earliest date, on the facts and the circumstances in which such actions occurred and, to the extent possible, determining responsibilities, punishing the perpetrators and preventing the repetition of similar events.

Monitoring mechanisms. In its previous comment, the Committee requested the Government to provide detailed information on the progress made by the Tripartite Validating Teams, the National Tripartite Industrial Peace Council Monitoring Body (NTIPC-MB) and other relevant bodies in ensuring the collection of the necessary information to bring the pending cases of violence to the courts and the outcome in this regard. The Committee notes the Government's assertion that: (i) the existing mechanisms remain steadfast in ensuring expeditious investigation, prosecution and resolution of pending cases concerning alleged harassment and assassination of labour leaders; (ii) for example, after the alleged extra-judicial killing (EJK) of a trade unionist Dennis Sequeña was endorsed by the IAC, the Department of Justice ordered the set-up of a special investigating team to conduct the investigation and case build-up; (iii) a notable advancement with regard to the IAC was the appointment of labour representatives nominated and selected from the NTIPC as observers in its proceedings; and (iv) the existing mechanisms monitor 72 cases of EJK and attempted murders and have also been mobilized to validate and gather information on the 43 cases of alleged murders of unionists and union leaders, as identified by the CTUHR and discussed at the Conference Committee. The Committee welcomes the information provided by the Government to the Conference Committee that, in the spirit of social dialogue and tripartite engagement, trade unions' and employers' representatives were enlisted as deputized labour inspectors (as of January 2019, there were 241 deputized social partners) and that 16 Regional Tripartite Monitoring Bodies (RTMBs) across the country were ready to be mobilized in case of need, bringing about an immediate response and concrete appropriate action.

The Committee observes, however, that the Government representative at the Conference Committee recognized that the mandates, structures and internal rules of the monitoring mechanisms need to be further revisited. According to the Government representative, the IAC, for instance, needed strengthening by ensuring openness and transparency on the prosecution and movement of EJK cases, adopting inclusive criteria in the screening of these cases, relatedness to the exercise of freedom of association, capacity-building on freedom of association and on the collection of physical and vital forensic evidence to reduce heavy reliance on testimonial evidence. The Committee regrets to observe that the IAC has not yet reconvened and that even though members of the Tripartite Validating Teams may request security assistance from the PNP and the AFP, due to the risks and dangers involved for them, this initiative has not yet been put into practice. The Committee further observes the concerns raised by the ITUC and the ITF with regard to the criteria used by the IAC to determine extra-judicial killings, the lack of effective monitoring mechanisms and of resources to investigate and prosecute all complaints of EJK of trade unionists and the need to rapidly identify perpetrators of violence and bring them to justice to combat impunity.

The Committee regrets that despite a number of initiatives undertaken, there continue to be numerous allegations of violence perpetrated against trade union members for which the presumed perpetrators have not yet been identified and the guilty parties punished. It notes in this regard the Government's acknowledgment that conviction has indeed been the recurring and imposing challenge due to the amount of evidence required to convict perpetrators of a crime and that there is a need for major support on this aspect. The Committee observes that the Conference Committee also noted with concern the numerous allegations of murders of trade unionists and anti-union violence, as well as the allegations regarding the lack of investigation in relation to these allegations. In light of the above, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that all of the existing monitoring mechanisms can function properly and efficiently, including by allocating sufficient resources and staff, so as to contribute to effective and timely monitoring and investigation of allegations of EJK and other forms of violence against trade union leaders and members. In particular, the Committee expects that, despite the challenges faced, the Tripartite Validating Teams will be established in practice and the IAC will reconvene in the near future. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide detailed information on the progress made by the existing monitoring mechanisms in ensuring the collection of the necessary information to bring the pending cases of violence to the courts.

Measures to combat impunity. The Committee previously requested the Government to provide detailed information on the steps taken to combat impunity, provide sufficient witness protection and build the capacity of the relevant State actors in the conduct of forensic investigation. The Committee welcomes the detailed information provided by the Government to the Conference Committee relating to numerous trainings, capacity-building activities, seminars and lectures conducted to enhance the knowledge and capacities of various State and non-State actors, including the police, military, prosecutors, enforcers, relevant actors in criminal investigation, local chief executives and social partners on international labour standards, the principles and application of the Convention, as well as on criminal investigation. The Committee also welcomes additional steps taken by the Government in this regard: elaboration of a workers' training manual and of an e-learning module on freedom of association as part of the Labour and Employment Education Services (LEES); call by the Department of Labour and Employment (DOLE) on the PNP and AFP to ensure the observance of the guidelines on the conduct to be observed during the exercise of workers' rights and activities; AFP and PNP commitment to integrating the Labour Code and the guidelines in their education programme; and review of the guidelines for amendment and updating. Finally, the Committee observes the Government's explanation that reliance on testimonial evidence in the prosecution of criminal cases remains indispensable, that forensic evidence is supplemental in character and that programmes should be conducted, together with the ILO, to enhance the capacity of the concerned agencies in gathering and handling forensic evidence. The Government representatives also informed the Conference Committee about a strategic planning conducted in March 2019 regarding the provision of adequate assistance and protection to witnesses under the Witness Protection Programme. The Committee further notes the supplementary information provided by the Government, indicating that exploratory talks were ongoing with the ILO Country Office on possible collaboration for future projects and capacity-building on human and trade union rights for all concerned State actors but due to the immense impact of the COVID-19 pandemic, such initiatives have been stalled. It states that, in view of the precautionary health and safety measures and protocols that must now be observed, the Government together with the Country Office will have to reconsider, review and re-design previous training and capacity-building programmes to incorporate the health and safety standards. Welcoming the above initiatives and measures undertaken, and duly noting the need to ensure pertinent health and safety measures in the context of the current pandemic, the Committee encourages the Government to continue to provide regular and comprehensive training to all concerned State actors in relation to human and trade union rights, as well as on the collection of evidence and the conduct of forensic investigation, with the aim of combating impunity, increasing the investigative capacity of the concerned officials and providing sufficient witness protection. The Committee invites the Office to provide any technical assistance required in this regard.

Review of operational guidelines of monitoring mechanisms. The Committee previously requested the Government to inform it of developments with regard to the review and updating of the operational guidelines of the investigating and monitoring bodies, as part of the National Action Plan under the DOLE-ILO-EU-GSP+ Development Cooperation Project. The Government indicated to the Conference Committee that one of the outcomes of the project is the review of the existing mechanisms to address cases of violations of workers' civil liberties and trade union rights. Following the review of the operational guidelines and process structures of the NTIPC-MB, the RTMBs, the IAC and the National Monitoring Mechanisms (NMM), gaps and issues in the operationalization of these mechanisms have been identified, as well as problem areas encountered by investigative agencies, such as the PNP, the Commission on Human Rights (CHR) and the AFP Human Rights Officer. According to the Government, recommendations issued to help address the identified gaps and blockages will be taken up by the concerned agencies for consideration and possible implementation. Welcoming this information, the Committee trusts that the recommendations addressing the current gaps and blockages will be rapidly implemented so as to contribute to swift and efficient investigation of pending labour-related cases of EJK and other violations.

Trade union rights and civil liberties. Anti-Terrorism Act. The Committee notes the concerns expressed by the ITUC over the adoption of the Anti-Terrorism Act, 2020 which it alleges contains a broad definition of terrorism, aims at silencing dissenting voices and further entrenches State repression and hostility against workers and trade unionists. The Committee notes that in reply, the Government states that the Anti-Terrorism Act does not, in any way, seek to curtail workers' right to freedom of association but aims to address the root causes of terrorism through a comprehensive approach and by all legal means, while safeguarding and upholding basic rights and fundamental liberties enshrined in the Constitution, including the right to freedom of association. In view of the Government's indication, the Committee expects that the Anti-Terrorism Act, 2020 will not be used in any way to curtail legitimate trade union activities or to justify repression against trade unionists, and requests the Government to provide information on any aspects of implementation of the Act that affect trade unionists or trade union activities.

Legislative issues

Labour Code. In its previous comments, the Committee had been noting the numerous amendment bills pending before Congress over many years and in various forms with a view to bringing the national legislation into conformity with the Convention. The Committee notes the Government's assertion that, in coordination with the social partners, it has sought to address emerging labour, economic and social concerns affecting workers' rights and exercise thereof and has achieved substantial progress in its commitments towards the promotion and protection of freedom of association rights, including a multitude of actions and reforms undertaken. On the other hand, the Committee notes that, according to the ITUC, there appears to be an absence of good faith by the Government to adopt the necessary measures that would bring the legislation into compliance with the Convention. The Committee further observes that the Conference Committee regretted that the reforms introduced to address some of the issues were not adopted and urged the Government to bring the law into compliance with the Convention. The Committee on Freedom of Association also trusted that the Government would make serious efforts to bring the Labour Code into conformity with the principles of freedom of association and referred these legislative aspects to this Committee (see 391st Report, October 2019, Case No. 2745, paragraph 50 and 392nd Report, October 2020, Case No. 2716, paragraph 153). The Committee expects that the Government will make serious efforts to align the Labour Code and other pieces of national legislation with the Convention on the following matters.

Article 2 of the Convention. Right of workers, without distinction whatsoever, to establish and join organizations of their own choosing, without previous authorization. Foreign nationals. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to provide information on the progress made in relation to amendments to sections 284 and 287(b) of the Labour Code so as to grant the right to organize to all workers residing in the Philippines. The Committee notes, from the supplementary information provided by the Government that House Bill No. 2629 (allowing foreign nationals to exercise their right to self-organization) was filed in July 2019 and is pending with the House of Representatives Committee on Labour and Employment for consideration. While taking note of the pending bill, the Committee regrets the absence of any substantial progress in the adoption of the pertinent legislation and expects that the necessary amendments will be adopted in the near future and that they will ensure that any individuals residing in the country, whether or not they have a residence or a working permit, can benefit from the trade union rights provided by the Convention. The Committee requests the Government once again to provide information on progress made in this respect and to transmit copies of the amending legislation once adopted.

Other categories of workers excluded from the guarantees of the Convention. The Committee had previously pointed to the lack of trade union rights for certain categories of workers, including workers in managerial positions or with access to confidential information, firefighters, prison guards and other public sector workers, as well as temporary or outsourced workers and workers without employment contract (sections 253 and 255 of the Labour Code, Rule I Section 4 of Executive Order No. 180, 1987 and Rule II Section 2 of the Amended Rules and Regulations Governing the Exercise of the Right to Government Employees to Organize, 2004). The Committee notes the Government's indication, from the supplemental information provided, that the right to self-organization may be exercised by all employees in commercial, industrial and agricultural enterprises, as well as in religious, charitable, medical and educational institutions and that the coverage extends to ambulant, intermittent, itinerant, self-employed and rural workers, as well as those without any definite employer. The Government reiterates that for the purposes of exercising the right to organize, the first parameter to take into account is whether or not a worker is covered by an employer–employee relationship. It states that under section 253 of the Labour Code, only employees may join trade unions for purposes of collective bargaining, whereas ambulant, intermittent, itinerant, self-employed and rural workers, as well as those without any definite employer may only form labour organizations for their mutual aid and protection. In its supplementary report, the Government reiterates this distinction and asserts that nothing in the law or jurisprudence prevents temporary or outsourced workers and workers without an employment contract from exercising the right to form and join trade unions. Concerning workers in managerial positions, the Committee notes that under section 255 of the Labour Code, they are not eligible to join, assist or form any labour organization but observes that, according to the Government, while workers in managerial positions may not form or join labour organizations so as to avoid any conflict of interest or company-dominated unions, they may form and join any organizations for mutual aid and protection or for any legitimate purpose other than collective bargaining. Finally, the Committee observes that firefighters and prison guards are excluded from the scope of application of the Executive Order No. 180 (Rule I, section 4), which provides guidelines for the exercise of the right to organize of government employees but notes the Government's indication that firefighters and prison guards may exercise the right to freedom of association but not to the extent of forming, joining or assisting labour organizations for purposes of collective bargaining. While taking due note of the above information, in particular on the right to organize for purposes other than collective bargaining and to form or join organizations other than labour organizations for mutual aid and protection, the Committee observes that it remains unclear whether or to what extent this form of organization provides to all of the above categories of workers, both in law and in practice, the full guarantees of freedom of association as set out in the Convention and also observes the concerns expressed by the ITUC in this regard.

As to the pending legislative amendments, the Committee notes the Government's indication, in its supplementary report, that House Bill No. 2621, which seeks to address the gaps in public sector labour relations, particularly on the protection of the right to organize, and House Bill No. 2846, which aims at codifying all laws and relevant issuances governing the civil service into a single, comprehensive statute, were filed in the 18th Congress in July 2019 and are currently with the House Committee on Civil Service and Professional Regulation. The Government also informs that House Bill No. 7036 (strengthening the security of tenure of workers) was further consolidated and submitted to the House Committee on Labour and Employment for consideration. This bill seeks to: (i) protect workers from labour-only contracting by allowing the labour sector to express concerns on contracting certain jobs and the employers to present the realities of their business operations; and (ii) simplify the classification of workers to regular and probationary, with project and seasonal employees being classified as regular workers for the duration of their employment, while all other forms of employment are strictly prohibited. Taking due note of the above information and the pending legislative bills and recalling that the legislative reform addressing any potential gaps in the right to organize of the above-mentioned categories of workers has been pending for a number of years, the Committee urges that any legislative amendments currently pending on the issue be adopted without delay so as to ensure that, should this not yet be the case, all workers, with the sole exception of the armed forces and the police, including those in managerial positions or with access to confidential information, firefighters, prison guards and other public sector workers, as well as temporary or outsourced workers and workers without employment contracts, are able to form and join the organizations of their own choosing to defend their occupational interests, and thus benefit from the full guarantees provided by the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to transmit copies of the amending legislation once adopted and reminds the Government that it can avail itself of the technical assistance of the Office, if it so desires.

Registration requirements. The Committee had previously referred to the need to amend section 240(c) of the Labour Code so as to lower the excessive minimum membership requirement for forming an independent union (20 per cent of all the employees in the bargaining unit where the union seeks to operate). The Committee notes, from the supplementary information that, according to the Government, while the current 20 per cent requirement is required for an independent union to acquire legal personality and to be entitled to the rights and privileges granted by the law to legitimate labour organizations, there is no required number of workers in an establishment before a union can be formed. It also clarifies that section 241 of the Labour Code makes registration easier through "chartering", where any duly registered federation or national union can, by issuing a charter certificate, directly create a local chapter entitled to all the rights and privileges of a legitimate labour organization without the need to comply with the registration requirements in section 240(c) of the Labour Code. The Committee understands from the Government's indication that although a union may be formed by any number of workers at an enterprise, it will not be considered as a legitimate organization and will thus not have a legal personality or benefit from any other rights stemming from the law (right to own property, sue in court, etc.), unless it represents 20 per cent of the workforce at the unit where it is active and obtains a certificate of registration. In this regard, the Committee notes the Government's indication that House Bill No. 6023, which seeks to reduce the minimum membership requirement for registration of independent unions from 20 to 5 per cent, institutionalize online registration, decentralize the registration process and ensure a one-day process cycle time, was filed in January 2020 and is pending consideration with the House of Representatives Committee on Labour and Employment. Observing that the Government has been referring to amending legislation for several years now, the Committee firmly expects that the necessary amendments will be adopted in the very near future, reducing the minimum membership requirement for registration to a reasonable level so that the establishment of independent legitimate organizations is not hindered. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on progress made in this respect and to transmit copies of the amending legislation once adopted.

Article 3. Right of workers' organizations to organize their activities and to formulate their programmes without interference by the public authorities. Essential services. The Committee previously requested the Government to provide information on the legislative progress made to ensure that Government intervention leading to compulsory arbitration is limited to essential services in the strict sense of the term (amendments to section 278(g) of the Labour Code). The Committee notes from the supplementary information provided by the Government that House Bill No. 2632 (aimed at limiting Government intervention leading to compulsory arbitration to essential services in the strict sense of the term, and even to prohibiting the issuance of injunctions in labour cases) was filed in July 2019 and is pending consideration with the House of Representatives Committee on Labour and Employment. The Committee also notes that the Government reiterates information provided previously on the issuance in 2013 of Order No. 40-H-13 (an implementing guideline for section 278(g) of the Labour Code), which harmonizes the list of industries indispensable to the national interest with the essential services criteria of the Convention in the exercise of assumptive power of the Secretary of Labour and Employment over labour disputes, strikes and lockouts, and which should help facilitate the passage in Congress of the respective bill. The Committee recalls that the industries referred to in Order No. 40-H-13 include the hospital sector, electric power industry, water supply services (except small water supply services, such as bottling and refilling stations) and air traffic control; and that other industries may be included upon recommendation of the NTIPC. It observes in this regard that, according to the ITUC, the Government still retains an expansive instead of a strict and limited definition of essential services. Observing that the Committee on Freedom of Association has also previously addressed this issue (see 390th Report, June 2019, Case No. 2716, paragraph 78; 391st Report, October 2019, Case No. 2745, paragraph 51 and 392nd Report, October 2020, Case No. 2716, paragraph 153) and recalling that the Government has been referring to legislative amendments to section 278(g) for numerous years, the Committee expects that these legislative amendments will be adopted in the very near future and that they will ensure that Government intervention leading to compulsory arbitration is limited to essential services in the strict sense of the term. The Committee requests the Government to report progress in this regard and to transmit copies of the amending legislation once adopted.

Penal sanctions for participation in a peaceful strike. In its previous comments, the Committee firmly trusted that sections 279 and 287 of the Labour Code would be amended in the very near future to ensure that no penal sanctions are imposed against a worker for having carried out a peaceful strike, even if non-compliant with bargaining or notice requirements. The Committee notes that, according to the Government, current sections 279 and 287 of the Labour Code do not impose penal sanctions on workers for participating in or carrying out a peaceful strike but merely list and penalize activities which are prohibited during a strike or lockout. In its supplementary report, the Government also informs that House Bill No. 2631 (strengthening the workers' right to strike) was filed in July 2019 and is pending with the House of Representatives Committee on Labour and Employment for consideration. The bill aims to: (i) authorize a group or representatives of workers to file the notice of, and to go on, strike; and (ii) remove dismissal and imprisonment as penalty for violation of orders, prohibitions or injunctions issued by the Secretary of Labour and for direct participation by union officers in an illegal strike. The Committee further observes the allegations raised by the ITF, indicating that in addition to sections 279 and 287 of the Labour Code, the 1946 Commonwealth Act has also been used to impose penal sanctions against an organizer of a peaceful strike. Regretting the absence of any substantial progress in the adoption of the previously announced amendments to sections 279 and 287 of the Labour Code, the Committee expects the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that these amendments are adopted in the near future and that any other necessary changes are made in national laws or regulations to ensure that no penal sanctions are imposed against a worker for having carried out a peaceful strike, even if non-compliant with bargaining or notice requirements. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the progress made, as well as its reply to the ITF allegations.

Foreign assistance to trade unions. The Committee had previously referred to the need to amend section 285 of the Labour Code, which subjected the receipt of foreign assistance to trade unions to prior permission of the Secretary of Labour. The Committee notes the Government's clarification that while section 285 of the Labour Code regulates foreign assistance to trade unions, the burden of obtaining an authorization is not on the union but on the foreign entity which provides the assistance. The Committee further observes, from the supplementary information provided by the Government, that House Bill No. 2629 was filed in July 2019 and is pending with the House of Representatives Committee on Labour and Employment for consideration. The bill aims to lift the regulation on foreign assistance by allowing foreign individuals or entities to give any donation, grant or other assistance to any labour organization, group of workers or auxiliary thereof without prior approval of the Secretary of Labour. Recalling that the Government has been referring to amending legislation for several years now, the Committee firmly expects that the proposed legislative amendments removing the need for Government permission for foreign assistance to trade unions will be adopted in the very near future. It requests the Government to provide information on any progress made in this regard and to transmit copies of the amending legislation once adopted.

Article 5. Right of organizations to establish federations and confederations. The Committee previously referred to the need to lower the excessively high requirement of ten union locals or chapters duly recognized as collective bargaining agents for the registration of federations or national unions set out in section 244 of the Labour Code. The Committee notes from the supplementary information provided by the Government that House Bill No. 6023, which seeks to lower the requirement for registration of federations and confederations from 10 to 5 local chapters was filed in January 2020 and is pending consideration with the House of Representatives Committee on Labour and Employment. Observing that the revision of the Labour Code on this point has been pending for several years, the Committee firmly expects that the legislative amendments lowering the excessively high requirement for registration will be adopted in the very near future and requests the Government to provide information on the progress achieved.

Other legislative matters. The Committee notes that the Committee on Freedom of Association referred a number of legislative aspects to this Committee, in particular relating to: (i) the progress made in the adoption of the Bill concerning enforced and involuntary disappearances, which the Committee had considered could represent an important step in acknowledging the existence of enforced disappearances and ensuring significant and dissuasive sanctions (see 392nd Report, October 2020, Case No. 2528, paragraph 136); and (ii) the progress made with regard to the previously announced review by the Supreme Court and the Commission on Human Rights of the witness protection programme on the writ of amparo adopted in 2007, the application of the Anti-Torture Act No. 9745 and of Act No. 9851 on crimes against international humanitarian law, genocide and other crimes against humanity (see 392nd Report, October 2020, Case No. 2528, paragraph 138). The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any progress made on the above matters.

Application of the Convention in practice. The Committee welcomes the statistics provided by the Government on the number of workers' organizations and the number of workers covered in both the private and public sectors, as well as the introduction of a prohibition to contract or subcontract when undertaken to circumvent the workers' right to security of tenure, self-organization, collective bargaining and peaceful concerted activities (Executive Order No. 51, series of 2018).

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Saint Lucia

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1980)

The Committee notes with deep concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments. The Committee informs the Government that, if it has not supplied replies to the points raised by 1 September 2021, then it will proceed with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the information at its disposal at its next session.

Article 2 of the Convention. Right of workers and employers, without distinction whatsoever, to establish and to join organizations. For several years, noting that the "protective services" – which include the fire services and prison officers – were excluded from the Registration, Status and Recognition of Trade Unions and Employers' Organizations Act, 1999, the Committee had requested the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the right to organize to fire service personnel and prison staff. The Committee notes that section 325 of the Labour Act 2006 also excludes "protective services" (which according to section 2 of the Act include the fire service and the correctional services) from the scope of application of the provisions which are dealing with the right to organize in the new legislation. Noting that the Government indicates in its report that the issue of the right to organize fire service personnel and prison staff would be raised with the Minister of Labour, and recalling previous indications that the workers of these services benefit in practice from this right, the Committee once again requests the Government to indicate the manner in which service personnel and prison staff are assured the organizational rights provided in the Convention.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee expects that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1980)

The Committee notes with deep concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments. The Committee informs the Government that, if it has not supplied replies to the points raised by 1 September 2021, then it may proceed with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the information at its disposal at its next session.

Articles 1, 2, 4 and 6 of the Convention. For several years, noting that the "protective services" – which include the fire services and correctional officers – were excluded from the Registration, Status and Recognition of Trade Unions and Employers' Organizations Act, 1999, the Committee had requested the Government to take the necessary measures in order to grant fire service personnel and correctional staff the rights and guarantees provided for in the Convention. The Committee notes that the Labour Act 2006, which entered into force on 1 August 2012, repeals the Registration, Status and Recognition of Trade Unions and Employers' Organizations Act, 1999. It further notes that section 355 of the Labour Act 2006 also excludes "protective services" (which according to section 2 of the Act include the fire service and the correctional services) from the scope of application of the provisions which are dealing with the right to bargain collectively in the new legislation. Noting that the Government indicates in its report that fire service personnel and prison staff benefit in practice from the right to collective bargaining, and that the issue would be raised with the Minister of Labour, the Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to expressly grant in the legislation the right to collective bargaining to fire service personnel and correctional staff.

The Committee expects that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

The Committee notes with concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments.

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Adequate protection against anti-union discrimination and interference. The Committee recalls that for a number of years it has been requesting the Government to take the necessary measures for the adoption of appropriate legislation which imposes sufficiently effective and dissuasive sanction against acts of anti-union discrimination and acts of interference against trade union organizations, in accordance with the provisions of the Convention. Noting with regret that the Government limits itself to mention that, in practice, other laws are resorted to in order to compensate the mentioned legislative lacuna, the Committee requests once again the Government to take the necessary measure so as to ensure that the legislation contains specific and effective provisions concerning anti-union discrimination and interference. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on any developments in this regard.

Article 4. Promotion of collective bargaining. Absence of a legal framework for the exercise of the right to collective bargaining and absence of collective bargaining in practice. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that the right to collective bargaining is recognized in Act No. 5/92, but is not the subject of legal regulation, and that the adoption of a bill on the legal framework for collective bargaining has been pending for several years.

The Committee notes with regret that, in contrast with its previous reports, the Government affirms that there is no bill being elaborated in this respect. Recalling that, in its previous observation, the Committee has also expressed concern at the absence of collective agreements in the country, the Committee highlights that the absence of a legal framework can hamper the exercise of the right to collective bargaining. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take all the necessary measures, both in law and practice, to encourage and promote the development and utilization of collective bargaining. The Committee reminds the Government that it can avail itself of technical assistance from the Office in relation to the various matters raised and trusts that it will be able to note the progress in the near future.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1960)

Bringing the legislation into conformity with the Convention. The Committee recalls that, for very many years, its comments have related to the need to amend several legal provisions to bring them into conformity with the Convention. While the Government has so far indicated its willingness to make these amendments, the Committee notes with deep regret that the Government's latest report contains no information on the measures taken to implement its recommendations. Under these conditions, the Committee finds itself obliged once again to call on the Government to take the necessary measures without further delay to bring the national law into full conformity with the Convention on all of the following points.

Article 2 of the Convention. Trade union rights of minors. The Committee recalls its previous recommendations on the need to amend section 11 of the Labour Code to guarantee the right to organize of minors who have reached the statutory minimum age for admission to work (15 years of age, under section L.145 of the Labour Code), both as workers and as apprentices, without a requirement for authorization from their parents or guardians. The Committee noted previously that a Bill amending section 11 had been approved by the National Consultative Labour Council and that the aim of this amendment was to guarantee that minors could freely join trade unions, without any restriction or prior authorization, from the age of 16 years, which is the age of completion of compulsory schooling in Senegal. The Committee urges the Government to report on any progress achieved with regard to the modification of section 11 of the Labour Code to enable minors to freely join trade unions, once they have reached the minimum age for access to employment, as provided for in the Labour Code.

Articles 2, 5 and 6. Right of workers to establish organizations of their own choosing without previous authorization. The Committee recalls its previous recommendations on the need to repeal Act No. 76-28 of 6 April 1976 and to amend section L.8 of the Labour Code in order to guarantee workers and their organizations the right to establish organizations of their own choosing without previous authorization. The Committee noted with regret that the Government's previous report confined itself to recalling that the procedure in question comprised only simple administrative formalities. The Committee urges the Government to take without delay measures to repeal the legislative provisions that restrict the freedom of workers to establish organizations of their own choosing, particularly the provisions concerning the morality and aptitude of trade union leaders or those which grant de facto to the authorities the discretionary power of previous authorization, which is contrary to the Convention.

Article 3. Right of trade union organizations to exercise their activities in full freedom and to formulate their programmes. Requisitioning in the event of a strike. The Committee recalls that its comments concerned the need to adopt the Decree implementing section L.276 of the Labour Code, establishing the list of jobs where the requisitioning of workers in the event of a strike is authorized only to ensure the operation of essential services in the strict sense of the term. On this point, the Committee recalls that the Government referred previously to Decree No. 72-17 of 11 January 1972, which establishes the list of posts, jobs and functions the occupant of which may be requisitioned, without taking into account the comments made by the Committee in 2006, namely that the Decree in question provides for the requisitioning of workers in the event of a strike for many posts, jobs or functions to which the definition of the term "essential services" does not apply in its strict sense (essential services are those the interruption of which would endanger the lives, safety or health of the whole or part of the population). The Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the implementing Decree of section L.276 of the Labour Code authorizes the requisitioning of workers only to ensure the operation of essential services in the strict sense of the term.

Occupation of workplaces in the event of a strike. The Committee recalls its previous recommendations on the need for a provision stipulating that the restrictions set forth in section L.276 of the Labour Code concerning the occupation of workplaces or their immediate surroundings shall apply only when strikes cease to be peaceful or when respect for the freedom to work of non-strikers and the right of the management to enter the premises of the enterprise are hindered. The Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to limit the restrictions provided for in section L.276 of the Labour Code to the instances mentioned above.

Article 4. Dissolution by administrative authority. The Committee recalls that its comments concerned the need to adopt legislative or regulatory provisions that expressly provide that the dissolution of seditious associations, as envisaged by Act No. 65-40 of 22 May 1965 on associations, may in no event be applied to occupational organizations. The Government indicated in its report of 2015 that the legislation was being brought into conformity in this regard. In its report of 2018, the Government merely indicated that administrative dissolution is not feasible under Senegalese law. The Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to amend the legislation such that the dissolution of seditious organizations, provided for by Act No. 65-40 of 22 May 1965 on associations, may in no event be applied to professional organizations.

Trade union rights of customs workers. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the recommendations of the Committee on Freedom of Association with respect to a case concerning the trade union rights of customs officials (see 384th Report, March 2018, Case No. 3209) inviting the Government to amend section 8 of Act No. 69-64 of 30 October 1969 (the Customs Staff Regulations Act) in order to remove the prohibition against the exercise by customs workers of their trade union rights. In the absence of information in this regard, the Committee once again requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged to amend section 8 of Act No. 69-64 (the Customs Staff Regulations Act) in order to remove any obstacles to the exercise of trade union rights.

The Committee reminds the Government of the availability of ILO technical assistance with regard to the various legislative matters raised.

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 2014)

The Committee takes note of the Government's first report on the application of the Convention. It notes with interest the Government's indication that a draft Labour Code (the content of which is examined in the direct request accompanying this observation), was developed in collaboration with the ILO to revise the 1972 Labour Code, and that all tripartite partners were involved in the process. It further notes that this draft Labour Code and a draft Civil Service Law are currently pending approval by the Parliament. The Committee requests the Government to inform on the adoption process of the draft Labour Code and the draft Civil Service Law and to transmit copies of the laws once adopted.

The Committee also notes the observations of the Federation of Somali Trade Unions (FESTU), received on 1 October 2020, alleging violations of the right to organize, including the right to strike, at an airport management company, as well as pressures and threats by the police against trade union officials. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments in this respect.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1972)

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020). The Committee proceeded with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the supplementary information received from the Government this year (see Article 4 below), as well as on the basis of the information at its disposal in 2019.

The Committee notes the Government's reply to the 2018 observations of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) and the Free Trade Zones and General Services Employees Union (FTZ and GSEU) which referred to allegations of anti-union dismissals in export processing zones (EPZs) as well as the refusal to recognize the right of unions to bargain collectively in the EPZs. The Committee notes that the Government indicates that labour inspectors have the right to enter workplaces in EPZs at any time and without prior notice and that the Labour Offices have not received any complaints in this regard.

The Committee also notes the observations of the ITUC received on 1 September 2019 alleging anti-union dismissals in a company and denouncing that anti-union discrimination and union-busting remain a major problem in the country. The Committee requests the Government to send its reply thereon.

Article 1 of the Convention. Adequate protection against acts of anti-union discrimination. Effective and expeditious procedures. For many years, the Committee has referred to the fact that, in practice, only the Department of Labour can bring cases concerning anti-union discrimination before the Magistrate's Court and that there are no mandatory time limits for bringing cases before the Court. Recalling the importance of efficient and rapid proceedings to redress anti-union discrimination acts, the Committee had urged the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that workers who are victims of anti-union discrimination can lodge a complaint before the judicial courts. The Committee had also expressed the hope that the Industrial Disputes Act be amended to grant trade unions the right to bring anti-union discrimination cases directly before the courts. In this respect, the Committee notes that the Government indicates once again that the possibility for workers and for trade unions to lodge complaints with the judicial courts has been discussed for years at the National Labour Advisory Council (NLAC) but that no consensus has been reached on this matter. The Government expresses the view that, as an impartial institution, the Department of Labour is in a better position than the victims are to carry out investigations and collect evidence in relation to anti-union discrimination complaints. The Government reports that, by the end of 2018, 311 cases of anti-union discrimination were pending and eight had concluded. Recalling that anti-union discrimination is one of the most serious violations of freedom of association, and observing that, according to the ITUC, anti-union discrimination and union-busting remain a major problem in the country, the Committee once again: (i) urges the Government to take the necessary measures in the near future to ensure that workers who are victims of anti-union discrimination can lodge a complaint before the courts and (ii) expresses the hope that the Government will take the necessary measures to amend the Industrial Disputes Act so as to grant trade unions the right to bring anti-union discrimination cases directly before the courts. The Committee also requests the Government to continue to provide information on the number of cases of anti-union discrimination examined by the courts as well as to indicate the duration of proceedings and the sanctions or remedies imposed.

Article 4. Promotion of collective bargaining. Export processing zones (EPZs). The Committee notes the information provided by the Government on measures taken to promote collective bargaining in the EPZs and welcomes the Government's indication that in 2018 and 2019 the Department of Labour conducted 12 awareness-raising programmes in the EPZs reaching approximately 1,000 workers and covering more than 50 work places. The Committee also notes the Government's indication that the fact that only trade unions can engage in collective bargaining discourages the establishment of employee councils in the EPZ's. The Committee takes note that in its supplementary report the Government reiterates the information provided in previous years that seven collective agreements are currently in force in EPZs. The Committee notes, however, that the Government does not indicate the number of trade unions and employees' councils established in the EPZs, as requested by the Committee. The Committee therefore requests the Government to provide such information and to continue to inform on the number of collective agreements concluded by trade unions in the EPZs and the number of workers covered by them in comparison with the total number of workers employed in this sector. Recalling previous ITUC observations regarding the refusal to recognize the right of unions to bargain collectively in the EPZs, the Committee encourages the Government to continue to take measures to promote collective bargaining in the EPZs and requests it to provide information in that regard.

Representativeness requirements for collective bargaining. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to review section 32(A)(g) of the Industrial Disputes Act, according to which no employer shall refuse to bargain with a trade union which has in its membership not less than 40 per cent of the workers on whose behalf the trade union seeks to bargain. The Committee notes that the Government reiterates that this matter was discussed within the NLAC but that both the employers and major trade unions do not agree to reduce the threshold, as it would create more divisions in the work place and dilute the trade union representation and bargaining power. The Government also reiterates that unions who do not meet the required threshold of representativity can merge and operate as one and indicates that some employers have accepted to bargain with trade unions without considering the threshold of 40 per cent. Recalling that the ITUC had previously referred to cases where companies had refused to bargain collectively with unions that did not reach the 40 per cent threshold, the Committee wishes to recall that the determination of the threshold of representativity to designate an exclusive agent for the purpose of negotiating collective agreements, which are designed to be applied to all workers in a sector or establishment, is compatible with the Convention in so far as the required conditions do not constitute an obstacle to the promotion of free and voluntary collective bargaining in practice. The Committee considers however that, if no union in a specific negotiating unit meets the required threshold of representativity to be able to negotiate on behalf of all workers, minority trade unions should be able to negotiate, jointly or separately, at least on behalf of their own members. The Committee therefore reiterates that it expects that the NLAC and the Government will take the necessary measures to review section 32(A)(g) of the Industrial Disputes Act, in accordance with Article 4 of the Convention, in order to ensure that, if there is no union representing the required percentage to be designated as the collective bargaining agent, the existing unions are given the possibility, jointly or separately, to bargain collectively, at least on behalf of their own members. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in this respect.

Article 6. Right to collective bargaining for public service workers other than those engaged in the administration of the State. The Committee had previously noted that the procedures regarding the right to collective bargaining of public sector workers did not provide for genuine collective bargaining, but rather established a consultative mechanism. In its last report, the Government had indicated that it was going to take measures with a view to addressing this issue. In that respect, the Committee notes that the Government once again indicates that: (i) the Industrial Disputes Act recognizes the right of private sector trade unions to bargain collectively with the employer or the authority concerned; (ii) in Sri Lanka, the private sector includes government corporations where a large segment of workers are engaged; and (iii) section 32(A) of the Act, which deals with unfair labour practices and collective bargaining, applies not only to trade unions in the private sector but also to trade unions in public corporations. The Government also indicates that the public sector of Sri Lanka constitutes 14 per cent of all employees and that trade unions with significant bargaining power have bargained specific allowances which have led to disproportionate disparities in the public sector with respect to net salaries. The Government expresses the view that legally allowing collective bargaining rights to the public sector employees would be unfavourable to the sustainability of the Government. In that connection, the Committee wishes to reiterate once again that there are arrangements that allow for the conciliation of the balance of public budgets and the protection of the principle of equal remuneration for work of equal value in the public sector, on the one hand, and the recognition of the right to collective bargaining, on the other. It also recalls once again that, in order to give effect to Article 6 of the Convention, a distinction should be drawn between, on the one hand, public servants engaged in the administration of the State, who may be excluded from the scope of the Convention and, on the other hand, all other persons employed by the Government, by public enterprises or autonomous public institutions, who should benefit from the guarantees provided for in the Convention (see the 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 172). In view of the above and considering that section 49 of the Industrial Disputes Act excludes state and government employees from the Act's scope of application, the Committee reiterates its previous request to the Government to take the necessary measures to guarantee the right to collective bargaining of the public sector workers covered by the Convention with respect to salaries and other conditions of employment. The Committee also reminds the Government that it may have recourse to the technical assistance of the Office.

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1993)

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020). The Committee proceeded with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the supplementary information received from the Government and the social partners this year, as well as on the basis of the information at its disposal in 2019 (see sections on Civil liberties and Article 2 below).The Committee notes the observations of the Confederation of Public Employees Trade Unions (KESK), received on 31 August 2020, of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), received on 16 September 2020, of Education International (EI), received on 1 October 2020, and the Government's detailed replies thereon. The Committee further notes the observations of the Confederation of Public Servants Trade Unions (MEMUR-SEN), communicated with the Government's supplementary report.

The Committee had previously noted the observations of the ITUC, received on 1 September 2019 and examined by the Committee below. It had further noted the observations of the KESK and of the Turkish Confederation of Employers' Associations (TİSK) transmitted by the Government with its report and referring to the issues raised by the Committee below. The Committee further noted the observations of the International Transport Workers' Federation (ITF), received on 4 September 2019 and referring to the information submitted by the ITUC. The Committee also noted the TİSK observations received on 2 September 2019.

The Committee recalls that it had previously requested the Government to reply to the 2018 observations of the Confederation of Turkish Trade Unions (TÜRK-İŞ) alleging that workers employed temporarily via private employment agencies could not enjoy trade union rights, as well as to the allegations of pressure exercised on workers, particularly in the public sector, to join unions designated by the employer. The Committee notes the Government's indication that in a "triangular employment contract" arrangement (in which the worker is employed by a temporary employment agency and works for a different employer), workers have the right to organize in the branch of activity in which the employment agency operates. The Committee requests the Government to provide further information in this regard, including concrete examples as to how the rights of workers in a triangular employment contract arrangement are exercised in practice. With regard to the allegation of pressure exercised on workers in the public sector, the Government refers to the legislative provisions guaranteeing protection against anti-union discrimination and points out that unions and workers are entitled to administrative and judicial means to contest such actions. It refers, in particular, to the first paragraph of article 118 of the Penal Code, according to which, any person who uses force or threats with the aim of compelling a person to join a trade union or not to join, or to participate in union activities or not to participate, or to resign from a trade union office shall be punished by imprisonment for a term of six months to two years. In addition, according to the Government, in such cases, the legislation provides for compensation equivalent to at least the amount of one year's wage and, in the case of a dismissal, the possibility of reinstatement. Public sector employers have the responsibility to respect the law in discharging their duties and thus are further liable under the public law.

Follow-up to the conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards (International Labour Conference, 108th Session, June 2019)

The Committee notes the discussion that took place in the Conference Committee in June 2019 concerning the application of the Convention. The Committee observes that the Conference Committee noted with concern the allegations of restrictions placed on workers' organizations to form, join and function and called on the Government to: (i) take all appropriate measures to guarantee that irrespective of trade union affiliation, the right to freedom of association can be exercised in normal conditions with respect for civil liberties and in a climate free of violence, pressure and threats; (ii) ensure that normal judicial procedure and due process are guaranteed to workers' and employers' organizations and their members; (iii) review Act No. 4688, in consultation with the most representative workers' and employers' organizations, in order to allow that all workers without any distinction, including public sector workers, have freedom of association in accordance with the Convention in law and practice; (iv) revise Presidential Decree No. 5 to exclude workers' and employers' organizations from the scope; and (v) ensure that the dissolution of trade unions follows a judicial decision and that the rights of defence in due process are fully guaranteed through an independent judiciary.

Civil liberties. The Committee recalls that for a number of years it has been commenting upon the situation of civil liberties in Turkey. Noting the Government's indication that domestic administrative or judicial remedies were available against all acts of the administration, the Committee had requested the Government to indicate whether such remedial channels had been invoked by those affected and with what results. The Committee had also requested the Government to provide information on the measures taken to ensure a climate free from violence, pressure or threats of any kind so that workers and employers could fully and freely exercise their rights under the Convention.

The Committee recalls that in its previous comment it noted the Government's reiteration that Turkey is a democratic country, upholding the rule of law and that no trade union had ever been closed or their officials suspended or dismissed on grounds of their legitimate activities. The Government indicated that: (i) with the enactment of the Act on Trade Unions and Collective Labour Agreement (Act No. 6356) and substantial amendments to Act No. 4688 on public employees unions in 2013, the rate of unionization has steadily increased, reaching 22 per cent in public and private sectors combined (66.79 per cent public sector; 13.76 per cent private sector). Currently, there are four trade union confederations in the private sector and ten confederations of public servants trade unions. Like all democratic countries, Turkey has a regulatory framework for organizing meetings and demonstrations. When trade union members transgress the law, destroy public and private property and seek to impose their own rules during the meetings and demonstrations, the security forces are obliged to intervene to preserve public order and safety. The Government indicates that marches and demonstrations can be organized with a prior notification, as illustrated by the May Day celebrations, held by all trade unions and confederations in a peaceful manner. The Government further reiterates that fundamental rights and freedoms are protected under the national Constitution. Apart from the right to seek judicial review against acts of the administration, every person may apply to the Constitutional Court against public authorities for violation of constitutional rights and freedoms. The Government further points out that the allegations mostly concern the period during the state of emergency between July 2016 and July 2018 in the aftermath of a coup attempt and that the problems occurred when the requirements of the state of emergency were ignored and disrespected persistently by some trade unions and their members. Although civil servants do not have the right to strike, strike actions were called for by some public servants' trade unions and their members; and open air meetings and demonstrations were conducted in violation of the provisions of the Act on Meetings and Demonstrations No. 2911. Consequently, the disciplinary procedures may have been applied for civil servants involved in politics.

Regarding the alleged excessive use of force by the security forces, the Government points out that it has taken all the necessary measures to prevent the occurrence of such incidences. It explains that these incidences largely occurred for two reasons: (i) infiltration of illegal terrorist organizations into the marches and demonstrations organized by trade unions; and (ii) the insistence of some trade unions to organize such meetings in areas not allocated for such purposes. The Government informs that the security forces intervened in 2 per cent of cases out of 40,016 actions and activities in 2016; in 0.8 per cent of cases out of 38,976 activities in 2017; and in 0.7 per cent of cases out of 36,925 activities in 2018. According to the supplementary information provided by the Government, the rate of interference by the security forces decreased from 0.8 per cent in 2017 to 0.7 per cent in 2019. The Government further indicates that in 2019, 51,525 demonstrations or activities were conducted involving 32,166,244 people, representing, compared to 2018, an increase of 3.6 per cent in the number of events and an increase by 11.07 per cent in terms of participants. The Government indicated in its 2019 report that the police intervention occurs only in cases of violence and attacks against the security forces and citizens and when the life of citizens is affected unbearably.

The Committee recalls that in its 2019 report, the Government indicated that a Judicial Reform Strategy was launched on 30 May 2019 by the President of the Republic. The main aims of this reform include strengthening of the rule of law, effective protection and promotion of rights and freedoms, strengthening the independence of the judiciary and improving impartiality, increasing the transparency of the system, simplifying judicial processes, facilitating access to justice, strengthening the right of defence and efficiently protecting the right to trial in a reasonable time. The Government indicated that a clear and measurable Action Plan would also be prepared and the Ministry of Justice would issue annual monitoring reports.

While taking note of the above, the Committee noted with concern the observations of the ITUC alleging that since the attempted coup and the severe restrictions on civil liberties imposed by the Government, workers' freedoms and rights have been further restricted (the ITUC denounces, in particular, police crackdowns on protests and the systematic dismissal of workers attempting to organize). The Committee further noted with concern the allegation of the murder of a president of the rubber and chemical workers' union Lastik-İş on 13 November 2018 and the sentencing, on 2 November 2018, of 26 trade union members to a suspended five-month imprisonment for "disobeying the law on meetings and demonstrations" after taking part in a protest in March 2016 demanding the recognition of the right to organize at a private company (the ITUC alleged that the protest was violently dispersed by police). The Committee also noted with concern the ITUC allegations of criminal prosecution of the following trade union leaders for their legitimate trade union activities: (i) the General Secretary of the teacher's union Eğitim Sen was arrested in May 2019 for attending a press meeting and was thus not allowed to attend the ILO Conference; (ii) Kenan Ozturk, the President of the transport workers' union TÜMTIS, and four other union officials were arrested under Act No. 2911 for visiting, in 2017, the unfairly dismissed workers of a cargo company in the Province of Gaziantep and holding a press conference; while they await criminal trial, another TÜMTIS leader, Nurettin Kilicdogan is still in prison; (iii) Arzu Çerkezoğlu, the President of the Confederation of Progressive Trade Unions of Turkey (DISK) is facing criminal trial for speaking at the public panel organized by Turkey's opposition party in June 2016; and (iv) in May 2019, the prosecution began proceedings against Tarim Orman-is, the President of the Civil Servants Union of Agriculture, Forestry, Husbandry and Environment for criticising the Government after he publicly defended workers' right to benefit from the public facilities.

The Committee noted that the ITUC expressed its concern at the seriousness and persistence of violations of freedom of association and the Government's authoritarian measures to interfere in trade union affairs and impose heavy restrictions on the right to organize. The ITUC alleged that it has become almost impossible for trade unions in Turkey to operate. It stated, in this respect that from 2016, the Government has justified continued violations of civil liberties under the guise of the state of emergency through associated decrees. As a result, about 110,000 public servants and 5,600 academics had been dismissed; about 22,500 workers in private education institutions had had their work permits cancelled; 19 trade unions had been dissolved and about 24,000 workers were undergoing various forms of disciplinary action associated with workers' protests. More than 11,000 KESK representatives and members were suspended from their jobs or dismissed because of their trade union activities, under the pretext of national security and emergency powers. Furthermore, the ITUC stated that the Government continued to uphold emergency state laws that allow for arbitrary dissolution of trade union organizations. Decree No. 667 adopted in 2016 provides that "trade unions, federations and confederations … found to be in connection, communication or adherence to formations threatening national security or to terrorist organizations are banned upon the suggestion of the commission and approval of the minister concerned". The ITUC further alleged that the law makes no distinction between a trade union as an organization with an objective public purpose and individual actors and holds all trade union members guilty by association with a closing down of the union. Although the Government had set up an Inquiry Commission to review its actions, including cases of trade union dissolution, the process did not enjoy the trust of victims and trade unions due to the manner in which it was constituted and the results of the processes so far (the ITUC alleged that it is marred by a lack of institutional independence, long waiting periods, an absence of safeguards allowing individuals to rebut allegations and weak evidence cited in decisions to uphold dismissals).

The Committee notes that in its supplementary report, the Government indicates that Mr Kenan Ozturk, the President of the transport workers' union TÜMTIS, and four other union members arrested in 2017 were acquitted in May 2018 and that another TÜMTIS leader, Mr Nurettin Kilicdogan, was released in February 2020. Regarding the ITUC allegation on the work of the Inquiry Commission, the Government indicates that the Commission began its work on 22 December 2017 and as of 2 October 2020 it has delivered 110,250 decisions (12,680 accepted and 97,570 rejected). According to the Government, 60 of the acceptance decisions are related to the opening of organizations that were shut down (associations, foundations, and television channels). The Government points out that 87 per cent of the applications have been decided within a period of 33 months. The Government further informs that currently, six Ankara Administrative Courts are competent to deal with the annulment cases brought against the decisions of the Inquiry Commission and that the "average completion time" (to finalize an application for annulment) varies, depending on the court, between 191 and 347 days.

The Committee notes with concern the most recent ITUC allegation that in 2019 and 2020, trade union leaders continued to face arrests and prosecution as the Government tried to suppress critical voices. According to the ITUC, while the courts dismissed several cases, the authorities have fallen into a pattern of systematic targeting, arrest and prosecution of trade union leaders. The ITUC refers to the pending case of Umar Karatepe, director of communication of DISK, noting that his house was raided on 5 March 2020; he was arrested and taken to the police headquarters in Istanbul; and charges against him were unspecified but reportedly related to several statements made on his account on social media.

The Committee further notes with concern the MEMUR-SEN allegation of pressure and harassment put on its members, members of Bem-Bir-Sen, its affiliate, and members of Hizmet-Is, affiliated to Hak-Is, following the local elections of 31 March 2019.

While noting the Government's reply to some of these allegations, the Committee requests the Government to provide its detailed comments on the remaining lengthy and serious allegations of violations of civil liberties and trade union rights. The Committee observes that the issue of dismissal of trade unionists following dissolution of trade unions is being considered by a tripartite committee of the Committee on Freedom of Association established to examine a representation under article 24 of the ILO Constitution alleging non-observance by the Government of Turkey of Convention No. 87. The Committee will proceed with its examination of these matters once the tripartite committee finalizes its work.

Article 2 of the Convention. Right of workers, without distinction whatsoever, to establish and join organizations. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that section 15 of Act No. 4688, as amended in 2012, excludes senior public employees, magistrates and prison guards from the right to organize. The Committee noted the Government's reiteration that the restrictions under section 15 of the Act are limited to those public services where the disruption of service cannot be compensated, such as security, justice and high level civil servants.

The Committee notes that the MEMUR-SEN points out to the need to ensure freedom of association rights for pensioners, locum workers (teachers, nurses, midwives, etc.) as well as public servants who are not on the payroll and work without a contract of employment. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments thereon.

Recalling that all workers, without distinction whatsoever, shall have the right to establish and join trade unions of their own choosing and that the only possible exceptions from the application of the Convention in this regard pertain to the armed forces and the police, the Committee encourages the Government to take the necessary measures to review section 15 of Act No. 4688, as amended, with a view to ensuring to all public servants the right to form and join organizations of their own choosing. It requests the Government to provide information on all measures taken or envisaged in this respect.

Article 3. Right of workers' organizations to organize their activities and formulate their programmes. The Committee recalls that in its previous comments it had noted that section 63(1) of Act No. 6356 provides that a lawful strike or lockout that had been called or commenced may be suspended by the Council of Ministers for 60 days by a decree if it is prejudicial to public health or national security and that if an agreement is not reached during the suspension period, the dispute would be submitted to compulsory arbitration. For a number of years, the Committee had been requesting the Government to ensure that section 63 of Act No. 6356 was not applied in a manner so as to infringe on the right of workers' organizations to organize their activities free from government interference. While observing that in a decision dated 22 October 2014, the Constitutional Court ruled that the prohibition of strikes and lockouts in banking services and municipal transport services under section 62(1) was unconstitutional, the Committee noted that pursuant to a Decree with power of law (KHK) No. 678, the Council of Ministers can postpone strikes in local transportation companies and banking institutions for 60 days. The Committee further noted with concern that in 2017, five strikes were suspended including in the glass sector on the grounds of threat to national security, while in 2015 the Turkish Constitutional Court had found a strike suspension in the same sector unconstitutional. The Committee recalled that the right to strike may be restricted or banned only with regard to public servants exercising authority in the name of the State, in essential services in the strict sense of the term, and in situations of acute national or local crisis, for a limited period of time and to the extent necessary to meet the requirements of the situation. Recalling the Constitutional Court ruling that strike suspensions in these sectors were unconstitutional, the Committee had requested the Government to take into consideration the above principles in the application of section 63 of Act No. 6356 and KHK No. 678. It further requested the Government to provide a copy of KHK No. 678. The Committee notes a copy of the Decree and will examine it once the translation thereof is available. The Committee further notes the Government's indication that the power to suspend a strike for 60 days rests with the President when a strike action is harmful to the general health and national security or to urban public transportation of metropolitan municipalities or to economic and financial stability in banking services. The Government indicates that where the strike has been suspended, the High Board of Arbitration makes maximum effort to bring the parties to an agreement. Judicial procedure is open for the stay of execution against the decision of the Board. The Government points out that pursuant to article 138 of the Constitution on "Independence of Courts," no organ, authority, office or individual may give orders or instructions to courts or judges relating to the exercise of their judicial power, send them circulars, or make recommendations or suggestions. The Committee notes that, according to the ITUC, while the legislation indicates that the measure of suspension should be limited to strikes that may be prejudicial to public health or national security, it has been interpreted in such a broad manner that strikes in non-essential services have also been effectively prohibited. It informs in this respect that in January 2019 a strike called by the ITF-affiliated railway union in Izmir has been postponed under these laws. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments thereon. Considering that strikes can be suspended only in essential services in the strict sense of the term, for public servants exercising authority in the name of the State or in an event of an acute national crisis, the Committee requests the Government to ensure that the above is taken into consideration in the application of section 63 of Act No. 6356 and KHK No. 678.

The Committee recalls that the ITUC has previously alleged that Decree No. 5 adopted in July 2018 provided that an institution directly accountable to the Office of the President – the State Supervisory Council (DDK) – had been vested with the authority to investigate and audit trade unions, professional associations, foundations and associations at any given time. According to the ITUC, all documents and activities of trade unions may come under investigation without a court order and the DDK has discretion to remove or change the leadership of trade unions. Recalling that any law that gives the authorities extended powers of control of internal functioning of unions beyond the obligation to submit annual financial reports would be incompatible with the Convention, the Committee had requested the Government to transmit a copy of Decree No. 5 in order to make a thorough examination of its conformity with the Convention. It had also requested the Government to provide specific information on any investigations or audits undertaken pursuant to Decree No. 5 and their results, including any dismissal or suspension of trade union leaders. The Committee notes the Government's indication that there has never been an investigation or audit of a trade union organization or suspension of a trade union official by the State Supervisory Council pursuant to Decree No. 5. The Government explains that the Council's powers to investigate with the purpose of ensuring the lawfulness, regular and efficient functioning and improvement of the administration emanates from of article 108 of the Constitution. It further indicates that the Council has no authority to dismiss trade union officials and has never interfered and has no intention to interfere with the internal functioning of the unions. The measures of dismissal can be taken only by the courts within the framework of existing legal arrangements. Furthermore, suspension is a measure applied to public officials in cases where the provision of public services so requires during an administrative investigation. When a suspension measure needs to be taken for elected officials such as trade union officials, the State Supervisory Council can only propose the application of this measure to the competent authorities which, in the case of trade unions, refers to the trade unions' own supervisory boards and the disciplinary committees. The Committee notes a copy of Decree No. 5 transmitted by the Government and will examine it once its translation is available. The Committee requests that the Government continue to provide information on any investigations or audits undertaken by the Council, pursuant to Decree No. 5 or article 108 of the Constitution, and their results including any sanctions assessed.

Article 4. Dissolution of trade unions. The Committee recalls that after the attempted coup of 15 July 2016, Turkey was in a state of acute national crisis, and that an Inquiry Commission was established to examine applications against the dissolution of trade unions by a decree during the state of emergency. The Committee firmly hoped that the Inquiry Commission would be accessible to all the organizations that desired its review and that the Commission, and the administrative courts that reviewed its decisions on appeal, would carefully examine the grounds for the dissolution of trade unions paying due consideration to the principles of freedom of association. It requested the Government to provide information on the number of applications submitted by the dissolved organizations and the outcome of their examination in the Commission. The Committee had further requested the Government to provide information on the number and outcome of appeals against the negative decisions of the Commission concerning dissolved trade unions. The Committee observes that the Government refers only to cases of Cihan-Sen and Aksiyon-İş Confederations. According to the Government, these organizations, together with their affiliated trade unions, were dissolved on the basis of their connection to the FETO terrorist organization that perpetrated the coup attempt to overthrow the democratically elected government. The Government indicates that the cases of the above-mentioned organizations are still pending before the Inquiry Commission. Recalling that the dissolution and suspension of trade unions constitute extreme forms of interference by the authorities in the activities of organizations, the Committee observes, as noted above, that the issue of dissolution of trade unions is being considered by a tripartite committee of the Committee on Freedom of Association established to examine a representation under article 24 of the ILO Constitution alleging non-observance by the Government of Turkey of Convention No. 87. The Committee will proceed with its examination of this issue once the tripartite committee finalizes its work.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1952)

The Committee notes the observations of the Confederation of Public Employees Trade Unions (KESK), received on 31 August 2020, of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), received on 16 September 2020, Education International (EI), received on 1 October 2020, and the Government's detailed replies thereon. The Committee further notes the observations of the Confederation of Public Servants Trade Unions (MEMUR-SEN) and of the Confederation of Turkish Trade Unions (TÜRK-IS), communicated with the Government's report. The Committee notes the Government's reply to the observations submitted by the TÜRK-IS. The Committee finally notes the observations of the Turkish Confederation of Employer Associations (TİSK), received on 29 September 2020.

Scope of the Convention. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that while the prison staff, like all other public servants were covered by the collective agreements concluded in the public service, this category of workers did not enjoy the right to organize (section 15 of the Act on Public Servants' Trade Unions and Collective Agreement (Act No. 4688)). The Committee had requested the Government to take the necessary measures, including legislative review, with a view to guaranteeing that the prison staff can be effectively represented by the organizations of their own choosing in negotiations which affect them. The Committee notes that the Government reiterates that it is forbidden to this category of public servants to establish and join trade unions due to the nature of their work and considerations of public order and safety, discipline and hierarchy, which are overarching principles in the public service administration. Recalling that all public servants not engaged in the administration of the State or those who are members of the armed forces or the police, defined in a restrictive manner, must enjoy the rights afforded by the Convention, the Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures, including legislative review of section 15 of Act No. 4688, with a view to guaranteeing that the prison staff can be effectively represented by the organizations of their own choosing in negotiations which affect them. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on all measures taken in this respect.

Further noting that the MEMUR-SEN points out to the need to ensure freedom of association and collective bargaining rights to locum workers (teaches, nurses, midwives, etc.) as well as public servants who work without a written contract of employment, the Committee requests the Government to provide its comments thereon.

Articles 1 and 3 of the Convention. Adequate protection against anti-union discrimination. Following up on the recommendations of the June 2013 Committee on the Application of Standards of the International Labour Conference (hereafter, the Conference Committee), the Committee has been requesting the Government to establish a system for collecting data on anti-union discrimination in both private and public sectors. The Committee notes the Government's indication that it is currently not possible to obtain reliable data on the cases of trade union discrimination. In this respect, the Government points out the difficulties with carrying out data collection, which include the length of judicial processes and the need to make considerable arrangements in the records and databases of various institutions. The Government indicates that it is necessary to carry out work with all relevant institutions and organizations on the issue of discrimination and that these institutions have to develop their own database infrastructure and recording systems to detect trade union discrimination. The Committee notes this information and underlines the importance of statistical information for the Government to fulfil its obligation to prevent, monitor and sanction acts of anti- union discrimination. The Committee reiterates the June 2013 request of the Conference Committee and expects that the necessary work will be conducted within each relevant institution to that end. The Committee requests the Government to provide in its next report information on the measures taken in this respect. The Committee notes the TISK indication that the social partners are committed to work together in this respect. The Committee recalls that the Government can avail itself of the technical assistance of the ILO in this regard.

Articles 1, 2 and 3. Massive dismissals in the public sector under the state of emergency decrees. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted the information on the high number of suspensions and dismissals of trade union members and officials under the state of emergency. It had noted in this respect the allegation that the state of emergency was used by the political power to target and punish certain trade unions and to exert pressure on oppositional trade unions through dismissals of their members. Firmly hoping that the Inquiry Commission (established to review such dismissals) has the necessary means to examine the relevant facts, the Committee had requested the Government to provide information on the functioning of the Commission and to indicate the number of applications received from trade union members and officials, and the outcome of their examination. The Committee had also requested the Government to provide information on the number and outcome of appeals against the negative decisions of the Commission concerning trade union members and officials. The Committee notes the Government's indication that as of 2 October 2020, there were 126,300 applications submitted to the Inquiry Commission. Since 22 December 2017, the Commission delivered its decisions in respect of 110,250 applications, out of which, 12,680 were accepted (for reinstatement) and 97,570 were rejected while 16,050 applications are still pending. The Government explains that the decision of the Commission are circulated to the institutions where the persons lastly took office, which then carry out the appointments together with the Council of Higher Education, where relevant. The Government further indicates that an annulment action against the decision of the Commission and the institution or organization where the relevant person lastly tool office may be brought before any of the six Ankara Administrative Courts within a period of sixty days as from the date of notification of the decision. The Government points out that there is no statistical information available on the number of trade union members or officials who have applied to either the Inquiry Commission or Ankara Administrative Courts.

The Committee recalls that it had previously noted that according to the ITUC 2019 observations, more than 11,000 KESK representatives and members were suspended from their jobs or dismissed because of their trade union activities and requested the Government to provide its comments thereon. The Committee notes that in its most recent observations, KESK points out that close to 89 per cent of all applications are rejected by the Commission and alleges that the examination of cases involving its members is postponed. The Committee further notes that the Government reiterates that given the higher rate of positive decisions in relation to KESK members (one in three, which is above the average rate), KESK allegations are unfounded. The Government further denies that measures imposed on KESK members were based on anti-union grounds and refers to the legislative provisions providing protection against acts of anti-union discrimination.

Further in this respect, the Committee notes the EI allegations that: during the state of emergency period, 1628 members of the Education and Science Workers Union of Turkey (EĞİTİM SEN) were dismissed from the public service by virtue of Decrees with the force of law; only 12.7 per cent of files pertaining to this union members have been examined, among which 126 applications were rejected and only 79 accepted; and as of May 2020, 1178 EĞİTİM SEN members were still without employment. While noting the Government's reply that the acceptance rate for reinstatement of EĞİTİM SEN (38,5 per cent) is much higher than the average rate (11,5 per cent), the Committee expresses its concern at the allegation that close to 75 per cent of the dismissed EĞİTİM SEN members are still without employment. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments thereon.

While taking note of the general statistics provided by the Government, as well as the detailed information in which it recalls the reasons for the state of emergency, the Committee regrets once again the absence of specific information on the number of trade union members and officials involved. The Committee notes with concern the high number of rejection cases (currently 88.5 per cent) and further regrets the absence of information regarding the number and outcome of appeals against the negative decisions of the Inquiry Commission concerning trade union members and officials. The Committee reiterates its firm hope that the Inquiry Commission and the administrative courts that review its decisions carefully examine the grounds for the dismissal of trade union members and officials in the public sector and order reinstatement of the trade unionists dismissed for anti-union grounds. The Committee once again requests the Government to provide specific information on the number of applications received from trade union members and officials, the outcome of their examination by the Inquiry Commission and on the number and outcome of appeals against the negative decisions of the Commission concerning trade union members and officials.

Article 1. Anti-union discrimination in the course of employment. The Committee recalls the observations of KESK and the EĞİTİM SEN, alleging that hundreds of their members, mostly in the education sector, were transferred against their will from their workplaces in 2016 (at least 122 transfers, mainly for participation in trade union activities and events) and in 2017 (1,267 transfers, 1,190 of whom from the education sector). The Committee had requested the Government to take the necessary measures to prevent the occurrence of anti-union transfers and demotions in the future, and to ensure that if any anti-union discriminatory measures remained in force, they were revoked immediately. The Committee notes the most recent KESK allegations concerning relocation of its members, termination of their contracts and suspensions for having exercised their trade union rights, as well as administrative investigations launched by employers. It further notes the ITUC allegations of trade union busting at various enterprises and the Government's detailed reply thereon. The Committee notes that the Government denies any discrimination against legitimate trade union activities of any trade union organization and emphasizes that under the national legislation, no dismissal or suspension can take place because of a legitimate trade union activity or trade union affiliation. The Government points out that the protection of the legislation against anti-union discrimination in both public and private sectors are further strengthened and adjudicated through the judicial system that includes individual application to the Constitutional Court and the European Court of Human Rights against violation of fundamental rights and freedoms by public authorities. Referring to the KESK allegation of relocation, the Government points to the legislation applicable to public service, which allows for relocation if the needs of the service require. The Committee takes note of the observations submitted by workers organizations and the detailed information provided by the Government. The Committee requests the Government to continue engaging with the social partners regarding complaints of anti-union discrimination practices in both the private and public sectors.

Article 4. Promotion of collective bargaining. Cross-sector bargaining. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that while cross-sector bargaining resulting in "public collective labour agreement framework protocols" was possible in the public sector, this was not the case in the private sector. It noted in this respect that pursuant to section 34 of Act No. 6356, collective work agreement may cover one or more than one workplace in the same branch of activity, thereby making cross-sector bargaining in the private sector impossible. The Committee had requested the Government to consider, in consultation with the social partners, the amendment of section 34 of Act No. 6356 in a manner so as to ensure that it does not restrict the possibility of the parties in the private sector to engage in cross-sector regional or national agreements should they so desire. The Committee notes the Government's indication that section 34 of the Act was drafted taking into account the views of the social partners. The Government indicates that this provision regulates the scope and level of collective bargaining with a view to protect and strengthen workplace peace and that the legislation in question does not restrict collective bargaining to the level of workplace but allows also the enterprise and group level bargaining as well as framework agreements. The Committee notes the TISK indication that because of the sectoral characteristics and the difficulties to compile all of them in a single agreement, inter-sectoral or national agreements are not favoured by the social partners. While taking note of these explanations, the Committee recalls that in accordance with Article 4 of the Convention, collective bargaining should remain possible at all levels and that the legislation should not impose restrictions in this regard. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to consider, in consultation with the social partners, the amendment of section 34 of Act No. 6356 so as to ensure that the parties in the private sector wishing to engage in cross sector regional or national agreements can do so without impairment. It requests the Government to provide information on the steps taken in this regard.

Requirements for becoming a bargaining agent. The Committee recalls that in its previous comments, it had noted that section 41(1) of Act No. 6356 initially set out the following requirement for becoming a collective bargaining agent: the union should represent at least 1 per cent (progressively, 3 per cent) of the workers engaged in a given branch of activities and more than 50 per cent of workers employed in the workplace and 40 per cent of workers of the enterprise to be covered by the collective agreement. It further recalls that the 3 per cent threshold was decreased to 1 per cent by Act No. 6552 of 10 September 2014 and that additionally, section 1 of Act No. 6356 stipulating that the 1 per cent membership threshold should be applied as 3 per cent with regard to trade unions that are not members of confederations participating in the Economic and Social Council was repealed by the Constitutional Court. Therefore, the 3 per cent branch threshold was reduced to 1 per cent with regard to all trade unions. Furthermore, the Committee recalls that until 6 September 2018, legal exemptions from the branch threshold requirement were granted to three categories of previously authorized trade unions, so as to prevent the loss of their authorization for collective bargaining purposes. Recalling the concerns that had been expressed by several workers' organizations in relation to the perpetuation of the double threshold and noting that the exemption granted to the previously authorized unions was provisional, the Committee had requested the Government to indicate whether the exemption had been extended beyond 6 September 2018, and the impact of the decision made in this regard on the capacity of previously authorized organizations to bargain collectively. It had further requested the Government to continue reviewing the impact of the perpetuation of the branch threshold requirement on the trade union movement and the national collective bargaining machinery as a whole in full consultation with the social partners, and should it be confirmed that the perpetuation of the 1 per cent threshold had a negative impact on the coverage of the national collective bargaining machinery, revise the law with a view to its removal.

The Committee recalls that the Government had previously pointed out that Act No. 6356 was drafted in consultation with the social partners and taking into consideration the universal principles regarding trade union rights and freedoms. Following the entry into force of the arrangements outlined in the Act, the Government proceeded to obtain the views and evaluations of the social partners. While some of the social partners asked for the continuation of the branch level threshold, others were of the view that it needs to be reduced or abolished; there was no agreement on this issue. The Government had indicated, however, that should a consensus be achieved on this matter, steps would be taken to make the necessary arrangements.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that the provisional exemption of the branch of activity threshold requirement was extended until 12 June 2020 by Act No. 30799, published on 12 June 2019. The Government indicates that following publication of the Act, the exempted trade unions concluded collective agreements. The Committee notes the TISK indication that the exempted trade unions have been given a significant opportunity to increase their membership. However, following three consecutive extensions, most of the unions in question have not reached the branch level threshold. The TISK indicates that there was a consensus among the social partners for the discontinuation of the exemption. Noting that the provisional exemption has expired on 12 June 2020, the Committee requests the Government to indicate if further extension has been decided and if not, to provide information on the impact of the non-extension on the capacity of previously authorized organizations to bargain collectively and to indicate the status of the collective agreements concluded by them. It also requests the Government to continue monitoring the impact of the perpetuation of the branch threshold requirement on the trade union movement and the national collective bargaining machinery as a whole in full consultation with the social partners and to provide information in this regard.

With regard to the workplace and enterprise representativeness thresholds, in its previous comments, the Committee had noted section 42(3) of Act No. 6356, which provides that if it is determined that there exists no trade union which meets the conditions for authorization to bargain collectively, such information is notified to the party which made the application for the determination of competence. It had further noted section 45(1), which stipulates that an agreement concluded without an authorization document is null and void. While noting the "one agreement for one workplace or business" principle adopted by the Turkish legislation, the Committee had recalled that under a system of designation of an exclusive bargaining agent, if no union represents the required percentage of workers to be declared the exclusive bargaining agent, all unions in the unit, jointly or separately, should be able to engage in collective bargaining, at least on behalf of their own members. The Committee highlighted that by allowing for the joint bargaining of minority unions, the law could adopt an approach more favourable to the development of collective bargaining without compromising the "one agreement for one workplace or business" principle. The Committee had requested the Government to take the necessary measures to amend the legislation, in consultation with the social partners, and to provide information in this respect. The Committee notes that the Government refers to its previous indication that: (1) the issue of the amendment of the collective bargaining system was discussed with the social partners but no model could be agreed upon by everyone; and that (2) it would consider the proposal for the amendment to the legislation if put forward by the social partners and if such a proposal represented a consensus. The Committee recognizes that while the search for a consensus with regard to collective bargaining is important, it cannot constitute an obstacle to the Government's obligation to bring the law and practice into conformity with the Convention. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to amend the legislation so as to ensure that if no union represents the required percentage of workers to be declared the exclusive bargaining agent, all unions in the unit, jointly or separately, should be able to engage in collective bargaining, at least on behalf of their own members. It requests the Government to provide information on all measures taken or envisaged in this regard.

Articles 4 and 6. Collective bargaining rights of public servants not engaged in the administration of the State. Material scope of collective bargaining. The Committee had previously noted that section 28 of Act No. 4688, as amended in 2012, restricts the scope of collective agreements to "social and financial rights" only, thereby excluding issues such as working time, promotion and career as well as disciplinary sanctions. The Committee notes that the Government reiterates its previous indication that the demands of the unions and their confederations that do not fall within the category of financial and social rights are received and considered at the other, more appropriate platforms established beside collective bargaining. The Committee is therefore bound to once again recall that public servants who are not engaged in the administration of the State should enjoy the guarantees of the Convention and therefore be able to negotiate collectively their conditions of employment and that measures taken unilaterally by the authorities to restrict the scope of negotiable issues are often incompatible with the Convention. The Committee wishes to further recall however, that the Convention is compatible with systems requiring competent authorities' approval of certain labour conditions or financial clauses of collective agreements concerning the public sector, as long as the authorities respect the agreement adopted. Bearing in mind the compatibility with the Convention of the special bargaining modalities in the public sector as mentioned above, the Committee again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the removal of restrictions on matters subject to collective bargaining so that the material scope of collective bargaining rights of public servants not engaged in the administration of the State is in full conformity with the Convention.

Collective bargaining in the public sector. Participation of most representative branch unions. In its previous comment, the Committee had noted that pursuant to section 29 of Act No. 4688, the Public Employers' Delegation (PED) and Public Servants' Unions Delegation (PSUD) are parties to the collective agreements concluded in the public service. In this respect, the proposals for the general section of the collective agreement were prepared by the confederation members of PSUD and the proposals for collective agreements in each service branch were made by the relevant branch trade union representative member of PSUD. The Committee had also noted the observation of the Turkish Confederation of Public Workers Associations (Türkiye KAMU-SEN), indicating that many of the proposals of authorized unions in the branch were accepted as proposals relating to the general section of the agreement meaning that they should be presented by a confederation pursuant to the provisions of section 29 and that this mechanism deprived the branch unions from the capacity to directly exercise their right to make proposals. Noting that although the most representative unions in the branch were represented in PSUD and took part in bargaining within branch-specific technical committees, their role within PSUD was restricted in that they were not entitled to make proposals for collective agreements, in particular where their demands were qualified as general or related to more than one service branch, the Committee had requested the Government to ensure that these unions can make general proposals. The Committee notes that the Government refers to its previous indication that collective bargaining is held every two years in order to discuss the issues that concern service branches and general issues together. On that occasion, collective bargaining offers for all service branches are determined separately by the authorized trade unions having the highest number of members in that service branch. Naturally, the proposals of the trade unions are determined exclusively for the service branches due to the differences in the service branches and the public servants within the scope of those branches and discussed in the special committees established separately for the service branches by the Heads of PED and PSUD. Considering that where joint bodies within which collective agreements must be concluded are set up, and the conditions imposed by law for participation in these bodies are such as to prevent a trade union which would be the most representative of its branch of activity from being associated in the work of the said bodies, the principles of the Convention are impaired, the Committee again requests the Government to ensure that Act No. 4688 and its application enable the most representative unions in each branch to make proposals for collective agreements including on issues that may concern more than one service branch, as regards public servants not engaged in the administration of the State.

Collective bargaining in the public sector. Public Employee Arbitration Board. In its previous comment, the Committee had noted that pursuant to sections 29, 33 and 34 of Act No. 4688, in case of failure of negotiations in the public sector, the chair of PED (the Minister of Labour) on behalf of public administration and the chair of PSUD on behalf of public employees, can apply to the Public Employees' Arbitration Board. The Board decisions were final and had the same effect and force as the collective agreement. The Committee had noted that seven of the 11 members of the Board including the chair were designated by the President of the Republic and considered that this selection process could create doubts as to the independence and impartiality of the Board. The Committee had therefore requested the Government to take the necessary measures for restructuring the membership of the Public Employee Arbitration Board or the method of appointment of its members so as to more clearly show its independence and impartiality and to win the confidence of the parties. The Committee notes that the Government refers to its 2019 report in which it confirms that in addition to the Head of the Board, its five other members with knowledge in public administration, public finances and public personnel regime, as well as one member among the academics proposed by the competent confederations, are appointed by the President. The Committee requests the Government to consider reviewing, in consultation with the social partners, the method of appointment of the Board members so as to more clearly show its independence and impartiality and to win the confidence of the parties.

[The Government is asked to reply in full to the present comments in 2021.]

Workers' Representatives Convention, 1971 (No. 135) (ratification: 1993)

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020). The Committee proceeded with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the supplementary information received from the Government this year, as well as on the basis of the information at its disposal in 2019.

Article 1 of the Convention. Massive dismissals of public servants. The Committee had previously noted that following the coup attempt in July 2016, a great number of public servants, including an unknown number of trade union representatives, were dismissed on the basis of emergency decrees. In these circumstances, the Committee had requested the Government to ensure that workers' representatives were not dismissed on the basis of their status or activities as a workers' representative or of their union membership or participation in union activities, in so far as they acted in conformity with existing laws. In case of existence of grounds to believe that a workers' representative had been involved in illegal activities, the Committee had requested the Government to ensure that all guarantees of due process were fully afforded. The Committee had further requested the Government to provide statistical information on the number of union representatives affected by the dismissals and suspensions based on emergency decrees. The Committee had noted the establishment, for a two year period, of an ad hoc Inquiry Commission to review the dismissals based on the state of emergency decrees and, in this respect, noted with concern that the Commission would have to deal with a very significant caseload in a relatively short period of time. The Committee had requested the Government to ensure that the Inquiry Commission was accessible to all dismissed workers' representatives who desire its review, and that it was endowed with the adequate capacity, resources and time to conduct the review process promptly, impartially and expeditiously. The Committee had further requested the Government to ensure that the dismissed workers' representatives did not bear alone the burden of proving that the dismissals were discriminatory, by requiring the employers or the relevant authorities to prove that the decision to dismiss them was justified based on other grounds. Finally, the Committee had requested the Government to provide statistical information on the number of applications lodged and processed in the Inquiry Commission and administrative courts by affected workers' representatives and to indicate the outcome of those procedures.

The Committee noted the Government's indication in its 2019 report that the dismissal of public servants from public service, which may include some trade union representatives, by the state of emergency decrees, was based on the grounds of their membership, affiliation or connection to terrorist organizations, following the coup attempt in 2016. The Government reiterated that after the coup attempt, it issued state of emergency decrees to eliminate the influence of terrorist organizations, such as Fethullahist Terrorist Organization (FETO), Kurdistan Workers' Party (PKK) or ISIS (DAISH). According to the Government, these terrorist organizations, in particular the one that perpetrated the said coup attempt to overthrow the democratically elected legitimate government in Turkey, established themselves within the state structure of the central and local government institutions and agencies, particularly in the armed forces, police, judiciary and educational institutions. The Government further reiterated that public servants are obliged, on the one hand, to carry out their duties with loyalty to the Constitution and the existing laws, in a manner respecting the principles of neutrality and equality, while on the other, not to join or assist any movement, group, organization or association that carry out illegal activities. It pointed out that being a public servant or a trade union member or representative or even a trade union officer does not ensure immunity from prosecution for illegal activities. The Government further explained that dismissal or suspension procedures of the public servants who were deemed to be member or affiliate of or in liaison or cohort with the terrorist organizations or the structures, entities or groups that were considered by the National Security Council as operating against the national security of the State were conducted in conformity with the provisions of the State of Emergency Act No. 2935, Civil Servants Act No. 657 and the Decrees with the force of law. The Government referred in this respect to the decision of the Constitutional Court of Turkey in a case involving the dismissal of two members of its court: "although the coup attempt was de facto prevented, taking measures in order to eliminate the dangers against the democratic constitutional order, fundamental rights and freedoms and national security, and to prevent future attempts is not only within the scope of the state's authority, it is also a duty and responsibility towards individuals and society that cannot be postponed [...] in some cases, it may not be possible for the state to eliminate the threats against democratic constitutional order, fundamental rights and freedoms and national security through ordinary administrative procedures. Accordingly, it may be necessary to impose extraordinary administrative procedures until these threats are eliminated".

The Government explained that the Inquiry Commission was established to ensure that those affected by the state of emergency decrees enjoyed due process of law. Public servants dismissed directly by a decree with the force of law could apply to the Commission and the applicants whose application was rejected by the Commission could bring their case to the competent administrative courts. The Government reiterated that a dismissal through a decree with the force of law was a measure applied only during the state of emergency and all of the judicial recourse avenues are open against the decisions of the Inquiry Commission through the judicial system, including the Constitutional Court of Turkey and the European Court of Human Rights. The Inquiry Commission's period of office is renewable by one year after the initial two-year period. Hence, the operation of the Commission will continue until its work has been fully carried out. All dismissed public servants, including trade union representatives, have the right to apply to the Inquiry Commission for a review of their dismissals; the only exception being the members of the judiciary whose application should be made to the judicial bodies indicated in the relevant decree and law. The Commission's activities can be followed by the public through its announcements on its web page. The Government emphasized that the Commission undertook its work with no other intention than to protect the democratic constitutional order, the rule of law and the rights of individuals and works in a transparent manner respecting the rights of individuals. According to the Government, due process of law was functioning well and every dismissed public servant had access to legal remedies.

The Government further explained that following the examination, the Commission may dismiss or accept the application. In case of acceptance of the application concerning those who were dismissed from the public service, profession or organization, the decision is notified to the public organization/institution where the applicant was last employed for his/her reinstatement within 15 days. In case of a rejection, the applicant can have recourse to the competent administrative courts. With regard to burden of proof, the Commission demands from the relevant institution to submit the documents and information showing the applicant's membership, affiliation or connection to a terrorist organization. If no such document and information is provided and no investigation or prosecution exists about the applicant, then the Commission accepts the application for reinstatement. The decisions of the Commission are transmitted to the relevant institution or organization, which then appoints the person whose reinstatement was pronounced. The Council of Judges and Prosecutors may bring an annulment action before the Ankara Administrative Court against the decision of the Commission and the relevant institution or organization within a period of 60 days as from the date of notification of the decision. The Committee notes in this respect that in its supplementary report, the Government indicates that six Ankara Administrative courts are designated to deal with annulment cases.

The Committee further notes that in its supplementary report, the Government reiterates that apart from its seven members, the Commission employs a total of 250 persons, 80 of whom are judges, experts and inspectors employed as rapporteurs. Following the establishment of a data processing infrastructure for the application process, the information on the applications received from 20 institutions and organizations has been recorded in this system. The Government further indicates that a total of 490, 000 files, including personnel files, court files and former applications, have been classified, registered and archived.

The Government informs that 131,922 measures were taken through the state of emergency decrees, including the dismissal from public service of 125,678 persons. As of 2 October 2020, the Commission pronounced itself on 110,250 applications out of 126,200 applications received; 16, 050 applications are still pending. Among these 110,250 applications for which a decision was made, 12,680 were accepted for reinstatement and 97,570 were rejected.

The Committee recalls that the Government had previously indicated that no statistical information is available on the number of trade union representatives affected and the number of applications to the courts.

The Committee recalls that Article 1 of the Convention requires the effective protection of workers' representatives against dismissals based on their activities as a workers' representative or on union membership or participation in union activities, in so far as they act in conformity with existing laws or collective agreements or other jointly agreed arrangements. The Committee further recalls that in this respect that it had requested the Government to ensure that the dismissed workers' representatives did not bear alone the burden of proving that the dismissals were discriminatory. While noting the updated information provided by the Government in this respect, the Committee once again requests it to provide further details on the handling of cases where workers' representatives allege before the Inquiry Commission or the administrative court that they were subject to a dismissal based on their legitimate trade union activity or affiliation. The Committee notes with regret that no statistical information is available on the number of trade union representatives affected and the number of applications made by them to courts and points out that this information is crucial in order to assess whether the protection of workers' representatives afforded by the Convention is effectively ensured. Noting the detailed and updated information provided by the Government regarding the data processing system established for the purpose of the Inquiry Commission, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures in order to ensure that it allows retrieving information on the number of trade union representatives affected. The Committee once again requests the Government to provide this information and to indicate, in particular, the number of trade union representatives reinstated following the decision of the Commission and the number of appeals to the administrative courts, as well as the outcome of such appeals.

Uruguay

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1954)

The Committee notes the supplementary information provided by the Government in the light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020). The Committee proceeded with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the supplementary information received from the Government and the observations submitted by the social partners this year, as well as on the basis of the information at its disposal in 2019.

The Committee notes the observations of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), received on 1 September 2019. It also notes the joint observations of the National Chamber of Commerce and Services of Uruguay (CNCS), the Chamber of Industries of Uruguay (CIU) and the International Organisation of Employers (IOE), received on 1 September and 22 November 2019, and also on 30 September 2020 which, like the observations of the ITUC, concern matters addressed by the Committee in this comment. The Committee also notes the Government's replies to the observations of the employers' organizations from 2019 and 2020.

Follow-up to the conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards (International Labour Conference, 108th Session, June 2019)

The Committee notes the discussions that took place in the Committee on the Application of Standards of the Conference (hereinafter: the Conference Committee), in June 2019, on Uruguay's application of the Convention. The Committee notes that the Conference Committee urged the Government to: (i) initiate legislative measures by 1 November 2019, after full consultation with the most representative employers' and workers' organizations and taking into consideration the recommendation of the ILO supervisory bodies, in order to guarantee the full compliance of national law and practice with the Convention; and (ii) prepare, in consultation with the most representative employers' and workers' organizations, a report to be submitted to the Committee of Experts before 1 September 2019, providing detailed information on actions undertaken to make progress in the full application of the Convention in law and practice.

Article 4 of the Convention. Promotion of free and voluntary bargaining. For several years, the Committee, together with the Committee on Freedom of Association (Case No. 2699), has been requesting the Government to revise Act No. 18566 of 2009 (establishing the fundamental rights and principles of the collective bargaining system, hereinafter: Act No. 18566) with a view to ensuring the full compliance of the Act with the principles of collective bargaining and the Conventions ratified by Uruguay in this area. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, in 2015, 2016 and 2017, the Government submitted to the social partners several proposals for legislative amendments, which the Government indicated had not achieved the necessary agreement between the parties.

In its last comment, the Committee noted from the Government's report that: (i) on 29 October 2019, following various tripartite meetings, the Government submitted to Parliament a bill amending some aspects of Act No. 18566 of 11 September 2009; and (ii) the bill combined the proposals the Government made from 2015 up to the present time.

The Committee noted that, in their 2019 observations, the CNCS, CIU and IOE indicated that the proposed amendments contained in the bill were insufficient and that some of them should have been drafted differently. They also indicated that in the tripartite meetings the Government indicated that it would prepare a bill, so long as consensus was reached. The Committee also noted that, according to the Government, at the tripartite meetings that took place, the Inter-Union Assembly of Workers – Workers' National Convention (PIT-CNT) indicated that while it was willing to engage in dialogue, it thought that Act No. 18566 did not warrant amendment. For its part, the ITUC indicated that more than 90 per cent of workers were protected by collective agreements and that care was required when taking measures that could destabilize this effective mechanism.

The Committee noted that the proposed amendments contained in the bill had already been submitted in the Government's previous report. While recalling that it considered that those amendments were in compliance with the requirement of Article 4 of the Convention to promote free and voluntary collective bargaining, the Committee regretted to observe that, despite its repeated comments, the bill did not propose amendments or clarifications regarding the competence of the Wage Boards in relation to adjustments made to wages that are above the minimum for the occupational category and working conditions (section 12 of Act No. 18566). The Committee noted that the CNCS, CIU and IOE expressed concern in that regard.

The Committee took the opportunity to recall once more that although the establishment of minimum wages may be subject to decisions by tripartite bodies, Article 4 of the Convention seeks to promote bipartite negotiation for the setting of working conditions, whereby all collective agreements establishing working conditions shall result from an agreement between employers or employers' organizations and workers' organizations. The Committee also emphasized that mechanisms can be established that would guarantee both the free and voluntary nature of collective bargaining and the effective promotion thereof, while ensuring that the country's existing collective agreements continue to offer a high level of coverage.

The Committee notes that, in their observations from 2020, after recalling their criticism of the bill, the CIU, IOE and CNCS point out that in March 2020 a new Government took office and that, having reached the close of the legislative session, the bill was shelved, thus losing its parliamentary status without any of its provisions being adopted or even addressed. The employers' organizations express concern at the Government's persistent failure to comply with the recommendations that this Committee has now been making for many years, and they highlight the need for the Government to present a new bill, which may or may not build on antecedents.

The Committee notes from the Government's supplementary report that, 13 days after it took office, a health emergency was declared due to the COVID-19 pandemic, resulting in restrictions on activities and meetings and rendering it impossible to make progress with regard to the issues raised in this comment. The Committee notes that the Government, in reply to the observations of the employers' organizations, reaffirming its commitment to respect international standards, indicates that in November 2019, it set forth the outline of a government plan in a document entitled "Commitment for the Country", in which includes it undertook to integrate the ILO's observations into collective bargaining law by amending the current regulations. The Committee also notes, according to the Government, that: (i) it intends to initiate a new phase of dialogue, without ruling out the possibility of recourse to ILO technical assistance; (ii) during this new phase of dialogue, the Government would present a new bill, taking the draft already submitted and now shelved as input, together with the comments made in its regard by the social partners; and (iii) it was in the process of drafting a bill on the legal personality of trade union organizations, which it will shortly share with the social partners, and which will cover some areas of the observations.

While duly recognizing the particular difficulties caused by the pandemic that the Government has had to confront since taking office, the Committee regrets that to date no progress has been achieved in terms of integrating its recommendations into the legislation. However, taking due note of the commitment made by the Government to adjust the legislation in light of the Committee's comments, the Committee strongly hopes that, after consulting the social partners, the Government will place before Parliament, as soon as possible, a bill that, conforming to the outline proposed in its latest comments, fully guarantees both the free and voluntary nature of collective bargaining and the continued effective promotion thereof, in accordance with the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to report on all progress in that regard and recalls that it can continue to count on the technical assistance of the Office. It also requests it to provide information on the bill on the legal personality of trade union organizations.

Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1982)

Follow-up to the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry (complaint made under article 26 of the Constitution of the ILO)

The Committee recalls that the Governing Body, at its 332nd Session (March 2018), approved the appointment of a Commission of Inquiry to examine a complaint made under article 26 of the ILO Constitution alleging non-observance by the Government of the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela of the Minimum Wage-Fixing Machinery Convention, 1928 (No. 26), the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144). The Committee notes that the Commission of Inquiry completed its work in September 2019 and that its report was presented to the Governing Body, which took note of it at its 337th Session (October 2019).

The Committee notes the document submitted to the Governing Body (GB.340/INS/13) with the Government's reply to the Commission of Inquiry's report, and also the discussion which took place on this matter at the 340th Session (October 2020) of the Governing Body and which will continue at its next session in March 2021. In its reply, and in its report to the Commission, the Government stated that it does not accept the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry since compliance with them would entail the violation of the Constitution of the Republic, the separation of powers, the law, the independence, the sovereignty and the self-determination of the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela. However, the Committee observes that the Government did not avail itself of the prerogative granted under the ILO Constitution – namely, to refer the complaint to the International Court of Justice within three months of receipt of the report. Moreover, the Committee observes that the Government expresses its readiness to improve its compliance with the Conventions ratified by the country on the basis of constructive suggestions from the ILO supervisory bodies and to receive technical assistance from the Office.

The Committee recalls that, in formulating comments on the application of the Convention by the Government of the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela, it has been raising many of the issues examined by the Commission of Inquiry. The Committee observes that the Commission of Inquiry, after a detailed examination, confirmed a number of the concerns raised by the Committee, and also by the Committee on Freedom of Association and the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards, regarding the application of this fundamental Convention. In its report the Commission considered, in light of the gravity of the issues raised, that the situation and the progress achieved on its recommendations should be the subject of active supervision by the ILO supervisory bodies concerned. In particular, it stated that the Government must submit to the CEACR the corresponding reports on the application of the Conventions covered by the complaint for examination at its session in November–December 2020.

The Committee notes that, with regard to observance of this Convention, the Commission of Inquiry recommended that the authorities concerned take without further delay – and with implementation to be completed no later than 1 September 2020 – the necessary measures: (1) to ensure the existence of a climate free from violence, threats, persecution, stigmatization, intimidation or any other form of aggression, in which the social partners are able to exercise their legitimate activities, including participation in social dialogue with full guarantees; and (2) to ensure full respect for the independence of employers' and workers' organizations, particularly in relation to the Government and political parties; and to suppress any interference and favouritism by State authorities – also encouraging the social partners to take any measures at their disposal to preserve the independence of their organizations in defence of their members' interests.

While noting that in its report the Government emphasizes its disagreement with the conclusions and recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry, the Committee recalls that in previous occasions when following-up on recommendations of a commission of inquiry the Committee has observed that the ILO Constitution does not make the results of an inquiry subject to the consent of the State concerned. In this regard, the Committee has recalled that under article 32 of the Constitution, the only authority capable of affirming, varying or reversing the findings or recommendations of a Commission of Inquiry is the International Court of Justice, and that therefore, a government which chooses not to avail itself of the possibility of referring the matter to the International Court of Justice ought to take account of the conclusions and act upon the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry, in light of the provisions of the ILO Constitution.

The Committee also notes the observations, regarding the follow-up to the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry and the application of the Convention in law and in practice, sent by the following organizations: the Confederation of Workers of Venezuela (CTV), the Federation of University Teachers' Associations of Venezuela (FAPUV) and the Independent Trade Union Alliance Confederation of Workers (ASI), received on 26 May 2020; the ASI, received on 30 September 2020; the CTV, received on 30

September; FAPUV, received on 30 September; the National Federation of Administrative Professionals and Technicians of the Universities of Venezuela (FENASIPRUV), the SPT 7 Union of Education Professionals and Technicians of the State of Táchira, the Social Movement 10 "The Voice of SIDOR Workers" (MS10) and the Association of Retirees and Pensioners of Alcasa (AJUPAL), received on 30 September 2020; the Federation of Chambers and Associations of Commerce and Production of Venezuela (FEDECAMARAS), with the support of the International Organisation of Employers (IOE), received on 1 October 2020; the Confederation of Autonomous Trade Unions (CODESA), the General Confederation of Labour (CGT) and the National Union of Workers of Venezuela (UNETE), received on 1 October 2020; the ASI and the National Union of Men and Women Public Officials in the Legislative Career Stream, and Men and Women Workers at the National Assembly (SINFUCAN), received on 5 October 2020; and the Federation of Workers of the State of Bolivar (FETRA-BOLIVAR), received on 5 November 2020. Finally, the Commission takes note of the observations of the Bolivarian Socialist Confederation of City, Country and Fishing Workers of Venezuela (CBST-CCP) received on 3 December 2020, stating that the CBST-CCP has managed, in coordination with the Government and despite adverse conditions, to maintain compliance with the Convention in the course of 2020. The Committee requests the Government to send its observations in this regard.

Civil liberties and trade union rights. Climate free from violence, threats, persecution, stigmatization, intimidation or any other form of aggression, in which the social partners are able to exercise their legitimate activities, including participation in social dialogue with full guarantees. The Committee notes that the Commission of Inquiry recommended: (i) the immediate cessation of all acts of violence, threats, persecution, stigmatization, intimidation or other forms of aggression against persons or organizations in relation to the exercise of legitimate employers' or trade union activities, and the adoption of measures to ensure that such acts do not recur in future; (ii) cessation of the use of judicial proceedings and preventive and non-custodial measures, including the subjection of civilians to military jurisdiction, for the purpose of undermining freedom of association; (iii) the immediate release of any employer or trade unionist who is imprisoned in relation to the exercise of the legitimate activities of their organizations, as is the case of Mr Rubén González and Mr Rodney Álvarez; (iv) the independent investigation without delay of all allegations of violence, threats, persecution, stigmatization, intimidation and any other forms of aggression that have not been duly elucidated, with a view to clarifying responsibilities and identifying the perpetrators and instigators, while ensuring the adoption of appropriate protection, penalization and compensation measures; (v) the adoption of the necessary measures to ensure the rule of law, and particularly the independence from the executive authorities of the other branches of State authority; and (vi) the organization of training programmes with the ILO to promote freedom of association, tripartite consultation and social dialogue in general, including on full respect for essential conditions and basic rules of social dialogue, in accordance with international labour standards.

In this regard, the Committee notes that the Government: (i) while regretting the slowness of the justice system, asserts that this does not signify impunity, that the actions of the executive authority with regard to the judiciary are taken on the basis of the principle of the separation of powers, that no person who commits a military offence can avoid trial by a natural judge of the military courts, that the judicial proceedings and preventive and non-custodial measures provided for in the legal system are under no circumstances used to undermine freedom of association or any other right and that the legitimate activities of employers and workers and their leaders do not constitute a crime in the country; (ii) indicates that summonses and preventive detentions for the purpose of conducting investigations and taking statements are intended to clarify the facts of each case and none of this can be interpreted as harassment, threats, intimidation or persecution; (iii) states that it continues to urge the security agencies and national justice bodies to conduct independent and transparent investigations and proceedings without delay with a view to clarifying the responsibilities of the perpetrators and instigators and ensuring the adoption of appropriate protection, penalization and compensation measures (the Government explains that any financial compensation or the payment of damages are not automatic and are only referred to the judicial authorities at the request of the interested party); and (iv) indicates that it continues to strengthen social dialogue and that, despite the COVID-19 pandemic, high-level meetings and dialogue round tables have been held between the Government and representatives of employers' organizations in the country, including FEDECAMARAS (in this regard, it refers to statements by employers' leaders – of FEDECAMARAS and its affiliates – supposedly recognizing the existence of a dialogue between the private sector and the Government).

Furthermore, the Committee welcomes the partial follow-up to one of the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry through the granting of a pardon to Mr Rubén González, by the Decree of 31 August 2020 of the President of the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela. However, the Committee notes with regret that the Government has not proceeded with the release of the trade unionist Mr Rodney Álvarez and does not report any other tangible progress regarding the above-mentioned recommendations relating to civil liberties and trade union rights.

In addition, the Committee notes that numerous observations received from the social partners allege the absence of progress in giving effect to these recommendations and also additional violations of the Convention:

(i) FEDECAMARAS indicates that there has been no progress and highlights the persistence of expressions of disrespect, disparagement and defamation against it (as illustrated by the derogatory, stigmatizing or discrediting remarks against FEDECAMARAS and against independent trade unionism contained in the Government's reply of 27 December 2019 to the report of the Commission of Inquiry). FEDECAMARAS states that it cannot be argued that either the limited meetings held between it and the Government to resolve operational issues in the context of the pandemic or the patchy responses aimed at tackling the crisis can be regarded as effective social dialogue, or even bipartite, especially when not the slightest consideration was given in these contacts to matters covered by the Commission of Inquiry's report. In this regard, and in view of the fact that the round tables recommended in the report have not been established, FEDECAMARAS and independent workers' organizations (including the CTV, UNETE, ASI, CGT and CODESA confederations) have launched an initiative for bipartite dialogue on the basis of the "Bipartite manifesto for decent and productive work and social justice".

(ii) The CTV alleges that there has been no reduction in the persecution of workers' representatives (referring to several examples, such as the detention of the organizational secretary of the Union of the Socialist Fisheries and Aquiculture Institute (SINTRAPESCAVE) after making complaints against the authorities of the Institute for failure to uphold job-related benefits); that the courts continue to be used as a tool for restricting freedom of association, referring, inter alia, to the detention in February 2020 of leaders of the Single Union of Employees of the Sucre State Executive Authorities (SUEPPLES) during a peaceful protest at which they were calling on the Sucre government to pay debts to the workers, these leaders being accused of incitement to hatred, unlawful association and disruption of public order; and to the detention measure issued against a leader of the health union in the state of Monagas who denounced the meagre resources of the Dr Manuel Núñez Tovar University Hospital for tackling the pandemic and was accused of incitement to hatred, causing anxiety for the community, and unlawful association; and that the national executive branch controls almost all the public authorities of the State, except for the National Assembly, no measures having been taken to restore the rule of law in the country.

(iii) The ASI confederation denounces the killing of another trade unionist in the construction sector in Sucre in 2019 and the detention of two trade unionists from the Agropatria enterprise. UNETE, CODESA and the CGT allege that the Government's violations of the Convention have grown worse since the publication of the Commission of Inquiry's report. Similarly, FAPUV states that acts of anti-union violence, threats and persecution by State officials are continuing, referring in this regard to new complaints presented to the Committee on Freedom of Association (such as Cases Nos 3385 and 3374) and to the preliminary study published on 1 May 2020 by PROVEA, a non-governmental organization for the defence of human rights, concerning the follow-up to the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry, in which many new cases are reported of anti-union actions in violation of the aforementioned recommendations. FAPUV reports other new cases of similar violations described by trade unions with diverse leanings in various sectors, and it also refers to its joint communications with the ASI and the CTV describing additional specific cases of trade unionists and other workers detained for reporting situations related to the pandemic or for asserting their labour rights during it. In addition, it alleges that the anti-union use of judicial proceedings persists, providing details of specific cases of trade unionists subjected to criminal proceedings or already convicted, with non-custodial measures involving periodic appearances before the authorities and, additionally in one case, a ban on leaving the country. On top of this, there are measures imposed orally, such as a ban on making statements. FAPUV also emphasizes that the detailed conclusions of the Independent International Fact-Finding Mission on the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela, presented on 16 September 2020 to the 45th session of the United Nations Human Rights Council, confirm the concerns of the Commission of Inquiry regarding deficiencies with respect to the rule of law and the separation of powers in the country.

Expressing deep concern at the almost total absence of progress and at the gravity of the allegations of additional violations made in the observations of the social partners alluded to, the Committee reiterates the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry set forth above relating to civil liberties and trade union rights. In this regard, the Committee firmly urges the Government to take the necessary measures to give immediate effect to the recommendations and also to investigate and take action promptly with regard to the new specific allegations referred to above in order to ensure a climate free from violence, threats, persecution, stigmatization, intimidation or any other form of aggression, in which the social partners are able to exercise their legitimate activities, including participation in social dialogue with full guarantees.

Articles 2 and 3 of the Convention. Respect for the autonomy of employers' and workers' organizations, particularly in relation to the Government or political parties, and suppression of all interference and favouritism by the State authorities. The Committee notes that the Commission of Inquiry recommended: (1) the adoption of the necessary measures to ensure in law and practice that registration is a mere administrative formality and that in no event can it imply previous authorization, and to proceed to the immediate registration of the ASI confederation; (2) the elimination of "electoral abeyance" and the reform of the rules and procedures governing trade union elections, so that the intervention of the National Electoral Council (CNE) is really optional and does not constitute a mechanism for interference in the life of organizations, the pre-eminence of trade union independence is guaranteed in election processes and delays are avoided in the exercise of the rights and activities of employers' and workers' organizations; (3) the elimination of any other use of institutional machinery or types of action that interferes in the independence of employers' and workers' organizations and their mutual relations. In particular, the Commission recommended the adoption of any necessary measures to eliminate the imposition of control institutions or mechanisms, such as Workers' Production Boards (WPBs), which may in law or in practice restrict the exercise of freedom of association; (4) the establishment, with ILO assistance, of criteria that are objective, verifiable and fully in accordance with freedom of association to determine the representativeness of both employers' and workers' organizations; and (5) in general, the elimination in law and practice of any provisions or institutions that are incompatible with freedom of association, including the requirement to provide detailed information on members, taking into account the conclusions of the Commission and the comments of the ILO supervisory bodies.

In this regard, the Committee notes the Government's assertion that Venezuelan labour law and practice have always been advanced and that what is not provided for in the ILO Conventions – minimum standards – can be set out or developed for workers by national legislation. The Government states that this is the case with the WPBs and in this regard reiterates what was already indicated in its response to the Commission of Inquiry: that the Act establishing them provides that they "are not by their nature trade unions and in the exercise of their functions shall not carry out trade union activities, nor impede or interfere in the exercise of the right to freedom of association and collective bargaining"; and that they are not supervisory mechanisms, nor do they undermine the exercise of freedom of association. With regard to the representativeness of workers' organizations, the Government indicates that it sent the ILO a request for technical assistance in March 2020 and affirms in general that it has never objected to the specialized technical assistance offered by the ILO in the context of the Convention.

The Committee welcomes the partial effect given to one of the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry, in that the National Registry of Trade Unions (RNOS), attached to the Ministry of People's Power for the Social Process of Labour, issued the registration certificate for the ASI confederation on 28 February 2020, four years after the initial application for registration.

With regard to the Government's request for technical assistance in relation to a specific recommendation – the establishment of objective and verifiable criteria which are fully in accordance with freedom of association to determine the representativeness of employers' and workers' organizations – the Committee observes that the Commission of Inquiry emphasized that, to implement its recommendations, it is necessary to ensure the essential conditions and basic standards for effective social dialogue with full guarantees and genuine impact. According to the Commission of Inquiry, this includes: the absence of any form of violence, aggression, harassment or intimidation; respect for the independence and autonomy of employers' and workers' organizations; recognition of the representative partners; mutual respect, including in the tone of the debate; the agreed determination of forms and timelines that allow for genuine and constructive participation and discussion; adherence to good faith and confidence building; and a genuine commitment to honour the agreements concluded. In this regard, the Committee observes that because the recommendations are inter-related and must be considered as a whole, they should be implemented in a holistic manner and in a climate where the social partners can exercise their legitimate activities, including participation in social dialogue with all guarantees and also full respect for the autonomy of employers' and workers' organizations.

Furthermore, the Committee notes with regret that the Government does not report any other progress on its part regarding the above-mentioned recommendations relating to respect for the autonomy of employers' and workers' organizations and also the suppression of any interference and favouritism by State authorities. The Committee also notes that numerous observations received from the social partners allege that no progress has been made as regards giving effect to these recommendations and that violations of the Convention persist.

The Committee notes the allegation of FEDECAMARAS that no progress has been made and emphasizes that the exclusion of FEDECAMARAS and discrimination towards it persist and favouritism continues to be shown to FEDEINDUSTRIA, the employers' organization with links to the Government and its political agenda (as illustrated by the meeting on 22 January 2020 between the President of the Republic and the Government, on the one hand, and small and medium-sized enterprises, on the other, at which FEDEINDUSTRIA reportedly played a significant part, whereas no invitation had been issued to FEDECAMARAS or its chambers of commerce representing small and medium-sized industries). Furthermore, FEDECAMARAS alleges that the Government, instead of giving effect to the recommendation to abolish the WPBs, has continued to strengthen and promote them: (a) by promotional public activities undertaken by the President of the Republic (such as his participation in February 2020 in an action of the State petroleum company, at which he reportedly emphasized that the key instrument for transforming the economy, society and productive relationships are the WPBs, with the WPB supervisory body in that industrial sector having been established on that occasion); (b) by granting WPBs functions for controlling employers in the area of price fixing; and (c) by campaigns to promote and install WPBs in workplaces throughout the country (through national implementation in June 2020 or the holding of a public action with the President of the Republic on 3 September 2020, assigning the WPBs the task of being protagonists in the social process of labour, supported by the "combat corps" of the working class). FEDECAMARAS considers that there is clear interference from the Government and the imposition of its political and ideological agenda within labour relations, restricting the rights established in the Convention, and asserts that this interference from the WPBs not only affects workers' organizations but also violates the freedom of association of employers, in obstructing relations between employers and workers and their organizations.

With regard to the observations received from workers' organizations, the Committee notes the statement of the CTV that, apart from the registration of the ASI, no progress whatsoever has been made with respect to this set of recommendations. It indicates that, on the contrary, cases of non-observance have persisted – as illustrated by the acceleration in the creation of mechanisms to interfere in the autonomy of trade unions and employers' organizations, such as the WPBs (according to statements from the President of the Republic himself, a total of 2,208 WPBs have been established, with the Ministry of Labour having declared that the WPBs are an organizational force of great importance because they will enable votes to be mobilized for the next elections). In addition, UNETE, CODESA and the CGT state that the WPBs – civic-military entities imposed on all workplaces and directly dependent on the Government – imply government interference in the operation of labour relations which restricts the exercise of freedom of association. While indicating their ongoing proliferation and the promotion thereof, the aforementioned confederations warn that the WPBs are the Government's instrument of social control for eliminating the trade union movement. In addition, FAPUV: (i) indicates, with reference to specific examples, that government actions persist to disregard and attack legitimate majority trade unions and to encourage or favour minority organizations close to the Government; (ii) warns that the registration of trade unions continues to be an obstacle in relation to the exercise of freedom of association and that organizations which are up to date in their registration are increasingly few; (iii) states that interference from the State persists through proceedings relating to trade union elections – referring to various cases in which "electoral abeyance" continues to block action by workers' organizations; (iv) emphasizes in this regard that a decision is needed from the labour authorities to secure recognition of the results of elections conducted by trade unions without intervention from the CNE; (v) states that in January 2020 more WPBs were sworn in and denounces the fact that at the State petroleum company the WPBs are taking the place of trade unions and their leaders, that at educational establishments in the state of Sucre the authorities only allow entry to WPBs, arguing that trade unionists are "miserable and stateless", and that the SUTISS trade union has been disregarded de facto (with the majority of its committee forced unlawfully into retirement) and replaced by WPBs, which do not allow the SUTISS leaders to enter the plant; and (vi) in relation to the same matter, warns about the integration of Bolivarian militias into basic industries in Guyana.

Reiterating its deep concern at the almost total absence of progress, and in view of the allegations of persistent violations of the Convention that would confirm the fears expressed in its previous comments (for example, regarding Workers' Production Boards (WPBs) and their negative impact on the exercise of freedom of association), the Committee refers to the conclusions of the Commission of Inquiry and reiterates its recommendations set forth above regarding the need to ensure respect for the autonomy of employers' and workers' organizations, particularly in relation to the Government or political parties, and regarding the suppression of all interference and favouritism by the State authorities. Among other specific recommendations, this includes ceasing the imposition of control institutions or mechanisms which, like the WPBs, can restrict the exercise of freedom of association in law or in practice. The Committee firmly urges the Government to take the necessary measures to give immediate effect to all these recommendations.

Articles 2 and 3. Legislative issues. The Committee recalls that it has been asking the Government for several years to consult the most representative workers' and employers' organizations and take the necessary steps to revise the following aspects of the national legislation with a view to bringing it into conformity with the Convention:

– section 388 of the Basic Labour Act (LOTTT), to remove the requirement for unions to provide the list of their members to the National Registry of Trade Unions;
– sections 367 and 368 of the LOTTT, to remove, in the definition of the objectives to be pursued by trade unions, all those that relate to the specific responsibilities of the public authorities;

- section 402 of the LOTTT and other provisions that are in force so that: (i) they do not permit a non-judicial authority (such as the CNE) to decide on appeals respecting trade union elections; (ii) the principle of "electoral abeyance" is eliminated in law and in practice; (iii) the requirement to notify the CNE of the electoral schedule is removed; and (iv) the requirement to publish the results of trade union elections in the Electoral Gazette as a condition for their recognition is removed;
- section 387 of the LOTTT, so that the eligibility of leaders is not conditional on having convened trade union elections within the prescribed time frame when they were leaders of other trade unions;
- section 395 of the LOTTT, to remove the provision in the Act establishing that failure of members to pay their trade union dues invalidates their right to vote;
- section 403 of the LOTTT, to eliminate the imposition of specific voting systems on trade unions;
- section 410 of the LOTTT, to eliminate the system of holding recall referendums to remove trade union officers;
- section 484 of the LOTTT, to ensure that either a judicial or an independent authority determines the areas or activities which may not be subject to stoppages during a strike on the grounds that they prejudice the production of essential goods or services which would cause damage to the population; and
- section 494 of the LOTTT, to ensure that the system for the appointment of the members of the arbitration board in the event of a strike in essential services guarantees the confidence of the parties in the system.

The Committee also notes that the Commission of Inquiry – which did not enter into some of these specific legislative aspects on the grounds that they were not issues covered by the complaint – recommended the submission to tripartite consultation of the revision of the laws and standards, such as the LOTTT, giving effect to the Convention that raise problems of compatibility with it in light of the conclusions of the Commission of Inquiry and the comments of the ILO supervisory bodies. The Committee observes the Government's statement that it has taken note of the suggestions for legislative reforms to improve Venezuelan legislation but that, although those suggestions could be presented in due course to the National Assembly as the competent body, it is not in a position to proceed in this regard since the National Assembly remains in contempt (according to the rulings of the Supreme Court of Justice), and so its actions are null and void and it is unable to deal with legislative reforms. In this regard, the Committee considers that this should not have prevented the Government, before conveying the modifications to the legislative body, from giving effect to the Commission of Inquiry's recommendation to submit this major task to tripartite consultation. The Committee reiterates the recommendation and requests the Government, in the context of the tripartite dialogue round table referred to below, to submit to tripartite consultation without further delay the revision of the laws and standards which give effect to the Convention and raise problems of compatibility with it, starting with the LOTTT, in light of the conclusions of the Commission of Inquiry (such as those relating to trade union registration, "electoral abeyance" or the WPBs) and the previous comments of this Committee.

The Committee expresses its deep concern at the numerous serious violations of the Convention recorded by the Commission of Inquiry in its report, drawing attention to the existence of a complex web which harasses and undermines the action of employers' and workers' organizations that are not close to the Government. Although the Government once again asserts that it is continuing to work on improving compliance with the ratified Conventions, and even though the Committee recognizes that, as the Government indicates, the situation of the COVID-19 pandemic has also affected the country, the Committee is bound to note with deep regret the lack of action regarding almost all the recommendations that the ILO supervisory bodies, including the Commission of Inquiry in particular, have been making with regard to observance of the Convention. Even though the Commission of Inquiry provided a time frame of one year to give effect to its recommendations, this time frame has elapsed and, apart from the release of one trade union leader and the registration of one workers' organization, the Government has not made progress on giving effect to the recommendations which go to the core of the issues examined by the Commission of Inquiry. In particular, the Government has not taken any action to establish and convene dialogue round tables in support of the implementation of the recommendations in the report (which states that before March 2020 the round tables should have been established with a schedule of meetings).

In this regard, the Committee firmly urges the Government to proceed immediately with the establishment of the aforementioned round tables in the manner indicated in the report of the Commission of Inquiry: (i) a round table for tripartite dialogue which includes all representative organizations; (ii) a round table for dialogue between the authorities concerned and FEDECAMARAS on questions relating to that organization; and (iii) another round table for representative workers' organizations to address subjects that are of specific concern to them.

Taking note of the Government's stated willingness to receive technical assistance from the ILO, and of the requests of social partners in this regard, the Committee considers it vitally important that this technical assistance is determined in a tripartite manner in the context of the dialogue round tables and in light of the considerations expressed above.

The Committee is aware of the ongoing consideration being given by the Governing Body to the follow-up of the report of the Commission of Inquiry. In view of the grave violations of labour rights described above, the systemic failure to comply with a number of ILO Conventions and the serious lack of cooperation from the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela authorities with regard to its obligations, the Committee considers it critical that within the context of the ILO standards the situation in the country be given the full and continuing attention of the ILO and the ILO supervisory system in order to obtain robust and effective measures that can bring about compliance in law and in practice with the Conventions concerned.

Zimbabwe

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 2003)

Follow-up to the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry appointed under article 26 of the Constitution of the ILO

Follow-up to the conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards (International Labour Conference, 108th Session, June 2019)

The Committee notes the observations submitted by the Zimbabwe Congress of Trade Unions (ZCTU), received on 30 August 2019 and 29 September 2020, and by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), received on 1 September 2019 and 16 September 2020, which refer to the issues addressed by the Committee below. The Committee further notes that the ITUC and the ZCTU 2020 observations recall that, since the January 2019 crackdown on the ZCTU-organized general strike, the ZCTU President and General Secretary remain charged with subversion and are under strict release conditions, banned from traveling and forced to check in regularly at the police station. Both organizations allege further retaliatory acts against both trade union leaders as well as leaders of the Amalgamated Rural Teachers Union (ARTUZ), following protests organized by the ZCTU in 2020. The ITUC alleges, in particular, that on 17 July 2020, the ARTUZ President had his home broken into by armed personnel in the middle of the night in an attempt to abduct him. The ZCTU alleges that earlier, in May 2020, the ARTUZ Secretary for Gender was arrested, tortured and left for dead after police accused her of inciting violence. According to the ITUC, the ZCTU is being attacked and labelled as a terrorist organization and its leaders face daily threats, harassment and persecution by the authorities. The ITUC and the ZCTU also allege repression against workers' protests in the health sector. The Committee expresses its concern at these serious allegations, and requests the Government to provide its comments on the matter.

The Committee notes the discussion that took place in the Conference Committee in June 2019 concerning the application of the Convention. The Committee observes that the Conference Committee noted concern regarding the Government's failure to implement specific elements of the recommendations of the 2009 Commission of Inquiry. The Conference Committee noted persisting issues of non-compliance with the Convention, including allegations of violations of the rights of the freedom of assembly of workers' organizations. The Conference Committee also noted the Government's stated commitment to ensure compliance with its obligations under the Convention and to the process of social dialogue, including through the framework for Tripartite Negotiating Forum (TNF). The Committee called upon the Government to: (i) refrain from the arrest, detention or engagement in violence, intimidation or harassment of trade union members conducting lawful trade union activities; (ii) ensure that the allegations of violence against trade union members are investigated, and where appropriate, impose dissuasive sanctions; (iii) repeal the Public Order and Security Act (POSA), as it has committed to do so, and ensure that the replacement legislation regarding public order does not violate workers' and employers' freedom of association in law and practice; (iv) revise or repeal the Public Service Act and, as necessary, the Health Services Act, to allow public sector workers freedom of association in consultation with the social partners; (v) amend the Labour Act, in consultation with workers' and employers' organizations, to come into compliance with the Convention; and finally (vi) continue to engage in social dialogue with the workers' and employers' organizations in connection with the framework of the TNF. The Conference Committee urged the Government to accept a direct contacts mission of the ILO to assess progress before the next International Labour Conference.

The Committee welcomes the Government's commitment to receive a direct contacts mission of the ILO requested by the Conference Committee. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the mission, scheduled for May 2020, had to be postponed due to COVID-19, and its hope that the mission will be rescheduled consistent with Covid-19 travel guidelines.

Trade union rights and civil liberties. The Committee recalls that it had previously noted with concern the allegations submitted by the ITUC and the ZCTU regarding: the injuries suffered by the ZCTU personnel when the union's office came under attack by soldiers during the demonstrations on 1 August 2018; cases of strike action being banned and criminalized; and denial or delay of trade unions registration. The Committee noted the information provided by the ZCTU in 2019, according to which the Government set up a commission of inquiry to investigate the police and military action during the August 2018 demonstrations. According to the ZCTU, the Commission found out that six people were killed and 35 injured as a result of the military and police action and recommended a payment of compensation for losses and damages caused. The ZCTU expressed its concern that no compensation has been paid to its staff members affected nor for the damages to its building, and that the perpetrators have not been made accountable for their action.

The Committee notes that in its report, the Government indicates that the objective of the commission of inquiry was to investigate the politically motivated disturbances of 31 August 2018. The commission produced a report and recommendations, which the Government has accepted. The Government indicates that it is working on the compensation modalities and will write to the ZCTU requesting it to submit compensation claims. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on all progress made in giving effect to the commission's recommendations.

Regarding the ZCTU's allegation made in 2019 that the Footwear Tanners and Allied Workers Union of Zimbabwe remained unregistered, the Committee welcomes the Government's indication that the Union was registered on 30 January 2020.

The Committee recalls that it had previously noted that a training curriculum on freedom of association was being developed for the dissemination and use by police officers. The Committee noted with concern the ZCTU's 2019 allegation that it has not observed a change in behaviour on the part of the police officers and that the situation on the ground has turned for the worst with serious attacks on civil liberties.

In this respect, the Committee notes the Government's indication that the training curriculum on freedom of association has been mainstreamed in the Police training manuals, and that the Training Centres have been conducting the trainings. The Government informs that some of the incidences reported by ZCTU are related to demonstrations that were conducted in violation of COVID-19 lockdown measures. Whilst the Government recognizes the need to uphold the principles of freedom of association, it considers that lockdown measures had to be respected to preserve human life against the backdrop of rising COVID-19 cases. The Government further indicates that the issue of alleged clashes between police and trade unions and alleged harassment by the police at roadblocks/checkpoints is an ongoing subject of discussion under the auspices of the Tripartite Negotiating Forum (TNF). According to the Government, the TNF Social Cluster was tasked to engage the Police and develop a standard checklist for use by security forces at checkpoints; it is in that context that ease of passage of workers during lockdown was facilitated, including ease of passage for trade unions and employers' organizations. The Government expresses the hope that continued engagement under the TNF will strengthen collaboration between law enforcement organs and trade unions. The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information on the work carried out by the TNF Social Cluster and on the progress in its engagement with the police forces. The Committee also requests the Government to provide detailed comments on the ITUC and ZCTU 2020 allegations of several new instances of violation of civil liberties in the country.

Public Order and Security Act (POSA). The Committee recalls that it had previously requested the Government to review the application of the POSA, in consultation with the social partners, with a view to making proposals to ensure with greater clarity that trade union activities were outside its scope. The Committee notes the enactment of the Maintenance of Peace and Order Act (MOPA) in November 2019. The Committee further notes the Government's indication that before its adoption, the Bill was subject to public stakeholders' consultations in 2019 in which all stakeholders, including the ZCTU, had the opportunity to raise their concerns or propose changes. The Government indicates that the views from these consultations were taken into consideration. The Government further informs that consultative meetings with the social partners to unpack provisions of the MOPA had been scheduled prior to the lockdown measures brought by COVID-19 pandemic and it hopes to reschedule such meetings once lockdown measures are removed. The Committee notes that, similar to the POSA in the past, relevant sections of the MOPA do not apply to public gatherings held by a registered trade union for bona fide trade union purposes for the conduct of business in accordance with the Labour Act. In this respect, the Committee notes the conclusions and recommendations of the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 3339 (see 392nd Report, October 2020). In view of the concerns previously raised by the ILO supervisory bodies regarding the application of the POSA to trade union activities and its similarity to the MOPA, the Committee expects that the consultative meeting with the social partners to which the Government refers will be held as soon as possible. The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information on the developments in this regard.

Labour law reform and harmonization

Labour Act. In its previous comments, the Committee noted with concern that, despite its numerous requests, some of which predate the 2009 Commission of Inquiry, there was no concrete progress in amending the Labour Act so as to bring it into conformity with the Convention. Noting that the social partners were concerned that the legislative reform was slow and haphazard, leading to the perception of a lack of political will to carry it out, the Committee expected that the labour law review would be concluded in full consultation with the social partners, without further delay. The Committee further noted the ZCTU's submission that no legislative changes had occurred and that the fourth version of the draft Labour Bill did not address the requests made by the Commission of Inquiry nor by this Committee. The Committee also noted that at its meeting in June 2019, the Committee on Freedom of Association urged the Government to amend the Labour Act without further delay in consultation with the social partners (see 389th Report, June 2019, Case No. 3128, paragraphs 103–109).

The Committee notes the Government's indication that the draft Labour Bill had been thoroughly examined by the Government and the social partners at a stakeholders' meeting convened from 30 September to 1 October 2019 and that amendments were made taking into consideration the proposals by the social partners. An agreement was reached with the social partners to allow the drafters to polish the Bill in line with the outcomes of the meeting. The revised Bill was submitted to the social partners for their comments. The Government points out that while the employers' side consented to the revised Bill and proposed that the Bill be processed, the labour side submitted new requests for amendments that had not been discussed in previous meetings. These and subsequent requests were submitted to the Attorney General's Office with the view to finalize the draft Bill. The Government indicates that there has been an agreement to fast track the Bill in its current form to ensure that it is tabled before the 9th Parliament of Zimbabwe as soon as possible.

Public Service Act and Health Services Act. The Committee had also previously requested the Government to ensure, in consultation with the social partners, that under the Public Service Act, staff of the Civil Service Commission enjoyed the rights enshrined in the Convention and that legislative provisions dealing with the registration of organizations of public servants would be sufficiently clear so as not to give rise to possible interpretation of the law as giving discretionary power to the authorities to refuse the registration of an organization.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that there have been consultations with worker representatives of the Civil Service under the auspices of the National Joint Negotiation Council, which is a bipartite Collective Bargaining Chamber between the Government and worker representatives in the Civil Service. The Government indicates that this matter was raised in the TNF meeting held on 7 February 2020, and that the Civil Service worker representatives of the TNF expressed satisfaction with the consultations that had been conducted so far. The Committee further notes the Government's indication that the amendment of the Public Service Act is currently with the Attorney General's Office, waiting for necessary constitutional amendments that have a bearing on the Act, and that the Constitutional Amendment Bill is currently under Parliamentary public consultations.

The Committee recalls that it had previously noted the ZCTU's indication that the Health Services Act required reforms as it mostly duplicated the Public Service Act, in particular regarding freedom of association and collective bargaining rights. The Committee notes the Government's indication that it is currently embarking on a re-organization exercise of the health sector to address the challenges including those faced during the COVID-19 period. It indicates that there is a commitment for a holistic review of the enabling legislation and that this will also be brought to the TNF for consideration.

The Committee notes with concern that according to the most recent ZCTU's observations, there has been no progress with respect to the legislative changes requested by the ILO supervisory bodies and that the process of the tripartite dialogue on the labour law reform remains uncompleted. The Committee further notes the concerns expressed by both the ZCTU and the ITUC regarding the functioning of the social dialogue institutions, the TNF and the Bipartite Negotiating Panel in the health sector.

While noting the information provided by the Government, the Committee expects that the Labour Act, Public Service Act and Health Services Act will be brought into conformity with the Convention without further delay and in full consultation with the social partners, and requests the Government to provide information on all progress made in this regard, including copies of the legislative acts as soon as they are enacted.

The Committee noted in its previous comment that the Tripartite Negotiating Forum (TNF) Act was enacted and that the TNF was launched on 5 June 2019. In this respect, the Committee notes the Government's indication that since the enactment of the TNF, there has been a lot of engagement with the social partners with a view to strengthening social dialogue in Zimbabwe. The Government reports on a number of meetings held to discuss the issues of the TNF's terms of reference and operationalisation. The Government further informs that despite the limitations stemming from the COVID-19 lockdown measures, the TNF has held a number of meetings virtually, mostly on matters to mitigate challenges induced by COVID-19 and that the recommendations of the COVID-19 National Taskforce emanated from the TNF discussions. The Committee notes the ZCTU indication that while it brought some of the issues relating to the protective measures against COVID-19 to the TNF, no discussions have taken place. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations thereon.

The Committee expects that the operationalization of the TNF will allow for labour law reform and public service legislation harmonization to be concluded without further delay.

[The Government is asked to reply in full to the present comments in 2021.]

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1998)

The Committee notes the observations submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) and the Zimbabwe Congress of Trade Unions (ZCTU), received on 16 and 29 September 2020, respectively, which refer to the issues addressed by the Committee in the present comment. The Committee further notes that the ZCTU also alleges that collective bargaining rights have been seriously diminished during the COVID-19 era as some employers have taken advantage of the pandemic and ignored the call for negotiations to alleviate the plight of workers. Finally, the ZCTU indicates that it brought some of the issues relating to the protective measures against COVID-19 to the Tripartite Negotiating Forum (TNF) but no discussions have taken place. The Committee notes that, similarly, the ITUC alleges that the Government has unilaterally declared that it would not be engaging in any form of collective bargaining in the health sector, thereby rendering the Bipartite Negotiating Panel for the health sector useless. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments thereon.

Follow-up to the 2009 recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry appointed under article 26 of the Constitution of the ILO

Labour law reform and harmonization

The Committee had previously noted with concern that, despite its numerous requests, some of which predate the 2009 Commission of Inquiry, there was no concrete progress in amending both the Labour Act and the Public Service Act so as to bring them into conformity with the Convention. It had therefore urged the Government to make all necessary efforts to ensure that the process of reviewing the labour and public service legislation with a view to ensuring its conformity with the Convention would move forward without further delay and in full consultation with the social partners.

Labour Act. In its previous comment, the Committee had noted the Government's indication that following the adoption of the Labour Law Reform Principles by the Cabinet, in December 2016, and a number of consultative meetings held in 2017 and 2018, the final draft of the Labour Amendment Bill was finalized and ready to be tabled before Cabinet and then Parliament. The Committee had, however, noted with concern the ZCTU's allegation that the draft of the Labour Amendment Bill deliberately ignored the Committee's observations and did not include any provision setting clearly the protection of workers and their representatives against anti-union discrimination.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that the draft Bill had been thoroughly examined by the Government and the social partners at a stakeholders' meeting convened from 30 September to 1 October 2019 and that amendments were made taking into considerations the proposals by the social partners. An agreement was reached with the social partners to allow the drafters to polish the Bill in line with the outcomes of the meeting. The revised Bill was submitted to social partners for their comments. The Government points out that while the employers' side consented to the revised Bill and proposed that the Bill be processed, the labour side submitted new requests for amendments that had not been discussed in previous meetings. These and subsequent requests were submitted to the Attorney General's Office with the view to finalize the draft Bill. The Government indicates that there has been an agreement to fast track the Bill in its current form to ensure that it is tabled before the 9th Parliament of Zimbabwe as soon as possible.

Public Service Act and the Health Services Act. The Committee had previously noted the Government's indication that the principles to amend the Public Service Act were approved by the TNF and further consultations were undertaken within the National Joint Negotiation Council (NJNC). The Government had further indicated that the Attorney General's Office was in the process of drafting the bill and that the social partners would be consulted on the draft.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that the amendment of the Public Service Act is with the Attorney General's Office, waiting for necessary constitutional amendments that have a bearing on the Act and that the Constitutional Amendment Bill is currently under Parliamentary public consultations. Regarding the Health Services Act, the Government informs that it is currently embarking on a re-organization exercise of the health sector to address the challenges including those faced during the COVID-19 period. It indicates that there is a commitment for a holistic review of the enabling legislation and that this will also be brought to the TNF for consideration.

The Committee notes with concern that according to the most recent ZCTU's observations, there has been no progress with respect to the legislative changes requested by the ILO supervisory bodies and that the process of the tripartite dialogue on the labour law reform remains uncompleted. The Committee further notes the concerns expressed by both the ZCTU and the ITUC regarding the functioning of the social dialogue institutions, the TNF and the Bipartite Negotiating Panel in the health sector. While noting the information provided by the Government, the Committee expects that the labour and public service legislation will be brought into conformity with the Convention without further delay in full consultation with the social partners and requests the Government to provide information on all progress made in this regard.

Article 4 of the Convention. Promotion of collective bargaining. The Committee had previously noted that section 56(2) of the Special Economic Zones Act (2016) did not recognize the right to collective bargaining and gave the power to determine conditions of work to the Special Economic Zones Authority and the Minister. It had therefore requested the Government to take the necessary measures to amend the Act, in consultation with the social partners, so as to bring it into conformity with the Convention and to provide information on any developments in this regard.

The Committee notes with interest the Government's indication that the Special Economic Zones Act was repealed and replaced by the Zimbabwe Investment Development Agency Act (ZIDA). The Committee notes the Government's indication that pursuant to section 11 of the ZIDA, the Labour Act supersedes any law when it comes to employment issues and that the ZIDA Act has also established a One-Stop Investment Services Centre, which consists of representatives from several government ministries/departments including the Ministry of Labour, who have a mandate to assist and advise investors. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the application of the Convention in practice in the special economic zones and to indicate the number of collective agreements in force for such zones.

Application of the Convention in practice

Article 1. Adequate protection against acts of anti-union discrimination. The Committee recalls that it had previously urged the Government to take all the necessary measures, without delay, to ensure effective protection against acts of anti-union discrimination in practice. In this respect it had also requested the Government to provide detailed information on any developments regarding an electronic case management system, which would assist in tracking labour dispute cases, particularly those relating to anti-union discrimination the Government was in the process of developing with the assistance of the ILO.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that it has developed a concept note, which was shared with social partners and the ILO, leading to the engagement of a consultant in 2019 to develop the Software Requirements Specifications (SRS) of the electronic case management system. The SRS document was submitted to the ILO in May 2020 for standard check. Resources are being mobilized for the procurement of hardware equipment to operationalize the system. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the developments in this regard.

The Committee recalls that it had also requested the Government to provide its comments on the ZCTU's allegation of a widespread anti-union discrimination in the construction sector (where several members of the Zimbabwe Construction and Allied Trade Workers' Union would have been victims of assault and harassment, mainly in multinationals and foreign-owned companies, and their representatives denied access to companies' premises) as well as on other cases of anti-union discrimination.

The Committee notes that the Government disputes that there is a wide spread anti-union discrimination in the construction sector. It further notes the Government's indication that all alleged cases were investigated, that it has conducted joint inspections in areas alleged to have anti-union discrimination and has encouraged trade unions to report all such cases. The Committee encourages the Government to continue engaging with the social partners on all issues of application of the Convention in practice and to ensure that all allegations of violation are promptly investigated.

Direct requests

In addition, requests regarding certain matters are being addressed directly to the following States: Convention No. 87 (Algeria, Angola, Antigua and Barbuda, Australia, Bahamas, Barbados, Belgium, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Botswana, Burundi, Cambodia, Canada, Central African Republic, Chad, Chile, Colombia, Comoros, Congo, Costa Rica, Croatia, Djibouti, Dominica, Ecuador, Eritrea, Eswatini, France, Gambia, Grenada, Haiti, Kyrgyzstan, Netherlands: Aruba, Philippines, Saint Lucia, Sao Tome and Principe, Somalia, Tajikistan, Timor-Leste, Turkey, Uzbekistan); Convention No. 98 (Angola, Argentina, Australia, Belgium, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Brazil, Canada, Chile, Colombia, Comoros, Congo, Croatia, Czechia, Djibouti, Eswatini, Finland, France, Kyrgyzstan, San Marino, Solomon Islands, Somalia, South Sudan, Tajikistan, Timor-Leste); Convention No. 135 (Antigua and Barbuda, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Burundi, Dominica); Convention No. 141

Supplementary information received in 2020 to the 2019 reports

The following Member States have provided supplementary information in 2020. Their examination by the CEACR have however not led to a change to the CEACR comments issued in 2019: Convention No. 11 (Argentina, Azerbaijan, Bulgaria, Malaysia: Peninsular Malaysia and Sarawak); Convention No. 87 (Azerbaijan, Cuba, Czechia, Denmark: Faroe Islands, Estonia, Ethiopia, Finland, France: French Polynesia, French Southern and Antarctic Territories and New Caledonia, North Macedonia); Convention No. 98 (Azerbaijan, Bulgaria, Cuba, Denmark: Faroe Islands, Estonia, Ethiopia, France: French Polynesia, French Southern and Antarctic Territories and New Caledonia, North Macedonia; Convention No. 135 (Argentina, Azerbaijan); Convention No. 151 (Argentina, Azerbaijan, Belgium); Convention No. 154 (Azerbaijan, Belgium, Brazil).

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1983)

The Committee notes with deep concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments. The Committee informs the Government that, if it has not supplied replies to the points raised by 1 September 2021, then it may proceed with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the information at its disposal at its next session.

Article 1(c) and (d) of the Convention. Penalties involving compulsory labour as a punishment for breaches of labour discipline or for having participated in strikes. For many years, the Committee has been referring to section 35(2) of the Trade Unions Act, under which a penalty of imprisonment (involving an obligation to perform labour, by virtue of section 66 of the Prison Rules) may be imposed on any person employed by the Government, municipal authority or any employer in charge of supplying electricity, water, railway, health, sanitary or medical services or communications or any other service that may, by proclamation, be declared by the Governor to be a public service, if such person wilfully and maliciously breaks a contract of service, knowing or having reasonable cause to believe that the probable consequences will be to cause injury or danger or grave inconvenience to the community. The Committee has also noted that section 2 of the Settlement of Disputes (Essential Services) Act, Statutory Instrument No. 92 of 1981, declared the national fire service, postal service, monetary and financial services (banks, treasury, monetary authority), airports (civil aviation and airport security services) and the port authority (pilots and security services) to be essential services, and Statutory Instrument No. 51 of 1988 declared the social security scheme administered by the Social Security Branch an essential service.

The Committee has recalled in this respect that the imposition of sanctions involving compulsory labour as a punishment for breaches of labour discipline or for having participated in strikes is incompatible with the Convention. It has noted that section 35(2) of the Trade Unions Act refers not only to injury or danger but, alternatively, to grave inconvenience to the community, and applies not only to essential services, but also to other services, such as most employment under the Government or a municipal authority and most banking, postal and transport services.

The Government indicates in its report that one of the main tasks of the newly revived Labour Advisory Board is the revision of the national legislation, and that the Board has regrouped the legislation under revision into six topics, including trade unions' rights. The Government also states that, although trade unions' legislation has not yet been covered, the intention is to revise it in order to bring it into conformity with the international labour Conventions, and that the Committee's concern regarding section 35(2) of the Trade Unions Act will definitely be taken into consideration. While taking due note of this information, the Committee trusts that the process of the revision of the Trade Unions Act will be completed in the near future, so as to ensure that no sanctions involving compulsory labour could be imposed as a punishment for breaches of labour discipline or for peaceful participation in strikes.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee expects that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee notes with deep concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments. The Committee informs the Government that, if it has not supplied replies to the points raised by 1 September 2021, then it may proceed with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the information at its disposal at its next session.

Article 2(2)(a) of the Convention. 1. Work exacted under compulsory military service laws. For many years the Committee has been drawing the Government's attention to the fact that section 1 of Act No. 16 of 27 August 1981 establishing compulsory military service is not in conformity with the Convention. Under this provision, national service is instituted for the purpose of enabling every citizen to participate in the defence and construction of the nation and has two components: military service and civic service. The Committee has repeatedly emphasized that work exacted from recruits as part of compulsory national service, including work related to national development, is not purely military in nature and is therefore contrary to Article 2(2)(a) of the Convention.

The Committee notes that the Government once again indicates that it is committed to repealing the above-mentioned Act and this will be seen in practice in the revision of the Labour Code, which is in progress. The Committee again expresses the strong hope that when the Labour Code is revised, the necessary steps will be taken to amend or repeal the Act establishing compulsory military service so as to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention. The Government is requested to supply information on any progress made in this respect.

2. Youth brigades and workshops. In its previous comments the Committee noted the Government's indication that Act No. 31-80 of 16 December 1980 on guidance for youth had fallen into disuse since 1991. Under this Act, the party and mass organizations were supposed to create, over time, all the conditions for establishing youth brigades and organizing youth workshops (type of tasks performed, number of persons involved, duration and conditions of their participation, etc.). The Committee once again notes the Government's indication that it is committed to repealing the above-mentioned Act and this will be seen in practice in the revision of the Labour Code, which is in progress. The Committee expresses the strong hope that when the Labour Code is revised, the necessary steps will be taken to formally repeal Act No. 31-80 of 16 December 1980 on guidance for youth.

Article 2(2)(d). Requisitioning of persons to perform community work in instances other than emergencies. For many years the Committee has been drawing the Government's attention to the fact that Act No. 24-60 of 11 May 1960 is not in conformity with the Convention in that it allows the requisitioning of persons to perform community work in instances other than the emergencies provided for under Article 2(2)(d) of the Convention, and provides that persons requisitioned who refuse to work are liable to imprisonment ranging from one month to one year.

The Committee again notes the Government's indication that this Act has fallen into disuse and may be considered as repealed, in view of the fact that the Labour Code (section 4) and the Constitution (article 26), which prohibit forced labour, annul all the provisions of national law which are contrary to them. The Government explains that, in order to avoid any legal ambiguity, a text will be adopted enabling a clear distinction to be made between work of public interest and the forced labour prohibited by the Labour Code and the Constitution. The Government also indicates that the practice of mobilizing sections of the population for community work, on the basis of the provisions of section 35 of the statutes of the Congolese Labour Party (PCT), no longer exists. Tasks such as weeding and clean-up work are carried out by associations, state employees and local communities on a voluntary basis, therefore without any compulsion involved. Moreover, the voluntary nature of work for the community will be established in the revision of the Labour Code in such a way as to clearly bring the national legislation into conformity with the provisions of the Convention. The Committee notes this information and hopes that appropriate measures will be taken to clarify the situation in both law and practice, especially by the adoption of a text enabling a distinction to be made between work in the public interest and forced labour.

The Committee expects that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1983)

The Committee notes with deep concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments. The Committee informs the Government that, if it has not supplied replies to the points raised by 1 September 2021, then it may proceed with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the information at its disposal at its next session.

Articles 1(1) and 2(1), (2)(a) and (d) of the Convention. National service obligations. Over a number of years, the Committee has been requesting the Government to repeal or amend the National Service Act, 1977, under which persons between the ages of 18 and 21 years are required to perform service with the national service, including participation in development and self-help projects concerning housing, school, construction, agriculture and road building, failure to do so being punishable with a fine and imprisonment (section 35(2)). The Committee observed that, contrary to the Government's repeated statement that the national service was created to respond to national disasters, the Act contained no reference to natural disasters, but specified the objectives of the national service, which "shall be to mobilize the energies of the people of Dominica to the fullest possible level of efficiency, to shape and direct those energies to promoting the growth and economic development of the State". The Committee pointed out that the above provisions are not in conformity with the present Convention and the Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105), which specifically prohibits the use of forced or compulsory labour "as a means of mobilizing and using labour for purposes of economic development".

The Government indicates in its report that the item concerning the amendment of the legislation has been included in the Decent Work Agenda, and that the necessary measures will be taken to address the requests in relation to compliance with the Conventions with the technical assistance of the ILO. While having noted the Government's indications in its earlier reports that the National Service Act, 1977, has been omitted from the Revised Laws of Dominica, 1990, and that section 35(2) of the Act has not been applied in practice, the Committee trusts that appropriate measures will be taken in the near future in order to formally repeal the above Act, so as to bring national legislation into conformity with Conventions Nos 29 and 105 and that the Government will provide, in its next report, information on the progress made in this regard.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee expects that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Eritrea

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 2000)

Article 1(a) of the Convention. Sanctions involving compulsory labour as a punishment for holding or expressing political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that several provisions of Press Proclamation No. 90/1996 establish restrictions on printing and publishing (concerning the printing or reprinting of an Eritrean newspaper or publication without a permit; printing or disseminating a foreign newspaper or publication prohibited from entering Eritrea; publishing inaccurate news or information disturbing public order (section 15(3), (4) and (10))), which are punishable with penalties of imprisonment. Under the terms of section 110 of the Transitional Penal Code of 1991, persons convicted to imprisonment are subject to the obligation to work in prison. The Government indicated that expressing a political opinion or belief did not constitute a crime in Eritrea and that since independence, no citizen had been detained for expressing his or her opinion or for criticizing the Government. With regard to religious freedom, the Government referred to Proclamation No. 73/1995 respecting religious institutions and activities and indicated that no interference was allowed in the exercise of the rights of any religion or creed on condition that they are not used for political purposes and are not prejudicial to public order or morality. In this regard, the Committee noted that the United Nations Human Rights Council, in its resolution on the situation of human rights in Eritrea of June 2017, expressed its "deep concern at the severe restrictions on the right to freedom to hold opinions without interference, freedom of expression, including the freedom to seek, receive and impart information, liberty of movement, freedom of thought, conscience and religion, and freedom of peaceful assembly and association, and at the detention of journalists, human rights defenders, political actors, religious leaders and practitioners in Eritrea" (A/HRC/RES/35/35).

It also noted that in the context of the Working Group on the Universal Periodic Review, the Government accepted the recommendations of certain countries encouraging it to "reform legislation in the area of the right to freedom of conscience and religion"; ensure that "the rights of all its people to freedom of expression, religion, and peaceful assembly are respected"; and take the "necessary measures to ensure respect for human rights, including the rights of women, political rights, the rights of persons in detention and the right of freedom of expression as it pertains to the press and other media" (A/HRC/26/13/Add.1). The Committee hoped that the Government would take all the necessary measures to ensure that the legislation currently in force, as well as any legislation concerning the exercise of the rights and freedoms under preparation, did not contain any provision which could be used to punish the expression of political opinions or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system, or the practice of a religion, through the imposition of a sentence of imprisonment under which labour could be imposed.

The Committee notes that the Government, in its report, reiterates its statement that no citizens were arbitrarily arrested for expressing their political opinion or belief nor did any courts impose prison sentences for expressing one's views or for criticizing the Government. In this regard, the Committee notes that the Human Rights Committee, in its concluding observations under the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights of May 2019, expressed its concern about reports of ongoing arrest and detention of persons for merely expressing their opinion, including political figures, journalists and religious and community leaders (CCPR/C/ERI/CO/1, para, 39). Moreover, the United Nations Special Rapporteur, in her statement of October 2020 on the situation of human rights in Eritrea, referred to numerous cases of arrests and prolonged imprisonment of journalists and writers for being critical of the Government, as well as individuals and religious communities because of their faith and belief. She stated that Eritrea continues to severely restrict civil liberties and that independent human rights defenders, journalists and political opposition groups cannot work freely in the country. The Committee further notes the Government's indication that a new civil and penal code and other related codes with their procedural laws have been concluded and will be enacted shortly.

The Committee recalls that the Convention protects persons who hold or express political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system by prohibiting the imposition of penalties which may involve compulsory labour, including sentences of imprisonment including compulsory labour. Freedom of opinion, belief and expression are exercised through various rights, such as the right of assembly and association and freedom of the press. The exercise of these rights enables citizens to secure the dissemination and acceptance of their views, or to practice their religion. While recognizing that certain limitations may be imposed on these rights as a safeguard for public order to protect society, such limitations must be strictly within the framework of the law. In light of these considerations, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures, both in law and in practice, to ensure that no penalties involving compulsory labour are imposed for the peaceful expression of views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system or the practice of a religion, for example by clearly restricting the scope of the provisions under Press Proclamation No. 90/1996 and Proclamation No. 73/1995 to situations connected with the use of violence, or by repealing penalties involving compulsory prison labour. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any progress made in this regard, as well as information on the application in practice of the provisions of the above Proclamations, with an indication of the acts which gave rise to conviction and the type of penalties imposed.

Article 1(b). Compulsory national service for purposes of economic development. In its previous comments, the Committee referred to its observation concerning the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29), in relation to the broad range of types of work exacted from the population as a whole in the context of compulsory national service, as set out in the Proclamation on National Service No. 82 of 1995 and the 2002 Declaration on the "Warsai Yakaalo" Development Campaign. The Committee recalled that this national service obligation, to which all citizens between the ages of 18 and 40 years are subject for an indeterminate period of time, has the objectives of the reconstruction of the country, action to combat poverty and the reinforcement of the national economy and, consequently, is clearly in contradiction with the objective of this Convention which, in Article 1(b), prohibits recourse to compulsory labour "as a method of mobilizing and using labour for purposes of economic development". It therefore strongly urged the Government to take the necessary measures without delay for the elimination in law and practice of any possibility of using compulsory labour in the context of national service as a method of mobilizing labour for the purposes of economic development.

The Committee notes that the Conference Committee for the Application of Standards concerning the application of the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29), in its conclusions adopted in June 2018, noted the Government's statement that the "Warsai Yakaalo" Development Campaign was no longer in force, and that a number of conscripts had been demobilized and were under the civil service with an adequate salary. The Committee also notes that the Conference Committee urged the Government to amend or revoke the Proclamation on National Service, bring an end to forced labour, ensure the cessation of the use of conscripts for the exaction of forced labour in line with the Convention, and avail itself without delay of ILO technical assistance.

Referring to the ILO Technical Advisory mission report of July 2018, the Committee notes a consensus prevailing among the various interlocutors the mission met with that it was important to understand the context of the national service with respect to any engagement with Eritrea. This context included the fact that the obligation of every citizen to undertake national service had to be seen in the light of the situation of "no war, no peace" which had been devastating for the country, and that national service had been part of the Eritrean national struggle for liberation even though national service of an indefinite duration had never been on the Government's agenda. While recognizing that many Eritreans were willing to be part of the national service, which was not intended to be "indefinite", and that national service was essential not only to ensuring the development of the country but also to ensuring its very existence, the Committee notes that the mission was of the view that national service could not be considered as a case of "force majeure", and that the exceptions set out by the Convention No. 29 could not apply to forced labour exacted for economic development purposes for an indefinite period of time. Moreover, a range of stakeholders indicated to the mission that in light of the recent peace treaty between Eritrea and Ethiopia, the compulsory nature of the national service would no longer be justified and demobilization was expected to happen, even though no precise date has been specified.

The Committee notes the Government's statement in its report that Eritrea is in the process of implementing fundamental nation-building principles, and attaches great importance to such principles, which entail creating and expanding national wealth through knowledge-based well-organized productive work, and ensuring equitable distribution of resources and opportunities. If some major tasks such as water supply for all, revival of transport and communication infrastructure, green power generation and electricity supply, housing projects, modern health and education infrastructure are properly implemented, this could lead to wider chances of job creation and employment opportunities for people. It recognizes that the proven commitment, full participation of the people and their relentless toil and resilience is necessary to transform the old traditional subsistence economy to a developed industrial economy and to bring sustainable change to the quality of life of the people. In this respect, people are called upon to carry out economic reconstruction activities, such as reforestation, soil and water conservation and food securing programmes. The Government reiterates that no forced or compulsory labour is used and that the practice of exaction of various kinds of labour from the population is only limited in scope so as to be compatible with the Convention.

In addition, the Committee notes that, in its concluding observations of May 2019, the Human Rights Committee expressed concern about allegations that national service conscripts are deployed for labour in various posts including mining and construction plants owned by private companies, while receiving very little or no salary (CCPR/C/ERI/CO/1, paragraph 37).

The Committee recalls that the prohibition laid down in Article 1(b) of this Convention applies even where recourse to forced or compulsory labour as a method of mobilizing and using labour for purposes of economic development is of temporary or exceptional nature. The Committee further emphasizes that no exceptions to universally recognized human rights should be sought in the name of development (paragraph 308 of the 2012 General Survey on fundamental Conventions). The Committee therefore urges the Government to take the necessary measures, without delay, to eliminate both in law and practice, the use of compulsory labour in the context of national service as a method of mobilizing labour for the purposes of economic development. In this respect, noting the Government's indication to the members of the technical advisory mission of its willingness to avail itself of ILO technical assistance, the Committee strongly encourages the Government to collaborate with the ILO by continuing to avail itself of ILO technical assistance in its efforts to bring its law and practice into compliance with the provisions of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken as well as on any progress made in this regard.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 2001)

The Committee notes the supplementary information provided by the Government on matters raised in its previous direct request, and otherwise repeats the content of its observation adopted in 2019 which read as follows.

The Committee previously noted that according to the Criminal Code of 3 July 2014, persons convicted for penal offences with penalties of correctional work or community service are under the obligation to perform labour (sections 42 and 43 of the Criminal Code). The Committee notes that the penalties of restriction of freedom and deprivation of liberty (provided for under sections 44 and 46 of the Criminal Code, respectively) also involve compulsory labour, under the conditions set out in the Executive Penal Code of 5 July 2014 (sections 63(2) and 104(2)(1)).

Article 1(a) of the Convention. Sanctions involving compulsory labour as a punishment for holding or expressing political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system. Criminal Code. In its previous comments, the Committee noted a number of provisions of the Criminal Code, under the terms of which certain activities might be punished by sentences involving an obligation to perform labour in circumstances which are covered by the Convention. The provisions in question are as follows:

- section 174, which provides for penalties of restriction of freedom or deprivation of liberty for the incitement of social, national, gender-based, racial, class or religious discord;
- section 400, which establishes penalties such as a fine, correctional work, community work or remand in custody in case of violation of the procedure for organizing and holding meetings, rallies, pickets, street marches and demonstrations;
- section 404, which establishes penalties such as a fine, correctional work, restriction of freedom, deprivation of liberty, with forfeiture of the right to hold certain posts or to engage in certain activities in case of forming, leading and participation in activities of illegal social and other associations.

The Committee noted the Government's indication that, in 2015, there were 47 offences under section 174 of the Criminal Code, out of which three cases were submitted to court, and 44 cases were discontinued. The Committee requested the Government to ensure in practice that the provisions of sections 174, 400 and 404 of the Criminal Code were applied in a manner so as to ensure that no penalties involving compulsory labour were imposed as a punishment for holding or expressing political or ideological views.

The Government indicates in its report that, according to the Supreme Court of Kazakhstan, in the first half of 2019, 19 people were convicted under section 174 of the Criminal Code, including six who were sentenced to imprisonment and ten to restriction of freedom. The Government states that no cases were prosecuted under sections 400 and 404. The Committee notes the information in the compilation report prepared by the United Nations Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights, for the Universal Periodic Review of November 2019, that the Special Rapporteur on terrorism observed that section 174 of the Criminal Code was the most commonly used against civil society activists, particularly against religious organizations (A/HRC/WG.6/34/KAZ/2, paragraph 25). The Committee also notes that, according to the 2017 Report "Defamation and Insult Laws in the OSCE Region: A Comparative Study" of the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE), section 174 of the Criminal Code has been increasingly widely used against critical activists, including atheist writers (page 29). Moreover, section 174 of the Criminal Code has been applied in cases concerning criticism of policies pursued by the president of a foreign state (page 132).

Referring to its General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, 2012, paragraphs 302 and 303, the Committee points out that the range of activities which must be protected from punishment involving compulsory labour, under Article 1(a), comprises the freedom to express political or ideological views (which may be exercised orally or through the press and other communications media), as well as various other generally recognized rights, such as the right of association and of assembly, through which citizens seek to secure the dissemination and acceptance of their views and which may also be affected by measures of political coercion. It also emphasizes that the Convention does not prohibit the application of penalties involving compulsory labour to persons who use violence, incite violence or prepare acts of violence. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that no penalties involving compulsory labour, including compulsory prison labour, correctional work or community service, are imposed in law and in practice, on persons who peacefully express views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system, for example by clearly restricting the scope of sections 174, 400 and 404 of the Criminal Code to situations connected with the use of violence, or by suppressing sanctions involving compulsory labour. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any progress made in this regard, as well as information on the application in practice of the sections referred to above, specifying the number of prosecutions made under each provision, the grounds for prosecution, and the type of penalties imposed.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Lebanon

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1977)

The Committee notes with concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments.

The Committee notes the observations of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) received on 1 September 2018 and requests the Government to provide its comments in this respect.

Articles 1(1) and 2(1) of the Convention. Vulnerable situation of migrant domestic workers to conditions of forced labour. In its earlier comments, the Committee noted the observation of 2013 from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), indicating that there are an estimated 200,000 migrant domestic workers employed in Lebanon. These workers are excluded from the protection of the Labour Law, have a legal status tied to a particular employer under the kafala (sponsorship) system, and legal redress is inaccessible to them. Moreover, they are subjected to various situations of exploitation, including delayed payment of wages, verbal, and sexual abuse. The Committee also requested the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the Bill regulating the working conditions of domestic workers, as well as the Standard Unified Contract (SUC) regulating their work are adopted in the very near future.

The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that, the Bill regulating the working conditions of domestic workers was drafted in conformity with Domestic Workers Convention, 2011 (No. 189), and the Bill has been submitted to the Council of Ministers for discussion. The Bill will provide a certain number of safeguards, including social security coverage; decent accommodation; the timely payment of wages through bank transfer; hours of work (eight hours per day); sick leave; and a day of rest. The Government also indicates that a Steering Committee has been established under the Ministry of Labour in order to deal with issues related to migrant domestic workers and is composed of relevant Ministerial Departments, representatives of the private recruitment agencies, NGOs, certain international organizations, as well as representatives of certain embassies. A representative from the ILO Decent Work Technical Support Team in Beirut is also participating in the Steering Committee.

Moreover, the Government indicates that the Ministry of Interior and the Ministry of Labour have taken a series of preventive measures, including awareness raising campaigns through the media; the establishment of a shelter "Beit al Aman" for migrant domestic workers who are facing difficulties in collaboration with Caritas; the appointment of social assistants who look into the working conditions of migrant domestic workers in their workplaces; the training of labour inspectors on decent working conditions; and the conclusion of a series of Memoranda of Understanding (MOUs) with sending countries, such as the Philippines, Ethiopia and Sri Lanka. The Government further states that the Ministry of Labour has set up a specialized office for complaints and a hotline to provide legal assistance to migrant domestic workers. Moreover, under the Recruitment Agencies of Migrant Domestic Workers Decree No. 1/168 of 2015, it is prohibited to impose recruitment fees on all workers.

The Committee further notes that in its 2015 concluding observations, the UN Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW) welcomed the various measures adopted by the State party to protect the rights of women migrant domestic workers, including issuing unified contracts, requiring employers to sign up to an insurance policy, regulating employment agencies, adopting a law criminalizing trafficking in persons and integrating such workers into the social charter and the national strategy for social development. The CEDAW, however, expressed concern that the measures have proved insufficient to ensure respect for the human rights of those workers. The CEDAW is equally concerned about the rejection by the Ministry of Labour of the application by the National Federation of Labour Unions to establish a domestic workers' union, the absence of an enforcement mechanism for the work contracts of women migrant domestic workers, limited access for those workers to health care and social protection and the non-ratification of the Domestic Workers Convention, 2011 (No. 189). The CEDAW was further concerned about the high incidence of abuse against women migrant domestic workers and the persistence of practices, such as the confiscation of passports by employers and the maintenance of the kafala system, which place workers at risk of exploitation and make it difficult for them to leave abusive employers. The CEDAW was deeply concerned about the disturbing documented reports of migrant domestic workers dying from unnatural causes, including suicides and falls from tall buildings, and about the failure of the State party to conduct investigations into those deaths (CEDAW/C/LBN/CO/4-5, paragraph 37).

While taking note of the measures taken by the Government, the Committee notes with concern that migrant domestic workers are subjected to abusive employer practices, such as retention of passports, non-payment of wages, deprivation of liberty and physical abuse. Such practices might cause their employment to be transformed into situations that amount to forced labour. The Committee therefore urges the Government to strengthen its efforts to provide migrant domestic workers with an adequate legal protection, by ensuring that the Bill regulating the working conditions of domestic workers will be adopted in the very near future and to provide a copy of the legislation, once adopted. The Committee also urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that migrant domestic workers are fully protected from abusive practices and working conditions that amount to forced labour.

Article 25. Penal sanctions for the exaction of forced labour. In its earlier comments, the Committee noted that according to the ITUC's information, it was found that a lack of accessible complaint mechanisms, lengthy judicial procedures, and restrictive visa policies dissuade many workers from filing or pursuing complaints against their employers. Even when workers file complaints, the police and judicial authorities regularly fail to treat certain abuses against domestic workers as crimes. The Committee also noted the Government's indication that section 569 of the Penal Code, which establishes penal sanctions against any individual who deprives another of their personal freedom, applies to the exaction of forced labour. It requested the Government to provide information on any legal proceedings which had been instituted on the basis of section 569 as applied to forced labour and on the penalties imposed.

The Committee further notes that in its 2015 concluding observations, the CEDAW observed that migrant domestic workers face obstacles with regard to their access to justice, including fear of expulsion and insecurity of residence.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that the work of migrant domestic workers is regulated by the SUC and that the application of section 569 of the Penal Code is of the competency of the judiciary when a violation is detected. The Committee also notes copies of court decisions provided by the Government. It observes that the cases are related to non-payment of wages, harassment and working conditions of migrant domestic workers. In all cases employers have been sentenced to pay a monetary penalty to compensate the workers.

While noting this information, the Committee recalls that Article 25 of the Convention provides that the exaction of forced labour shall be punishable as a penal offence. The Committee therefore urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that employers who engage migrant domestic workers in situations amounting to forced labour are subject to really adequate and strictly enforced penalties. It requests the Government to provide information on measures taken in this regard.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request directly addressed to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 2007)

The Committee notes with concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments.

Article 1(b) of the Convention. Imposition of forced labour as a method of mobilizing and using labour for the purposes of economic development. In its previous comments, the Committee emphasized that national service, as established in Ordinance No. 78-002 of 16 February 1978 setting forth the general principles of national service, is incompatible with Article 1(b) of the Convention. Under the terms of section 2 of the Ordinance, all Malagasies are bound by the duty of national service defined as compulsory participation in national defence and in the economic and social development of the country. This compulsory service, which requires citizens to be engaged in defence or development work, involves citizens of both sexes for a maximum period of two years and may be carried out up to the age of 35. The Committee requested the Government to take the necessary measures to bring its legislation into conformity with the Convention.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that, after the processes of registration and review, young national service conscripts have to carry out their service by choosing between two options: (i) being excused for family reasons, in which case conscription is cancelled or deferred for one year, depending on the circumstances; or (ii) continuing vocational training through Action for Development Military Service (SMAD). The objective of the SMAD is therefore to facilitate the integration into active life of young Malagasies who volunteer for national service. The SMAD is established on a voluntary basis for young persons, and the duration of the training is set at 24 months, following which the volunteers are released from their statutory service obligations. These young persons choose between training for rural or urban trades.

The Committee once again recalls that programmes involving the compulsory participation of young persons in the context of military service or, instead of such service, in work for the development of their country, are incompatible with Article 1(b) of the Convention, which prohibits the use of compulsory national service as a method of mobilizing labour for the purposes of economic development. It observes that the Ordinance of 1978 provides that all Malagasies are covered by the duty of national service, defined as compulsory participation in national defence and in the economic and social development of the country. The Committee firmly requests the Government to take the necessary measures to bring Ordinance No. 78-002 of 16 February 1978 into conformity with the Convention by guaranteeing that compulsory national service is not used as a method of mobilizing labour for the purposes of economic development. In the meantime, the Committee requests the Government to specify the relationship between the service obligations envisaged in the framework of compulsory national service, as set out in the Ordinance of 1978, and participation in SMAD. The Committee further requests the Government to indicate the practical modalities for the implementation of the SMAD and whether young persons who have chosen the SMAD can cancel the training on their own initiative. Finally, the Committee requests the Government to indicate the number of cancellations registered and their consequences.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Mali

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1960) and Protocol of 2014 (ratification: 2016)

The Committee welcomes the ratification by Mali of the Protocol of 2014 to the Forced Labour Convention, 1930. It notes the Government's report on the Convention and the first report on the Protocol.

Slavery-like practices and hereditary servitude

Articles 1(1) and 2(1) of the Convention, and Article 1(2) of the Protocol. Systematic and coordinated action. In its previous comments, the Committee expressed the hope that the Government would be able to report the action taken to examine the issue of the persistence of slavery and to take the necessary measures to bring an end to any practice under which persons considered to be descendants of slaves are forced to perform work without giving their valid consent.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that the insecurity in the North of the country makes it difficult to take any initiative for the examination of the situation in question. However, action is being taken to examine the issue of the persistence of slavery and the measures necessary to bring it to an end. The Committee notes that, in his 2020 report, the United Nations Independent Expert on the situation of human rights in Mali indicates that he has been informed of several cases involving physical violence, threats and banishment of victims of slavery, including the arbitrary arrest and detention of 16 anti-slavery human rights defenders (A/HRC/43/76, paragraph 29). The Committee also notes that a new project has been initiated to combat slavery and discrimination on the basis of slavery, which was developed by the Government and the ILO and its partners. The Committee notes with concern the persistence of slavery-like practices in the country and the lack of systematic and coordinated action to bring it to an end. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures, including within the framework of the project developed with the ILO, to assess the extent of the phenomenon of slavery and similar practices and to develop a strategy for the implementation of systematic and coordinated action to bring an end to these practices.

Article 25 of the Convention and Article 1(3) of the Protocol. Imposition of penalties. The Committee notes the lack of judicial action and penalties in cases related to slavery. The Committee notes that, under the terms of section 29 of the Penal Code, slavery is defined as a crime against humanity and is punishable by the death penalty. Moreover, section 243 of the Penal Code provides that debt bondage and slavery shall be punishable by a sentence of imprisonment of from six months to two years and a find of between CFA 20,000 and 100,000. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that prosecutions are undertaken in cases of slavery, and to provide information in this regard and on the penalties imposed. It also requests the Government to take measures to reinforce awareness-raising activities and training for actors involved in the criminal justice system in relation to the suppression of slavery-like practices.

Articles 2 and 3 of the Protocol. Awareness-raising measures. Identification and protection of victims. The Committee notes the lack of information on measures for the prevention of slavery and for the identification and protection of the victims of slavery. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures adopted to raise awareness of the issue of the persistence of slavery-like practices, and to identify and protect the victims. It also requests the Government to provide information on the number of victims identified, those that have benefited from protection and the nature of the protection provided.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Mauritania

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1961) and Protocol of 2014 (ratification: 2016)

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020). The Committee proceeded with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the supplementary information received from the Government this year, as well as on the basis of the information at its disposal in 2019.

The Committee notes the observations of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), the General Confederation of Workers of Mauritania (CGTM) and the Free Confederation of Mauritanian Workers (CLTM), received on 1 September, 30 August and 12 June 2019, respectively. It also notes the observations of the ITUC and the CGTM received in 2018. Lastly, the Committee notes the Government's reply to the 2019 observations of the CLTM and the CGTM, received on 21 October 2019.

Follow-up to the conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards (International Labour Conference, 106th Session, June 2017)

Articles 1(1), 2(1) and 25 of the Convention. Slavery and the vestiges of slavery. The Committee previously noted that in June 2017 the Conference Committee expressed its deep concern at the persistence of slavery and the low number of prosecutions brought and it urged the Government to continue its efforts to combat slavery and its vestiges. The Committee welcomed the fact that the Government had accepted a high-level mission and the continuation of the ILO technical cooperation project to strengthen the efforts made by the Government to bring an end to the vestiges of slavery. The Committee requested the Government to take the necessary measures, both in the framework of the technical cooperation project and the inter-ministerial committee responsible for implementing the road map to combat the vestiges of slavery, to implement the recommendations of the Conference Committee and those made by the Committee of Experts.

The Committee notes the report of the high-level mission which visited Mauritania in April 2018. The mission noted certain progress due to the efforts of the Government. While the Government showed the will to continue taking action to combat this divisive phenomenon, the global context in which action was being taken remained complex. The mission heard ambivalent statements and observed that the action taken was subject to different perceptions by the various stakeholders. The mission considered that the continuation of a multisectoral approach was essential to combat all the aspects of slavery and its vestiges, including discrimination. The mission recommended the Government to establish a coordination mechanism and to adopt a plan of action to combat forced labour and slavery articulated around four components: (a) support for the effective application of the Act of 2015 (Act No. 2015-031 of 10 September 2015 criminalizing slavery and punishing slavery-like practices) through the strengthening of the role and presence of the State; (b) the identification, provision of assistance and protection of victims; (c) the promotion of an inclusive approach and a better collective understanding of the action taken; and (d) awareness-raising. The Committee therefore proposes to examine these four components, which were addressed in its previous comments.

(a) Effective application of the 2015 Act. The Committee previously emphasized that the efforts made to disseminate knowledge of the 2015 Act and reinforce the training of the various actors in the criminal justice system had not in practice led to the examination of cases by the three special criminal courts with competence for slavery issues. It requested the Government to continue to take action in this respect so as to ensure that no cases of slavery go unpunished. The Committee notes that the mission welcomed the fact that several cases are before the special criminal courts and emphasized the importance of ensuring that these courts benefit from the necessary resources and stability to discharge their functions. It also observed that access to victims and their identification is still complex.

In its 2019 report, the Government refers to a number of measures, including: the circular issued by the Public Prosecutor urging all prosecutors to investigate cases of slavery more actively; free legal assistance and exemption from legal fees for victims of slavery at all stages of the procedure; the creation of legal aid offices; and the possibility available to the judges to order interim measures to protect the rights of victims. The Government adds that 35 cases have been referred to the three special criminal courts and have resulted in conciliation, the dismissal of cases, acquittals, convictions and civil damages. The East court has handed down two judgments and is due to examine around ten cases involving matters prior to the entry into force of the 2015 Act. The court in Nouakchott has dealt with ten cases since 2010 and appeals have been lodged in six others which were examined by courts of first instance. The court of Nouadhibou has dealt with seven cases (only one case is under investigation, two have been closed and three are awaiting referral by the regional criminal court). The Government also indicates that the Department of Justice is continuing to organize seminars for judicial stakeholders involved in action to combat slavery. In 2018 and 2019, training and awareness-raising workshops were organized in Nouadhibou, Kiffa, Nouakchott and Aleg for members of the special criminal courts and magistrates of appeal bodies, investigating magistrates, prosecutors and members of the police and gendarmerie. In the supplementary information provided in 2020, the Government specifies that the criminal courts tried 11 cases related to slavery on the basis of the 2015 Act. Nine cases concerned traditional slavery, while the two others concerned slavery-based insults. Two acquittals were given, and prison sentences of one to 20 years and substantial fines imposed.

The Committee notes that, in the context of the technical cooperation project of the ILO, an evaluation is being prepared of the operation of the three special criminal courts, with the support of the Ministry of Justice. The objective is to be able to make recommendations for specific improvements that can be made with a view to the more effective enforcement of the 2015 Act.

The Committee notes that, in its observations, the ITUC reports several obstacles to the effective enforcement of the law: the lack of action by police officers and prosecutors when cases of slavery are reported; acts of intimidation by the police and the judicial authorities in relation to victims to persuade them to accept an amicable settlement with their former “master”; and the absence of protection measures for victims and witnesses.

The Committee notes all of these elements. It recalls that, under the terms of Article 25 of the Convention, member States are required to ensure that the penalties imposed by law for the exaction of forced labour are really adequate and are strictly enforced. In this regard, it welcomes the fact that the three special criminal courts have before them an increasing number of cases of slavery. However, it observes that the information concerning these cases is still imprecise and that, four years after the adoption of the 2015 Act, a limited number of cases appear to have resulted in the imposition of really adequate penalties. The Committee urges the Government to continue to take the necessary measures to strengthen knowledge of the Act of 2015 by both the public authorities and the victims and to ensure its effective application. Therefore, as indicated by the mission in its report, the Committee encourages the Government to pursue the training activities for the various actors in the enforcement system. It also emphasizes the importance of the preparation of a practical guide listing the most common elements/indicators that suggest that a person is in a situation of slavery as a means of reinforcing capacities for the identification of cases of slavery, the collection of evidence and the assessment of the facts. The Committee also hopes that the Government will take the necessary measures to ensure that the evaluation is undertaken of the operation of the three special criminal courts and requests it to specify the recommendation made in this context. It requests the Government to continue providing information on the number of cases of slavery reported to the authorities, the number of cases that have led to judicial action, the number of the convictions handed down, the nature of the sanctions imposed, as well as the number of cases that were settled outside the judicial system. The Committee also requests the Government to indicate the number of victims of slavery who have been compensated for the damages suffered, in accordance with section 25 of the 2015 Act.

(b) Identification, protection and reintegration of victims. The Committee previously noted that the identification and provision of effective assistance to victims of slavery still remained a challenge to be overcome in practice. The mission considered that it was essential to establish structures to receive victims and provide them with comprehensive assistance so that they can be provided with support in asserting their rights and reconstructing their lives free of any pressure.

The Committee notes that the Government has not provided any information on the specific assistance provided to victims, despite the existence of a number of cases that are before the courts. It notes that, among general social integration measures, the Government refers to: the activities undertaken by the Tadamoun Agency (the National Agency to combat the vestiges of slavery); the measures taken to facilitate access to civil status of persons without filiation through 17,857 declaratory judgements respecting civil status, particularly to issue birth certificates; action to encourage families to register with schools the children of poor families and/or victims of the vestiges of slavery, within the framework of cash transfer measures; training courses, skills and employment programmes and income generation projects established for populations who are victims of the vestiges of slavery; and the reform of property ownership undertaken through the pluridisciplinary commission to reform the law on property and public land. In its supplementary information, the Government refers to the launching, in January 2020, of the special "Ewlewiyatt" (Priorities) programme, which covers the largest number of simultaneous projects ever in the country, and also to the programmes developed by the General Office for National Solidarity and the Combat against Exclusion (TAAZOUR), aimed at supporting the most disadvantaged populations.

The Committee notes that, in its observations, the CGTM indicates that the actions undertaken by the Tadamoun Agency have only focused on the development of social and school infrastructure, without addressing the issues of prevention and the protection of victims, The CGTM observes that victims are not associated in the design or implementation of the programmes that concern them. The CLTM also refers to the absence of reception structures. The ITUC emphasizes that people who are freed from slavery do not have access to specific rehabilitation and integration measures. Faced with poverty, they are at risk of falling back into a situation of exploitation due to the lack of alternatives, or of returning to their former "masters" by reason of the psychological hold exerted in the context of slavery.

While welcoming the general measures to combat poverty and promote social integration taken by the Government, the Committee hopes that the Government will provide information on the specific measures taken so that the victims who are identified benefit from specific support adapted to their situation, enabling them to assert their rights and rebuild their lives psychologically, economically and socially. As noted by the mission, the Committee draws the Government's attention to the need to pay special attention to the situation of women and their children and to the possibility of envisaging the creation of a public fund for the compensation of victims. The Committee once again requests the Government to indicate the number of cases in which the Tadamoun Agency has been a party to civil proceedings, and the number of victims who have been supported by the Agency during the investigations and judicial proceedings, with an indication of the nature of the assistance provided.

(c) An inclusive approach, coordination and a better collective understanding of the phenomenon. 1. Plan of action. The Committee previously welcomed the multisectoral approach and the interministerial coordination introduced for the implementation of the road map to combat the vestiges of slavery. It requested the Government to indicate the new actions identified following the final evaluation of the impact of the measures adopted within the framework of the road map. The Government indicates that the final evaluation seminar on the implementation of the road map found that the 29 recommendations set out in the road map have been globally implemented in a satisfactory manner. The Committee notes that, in its observations, the CGTM observes that workers' organizations were not associated with the formulation, implementation or evaluation of the road map. It adds that the absence of dialogue concerning the action to be taken for the elimination of all forms of forced labour is liable to compromise the Government's programmes and the efforts made to combat slavery and its vestiges. The ITUC recalls in this regard the importance of the inclusion of workers' organizations at every stage of the preparation and implementation of a plan of action.

The Committee notes the adoption of Order No. 085 of 5 February 2019 appointing the President and the members of the National Social Dialogue Council. The Committee notes that the priority issues to be covered by the National Social Dialogue Council include the development and finalization as soon as possible of a plan of action to combat forced labour and child labour with a view to the continuation of the action to be taken on the basis of the conclusions set out in the report of the ILO mission and the recommendations of the Committee on the Application of Standards. The Committee trusts that the Government will take the necessary measures to adopt without delay the plan of action to combat forced labour prepared by the National Social Dialogue Council and to ensure that it will cover all of the components examined by the Committee and the mission in its report, with a view to taking effective action to combat the multiple aspects of slavery. Recalling that action to combat slavery requires the commitment of all actors within the framework of coordinated action carried out at the highest level, the Committee also requests the Government to indicate the measures adopted to establish a coordination and follow-up mechanism for the implementation of the plan of action, and to ensure the involvement of all stakeholders, including workers' and employers' organizations.

2. Qualitative study. With regard to the qualitative study that is due to be undertaken within the framework of the technical cooperation project of the ILO, the Committee emphasized the importance of taking into account the issue of economic, social and psychological dependence when assessing whether a person has expressed free and informed consent to work, free of any threat of pressure. In its report, the mission emphasized that the qualitative study to be carried out would provide all of the actors involved with reliable data to guide their action and that it was essential for the Government to facilitate the process of the preparation of the study as soon as possible.

The Committee notes that, during the course of 2019, within the framework of the technical cooperation project, 12 regional workshops were organized throughout the national territory with a view to the preparation of a research protocol for the qualitative study. The objective was to identify the scope of application of the study, the categories of workers and the employment sectors at risk. The social partners were associated with the workshops. The research protocol could be validated at the beginning of 2020. The Committee notes that the ITUC, in its observations, welcomes the progress in the preparation of the qualitative study and reiterates the importance of also carrying out a study to determine the quantitative incidence of slavery.

The Committee also notes that, in its observations, the CLTM indicates that slavery continues to exist in its most archaic form involving people who remain at the disposal of their masters 24 hours a day. The CGTM refers to the subordinate relationship of former slaves who live in very difficult economic and social conditions due to the discrimination and social exclusion that has marked them and makes them vulnerable to exploitation.

Recalling the importance of the availability of reliable data on the phenomenon of slavery and the various forms of forced labour, the Committee firmly hopes that the Government will continue to take all the necessary measures so that the qualitative study can be completed as soon as possible, with ILO assistance.

(d) Awareness-raising. The Committee previously noted the awareness-raising actions taken by the Government and requested it to continue to take action, not only to raise awareness of the 2015 Act, but also to delegitimize slavery and combat the stigmatization and discrimination to which victims and their descendants are subjected. The Committee notes in this respect that the mission recommended the establishment of a multi-year intervention plan to coordinate awareness-raising activities over time and throughout the national territory, paying special attention to women, children, mayors and local actors. The Government refers once again to the awareness-raising caravans that are travelling throughout the national territory, and particularly in certain adwabas (villages), placing emphasis on the action taken to combat slavery practices. The Government adds that, with a view to reinforcing the legal framework to combat contemporary forms of slavery and any tendency to discriminate against citizens, an important legislation has been adopted to repress any discriminatory practices that may emerge in the country.

The Committee notes that the ITUC, in its observations, continues to refer to the obstacles encountered by certain civil society organizations working in the field of action to combat slavery and its vestiges, and refers to acts of intimidation and the difficulties encountered by certain organizations concerning their registration.

The Committee requests the Government to continue undertaking awareness-raising activities on the issue of slavery throughout the national territory. The Committee also requests the Government to associate all the stakeholders, including the local authorities, so that the firm will of the State on the issue of action to combat slavery, its vestiges and discrimination is communicated and understood at all levels. The Committee also requests the Government to ensure that persons and organizations that combat slavery can act freely and without fear of reprisals.

Noting that the Government has not provided its first report on the application of the Protocol of 2014 to the Forced Labour Convention, 1930, the Committee requests the Government to provide it with its next report on the application of the Convention.

Mozambique

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 2003) and Protocol of 2014 (ratification: 2018)

Articles 1(1), 2(1) and 25 of the Convention. Trafficking in persons. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the implementing regulations of Act No. 6/2008 of 9 July establishing the legal framework applicable to preventing and combating trafficking in persons, which were intended to establish measures for awareness-raising, training, protection and the reintegration of victims, had not been adopted, but that a study ordered by the Prosecutor-General recommended the adoption of a plan of action in this area. It requested the Government to take the necessary measures to adopt a national plan to combat trafficking in persons with precise and coordinated measures and to describe the measures taken for the protection and reintegration of victims, in accordance with sections 20, 21 and 24 of Act No. 6/2008. The Committee notes the Government's indication, in its report, that on 11 December 2017 a draft national plan to prevent and combat trafficking in persons was presented by the Deputy Minister for Justice in order to improve the protection system through a comprehensive national strategy. The Government adds that the draft national plan includes specific objectives for the prevention of trafficking, protection of victims and sanction of perpetrators. The Committee notes the Government's statement that the national police carried out awareness-raising campaigns at community-level, as well as regular monitoring of places where trafficking in persons may occur, such as restaurants, plantations and mining operations. With regard to victim protection, the Government states that victims of trafficking can benefit from emergency shelters operating under the responsibility of the Ministry of Gender, Child and Social Action, offering appropriate housing, medical and psychological assistance and sometimes vocational training. The Committee notes, from the 2018 annual report of the Prosecutor-General of the Republic submitted to the Assembly of the Republic, that several measures have been taken to raise awareness of trafficking in persons and for the training of state employees, more particularly judges and police officers, as well as to strengthen transnational cooperation with South Africa, Zimbabwe and Eswatini. It notes that the number of victims of trafficking increased from 5 in 2017 to 26 in 2018, of whom 21 were victims of trafficking for labour exploitation. It notes, however, that the Prosecutor-General highlighted the need for concerted and increased efforts to prevent and combat trafficking in persons, as well as the inappropriate legislative framework for sanctioning those perpetrators. The Committee further notes that, in their respective 2019 and 2018 concluding observations, the United Nations Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination Against Women (CEDAW) and Committee on Migrant Workers (CMW) expressed concern about: (i) Mozambicans and migrant workers, in particular those in an irregular situation, who have been victims of trafficking and forced labour, particularly in the mining, agriculture, construction, tourism and domestic work sectors; (ii) the insufficiency of the human and financial resources allocated to prevent and eradicate trafficking in persons, as well as of the training given to officials responsible for the implementation of anti-trafficking legislation; (iii) the very low number of prosecutions and convictions of cases of trafficking in persons and the complicity within the national police force from which some traffickers benefited; and (iv) the lack of effective procedures for early identification and referral of victims of trafficking, including undocumented migrants, the insufficient number and coverage of shelters for victims of trafficking, and the inadequacy of the medical and psychological assistance provided to them (CEDAW/C/MOZ/CO/3-5, 30 July 2019, paragraph 27 and CMW/C/MOZ/CO/1, 16 October 2018, paragraph 61). While noting the measures taken by the Government, the Committee requests it to strengthen its efforts to combat trafficking in persons and to adopt and implement without delay concrete and coordinated measures with a view to: (i) preventing trafficking in persons and raising awareness of the issue; (ii) reinforcing the capacities and training of the authorities responsible for the detection of situations of trafficking, carrying out investigations and initiating prosecutions; and (iii) punishing those responsible, including any complicit public officials. It also requests the Government to provide information on any progress made towards the adoption of the national plan to prevent and combat trafficking in persons and the implementing regulations of Act No. 6/2008, or any difficulties faced in that regard. It further requests the Government to provide information on the specific measures taken for the protection and reintegration of victims, in particular in the framework of sections 20, 21 and 24 of Act No. 6/2008. Lastly, the Committee requests the Government to provide statistical data on the number and nature of investigations carried out, prosecutions initiated, court decisions handed down and penalties imposed under Act No. 6/2008 which establishes penalties of up to 16–20 years of imprisonment.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1977)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments.

Article 1(a) and (b) of the Convention. Compulsory labour for persons identified as "unproductive" or "anti-social". For many years, the Committee has been drawing the Government's attention to the need to amend the Ministerial Directive of 15 June 1985 on the evacuation of towns, under which persons identified as "unproductive" or "anti-social" may be arrested and sent to re-education centres or assigned to productive sectors. The Government indicated previously that re-education centres no longer existed and that the 1985 Directive had become obsolete and would be repealed within the framework of the revision of the Penal Code. The Committee observes with regret that the new Penal Code adopted in December 2014 (Act No. 35/2014) does not repeal this Directive. The Committee recalls that, under the terms of Article 1(a) and (b) of the Convention, States undertake not to make use of any form of forced or compulsory labour as a means of political coercion or education or as a method of mobilizing and using labour for purposes of economic development. The Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to formally repeal the Ministerial Directive of 15 June 1985 on the evacuation of towns so as to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention and with the practice indicated, and thereby ensure legal certainty.

Article 1(b) and (c). Imposition of sentences of imprisonment involving an obligation to work for the purposes of economic development and as a means of labour discipline. For many years, the Committee has been emphasizing the need to amend or repeal certain provisions of Act No. 5/82 of 9 June 1982 concerning the defence of the economy. This Act provides for the punishment of types of conduct which, directly or indirectly, jeopardize economic development, prevent the implementation of the national plan and are detrimental to the material or spiritual well-being of the population. Sections 10, 12, 13 and 14 of the Act prescribe prison sentences, which may involve compulsory labour, for repeated cases of failure to fulfil the economic obligations set forth in instructions, directives, procedures, etc., governing the preparation or implementation of the national State plan. Section 7 of the Act penalizes unintentional conduct (such as negligence, the lack of a sense of responsibility, etc.) resulting in the infringement of managerial or disciplinary standards.

The Committee noted previously that in 2007 the Constitutional Council declared a law adopted by the Assembly of the Republic repealing Act No. 5/82 (as amended by Act No. 9/87) to be unconstitutional, considering that the blanket repeal of these Acts would have the effect of no longer criminalizing or punishing certain conducts that jeopardize economic development that are not punishable by other legislative texts, thereby leaving a legal vacuum. The Committee notes that, although the 2014 Penal Code repeals certain provisions of these two Acts, the sections covered by its previous comments, namely sections 7, 10, 12, 13 and 14, remain in force. The Committee regrets that the Government did not take the opportunity of the adoption of the new Penal Code to bring its legislation into conformity with the Convention and it trusts that the Government will not fail to take the necessary measures to repeal the provisions of Act No. 5/82 concerning the defence of the economy, as amended by Act No. 9/87, which are contrary to the Convention.

Article 1(d). Penalties imposed for participation in strikes. In previous comments, the Committee noted that, under section 268(3) of the Labour Act (Act No. 23/2007), striking workers who are in violation of the provisions of section 202(1) and section 209(1) (obligation to ensure a minimum service) face disciplinary penalties and may incur criminal liability, in accordance with the general legislation. The Committee notes that the Government has not provided any information on the nature of the penalties which may be faced by striking workers in cases where their criminal liability is incurred, nor on the provisions of the general legislation that are applicable in this respect. The Committee recalls in this regard that, in accordance with Article 1(d) of the Convention, persons who participate peacefully in a strike cannot be liable to imprisonment involving compulsory labour. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to indicate the nature of the penalties that may be imposed on striking workers where their criminal liability is incurred pursuant to the provisions of section 268(3) of the Labour Act. Referring also to its comments on the application of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that no prison sentences involving compulsory labour can be imposed on workers who participate peacefully in a strike.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1955)

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020). The Committee proceeded with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the supplementary information received from the Government this year as well as on the basis of the information at its disposal in 2019.

The Committee notes the observations of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) received on 1 September 2019. It also notes the detailed discussion which took place at the 108th Session of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2019, concerning the application by Myanmar of the Convention.

Follow-up to the conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards (International Labour Conference, 108th Session, June 2019)

Articles 1(1), 2(1) and 25 of the Convention. Elimination of all forms of forced labour. 1. Engagement of the ILO regarding the elimination of forced labour. (a) Historical background. In March 1997, a Commission of Inquiry was established under article 26 of the ILO Constitution to address the forced labour situation in Myanmar. As reported to the ILO Governing Body, forced labour had taken various forms in the country over the years, including forced labour in conflict zones, as well as for public and private undertakings. In its recommendations, the Commission of Inquiry urged the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure that: (i) the relevant legislative texts, in particular the Village Act and the Towns Act, be brought into line with the Convention; (ii) in practice, no more forced or compulsory labour be imposed by the authorities, in particular the military; and (iii) the penalties which may be imposed under section 374 of the Penal Code for the exaction of forced or compulsory labour be strictly enforced.

Since then, the issue has been the focus of cooperation between the Government and the ILO for more than a decade. In 2002, an Understanding was agreed between the Government and the ILO, which permitted the appointment of an ILO liaison officer. Later in 2007, the Supplementary Understanding (SU) was signed, in particular, to set out a complaints mechanism with the objective "to formally offer the possibility to victims of forced labour to channel their complaints through the services of the Liaison Officer to the competent authorities with a view to seeking remedies available under the relevant legislation and in accordance with the Convention". In addition, in 2012, the ILO concluded a Memorandum of Understanding (MoU) on a Joint Strategy for the Elimination of Forced Labour by 2015, which provided a basis for seven interrelated action plans. The ILO also participated in the Country Task Force on Monitoring and Reporting on underage recruitment issues.

(b) Recent developments. The Action Plan for the elimination of all forms of forced labour, 2018 and the SU, which provided for a complaints mechanism, expired in December 2018. On 21 September 2018, the Government, the workers' and employers' organizations and the ILO signed the MoU on Decent Work Country Programme (DWCP) (2018–21). The significant implementation outputs, as indicated in the DWCP document, include institutionalization of national forced labour complaints mechanisms and strengthened protection against unacceptable forms of work, in particular forced and child labour by 2021. The Committee notes that in the course of the discussion in October–November 2019, the Governing Body noted, in respect of progress in the elimination of the use of forced labour that the number of complaints received had continued to decrease since 2016 suggesting progress towards elimination of underage recruitment, which generally accounted for the highest proportion of complaints received. It noted that in 2019 the ILO received 108 forced labour complaints, 48 of which have been assessed as being within the definition of forced labour while there were no complaints received of forced labour related to the involuntary use of civilians as guides and porters from conflict areas. Very few reports of forced labour in the private sector have been received since March 2019. The Governing Body also noted that the proposal for the establishment of a National Complaints Mechanism (NCM) was approved by the Government by a letter dated 7 August 2019 (GB.337/INS/9). The Governing Body noted that the ILO stressed on the following elements as necessary for a credible and effective complaints mechanism: (a) impartiality in the assessment and investigation of complaints; (b) guaranteed protection of victims; (c) credible accountability; (d) decentralization of responsibility to eliminate forced labour; and (e) awareness-raising programmes, particularly for those living in remote and conflict-affected areas. Although the Government had publicly advertised its intention to establish an NCM, no reference had been made to complainants being able to continue to submit complaints to the ILO. The GB also noted that while the Government had made efforts to develop interim procedures for dealing with complaints, a framework for the development of the NCM and an action plan for the elimination of forced labour under the DWCP, the victim protection measures remained unclear and the decentralization responsibility to state and regional governments to eliminate forced labour still needed to be addressed.

2. Application of the Convention in law and in practice. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the Ward or Village Tract Administration Act of 2012, which repealed the Village Act and the Towns Act of 1907 makes the use of forced labour by any person a criminal offence punishable with imprisonment and fines (section 27A). It noted that no action had been taken to amend article 359 of the Constitution (Chapter VIII – Citizenship, fundamental rights and duties of citizens), which exempts from the prohibition of forced labour "duties assigned by the Union in accordance with the law in the interest of the public" and could be interpreted in such a way as to allow a generalized exaction of forced labour from the population. It also noted that the developments within the peace process, such as the National Ceasefire Agreement of 2015 as well as the ILO initiation with the Government and the Ethnic Armed groups which resulted in two non-state armed groups committing to end forced labour, led to a significant decrease in the numbers of reported cases of forced recruitment for military purposes by both the security forces and armed groups. The Committee, however, noted from the Report of the Detailed Findings of the Independent International Fact-Finding Mission on Myanmar of 17 September 2018 (A/HRC/39/CRP.2) that the use of forced labour by the Tatmadaw (the armed forces of Myanmar) persisted, particularly in Kachin and Shan States, as well as among the ethnic Rakhine and Rohingya. It noted that in many instances, the Tatmadaw arrived in a village and took villagers directly from their homes or from the areas surrounding their village while they were fishing, farming, running errands or travelling while in some cases, this was done in an organized way, such as house by house, on the basis of a quota for each family, through a list, or with the cooperation of village leaders. Persons subjected to forced labour were required to perform a variety of tasks and the duration varied from a few days to months. Many of them were required to act as porters, carrying heavy packages including food, clothes and in some cases weapons. Other common types of work included digging trenches, cleaning, cooking, collecting firewood, cutting trees, and constructing roads or buildings in military compounds. Victims were also sometimes required to fight or participate in hostilities. Often, victims were given insufficient food of poor quality or were not able to eat at all. They did not have access to water and were kept in inadequate accommodation, including in the open air without bedding and without adequate sanitary facilities. Victims were subjected to violence if they resisted, worked slowly or rested. Particularly, female victims also faced sexual violence (paragraphs 258–273, 412–424 and 614–615). The Committee noted with deep concern the persistence of forced labour imposed by the Tatmadaw in Kachin and Shan States, as well as among the ethnic Rakhine and Rohingya. It urged the Government to strengthen its efforts to ensure the elimination of forced labour in all its forms, in both law and practice, particularly the forced labour imposed by the Tatmadaw; to take the necessary measures to ensure the strict application of the provisions of the Ward or Village Tract Administration Act of 2012 and the Penal Code; as well as to provide information on any progress made regarding the amendment to article 359 of the Constitution.

The Committee notes that, in its observations, the ITUC stated that forced labour is exacted in a systematic and continuous manner and that this practice is also persistent in the private sector, especially in the agricultural sector (fisheries, sugarcane, beans) and in the jade industry. The ITUC further highlights the plight of the Rohingya population, nearly 700,000 of them, who were expelled from the Rakhine State following the so-called clearance operations, commenced in 2017, and who are at an increased risk of falling victims to forced labour by both state and non-state actors.

The Committee notes the statement made by the Government representative of Myanmar to the Conference Committee that a total of ten ethnic armed forces have already signed the National Ceasefire Agreement and a unilateral ceasefire has been announced in the States of Kachin and Shan from December 2018 to April 2019. The Government representative further indicated that interim procedures for continuously receiving complaints are in place and that a Joint Parliamentary Committee was established to amend the Constitution. The Worker members, in their statement to the Conference Committee, alleged that the Government failed to implement most of the activities designed under the 2012 and 2018 action plans. The Committee notes that the Conference Committee, in its concluding observations, while welcoming the efforts in eliminating forced labour, expressed concern over the persistent use of forced labour and therefore urged the Government to take all necessary measures to ensure that forced labour is not imposed in practice by the military or civilian authorities; to ensure that victims of forced labour have access to effective remedies and comprehensive victim support without fear of retaliation; to increase the visibility of awareness-building and capacity-building activities for the general public and administrative authorities to deter the use of forced labour; to provide detailed information on the progress made within the DWCP; and to intensify its cooperation with the ILO through the development of a time-bound action plan for the establishment of, and transition to, an effective complaints handling procedure.

The Committee notes the Government's information in its report that within the framework of the DWCP, in January 2019, a Training of Trainers on the Elimination of Forced Labour was conducted with representatives from the High Level Working Group (HLWG), members of the Technical Working Group (TWG) and representatives of the ILO. Moreover, a knowledge-sharing workshop was held during the same period with 50 representatives, including members from the HLWG, TWG, representatives of ILO, Government, and employers' and workers' organizations to share good practices of other countries on developing the National Complaints Mechanism (NCM). The Government indicates that the interim procedures for receiving and resolving forced labour complaints are, and will be, carried out by the HLWG until the establishment of the NCM.

In this regard, the Committee takes due note of the Government's indication in its supplementary information that the NCM has been established and operational since February 2020. A national committee was set up in order to effectively implement the NCM, comprising representatives from 16 ministries and the Myanmar Human Rights Commission, as well as representatives from the Union of the Myanmar Federation of Chambers of Commerce and Industry (UMFCCI), the Confederation of Trade Unions Myanmar (CTUM), the Agriculture and Farmers Federation of Myanmar (Food Allied Workers) (AFFM-IUF) and the Myanmar Industries Craft and Services Trade Unions Federation (MICS-TUsF). An orientation session, facilitated by the ILO, was conducted for the members of the national committee for the NCM. Moreover, training on identifying and investigating forced labour cases, as well as on the international definition of forced labour and international humanitarian law was provided to 38 officials and staff from the various ministries and departments that receive complaints on forced labour. The Committee also notes the Government's information that the NCM resolved 20 cases out of the 38 cases received in 2020, including the 24 cases received during the operation of the interim complaints mechanism.

The Committee also notes the Government's information that from July 2018 to August 2019, a total of 6,423 awareness-raising workshops on forced labour were conducted for an estimated 507,935 people in related townships across the country and 115,113 posters were distributed. Moreover, to prevent the use of forced labour in the private sector, from January 2018 to July 2019, 1,903 knowledge-sharing workshops were conducted with 92,698 participants from 4,252 factories, shops, establishments and training centres.

Regarding the amendment to article 359 of the Constitution which exempts from the prohibition of forced labour "duties assigned by the Union in accordance with the law in the interest of the public", the Committee notes the Government's information that the proposal was brought before the Pyidaungsu Hluttaw (Assembly of the Union) on 19 March 2020. However, the Committee notes with regret the Government's statement that although 409 of the 654 representatives voted in favour of it, the article could not be amended as the required vote of more than 75 per cent of all the representatives of the Assembly was not received.

The Government further indicates that up until July 2020, 1,105 cases concerning underage recruitment were received under the SU complaints mechanism, of which 707 cases have been resolved. The Committee notes that from April 2019 to July 2020, ten military officers and eight military personnel were punished for the irregular recruitment of children. Moreover, 23 underage children who were irregularly recruited were released. The Committee, however, notes an absence of information on the concrete penalties applied to the ten military officers and eight military personnel for the irregular recruitment of children.

It further notes the Government's information that no one was punished under the Ward or Village Tract Administration Act and the Penal Code from July 2018 to July 2019. While taking note of the measures taken by the Government towards the elimination of all forms of forced labour, the Committee once again reminds the Government that, by virtue of Article 25 of the Convention, the exaction of forced or compulsory labour shall be punishable as a penal offence, and the penalties imposed by law shall be really adequate and strictly enforced.

The Committee therefore strongly urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the strict application of the national legislation, particularly the provisions of the Ward or Village Tract Administration Act of 2012 and the Penal Code, so that sufficiently dissuasive penalties of imprisonment are imposed and enforced against perpetrators in all cases. In this regard, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the application in practice of the above-mentioned legislation to ensure accountability, including the statistical data on cases of forced labour detected, legal proceedings initiated, convictions handed down and the nature of the penalties imposed on convicted persons. It also requests the Government to continue providing detailed information on the measures taken to ensure that, in practice, forced labour is no longer imposed by the military or civilian authorities, as well as the private sector, such as awareness-raising and capacity-building activities for local administrators, military personnel, other stakeholders and the general public. The Committee further requests the Government to continue to provide information on the number of complaints on forced labour received and resolved by the NCM. Furthermore, while acknowledging the efforts made by the Government in respect to the proceedings to amend article 359 of the Constitution, the Committee firmly hopes that the Government will continue to take the necessary measures to ensure that article 359 of the Constitution is amended so as to bring it into conformity with the Convention and to provide information on any progress made in this regard. It once again reiterates the firm hope that all the necessary measures will be taken, in law and in practice, without delay to achieve full compliance with the Convention so as to ensure that all use of forced or compulsory labour in Myanmar is completely eliminated.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Niger

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1961) and Protocol of 2014 (ratification: 2015)

The Committee welcomes the ratification by Niger of the Protocol of 2014 to the Forced Labour Convention, 1930, which bears witness to the Government's commitment to prevent and eliminate all forms of forced labour.

Articles 1(1) and 2(1) of the Convention, and Article 1(1) of the Protocol. Effective measures to combat slavery and similar practices. 1. Systematic and coordinated action. The Committee has been examining the issue of the persistence of slavery-like practices in Niger for many years. The Committee has welcomed the Government's commitment to combating these practices, including with the technical assistance of the Office provided within the framework of the support project to combat forced labour and discrimination (the PACTRAD project). Nevertheless, although noting the existence of a legislative framework that criminalizes slavery, the Committee observed that the institution initially established to coordinate action to combat slavery-like practices, the National Commission to Combat the Vestiges of Forced Labour and Discrimination, lacked the resources to discharge its functions. The Committee considered that the Government should intensify its efforts to bring an end to slavery-like practices and take the necessary measures for the adoption of a national strategy to combat slavery.

In its report, the Government indicates that it has opted for an overall plan to combat trafficking in persons and forced labour by reinforcing the presence of the Ministry of Labour within the National Commission to Combat Trafficking in Persons (CNLTP) and through the closer involvement of the social partners. It also refers to the activities carried out within the framework of the PACTRAD II project, the general objective of which is to contribute to a significant reduction in the number of victims of forced labour, with the immediate objective of the progressive elimination of the vestiges of slavery. In this context, technical meetings for the exchange of information have been organized so that the various actors have a better knowledge of the priorities and means of intervention used by each of them.

The Committee notes this information. While noting the Government's indication that it has adopted an overall approach to combating trafficking in persons and forced labour within the framework of the National Commission to Combat Trafficking in Persons, the Committee recalls that the issues of trafficking in persons and the vestiges of slavery have their own characteristics and require different specific action. Action to combat trafficking in persons was defined and provided with a framework by Ordinance No. 2010-86 of 16 December 2010 on action to combat trafficking in persons and is covered by a national plan of action implemented by the National Agency for action to combat trafficking in persons and the smuggling of migrants (ANLTP/TIM) (see, in this respect, the Committee's comments in its direct request). The crimes and offences of slavery were introduced into the Penal Code in 2003, without an overall strategy being established to combat these practice. The Committee has previously emphasized the complexity of the factors underlying the persistence of slavery-like practices and the need for a specific response. The Committee therefore urges the Government to take the necessary measures for the adoption of a national policy and plan of action to combat slavery and slavery like practices with a view to ensuring the adoption of systematic and coordinated action by the competent authorities and the determination of the objectives to be achieved and the measures to be taken. Please indicate in this regard the manner in which employers' and workers' organizations are consulted. The Committee also requests the Government to indicate the authority that will be competent for the implementation of this policy and to specify the measures taken to ensure that it has the resources to discharge its functions throughout the national territory.

2. Article 2 of the Protocol. Prevention. Awareness-raising, education and information (clauses (a) and (b)). The Committee notes the information provided by the Government on the training and awareness-raising activities organized within the framework of the PACTRAD II project for traditional chiefs, journalists in the public and private press, universities and the National School of Administration, with a view to promoting a change of mentality and behaviour. It notes that, following the theoretical and practical training provided to the Association of Traditional Chiefs of Niger (ACTN), the Association adopted a plan of action to combat forced labour and similar practices. The Committee further notes the Government's indication that, in the context of the Bridge technical cooperation project, it is planned that the ANLTP/TIM will undertake studies on the situation of slavery in locations where vestiges of slavery still persist with a view to the adoption of a strategy to combat slavery.

The Committee recalls that the availability of reliable data on the nature and incidence of slavery-like practices in Niger is an essential prerequisite. It strongly encourages the Government to take the necessary measures to undertake, with the assistance of the Office, a study on the situation with regard to slavery and slavery practices to gain a better understanding of the characteristics of such practices, and particularly the multidimensional nature of the relationship that exists between victims and their masters. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on the awareness-raising activities carried out for the various competent authorities and actors concerned, as well as the population. Please indicate the manner in which these activities target zones and populations that are at risk.

Action to address the root causes of slavery (clause (f)). The Committee welcomes the various types of action undertaken within the framework of the PACTRAD II project to address the root causes of slavery. It notes in particular the measures taken which led to the creation of community schools (MODECOM) in areas in which communities with slave origins are established, with a view to promoting their emancipation; the organization of a campaign in fairs to draw up birth certificates and identity documents to combat the marginalization of these populations by enabling them to have access to their rights (the right to vote, education and other services); and support services for the independence of households of slave origins in the commune of Tajaé.

The Committee requests the Government to continue taking measures to address the root causes of the vestiges of slavery-like practices, with an indication of the framework within which the activities are carried out and the manner in which they are coordinated. It requests it to specify whether programmes are specifically targeted at former slaves or the descendants of slaves with a view to ensuring they have sufficient means of subsistence so that they do not fall back into a situation of dependence in which they are vulnerable to the exploitation of their labour. In this regard, the Committee also refers to its comments under the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111), in which it emphasized the importance of combating the discrimination and stigmatization of which former slaves and the descendants of slaves are victims, including in relation to access to productive resources, such as land, so as to enable them to have a job or engage freely in their activities.

3. Article 3 of the Protocol. Identification and protection of victims. With regard to the identification and protection of victims, the Committee notes that the information provided by the Government mainly concerns the measures adopted or envisaged for the victims of trafficking in persons. It emphasizes in this regard that the victims of slavery are in a situation of economic and psychological dependence which requires specific action by a series of actors in society to detect cases of slavery and help victims to leave their situation of dependence. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the victims of slavery are identified and released and that they benefit from protection that is adapted to their situation so that they can rebuild their lives outside the slave-master relationship. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the situations that are denounced, the number of potential victims identified, those who have benefited from protection, the nature of such protection and the institutions that have provided such assistance.

4. Article 4 of the Protocol. Access to justice and compensation. The Committee previously noted that the Penal Code empowers any association that has the objective of combating slavery and similar practices to bring civil action for compensation for the damages caused by offences related to slavery (section 270-5). It also noted that vulnerable people who do not have the necessary income can benefit from legal and judicial assistance administered by the National Agency for Legal and Judicial Assistance. The Government indicated that this assistance constitutes significant progress in allowing victims to re-establish their rights. The Committee once again requests the Government to indicate the manner in which in practice legal assistance is provided to persons identified as potential victims of slavery. It requests the Government to indicate the manner in which the various actors (civil society associations, the forces of order and the National Agency for Legal and Judicial Assistance) cooperate to ensure that victims are in practice able to assert their rights and have access to justice. The Committee also requests the Government to ensure that victims have easy access to appropriate compensation mechanisms for all the damages that they have suffered.

5. Article 25 of the Convention and Article 1(1) of the Protocol. Imposition of effective penal sanctions. The Committee notes that, since the adoption of the provisions criminalizing slavery in 2003 (Act No. 2003-025 of 13 June 2003, which introduced sections 270-1 to 270-5 on slavery into the Penal Code), very little information has been provided on the prosecutions brought and the sentences handed down against those engaging in slavery. The Government refers to several training activities undertaken between 2013 and 2017 in the defence and security forces within the framework of training modules on human rights, and to awareness-raising activities on trafficking in persons for actors in the criminal justice system. The Committee notes this information and once again emphasizes the need to carry out more targeted activities on the subject of slavery and the related legislative provisions. The Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to strengthen the capacities of the forces of order, the prosecution services and the judicial authorities to ensure that cases of slavery are identified, evidence collected and prosecutions initiated so that those responsible for such practices are punished under the terms of sections 270-1 to 270-5 of the Penal Code. The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information on this subject in its next report.

The Committee notes that a new ILO technical cooperation project (the BRIDGE project) has been implemented since the beginning of 2020 and that its objectives include support for the preparation of a national plan to combat slavery and similar practices, and the reinforcement of a coordination mechanism. The plan also includes activities intended to raise awareness of this issue and the inclusion of victims of slavery in projects to facilitate their independence and social integration. The Committee hopes that the assistance of the Office will support the Government in the implementation of the recommendations set out above.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Oman

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1998)

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020). The Committee proceeded with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the supplementary information received from the Government this year, as well as on the basis of the information at its disposal in 2019.

Articles 1(1) and 2(1) of the Convention. Vulnerable situation of migrant workers to conditions of forced labour. Migrant workers and migrant domestic workers. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that migrant workers are covered by Labour Law No. 35 of 2003 (Chapter 2: Regulation of foreigners' work) and that they can terminate their employment contract after a notification period of 30 days. The Committee also noted that migrant domestic workers are not covered by the Labour Law and that their work is regulated by Ministerial Order No. 1 of 2011, on the recruitment of non-Omani workers by private employment agencies, as well as the model contract for recruiting migrant domestic workers. It further noted that under Ministerial Decree No. 189/2004 on the Special Terms and Conditions of Domestic Workers, migrant domestic workers cannot work for another employer before completing the procedure of changing to another employer according to the national regulations (section 7). The Committee requested the Government to indicate the manner in which this category of workers can freely terminate their employment contract and to report on the number of employment transfers that took place in practice for migrant workers and migrant domestic workers.

The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that the period of time required to transfer a worker from one employer to another varies from a minimum of one day to a maximum of one month, depending on the readiness of the parties. The Government also states that there is no sponsorship (kafala) system in Oman and that the system in place is a temporary contractual relationship pursuant to an employment contract specifying the terms and signed by the worker and the employer. According to the Government, the reduction in the number of cases involving the transfer of workers is a positive reflection of labour force stability in employment, which provides evidence of a decent working environment in Oman as a result of the efforts made by the Ministry of Manpower, in cooperation with the ILO, to implement the Decent Work Country Programme since 2010.

Regarding migrant domestic workers, the Committee notes the Government's indication that the procedures for terminating domestic workers' contracts and the period required to transfer their services from one employer to another are the same procedures as those that apply to all workers.

The Committee notes that pursuant to section 8 of Ministerial Decree No.189/2004, on the Special Terms and Conditions of Domestic Workers, the employment contract can be terminated by either the employer or the worker provided that one month's notice is given. The worker is entitled to terminate the employment contract without providing a prior notice in case of abuse by the employer or a member of the employer's family. The Committee notes however that pursuant to section 7(4), the migrant domestic worker cannot work for another employer before the recruiter relinquishes his sponsorship and completes the necessary procedures in this regard.

The Committee further notes that sections 17 and 20 of Foreign Residence Act No. 16/95 of 1995 provide that residence visas are granted to foreign workers by their sponsors, and the conditions and procedures of transfer of foreign workers to another sponsor are determined by the decision of the Inspector-General of the Ministry of the Interior. In this regard, the Committee notes the Government's information in its supplementary report according to which the implementing regulation of the Foreign Residence Act was amended in 2020. Section 24 of the regulation, which provided that a foreign worker's residence may be transferred to another employer only with the approval of the first sponsor-employer, has been amended. It is now provided that a foreign worker's residence may be transferred from one employer to another who has a licence to recruit workers, provided that proof of the end, abrogation or termination of the worker's employment contract is presented, and that proof of approval by the competent government agency of the second employer's contract with the foreign worker is provided. The Government further indicates that 58,744 workers were transferred to a new employer in 2018, and 60,958 in 2019.

The Committee observes that while there are provisions allowing migrant workers, including domestic workers to terminate their employment contract, the conditions for changing employment remain difficult as the work permit of this category of workers is linked to their sponsor-employer pursuant to sections 17 and 20 of the Foreign Residence Act No.16/95 of 1995.The Committee notes that in its concluding observations of 2017, the United Nations Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW) recommended that the Government of Oman review the kafala system, which operates against vulnerable migrant workers. The Committee further notes that this Committee observed that, while the Government had adopted a number of measures to protect the rights of female migrant domestic workers, the kafala system still increases their risk of exploitation. CEDAW was also concerned about: the exclusion from the Labour Law of this category of workers and, therefore, from access to the labour courts, their risk of facing charges of "absconding", as well as the fact that forced labour is not criminalized under the Penal Code and is prohibited only under the Labour Law, which does not apply to domestic workers (CEDAW/C/OMN/CO/2-3, paras 30(h) and 39).

The Committee recalls that the sponsorship system creates a relationship in which migrant workers, including domestic workers, are dependent on their sponsors-employers, and that the work permit of this category of workers is linked to their sponsors. The Committee observes that such a system prevents migrant workers from freely terminating their employment and increases their risk of vulnerability to situations amounting to forced labour. In this regard, the Committee requests the Government to pursue its efforts to ensure that migrant workers, including migrant domestic workers are not exposed to practices that amount to forced labour. The Committee also requests the Government to continue to provide information on the manner in which migrant workers, including migrant domestic workers, can exercise, in practice, their right to freely terminate their employment and to leave the country, so that they do not fall into abusive practices that may arise from the sponsorship system. Lastly, the Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on the number of migrant workers who have changed employer and whose work permits have been transferred to a new employer, including, if available, statistics disaggregated by gender, occupation and country of origin.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Pakistan

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1957)

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020). The Committee proceeded with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the supplementary information received from the Government this year as well as on the basis of the information at its disposal in 2019.

Articles 1(1), 2(1) and 25 of the Convention. I. Debt bondage. 1. Legislative framework. The Committee previously noted the Government's statement that the Bonded Labour System (Abolition) Act 1992 remained applicable in the Islamabad Capital Territory (ICT) and Balochistan Province. The Committee noted that the Governments of Khyber Pakhtunkhwa (KPK) Province and Sindh Province adopted the KPK Bonded Labour System Abolition Act 2015, and the Sindh Bonded Labour System (Abolition) Act 2015, respectively, both of which contained provisions prohibiting bonded labour, extinguishing remaining debts, and providing for criminal penalties in case of violations. However, the Committee noted the information of the All Pakistan Federation of Trade Unions (APFTU) that, despite the prohibition of bonded labour by law, this practice persisted in brick kilns due to the absence of effective enforcement of the law. The Committee therefore urged the Government to take immediate measures to ensure the effective application of the newly enacted provincial legislation related to the abolition of bonded labour in practice, and to provide information in this regard.

The Committee notes the Government's information in its report that the Government of Punjab enacted the Punjab Bonded Labour System (Abolition) (Amendment) Act, 2018. It also notes from the Government's supplementary report that the Provincial Cabinet of Balochistan approved the Elimination of Bonded Labour Bill, 2020, which contains provisions that help to curb the bonded and forced labour system in this province, as well as the Rehabilitation of Victims of Bonded Labour Bill, 2020. Both the Bills shall be submitted to the law department for vetting. The Committee further notes the Government's information that the Ministry of Overseas Pakistanis and Human Resource Development (OP and HRD) in consultation with the ILO has initiated the "Gap analysis concerning Protocol of 2014 to the Forced Labour Convention, 1930" with the aim of: (i) identifying the extent to which Convention No. 29 and the Protocol have been incorporated into the national laws and policies; (ii) identifying gaps in the application of Convention No. 29 and areas where current mechanisms and actions to address forced labour need to be strengthened to meet the requirements of the Protocol; and (iii) formulating a set of recommendations to support greater compliance with Convention No. 29 and move towards the ratification of the Protocol.

The Committee notes that according to the findings of the study conducted by the Bureau of Statistics Planning and Development Department of the Government of KPK in May 2017 on bonded labour in the brick kiln industry in the two districts of KPK, of the total of 190 brick kilns in the two districts, a range of four to 270 workers were found working in each kiln. The study reveals that according to the data collected from the workers in the brick kilns, no evidence of forced labour or punishment by owners was found and that they were all treated humanely and according to the laws. The Committee also notes the information from this study that, unlike Punjab, the rights of workers in the brick kiln in KPK are protected mainly due to enforcement of the laws. The Committee requests the Government to continue taking effective measures to eliminate bonded labour in all its provinces, including through the effective implementation of the newly enacted provincial laws abolishing bonded labour and to provide information in this regard. It also firmly hopes that the Government will take the necessary measures to ensure that the Balochistan Elimination of Bonded Labour Bill, 2020, and the Rehabilitation of Victims of Bonded Labour Bill, 2020, are enacted in the near future, and requests the Government to provide information on any progress made in this regard.

2. Programmes of action. The Committee previously noted the measures taken by the provincial governments to eliminate bonded labour, such as the adoption and implementation of the Provincial Plan of Action to Combat Bonded Labour and the ILO project entitled "Strengthening Law Enforcement Responses and Action against Internal Trafficking and Bonded Labour" by the Governments of the Provinces of Sindh and Punjab as well as the implementation of the "Elimination of Bonded Labour in Brick Kilns" project in Punjab.

The Committee notes the Government's information that the Provincial Action Plan to combat Bonded Labour in Punjab is in progress and a Legal Aid Service Unit has been established by the Punjab Labour Department to help the victims of bonded labour. It also notes that the Labour and Human Resources Department of Punjab, with support of the ILO technical cooperation project is undergoing a gap analysis of the project entitled "Elimination of Child and Bonded Labour Project – an integrated project for the promotion of decent work of vulnerable workers in Punjab". The Committee also notes that the Government of Sindh has released and rehabilitated eight families under bondage from the district of Khairpur. The Government further indicates that the Government of Balochistan is making efforts to adopt a specific development scheme for brick kiln workers through a survey in Balochistan. Furthermore, the Committee notes from the Government's report under the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182), that the National Strategic Framework to Eliminate Child and Bonded Labour in Pakistan, which sets 18 recommendations of actions by provinces to eliminate child and bonded labour, has been adopted in 2017. The Committee encourages the Government to pursue its efforts to combat and eliminate bonded labour, as well as to continue adopting measures aimed at supporting freed bonded labourers. It requests the Government to continue to provide detailed information on the specific measures implemented in the Punjab and other provinces in this regard, including the actions taken under the National Strategic Framework, as well as information on the concrete results of these initiatives, including the number of bonded labourers and former bonded labourers, benefiting from these measures.

3. District vigilance committees (DVCs). The Committee previously noted the Government's indication that it was impossible to monitor bonded labour through the normal inspection procedure and hence DVCs were established under the provincial bonded labour laws. It noted that the DVCs were operational throughout Punjab while the KPK and Sindh Provinces had enacted new laws on bonded labour, under which the DVCs would be re-established in accordance with the rules framed. Moreover, Balochistan Province indicated that the DVCs would be functionalized without delay. The Committee requested the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the DVCs would be re-established in KPK and Sindh Provinces under the new laws and functionalized in Balochistan.

The Committee notes the Government's information that there are seven DVCs working efficiently in the Province of Sindh. These DVCs comprise the elected representatives of the area, representatives of the District Administration, Bar Associations, press, recognized social services and the Labour Department of the Province. The Government report indicates that the Islamabad Capital Territory (ICT) has also established DVCs to eliminate bonded labour from brick kilns. The Punjab Bonded Labour System (Abolition) (Amendment) Act, 2018 contains provisions to strengthen and streamline inspections and reporting through reactivating the DVCs and redefining the role of authorized inspectors. According to the Government's report, in Punjab, 188 DVC meetings were held in all the 36 districts in 2018. Moreover, in 2019, 258 meetings and during the initial two months of 2020, 70 meetings of the DVCs were held. The Government further indicates that in 2018, 7,420 inspections related to bonded labour were carried out in Punjab, 33 complaints were received, 24 complaints were disposed of and one case was referred to the DVC. Moreover, it notes that the Government of Punjab formulated a subcommittee in April 2019 to assist the Provincial Vigilance Committees to review the implementation of the law and action plan relating to the abolition of bonded labour and the rehabilitation of freed bonded labourers; to monitor the working of the DVC; and to address the concerns of the national and international bodies on matters relating to bonded labour. It further notes that in the Province of Balochistan and KPK, the process for the activation of the DVCs will be completed in the near future. The Committee encourages the Government to continue its efforts to establish, reinforce and strengthen the DVCs in all the provinces, including in Balochistan and KPK. It also requests the Government to continue to provide information on the functioning of the DVCs, including the number of bonded labourers identified and rescued, and to provide copies of monitoring or evaluation reports. It further requests the Government to indicate if any legal action has been taken against persons employing bonded labourers, and to provide information on the number of prosecutions, convictions, and specific penalties applied, as well as copies of relevant court decisions.

4. Data-gathering measures to ascertain the current nature and scope of bonded labour. In its previous comments, the Committee urged the Government to pursue its efforts to ensure that a survey of bonded labour would be undertaken in each province of the country in the near future, in cooperation with employers' and workers' organizations and other relevant partners.

The Committee notes the Government's reference to the study conducted in 2017 in the brick kiln industry in the two districts of KPK. The Committee notes the Government's indication that due to the traditionally hidden nature of the cases of bonded labour, no survey has been conducted so far on bonded labour. However, provinces are making efforts to conduct surveys and research studies on the subject, for formulation of a comprehensive bonded labour eradication policy. The Committee encourages the Government to pursue its efforts to conduct surveys and research studies on bonded labour in all the provinces. It requests the Government to provide information on any measures taken in this regard, as well as copies of the surveys, once completed.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee notes the supplementary information provided by the Government on matters raised in previous direct request addressed to it, and otherwise repeats the content of its observation adopted in 2019 which read as follows.

Articles 1(a) and (e) of the Convention. Penalties involving compulsory labour as a punishment for expressing political views and as a means of religious discrimination. In its previous comments, the Committee observed that sections 10–13 of the Security of Pakistan Act 1952; sections 5, 26, 28 and 30 of the Press, Newspaper, News Agencies and Books Registration Ordinance 2002; section 32(2) and (3) of the Electronic Media Regulatory Authority Ordinance 2002; and sections 8 and 9 of the Anti-Terrorism Act 1997, provided for restrictions on the expression of political views and provided for penalties of imprisonment involving compulsory labour in cases of violations. The Committee also referred to sections 298B(1) and (2) and 298C of the Penal Code, inserted by the Anti-Islamic Activities of Quadiani Group, Lahori Group and Ahmadis (Prohibition and Punishment) Ordinance, No. XX of 1984, under which any person of these groups who uses Islamic epithets, nomenclature and titles is punishable with penalties of imprisonment (which may involve compulsory labour) for a term of up to three years. In this regard, the Committee noted the Government's statement that, the Ministry of Overseas Pakistanis and Human Resources Development submitted a proposal to the Ministry of Law and Justice to consider bringing any breach of the civil and social rights and liberties beyond the purview of criminal punishment; to limit penalties for such breaches to fines or other sanctions that does not involve compulsory labour; and to confer a special status to prisoners convicted of political offences. The Committee therefore requested the Government to continue its efforts to bring the above-mentioned laws into conformity with the Convention in the near future, and requested the Government to provide information on any progress made in this regard.

The Committee notes that the Government's report does not contain any information on this matter. The Committee therefore urges the Government to take the necessary measures to amend the above-mentioned provisions, either by repealing them, by limiting their scope to acts of violence or incitement to violence, or by replacing sanctions involving compulsory labour with other kinds of sanctions (e.g. fines), in order to ensure that no form of compulsory labour (including compulsory prison labour) may be imposed on persons who, without using or advocating violence, express certain political views or oppositions to the established political, social or economic system. It also requests the Government to provide information on any progress made in this regard.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1967)

Follow-up to the conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards (International Labour Conference, 106th Session, June 2017)

The Committee notes the discussion held in June 2017 in the Committee on the Application of Standards of the International Labour Conference (hereinafter the Conference Committee). The Committee notes the Government's report received in 2019, and the observations of the International Organisation of Employers (IOE), received on 1 September 2017, the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), received on 1 September 2017 and 9 September 2019, the Central Confederation of Workers Authentic (CUT-A), received on 2 September 2017 and 30 August 2019, and the National Confederation of Workers (CNT), received on 26 August 2019.

Articles 1(1), 2(1) and 25 of the Convention. 1. Institutional framework for action to combat forced labour. In its previous comments, the Committee considered that the adoption of the National Strategy for the Prevention of Forced Labour 2016-20 (Decree No. 6285 of 15 November 2016) constituted an important step in action to combat forced labour. It urged the Government to take the necessary measures for the effective implementation of the Strategy, particularly in regions and sectors where indicators of the existence of forced labour have been detected and to raise awareness of the issue. The Committee notes that, in its conclusions, the Conference Committee urged the Government to: continue including the social partners in the process of the implementation of the Strategy; develop regional action plans; and develop priority action to raise awareness of forced labour and protect victims.

The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that Decree No. 7865 of 12 October 2017 provided for the establishment of the National Commission on Fundamental Labour Rights and the Prevention of Forced Labour (CONTRAFOR), under the responsibility of the Ministry of Labour, Employment and Social Security (MTESS), replacing the Commission on Fundamental Labour Rights and the Prevention of Forced Labour. The participants in the Commission include the representatives of 14 ministries, the Paraguay Indigenous Institute (INDI) and the Council of Indigenous Peoples of Chaco, as well as representatives of employers' and workers' organizations. The general function of the CONTRAFOR is to coordinate public policies for the prevention and eradication of forced labour at the national level, and specifically to determine the processes for the implementation of the National Strategy for the Prevention of Forced Labour 2016-20 and to propose relevant adjustments. The Committee also welcomes the adoption, through the CONTRAFOR, of the Plan of Action for the prevention and eradication of forced labour in Paraguay 2017-19. The Plan covers three areas: (i) the preparation of a diagnostic study on the situation with regard to forced labour; (ii) interinstitutional and tripartite coordination (including the coordination of action for the implementation of the Strategy and the strengthening of labour inspection so as to be able to deal effectively with complaints and denunciations); and (iii) awareness and visibility of the issue of forced labour. The Plan also calls for the Monitoring and Evaluation Commission, which includes representatives of social partners, to prepare an annual report on progress and the achievement of the planned objectives as a basis for making adjustments and coordinating the development of the next plan of action.

The Committee notes that, in her 2018 report on her mission to Paraguay, the United Nations Special Rapporteur on contemporary forms of slavery commended the Government on the positive steps taken in the development of a legal and institutional framework in the country to combat modern forms of slavery and also emphasized as a positive development the greater awareness in society of the various forms of exploitation (A/HRC/39/52/Add.1, paragraph 18).

The Committee welcomes the efforts made by the Government to strengthen the institutional framework to combat forced labour and firmly encourages the Government to continue taking measures for the full implementation of the National Strategy for the prevention of forced labour and the Plan of Action for the prevention and eradication of forced labour in Paraguay 2017-19. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the results achieved, including specific information on the roles assigned to the institutions responsible for its implementation, interinstitutional coordination mechanisms, the adoption of regional plans, the annual reports prepared by the Monitoring and Evaluation Commission and the diagnostic study on forced labour, including information on the factors that are identified as potential facilitators of forced labour. The Committee further requests the Government to provide information on the process of the development and adoption of the second National Strategy for the prevention of forced labour and encourages the Government to promote tripartite dialogue in its action to combat forced labour.

2. Exploitation of the labour of indigenous workers in the Chaco. For several years, the Committee has been urging the Government to take measures to bring an end to the economic exploitation, and particularly the debt bondage of indigenous workers in the Chaco region. The Committee has drawn attention to the need to reinforce the presence of the State in that region so as to be able to identify victims and carry out investigations of the complaints received. In this regard, the Committee previously noted the establishment of a Labour Office in the locality of Teniente Irala Fernández (central Chaco) and the recruitment of 30 labour inspectors at the national level, the establishment of new courts in the Chaco region (including labour tribunals) and of the subcommission of the Commission on Fundamental Labour Rights and the Prevention of Forced Labour in the Chaco region. The Committee observes that the Conference Committee also urged the Government to allocate sufficient material and human resources to the Ministry of Labour offices in the Chaco region to receive workers' complaints and reports of forced labour and take appropriate measures to ensure that in practice victims are in a position to turn to the competent authorities.

In its report, the Government refers to the conclusion, in July 2017, of a Framework Interinstitutional Cooperation Agreement between the MTESS and the government of the Department of Boquerón with a view to the strengthening of the activities of the MTESS in the Chaco region in order to, inter alia, facilitate the access to information and complaint procedures for all members of indigenous peoples. Within this framework, the Office of the Labour Department for Indigenous Peoples was established in March 2018 in the city of Filadelfia, Department of Boquerón (Chaco). The Office has since been strengthened and offers an accessible complaints procedure for workers and is raising the awareness of indigenous peoples concerning their rights and providing them with advice. The Government also provides information on awareness-raising campaigns ("The Paraguayan Chaco with decent work") and capacity-building workshops for the population of the Paraguayan Chaco on their labour rights in various languages (Spanish, Guaraní, Enxet, Sanapaná, Nivaclé, Ayoreo, Toba Qom, German and the Menonnite dialect), as well as for the private sector and public officials. The Government indicates that since 2018 it has been taking action to strengthen the Regional Office of the MTESS in the Chaco, including: the preparation of a list of public institutions in the three districts of the Boquerón (Filadelfia, Mariscal Estigarribia and Loma Plata) with which the Regional Office has constant relations, the development of a list of indigenous communities in each district; and the organization of the Office to receive, provide advice to and mediate between employers and workers. In the month of January 2019, a total of 117 persons received advice from the MTESS in the city of Filadelfia.

The Committee notes that, in its observations, the ITUC indicates that the Filadelfia Office does not have the minimum level of administrative resources necessary for its operation nor the independence to ascertain possible irregularities on site. The ITUC indicates that the Government has not provided information to workers' organizations on the activities of the Office, the number of complaints received and the action taken on forced labour and other violations of labour rights. The CUT-A indicates that the Filadelfia Office does not have staff trained in "building a case" and gathering evidence, or in interviewing potential victims. The CUT-A adds that it does not have information on the outcome of any interventions that have been made, hence the ongoing lack of exemplary penalties.

The Committee notes that, in her report, the United Nations Special Rapporteur observes that, according to information received, cooperatives and ranches generally comply with the national legislation and there have been recent improvements in the level of compliance in the Chaco region. Nevertheless, she remains concerned at cases of forced and slave labour in smaller workplaces and more remote and less accessible ranches, and at labour practices that she views as exploitative (para. 50).

The Committee encourages the Government to intensify its efforts to facilitate the access of indigenous workers to administrative and judicial procedures to report situations of forced labour, taking into account their geographical location, linguistic and cultural situation and educational level. In this regard, the Committee requests the Government to continue taking measures to ensure the presence of inspectors in the most remote areas of the Chaco where indigenous workers are present, and to indicate the current number of inspectors covering the region and their geographical distribution, the number of inspections undertaken, complaints received and administrative and criminal penalties imposed, and the manner in which the Ministry of Labour cooperates with the Office of the Public Prosecutor and the police for the investigation of cases of forced labour. The Committee also requests the Government to indicate the measures taken to protect workers who have reported being the victims of forced labour and in providing them with support and assistance. It also requests it indicate the manner in which the MTESS collaborates with the Paraguay Indigenous Institute for the identification and action to address problems affecting the indigenous peoples of the Chaco which make them vulnerable to situations of forced labour.

3. Article 25. Application of penal sanctions. The Committee previously noted that persons who exact forced labour (debt bondage and other practices involving forced labour) have not been prosecuted or penalized. In the same way as the Conference Committee, the present Committee requested the Government to ensure that the criminal law contains sufficiently specific provisions adapted to national circumstances to enable the competent authorities to initiate criminal proceedings against the perpetrators of these practices. The Government indicates that a preliminary draft Bill has been prepared to criminalize forced labour and that it establishes a sentence of imprisonment of up to five years or a fine for any person "who through force or threats compels another person to perform work or provide a service, irrespective of whether or not it is paid". The preliminary draft text contains a list of aggravating circumstances which carry a sentence of imprisonment of up to ten years. These circumstances include the fact of submitting the victim to a situation of slavery, servitude or degrading conditions that undermine their humanity or the victim being in a seriously defenceless or vulnerable situation. The Committee also notes the adoption of the Tripartite and Interinstitutional Guide on Intervention in Cases of Forced Labour, which contains indicators of forced labour and proposes intervention maps in cases of complaints of forced labour, from both a criminal and a labour perspective. The Guide makes it clear that in cases where there has been no complaint, but it is known that there is a situation of forced labour, the Office of the Public Prosecutor must take action at its own initiative.

The Committee observes that the penalty envisaged when there are no aggravating circumstances, that is a sentence of imprisonment of up to five years or a fine, is not sufficiently dissuasive. Indeed, the Committee has already indicated that "when the envisaged sanction consists of a fine or a very short prison sentence, [...] it does not constitute an effective sanction in light of the seriousness of the violation and the fact that the sanctions need to be dissuasive" (2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, para. 319). While welcoming the preparation of draft legislation criminalizing and penalizing forced labour, the Committee trusts that the Government will take the necessary measures to review the draft legislation to ensure that the exaction of forced labour is punishable by criminal penalties that are really effective and sufficiently dissuasive. The Committee trusts that the draft legislation will be adopted in the very near future and requests the Government to provide information on the awareness-raising and capacity-building activities undertaken to promote knowledge of the legislation and its use by the competent authorities. The Committee also once again requests the Government to provide information on the prosecutions initiated against persons who exact forced labour and their outcome.

Article 2(2)(c). Obligation to work imposed on non-convicted detainees. For several years, the Committee has been emphasizing the need to amend the Act on the prison system (Act No. 210 of 1970), under the terms of which prison labour shall be compulsory for persons subject to security measures in a prison (section 10 in conjunction with section 39). The Committee previously requested the Government to take measures to formally repeal these provisions of the Act. The Committee notes the Government's indication that in 2017 a formal proposal was submitted for the repeal of section 39 of the Prison Act No. 210/70 in order to harmonize it with the provisions of the Convention. This proposal was submitted to the Office of the President of the Republic for referral to the National Congress. The proposal was sent back to the MTESS by the Office of the President accompanied by legal opinion No. AJ/2017/No. 1073 of 16 July 2018, with the recommendation to obtain the legal opinion of the Ministry of Justice concerning the draft text. The Committee urges the Government to continue taking the necessary measures for the prompt approval of the draft legislation repealing section 39 of Act No. 210/70 on the prison system and to provide information in this regard.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee takes note of the information provided by the Government in its 2019 report as well as the supplementary information provided in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020).

The Committee also notes the joint observations of the Autonomous Workers' Confederation of Peru (CATP); the Confederation of Workers of Peru (CTP); the General Confederation of Workers of Peru (CGTP); and the Single Confederation of Workers of Peru (CUT-Perú) transmitted by the Government with its supplementary information.

Articles 1(1) and 2(1) of the Convention. Efforts to combat forced labour. (a) National Plan to combat forced labour (PNLCTF). The Committee previously noted the lack of information provided by the Government on the implementation of the three strategic objectives of the Second National Plan to combat forced labour for 2013–2017 (PNLCTF-II), as well as the observations made by the CATP that the lack of funding had prevented the implementation of actions planned under the PNLCTF-II or the strengthening of the capacities of the National Committee on Combating Forced Labour (CNLCTF) at both national and regional levels, particularly in the regions containing the areas most at risk. The Committee requested the Government to provide full information on any evaluation made on the implementation of the PNLCTF-II as well as on the measures taken to strengthen the capacities of the CNLCTF, while hoping that it would be possible to draw up regional plans for combating forced labour that take account of the specific features of forced labour situations that may exist in the various regions of the country. The Committee notes the Government's statement, in its report, that according to the evaluation made in 2018 by the CNLCTF, with the assistance of the ILO, it was highlighted that the design of the PNLCTF-II, and more particularly the lack of basis values or targets expressed in absolute terms, did not enable any assessment of its results and effectiveness and that involved institutions only reported partly on what had been done. The Government adds however that the implementation of the PNLCTF-II resulted in better knowledge of forced labour, in particular in the Ucayali and Madre de Dios regions where two case studies were conducted with the assistance of the ILO. Moreover, in 2018 several workshops to formulate regional plans to combat trafficking in persons while incorporating actions against forced labour were organized in the Cusco, Loreto, Amazonas, Tumbes and Ica regions. The Committee takes due note of the adoption of the PNLCTF-III for 2019–2021 (Supreme Decree No. 015-2019-TR of 18 September 2019) which sets two specific objectives, namely: (i) to develop an adequate capacity of government institutions to prevent and eliminate forced labour, in particular through specific actions aimed at preventing and detecting forced labour cases, providing assistance to victims of trafficking, sanctioning those perpetrators and restoring victims' rights; and (ii) to reduce public tolerance towards forced labour through capacity-building and awareness-raising activities, in particular among civil servants. The Committee notes that in their joint observations the CATP, CTP, CGTP and CUT-Perú emphasize that the implementation of the PNLCTF-III requires the allocation of adequate resources for the institutions that are part of the CNLCTF. Welcoming the adoption of the PNLCTF-III and noting that it explicitly provides for the development of a monitoring system and annual evaluation reports, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the implementation of the two strategic objectives of the PNLCTF-III and on any evaluation undertaken on the measures taken within this framework. It once again requests the Government to provide information on any measures taken to strengthen the capacities of the CNLCTF at both national and regional levels, as well as on the content and impact of any regional plans for combating forced labour implemented in the various regions of the country, in particular in those containing the areas most at risk.

(b) Diagnosis. The Committee previously noted that, in March 2017, the Ministry of Employment and Employment Promotion (MTPE), the National Institute of Statistics and Information Technology (INEI) and the ILO signed a cooperation agreement aimed at collecting statistical information to discover the true extent of the problem of forced labour in the most vulnerable areas of the country and hoped that such data could be collected quickly. The Committee notes the Government's indication that, in the framework of this cooperation agreement, the INEI will conduct a survey on the prevalence of forced labour in the Cusco region, with the assistance of the ILO, which will provide quantitative statistical information and improve governmental policies and actions. In its supplementary information, the Government indicates that technical meetings were organized, a questionnaire was prepared and pilot testing was carried out in that respect, at the end of 2019. The Government indicates however that as a result of the COVID-19 pandemic these actions have currently been suspended. The Committee notes that, in their joint observations, the CATP, CTP, CGTP and CUT-Perú encourage the Government to conduct the survey in order to generate reliable data to contribute to the improvements of public policy interventions in the different economic sectors. Moreover, the Committee notes that, while the Bridge Project in Peru, which provided ILO technical assistance, ended on 19 October 2019, the ILO plans to continue supporting the Government as well as employers' and workers' organizations in the implementation of the PNLCTF-III, including by conducting the first labour force survey in 2020–21. The Committee trusts that the Government will make every effort to ensure that in the near future quantitative and qualitative data on forced labour is collected, analysed and communicated to the competent authorities to enable better targeting of their actions, appropriate use of human and financial resources and identification of victims of forced labour. It hopes more particularly that the technical assistance of the Office will help the Government to achieve tangible progress in this respect and requests the Government to provide information on the results of any statistical information collected on forced labour, as well as any measures adopted as a result.

(c) Labour inspection. The Committee previously noted that the National Labour Inspection Supervisory Authority (SUNAFIL) had begun a restructuring of the Special Labour Inspection Unit for Combating Forced and Child Labour (GEIT) set up in 2008 in order to strengthen its efficiency and that, in April 2016, the protocol for action on forced labour drafted by SUNAFIL, containing basic guidance to ensure coordinated and effective action by the labour inspection system in relation to the prevention and elimination of forced labour, was adopted. Noting the CATP's observations on the lack of funding faced by the SUNAFIL, the Committee requested the Government to strengthen its efforts to ensure that the GEIT had adequate human and material resources to cover the whole of the national territory quickly and effectively. The Committee takes note of the adoption of Resolution No. 05-2018-SUNAFIL of 10 January 2018 which: (i) establishes a new specialized inspection group to combat forced labour and child labour (GEIT-TFI) which will consist of at least ten inspectors (supervisor, labour inspectors and auxiliary inspectors); and (ii) approves Protocol No. 001-2018- SUNAFIL /INII concerning the actions to be undertaken by the GEIT-TFI, a second version of which was adopted by Resolution No. 152-2019-SUNAFIL of 7 May 2019. According to the protocol for action, the GEIT-TFI is responsible for conducting inspections to monitor and provide guidance on forced labour and child labour; generating information; promoting intergovernmental and multi-sectorial collaboration; participating in training and internship; and suggesting improvements regarding the functioning of SUNAFIL. The Committee also notes that the Protocol for action on forced labour was adopted by Resolution No. 217-2019-SUNAFIL of 9 July 2019 with a view to collecting and using information that will enable the identification of economic sectors or regions in which forced labour exists and ensure the dissemination of information, awareness-raising activities on the protection of fundamental rights at work, as well as capacity-building of the staff of the labour inspectorate on forced labour issues. It notes that the protocol provides for administrative fines to be imposed in case of forced labour situations (paragraph 14.2 of the Protocol). The Committee further notes that the PNCLTF-III provides for specific actions to train inspectors in detecting forced labour situations as well as in order to ensure that a sufficient number of professionals are specialized on this issue and that sufficient equipment, material and logistical resources are made available so that they can carry out their inspection functions more effectively. The Committee notes that, in its supplementary information, the Government indicates that 174 inspection orders on forced labour were issued, 29 infractions were detected and ten penalties in the form of fines were imposed through decisions under administrative disciplinary proceedings. The Committee requests the Government to continue to take measures to strengthen the institutional capacity of SUNAFIL, and more particularly the GEIT-TFI, including by ensuring adequate human and material resources to cover the whole of the national territory quickly and effectively. It further requests the Government to provide information on the impact of any measures taken to that end, in particular within the framework of the PNLCTF-III and Resolution No. 217-2019-SUNAFIL. Given that, as a result of inspections carried out by the GEIT-TFI, workers in situations of forced labour can be identified and released, and the courts can be provided with documents which serve to bring civil and criminal proceedings against the perpetrators of these practices, the Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on the number of inspections conducted, the regions targeted, the nature of violations recorded and the administrative penalties imposed.

Article 25. Application of effective penalties. The Committee previously welcomed the incorporation of the provisions of sections 153-B (''sexual exploitation''), 153-C (''slavery and other forms of exploitation'') and 168-B (''forced labour''), establishing penalties of imprisonment, into the Penal Code. The Committee takes note of the adoption of Act No. 30924 of 29 March 2019, which amends section 168-B of the Penal Code by adding penalties of fines to be imposed on perpetrators of forced labour together with the custodial sentence. The Committee also notes that, in their joint observations, the CATP, CTP, CGTP and CUT-Perú express concern about a legislative proposal (Bill No. 05556/2020 CR) criminalizing ''human exploitation'' that would result in the removal of the offences established in the Penal Code, among which sexual exploitation, forced labour and slavery.

The Committee further notes that, under the inter-institutional cooperation framework agreement signed between the Ministry of Labour and Promotion of Employment and the ILO, on 6 August 2018, several actions are planned for the organization of workshops with the Public Prosecutor's Office, the judiciary and the national police to strengthen their capacity to investigate, process and effectively sanction cases of forced labour. In its supplementary information, the Government refers to several workshops organized in that regard, in collaboration with the ILO, in 2020. The Committee notes that the PNLCTF-III also provides for specific actions to train the national police and prosecutors in the detection of forced labour situations. The Committee encourages the Government to pursue its efforts in this regard and requests it to provide information on the measures adopted, in particular in the framework of the PNLCTF-III and the inter-institutional cooperation framework agreement signed with the ILO, to further strengthen the capacity of law enforcement authorities with a view to ensuring the detection of forced labour, the identification and protection of victims and the investigation and prosecution of all cases of forced labour. It also requests the Government to provide information on investigations conducted, judicial proceedings initiated and penalties imposed pursuant to sections 168-B, 153-B and 153-C of the Penal Code. Lastly, the Committee requests the Government to provide its comments with respect to the observations of the trade union organizations on Bill No. 05556/2020 CR.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 2005)

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020). The Committee proceeded with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the supplementary information received from the Government this year, as well as on the basis of the information at its disposal in 2019.

Articles 1(1), 2(1) and 25 of the Convention. Trafficking in persons. Law enforcement measures and penalties. The Committee previously requested the Government to provide information on the measures taken to strengthen the capacity of law enforcement agencies and the activities undertaken within the framework of the National Strategic Action Plan for 2012–2016.

The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that the Anti-Trafficking Task Forces all over the country have conducted a total of 136 training, capacity-building and seminars on trafficking in persons and other related topics which were attended by a total of 6,593 participants. Some 2,098 came from private sectors and non-government organizations while 4,495 were government personnel. The Committee further notes the Government's indication in its supplementary report that in 2019, the Anti-Trafficking Task Forces conducted training on trafficking in persons for the purpose of labour exploitation for 130 members of government agencies. In addition, the Inter-Agency Council Against Trafficking (IACAT) conducted training on handling trafficking in persons and victim protection.

The Government also indicates in its report of 2019 that the National Bureau of Investigation (NBI) is in the final drafting stage of the creation of the NBI Manual and Standard Operating Procedures for Trafficking in persons and online sexual exploitation of children cases. This aims to improve the efficiency of investigations and operations involving trafficking in persons and online sexual exploitation of children cases. Moreover, in 2018, the NBI conducted 32 operations nationwide causing the arrest of 67 offenders and the rescue of 620 victims, 123 of whom are minors. There were a total of 201 illegal recruitment cases, 75 (37 per cent) of which were filed in Court. The National Police has investigated a total of 300 trafficking in persons cases, which resulted in the rescue of 1,039 victims and the arrest of 498 suspects. The Committee further notes that in 2019, the NBI conducted 55 anti-trafficking operations, resulting in the arrest of 234 offenders, and the rescue of 504 victims. In addition, the national police investigated 153 cases of trafficking in persons, rescued 729 victims and arrested 222 suspects. According to the Government, the establishment of 24 Anti-Trafficking Task Forces in the country with 226 prosecutors significantly contributed to the increase in the prosecution of cases of trafficking in persons. In 2019, the Anti-Trafficking Task Forces comprised 236 prosecutors, enhancing local law enforcement, including in rescue operations, to ensure that cases are reported and filed with the local prosecutor. The Committee notes that in 2018, a total number of 88 persons were convicted, in comparison with 48 in 2017. In 2019, 76 convictions were pronounced for cases of trafficking in persons, with a total of 85 persons convicted.

The Committee notes that a 2017–2021 National Strategic Action Plan against trafficking in persons (Strategic Action Plan) has been adopted. In this regard, the Government indicates in its supplementary report that the Strategic Action Plan details core programmes and planned outcomes by key result areas: (i) prevention and advocacy; (ii) protection, recovery, rehabilitation and reintegration; (iii) prosecution and law enforcement; and (iv) partnership and networking. The IACAT is responsible for monitoring the full implementation, cooperation and coordination of the national anti-trafficking response. As part of the implementation of the Strategic Action Plan, six anti-trafficking task forces were established to intercept the operations of suspected trafficking at points of entry on land, and in airports and seaports, resulting in the interception of six alleged offenders in 2019 and the rescue of 1,002 victims. In addition, an Anti-Trafficking capacity-building module was developed for local government units to strengthen their capacity to provide concrete responses in addressing trafficking in persons. Committees on anti-trafficking and violence against women were created in a large number of provinces, cities and municipalities of the country. In the area of prevention and advocacy, educational and awareness communication materials were developed on specific types of trafficking.

The Committee also observes from the UNICEF 2016 Summary Report on Situation Analysis of Children in the Philippines that domestic and cross-border trafficking of women and children for sexual exploitation continues, with 1,465 victims of trafficking assisted in 2015, and sex tourism reportedly on the rise (page 24). Taking due note of the measures adopted by the Government, the Committee requests it to continue taking measures to strengthen the capacity of law enforcement bodies to combat trafficking in persons and identify victims of trafficking, as well as to provide statistical information on the number of legal proceedings initiated, convictions handed down and penalties imposed. The Committee also requests the Government to continue indicating the measures that have been taken to implement the 2017–2021 National Strategic Action Plan against trafficking in persons, and the results achieved in this regard.

Complicity of law enforcement officials in trafficking activities. The Committee notes the Government's indication in its supplementary report according to which the IACAT applies a zero-tolerance policy towards any form of complicity by government officials in cases of trafficking. Reports of allegations against government officials are therefore thoroughly investigated. In 2019, most allegations of government complicity in cases of trafficking in persons involved illegal activities at the country's entry and exit points. Several measures were taken to combat the involvement of government officials in corrupt practices, including: (i) investigations of alleged trafficking in persons networks at airports, of immigration officials identified as having facilitated trafficking in persons, and of the Regional Consular Office in Cobato where most fraudulent passports were issued; and (ii) the monitoring of personnel at the Bureau of Immigration during inspections of passengers leaving the country.

The Government indicates that five officials were convicted for cases relating to trafficking in persons between 2009 and 2020, including three police officers. All were sentenced to life imprisonment. The Government further indicates that the IACAT is developing a guideline to investigate and resolve corruption cases related to trafficking in persons. The Committee requests the Government to pursue its efforts to ensure that complicit law enforcement officials are subject to thorough investigations and prosecutions, and that appropriate and dissuasive penalties are imposed. It requests the Government to continue providing information on the number of cases registered and prosecuted, as well as the sanctions imposed.

Protection and assistance to victims. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the Department of Social Workers and Development (DSWD) implements the Recovery and Reintegration Program for Trafficked Persons (RRPTP) since 2011. The RRPTP is a comprehensive programme that ensures that adequate recovery and reintegration services are provided to trafficked persons. Utilizing a multi-sectoral approach, it delivers a complete package of services that will enhance the psychosocial, social and economic needs of the victims. It also enhances the awareness, skills and capabilities of the families and the communities where the trafficked persons will eventually return. It also improves community-based systems and mechanisms that ensure the recovery of the victims, and prevents other families and community members from being victims of trafficking. In 2018, according to the DSWD, the RRPTP served and assisted a total of 2,318 identified trafficked persons, of whom 1,732 (75 per cent) are women while 611 (26 per cent) are minors. The Government further indicates in its supplementary report that in 2019, the RRPTP served and assisted 2,041 victims of trafficking. In addition, financial assistance was provided to 27 victims through the Victim Compensation Programme of the Department of Justice in 2019. A total of 291 victim-witnesses also received assistance under the Victim-Witness Coordinator Programme, which is a pilot project aimed at encouraging cooperation during the investigation, prosecution and trial of cases of trafficking in persons. The Government adds that the IACAT Operations Centre (OpCen) serves as a referral centre for victim protection and assistance, including referrals to reintegration services. In 2019, OpCen provided transportation and security assistance to 171 victims of trafficking in persons.

The Government also indicates that in June 2018, a Residential Care Facility for Male Victims of Trafficking in Mindanao was set up in collaboration with the Local Government Unit of Tagum City. It aims to provide services in recovery, rehabilitation and reintegration of trafficked victims. As of 2018, there were 44 residential care facilities available in the country for victims of trafficking: 24 for children; 13 for women; 1 for men; 4 for older persons; and 2 for processing centres. The Committee requests the Government to continue to take measures to ensure that appropriate protection and assistance is provided to victims of trafficking and to provide statistical information on the number of victims who have been identified, as well as those who have benefited from the RRPTP services.

Articles 1(1) and 2(1). Vulnerable situation of migrant workers with regard to the exaction of forced labour. The Committee notes the Government's indication that, the Department of Foreign Affairs, Department of Health, Department of Labor and Employment, Department of Social Welfare and Development, Department of Interior and Local Government, Manila International Airport Authority, Philippine Overseas Employment Administration and Philippine Charity Sweepstakes Office, issued a joint memorandum circular No. 2017-0001 dated 16 June 2017 entitled "Integrated Policy Guidelines and Procedures in the Implementation of the Inter-Agency Medical Repatriation Program (IMRAP) for Overseas Filipinos". This programme aims to establish an integrated system and process flow in medical repatriation among appropriate government agencies and stakeholders. In addition, the Government indicates that the Philippine Overseas Employment Administration (POEA) provides overseas jobseekers with Pre-Employment Orientation Seminar (PEOS) on, for example, legal modes of recruitment, the procedures and documentary requirements when applying for jobs, and the government services available to overseas job applicants and hired workers. For 2018, the POEA conducted community-based PEOS with a total of 30,517 participants, among them 9,935 males, 10,848 females and 9,736 with unspecified sex. The POEA has also entered into partnerships with 50 local government units and one non-government organization and conducted 48 anti-illegal recruitment and anti-trafficking in persons seminar nationwide, with 1,695 male participants and 1,544 female participants. The Committee notes the Government's indication in its supplementary report that prior to the departure of Filipino workers abroad, the Department of Labour and Employment ensures that all workers are properly documented. Pre-departure and post-arrival orientation seminars are also organized.

To address the vulnerability of overseas Filipino workers, particularly female domestic workers, the Government indicates that it has concluded bilateral labour agreements with destination countries and conducts regular dialogue with them to ensure that workers' rights and welfare are protected. In addition, the Philippine overseas labour offices (POLOs) intervened in 40 countries to help workers address issues and concerns related to their working conditions and welfare, including shelter, repatriation assistance and other welfare services. From July 2016 to May 2020, 3,000,506 overseas Filipino workers received on-site assistance from the POLOs. Furthermore, the Government indicates that the overseas Filipino workers command centre (OCC) of the Department of Labour and Employment ensures that all workers' concerns are addressed promptly. The OCC serves as the 24/7 central referral and action centre for all migrant workers' inquiries. The Government states that, from 2018 to 2020, a considerable number of private recruitment agency licences were cancelled due to violations of recruitment laws and regulations, and a number of recruiters were convicted.

Taking due note of the measures adopted by the Government, the Committee requests it to ensure that migrant workers are fully protected from abusive practices and conditions that amount to the exaction of forced labour. The Committee also requests the Government to continue to supply information on the pre-departure services provided for migrant workers, indicating also the number of migrant workers victims of forced labour practices and the assistance received in such cases. Lastly, the Committee requests the Government to indicate the number of recruiters convicted for illegal practices and the penalties imposed in this regard.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020). The Committee proceeded with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the supplementary information received from the Government this year, as well as on the basis of the information at its disposal in 2019.

Article 1(a) of the Convention. Punishment for holding or expressing political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system. In its previous comments, the Committee hoped that the Government would take the necessary measures within the framework of the revision of the Penal Code, to amend sections 142 (inciting to sedition by means of speeches, proclamations, writings or emblems; uttering seditious words or speeches; writing, publishing or circulating scurrilous libels against the Government) and 154 (publishing any false news which may endanger the public order or cause damage to the interest or credit of the State, by means of printing, lithography or any other means of publication) of the Penal Code under which penalties of imprisonment (involving compulsory prison labour) may be imposed.

The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that sections 142 and 154 of the revised Penal Code do not provide for a penalty of forced labour, rather a penalty of "prision correccional" under section 142 and a penalty of "arresto mayor" under section 154. Both penalties range from six months and one day to six years imprisonment. In this connection, the Committee once again observes that sections 142 and 154 of the Revised Penal Code are worded in terms broad enough to lend themselves to be applied as a means of punishment for the peaceful expression of views, enforceable with sanctions involving compulsory prison labour under Chapter 2, section 2, of the Bureau of Corrections manual. The Committee further notes that, in the 2017 Report of the Officer of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights, the Human Rights Committee expressed regret that the Cybercrime Prevention Act of 2012 had criminalized libel over the internet. It urged the State party to consider the decriminalization of defamation (A/HRC/WG.6/27/PHL/2, paragraph 39). The Committee notes the Government's information in its supplementary report according to which the implementing rules and regulations of the Cybercrime Prevention Act provide that libel committed through a computer system or any other similar means is punishable by a prison sentence, a fine, or both. The Committee therefore notes with regret that under section 4(c)(4) of the Cybercrime Prevention Act, libel may be punishable by a prison sentence involving compulsory prison labour. The Committee recalls that Article 1(a) prohibits the use of forced or compulsory labour as a punishment for holding or expressing political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system. It emphasizes that the range of activities which must be protected under this provision, from punishment involving forced or compulsory labour, thus includes the freedom to express political or ideological views (which may be exercised orally or through the press and other communications media (see 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraph 302)). The Committee therefore, urges the Government to take the necessary measures to repeal or amend sections 142 and 154 of the Revised Penal Code, as well as section 4(c)(4) of the Cybercrime Prevention Act in order to ensure that no prison sentence entailing compulsory labour can be imposed on persons who, without using or advocating violence, express certain political views or opposition to the established political, social or economic system.

Article 1(d). Punishment for having participated in strikes. Over a certain number of years, the Committee has been drawing the Government's attention to section 263(g) of the Labor Code under which in the event of a planned or current strike in an industry considered indispensable to the national interest, the Secretary of Labor and Employment may assume jurisdiction over the dispute and settle it or certify it for compulsory arbitration. Furthermore, the President may determine the industries indispensable to the national interest and assume jurisdiction over a labour dispute. The declaration of a strike after such "assumption of jurisdiction" or submission to compulsory arbitration is prohibited (section 264), and participation in an illegal strike is punishable by imprisonment (section 272(a) of the Labor Code), which involves an obligation to perform labour. Furthermore, the Revised Penal Code also provides for sanctions of imprisonment for participation in illegal strikes (section 146). The Committee requested the Government to take the necessary measures to amend the above-mentioned provisions of the Labor Code and the Revised Penal Code so as to ensure their compatibility with the Convention.

The Committee notes the Government's explanation on the absence of a forced labour penalty for participation in an illegal strike under the provisions of the Labour Code. The Committee further notes the Government's information in its supplementary report according to which a House Bill entitled the "Act limiting the power to assume jurisdiction over labour disputes involving essential services by the President of the Philippines" was filed on 24 July 2019 and is pending before the House of Representatives Committee on Labour and Employment. The Bill seeks to limit Government intervention leading to compulsory arbitration to essential services in the strict sense of the term. The Committee points out that pursuant to sections 272(a) and 264 of the Labour Code and 146 of the Penal Code, participation in illegal strikes is punishable with imprisonment from three months to three years, and from six months and one day to six years, respectively, penalty that involves compulsory prison labour under chapter 2, section 2, of the Bureau of Corrections Manual. The Committee further recalls that the Convention prohibits the imposition of compulsory labour, including compulsory prison labour, on persons participating peacefully in a strike. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend the above-mentioned provisions of the Labour Code and the Revised Penal Code so as to ensure that penalties of imprisonment (involving compulsory labour) cannot be imposed for the mere fact of persons peacefully participating in strikes. Pending the adoption of such measures, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on all court decisions issued under the above-mentioned sections of the Penal Code and the Labour Code in order to assess their application in practice, indicating in particular the facts that gave rise to the conviction, and the penalties applied.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Poland

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1958) and Protocol of 2014 (ratification: 2017)

The Committee notes the supplementary information provided by the Government on matters raised in its previous direct request, and otherwise repeats the content of its observation adopted in 2019 which read as follows.

Articles 1(1), 2(1) and 25 of the Convention. Vulnerable situation of migrant workers with regard to the exaction of forced labour. The Committee previously noted the observations of the Independent and Self-Governing Trade Union ("Solidarnosc") that there had been exploitation of citizens of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea (DPRK) for forced labour in Poland. In 2012, there were 509 DPRK workers brought legally to Poland. Reportedly they had to send back to the regime a large part of their legitimate earnings. The Committee also noted that, according to the report of the Special Rapporteur of the United Nations on the situation of human rights in the DPRK, nationals of the DPRK were being sent abroad by their Government to work under conditions that reportedly amount to forced labour, mainly in the mining, logging, textile and construction industries. The workers were forced to work sometimes up to 20 hours per day with only one or two rest days per month and given insufficient daily food rations. They were under constant surveillance by security personnel and their freedom of movement was unduly restricted. Workers' passports were also confiscated by the same security agents.

The Committee noted the Government's statement that, in response to the signals revealed in 2016, the National Labour Inspectorate and the Border Guards carried out monitoring activities covering all entities employing the citizens of the DPRK, and no infringements seemed to relate to forced labour. The Government further indicated that, in 2016 and 2017, no new visas had been issued to DPRK citizens. As of 1 January 2017, there were 400 citizens from DPRK in Poland with valid residence permits. The Committee also noted the Government's information that a number of violations of provisions of the Act on the Promotion of Employment, as well as regulations in the scope of Labour Law were identified, such as the indirect payment of wages and confiscation of identification papers. The Committee requested the Government to strengthen its efforts to ensure that migrant workers, especially those from the DPRK, are fully protected from abusive practices and conditions that amount to the exaction of forced labour.

The Government indicates in its report that it has ceased to issue new temporary residence permits for paid activities to the DPRK nationals. Consequently, section 100, paragraph 1, point 4 of the Act on Foreigners of 2013 and section 88(j), paragraph 2 of the Act on the Promotion of Employment and on Labour Market Institutions have been amended by the Act of 20 July 2017, and have accordingly been supplemented with the provisions providing for an additional reason for refusing temporary residence. The Government further indicates that it is currently implementing the United Nations Security Council Resolution 2397 of 22 December 2017, which allows for the return of the DPRK employees to their own country to be accelerated. The Government has already withdrawn the majority of the temporary residence permits for paid activities issued to the DPRK nationals in Poland. The Government states that, in March 2019, no more than 19 DPRK nationals resided in Poland, so that the number of the DPRK employees in Poland has dropped by approximately 95 per cent.

Furthermore, in recent years, as a result of the alleged infringements of the rights of the DPRK nationals who work in Poland and of the increasing number of foreigners employed in the territory, the frequency of inspections has been increased. The Border Guard Service has applied special monitoring to businesses employing DPRK citizens. The Government indicates that the inspections carried out did not show any indications that the DPRK nationals experienced forced labour. The Government communicates statistical data collected by the Border Guard Service, indicating that in 2018, 12,108 foreigners were found to be working illegally and 155 DPRK nationals were identified during inspections, among which 11 have been illegally employed, namely without valid residence permits or work permits, or without employment contracts or civil law contracts. From 1 January to 31 May 2019, 4,255 foreigners were found to be working illegally and 88 DPRK nationals were identified during inspections, among which 58 have been illegally employed. Additionally, the Committee notes the Government's information that labour inspectors detected a number of irregularities as a result of the inspections carried out in entities hiring foreigners, such as the failure to provide a foreigner with a contract translated into a language comprehensible to the foreigner before signature, or the failure to provide a foreigner with a copy of the work permit. The Border Guard Service also identified cases of non-payment of wages, or only partial payment thereof.

With regard to prevention measures, the Committee notes the Government's indication that the National Labour Inspectorate launched education and information campaigns, intended to raise awareness both among employers hiring foreigners regarding their obligations, and among foreigners working in Poland, regarding their rights. A hotline was made available to foreigners at the National Labour Inspectorate Consultancy Centre in February 2018, in order to increase understanding of the legislation on the employment of foreigners in Poland, in the Ukrainian and Russian languages. Over 3,400 foreigners have so far contacted the experts for advice, including Ukrainians, Belarusians, Georgians, Moldovans and Russians.

The Committee notes that, in its concluding observations of August 2019, the United Nations Committee against Torture reported that, despite the fact that a recent case was opened in Poland, involving 107 nationals of the DPRK, investigations appear to be ineffective and to lack impartiality, particularly with regard to interpreting services and formal proceedings for those investigated. While taking note of the measures taken by the Government, the Committee urges the Government to strengthen its efforts to prevent foreign migrants from falling victim to abusive practices and conditions that amount to the exaction of forced labour and to ensure their access to justice and remedies. The Committee also requests the Government to continue to supply information on the number of identified victims of abusive practices among migrant workers, and on the number of investigations, prosecutions and penalties imposed on the perpetrators.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Qatar

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1998)

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020). The Committee proceeded with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the supplementary information received from the Government (see points (i) to (v) under the national legal framework for migrant workers, and point (i) under access to justice and law enforcement), as well as on the basis of the information at its disposal in 2019.

COVID-19 measures. The Committee appreciates the efforts made by the Government to provide information concerning various measures taken in 2020 in the context of the COVID-19 pandemic, including holding remote sessions of the Labour Dispute Settlement Committee to decide on urgent labour issues and claims by domestic workers; resolving complaints and labour disputes via video conferencing; ensuring that employers pay their workers' wages; and taking legal measures against companies violating the Wage Protection System.

Articles 1(1), 2(1) and 25 of the Convention. Vulnerable situation of migrant workers to conditions of forced labour. Background and context. The Committee previously noted that at the 103rd Session of the International Labour Conference (ILC) in June 2014, 12 delegates to the ILC, under article 26 of the International Labour Organisation (ILO) Constitution filed a complaint against the Government of Qatar relating to the violation of the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29), and the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81). It also noted the discussions which took place at the 104th Session of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards (CAS) in June 2015, concerning the application by Qatar of the Convention. The Committee further noted that at its 331st Session (October–November 2017), the Governing Body decided to close the complaint against the Government of Qatar and support the technical cooperation programme between the Government of Qatar and the ILO and its implementation modalities. The technical cooperation programme is articulated around five pillars, including: improvement in payment of wages; enhanced labour inspection and occupational safety and health (OSH) systems; refinement of the contractual system that replaces the kafala system; improved labour recruitment procedures, increased prevention, protection and prosecution against forced labour; and promotion of the voice of workers.

1. National legal framework for migrant workers. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to provide information on the following issues: (i) the functioning of the sponsorship system (kafala); (ii) the procedure for issuing exit visas; (iii) recruitment fees and contract substitution; (iv) passport confiscation; (v) the late payment and non-payment of wages; and (vi) migrant domestic workers.

(i) Functioning of the sponsorship system (kafala). In its earlier comments, the Committee noted that the recruitment of migrant workers and their employment were governed by Act No. 4 of 2009 regulating the sponsorship system. Under this system, migrant workers who have obtained a visa must have a sponsor (section 180). The law forbids workers to change employer, and the temporary transfer of the sponsorship is only possible if there is a pending lawsuit between the worker and the sponsor. The Committee also took note of Act No. 21 of 2015 which regulates the entry, exit and residence of migrant workers and which entered into force in December 2016. The Committee observed that the main new feature introduced by the Act of 2015 consisted of the fact that workers may change jobs without the employer's consent at the end of a contract of limited duration or after a period of five years if the contract is of unspecified duration (section 21(2)) without the employer's consent; whereas under the Act of 2009, the worker could not return to work in Qatar for two years in case the sponsor refused such transfer. However, it observed that the Act of 2015 did not seem to foresee termination by the expatriate worker before the expiry of the initial contract (that is with a notice period) without approval of the employer nor did it set out reasons and conditions for termination generally, other than in a few very specific cases. The Committee expressed the firm hope that new legislation would remove all the restrictions that prevent migrant workers from terminating their employment relationship in the event of abuse and would enable migrant workers to leave their employment at certain intervals or after having given reasonable notice during the duration of the contract and without the employer's permission.

Regarding the transfer of workers in abusive situations, the Committee notes that Act No. 21 of 2015 allows the Minister of Interior or its representative to approve the temporary transfer of a migrant worker to a new employer in cases involving lawsuits between a worker and his/her current employer, provided that the Ministry of Labour approves the transfer. The Committee notes the statistical information provided by the Government on the number of workers transferred to new employers from December 2016 to January 2019 which reached a total of 339,420 permanent transfers. It notes that the number of transfers based on abuse reached 2,309 in 2019. The Committee notes the Government's reference in its report to Minister of Interior Decree No. 25 of 2019 on the issuance of the executive regulations of Act No. 21 of 2015 regulating the entry, exit and residence of foreign nationals. The Committee further notes in the annual progress reports to the Governing Body on the ILO technical cooperation programme in Qatar (annual progress report) that the programme supported the drafting of amendments to Labour Act No. 14 of 2004 and Act No. 21 of 2015 regulating the entry and exit of expatriates and their residence with regard to termination of employment and the removal of the no-objection certificate so as to eliminate restrictions on workers' freedom of movement to change jobs (GB.337/INS/5 paragraph 18). The Committee notes that amendments to Labour Act No. 14 of 2004 and Act No. 21 of 2015 to eliminate restrictions on workers' freedom of movement to change jobs were approved by the Council of Ministers in September 2019, and referred to the Shura Council for consideration.

The Committee further notes the Government's information in its supplementary report that the legislative amendments of 2020 have dismantled and abolished the kafala system in Qatar. The Committee notes with interest the Government's information that the provisions of Labour Act No.14 of 2004 and Act No. 21 of 2015 concerning the termination of employment contracts and change of employment by workers have been amended by Decree Law No.18 of 2020 and Decree Law No. 19 of 2020, respectively. According to Decree Law No. 18, workers may terminate the employment contract during the probation period to transfer to another employer, provided they notify their current employer, in writing, of their intent to terminate the contract at least one month before the date of termination. This requires the new employer to compensate the current employer a portion of the recruitment fees and the air ticket, provided that the amount does not exceed the equivalent of two months of the worker's basic wage. The law further permits either party to the employment contract, whether fixed-term or permanent, to terminate the employment contract after the probation period, in which case the party wishing to terminate the contract shall notify the other party in writing of their intent to terminate the contract, with a specific notice period of one or two months depending on the number of years of employment. Decree No. 19 further permits expatriate workers to change employer after notifying the Ministry of Administrative Development, Labour and Social Affairs (MADLSA) provided that their residency permit is valid or is within 90 days from the date of expiry, unless it has expired for reasons which are not within their control. The Committee further notes the Government's information that in 2018 there were 8,653 cases involving a change of employer and from September 2019 to August 2020, there were 17,843 such cases. Welcoming these recent legislative developments, the Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the number of employment transfers and termination of employment contracts that have taken place, disaggregated on the basis of contracts of limited duration and contracts of unspecified duration and on the basis of gender and types of work, following the adoption of Decree No. 18 of 2020 and Decree No.19 of 2020. The Committee also requests the Government to indicate when the new employer must compensate the old employer for recruitment and airfare costs.

(ii) Procedure for issuing exit visas. The Committee previously noted that Act No. 4 of 2009 on entry and exit of foreign workers required migrant workers to obtain an exit permit signed by the sponsor in order to leave the country. It subsequently noted the adoption of Act No. 21 of 2015 on entry and exit of foreign workers which removed the obligation to have the exit permit signed by the sponsor to leave the country. Act No. 21 nevertheless provided that the employer may object to the departure from the country of the expatriate worker in which case the latter had the right to appeal to an Appeals Committee (section 7(2) and (3)). The Committee further observed that the Law did not enumerate the specific grounds on which the employer may object to the departure of the migrant worker from the country. The Committee requested the Government to take the necessary measures to remove the obstacles that limit the freedom of movement of migrant workers.

The Committee notes with satisfaction the adoption of Act No. 13 of 2018 which amends section 7 of Act No. 21 and suppresses the exit permit requirement for migrant workers covered by Labour Act No. 14 of 2004. The Committee notes, however, that this new Act specifies that employers may submit for approval to the MADLSA a list of workers for whom a "no-objection" certificate would still be required, with a justification based on the nature of their work. Positions in which exit permits may be required are limited to the following highly skilled workers: chief executive officers, finance officers, managers responsible for the oversight of the company's day-to-day operations and directors of ICT. The number of these workers per company shall not exceed 5 per cent of their workforce. As of May 2019, the number of companies that requested an exception up to a maximum of 5 per cent of the workforce was 12,430 companies, while the number of workers was 38,038. Given that Act No. 13 does not cover categories of workers outside of the scope of the Labour Act, the Committee notes that a Ministerial Decision is to be adopted before the end of 2019 to suppress the exit permit for all workers not covered by the Labour Act, notably domestic workers, workers in government and public institutions, workers employed at sea and in agriculture, as well as casual workers.

The Committee notes the Government's information in its supplementary report that Ministerial Decree No. 95 of 2019, which provides for broadening the scope of exit visas for workers who are not covered by the Labour Act and which abolishes the "no-objection" certificate requirement for workers to change their employer, has been adopted. It notes with satisfaction that Decree No. 95 of 2019 abolishes the exit permit requirement for migrants working in ministries; government bodies, public institutions and organizations; workers in the oil and gas sector and on the maritime vessels of affiliated companies; workers in agriculture and grazing, workers in private offices, and domestic workers. These categories of workers are entitled to leave temporarily or depart the country definitively during the validity of their employment contract. In the case of domestic workers, workers have to inform the employer at least 72 hours in advance of their intent to leave.

The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the application in practice of Ministerial Decree No. 95 of 2019, indicating the number and category of workers, disaggregated by gender and types of work, to whom exit visas are granted without requiring a "no-objection" certificate from the employer.

(iii) Recruitment fees and contract substitution. The Committee previously encouraged the Government to ensure that recruitment fees are not charged to migrant workers. It also requested the Government to ensure that contracts signed in sending countries are not altered in Qatar. The Committee notes the Government's indication that amendments to section 33 of Labour Act No. 14 of 2004 provide that: "A licensee shall be prohibited from recruiting workers from abroad on behalf of third parties and from receiving any money for recruiting workers in the form of payment, recruitment fees or other costs". The Government underlines that this provision has been added to the basic contracts signed by all migrant workers in order to clarify to employers and workers that the Qatari law prohibits employers from imposing any recruitment fees. The Committee further notes that the work of recruitment agencies is regulated by Ministerial Decree No. 8 of 2005 which ensures that recruitment is carried out by licensed companies and respects all workers' rights. There are currently 349 recruitment agencies that have a valid license under this system. Moreover, Decree No. 8 holds recruitment agencies in the country responsible for selecting recruitment agencies in the country of origin that comply with the law. To this end, 36 bilateral agreements and 13 memoranda of understanding have been signed with workers' countries of origin in order to provide legal protection for them prior to their employment. According to the Government, the MADLSA follows up on the work of the labour recruitment offices acting on behalf of a third party to recruit workers and inspects them periodically or without prior notice. The Government states that in 2019, 337 inspection visits have been carried out and four warnings have been issued. In addition, from January to 17 September 2020, 414 inspections were conducted, during which 36 warnings were issued, advice and guidance was provided in seven cases, and three reports were filed.

The Committee also takes note of the establishment of the electronic contract models for migrant workers including migrant domestic workers. According to the Government, in 2018, the total number of electronic contracts approved by the MADLSA covered 389,810 workers registered in the system of electronic contract. Furthermore, the Committee notes the establishment of the Qatar Visa Centre in the labour-sending countries in which fingerprint and medical screening procedures are carried out before the worker arrives in Qatar and the contract is signed electronically. The signing of the contract electronically by a worker allows him/her to read the contract in his/her native language, giving him/her a better chance to understand the contract and negotiate its terms if he/she is not satisfied with any of the terms included therein. The Committee notes that Visa Centres were opened in six labour-sending countries – Sri Lanka, Bangladesh, Pakistan, Nepal, India and the Philippines, with future plans to open Centres in Tunisia, Kenya and Ethiopia. All the services provided by the Centres are free and performed electronically, while the cost is borne by employers and paid through a bank transfer. Additionally, the Committee notes that in line with the ILO General Principles and Operational Guidelines for Fair Recruitment, a "Fair Employment Programme" is being implemented with the Government of Bangladesh, as a pilot project in the construction sector. The Committee requests the Government to continue to take measures to ensure that recruitment fees are not charged to workers, and to provide information on violations detected in this regard. Considering the establishment of the electronic contract system to be an important initiative which can contribute to reducing contract substitution, the Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the number of workers, including domestic workers registered in the electronic contract system.

(iv) Passport confiscation, late payment and non-payment of wages. The Committee notes that section 8(3) of Act No. 21 of 2015 prohibits passport confiscation and any person who violates this provision shall be sentenced to a maximum fine of 25,000 Qatari riyals (QAR) (US$6,800). According to the Government, the residency permit is now issued in a separate document and not included in passports. Ministerial Decree No. 18 of 2014 specifies the requirements and specifications of suitable accommodation for migrant workers, in a manner which enables migrant workers to keep their documents and personal belongings, including their passports. Surveys conducted in 2017 and 2018 by Qatar University's Social and Economic Survey Research Institute (SESRI) showed that passport retention became less common among entities covered by the Labour Act.

Regarding the implementation of the wage protection system (WPS), the Government indicates that the number of companies registered in the WPS was 80,913 and the percentage of workers whose salaries were transferred on time to their bank accounts increased to 92.3 per cent while the percentage of unpaid workers was at 7.7 per cent. The Committee further notes the Government's information that currently 1,660,000 workers are registered in the WPS. The Government indicates that in January 2020, the WPS unit imposed a ban on 588 companies and later, in the wake of the complete closure and restrictions due to the COVID-19 pandemic, more companies were detected in breach of the WPS and further bans were imposed on 8,756 companies. Moreover, under Decree Law No.18 of 2020, sections 144 and 145 of the Labour Act were amended to include tougher penalties for violating the WPS concerning any delay in the payment of wages or dues to the worker or failure to pay the wages to the worker before their annual leave.

The Committee notes with interest the establishment of the "Workers' Support and Insurance Fund" which aims to guarantee the payment of workers' entitlements that are determined by Labour Disputes Settlement Committees in the event of a company's insolvency and if it is unable to pay wages in order to avoid actions that may take time and affect the ability of workers to fulfil their obligations towards their families or others. The Fund also aims to facilitate the procedures for return of migrant workers, including domestic workers to their country of origin. The Fund is currently working on a pilot and partial basis, and final regulations will be adopted with a view to ensuring the Fund's full operation by the end of 2019.

The Committee further notes the Government's information that the Worker's Support and Insurance Fund formed pursuant to Ministerial Decision No. 3 of 2019 is fully operational. The Decree allocates a sum equivalent to 60 per cent of the fees collected for workers' permits to ensure diverse and adequate resources for paying the workers' dues and providing them with support. The Government indicates that since its inception, the Fund has dispersed QAR13,917,484 (USD$3,823,484) as financial relief to 5,744 workers. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the work done by the Workers' Support and Insurance Fund in terms of enabling migrant workers to recover their entitlements. It also requests the Government to continue to provide information on the implementation of the WPS and the application in practice of sections 144 and 145 of the Labour Act, as amended by Decree No. 18 of 2020, including the penalties applied for the delay or non-payment of wages or dues to workers.

(v) Migrant domestic workers. In its previous comments, the Committee expressed the firm hope that the draft Bill on Domestic Workers will be adopted.

The Committee notes with interest the adoption of Act No. 15 of 2017 on migrant domestic workers as well as the model contract approved by the MADLSA in September 2017. It notes that migrant domestic workers shall be entitled to: a paid probationary period (section 6); a monthly wage paid at the end of the month (section 8); maximum hours of work not exceeding ten hours a day (section 12); and a paid weekly rest holiday that is not less than 24 consecutive hours (section 13). The Committee further notes that migrant domestic workers can terminate their employment contract before the end of its duration in a number of cases, including: (i) failure of the employers to meet their obligations specified in the provisions of this Act; (ii) provision of misleading information during the conclusion of the employment contract; (iii) physical violence from the employers or a member of their families; and (iv) in the event of a serious danger which threatens a worker's safety or health, provided that an employer was cognizant of the danger.

The Committee also notes the statistical information provided by the Government on the number of convictions and fines imposed on employers of female domestic workers in 2018. It notes that 16 cases of violence were reported followed by 12 convictions of an average of one month of imprisonment. The Committee further notes that from January to August 2020, a total of 159 complaints by domestic workers against employers were received, of which 55 cases were resolved, 80 cases are being processed, 22 cases have been referred to the court and two cases have been filed for further investigation. According to the Government, the MADLSA and the ILO will issue two manuals for domestic workers and employers of domestic workers, based on the projects of related organizations and the Migrant-Rights NGO. The Handbook on Domestic Workers will be printed in several languages and will provide information on the main provisions of Act No. 15 of 2017. The Handbook for Employers will be printed in Arabic and English and will also provide information based on the rights and responsibilities of employers as provided for in Act No. 15 of 2017. These manuals will be launched as part of a wider public awareness campaign on the rights and responsibilities of domestic workers and their employers in Qatar. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the application in practice of Act No. 15 of 2017, indicating the number and nature of complaints filed by migrant domestic workers and the outcome of such complaints, including the penalties applied.

2. Access to justice and law enforcement. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to provide information on: (i) access to the complaints mechanism; and (ii) monitoring mechanisms for infringements of the labour legislation and imposition of penalties.

(i) Access to the complaints mechanism. The Committee notes the Government's indication that access to the complaints mechanism is free of charge and the related devices are available in 11 languages. The Committee further notes the establishment of the Labour Disputes Settlement Committees (Cabinet Resolution No. 6 of 2018) mandated to take decisions within a period not exceeding three weeks in all disputes related to the provisions of the law or the work contract. According to the Government, each worker or employer must submit, in case a dispute arises between them, the case first to the competent department of the Ministry (Labour Relations Department), which takes the necessary measures to settle the dispute amicably. The agreement is documented in the minutes of the dispute settlement meetings and has an executory force. If the dispute is not settled or the worker or employer refuse the settlement of the competent department, the dispute shall be referred to the Labour Disputes Settlement Committee. The decision of the Labour Disputes Settlement Committee may be appealed within 15 days from the issuance of the decision (if in presence of parties), or as of the day following the issuance of the decision (if its decision was in absentia), and the competent Court of Appeal shall consider the appeal rapidly, and take its decision within thirty days as of the date of its first hearing. The Committee further notes that a Protocol was agreed upon between the MADLSA and the ILO which allows workers to submit complaints using the facilitation of the ILO Office in Doha. It also notes that, based on that Protocol, the ILO has lodged 72 complaints for 1,870 workers, resulting in the conclusion of 43 cases (1,700 workers). The remaining cases are either on appeal, pending the outcome of criminal cases, or in process (GB.337/INS/5 paragraph 46). In 2018, the total number of workers submitting a complaint reached 49,894 and were mainly cases related to the late payment of wages, travel tickets, end of service bonus and leave allowance. Out of these complaints, 5,045 cases were referred to the Labour Disputes Settlement Committees and 93 cases were settled. In addition, from January 2019 to August 2020, a total of 24,351 workers submitted complaints, of which 1,810 were closed, 7,242 were referred to the Labour Disputes Settlement Committee, and 469 are under consideration. According to the Government's report, wage arrears, non-payment for overtime work and the non-reimbursement to the worker of deductions, are some of the most frequent causes of complaints by workers, in addition to the above-mentioned causes. Moreover, the Government indicates that in June 2020, the MADLSA opened an office at its headquarters to implement the rulings of the Supreme Judicial Council, and facilitate and ensure the prompt completion of judicial transactions for workers. The Committee encourages the Government to pursue its efforts to facilitate access of migrant workers to the Labour Disputes Settlement Committees. It requests the Government to continue providing statistical information on the number of migrant workers who have had recourse to these Committees, the number and nature of the complaints as well as their outcome.

(ii) Monitoring mechanisms on the infringement of labour legislation and imposition of penalties. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the number of labour inspectors reached 270 dedicated to migrant worker-related issues. In this regard, the Committee refers the Government to its detailed comments under the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81).

Regarding the applicable penalties, the Committee notes the Government's indication that section 322 of the Penal Code No. 11 of 2004 stipulates that: "Whoever forcibly obliges somebody to work with or without a salary shall be liable to imprisonment of a term of up to six months and a fine not exceeding QAR3,000 (US$826), or one of these two penalties". The number of criminal reports issued because of non-payment of wages during 2018, which were referred to the courts by the Office of Residence Affairs, reached 1,164 cases.

During 2015, the Human Rights Department of the Ministry of Interior received 168 complaints related to passport retention, all of which were referred to the Public Prosecution. The majority of the complaints have been investigated, and the persons found to be in violation were forced to return the passports, and several arrest warrants were issued. In addition, 232 cases of passport confiscation were referred to the Public Prosecution in 2016 and 169 cases were referred to the Public Prosecution in 2017. In 2018, two cases of passport confiscation were reported and the average fine ranging from QAR5,000 to QAR20,000 (US$1,300 to US$5,000) was imposed on the two defendants. The Committee observes, however, that the penalties imposed consist only of fines. The Committee reminds the Government that, by virtue of Article 25 of the Convention, the exaction of forced or compulsory labour shall be punishable as a penal offence, and the penalties imposed by law shall be really adequate and are strictly enforced. Underlining once again the importance of effective and dissuasive penalties being applied in practice to those who impose forced labour practices, the Committee urges the Government to ensure that thorough investigations and prosecutions of those suspected of exploitation are carried out and that in accordance with Article 25 of the Convention, effective and dissuasive penalties are actually applied to persons who impose forced labour on migrant workers, especially the most vulnerable migrant workers. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the judicial proceedings instigated as well as the number of judgments handed down in this regard. It also requests the Government to provide concrete information on the actual penalties applied, indicating the number of cases in which fines were imposed, the number of cases in which sentences of imprisonment were imposed as well as the time served.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Republic of Moldova

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1993)

Article 1(a) of the Convention. Sanctions for expressing political views. The Committee previously noted that section 346 of the Criminal Code provides for sanctions of imprisonment for a term of up to three years (involving an obligation to perform labour) for "inflaming of the national, racial or religious enmity". The Committee noted that the above provision of the Criminal Code provides for penal sanctions involving compulsory labour in circumstances defined in terms which are broad enough to give rise to questions about their application in practice. The Committee requested the Government to provide information on the application in practice of the above section of the Criminal Code.

The Committee notes with regret an absence of information on this point in the Government's report. The Committee therefore reiterates its request to the Government to provide information on the application in practice of section 346 of the Criminal Code, with an indication of whether any court rulings have been handed down under this section, the penalties imposed and a description of the acts giving rise to such rulings.

Article 1(b). Mobilizing of labour for purposes of economic development. For a number of years, the Committee has been drawing the Government's attention to the incompatibility with the Convention of certain provisions of the Act on mobilization, No. 1192-XV of 4 July 2002, the Act on the requisitioning of goods and services in the public interest, No. 1352-XV of 11 October 2002, and the Government decision to approve regulations on mobilization at the workplace, No. 751 of 24 June 2003, under which the central and local authorities, as well as military bodies can exact compulsory labour from the population under certain conditions as a means of mobilizing and using labour for purposes of the development of the national economy.

The Committee notes with regret that the Government does not provide information on any progress made in the amendment of the relevant legislation. The Committee, once again, firmly hope that the necessary measures will be taken to amend the above provisions of the Act on mobilization, No. 1192-XV of 4 July 2002, the Act on the requisitioning of goods and services in the public interest, No. 1352-XV of 11 October 2002, and the Government decision to approve the regulations on mobilization at the workplace, No. 751 of 24 June 2003, in order to bring them into conformity with the Convention. It further requests the Government to provide information on the progress made in this regard.

Article 1(c). Sanctions for violations of labour discipline. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, under section 329 of the Criminal Code, the non-performance or improper performance by an official of his/her duties as the result of a negligent attitude, causing substantial harm to legitimate rights and interests of persons or organizations, or to public interests, is punishable by deprivation of freedom for a term of up to three years (which involves compulsory prison labour). The Committee requested the Government to provide information on the application in practice of the above section of the Criminal Code.

The Committee notes with regret an absence of information on this point in the Government's report. The Committee therefore reiterates its request to the Government to provide information on the application in practice of section 329 of the Criminal Code, in order to enable it to ascertain whether this provision is not used as a means of labour discipline within the meaning of the Convention. It further requests the Government to indicate whether any court rulings have been handed down under section 329 of the Criminal Code, the penalties imposed and a description of the acts giving rise to such rulings.

Communication of legislation. The Committee reiterates its request to the Government to communicate a copy of the regulations governing service on board seagoing vessels, to which reference is made in section 58 of the Merchant Shipping Code, as well as any other provisions governing labour discipline in merchant shipping.

Russian Federation

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1956) and Protocol of 2014 (ratification: 2019)

The Committee notes the observations of the Confederation of Labour of Russia (KTR), received on 30 September 2019.

Articles 1(2) and 2(1) of the Convention. Vulnerable situation of migrant workers to the exaction of forced labour. The Committee notes that, according to the observations of the Confederation of Labour of Russia, migrant workers are at increased risk of falling into forced labour. For example, forced labour practices occurred in grocery stores in a district of Moscow, with victims from Uzbekistan, Kazakhstan and Tajikistan, mostly women, who were subjected not only to labour exploitation but also to sexual exploitation and abuse. The KTR indicates that no action has been taken by law enforcement agencies to put an end to such practices. As a result, two victims filed a complaint with the European Court of Human Rights in 2016. The Committee requests the Government to respond to the observations of the KTR in this regard.

Article 2(2)(c). Prison labour. In its earlier comments, the Committee noted that section 103 of the Code on the Execution of Penal Sentences provides that convicted persons are under an obligation to perform labour, such labour being exacted from them by the administration of penitentiary institutions at enterprises of such institutions, at state enterprises, or at enterprises of other forms of ownership. The Committee also noted that pursuant to section 21 of Act No. 5473-I (21 July 1993) on the institutions and bodies for the execution of penal sentences involving deprivation of freedom, compulsory labour may be exacted from convicted prisoners at enterprises of any organizational or legal form, even if such enterprises do not belong to the system of the execution of penal sentences and are located outside of penitentiary institutions. In the latter case, compulsory labour will be exacted on the basis of a contract concluded between the administration of penitentiary institutions and the enterprises concerned. Regarding the conditions of work of convicted prisoners, the Committee noted that, under sections 103–105 of the Code on the Execution of Penal Sentences, their hours of work and rest periods, occupational safety and health, as well as remuneration are governed by the general labour legislation. In this regard, the Committee observed that while prisoners' conditions of work may therefore be considered as approximating those of a free labour relationship, the legislation does not require the free, informed and formal consent of prisoners to work for private enterprises.

The Committee notes that, according to the observations of the KTR, recent changes in Russian legislation, introduced by Federal Act No. 179-FZ of 18 July 2019 on amendments to the Penal Enforcement Code of the Russian Federation, allow the establishment of branches of correctional centres at enterprises and large construction sites. The Committee notes the absence, in the Government's report, of new information regarding the consent of prisoners to work for private enterprises. It once again recalls that Article 2(2)(c) of the Convention strictly prohibits prisoners from being hired to or placed at the disposal of private enterprises. The work of prisoners for private companies is only compatible with the Convention where it does not involve compulsory labour, which requires the formal, freely given and informed consent of the persons concerned. Noting that the legislation allows work to be carried out by prisoners for private enterprises, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that this work is only permitted with the voluntary consent of the prisoners concerned, such consent being formal, informed and free from the menace of any penalty, including the loss of rights or privileges. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the number of prisoners working for private enterprises and the nature of those enterprises, as well as on the procedures established to obtain their free and informed consent to undertake such work. It also requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken or envisaged in this regard.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1998)

The Committee notes the observations of the Confederation of Labour of Russia (KTR) received on 30 September 2019.

Article 1(a) of the Convention. Sanctions involving compulsory labour as a punishment for expressing political or ideological views. 1. Act of 24 July 2007 on combating extremism. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the adoption of the Act of 24 July 2007 to amend certain legal acts with a view to increasing liability for "extremist activities", which includes acts based on racial, national or religious hatred or enmity. It noted that under sections 280, 282.1 and 282.2 of the Penal Code, the following acts are punishable with sanctions involving compulsory labour: public appeal to perform extremist activities; establishment of an extremist group or organization; and participation in such a group or organization prohibited by a court decision. The Government stated that, in imposing punishment, the court shall take into consideration the nature or degree or social danger of the crime and the personality of the convict, including any mitigating or aggravating circumstances, and also the influence of the imposed penalty on the rehabilitation of the convicted person. Moreover, the list of penalties established under section 280 allows courts to impose alternative penalties to deprivation of liberty, such as fines. The Government further indicated that most penalties imposed were fines and that deprivation of liberty only concerned four persons. However, the United Nations Human Rights Committee expressed concern that the vague and open-ended definition of "extremist activity" in the Federal Act on combating extremist activity does not require an element of violence or hatred to be present and that no clear and precise criteria on how materials may be classified as extremist are provided in the Act.

The Committee notes that, according to the observations of the KTR, the definition of "extremism" provided for by section 1 of Federal Act No. 114-FZ is so broad that public expression of political views as well as ideological beliefs opposite to the established political, social or economic system may also fall under this definition.

The Committee notes the Government's repeated indication that Federal Act No. 114-FZ, which enshrines the concepts of "extremist activities", "extremist organizations" and "extremist materials", determines the targets of action to combat extremist activities and governs procedures for preventing extremism. The Government also refers to Federal Act No. 519-FZ of 27 December 2018 on amendments to section 282 of the Penal Code (incitation of hatred or enmity and abasement of human dignity), according to which, only persons who have already incurred administrative liability for a similar act within one year are criminally punishable. The Government indicates that the Plenum of the Supreme Court, in paragraph 7 of its Decision No. 11 of 28 June 2011 on judicial practice in criminal cases on offences of an extremist nature, states that the phrase "acts intended to incite hatred or enmity" should be understood as, in particular, statements that justify and/or affirm the need for genocide, mass repressions, deportations and the commission of other unlawful acts, including the use of violence against representatives of any nation or race, or followers of any religion. Criticism of political organizations, ideological or religious associations, political, ideological or religious beliefs, national or religious customs in and of itself must not be considered acts intended to incite hatred or enmity. Moreover, according to statistical information from the judicial department of the Supreme Court, since 2017, the deprivation of liberty has been applied twice to persons convicted under section 280.2 of the Penal Code. Under section 280, the punishments imposed were primarily in the form of a fine. The Committee requests the Government to continue to ensure that no sentence entailing compulsory labour can be imposed on persons, who, without using or advocating violence, express certain political views or opposition to the established political, social or economic system. It also requests the Government to continue to provide information on the application of the laws on extremism in practice, including on any prosecutions and sentences pursuant to sections 280, 282.1 and 282.2 of the Penal Code and the Act of 2007 on combating extremism.

2. Federal Act No. 65-FZ of 8 June 2012 amending Federal Act No. 54 FZ of 9 June 2004 on assemblies, meetings, demonstrations, marches and picketing and the Code on Administrative Offences. The Committee previously noted the restrictions introduced in Federal Act No. 65-FZ of 8 June 2012 (Assemblies Act) amending Federal Act No. 54-FZ of 19 June 2004 on assemblies, meetings, demonstrations, marches and picketing and the Code on Administrative Offences. As amended, section 20.2 of the Code on Administrative Offences establishes a penalty of community work for a period of up to 50 hours for the organizing or holding of a public event without submitting notice thereof under the established procedures. Section 20.18 establishes administrative arrest for a term up to 15 years for the organization of the blocking, as well as active participation in the blocking, of transport lines. The Committee also noted that the HRC expressed concern about consistent reports of arbitrary restrictions on the exercise of freedom of peaceful assembly, including arbitrary detentions and prison sentences for the expression of political views. The HRC was further concerned about the strong deterrent effect on the right to peaceful assembly of these new restrictions introduced in the Assemblies Act. In this regard, the Committee also noted the comments made by the European Commission for Democracy through Law (Venice Commission) on this matter in 2013.

The Committee notes with regret the absence of information in the Government's report. The Committee once again requests the Government to specify the manner in which the sentenced person consents to community work. It also once again requests the Government to provide information on the application in practice of sections 20.2 and 20.18 of the Code on Administrative Offences, indicating the number of prosecutions, sanctions imposed and grounds for prosecution.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Rwanda

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1962)

The Committee notes with concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments.

Article 1(a) of the Convention. Prison sentences involving compulsory labour imposed as a punishment for expressing political views. The Committee previously noted that, according to section 50(8) of Law No. 34/2010 of 12 November 2010 on the establishment, functioning and organization of Rwanda Correctional Service, an incarcerated person has the main obligation, inter alia, to perform activities for the development of the country, himself/herself and the prison. The Committee further took note of the Report of the UN Special Rapporteur on the rights to freedom of peaceful assembly and of association who conducted an official visit to Rwanda in January 2014 (A/HRC/26/29/Add.2). The Special Rapporteur noted with concern the Government's prevailing hostility towards peaceful initiatives by its critics and the existence of a legal framework that silences dissent. In this regard, the Special Rapporteur referred to several provisions of the Penal Code which provide for sanctions of imprisonment for persons expressing political views (sections 116, 136, 451, 462, 463, 468 and 469 of the Penal Code). Noting that any reference made to compulsory prison labour had been removed from the Penal Code, the Committee requested the Government to provide information on the measures taken in order to harmonize the Code of Penal Procedure with the Penal Code. The Committee also requested the Government to provide a copy of the draft Ministerial Order on the nature of income-generating activities which can be performed by prisoners.

The Committee notes the Government's information in its report that Law No. 30/2013 of 24 May 2013 relating to the Code of Penal Procedure has removed the reference to compulsory prison labour. However, the Committee notes that section 50(8) of Law No. 34/2010 remains valid, under which an incarcerated person can be obliged to work for the development of the country, himself/herself and the prison. The Government also considers sections 116, 136, 451, 462, 463, 468 and 469 of the Penal Code as compatible with the Convention without providing further explanation, and indicates that there are no court decisions in this regard. However, the Committee notes that the UN Human Rights Committee expressed its concern in its concluding observations on the fourth periodic report of Rwanda of 2 May 2016, at the prosecution of opposition politicians, journalists and human rights defenders as a means of discouraging them from freely expressing their opinions (CCPR/C/RWA/CO/4, paragraphs 39 and 40).

The Committee once again recalls that Article 1(a) of the Convention prohibits the use of compulsory labour, including compulsory prison labour, as a punishment for peacefully holding or expressing political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system. It once again draws the attention of the Government to the fact that the above-mentioned sections of the Penal Code are worded in terms broad enough to lend themselves to the application as a means of punishment for peacefully expressing political views and, in so far as they are enforceable with sanctions of imprisonment which involve compulsory labour, they may fall within the scope of the Convention. The Committee further notes that the draft Ministerial Order on the nature of income-generating activities which can be performed by prisoners is not attached as indicated in the Government's report. The Committee therefore requests the Government to ensure that no penal sanctions involving compulsory prison labour may be imposed on persons for peacefully expressing political views, for example, by amending section 50(8) of Law No. 34/2010 following the adoption of Law No. 30/2013. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the application of sections 116, 136, 451, 462, 463, 468 and 469 of the Penal Code in practice, including any legal proceedings defining or illustrating their scope. The Committee finally once again requests the Government to provide a copy of the draft Ministerial Order on the nature of income-generating activities which can be performed by prisoners.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Saudi Arabia

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1978)

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020). The Committee proceeded with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the supplementary information received from the Government this year, as well as on the basis of the information at its disposal in 2019.

Articles 1(1) and 2(1) of the Convention. Vulnerable situation of migrant workers to the exaction of forced labour. 1. Migrant workers. The Committee previously noted the observations of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) that many migrant workers in the construction industry were subject to forced labour practices such as delayed payment of wages, passport confiscation and contract substitution. The Committee requested the Government to take the necessary measures to enable migrant workers to approach the competent authorities and seek redress; provide statistical information on the number of violations of the working conditions of migrant workers, and to indicate the penalties applied for such violations. It also requested the Government to indicate the measures taken to ensure that migrant workers who are victims of abuse receive appropriate assistance.

The Committee notes the Government's reference in its report to a number of implementing Regulations of the Labour Code that cover all workers, whether national or foreign workers. These include Regulation No. 70273 of 20 December 2018, which provides that the employer shall not retain the passport, residence permit or medical insurance card of a non-Saudi Arabian worker (section 6). Moreover, Decision No. 178743 of 31 May 2019, provides that an employer who forces a worker to work shall be liable to a fine of 15,000 Saudi riyals (SAR) (US$4,000) for each worker concerned. An employer who retains the passport, residence permit or health insurance card of a worker and members of his family shall be liable to a fine of SAR5,000 (US$1,300) for each worker concerned. Lastly, Decision No. 156309 of 24 April 2019 on the Contract Registration Programme enables employers to access and update information on the employment contracts of private sector workers. This programme also allows workers to check the data in their contracts via the online services of the Social Insurance institution, which requires establishments to implement Decision No. 156309 in accordance with a specific schedule determined by the size of the establishment. Regarding the measures taken to enable migrant workers to approach the competent authorities, the Government also indicates that the Ministry of Labour set-up a hotline for labour issues, launched a labour advisory service, and established departments for the amicable settlement of labour disputes in labour offices to receive complaints as a procedure prior to filing a labour claim. The hotline responded to 1,601,258 communications in 2018. According to the Government, the Public Security agencies are the bodies in charge of receiving complaints and reports of offences. Moreover, the Public Prosecutor is competent to investigate offences and to decide whether to institute proceedings or close a case in accordance with the regulations and to bring prosecutions before the judicial authorities in accordance with the regulations, within the scope of its competence. The Committee further notes the Government's supplementary information that support and protection departments and units, established within the Ministry of Human Resources and Social Development in different regions of the country, are responsible for monitoring recruitment agencies, providing services to workers, and receiving complaints from workers and embassies.

The Government also refers to a number of regulatory adjustments, including the insertion of new sections Nos 234 and 235 to the Labour Code providing for procedures for the expeditious settlement of labour disputes. The Committee notes that the total number of violations recorded during the first quarter of 2019 was 85,538, including 12,585 cases of failure by the employer to provide health care and treatment, 4,625 cases of workers being employed without a written employment contract, and 812 cases of non-payment of wages. For cases of non-payment of wages a fine was applied ranging from SAR10,000 to SAR5,000 (US$2,600–1,300). The Government adds that from 30 August 2019 to 30 June 2020, 57,337 violations were detected, including 11,217 cases of failure by the employer to provide health care and treatment, 6,676 cases of non-payment or late payment of wages or payment in a currency other than the official currency and 2,100 cases of workers being employed without a written employment contract. The Government finally states that 12 shelters have been established, providing psychological, legal and labour-related services to beneficiaries, staffed by 120 employees including psychologists. With regard to medical services, public sector workers are covered under the mandatory health insurance system. The Committee urges the Government to continue to strengthen its legal and institutional framework to ensure that, in practice, migrant workers are not exposed to practices that might increase their vulnerability to practices amounting to forced labour, including passport retention and non-payment of wages. The Committee also requests the Government to strengthen the capacity of the labour inspectors and law enforcement bodies to allow better identification and monitoring of the working conditions of migrant workers, and to ensure that penalties are effectively applied for any violations detected. It further requests the Government to continue to provide statistical information on the number and nature of violations of the working conditions of migrant workers that have been recently detected and registered by the labour inspectors, and to indicate the penalties applied for such violations, including in the event of abusive practices by recruitment agencies. Lastly, the Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on the measures taken to ensure that migrant workers who are victims of abuse receive psychological, social, medical and legal assistance as well as the number of persons benefiting from this assistance.

2. Migrant domestic workers. The Committee previously noted the ITUC's observations that, although covered by Ministerial Decision No. 310 of 2013, migrant domestic workers do not enjoy the same rights as other workers in Saudi Arabia. For example, daily working time is 15 hours under the Regulation, whereas working time for other workers is limited to eight hours per day. The Committee urged the Government to take the necessary measures, in law and in practice, to ensure that migrant domestic workers are fully protected from abusive practices and conditions that amount to the exaction of forced labour.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that Ministerial Decision No. 61842 of 2017 on the Unified Employment Contract, requires the employer: (i) to issue a salary slip for domestic workers and persons of similar status for every domestic worker through the banks offering this service; (ii) to register the employment contract of domestic workers and persons of similar status electronically through Musaned, the platform for domestic workers. The Committee further notes the Government's supplementary information that Ministerial Decision No. 172489 provides for the adoption of a contract to regulate and strengthen the contractual relationship between recruitment agencies and their employer clients when recruiting domestic workers through the Musaned system. In addition, the Government indicates that recruitment agencies shall be responsible for receiving and sheltering women domestic workers and providing them with high quality professional shelter services.

Moreover, two domestic labour dispute settlement committees have been established in the Riyadh shelter to provide legal and labour-related services. In 2018, the committees for the settlement of domestic workers' disputes completed 21,409 cases (labour cases) filed by domestic workers and 439 domestic workers were transferred to the shelter in Riyadh. With regard to medical services, the Government further states that domestic workers are treated free of charge in public hospitals.

The Committee further notes that in its 2018 concluding observations the United Nations Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW) expressed its concern about the situation of migrant domestic workers who continue to be subjected to economic and physical abuse and exploitation, the confiscation of passports by employers and the de facto persistence of the kafala system, which further increases their risk of exploitation and makes it difficult for them to change employers, even in cases of abuse (CEDAW/C/SAU/CO/3–4, paragraph 37). The Committee urges the Government to strengthen the measures taken above to ensure that in practice, migrant domestic workers can approach the competent authorities and seek redress in the event of a violation of their rights or abuses, without fear of retaliation. In this regard, please provide statistical information on the number of migrant domestic workers who had recourse to complaints mechanisms and the results achieved. Lastly, the Committee requests the Government to provide statistical information on the number of migrant domestic workers who have received assistance in the case of abusive working conditions.

3. Sponsorship system (kafala). The Committee previously noted the ITUC's observations that migrant workers have to obtain permission from their employers/sponsors to transfer employer as well as an exit visa to leave the country. The Committee requested the Government to provide information on the conditions and the length of the procedure for changing an employer, and to provide statistical information on the number of transfers that have occurred recently.

The Committee notes once again the Government's indication that Chapter 3 of the Labour Code specifies the circumstances in which the employment contract may be terminated and the conditions relating to periods of notice and compensation in the event that one of the parties wishes to terminate the contract. It also specifies the circumstances under which workers are entitled to leave their jobs without notice while retaining their full statutory rights. Section 14 of the implementing regulations of the Labour Code promulgated in Ministerial Decision No. 70273 of 20 December 2018, provide that migrant workers may terminate the contract with the employer and work for another employer. In addition, migrant workers may terminate the contract on condition that the workers give the employer 60 days' notice in advance of the expiration date that they do not wish to renew the contract and, also, to state whether they wish to remain in the country and transfer to another employer or leave the country definitively. All services relating to a change of employer are carried out electronically. With regard to migrant domestic workers, the Committee notes that they are covered by Regulation No. 310 of 2014 and the Standard Employment Contract. Migrant domestic workers may terminate the employment contract by giving a written notice of 30 days. Moreover, under Ministerial Decision No. 605 of 12 February 2017, on the procedures for the transfer of migrant domestic workers, migrant domestic workers may transfer to a new employer without the employer's consent for a number of reasons, including for non-payment of wages for three consecutive or isolated months. Lastly, the Committee notes the Government's indication that the entry and exit of non-nationals to and from Saudi Arabia is governed by the Residence Act and the procedures contained therein.

While noting that Ministerial Decision No. 70273 of 20 December 2018 and Ministerial Decision No. 605 of 12 February 2017 allow migrant workers and migrant domestic workers respectively to transfer to another employer provided a notice period is given, the Committee observes that both are obliged to obtain permission from the employer/sponsor to leave the country (pursuant to Saudi Arabian Residence Regulations, Act No. 17/2/25/1337 of June 1959). The Committee recalls that by restricting the possibility for migrant workers to leave the country, victims of abusive practices are prevented from freeing themselves from such situations. However, the Committee notes of the Government's indication in its supplementary information that procedures to regulate and facilitate the granting of visas to workers to enable them to leave the country without the agreement of the employer have been adopted. The Committee requests the Government to communicate a copy of the text regulating the procedures that have been adopted to facilitate migrant workers to leave the country when they have not obtained the agreement of the employer/sponsor, and to specify the criteria on the grounds of which the employer may object to a worker's departure from the country. The Committee requests the Government to provide statistical information on the number of employee departures from the country without an exit visa. The Committee further requests the Government to provide information on the conditions and the duration of the procedure for changing an employer under the sponsorship system, and to provide statistical information on the number of transfers that have occurred since the entry into force of Ministerial Decisions Nos 70273 and 605, disaggregated by gender, occupation and country of origin of workers.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 2003)

Article 1(a) of the Convention. Penal sanctions involving compulsory labour as a punishment for expressing political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system. Public Assembly Act. The Committee previously noted that section 15 of Public Assembly Act No. 51/92 provided for penalties of imprisonment for a maximum of 60 days on organizers of a public assembly who did not take the measures to maintain order in the assembly, who did not submit an application to the Ministry of Interior at least 48 hours prior to the scheduled beginning of the assembly, or who held an assembly regardless of a ban issued under the Act. The Committee noted that provisions requiring the granting of prior authorization for meetings and assemblies at the discretion of the authorities, where violations can be punished by sanctions of imprisonment involving compulsory labour, are not compatible with the Convention.

The Committee notes with satisfaction the adoption of Act No. 6 on public gatherings on 26 January 2016 which only provides for fines and not for penalties of imprisonment in sections 20-22 within applicable penal sanctions. The Committee also notes that Public Assembly Act No. 51/92 was repealed by the Decision of the Constitutional Court of the Republic of Serbia No. IUz-204/2013 on 23 October 2015.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1978)

Article 1(c) of the Convention. Disciplinary measures applicable to seafarers. In its previous comments, the Committee firmly hoped that section 153 of the Merchant Shipping Act as amended in 2015, would be reviewed in light of the Convention, with a view to ensuring that no sanction involving an obligation to perform work may be imposed as a disciplinary measure applicable to seafarers. The Committee notes that the Merchant Shipping Act has been amended by the Merchant Shipping (Amendment) Act, 2019 (Act 3 of 2020). The Committee notes with satisfaction that the penalties established for the infringement of section 153 (persistent and wilful neglect of duty, disobedience of lawful commands or impeding of the navigation of the ship) are now limited to fines.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to Government.

Sierra Leone

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1961)

The Committee notes with concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments.

Articles 1(1) and 2(1) of the Convention. Compulsory agricultural work. For many years, the Committee has been referring to section 8(h) of the Chiefdom Councils Act (Cap. 61), under which compulsory cultivation may be imposed on "natives". On numerous occasions, the Government indicated that this legislation would be amended. The Government also indicated that section 8(h) of the Act was not applied in practice and, as it was not in conformity with article 9 of the Constitution, it was unenforceable.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that, at the time of ratification, chiefs with administrative authority requested forced or communal labour from their communities, but that measures have been taken to address these occurrences, including through the establishment of the Human Rights Commission of Sierra Leone. Nonetheless, the Government states that, despite the prohibition on forced or compulsory labour, minor violations do occur. In this regard, the Government indicates that a report was filed with the Human Rights Commission relating to the undertaking of communal work by a village. Noting that the Government had previously indicated its intention to amend this Act, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to repeal section 8(h) of the Chiefdom Councils Act, to bring it into conformity with the Convention. It requests the Government to continue to provide information on the application of this Act in practice with regard to the exaction of compulsory labour, including information on the reports filed in this respect with the Human Rights Commission.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

South Africa

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1997)

Articles 1(1) and 2(1) of the Convention. Trafficking in Persons. In its previous comments, the Committee took note of the Prevention and Combating of Trafficking in Persons Act (PCTP Act) of 2013, which prohibits trafficking in persons and related activities, and provides for the protection of victims of trafficking. The PCTP Act also provides for the adoption of a National Policy Framework. The Committee further noted that the National Prosecuting Authority (NPA) was at the advanced stages of finalizing and issuing the directives for the implementation of the PCTP Act. In addition, prosecutors had undertaken training since 2013 on trafficking in persons and related matters. The Committee requested the Government to pursue its efforts to prevent, suppress and combat trafficking in persons.

The Government indicates in its report that it launched the Prevention and Combating of Trafficking in Persons National Policy Framework (NPF) on 25 April 2019, to promote a cooperative and aligned response to trafficking among all government departments and with civil society organizations engaged in assisting and supporting victims of trafficking. The NPF intends to support the implementation of the PCTP Act. Its strategic objectives are to: prevent trafficking in persons, including through awareness-raising and reducing vulnerability to trafficking and re-trafficking; establish a coordinated and cooperative institutional framework to combat trafficking; establish an adequate regulatory framework to combat trafficking; secure resources; and identify potential and presumed victims of trafficking and provide them with comprehensive assistance.

The Committee notes that the NPF contains a national anti-trafficking strategy, which outlines the strategic goals and specific objectives to be achieved to facilitate a comprehensive implementation of the PCTP Act, as well as a national anti-trafficking action plan, detailing how to achieve these goals and objectives.

In its report under the Worst Forms of Child labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182), the Government indicates the establishment of the National Inter-Sectorial Committee on trafficking in persons, consisting of national departmental representatives, the NPA and civil society organizations, which leads the implementation and administration of the PCTP Act at the national level. The Government also indicates in its report under Convention No. 182 that provincial trafficking in persons task teams and provincial rapid response teams were established to deal with and monitor complaints and, pending cases of trafficking in persons, and to provide support to victims.

The Government further indicates, in its report under the present Convention, that South Africa is a primary destination for trafficking in persons in the Southern African region and within Africa at large, and a country of origin and transit for trafficking in persons to Europe and North America. Men and women are trafficked for the purposes of labour and sexual exploitation. The Government reports that foreign male victims of forced labour have been detected on fishing vessels in South African territorial waters. It states that trafficking in persons is rooted in South Africa's landscape due to the country's deep structural inequalities and that a cultural shift and a systemic response are needed in this regard, including to detect suspicions of corruption.

The Committee notes the information from the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime (UNODC) Regional Office for Southern Africa, according to which there is a limited number of shelters for male victims of trafficking in persons in South Africa.

The Committee notes that, although two regulations were adopted in August and October 2015 under sections 43(1)(a) and 43(3) of the PCTP Act, it does not appear that regulations envisaged under section 43(1)(b) and 43(2) of the PCTP Act were formulated and adopted. It notes that regulations under section 43(1)(a) of the PCTP Act relate to the creation of a mechanism to facilitate the implementation of the Act. Regulations under section 43(2) concern the recovery and reflection period for foreign victims of trafficking and their repatriation in their country of origin. Noting the efforts made to combat trafficking in persons, the Committee strongly encourages the Government to continue to take measures in this regard, especially in light of the prevalence of the phenomenon in the country. It requests it to provide information on the implementation and results of the national Policy Framework on prevention and combating of trafficking in persons, including in the areas of prevention of trafficking and identification of victims. It further requests the Government to provide information on the activities of the National Inter-Sectorial Committee on trafficking in persons, as well as of the provincial trafficking in persons task teams and provincial rapid response teams, and on the impact of these activities on the reduction of trafficking in persons. It also requests the Government to indicate the assistance and protection services provided to victims of trafficking, as well as the number of victims that have benefited from such services. Lastly, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on any regulations made under sections 43(1)(b) and 43(2) of the PCTP Ac, and, where possible, to provide a copy of them.

Article 25. Penal sanctions. The Committee previously noted that section 13(a) of the PCTP Act provides that a person convicted of trafficking is liable to a fine or imprisonment, up to life imprisonment. It observed that persons convicted of trafficking in persons might be punished only with a fine. The Committee accordingly requested the Government to provide information on the application of the PCTP Act, in particular on the specific penalties imposed on persons under section 13(a).

The Committee notes the absence of information in the Government's report in this respect. It notes the 2018/2019 Annual Report of the South African police service, which indicates that between 1 April 2018 and 31 March 2019, a total of 448 victims of trafficking in persons were rescued (page 214). Referring to its 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, the Committee recalls that the possibility of imposing only a fine on a person committing the offence of trafficking in persons does not constitute a sufficiently effective penalty, in light of the seriousness of the violation and the dissuasive character that the sanction should have (paragraph 319). The Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure thorough investigations and prosecutions of the perpetrators of the above-mentioned cases of trafficking in persons that have been uncovered by the South African police service, and to provide information on any convictions and penalties imposed on these perpetrators. It once again requests the Government to supply information on the application in practice of the provisions of the PCTP Act regarding trafficking in persons, including the number of persons convicted, as well as the number and nature of penalties imposed.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1997)

Article 1(c) of the Convention. Disciplinary measures applicable to seafarers. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that certain provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1951 were incompatible with Article 1(c) of the Convention. In particular, it noted that sections 321, 322 and 180(2)(b) provided for the forcible conveyance of seafarers on board ship to perform their duties. It also noted that, pursuant to section 313, penalties of imprisonment (during which prison labour may be imposed, according to section 37(1)(b) of the Correctional Services Act, 1998) might be imposed for breaches of discipline by seafarers, including: wilfully disobeying any lawful command or neglecting duty; combining with any of the crew to disobey lawful commands, neglect duty, impede the navigation of the ship or retard the progress of the voyage; preventing, hindering or retarding the loading, unloading or departure of the ship; desertion; and absence without leave. The Committee noted, with concern, that the Merchant Shipping Amendment Act, 2015, did not amend any of the above-mentioned provisions, and expressed the firm hope that the Merchant Shipping Act of 1951 would be reviewed, to be in conformity with Article 1(c) of the Convention.

The Committee notes that the Government's report does not provide any information on this point. The Committee takes note of the Merchant Shipping Bill, 2020, which was published for public comments in Government Gazette No. 43073 of 6 March 2020. The Committee observes that sections 397, 398 and 142(3) of the Merchant Shipping Bill, 2020, reproduce, in the same terms, sections 321, 322 and 180(2)(b) of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1951, on the forcible conveyance of seafarers on board ship. The Committee also notes that, according to section 372 of the Bill, penalties of imprisonment (during which prison labour may be imposed) may still be imposed for breaches of discipline by seafarers, including wilfully disobeying any lawful command or neglecting duty (section 134(2)(b) and (c)); combining with any of the crew to disobey lawful commands, neglect duty, impede the navigation of the ship or retard the progress of the voyage (section 134(2)(d)); preventing, hindering or retarding the loading, unloading or departure of the ship (section 134(2)(f)); desertion (section 138(1) and (2)); and absence without leave (section 139 (1) and (2)). The Committee is therefore bound to note with deep concern that the Merchant Shipping Bill, 2020, contains the same provisions as the Merchant Shipping Act of 1951, affecting the application of the Convention, despite repeated comments by the Committee since 2004. The Committee wishes to recall that Article 1(c) of the Convention expressly prohibits the use of any form of forced or compulsory labour as a means of labour discipline, covering both the due performance of a worker's service under compulsion of law (in form of physical constraint or the menace of a penalty), and sanctions for breaches of labour discipline (such as disobedience, desertion or absence without leave) involving an obligation to perform labour. Only sanctions relating to acts that are likely to endanger the safety of the ship, or the life or health of persons (such as provided for in section 134(1) of the Merchant Shipping Bill, 2020), are excluded from the scope of application of the Convention. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the Government will take into account the Committee's comments to review the Merchant Shipping Bill, 2020, with a view to bringing it into conformity with the Convention. In this regard, it urges the Government to ensure that breaches of discipline, especially those provided for in section 134(2)(b), (c), (d) and (f), section 138(1) and (2) and section 139(1) and (2) of the Merchant Shipping Bill, are not punishable with penalties of imprisonment involving compulsory labour, where the ship or the life or health of persons are not endangered. It also urges the Government to repeal sections 397, 398 and 142(3), which allow for the forcible return of seafarers on board ship to perform their duties, or to restrict their application to situations where the ship or the life or health of persons are endangered.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Sudan

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1957)

Articles 1(1), 2(1) and 25 of the Convention. Abductions for the exaction of forced labour and penalties. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the practice of abductions for the purpose of forced labour in the context of armed conflict. It noted the Government's indication in its last report that no evidence had been found regarding cases of abductions. The Committee further noted the United Nations Independent Expert's indication in 2016 that fighting continued, particularly in Darfur between Government forces and the Sudan Liberation Movement-Abdul Wahid, causing killings, abductions, sexual violence and displacement of civilians. The Committee noted the appointment of a Special Prosecutor for Darfur crimes, and the Government's information that no prosecutions undertaken by the Special Prosecutor were related to cases of abductions for forced labour. The Committee accordingly requested the Government to take immediate and effective measures to ensure the imposition of appropriate criminal penalties on perpetrators of abductions for the exaction of forced labour.

The Government indicates in its report that there are no records of abductions for the purpose of compulsory labour, and that the Special Prosecutor for Darfur crimes has not received any cases of abductions for forced labour. The Government states that the security situation in Darfur is stable thanks to the efforts of the transitional Government, which has made peace its priority.

The Committee notes the United Nation's indication available on its website that a transitional Government was formed in August 2019 by the Transitional Military Council and the country's main opposition alliance, for a three-year period leading up to democratic elections. The Committee notes that the General Framework for the programme of the transitional Government sets as one of its priorities to put an end to the war and build fair, comprehensive and sustainable peace. In this regard, practical measures include: (i) establishing and activating the Transitional Justice Commission and building the relevant compensation and reparation institutions; and (ii) creating units for psychological support and assistance for the victims of violations. In addition, the Committee notes that Article 6(3) of the Transitional Constitution, signed on 17 August 2019, provides that despite any provision in existing laws, there shall be no statutory limitations on war crimes and crimes against humanity, extrajudicial killings, violations of international human rights law and international humanitarian law, and offences relating to corruption and abuse of power committed since 30 June 1989. The Committee welcomes the formal signature of a peace agreement on 3 October 2020 in Sudan between the transitional Government and opposition groups. The Committee requests the Government to continue to take measures to ensure that no cases of abductions for the exaction of forced labour occur in future and to guarantee that victims are fully protected from such practices. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the establishment of the Transitional Justice Commission, the compensation and reparation institutions and the units to support and assist victims of violations, and to indicate the activities that they have undertaken for the reparation and reintegration of victims of abductions for the exaction of forced labour.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1970)

Article 1(a) of the Convention. Punishment for expressing political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system. The Committee previously noted that sections 50, 66 and 69 of the Criminal Act provided for penalties of imprisonment, which might involve an obligation to perform prison labour, for committing an act with the intention of undermining the constitutional system, for the publication of false news with the intention of harming the prestige of the State, and for committing an act intended to disturb public peace and tranquillity. It took note of the report of 2016 of the Independent Expert on the situation of human rights in the Sudan according to which repressive measures, including arrests and detentions, had been used by Sudanese authorities against political opposition groups, civil society organizations and students. The Committee accordingly urged the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that sections 50, 66 and 69 of the Criminal Act were repealed or amended so that no prison sentence involving compulsory labour could be imposed on persons who, without using or advocating violence, expressed certain political views or opposition to the established political, social or economic system.

The Government indicates in its report that the Criminal Act is currently subject to review. The Committee notes that the Criminal Act was amended by the Act on various amendments of 13 July 2020. The Committee notes with regret that sections 50, 66 and 69 do not appear to have been amended.

The Committee further notes that the Human Rights Committee indicated in its concluding observations of November 2018 that the 2013 amendments to the Armed Forces Act introduced the possibility for the trial of civilians before military jurisdictions for crimes such as the spreading of false news (section 66 of the Criminal Act) or undermining the constitutional system (section 50 of the Criminal Act). The Human Rights Committee also pointed out that political opponents have been prosecuted before military jurisdictions (CCPR/C/SDN/CO/5, paragraph 39). The Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the legislation is amended without delay so that persons who peacefully express political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system cannot be subject to sanctions involving compulsory prison labour. For instance, the Government could restrict the scope of application of sections 50, 66 and 69 of the Criminal Act to situations of violence, or could repeal sanctions involving compulsory prison labour. In the meantime, the Committee requests the Government to indicate the specific penalties that have been imposed on persons under sections 50, 66 and 69 of the Criminal Act, including by the military jurisdictions. It also requests the Government to provide a copy of the 2013 amendments to the Armed Forces Act.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Syrian Arab Republic

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments.

Articles 1(1), 2(1) and 25 of the Convention. Situations of forced labour arising from the armed conflict. Trafficking and sexual slavery. Following its previous comments, the Committee notes that according to the 2016 Report of the UN Special Rapporteur on the human rights of internally displaced persons on his mission to the Syrian Arab Republic to the Human Rights Council, credible information indicates that women and girls trapped in conflict areas under the control of the Islamic State in Iraq and the Levant (ISIL) face trafficking and sexual slavery. Some specific ethnic groups are particularly vulnerable, such as Yazidis and those from ethnic and religious communities targeted by the ISIL (A/HRC/32/35/Add.2, paragraph 65). The Committee also notes that, according to the 2017 Report of the UN Secretary-General on conflict-related sexual violence, thousands of Yazidi women and girls who were captured in Iraq in August 2014 and trafficked to the Syrian Arab Republic continue to be held in sexual slavery, while new reports have surfaced of additional women and children being forcibly transferred from Iraq to the Syrian Arab Republic since the start of military operations in Mosul (S/2017/249, paragraph 69).

The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that, pursuant to the Prevention of Human Trafficking Act of 2010, a Department to Combat Trafficking in Persons was established. However, since the conflict has erupted, trafficking of persons and sexual slavery have increased because of the presence of terrorist groups in the country. The Committee must express its deep concern that, after almost six years of conflict, trafficking in persons and sexual slavery are practices that are still occurring on a large scale on the ground. While acknowledging the complexity of the situation on the ground and the presence of armed groups and armed conflict in the country, the Committee once again urges the Government to take the necessary measures to put an immediate stop to these practices which constitute a serious violation of the Convention and to guarantee that the victims are fully protected from such abusive practices. The Committee recalls that it is crucial that appropriate criminal penalties are imposed on perpetrators so that recourse to trafficking or sexual slavery does not go unpunished. The Committee urges the Government to take immediate and effective measures in this respect, and to provide information on the results achieved.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1958)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments.

Article 1(a) of the Convention. Penal sanctions involving compulsory labour as a punishment for holding or expressing political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system. For a number of years, the Committee has been drawing the Government's attention to certain provisions under which penal sanctions involving compulsory prison labour, pursuant to sections 46 and 51 of the Penal Code (Act No. 148 of 1949), may be imposed in situations covered by the Convention, namely:

- Penal Code: section 282 (insult of a foreign State); 287 (exaggerated news tending to harm the prestige of the State); 288 (participation in a political or social association of an international character without permission); and sections 335 and 336 (seditious assembly, and meetings liable to disturb public tranquillity); and
- the Press Act No. 156 of 1960: sections 15, 16 and 55 (publishing a newspaper for which an authorization has not been granted by the Council of Ministers).

The Committee also previously noted that the above-mentioned provisions are enforceable with sanctions of imprisonment for a term of up to one year which involves an obligation to perform labour in prison.

The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that the Press Act of 1960 had been repealed and replaced by the Media Act No. 108 of 2011, under which the penalty of imprisonment has been replaced by a fine. The Government also indicates that a draft Penal Code has been prepared and is in the process of being adopted. The Committee expresses the firm hope that, during the process of the adoption of the new Penal Code, the Government will take all the necessary measures to ensure that persons who express political views or views opposed to the established political, social or economic system benefit from the protection afforded by the Convention and that, in any event, penal sanctions involving compulsory prison labour cannot be imposed on them.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1963)

The Committee takes note of the Government's report and the supplementary information provided in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020).

Article 1(c) of the Convention. Sanctions involving compulsory labour for various breaches of labour discipline. In its reiterated comments since 2000, the Committee has been requesting the Government to take the necessary measures to amend sections 157 and 158 of the Shipping Act, 1987, under which penalties of imprisonment (involving compulsory labour pursuant to sections 255 and 269(3) of the Prison Rules) may be imposed for breaches of labour discipline in circumstances where the life, personal safety or health of persons are not endangered.

The Committee notes that the Government in its report, refers to the continued review of the Shipping Act by the Ministry of Works and Transport, and that the Government indicates that the Ministry will recommend to the Legislative Review Committee of Cabinet that the following provisions be repealed: section 157(b) (wilfully disobeying any lawful command), section 157(c) (continually disobeying any lawful command or wilfully neglecting duty), and section 158(a) and (b) (deserting and neglecting to join a ship and absenting oneself without leave). Moreover, the Government indicates that the Ministry will recommend the amendment of section 157(e) of the Shipping Act (combining with any of the crew to disobey a lawful command or to neglect duty) in order to provide for an appropriate fine instead of imprisonment. The Committee once again hopes that, within the framework of the amendments of the above-mentioned sections of the Shipping Act, the Government will take the necessary measures to ensure that no penalties of imprisonment may be imposed on seafarers for breaches of labour discipline.

Article 1(d). Sanctions for participating in strikes. In its reiterated comments since 2000, the Committee has been noting that pursuant to section 8(1) of the Trade Disputes and Protection of Property Act, a person employed in certain public services (but not limited in this respect to services whose interruption might endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population) who wilfully and maliciously breaks a contract of service, is liable to a fine or to imprisonment of three months. It also noted that pursuant to section 69 of the Industrial Relations Act, penalties of imprisonment (involving compulsory labour under the Prison Rules) could be imposed on certain categories of workers for participation in an industrial action.

In response to the Committee's request for measures to amend these provisions, the Government indicates in its report that the process of reviewing the Industrial Relations Act, chapter 88:01 has been ongoing since 2016, with proposals for amendments currently before the National Tripartite Advisory Council, including the removal of a penalty of imprisonment for the participation in peaceful industrial action. With regard to the Trade Disputes and Protection of Property Act, the Government indicates that the legislative review of this Act is scheduled by the Ministry of Labour and Small Enterprise Development for the first half of 2020. The Committee notes the Government's indication in its supplementary report, according to which due, to the disruption resulting from the COVID-19 pandemic, the review of this Act has not been possible. The Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that within the framework of the amendment of the Industrial Relations Act, no penalties of imprisonment may be imposed on persons for the peaceful participation in a strike. It also once again requests the Government to provide information on any measures taken or envisaged to amend the Trade Disputes and Protection of Property Act in this respect.

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1998)

The Committee takes note of the Government's report and the supplementary information provided in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020).

The Committee notes the observations of the Turkish Confederation of Employers' Associations (TİSK) communicated with the Government's report.

Articles 1(1), 2(1) and 25 of the Convention. Trafficking in persons. 1. Law enforcement measures. The Committee previously noted the TISK's 2014 observations, according to which Turkey was as destination and transit country for trafficked women, men and children. It noted that section 80 of the Penal Code prohibited trafficking in persons both for the purposes of sexual and labour exploitation. It noted that, in 2015, out of 514 suspects involved in adjudicated cases under section 80 of the Penal Code, 330 were acquitted and that in the first quarter of 2016, out of 148 suspects involved in adjudicated cases, 118 were acquitted. The Committee noted with concern the low number of convictions relating to trafficking in persons, despite the significant number of cases brought to justice. The Committee urged the Government to strengthen its efforts to ensure that all persons who engage in trafficking are subject to prosecution and that in practice, sufficiently effective and dissuasive penalties of imprisonment are imposed.

The Government indicates in its report that Turkey is a transit and destination country for the crime of trafficking in persons, especially for the exploitation of women and children. The Government states that the General Command of the Gendarmerie has taken steps to combat trafficking in persons, including: (i) the issuance of detailed application orders for 81 Provincial Commands of the Gendarmerie explaining the changes in the fight against trafficking in persons; (ii) the continuation of the activities of the anti-trafficking groups established by the Command of the Gendarmerie in 33 provinces; (iii) the inclusion, in the curriculum of the Gendarmerie Coast Guard Academy, of training on combating trafficking in persons; and (iv) the launch of an eight-month project on increasing efficiency of anti-trafficking activities of the General Command of the Gendarmerie on 30 October 2018, which included training of staff on combating trafficking in persons. The Government adds in its supplementary information that training on combating trafficking in persons was also provided to 210 staff members of the General Directorate of Security between May 2019 and July 2020.

The Government further indicates that, under section 80 of the Penal Code, 26 cases of trafficking for prostitution were identified in 2017, 61 persons were arrested and 13 were imprisoned; in 2018, 16 cases of trafficking for prostitution were identified, 128 persons were arrested and 35 were imprisoned; and from January to May 2019, seven cases of trafficking for prostitution were identified, 60 persons were arrested and three were imprisoned. The Committee notes the Government's information but observes that it has not provided any information regarding the penalties applied in these cases. The Committee further notes that the Group of Experts on Action against Trafficking in Human Beings of the Council of Europe (GRETA) noted, in its report adopted on 10 July 2019 concerning the implementation of the Council of Europe Convention on Action against Trafficking in Human Beings in Turkey, the Government's information that in 2016, 72 cases of trafficking in persons were initiated, 42 persons were convicted, and 266 persons were acquitted; in 2017, 42 cases were initiated, 45 persons were convicted, and 96 persons were acquitted; and in 2018, 82 cases were initiated, 77 persons were convicted, and 305 persons were acquitted (paragraph 222). The Committee also notes the Government's supplementary information according to which, between October 2019 and March 2020, 19 persons were convicted for trafficking in persons and 102 persons were acquitted. Of the 19 persons convicted, the Committee notes that one person was sentenced to a fine and 18 persons were sentenced to imprisonment and a fine.

The Committee also notes GRETA's indication that, following the removal from office of some 4,500 judges and prosecutors after July 2016, newly appointed staff had not received sufficient training to efficiently investigate and adjudicate complex criminal cases, including trafficking in persons (paragraph 219). GRETA also indicated that there were practical difficulties in adjudicating trafficking in persons cases and distinguishing between trafficking in persons and certain other offences, such as prostitution (section 227 of the Penal Code) and violation of freedom of work and labour (section 117 of the Penal Code). Representatives of the judiciary indicated that cases initiated as trafficking in persons were sometimes requalified at the stage of court proceedings as other offences, usually prostitution, which are punishable by lesser penalties (paragraph 224). While acknowledging the measures taken by the Government to combat trafficking in persons, the Committee urges it to continue to take the necessary measures to ensure that thorough investigations and prosecutions are carried out against all persons engaged in trafficking in persons both for the purposes of sexual and labour exploitation, and that sufficiently effective and dissuasive penalties are applied in practice. In this regard, it requests the Government to continue to provide information on the practical application of section 80 of the Penal Code, including the number of prosecutions, convictions and the specific penalties imposed, as well as the facts that led to sentences of fines only. Lastly, the Committee requests the Government to pursue its efforts to provide training to law enforcement officers, including judges and prosecutors, to ensure that perpetrators of trafficking in persons are appropriately prosecuted and sanctioned under the offence of trafficking in persons, and to provide information in this regard.

2. Protection and assistance for victims. The Committee previously noted the enactment of the Law on Foreigners and International Protection (No. 6458) 2013, which systematized victim identification procedures. It also noted the adoption of the Regulation on Combating Human Trafficking and Protection of Victims in 2016, setting forth the procedures and principles for the prevention of trafficking in persons and the protection of victims, including the granting of residence permits for foreign victims. The Committee further took note of the Voluntary and Safe Return Programme for victims wishing to leave Turkey, as well as the Victim Support Programmes, which include the provision of shelter homes or safe houses, health services, psychosocial help and legal assistance. The Committee requested the Government to provide information on the practical application of the new above-mentioned Law and Regulation with regard to the identification of victims and the provision of protection and assistance provided to them.

The Government indicates that, between July 2019 and March 2020, the most prevalent countries of origin of victims of trafficking in persons were Uzbekistan, Turkey and Moldova. The Government states that in 2017, 303 persons were identified as victims of trafficking by the Provincial Directorates of Migration Management, and 134 persons in 2018. It adds that in 2019, 215 persons were identified as victims of trafficking, and 79 in the first half of 2020, mainly women. The victims who stayed in Turkey benefited from the Victim Support Programmes (24 out of the 134 victims in 2018, 35 in 2019 and 42 in the first half of 2020), while some victims who preferred to leave the country benefited from the Voluntary and Safe Return Programme (101 victims in 2018, 153 in 2019 and 22 in the first half of 2020). The capacity of shelters for victims of trafficking has increased to 42 places. The opening of a third shelter is under consideration. Each victim admitted to a shelter has an individualized support programme, which has included, in recent years, services such as monthly financial aid, health services, psychological support, vocational training, and access to the labour market, legal assistance and leisure activities.

The Government further indicates that it has established a Department of legal support and victim rights within the General Directorate of Criminal Affairs (Ministry of Justice), which aims to inform all victims of crime, including victims of trafficking, of their rights and the assistance and support services available to them, as well as to support victims in the judicial process and to facilitate their access to justice. In addition, Forensic Support and Victim Services Directorates have been established in several courthouses to provide victims, including victims of trafficking in persons, with legal aid and support services, such as measures to prevent re-trafficking for victims of trafficking, accompanying victims of trafficking during court hearings, and referring victims to relevant institutions for psychological support, if necessary. The Committee also notes the Government's indication that a guidebook on approaching victims, with a specific headline on victims of trafficking and foreign victims, has been prepared for professionals who provide services to victims of crime, especially law enforcement, health professionals and judicial workers.

The Committee notes the statement in the communication of the TISK that in cooperation with the International Organization for Migration, the urgent helpline 157 was established for potential victims of trafficking in persons, with operators providing services in Russian, Romanian, English and Turkish. The TISK further states that the Coordination Commission on combating human trafficking was established under the Regulation on combating human trafficking and protection of victims, and held its first meeting in 2017 to develop measures on inter-institutional cooperation, awareness activities, and training materials for personnel. The Committee further notes in this regard the Government's supplementary information that the Coordination Commission on combating human trafficking aims at conducting studies, formulating policies and strategies, developing an action plan and ensuring cooperation to prevent and combat trafficking in persons. The Commission met in 2017, 2018 and 2019, resulting, inter alia, in: (i) the designation of provincial human trafficking liaison officers in 36 provinces; (ii) awareness-raising activities for the general public; and (iii) the training of more than 1,000 professionals from public institutions and non-governmental organizations on combating trafficking in persons in 2019.

The Committee takes notes of GRETA's indication, in its 2019 report, according to which trafficking in persons for the purpose of sexual exploitation prevails (paragraph 13). GRETA also indicated that the Directorate General of Migration Management, which has been coordinating national action against trafficking in persons since 2013, has a Department of protection of victims of human trafficking (paragraph 26). The Committee notes that GRETA pointed out the limited capacity of specialized shelters for victims of trafficking, as well as the fact that only a few victims remained in Turkey and took part in victim assistance programmes. GRETA was also concerned at the lack of specialized assistance for Turkish victims of trafficking and male victims of trafficking (paragraph 169). While welcoming the efforts of the Government, the Committee requests it to continue to take measures in order to improve the identification of and assistance for victims of trafficking in persons, and to provide information in this regard. It requests the Government to continue to provide information on the measures that have been developed by the Coordination Commission on Combating Human Trafficking to prevent and combat trafficking in persons, as well as to indicate the activities of the Department of Protection of Victims of Human Trafficking of the Directorate General of Migration Management. Lastly, the Committee requests the Government to indicate the number of victims of trafficking in persons identified and provided with protection and assistance, through the various programmes, directorates and departments mentioned above that support victims of trafficking in persons.

Article 2(2)(a). Compulsory military service. The Committee previously requested the Government to repeal section 10 of Act No. 1111 on military service, according to which conscripts in the surplus reserve might be assigned to work for public bodies and institutions.

The Committee notes the observations of the TISK according to which Act No. 7179 on military recruitment is a positive development with regard to bringing the national legislation in line with the Convention.

The Committee notes with satisfaction the entry into force of the Act No. 7179 on military recruitment on 26 June 2019, which replaces Act No. 1111 on military service and does not contain any provision regarding the fulfilment of military service obligations in public institutions and organizations.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1997)

The Committee proceeded with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the observations received from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), on 21 September 2020, as well as on the basis of the information at its disposal in 2019. The Committee requests the Government to reply to the observations of the ITUC.

The Committee also notes the observations of the ITUC, received on 1 September 2019.

Article 1(b) of the Convention. Imposition of forced labour as a method of mobilizing and using labour for purposes of economic development. Cotton production. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, in accordance with section 7 of the Act on the legal regime governing emergencies of 1990, in order to mobilize labour for the needs of economic development and to prevent emergencies, state and government authorities may recruit citizens to work in enterprises, institutions and organizations. The Committee considered that the notion of "needs of economic development" did not seem to satisfy the definition of "emergency" referred to in the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29), and was therefore incompatible with both Article 2(2)(d) of Convention No. 29 and Article 1(b) of Convention No. 105, which prohibits the imposition of compulsory labour as a method of mobilizing and using labour for purposes of economic development. The Committee also noted the Government's indication that the State of Emergency Act, the Emergency Response Act and the Act on preparation for and carrying out of mobilization in Turkmenistan do not mention the concept of "purposes of economic development". Instead, citizens may be employed in undertakings, organizations and institutions during mobilization in order to ensure that the country's economy continues to function and to produce goods and services that are essential to satisfy the needs of the State, the armed forces and the population, in case of emergency.

Moreover, section 19 of the Labour Code provides that an employer may require a worker to undertake work which is not associated with his or her employment in cases specified by law.

In its conclusions adopted in June 2016, the Conference Committee urged the Government: (i) to take effective measures, in law and in practice, to ensure that no one, including farmers and public and private sector workers, is forced to work for the state-sponsored cotton harvest, and threatened punishment for the lack of fulfilment of production quotas under the pretext of "needs of economic development"; (ii) to repeal section 7 of the Act on the legal regime governing emergencies of 1990; and (iii) to seek technical assistance from the ILO in order to comply with the Convention in law and in practice and to develop a national action plan to eliminate forced labour in connection with the state-sponsored cotton harvest.

The Committee noted that the International Organisation of Employers (IOE), in its observations of 2016, expressed high concern at the reported practices of forced labour in cotton production which affected farmers, businesses and private and public sector workers, under threat of punishment for the lack of fulfilment of production quotas. Moreover, the observations made by the ITUC in 2016 highlighted the practices of forced mobilization by the Government of employees of a wide range of private and public sector institutions to pick cotton, including education and healthcare institutions, municipal government offices, libraries, museums, meteorological agencies, cultural centres, sports organizations, utility, manufacturing, construction, telecommunications and fishing companies. Those who refused faced administrative penalties, including public censure, docked pay and termination of employment. In this regard, the Committee noted the Government's statement that, in certain regions of the country, local government and agricultural producers, together with local employment services, organized voluntary recruitment from among those registered during the seasonal cotton harvest in order to provide seasonal employment to that sector of the population.

The Committee further noted from the report of the ILO technical advisory mission of September 2016 that although representatives of international organizations and foreign embassies that the mission met with indicated that the practice of forced labour existed, in most cases they did not have direct proof of this as it was difficult to access the cotton fields. The mission report took note of the various national strategies and action plans developed by the Government, including the National Human Rights Action Plan (2016–2020); the National Action Plan to Combat Trafficking in Persons (2016–2018); the United Nations Partnership Framework for Development signed in April 2016; and the Sustainable Development Goals (SDGs) adopted in September 2016. It also took due note of the political will demonstrated by the Government to address the issue of forced labour in cotton harvesting in the country. The Committee urged the Government to continue to collaborate with the ILO with a view to eliminating, in law and in practice, forced labour in connection with the state-sponsored cotton harvesting.

The Committee notes from the–observations made by the ITUC in 2019 that in November 2018 workers in all sectors of the national economy were sent to the cotton fields, some even sent to remote districts hundreds of kilometres away from their homes. For the first time in 15 years, teachers were forced to spend their nine-day fall break picking cotton. In the region of Mary, an estimated 70 per cent of the teachers were required to pick cotton during the 2018 harvest season. The ITUC also states that people worked from early morning until dusk with a 30–60 minute break for lunch and in the evening they were bussed back to the city. People who were sent away to the fields for ten or more days stayed in a temporary base with an earth floor and without sanitation facilities. Farmers were required to produce a large cotton yield and were expected to meet the state quotas and pay the workers that were forced to work by the Government to pick cotton. Authorities threatened farmers with loss of land if they did not meet government-imposed quotas.

The Committee notes the Government's information in its report that the Decision of the Public Council adopted in September 2018 aims to improve the working methods in the agricultural sector and place work in this field on a modern footing and provide for the broad recruitment of private producers in agriculture. According to this Decision, plots of land shall be offered on a contractual basis to joint stock companies, family farms and other legal entities and producers for use for a period of 99 years for the production of crops like wheat and cotton. The Committee also notes the Government's information that it has resorted to using cotton harvesting machines to pick cotton and hence there is no need for the mass recruitment of human resources for this purpose. The Government indicates that during the harvesting season in 2017, 1,200 harvesting machines were used and in 2018, 500 additional machines were purchased from Uzbekistan and a contract for 200 such machines were concluded with a company that manufactures agricultural equipment. The Committee further notes the Government's information that together with the social partners, a draft cooperation programme has been developed and submitted to the ILO for consideration. This draft sets out measures for the implementation of international rules and standards, decent work, fair pay and social protection, and the active participation of social partners on issues of decent work and employment. The Committee notes, however, that this draft cooperation programme has not been agreed upon.

The Committee further notes from the recent observations of the ITUC that during the 2019 cotton harvests, public sector employees, including teachers, doctors, municipal service and utility companies' employees continued to be mobilized for cotton picking or forced to pay for replacements pickers. Those unable or unwilling to pick cotton had to pay a substantial part of their income. As of October 2019, teaching staff had each paid 285 Turkmenistan manats (US$16) while their average monthly income is around US$90. Further evidence shows that public sector workers are being mobilized for the 2020 harvest.

The Committee notes that the United Nations Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, in its concluding observations of October 2018, expressed concern at the reported continued widespread use of forced labour among workers and students under threat of penalties during the cotton harvest (E/C.12/TKM/CO/2, paragraph 23). It also notes from the Summary of Stakeholders' submissions of February 2018 to the United Nations Human Rights Council that people forced to pick cotton had been compelled to sign declarations on "voluntary" participation in the harvest (A/HRC/WG.6/30/TKM/3, paragraph 49).

The Committee must express its deep concern at the continued practice of forced labour in the cotton sector and the poor working conditions of workers employed in this sector. The Committee therefore urges the Government to take measures to ensure the elimination of the use of compulsory labour of public and private sector workers, as well as students, in cotton farming, and requests it to provide information on the measures taken to this end and the concrete results achieved, with an indication of the violations detected and the sanctions applied. In this regard, the Committee strongly encourages the Government to avail itself of ILO technical assistance, with a view to eliminating, in law and in practice, forced labour in connection with the state-sponsored cotton harvesting as well as to improve recruitment and working conditions in the cotton sector.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government, which reiterates the content of its previous request adopted in 2019.

In light of the situation described above, the Committee is bound to observe that there has been no meaningful progress to address the issue of mobilization of persons for forced labour in the cotton harvest since the discussion of the case by the Conference Committee and the visit of an ILO technical advisory mission to the country in 2016. It notes with deep concern the continued practice of forced labour in the cotton sector.

[The Government is asked to supply full particulars to the Conference at its 109th Session and to reply in full to the present comments in 2021.]

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1963)

The Committee notes with concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments.

Article 1(a) of the Convention. Penal sanctions involving compulsory labour as a punishment for holding or expressing political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system. For a number of years, the Committee has been referring to the following provisions of the national legislation, under which penal sanctions involving compulsory prison labour, by virtue of section 62 of the Prisons Regulations, may be imposed:

- the Public Order and Security Act, No. 20 of 1967, empowering the executive to restrict an individual's association or communication with others, independently of the commission of any offence and subject to penalties involving compulsory labour; and
- sections 54(2)(c), 55, 56 and 56(a) of the Penal Code, empowering the minister to declare any combination of two or more people an unlawful society and thus render any speech, publication or activity on behalf of, or in support of, such a combination, illegal and punishable with imprisonment (involving an obligation to perform labour).

The Committee requested the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the above provisions are amended or repealed so as to ensure the compatibility of the legislation with the Convention.

The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that both the Public Order and Security Act and the Penal Code are in conformity with the Convention.

However, the Committee notes the statements made by a certain number of governments in the 2016 report of the Working Group on the Universal Periodic Review (report to the UN Human Rights Council (HRC)), recommending the amendment of the Public Order Management Act of 2013, in order to ensure full respect of freedom of association and peaceful demonstration (A/HRC/34/10, paragraphs 115.101, 117.8, 117.18 and 117.52). Moreover, the Committee notes that, according to the Report of the HRC of 2017, a certain number of stakeholders regretted that Uganda failed to fully implement its commitments from the first Universal Periodic Review regarding freedom of expression, peaceful assembly and association. They also expressed concern over physical assaults on journalists and the harassment of political activists as well as human rights defenders, and urged for reforms to the Penal Code, the Press and Journalists Act and the Public Order Management Act of 2013 (A/HRC/34/2, paragraphs 688, 692, 693 and 694).

The Committee further notes with concern that penalties of imprisonment (involving compulsory prison labour) may be imposed under the following provisions of the Public Order Management Act, 2013: section 5(8) (disobedience of statutory duty in case of organizing a public meeting without any reasonable excuse); and section 8(4) (disobedience of lawful orders during public meetings).

In this regard, the Committee is bound to recall that Article 1(a) of the Convention prohibits all recourse to sanctions involving an obligation to perform labour, as a means of political coercion or as a punishment for holding or expressing political views, or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system. It also points out that the protection conferred by the Convention is not limited to activities expressing or manifesting opinions diverging from established principles; even if certain activities aim to bring about fundamental changes in state institutions, such activities are covered by the Convention, as long as they do not resort to, or call for, violent means to these ends. In light of the above considerations, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the above-mentioned provisions of the Public Order and Security Act, No. 20 of 1967, the Penal Code, and the Public Order Management Act of 2013 are amended or repealed so as to ensure that no prison sentence entailing compulsory labour can be imposed on persons who, without using or advocating violence, express certain political views or opposition to the established political, social or economic system. It requests the Government to provide information on measures taken in this regard.

Article 1(d). Penal sanctions involving compulsory labour as a punishment for having participated in strikes. The Committee previously noted that the Labour Disputes (Arbitration and Settlement) Act, 2006, contains provisions concerning the resolution and settlement of labour disputes which could lead to the imposition of compulsory arbitration procedures, thus making strikes or other industrial action unlawful. Strikes may be declared unlawful, for example, where the minister or the labour officer refers a dispute to the Industrial Court (section 28(4)) or where the Industrial Court makes an award which has come into force (section 29(1)). The organization of strikes in these circumstances is punishable with imprisonment (involving compulsory prison labour) pursuant to sections 28(6), 29(2) and (3) of the Act, and the Committee accordingly reminded the Government that such penalties were not in conformity with the Convention. In addition, the Committee noted that, under section 34(5) of the Labour Disputes (Arbitration and Settlement) Act, 2006, the minister may refer disputes in essential services to the Industrial Court, thus making illegal any collective withdrawal of labour in such services, with violation of this prohibition being punishable with imprisonment (involving an obligation to perform labour) (section 33(1) and (2) of the Act). The Committee requested the Government to take the necessary measures to bring the above-mentioned provisions of the Labour Disputes (Arbitration and Settlement) Act, 2006 into conformity with the Convention.

The Committee notes the absence of information on this point in the Government's report. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to bring the above-mentioned provisions of the Labour Disputes (Arbitration and Settlement) Act, 2006, into conformity with the Convention, either by removing the penalties of imprisonment involving compulsory labour, or restricting their scope to essential services in the strict sense of the term (namely those services, the interruption of which would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population), or to situations of acute national crisis. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on measures taken in this regard.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1956)

Articles 1(1), 2(1) and 25 of the Convention. Trafficking in persons. 1. Law enforcement and measures to combat trafficking in persons. In response to its previous comments, the Committee notes that the Government refers, in its report, to the 2016–2020 National Action Plan on combating trafficking in human beings and has communicated a copy of the 2018 implementation report on this Plan. It welcomes the detailed information therein on the activities taken to combat trafficking in persons, including multiple educational and awareness-raising activities, and the training of law enforcement officers, including prosecutors and judges.

The Committee also notes the 2018 report of the Group of Experts on Action against Trafficking in Human Beings (GRETA) concerning the implementation by Ukraine of the Council of Europe Convention on Action against Trafficking in Human Beings. The report notes a number of positive developments, such as the establishment of specialized police units and prosecutors, and a marked increase in the number of investigations into trafficking in persons between 2016 and 2017 (from 115 to 347). GRETA also emphasizes the importance of taking additional measures, such as ensuring that investigations into the offence of trafficking in persons also lead to convictions, and that sentences are proportionate to the gravity of the offence. In this respect, the Committee notes from the information in the 2018 implementation report and the reference in that report to the website of the State Judicial Administration, that in 2018 the police investigated 291 cases of trafficking in persons pursuant to section 149 of the Criminal Code on trafficking in human beings, 185 of which were referred to public prosecution, of which 168 were submitted to the courts, which resulted in 15 convictions, and five prison sentences. The Committee notes with concern the low number of convictions regarding trafficking in persons, despite the significant number of cases brought to justice. In this regard, the Committee recalls that, by virtue of Article 25 of the Convention, the exaction of forced or compulsory labour shall be punishable as a penal offence, and the penalties imposed by law shall be adequate and strictly enforced. The Committee therefore strongly urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure strict application of the national legislation, so that sufficiently effective and dissuasive penalties of imprisonment are imposed and enforced against perpetrators. The Committee further requests the Government to continue providing information on measures taken in this regard, including training and capacity building of law enforcement authorities, as well as on the results achieved. It also requests the Government to continue providing information on the number of prosecutions, convictions and specific penalties applied pursuant to section 149 of the Criminal Code.

2. Protection and assistance for victims. In its previous comment, the Committee welcomed the measures taken by the Government to identify and provide protection and assistance to the victims of trafficking in persons and requested the Government to continue to provide information on measures taken in this regard.

Concerning the identification of victims of trafficking in persons, the Committee notes, from the 2018 implementation report and the 2018 GRETA report, the information on the training provided to relevant actors and an upward trend in the number of victims identified by the Ministry of Social Policy (27 victims identified in 2014, 83 in 2015, 110 in 2016, 198 in 2017, and 221 in 2018). However, the Committee also notes from the 2018 GRETA report that statistical data on trafficking in persons remains largely unconsolidated, as different actors (law enforcement agencies, Ministry of Social Policy, International Organization for Migration (IOM), NGOs and social service providers) have their own statistics on the number of victims of trafficking in persons. The GRETA report also recommends the recruitment and training of a sufficient number of labour inspectors on trafficking in persons for the purpose of labour exploitation.

Concerning the provision of assistance and support for victims of human trafficking, the Committee notes that, according to the 2018 implementation report, such victims were provided with financial assistance and services, such as consultations on employment, legal aid, medical examinations and psychological assistance in two of the 27 regions. The Committee also notes the recommendations made by GRETA to ensure adequate funding and staff to work with victims of trafficking in persons, and to provide a sufficient number of places for all victims who need safe accommodation. Noting the information in the 2018 report on the implementation of the 2016–2020 National Action Plan on combating trafficking in human beings, the Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information on the protection and assistance provided to victims of trafficking in persons. In this regard, it requests the Government to continue to provide information on the number of victims identified, the types of assistance and services provided to them and the number of those who have benefited from such assistance and services. It also requested the Government to provide information on any progress made regarding measures taken, such as training of labour inspectors, use of indicators and tools, and cooperation between the relevant actors, to improve the identification of victims of trafficking.

3. Vulnerability of displaced people to trafficking in persons. In its previous comment, the Committee noted the indication in the 2015 report of the United Nations Special Rapporteur on the human rights of internally displaced persons that the number of internally displaced persons had dramatically increased since early June 2014 (A/HRC/29/34/Add.3, para. 7). The Committee also noted that according to the Situation Analysis of June 2016 on human trafficking in Ukraine, the IOM reported that internally displaced people were targeted by unscrupulous intermediaries who offered brokerage services for emigration and receiving refugee status abroad.

In this respect, the Committee notes that the 2016–2020 National Action Plan on combating trafficking in human beings provides for a number of preventive activities, particularly on the risks for internally displaced persons of becoming victims of trafficking, and that a proposal has been made to develop a guide with indicators for the identification of victims of trafficking, including internally displaced persons. The Committee also notes from the 2018 implementation report that some awareness-raising activities were undertaken, aimed at or with the participation of internally displaced persons. The Committee notes from the 2018 GRETA report that GRETA remains concerned by the negative consequences of the large number of internally displaced persons, who have been identified as being vulnerable to trafficking in persons, on the fight against human trafficking. The Committee requests the Government to continue to take measures to ensure that internally displaced persons, placed in a vulnerable situation, do not become victims of trafficking in persons.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 2000)

Article 1(a) of the Convention. Penal sanctions involving compulsory labour as a punishment for holding or expressing political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that under section 185-1 of the Code on Administrative Offences, a second breach (within a year) of the rules governing the organization and conduct of public meetings, street marches and demonstrations may be punishable with correctional labour for a term of up to two months. The Committee also noted the Government's indication that two Bills on the Freedom of Peaceful Assembly were tabled for consideration by the Parliament. The Bills proposed, inter alia, to define the legal framework concerning the organization and conduct of peaceful assemblies; and to amend or repeal section 185-1 of the Code on Administrative Offences with a view, as indicated in the preamble, to prevent politically motivated prohibitions of assemblies by the judiciary and arrests of protestors.

The Committee notes that the Government does not provide information on the progress made with regard to the amendment or repeal of section 185-1 of the Code on Administrative Offences. The Government indicates that section 185-1 provides penalties in the form of correctional labour in particular for violations of the procedures concerning organizing and holding gatherings, meetings, street marches and demonstrations, but not for the organization itself or for the participating in such gatherings. The requirements concerning organizing and holding peaceful gatherings are not yet established by law. The Committee notes that, according to the statistics provided by the Government, 43 cases were considered under section 185-1 of the Code, resulting in four administrative offence notices (including two warnings, a fine and a conviction to public labour). Furthermore, the Committee observes that the Government has not provided information on the facts based on which these administrative offences were imposed.

The Committee recalls that Article 1(a) of the Convention prohibits the use of compulsory labour as a punishment for holding or expressing political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system. The range of activities, which must be protected under this provision from punishment involving compulsory labour, comprises the freedom to express political or ideological views as well as various other generally recognized rights, such as the right of association and of assembly, through which citizens seek to secure the dissemination and acceptance of their views (see paragraph 302 of the 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions). The Committee reiterates the hope that in the framework of the adoption of the legislation on the freedom of assembly, the Government will take into account the comments of the Committee with a view to amending or repealing section 185-1 of the Code on Administrative Offences, so as to ensure that no sanctions involving compulsory labour may be imposed as a punishment on persons exercising their right to assemble peacefully. Pending the adoption of the relevant legislation, the Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the application in practice of section 185-1 of the Code on Administrative Offences, particularly concerning any persons who have been sanctioned to correctional work, indicating the facts that led to the legal proceedings and to the imposition of sanctions.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

United Arab Emirates

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1982)

Articles 1(1), 2(1) and 25 of the Convention. 1. Legal framework concerning migrant workers. In its previous comments, the Committee referred to the report adopted in March 2016 by the tripartite committee set up to examine the representation made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) alleging non-observance of Convention No. 29 by the United Arab Emirates. The Committee noted that in order to ensure that migrant workers do not face situations that increase their vulnerability to forced labour practices, the Government has adopted a number of legislative measures, including: Ministerial Decree No. 764 of 2015 on the Standard Employment Contract, and Ministerial Decree No. 766 of 2015 on Rules and Conditions for Granting a New Work Permit to a Worker whose Labour Relations with an Employer has Ended.

In this regard, the Committee requested the Government to provide information on the application in practice of the new legislation, in particular information on the following points: (a) recruitment fees, contract substitution, and passport confiscation issues; (b) the sponsorship system; (c) migrant domestic workers; (d) labour inspection and effective penalties; and (e) access to justice and protection of victims.

(a) Recruitment fees, contract substitution, and passport confiscation. The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that following the adoption of Ministerial Decree No. 764 of 2015 on the Standard Employment Contract, employers have the obligation to send the offer letter, which is a copy of the original employment contract to the worker in the sending country prior to departure. The offer letter must indicate all the terms and conditions of the contract, including the wage. Once the employment contract is signed and registered on the Ministry of Human Resources and Emiratization (MOHRE) database, the worker is granted the entry visa to the country. Any worker may have electronic access to a copy of the employment contract via the Ministry's site. Upon arrival of the worker, both the employer and the worker are instructed to visit one of the guidance centres that the MOHRE has established in partnership with the private sector. These centres aim to provide an induction programme to workers regarding the Labour Code and the residence laws of the country. In addition, both parties can sign the contract in these centres.

Regarding the Action Plan on migrant workers, the Government refers to a series of legislative measures that have been adopted since 2015, including: (i) the adoption of Ministerial Decree No. 765 of 2015 on Rules and Conditions for the Termination of Employment Relations; (ii) the signature of a series of Memoranda of Understanding with a number of countries to ensure that licenced recruitment agencies from both countries do not charge workers any fees; and (iii) the provision of adequate accommodation that meet strict occupational safety and health standards following the adoption of Ministerial Decree No. 212 of 2014. As per the issue of passport confiscation, the Committee notes the Government's indication that the Standard Employment contract for workers in the private sector provides for the right of workers to retain their identification documents. With regard to domestic workers, section 15(9) of Act No.10 of 2017 on domestic workers provides for the obligation of the employer to ensure the worker's right to retain his/her personal identification documents. The Government also indicates that, in cases brought by workers against employers over the withholding of passports, the court decision is always in favour of the worker and the employer is obliged to return the passport. In this regard, the Government refers to a series of judgements, including of the Cassation Court of September 2012, where the court referred to the freedom of travel and movement as rights guaranteed by the Constitution. In light of the above positive measures, the Committee requests the Government to continue to pursue its efforts to ensure that migrant workers are protected from abusive practices linked to contract substitutions, the imposition of recruitment fees and the confiscation of passports. It also requests the Government to provide information on the results achieved in this regard, including statistical data.

(b) Sponsorship system. Referring to Ministerial Decree No. 765 of 2015 on Rules and Conditions for the Termination of Employment Relations, the Committee notes the Government's indication that for a fixed-term contract of two years, either party can terminate the contract, either by mutual agreement of the two parties during the course of the term of the contract, or unilaterally, provided the terminating party complies with the legal procedures. This includes the observance of a notice period of up to three months and the compensation of the other party in accordance with the contract for wage arrears of no more than three months. According to the Government, the number of cases involving termination of employment contracts in accordance with Ministerial Decree No. 765, contracts during the period between January 2016 and December 2018 came to 2,932,062 cases. The Government also indicates that following the adoption of Decree No. 766 of 2015 on Rules and Conditions for Granting a New Work Permit to a Worker whose Labour Relations with an Employer has Ended, former employers no longer have the power to subject the worker to the threat of deportation or other negative practices. For the period between 2016 and 2018, the number of cases involving transfers to a new employer came to 229,971. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the number of employment transfers that have occurred recently, disaggregated by gender, type of work and contract.

(c) Migrant domestic workers. The Committee previously urged the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that migrant domestic workers are fully protected from abusive practices and conditions that amount to the exaction of forced labour, and to ensure that the Bill regulating the working conditions of migrant domestic workers will be adopted in the near future.

The Committee notes with satisfaction the adoption of Act No.10 of 2017 on domestic workers as well as the standard domestic labour contract and its annexes. It notes that the employment contract provides for the rights and obligations of both the worker and the employer, including the amount of the basic salary, the accommodation, and the daily and weekly rest periods (sections 15–18). Regarding the termination of the employment contract, section 23 of Act No.10 provides for the possibility for both the employer and the worker to terminate the contract unilaterally if one party fails to fulfil his/her obligations towards the other. In all instances of the termination of the contract, the MOHRE shall decide whether to grant a new work permit to the worker as per the regulations that are in force in the UAE (section 23(4)). Furthermore, the new employer is responsible for paying the fees for the transfer of sponsorship (kafala) and for the new residence permit to the worker. The employer also has the obligation to notify the MOHRE if the worker abstains from employment or is absent without valid reason. Likewise, the worker has the obligation to notify the MOHRE when leaving the workplace without the knowledge of the employer. With regard to conflict resolution, section 21 of the Act states that in the event that the employer and worker have a disagreement, the MOHRE will adjudicate the dispute. Migrant domestic workers can also refer to the Tad-beer Centres (support services established following the adoption of Ministerial Decree No. 819 of 2017) to seek legal support. These centres are dedicated to providing all services relating to migrant domestic workers upon their arrival in the country. This includes the provision of a medical examination, the issuance of health insurance and ID cards and stamping of the residence visa. The Government further indicates that MOHRE has recently issued the Ghanayem bank card for domestic workers as a smart multi-purpose bank ID card with a variety of features, including serving as an electronic wallet. It also provides a new automated system to monitor transfer transactions to ensure that domestic workers' wages are protected and to transfer salaries quickly while ensuring the confidentiality of both the client's and the MOHRE's information. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the application in practice of Act No.10 of 2017 on domestic workers, including statistical information on the number of employment transfers of migrant domestic workers that have taken place since the entry into force of the Act.

(d) Labour inspection and effective penalties. The Committee notes the Government's indication that 1,146 cases of violations were detected by the labour inspection, including 1,144 cases of late payment of wages involving 80,633 migrant workers. The two other remaining cases were linked to illegal salary deductions and failure to calculate overtime pay. For all these cases, the judicial decisions handed down have required the payment of fines. The Committee takes note of judgment No. 1 of 2016, judgment No. 45 of 2017, and judgment No. 49 of 2017, annexed to the Government's report, that illustrate the high fines imposed. The Committee further notes that sections 19 and 20 of Act No. 10 of 2017 on domestic workers grant labour inspectors the possibility to inspect the places of residence of the domestic worker in the event of a complaint being raised by the worker or if there are credible indications of violations of the provisions of the Act. The Committee requests the Government to indicate whether any inspections were carried out pursuant to sections 19 and 20 of Act No. 10 on domestic workers, indicating cases of violations that have been detected and registered by the labour inspectors, as well as the penalties applied for such violations.

(e) Access to justice and protection of victims. The Committee notes the Government's indication that in 2018 the MOHRE launched the Tawa-Fouq (reconciliation) centres for labour disputes resolution involving migrant workers. These centres perform a preliminary role of mediation to resolve the labour dispute amicably. They issue recommendations that they submit to the MOHRE. The latter is authorized to take the final decision over whether the dispute is resolved amicably or is referred to the judiciary. In this regard, the judicial departments have established a standard form on the manner in which workers may bring a case, comprising an integrated case file. This is submitted electronically to the judicial departments. The Government also refers to Ministerial Decree No. 749 of 2018 on settling collective labour disputes where more than 100 workers from the disputing parties are involved. A conciliation committee shall settle the dispute amicably within ten days. If the dispute settlement fails, it will be brought to the arbitration committee that shall consider the dispute within 30 days.

Regarding the protection and assistance provided to migrant workers, the Committee notes the Government's information on the measures taken to protect victims of trafficking in persons that are also applicable to migrant workers. The Committee requests the Government to continue to take the necessary measures to ensure that migrant workers can approach the competent authorities and access justice mechanisms, without fear of retaliation. It also requests the Government to provide statistical information on the number of migrant workers, including migrant domestic workers, who have had recourse to legal assistance from the* Tawa-Fouq *(reconciliation) centres, as well as the outcome of the labour disputes. It requests the Government to indicate whether the legal assistance provided in the reconciliation centres is available in the language spoken by the migrant worker. Lastly, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the judicial proceedings instigated and the number of judgements handed down in this regard.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1997)

Article 1(a) of the Convention. Penal sanctions involving compulsory labour as a punishment for holding or expressing political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system. 1. Federal Act No. 15 of 1980. For a number of years, the Committee has been referring to the following provisions of Federal Act No. 15 of 1980 governing publications and publishing, under which penal sanctions involving compulsory prison labour may be imposed (by virtue of sections 86 and 89 of the Penitentiaries Regulations Act No. 43 of 1992), for the violation of the following provisions:

- section 70: prohibition on criticizing the Head of State or the rulers of the Emirates;
- section 71: prohibition on publishing documents harmful to Islam, or to the Government, or to the country's interests or the basic systems on which society is founded;
- section 76: prohibition on publishing material containing information shameful to the Head of State of an Arab or Muslim country or a country with friendly ties, as well as material which may threaten the ties of the country with Arab, Muslim or friendly countries;
- section 77: prohibition on publishing material which causes an injustice to Arabs or constitutes a misrepresentation of Arab civilization or cultural heritage;
- section 81: prohibition on publishing material which harms the national currency or causes confusion over the economic situation of a country.

The Committee requested the Government to take the necessary measures to amend the above provisions and to ensure that the ensuing amendments, which would be contained in the draft Act on media activities, would be in conformity with the Convention.

The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that the draft Act regulating media activities is still under consideration and has not been adopted to date. The Committee once again expresses the firm hope that the Government will take the necessary measures to amend or repeal the above-mentioned provisions within the framework of the adoption of the draft Act on media activities, in order to ensure that no sanctions involving compulsory labour (including compulsory prison labour), can be imposed for holding or expressing political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on any progress made in the adoption of this draft Act, as well as a copy of the text once adopted.

2. Penal Code. Over a number of years, the Committee has been drawing the Government's attention to the incompatibility with the Convention of certain provisions of the Penal Code which prohibit the establishment of an organization or the convening of a meeting or conference for the purpose of attacking or mistreating the foundations or teachings of the Islamic religion, or calling for the observance of another religion, with such offences being punishable with imprisonment for a maximum period of ten years (sections 317 and 320). It also referred to sections 318 and 319 of the Penal Code pursuant to which a prison sentence could be imposed involving an obligation to work, on any person who is a member of an association specified in section 317, who challenges the foundations or teachings of the Islamic religion, proselytizes another religion or advocates a related ideology. The Committee expressed its firm hope that appropriate measures would be taken to bring the above-mentioned sections into conformity with the Convention.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that the application of articles 318 and 320 is strictly limited and the number of cases in which the provisions of these articles have been applied are minimal and usually receive a suspended sentence with deportation. In this regard, the Government refers to Criminal Court judgement No. 12311/2002, issued in December 2002 against a certain person. The defendant has been accused of criticizing the principles of the Islamic religion and of possessing and disseminating publications and items offensive to this religion. The Public Prosecution charged him based on sections 318, 320 and 323 of the Penal Code. The person was sentenced to one year's imprisonment, with deportation from the country. The Government adds that, the penalty of imprisonment was not applied in practice, and the Court settled for the deportation of the accused from the country on condition that he did not commit the same offence on the territory of the country within the next three years.

The Committee observes that, although the penalty of imprisonment was not applied in practice for this case, this does not imply an exemption of its application in other similar cases, as long as sections 317-320 of the Penal Code provide for sanctions of imprisonment, involving an obligation to work. The Committee, therefore, once again expresses its firm hope that appropriate measures will be taken to bring sections 317–320 of the Penal Code into conformity with the Convention, for example, by limiting their scope to acts of violence or incitement to violence or by replacing sanctions involving compulsory labour with other kinds of sanctions, (such as fines) and that the Government will soon be in a position to report on the progress made in this regard. Pending the adoption of such amendments, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the application in practice of sections 317–320, including copies of any relevant court decisions, and indicating the penalties imposed and the facts giving rise to the convictions.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1931) and Protocol of 2014 (ratification: 2016)

The Committee notes the information provided by the Government in its 2019 report as well as the supplementary information provided by the Government in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020). The Committee also notes the observations of the Trades Union Congress (TUC), received on 30 August 2019, and the Government's reply to those observations, received on 12 November 2019. It notes that the TUC sent supplementary information on 1 October 2020.

Recalling that in January 2016 the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland ratified the Protocol of 2014 to the Forced Labour Convention, 1930, the Committee observes that the Government has not provided a detailed report on the application of its provisions. The Committee requests the Government to provide in its next report information on the questions raised below as well as on measures taken to implement each provision of the Protocol.

Articles 1(1), 2(1) and 25 of the Convention. Suppressing all forms of forced labour, including trafficking in persons. 1. National strategies. In its previous comments, the Committee noted with interest the measures taken to strengthen the legislative and institutional framework to combat all forms of forced labour and encouraged the Government to pursue its efforts and provide information on the implementation of the various strategies adopted. The Committee notes the Government's indication that in July 2018, it commissioned an Independent Review of the Modern Slavery Act 2015. The Government has accepted or partially accepted the majority of the recommendations contained in the final report. Among the measures taken, the Government indicates that it is considering how to strengthen the independence of the Independent Anti-Slavery Commissioner (IASC), which has among its tasks to prepare a new strategic plan. The Committee also notes that the Government publishes annual reports on progress made on tackling slavery. According to these reports, the Government agrees that improving evidence of the scale and nature of modern slavery is a priority, considering that this is a complex and largely hidden crime. The Government established the Modern Slavery Policy and Evidence Centre in autumn 2019, which commissioned new research to enhance the evidence-based reports on modern slavery and improve understanding thereof.

In relation to Scotland, the Committee notes the publication of annual progress reports on the implementation of the Human Trafficking and Exploitation Strategy adopted in May 2017. The strategy covers three areas: victim identification and support; identification of perpetrators and disruption of their activities; and root causes of trafficking and exploitation. According to the 2020 UK Annual Report on modern slavery, while the Strategy was considered fit for purpose, the Scottish Government is committed to working with all partners and other interests to develop a revised and updated Strategy.

The Committee notes that in Northern Ireland, the Department of Justice developed in partnership with statutory organizations and NGOs, its third Modern Slavery Strategy for 2019–2020 around three key themes: pursue, protect and prevent. The Committee observes that the Organized Crime Task Force (OCTF) regularly monitors progress made and documents results in its annual reports. The Government also indicates that the OCTF provides a strategic partnership forum and helps to develop strong relationships between statutory partners to address modern slavery.

The Committee welcomes the measures taken to continue to develop national strategies to address all forms of forced labour, and to assess regularly the impact of the measures taken. The Committee requests the Government to indicate whether the Independent Anti-Slavery Commissioner (IASC) has adopted a new strategic plan and, if so, to provide information on the measures envisaged and the steps taken for their implementation. It also requests the Government to provide information on any revised strategy adopted for Northern Ireland and Scotland. The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed and concrete information on the results of the regular assessments of these strategies, the obstacles identified and the measures taken to overcome them. It requests the Government to indicate the manner in which the social partners are consulted on the development and implementation of the strategies.

2. Measures to support due diligence to prevent and respond to risks of forced labour. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that under the Modern Slavery Act 2015, certain commercial organizations must disclose a slavery and human trafficking statement for each financial year indicating what they are doing to eradicate modern slavery from their organizations and their supply chains. The Committee notes that while welcoming this provision, the TUC considers that its application has not resulted in sufficient or quality statements. Companies can report that they have taken no steps to combat modern slavery. In relation to public procurement, the TUC indicates that the Government should be using the huge leverage of the public sector buying to raise the level of due diligence on human rights across the board, by ensuring that negligent companies cannot access procurement contracts.

In its reply, the Government indicates that it has put in place a central reporting service for annual transparency in supply chain statements; extended the transparency requirements to the public sector; and developed tools and guidance to support how public bodies conduct modern slavery due diligence. Under the Public Contracts Regulations 2015, bidders for public contracts who have been convicted of child labour or human trafficking offences under the Modern Slavery Act within the last 5 years must be excluded from public procurements. In March 2020, the first Government Modern Slavery Statement was published, which outlines the steps undertaken to drive responsible practices and prevent risks in Government supply chains. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the steps taken to support companies and public bodies to take measures to identify, prevent, mitigate and account for how they address the risks of forced labour in their operations or in products or services to which they may be directly linked.

3. Identification and protection of victims. The Committee notes that according to the 2020 UK Annual Report on modern slavery, in 2019, there were 10,627 potential victims referred to the national referral mechanism (NRM) by first responders (a 52 per cent increase from 2018). Victims came mainly from the United Kingdom, Albania, Vietnam, China and India. The most common reported exploitation type was labour exploitation (52 per cent), followed by sexual exploitation (33 per cent). According to the report, the increase in NRM referrals is likely to be indicative of greater awareness of the NRM and improved law enforcement activity. The Committee notes the Government's indication that in Scotland, regulations have set to 90 days the period during which the provision of support and assistance to adult victims is considered necessary, taking into account the victims' needs. It also notes the funding agreements concluded with NGOs in Scotland and Northern Ireland for the provision of material assistance and medical support to a growing number of victims (from 158 victims in 2016-2017 to 251 in 2018-2019 in Scotland; and from 20 to 38 in Northern Ireland for the same period).

The Committee notes that, in its observations, the TUC indicates that first responder organizations that refer victims to the NRM receive insufficient training on the identification and support of victims, and on the different steps of the NRM process. The TUC refers in particular to the process for reviewing negative decisions concerning the status of a victim (reasonable grounds decisions and conclusive grounds decisions). The TUC also refers to barriers in access to compensation, and emphasizes that assistance provided to victims should not be linked to a definite timeframe but rather respond to their needs.

The Committee notes that in its reply, the Government indicates that it has started a multi-agency review to identify what training first responders should receive and how it should be delivered. It also states that the Home Office is embarking on an ambitious NRM Transformation Programme to improve the decision-making process, and address the challenges faced in delivering needs-based support for victims.

The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the results achieved by the NRM Transformation Programme and on the measures taken to ensure that assistance and support is provided as soon as there are reasonable grounds to believe that a person is a victim of modern slavery and that this support is provided over a sufficient period of time for their recovery and rehabilitation. It requests the Government provide specific information on the number of victims who have benefitted from the different types of assistance (medical, psychological, material and legal support as well as temporary resident or work permits). The Committee also requests the Government to communicate statistics on the number of persons referred to the NRM, the number of negative reasonable or conclusive grounds decisions and the number of such decisions that have been reviewed by the competent authority.

4. Protection of migrant workers from possible abusive and fraudulent practices. The Committee notes that in its observation, the TUC indicates that the Government is planning to introduce a number of temporary sector specific migration programmes for EEA and non EEA workers. The TUC alleges that such sector specific visas present high risks for migrant workers by providing them an insecure status and requests the Government to ensure that the schemes adopted will be designed to create resilience to exploitation. The Committee also notes that the TUC indicates that analysis of government enforcement agencies shows that bodies tasked with protecting victims of modern slavery are also sharing information on their immigration status. The TUC expresses concern at this practice of reporting information on status by labour inspectors, which undermines the aims of victim identification, prevention of modern slavery and prosecutions. The Committee recalls in this regard that according to Article 4 of the Protocol all victims of forced labour, irrespective of their legal status in the national territory, shall have access to appropriate and effective remedies, such as compensation. The Committee requests the Government to provide its reply to the TUC's observations and to indicate the measures taken to ensure that migrant workers are not placed in a position of accrued vulnerability to exploitation, are protected from abusive practices, have knowledge of their rights and have effective access to justice.

5. Law enforcement. The Committee takes note of the information provided by the Government on the measures taken to continue to improve awareness, training and capacities of frontline police officers and prosecutors, including through the Modern Slavery Police Transformation Programme in England and Wales; the appointment of a National Lead Prosecutor for Human Trafficking in Scotland; the issuance of guidance on identification and reporting of potential victims for frontline officers and the installation of specialized teams in the Public Prosecution Service (PPS) and the Police Service of Northern Ireland (PSNI). The Committee observes that, according to the 2020 UK Annual Report on Modern Slavery, in June 2020, there were 1,845 active law enforcement investigations, compared with 1,479 in June 2019. The number of prosecutions and convictions have also increased in England and Wales. The Committee notes that in Northern Ireland, the PSNI appoints a financial investigator for all modern slavery and human trafficking investigations and the assets of every potential suspect are considered for seizure. The Government also refers to the first two human trafficking convictions under the new Northern Ireland legislation, emphasizing that these cases did not rely on evidence provided by victims since no potential victims entered the NRM process pre-conviction. The Committee also notes the Government's indication that new legislation has broadened the remit and strengthened the powers of the Gangmasters and Labour Abuse Authority (GLAA) which has investigated serious cases of labour exploitation across the entire economy in partnership with other enforcement bodies (the Employment Agency Standards (EAS) and the HMRC National Minimum Wage (NMW)).

The Committee encourages the Government to continue to strengthen the capacity of law enforcement bodies to properly identify and address situations of forced labour so that cases may be successfully prosecuted and effective and dissuasive sanctions imposed on perpetrators. It requests the Government to continue to provide information on the number of investigations, prosecutions and convictions. The Committee also requests the Government to provide more detailed information on the confiscation of assets of perpetrators as well as on slavery and trafficking reparation orders against offenders to compensate the victims.

Article (2)(2)(c). Privatization of prisons and prison labour. Work of prisoners for private companies. For a number of years, the Committee has been requesting the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that formal, freely given and informed consent is required for the work of prisoners in privately operated prisons, as well as for all work of prisoners for private companies, both inside and outside prison premises.

The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that it continues to have in place a robust set of rules and regulations that ensure prisoner labour is not abused. The Government reiterates that it believes that work in prisons falls within the second exception in the Convention by ensuring public sector supervision of prison work carried out in both public and private sector prisons by means of: retaining rehabilitation as the primary purpose of the work; rigorous, independent inspections of both public and private sector prisons and workshops; the strong legislative framework that protects working conditions of prisoners; and their access to effective systems for complaints. The Government adds that work in prisons is a key part of successful prison whether public or private sectors operate it. It serves a number of important functions: providing prisoners with a purposeful activity; giving structure and meaning to prisoners' days; contributing to improving prisoners' mental and physical health; and most importantly, preparing prisoners for employment on release. The Government indicates that its flexible approach has enabled it to access new and innovative markets and to work with customers in novel ways, including employers opening employment academies in prison. The Government reiterates that it is keen to continually grow the number of employers who can provide valuable vocational work for offenders while in prison and who are able to offer them support in preparation for release and employment opportunities following their release.

While acknowledging the objective of rehabilitation pursued by the Government in providing work to convicted prisoners, the Committee is bound to reiterate that the privatization of prison labour exceeds the express conditions provided in Article 2(2)(c) of the Convention for exempting compulsory prison labour from the scope of the Convention. The Committee has already pointed out that Article 2(2)(c) expressly prohibits that convicted prisoners are hired to or placed at the disposal of private individuals, companies or associations, in the sense that the exception from the scope of the Convention provided for in this Article for compulsory prison labour does not extend to work of prisoners for private employers (including privatized prisons and prison workshops), even under public supervision and control. Thus, to be compatible with the Convention, the work of prisoners for private companies must not involve compulsion. It must require the formal, freely given and informed consent of the persons concerned, as well as further guarantees and safeguards covering the essential elements of a labour relationship, such as the level of wages, the extent of social security, and the application of regulations on safety and health. As the Committee has repeatedly pointed out, in spite of the express prohibition for prisoners to be hired to or placed at the disposal of private parties under the terms of the Convention, it is nevertheless fully possible for governments to apply the Convention when designing or implementing a system of privatized prison labour, once the above-mentioned requirements are complied with. Therefore, the Committee once again urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that formal, freely given and informed consent is required for the work of prisoners in privately operated prisons, as well as for all work of prisoners for private companies, both inside and outside prison premises, with such consent being authenticated by the conditions of work approximating those of a free labour relationship.

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1962)

Articles 1(1), 2(1) and 25 of the Convention. Trafficking in persons. Penalties and law enforcement. The Committee previously noted that pursuant to section 4 of the Anti-Trafficking in Persons Act (No. 6 of 2008), trafficking in persons is an offence, punishable with a fine of between 5 million Tanzanian shillings (TZS) and TZS100 million (approximately US$3,172–$63,577), or to imprisonment for a term of not less than two years and not more than ten years, or both. Pursuant to section 5 of the Act, a person who promotes, procures or facilitates the commission of trafficking in persons commits an offence, and is liable to a fine of between TZS2 million and TZS50 million (approximately US$1,272–US$31,083), or to imprisonment for a term of not less than one year, but not more than seven years, or both. The Committee, however, noted from the Government's replies to the list of issues of the United Nations Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW), in February 2015, an instance where an Indian national who was convicted of trafficking eight Nepalese girls was sentenced to ten years' imprisonment or to pay a fine of TZS15 million. The perpetrator paid the fine and was released (CEDAW/C/TZA/Q/7-8/Add.1, paragraph 84). Referring to paragraph 319 of the 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, the Committee recalled that, when the sanction consists only of a fine or a very short prison sentence, it does not constitute an effective sanction in light of the seriousness of the violation and the fact that the sanctions need to be dissuasive. The Committee therefore requested the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the Anti-Trafficking in Persons Act was applied effectively so that sufficiently effective and dissuasive penalties of imprisonment are imposed and enforced in practice in all cases and to continue providing information on its application in practice.

The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that one of the recommendations that came up during the National Dialogue with key stakeholders convened in July 2018 was to review the provisions relating to penalties under the Anti-Trafficking in Persons Act and also to include the provision of "attempt" as one of the grounds in establishing the crime of trafficking during prosecution. The Committee further notes the Government's information that from 2016 to 2018, 76 cases of trafficking in persons were reported, 50 cases were investigated and 60 persons were convicted. However, the Government report does not provide information on the penalties imposed on the persons convicted for the offences related to trafficking in persons. In this regard, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that in practice, sufficiently effective and dissuasive penalties are imposed and enforced against perpetrators in all cases related to the trafficking of persons. It also requests the Government to continue to provide information on the number of investigations, prosecutions and convictions related to trafficking in persons, as well as the specific penalties applied to those convicted. The Committee further requests the Government to provide information on any progress made with regard to the revision of the Anti-Trafficking Act.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1962)

Imprisonment involving an obligation to work. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted the Government's repeated statement that imprisonment does not involve an obligation to perform work by virtue of Part XI of the Prison Act of 1967, including in Zanzibar. However, the Committee noted that, pursuant to section 61 of the Prison Act, every prisoner sentenced to imprisonment and detained in prison shall be employed in such a manner as the Commissioner may determine, and for that purpose such prisoner shall, at all times, perform such labour, tasks and other duties as may be assigned to him/her by the officer-in-charge or any other prison officer in whose charge he/she may be. Section 50 of the Offenders Education Act of 1980 of Zanzibar contains the same provision. The Committee observed that prisoners are required to perform labour as determined by the Commissioner and assigned to him/her by the prison officer and that the consent of the prisoner is not required by both the laws. Therefore the following provisions referred to by the Committee, of which the violation is punishable by imprisonment, fall within the scope of the Convention.

Article 1(a) of the Convention. Penalties involving compulsory labour as a punishment for the expression of political views. 1. Media. In its previous comments, the Committee noted with regret that the Media Services Act No. 12 of 2016, which repealed the Newspapers Act of 1976 under Part VII on Offences and Penalties, established penalties of imprisonment for the violation of the Act. It noted that the relevant provisions are worded in terms broad enough to lend themselves to application as a means of punishment for the expression of political views or views opposed to the established political, social or economic system. These provisions include:

- Section 50, which provides that any person who makes use by any means of a media service for the purpose of publishing information which intentionally or recklessly falsified in a manner which, or any statement the content of which, threatens the interests of defence, public order, the economic interests of the country, public morality or public health, commits an offence and is punishable by three to five years' imprisonment.
- Section 51, which provides that any persons who imports, publishes, sells, offers for sale, distributes or produces any publication or any extract of it, the importation of which is prohibited, commits an offence and is punishable by three to five years' imprisonment for the first offence, and five to ten years' imprisonment for a subsequent offence.
- Sections 52 and 53, which provide that any act, speech or publication with a seditious intention, including the sales, distribution, reproduction and importation of such publication, is punishable by three to five years' imprisonment for the first offence, and five to ten years' imprisonment for a subsequent offence. The possession of such publication is punishable by two to five years' imprisonment for the first offence, and three to ten years' imprisonment for a subsequent offence.
- Section 54, which provides that any person who publishes any false statement, rumour or report which is likely to cause fear and alarm to the public or to disturb the public peace commits an offence and is punishable by four to six years' imprisonment.

The Committee also noted that, according to the statement of the United Nations Country Team with regard to the Universal Periodic Review on Tanzania in 2015, since the Media Services Act stipulates that no person will be allowed to practice journalism unless accredited by the journalist accreditation board, its enactment will lead to the suppression of citizen journalists and other volunteer journalists working with community radio stations (A/HRC/WG.6/25/TZA/2, paragraph 40). The Committee requested the Government to take the necessary measures to amend the provisions of the Media Services Act No.12 of 2016 so as to bring them into conformity with the provisions of the Convention.

The Committee notes an absence of information in the Government's report on this point. The Committee observes that the United Nations Human Rights Office of the High Commissioner published a number of news releases in 2020 on the situation of civil liberties in Tanzania. The Committee notes in particular that in a news release of 22 July 2020, three Special Rapporteurs referred to evidence illustrating the deterioration of the human rights situation since 2016, when political gatherings by opposition groups were barred with repeated arrests of opposition members, activists and critics. They observed that there exists a string of newly enacted legislation used to intimidate human rights defenders, silence independent journalism and further restrict freedoms of expression, peaceful assembly and association. In its news release of 17 March 2020, "Tanzania: Opposition sentences highlight continued stifling of freedoms", the United Nations Human Rights Office of the High Commissioner referred to the recent sentencing of eight senior members and one former senior leader of Tanzania's main opposition party, on charges including sedition and unlawful assembly, as a "troubling evidence of the crackdown on dissent and the stifling of public freedoms in the country".

The Committee takes note of this information with concern. It expresses the firm hope that the Government will take the necessary measures to amend the above-mentioned provisions of the Media Services Act No. 12 of 2016 and ensure that persons expressing political views or views opposed to the established political, social or economic system are not subject to penalties of imprisonment involving compulsory labour, whether by restricting the scope of these provisions to situations connected with the use of violence or incitement to violence, or by repealing sanctions involving compulsory labour. The Committee once again requests the Government to provide information on the application of the above-mentioned provisions, including any prosecutions conducted or court decisions handed down, and the penalties imposed.

2. Meetings, assemblies and organizations. Non-governmental Organizations Act. The Committee previously noted that section 11 of the Non-Governmental Organizations (NGO) Act of 2002 requires all NGOs to apply for registration with the registrar and that, pursuant to section 13(3), this application for registration may be approved or refused. Section 14(1) of the Act provides that the registration of an NGO may be refused if, inter alia, the activities of an NGO are not for the public interest or on the recommendation of the National Council for NGOs. Section 35 of the Act provides for penalties of a fine or imprisonment (involving compulsory labour) for a term not exceeding one year, or both, for the offences of, inter alia, operating an NGO without obtaining registration. The Committee noted the Government's statement that no convictions were made under section 35 of the NGO Act and that certain provisions of the NGO Act relating to the registration of NGOs had been ruled unconstitutional by the High Court. With reference to paragraph 302 of the General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, 2012, the Committee once again recalled that, under Article 1(a) of the Convention, the range of activities that must be protected from punishment involving compulsory labour comprises the freedom to express political or ideological views as well as the right of association and of assembly, through which citizens seek to secure the dissemination and acceptance of their views.

The Committee notes that the Government's report does not contain any information in this regard. The Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the above-mentioned provisions of the NGO Act are not applied in a manner which could result in the imposition of penalties of imprisonment, involving compulsory labour, to persons who hold or express political views or views opposed to the established system.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1991)

Article 1(d) of the Convention. Sanctions involving compulsory labour for participation in strikes. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, pursuant to article 12, section 95-98.1, of the North Carolina General Statutes, strikes by public employees are declared illegal and against the public policy of the State. Persons who violate article 12 may be subject to "community punishment" and, upon a second conviction to imprisonment (section 95–99 of the North Carolina General Statutes; section 15A-1340.11 and section 15A-1340.23 of chapter 15A (Criminal Procedure Act)). The Committee also noted that the imposition of community punishment may include assignment to the State's Community Service Work Programme, and that all able-bodied prison inmates shall be required to perform diligently all work assignments provided for them (article 3, section 148-26, of chapter 148 (State Prison System)). The Committee further noted that the observations of the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations (AFL–CIO) according to which, as sections 95–98.1 and 95–99 might have a chilling effect on public sector workers who might otherwise decide to engage in strikes, these provisions should be repealed or amended.

The Committee once again notes the Government's indication in its report that State court records continue to be devoid of any instance in which an individual has been convicted of engaging in an unlawful public-sector strike. In the unlikely event that an individual were to be so convicted, North Carolina law would not require the judge to order the public sector employee to perform work in violation of the Convention. The judge would have discretion to impose only a fine.

Observing that it has been raising this issue for more than a decade, the Committee must once again recall that Article 1(d) of the Convention prohibits the use of any form of forced or compulsory labour as a punishment for having participated in strikes. Referring to the explanations contained in paragraph 315 of its 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, the Committee recalls that, regardless of the legality of the strike action, any sanctions imposed should not be disproportionate to the seriousness of the violations committed, and that in both legislation and practice, no sanctions involving compulsory labour should be imposed for the mere fact of organizing or peacefully participating in strikes. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to bring the North Carolina General Statutes into conformity with both the Convention and the indicated practice, by ensuring the repeal or amendment of sections 95–98.1 and 95–99, so as to ensure that penalties of compulsory labour (through the Community Service Work Programme or during imprisonment) cannot be imposed for participation in a strike.

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1995)

The Committee takes note of the Government's report received in 2019 as well as the supplementary information provided in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020).

Article 2(2)(c). Work exacted as a consequence of a conviction in a court of law. Prison labour. 1. Legislative developments. The Committee previously noted that according to Legislative Decree No. 14.470 regulating conditions of imprisonment, convicted prisoners have an obligation to work and that in certain special circumstances the prison authority may conclude an agreement with public or private organizations concerning the use of prison labour and of prison workshops (sections 41 and 44). It noted that such agreements had been concluded since the Government indicated that a number of prisoners were working for private enterprises. In that regard, the Committee also noted the Government's statement that, despite the above-mentioned provisions, work in prison is voluntary, and that according to the provisions of paragraph 65 of Decree No. 225/006 of 13 July 2006, before starting any work, convicted prisoners must give their consent in writing.

The Committee notes the adoption of Act No. 19.889 on urgent consideration (Ley de Urgente Consideración (LUC)) of 9 July 2020 which amends section 41 of Decree No. 14.470 and provides that: (i) convicted prisoners have an obligation to work, and (ii) the failure of convicted prisoners to comply with such an obligation will not be penalized by the removal of rights but will entail the reduction of their benefits as determined by regulations. The Committee notes that not only does the newly amended section 41 of Decree No. 14.470 provide for an obligation to work of convicted prisoners, but it also provides that convicted prisoners who refuse to work can be punished by reducing their benefits, thereby amounting to a "menace of a penalty" under the terms of the Convention. In that regard, the Committee recalls that work by prisoners for private enterprises can be held compatible with the Convention only where the necessary safeguards exist to ensure that the prisoners concerned offer themselves voluntarily, by giving their free, formal and informed consent and without being subjected to pressure or the menace of any penalty, including the loss of a right or a privilege (advantage), and that this work is performed under conditions which approximate a free labour relationship (see 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, paragraphs 279 and 291).

In light of the above considerations, the Committee trusts that the Government will take the necessary measures to ensure that, both in legislation and in practice, prisoners carrying out work for private entities, as provided under section 44 of Legislative Decree No 14.470, do so only with their free, formal and informed consent, and that the conditions of such work approximate those of a free labour relationship. It requests the Government to provide information on any progress made in that regard. In the meantime, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the interplay of new section 41 of Legislative Decree No. 14.470 with other regulations on prison labour, in particular paragraph 65 of Decree No. 225/006.

2. Prison labour in the framework of public–private partnerships. The Committee previously noted that, following a call for tenders in December 2012, a prison was under construction in the context of a public–private partnership for the first time in Uruguay. It requested the Government to indicate whether the issue of labour by prisoners was covered in the public–private partnership contract, and to indicate whether the private entity selected to finance and construct the prison was required to fulfil certain obligations in relation to the provision and management of prison labour.

The Committee notes the Government's statement, in its report, that neither the call for tenders nor the public–private partnership contract contain any provision or obligation concerning the issue of work by prisoners. Noting that the above-mentioned prison, Unit No. 1 of Punta de Rieles, was inaugurated in January 2018, the Committee notes the Government's statement that prisoners work in internal services and maintenance activities within the establishment. The Government refers to several documents containing information on the consent, remuneration and conditions of work by prisoners which were not attached to its report, namely: (i) model contracts signed with a private entity regulating the work of prisoners within Unit No. 1; (ii) labour regulations for prisoners who work for the private entity; and (iii) a code of conduct for prisoners who work for the private entity. The Government adds that the authority responsible for monitoring the compliance with the public–private partnership contract requests monthly information on the obligations regarding work which are applicable to all persons working within the prison, regardless of whether they are prisoners or not. The Committee refers to its above comments underlining the need to ensure that prisoners carrying out work for private entities give their free, formal and informed consent to work, and requests the Government to provide detailed information on the manner in which prisoners express interest and give consent to work within the framework of the public–private partnership. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the remuneration and conditions of work of these workers, and to communicate any relevant document available in this regard, including the model contracts, the labour regulations and the code of conduct referred to above. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the content of the monthly information on the obligations regarding work within the prison collected by the authority responsible for monitoring the compliance with the public–private partnership contract.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1997)

The Committee notes the observations of the International Union of Food, Agricultural, Hotel, Restaurant, Catering, Tobacco and Allied Workers' Associations (IUF) received on 8 October 2020. Not having received other supplementary information from the Government, the Committee repeats its comments adopted in 2019 and reproduced below.

The Committee also notes the observations of the IUF received on 30 August 2019.

Article 1(b) of the Convention. Mobilization and use of labour for purposes of economic development in agriculture (cotton production). In its previous comments, the Committee noted the allegations made by the IUF that the Government of Uzbekistan continued to impose a state system of forced labour for the economic purpose of producing cotton. It also noted the International Trade Union Confederation's (ITUC) observations that there were a number of cases of involuntary engagement of workers as well as cases of extortion for replacement payments by local authorities which needed to be investigated and prosecuted. In this regard, the Committee noted the information provided by the Council of the Federation of Trade Unions of Uzbekistan (CFTUU) on the various measures taken within the framework of cooperation between Uzbekistan, the ILO and the World Bank for the implementation of ILO Conventions on child and forced labour in 2016, including training courses and seminars on international labour standards and their implementation for employees of ministries, departments, NGOs and farmers; awareness-raising campaigns against child and forced labour; and monitoring and implementation of the Feedback Mechanism (FBM). Moreover, at a round table discussion held in Tashkent and entitled "Status and Prospects for Cooperation between Uzbekistan and the ILO" all the participants, including representatives of the ILO, IOE, ITUC, World Bank, UNDP, UNICEF and diplomatic representatives expressed their commitment and willingness to cooperate closely with Uzbekistan.

The Committee further noted the results of the ILO quantitative survey on employment practices in the agricultural sector conducted by the research centre (Ekspecrt fikri) which indicated a decrease in the number of cotton pickers from 3.2 million in 2014 to 2.8 million in 2015; an increase in the number of voluntary participants in the 2015 cotton harvest; and a decrease in the number of medical employees, educational workers and students among the cotton pickers. The Committee finally noted from the report of the ILO, Third Party Monitoring and Assessment of Measures to Reduce the Risk of Child Labour and Forced Labour during the 2016 cotton harvest (TPM report) that since the 2015 harvest, the Government had made further commitments against child and forced labour, especially within the Action Plan for Improving Labour Conditions, Employment and Social Protection of Workers in the Agricultural Sector 2016–2018. Several training workshops to build the capacity of officials, including Hokims (regional governors), were conducted before the harvest with ministries, organizations and entities involved at all levels. Public awareness campaigns during the harvest reached remote villages, and messages on child and forced labour, on labour rights, and on the FBM hotline were distributed nationwide. Referring to the preliminary results of the ILO quantitative survey, the TPM report indicated that of the 2.8 million cotton pickers in 2015, a significant number, about two-thirds, were recruited voluntarily and that those "at risk" of involuntary work were mainly from the education sector, medical staff and students. The TPM report indicated that the monitoring teams, led by ILO experts, who visited 50 medical care facilities found that they were functioning normally during the harvest and that the staff attendance were usually monitored. The TPM report further indicated that while the unacceptability of child labour were recognized by all segments of society, awareness on risks of forced labour needed to be improved. The TPM report concluded that while important measures had been introduced for the voluntary recruitment of cotton pickers, they were not robust enough to decisively change the recruitment practices. Referring to the recommendations indicated in the TPM report to reduce the risk of forced labour in the cotton harvest, the Committee strongly encouraged the Government to continue to take effective and time-bound measures to strengthen safeguards against the use of forced labour in the cotton harvest, including through strengthening a functioning labour relations system for cotton pickers, developing a high-quality training strategy for all actors involved in the cotton harvest and continuing to raise awareness among all segments of society about the risks of forced labour in the cotton harvest.

The Committee notes the observations made by the IUF that the mobilization and use of labour for economic development in agriculture and to an extent in other sectors, remains a massive, systematic, ubiquitous and truly nationwide practice involving military personnel and servicemen, doctors, teachers, employees of state enterprises and other workers.

The Committee notes the Government's information in its report on the various legislative measures taken, including amendments and additions to the existing laws as well as adoption of new laws to improve the working and employment conditions in agriculture and to bring them into compliance with the fundamental standards and norms. In this regard, the Committee notes the Government's reference to the following measures taken:

- Act No. ZRU-558 of August 2019 on insertion of amendments and additions to several pieces of legislation, including section 51 of the Administrative Liability Code, thereby stiffening the penalties for coercion to work and the engagement of children in forced labour;
- Order No. 197-ICh of the Ministry of Employment and Labour Relations (MELR) of 13 August 2019 on increasing the number of city and district state legal labour inspectors of the State Labour Inspectorate;
- Resolution No. 349 of the Cabinet of Ministers of 10 May 2018 on additional measures to eliminate forced labour through mandating the heads of state and economic administrative bodies at all levels to respond effectively to and stop the exaction of all types of forced labour from individuals, in particular, educational and healthcare workers, pupils, and employees of other public sector organizations, and to impose strict disciplinary measures against officials who directly or indirectly commit or allow the exaction of forced labour;
- Presidential Edict No. UP-5563 of 29 October 2018 on increasing the responsibility of heads of state bodies at all levels for prohibiting and eliminating forced labour in all its forms and manifestations;
- Resolution No. 799 of the Cabinet of Ministers of October 2017 on the organization of the operations of the Community Work Fund of the MELR with the aim of prohibiting forced labour by engaging individuals in paid community work.

The Government also indicates that notices regarding the prohibition of child labour and forced labour have been displayed in all localities, in healthcare and educational institutions and state organizations. Wide-scale campaigns on penalties for breaching the prohibition of child labour and forced labour have been conducted. With the assistance of the ILO, in 2018, 400 banners and 100,000 flyers on the prohibition of forced labour were distributed and placed in visible locations across the country. A short film on the FBM on forced labour was broadcasted on television. Tangible organizational and financial steps have been taken with a view to recruiting workers voluntarily for the cotton harvest. The Committee further notes the Government's information regarding the reports on forced labour received by the FBM through a messaging service Telegram and a telephone hotline. According to this database, in 2016 and 2017, no more than 15 reports were received, in 2018, 2,135 reports were received. The state labour inspectors examined all the reports and in 284 cases concerning the use of forced labour, administrative penalties were imposed on persons forcing employees to pick cotton, including heads of the tax inspectorates and heads of the region, local council and local administrations (hokims). Orders were sent to 250 organizations to remedy breaches of the labour law and occupational safety and health; 50 representations were sent to heads of organizations; and a warning was sent to the Ministry of Defence. Disciplinary proceedings were brought against over 100 directors of comprehensive socio-economic development zones, 30 of them were dismissed from their posts, and 11 hokims were fined. Moreover, the Committee notes from the Government's report that the ILO Decent Work Country Programme (DWCP) has been extended to 2020.

The Committee notes with interest from the report of the ILO, Third Party Monitoring of child labour and forced labour during the 2018 cotton harvest (TPM report of 2018) that Uzbekistan has demonstrated major progress in the eradication of forced labour in the cotton harvest of 2018. Forced labour was reduced by 48 per cent compared to 2017. According to this report, there is a continued strong political commitment and clear communications from the Government of Uzbekistan to eradicate forced labour. The Committee also notes the following positive developments and results achieved in 2018 as reflected in the TPM report:

– Systematic forced labour (refers to a situation of forced labour imposed by the Government in a methodical and organized manner) was not exacted by the Government during the 2018 cotton harvest;
– The prohibition on recruiting students, teachers, nurses and doctors was systematically implemented and generally observed at the local level;
– Wages were increased by up to 85 per cent compared to the previous harvest and cotton pickers were paid on time and in full;
– Media started reporting actively on forced labour. Journalists were encouraged by the Government to cover forced labour issues. Local independent human rights activists were free to conduct their monitoring activities;
– Labour inspectorate was strengthened with 200 inspectors receiving training by the ILO on forced labour investigations and were deployed throughout the country to investigate alleged forced labour cases; and – Over 2,000 cases of forced labour were investigated and 206 hokims, officials and managers were sanctioned for forced labour violations, leading to fines, demotions and dismissals.

The Committee takes due note of the measures taken by the Government and their impact on reducing the number of cases of forced labour in cotton farming. It notes however from the TPM report of 2018 that while a vast majority of pickers are not in forced labour, there are still a considerable number of cases of forced labour (6.8 per cent or 170,000 people) mainly because the legacy of the centrally planned agriculture and economy (centrally set quotas) is still conducive to the exaction of forced labour. The TPM report states that although reforms announced by the central Government have had an impact, the uneven implementation of national policies, especially at the local level remains a challenge. The Committee therefore strongly encourages the Government to continue its efforts, including through its cooperation with the ILO and the social partners, within the framework of the DWCP, to ensure the complete elimination of the use of forced labour in cotton farming through the effective implementation of its policies at the local level. It requests the Government to continue to provide information on the measures taken to this end and the concrete results achieved, with an indication of the sanctions applied.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government which reiterates the content of its previous request adopted in 2019.

The Committee notes the observations received from the International Organisation of Employers (IOE) and the Federation of Chambers and Associations of Commerce and Production of Venezuela (FEDECAMARAS) on 31 August 2017, the Confederation of Workers of Venezuela (CTV) on 11 December 2019; the Federation of University Teachers' Associations of Venezuela (FAPUV) and the Independent Trade Union Alliance Confederation of Workers (CTASI) on 11 September 2020; and the CTASI on 30 September 2020. The Committee requests the Government to provide its reply to these observations.

Articles 1(1), 2(1) and 25 of the Convention. 1. Trafficking in persons. Massive migration flows. The Committee notes that, in their observations, the CTV, FAPUV and CTASI highlight that trafficking in persons in the country has increased as a result of the situation of humanitarian emergency faced by the country which resulted in the generalization of poverty for an increasing number of persons, mainly children and young people in situations of economic vulnerability, falling victim to exploitation by criminal groups within the country or forced to migrate. In this regard, the Committee notes that, the number of people who have left the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela has increased dramatically since 2018 to reach, according to official statistics, more than five million persons to date. The Committee notes that, as recently highlighted by several United Nations bodies: (i) Venezuelan migrants face obstacles in obtaining or legalizing documentation which is a source of challenges in transit and destination countries which makes them particularly vulnerable to trafficking for labour and sexual exploitation purposes; (ii) those who are leaving or re-entering the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela are often victims of extortion and illegal requisitions especially at the hands of the Bolivarian National Guard; and (iii) border closures and additional requirements to travel to transit and destination countries force migrants to use unofficial crossing points and therefore increase their risk of suffering abuses (A/HRC/41/18, 9 October 2019, paragraphs 69, 72 and 73; A/HRC/RES/42/25, 8 October 2019, preamble and paragraph 18; and webpage of the United Nations Refugee Agency, Venezuela situation, 2020). Taking into consideration the current situation of humanitarian emergency faced by the country and the increased number of persons who may be exposed to trafficking within the country as well as in transit and destination countries, the Committee draws the Government's attention to the need for specific and appropriate measures to be taken to ensure that the necessary safeguards are in place at national level, so that the current situation and the actions taken as a result by the national authorities do not contribute, directly or indirectly, to a subsequent increase in cases of trafficking in persons within the country or for Venezuelan migrant workers. It requests the Government to provide information on the specific measures developed and implemented in this regard, including within the framework of bilateral agreements with host countries.

Legislative and institutional framework. The Committee previously noted that several legislative texts contain provisions regarding trafficking in persons (section 56 of the Basic Act of 2007 on the right of women to a life free from violence and sections 53, 56 and 57 the Act of 2004 on foreigners and migration) and more particularly the Basic Act of 2012 against organized crime and the funding of terrorism which criminalizes trafficking in persons under its section 41, while limiting the offence of trafficking to perpetrators who are part of an organized criminal organization. It further noted that a Bill against trafficking in persons was under examination and that various discussions were held by the Government with a view to drawing up the strategies to be set out in the National Plan to combat trafficking in persons around three priorities: prevention, investigation and penalties, and the protection of victims. It noted that the establishment of a presidential commission to combat trafficking in persons was also under examination. The Committee requested the Government to provide information on any progress made in that regard, and more particularly on the adoption and implementation of the national plan and the establishment of a coordinating body. The Committee notes the Government's general indication, in its report, that the National Plan to combat trafficking in persons for 2016–2019 has been updated for the period 2020–2023. It notes that, in its observations, the CTV expresses concern at the lack of information from the Government on the impact of the National Plan for 2016–2019, as well as on any policy or measures implemented to combat trafficking in persons. The CTV further refers to the increasing number of victims of trafficking for sexual exploitation at the border with the Caribbean islands, as well as in the illegal mining sector in the state of Bolívar, in particular in the Arco Minero del Orinoco (AMO) where women and girls from indigenous communities are victims of sexual exploitation and domestic servitude. The Committee notes that, in their joint observations, the FAPUV and CTASI highlight the lack of legislative provisions against trafficking in persons and the insufficient actions implemented by the Government in that area. They also refer to cases of persons exposed to various forms of coercion in illegal mines by armed groups operating with impunity. In this regard, the Committee notes that, in her 2020 report on the independence of the justice system and access to justice in the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela, including for violations of economic and social rights, and the situation of human rights in the AMO region, the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights highlighted a sharp increase since 2016 in sexual exploitation, trafficking and violence in mining areas, due to the existence of a corruption and bribery scheme by organized criminal groups, locally known as sindicatos, controlling the mines whereby they pay off military commanders to maintain their presence and illegal activities. The Committee notes that, in her report, the High Commissioner specifically recommended to take urgent steps to end labour and sexual exploitation, and human trafficking in the AMO region (A/HRC/44/54, 15 July 2020, paragraphs 41 and 71). The Committee notes this information with concern and urges the Government to take the necessary measures to combat trafficking in persons for both labour and sexual exploitation, including in the Arco Minero del Orinoco. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the adoption and implementation of the National Plan to combat trafficking in persons for 2020–2023. It also requests the Government to provide information on any entity established, in particular within the framework of the new National Plan, to specifically coordinate the intervention of the many actors involved in the combat of trafficking in persons; and on any assessment made of the impact of the measures implemented to combat trafficking in persons, and any difficulties encountered and follow-up actions envisaged. Lastly, the Committee requests the Government to indicate whether the adoption of the Bill against trafficking in persons is still on the agenda and, if not, the reasons why it has been dropped.

Prevention and awareness-raising. The Committee previously noted that the National Bureau to Combat Organized Crime and the Funding of Terrorism (ONCDOFT), established under the Basic Act of 2012, is responsible for the organization, control and supervision at the national level of any actions aimed at preventing and combating organized crime and the funding of terrorism, among which trafficking in persons (section 5). It encouraged the Government to continue its awareness-raising activities. The Committee notes the Government's general indication that the ONCDOFT carried out several awareness-raising activities within communities and public education institutions to disseminate information on organized crimes, providing tools to prevent citizens from becoming victims of trafficking. The Government adds that a national network against organized crime and funding of terrorism, which is represented by coordination units in each of the 24 states, has been developed by the Government and is responsible for implementing prevention activities regarding organized crime and the funding of terrorism. The Committee requests the Government to continue its efforts to combat trafficking in persons by ensuring comprehensive prevention and awareness-raising activities specifically focused on trafficking in persons for labour and sexual exploitation purposes, at both national and local levels. It further requests the Government to provide information on the content of the activities undertaken to that end, as well as on the above-mentioned tools for the prevention of trafficking, the results achieved and any difficulties encountered.

Protection of victims. The Committee previously noted that the National Coordinating Unit for the protection of victims, witnesses and other parties to legal action, in collaboration with victim care units, is responsible for ensuring adequate protection for victims as soon as they are identified. This protection includes medical, psychological and legal assistance, temporary accommodation, money for food and conditions of security. The Committee requested the Government to provide specific information on the number of victims who have benefited from assistance and the type of assistance provided. The Committee notes the Government's general statement that several shelters are available for victims of trafficking where they can benefit from medical and psychological assistance. The Government adds that ONCDOFT is currently revising the protocol for assistance for victims of trafficking and that a large number of stakeholders, including non-profit organizations which provide assistance for the reintegration of victims, are involved in this process. The Committee notes that, in their observations, the CTV, FAPUV and CTASI highlight that the Government did not provide information on the number of victims identified or on the percentage of victims who received assistance and the type of assistance they benefited from, which is an issue of concern in view of the prevalence of trafficking situations within the country. Noting with regret the lack of information provided by the Government on the assistance provided to victims of trafficking, the Committee requests the Government to provide specific information on the number of victims who have benefited from assistance and the type of assistance provided. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the protocol for assistance for victims of trafficking formulated by the ONCDOFT, once it has been revised.

Enforcement of effective penalties. The Committee previously noted that ONCDOFT is responsible for developing training programmes for officials of the judiciary, the prosecution services and the forces of order on the various types of crimes covered under the Basic Act of 2012, among which trafficking in persons, and requested the Government to provide information on the judicial proceedings initiated and convictions in cases of trafficking, as well as on the measures taken to reinforce the capacities of the various authorities involved in combating this crime. The Committee notes the Government's indication that, since 2018, the Border Trafficking Route has been established in order to enhance training and capacity-building for public officers at key border control locations, providing them with tools to improve mechanisms for the identification of potential victims, assistance mechanisms, and prevention and control measures. Noting the Government's indication that the Office of the Public Prosecutor has initiated legal proceedings for trafficking in persons under section 41 of the Basic Act of 2012 against 163 persons for 2017–2018, the Committee notes with regret that the Government has still not provided information on the number of convictions or the nature of the penalties imposed. It further notes that, in its observations, the CTV highlights the insufficient implementation of the Basic Act of 2012 by the Government, which did not take any significant action to combat trafficking in persons. The CTV adds that the number of legal proceedings referred to by the Government does not reflect the real magnitude of the issue in the country, more particularly the prevalence of trafficking in women and girls in border and touristic areas, and that there is no information on the complaints of complicity or corruption. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on the concrete measures taken to enhance training activities and strengthen the capacities of the various authorities involved in combating trafficking in persons, to ensure that these authorities are effectively in a position to detect situations of trafficking in persons, carry out adequate investigations and initiate prosecutions against the perpetrators of this crime, including any complicit public officials. It further requests the Government to provide detailed information on the number and nature of investigations carried out, prosecutions initiated, court decisions handed down and penalties imposed, specifying the provisions of the national legislation under which the criminal proceedings were brought.

2. Conditions of work amounting to forced labour. Situation of Cuban doctors. The Committee previously noted that, in its observations received in 2016, the Independent Trade Union Alliance (ASI) raised specific concerns regarding the recruitment, conditions of work and isolation of Cuban doctors who came to work in the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela within the framework of an agreement signed between the Governments of the two countries and requested the Government to provide information on these allegations. The Committee notes the Government's indication that Cuban doctors are working under a health programme implemented within the framework of the cooperation agreement signed with the Republic of Cuba in 2000. It states that the Government provides personal housing, food and allowances for personal expenses and that, contrary to the politically motivated observations received from the ASI, Cuban doctors are not isolated. The Committee notes however that, in its observations, the CTV refers to the numerous complaints made by Cuban doctors regarding their conditions of work amounting to forced labour, including underpayment of wages, the main part of which is retained by the Cuban Government, confiscation of passports, limitations on movement, threats of retaliatory actions against workers and their families if they leave the programme, as well as surveillance outside of work. The CTV adds that health workers also denounced this situation. The Committee further notes that, in their observations, FAPUV and CTASI express similar concerns and further highlight that: (i) besides Cuban doctors, Cuban health personnel and other workers who work in Venezuela as "collaborators" are affected by the same situation; and (ii) the agreement with the Cuban Government for the provision of medical and other services in Venezuela has not been made official and even less approved by the National Assembly. In its additional observations, the CTASI expresses concern about the lack of transparency regarding the terms and conditions of the agreement, and the working conditions of these Cuban workers in Venezuela, and calls upon the Government to provide extensive public information in that regard. The Committee observes that, in her 2018 report following her mission to Cuba, the United Nations Independent Expert on human rights and international solidarity indicates that according to official sources, in July 2017, 42,000 Cuban health workers were based in 63 countries and Cuban doctors were serving in more than 6,000 outpatient clinics in the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela (A/HRC/38/40/Add.1, 9 May 2018, paragraph 55). The Committee notes that, in May 2019, a complaint on the working conditions of Cuban doctors in the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela was made before the International Criminal Court following an investigation carried out by a Spanish NGO named Cuban Prisoners Defenders. It further notes that the Organization of American States expressed similar concerns regarding the situation of Cuban doctors. The Committee requests the Government to provide further information on the recruitment, conditions of work and termination of employment of Cuban doctors and health workers, including by providing a copy of the agreement signed with the Cuban Government in that respect and examples of contracts signed by Cuban doctors. It further requests the Government to provide information on the number of doctors and health workers who left the programme and the consequences of such resignations. Lastly, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the number of complaints from Cuban doctors and health workers registered, the nature of the alleged violations and penalties imposed.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1964)

The Committee notes the observations received from the International Organisation of Employers (IOE) and the Federation of Chambers and Associations of Commerce and Production of Venezuela (FEDECAMARAS) on 31 August 2017. It also notes the observations from the Confederation of Workers of Venezuela (CTV) received on 5 November 2019 and requests the Government to provide its reply to these observations.

Article 1(a) of the Convention. Imposition of sentences of imprisonment involving the obligation to work as a punishment for expressing political opinions or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that persons sentenced to a penalty of deprivation of liberty of presidio or prisión are subject to an obligation to work (sections 12 and 15 of the Penal Code) and observed that the following provisions of the Penal Code provide for penalties of prisión, involving compulsory prison labour, for certain forms of behaviour, namely:

- offending or showing a lack of respect for the President of the Republic or for a number of public authorities (sections 147 and 148);
- public denigration of the National Assembly, the Supreme Court of Justice, etc. (section 149);
- offending the honour, reputation or prestige of a member of the National Assembly or a public servant, or of a judicial or a political body (sections 222 and 225); proof of the truth of the facts is not admitted (section 226); and
- defamation (sections 442 and 444).

Recalling that the Convention prohibits the imposition of work, including prison labour, as a punishment on persons who express political views, the Committee previously noted with deep concern the criminalization of social movements and the expression of political views. It requested the Government to provide information on the application in practice of the above-mentioned provisions, while ensuring that no one who, in a peaceful manner, expresses political views or opposes the established political, social or economic system can be sentenced to imprisonment, under the terms of which compulsory labour could be imposed.

The Committee notes the Government's statement, in its report, that no one, and more particularly no business or union leader, has been condemned for peacefully protesting or expressing political views. It adds that there is no legislative provision imposing an obligation to work on convicted persons and that no complaint has been registered in that respect. Convicted persons can voluntarily participate in cultural, sport or socio-productive activities in order to facilitate their social reintegration once released. The Committee notes that the Government refers to several provisions of the Basic Prison Code (Official Gazette No. 6.207 of 28 December 2015), while highlighting that convicted persons can work in areas corresponding to their skills and receive a financial allowance in return for their work. The Government adds that prison labour is a means of social reintegration and is only mandatory when the convicted person intends to reduce the length of his or her custodial sentence and access alternative penalties to imprisonment (sections 60, 63, 65 and 67 of the Code). It notes, nevertheless, that the Government does not provide any information on the application in practice of sections 147 to 149, 222, 225, 226, 442 and 444 of the Penal Code. Furthermore, referring to its previous comments, it recalls that: (i) under the terms of the Basic Prison Code, work by convicted persons is a right but also a duty and, under section 64 of the Code, convicted persons who refuse work or who voluntarily perform it in an inappropriate manner, commit a very serious fault and are liable to the penalties established in the Code; and (ii) pursuant to sections 12 and 15 of the Penal Code referred to above, persons sentenced to a penalty of deprivation of liberty of presidio or prisión are subject to an obligation to work. The Committee also emphasizes that where the national legislation provides for the obligation to work for persons convicted to sentences of imprisonment, as is the case in the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela for penalties of presidio and prisión, provisions of the legislation which lay down limits or restrictions on the exercise of certain civil rights or public freedoms, the violation of which may be punished by sentences of imprisonment, have an effect on the application of the Convention. Indeed, persons who do not comply with these limits could be convicted to a sentence of imprisonment and, as a consequence, be subjected to compulsory labour.

The Committee notes that, in its observations, the CTV expresses concern about the recurring cases of persecution for expressing political opinions, highlighting that there has been an increase in criminalization of social protests and expression of political opinions other than those of the governmental party, with the possibility of criminal sentences involving forced or compulsory labour. The CTV adds that there have been numerous cases of persecution of union leaders, some of whom have been prosecuted before military tribunals, and that recently several university rectors and lecturers have also been prosecuted for criticizing the Government. The CTV further refers to an investigation carried out by an NGO, which showed that, in 2018, 387 cases of violation of freedom of expression were registered and 24 persons were imprisoned for publishing, on social networks, opinions criticizing governmental actions or data showing the social, economic and political emergency in the country.

The Committee takes note of the adoption of the Constitutional Law against hatred, for peaceful coexistence and tolerance (Act No. 41.274 of 8 November 2017), and more particularly of section 20 which provides that “anyone who publicly or through any means suitable for public dissemination promotes, fosters or incites hatred, discrimination or violence against a person or a group of persons, by reason of their real or alleged membership to a determined social, ethnic, religious or political group … shall be punished by imprisonment for ten to 20 years.” It notes, that pursuant to section 21 of the Act, the real or supposed membership to a determined political group is an aggravated circumstance for the offence. The Committee notes that several bodies, such as the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights (IACHR), have expressed concern regarding the broad, vague and ambiguous nature of the terms mentioned under section 20 of the Act, and highlighted that the declarations issued by the Government indicate that it will be used to persecute the political opposition and criminalize expression of views opposed to the established political system (IACHR, Country report on Venezuela, Situation of human rights in Venezuela, December 2017).

The Committee notes that similar concerns were expressed on the above Act No 41.274 by the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights in her 2019 report on the situation of human rights in the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela, who also highlights that successive laws and reforms have facilitated the criminalization of the opposition and of anyone critical of the Government through vague provisions, increased sanctions for acts that are guaranteed by the right of freedom of peaceful assembly and the use of military jurisdiction for civilians. The United Nations High Commissioner further indicates that neither the Office of the Attorney General nor the Ombudsman, nor the Government nor the police provide protection to victims and witnesses of human rights violations, and that the Attorney General has contributed to stigmatizing and discrediting members of the political opposition and those critical of the Government, in violation of the principle of presumption of innocence. Impunity has enabled the recurrence of human rights violations, emboldened perpetrators and side-lined victims (A/HRC/41/18, 9 October 2019, paragraphs 35, 36, 57, 77 and 80). The Committee notes that, in its Resolution adopted in October 2019, the United Nations Human Rights Council strongly condemns the widespread targeted repression and persecution on political grounds in the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela and urges the Government to immediately release all political prisoners and all other persons arbitrarily deprived of their liberty. The Committee further notes that the United Nations Human Rights Council highlights that the Prosecutor of the International Criminal Court has decided to open a preliminary examination of the situation in the country to analyse crimes allegedly committed, since at least April 2017, in the context of demonstrations and related political unrest. It further notes that on 30 April 2020, several United Nations human rights experts indicated that they were alarmed at the increasing threats, attacks and charges against journalists as well as criminalization of human rights defenders since the state of health emergency which was declared on 13 March 2020 as a result of the global virus pandemic (OHCHR press release, 30 April 2020).

Lastly, the Committee notes the report of the ILO Commission of Inquiry appointed under article 26 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation to examine the observance by the Government of the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela of the Minimum Wage-Fixing Machinery Convention, 1928 (No. 26), the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144), of which the ILO Governing Body took note at its 337th Session (GB 337/INS/8, October 2019). It notes more particularly that the ILO Commission of Inquiry observed with concern that: (i) serious criminal charges, criminalized under the Penal Code and the Basic Code of Military Justice, have been brought against employers' leaders, trade unionists and members of employers' organizations for the exercise of their activities, such as participation in protest activities, or expression of views on issues directly related to the defence of the interests of employers' and workers' organizations; and (ii) their trial by a military court which constitutes serious violations of the exercise of basic civil liberties, such as freedom of expression and freedom of assembly. The Committee notes that the criminal charges imposed as a result of actions carried out during activities of the employers' and workers' organizations, which were referred to by the ILO Commission of Inquiry include: causing panic and/or unrest among the population through the dissemination of false information, insulting the sentry and the armed forces, unlawful association, treason, terrorism, resistance and contempt for authority.

The Committee deplores the continued criminalization of social movements and expression of views opposed to the established political, social or economic system. The Committee strongly urges the Government to take the necessary measures, both in law and practice, to put an immediate end to any violation of the provisions of the Convention by ensuring that no one who, in a peaceful manner, expresses political views or opposes the established political, social or economic system can be sentenced to imprisonment, under the terms of which compulsory labour could be imposed. It requests the Government to provide information on the application in practice of the provisions of the Penal Code, the Basic Code of Military Justice and Act No. 41.274 referred to above, as well as detailed information on court decisions based thereon, with an indication of the facts that gave rise to the convictions and the nature of the sanctions imposed. Lastly, the Committee requests the Government to ensure the immediate release of any person convicted to a prison sentence entailing compulsory prison labour, for peacefully expressing political views or opposing the established political, social or economic system.

Viet Nam

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 2007)

Article 1(1), 2(2) and 25 of the Convention. Trafficking in persons. 1. Penal sanctions and law enforcement. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that section 119 of the Penal Code prohibits trafficking in persons, and that the adoption of the Act on the Prevention and Suppression of Human Trafficking strengthened the definition of trafficking in persons provided for in this section.

The Committee notes the statistical information provided by the Government in its report on the application of section 119 of the Penal Code as well as the Act on the Prevention and Suppression of Human Trafficking. The Government indicates that from 2016 to 2019, there were 1,059 cases of trafficking detected in the whole country, with 1,432 offenders and 2,674 victims of trafficking. The competent authorities investigated 825 cases and prosecuted 478 cases, with 885 people accused. Moreover, 444 cases were tried, with 909 defendants and 444 cases were resolved and adjudicated, with 818 defendants. However, the Committee notes the absence of information regarding the number of convictions and the penalties imposed. The Committee requests the Government to strengthen its efforts to ensure the strict application of national legislation, so that sufficiently effective and dissuasive penalties of imprisonment are imposed and enforced against perpetrators. It also requests the Government to provide information on measures taken in this regard, including the training and capacity-building of law enforcement authorities, as well as on the results achieved. The Committee further requests the Government to continue providing information on the application in practice of section 119 of the Penal Code as well as the Act on the Prevention and Suppression of Human Trafficking, including the number of prosecutions, convictions and the specific penalties imposed.

2. National policy. Protection of victims. The Committee previously noted the adoption of the Action Programme to prevent and combat human trafficking for the period of 2016–2020. It also noted that several circulars were adopted with regard to the prevention and suppression of human trafficking. The Committee requested the Government to continue its efforts to prevent and combat trafficking in persons, and to provide information on the measures taken and results achieved.

The Committee notes the Government's information that a standing agency is established to coordinate the implementation of the Action Programme to prevent and combat human trafficking. The Government also indicates the measures undertaken to strengthen international cooperation in this regard, including the ratification of relevant international conventions and the conclusion of a number of bilateral agreements. The Committee further notes the Government's reference to the Receiving, verifying, protecting and supporting trafficked victims project for the period of 2016–2020, aimed at enabling trafficked victims to access basic social support services and to integrate into the community; encouraging civil society and individuals to participate in providing assistance to victims; and establishing shelters/accommodation for victims. From 2016 to the first half of 2019, 1,254 victims were identified and provided with appropriate assistance, including safe accommodation, psychological counselling, healthcare, life skills-based education, legal assistance upon request, and transfer to their families or other victim support establishments. The Committee requests the Government to continue taking measures to ensure that victims of trafficking are provided with appropriate protection and services, and to provide information on the number of persons benefiting from these services. It also requests the Government to indicate if a new Action Programme to prevent and combat human trafficking is to be developed upon the expiry of the current one in 2020.

Articles 1(1) and 2(1). Work exacted in drug rehabilitation centres. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the Government's indication that persons staying at drug rehabilitation centres are involved in productive work. According to section 104 of the Act on handling administrative violations, the district-level People's Court shall examine and decide to send drug addicts above the age of 18 who have been subject to educative measures in communes, wards and towns, but who remain addicted, into compulsory rehabilitation centres for treatment, work, education, vocational training and community reintegration. The Government also indicated that section 27 of Decree No. 221/2013/ND-CP provides for the working conditions in rehabilitation establishments. The Committee requested the Government to provide information on the application of section 27 of Decree No. 136/2016/ND-CP in practice, including the number of persons who are sent to the drug rehabilitation centres and the types of work performed by these persons.

The Committee notes the Government's information in its report that currently there are 37,384 persons in the drug rehabilitation establishments. The types of work being organized for treatment include mechanical repairing, sewing, carpentry, cultivation and farming, rattan, producing traditional products and preliminary processing of agricultural products. The Government emphasizes that the persons concerned are sent to the drug rehabilitation centres by court decisions, and that the rehabilitation labour is performed under the supervision of public authorities. However, the Committee notes that, in its concluding observations of 2019, the Human Rights Committee expresses its concern about the practice of forced labour and onerous working conditions in drug rehabilitation centres (CCPR/C/VNM/CO/3, paragraph 31). The Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on the application of section 27 of Decree No. 136/2016/ND-CP in practice, including the number of persons who are sent to the drug rehabilitation centres and the types of work performed by these persons.

Article 2(2)(a). Compulsory military service. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, according to the Act on militia and self-defence forces of 2009, Vietnamese citizens aged between 18 and 45 years for men and between 18 and 40 years for women are obliged to join militia or self-defence forces (section 9). The tasks of the militia and self-defence forces include protecting forests and preventing forest fires, protecting the environment and the construction and socio-economic development of localities and establishments (section 8(4)). The Government indicated that this work includes dredging canals, building roads, supporting the economic development of households, planting trees and contributing to reducing and eliminating poverty. The Committee therefore requested the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that persons working by virtue of compulsory military conscription laws, including in the militia and self-defence forces, only engage in work of a military nature.

The Committee notes with satisfaction that provisions regarding the engagement of the militia and self-defence forces in socio-economic development tasks were deleted upon the adoption of the Act on militia and self-defence forces in November 2019, with ILO technical assistance. The Government also indicates that currently there are 1,396,431 persons in the militia and self-defence service.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Zimbabwe

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1998) and Protocol of 2014 (ratification: 2019)

The Committee takes note of the Government's report and the supplementary information provided in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020).

The Committee notes the observations of the Zimbabwe Congress of Trade Unions (ZCTU) received on 1 September 2019 and 29 September 2020, respectively.

Articles 1(1), 2(1) and 25 of the Convention. Trafficking in persons. 1. Law enforcement and penalties. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the enactment of the Trafficking in Persons Act, 2014, which provides for a penalty of life imprisonment or any definite period of imprisonment of not less than ten years for offences related to the trafficking of persons (section 3(2) Parts I and II). The Committee requested the Government to provide information on the application in practice of the Trafficking in Persons Act, 2014.

The Committee notes the Government's information in its report that between 2016 and 2018, the police received and dealt with 72 cases of trafficking in persons, of which 71 cases involved female victims trafficked for domestic servitude in Kuwait and the Middle East. Twenty four persons were arrested and the cases are at various levels of prosecution. The Committee also notes from the second national Plan of Action on human trafficking (NAPLAC) 2019-2021 that, as part of capacity-building for law enforcement officials, modules on trafficking in persons are included in police training. This covers the Trafficking in Persons Act, investigations of cases related to trafficking in persons and public awareness-raising. Capacity-building workshops were conducted for members of the judiciary on adjudication and trials of trafficking in persons cases which were attended by 20 provincial heads of prosecutions and ten provincial heads of magistracy. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the effective implementation of the Trafficking in Persons Act and to provide information on the convictions and penalties applied. It also requests the Government to continue to provide information on the number of cases of trafficking for both sexual and labour exploitation that have been detected and investigated by the competent authorities.

2. Programme of action. Protection of victims. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to provide information on the measures taken within the framework of the NAPLAC 2016–2018, as well as the results achieved in this regard.

The Committee notes the ZCTU's observation that there is still a lack of awareness of the issue of trafficking in persons, as well as limited policies and programmes in place to assist and protect victims of trafficking.

The Committee notes the Government's information on the activities undertaken within the framework of the NAPLAC 2016-2018. This includes: (i) awareness-raising campaigns conducted in Harare and Bulawayo to sensitize the public on the Trafficking in Persons Act and trafficking-related offences; (ii) distribution of information materials containing messages against trafficking; (iii) commemoration of the World Day against trafficking in persons and awareness-raising of various forms of trafficking; and (iv) establishment of a referral system to ensure assistance and protection of victims of trafficking. The Government also indicates that the reintegration assistance provided to repatriated victims and other victims of trafficking include shelter; medical, educational, psychosocial and legal support; academic training, skills-acquisition and livelihood programmes; financial support to start income-generating projects; and for those with children of school age, assistance under the various Government scholarships, such as the basic education assistance module (BEAM).

The Committee further notes from the Government's report under the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) that a shelter for the victims of trafficking was refurbished at Harare hospital. A total of 100 female victims of trafficking were provided reintegration assistance, including support to start income-generating projects, as well as academic and skills-acquisition training. The Committee lastly notes that the NAPLAC has been updated based on the key findings, lessons learned and recommendations of the evaluation for the previous NAPLAC, which will guide the national response to trafficking in persons for the period from 2019-2021. The Committee requests the Government to pursue its efforts to combat trafficking in persons and to provide information on the measures taken on the prevention, protection, assistance and repatriation of trafficking victims, including within the framework of the NAPLAC 2019-2021.

Articles 1(1) and 2(1). 1. Legislation concerning vagrancy. In its previous comments, the Committee drew the Government's attention to certain provisions of the Vagrancy Act (Cap. 10:25), under which any person suspected of being a vagrant, defined as any person who has no settled or fixed place of abode or means of support and who wanders from place to place, or any person who maintains himself by begging or in some other dishonest or disreputable manner (section 2(a) and (b)), is subject to being arrested by a police officer, taken before a magistrate and subsequently detained in a re-establishment centre, where such persons may be maintained and afforded the occupation, instruction or training requisite to fit them for entry into, or return to, employment (section 7(1)). It noted that the provisions of the Vagrancy Act are worded in such general terms as to lend themselves to application as a means of indirect compulsion to work. The Committee noted the Government's indication that the Vagrancy Act would be amended in order to bring it into compliance with the Convention.

The Committee notes the observations of the ZCTU that the Vagrancy Act remains the same and that no progress has been made in this regard.

The Committee notes the Government's information that the alignment of various pieces of legislation with the Constitution is ongoing and that the Vagrancy Act is one of the Acts that has been earmarked for alignment. The Committee firmly hopes that the Government will take the necessary measures, without delay, to ensure that in the context of the alignment of its legislation with the Constitution, the Vagrancy Act will be amended, so that its provisions will be limited to the situations where the persons concerned disturb public order or tranquillity or engage in unlawful activities.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1998)

The Committee takes note of the Government's report received in 2019 and the supplementary information provided in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020).

The Committee notes the observations of the Zimbabwe Congress of Trade Unions (ZCTU) received on 1 September 2019.

Article 1(a) of the Convention. Penal sanctions involving compulsory labour as a punishment for the expression of views opposed to the established political, social or economic system. In its earlier comments, the Committee noted that penalties of imprisonment (involving compulsory prison labour by virtue of section 76(1) of the Prisons Act (Cap. 7:11) and section 66(1) of the Prisons (General) Regulations 1996) may be imposed under various provisions of national legislation in circumstances falling within Article 1(a) of the Convention, namely:

– sections 15, 16, 19(1)(b)–(c), and 24–27 of the Public Order Security Act (POSA) related to publishing or communicating false statements prejudicial to the State; making any false statement about or concerning the President; performing any action, uttering any words or distributing or displaying any writing, sign or other visible representation that is threatening, abusive or insulting, intending thereby to provoke a breach of peace; failure to notify the authority of the intention to hold public gatherings; and violation of the prohibition of public gatherings or public demonstrations; – sections 31 and 33 of the Criminal Law (Codification and Reform) Act (Cap. 9:23) (Criminal Law Code) as amended in 2005 which contain provisions similar to the above-mentioned sections of the POSA concerning publishing or communicating false statements prejudicial to the State; undermining authority of or insulting the President etc.; and – sections 37 and 41 of the Criminal Law Code under which sanctions of imprisonment may be imposed, inter alia, for participating in meetings or gatherings with the intention of disturbing the peace, security or order of the public, uttering any words or distributing or displaying any writing, sign or other visible representation that is threatening, abusive or insulting, intending thereby to provoke a breach of peace; and engaging in disorderly conduct in public places with similar intention.

The Committee notes the observations made by the ZCTU that the provisions of the POSA regulating public gatherings are still used to ban trade union meetings and other protests. Although a new Bill repealing POSA entitled Maintenance of Peace and Order (MOPO) Bill is before the Parliament, this is more draconian than the POSA. The Committee also takes note of the ZCTU's indication that 20 members of the ZCTU are facing criminal charges under section 37 of the Criminal Law for having participated in a ZCTU organised protest action in October 2018, whom if convicted will be subjected to forced labour under the Prisons Act.

The Committee notes the Government's statement in its supplementary report that the POSA was repealed in November 2019 and replaced by the MOPO Act which sets out clearly the lines of conduct of the police and security forces. The Committee further takes note of the contents of the MOPO Bill supplied by the ZCTU along with its observations.

The Committee notes with regret that while sections 15, 19 and 21 of the POSA have been repealed, the corresponding provisions are incorporated under sections 31, 33 and 37 of the Criminal Law Code. It also notes that sections 25 to 27 of the POSA concerning failure to notify the authority of the intention to hold public gatherings, and violation of the prohibition of public gatherings or public demonstrations are reproduced under sections 7(5) and 8(11) of the MOPO Bill with sanctions of imprisonment which involve compulsory prison labour. In this regard, the Committee notes the statement made in the End of Mission Statement of the United Nations Special Rapporteur on the rights to freedom of peaceful assembly and of association, on his visit to Zimbabwe in September 2019 that the MOPO Bill does not propose significant substantive amendments targeted to address the main problems prevailing in the POSA. The Bill has worrying similarities to the POSA revealing a common scope in which the exercise of the right to peaceful assembly is not fully guaranteed. Instead the MOPO Bill continues to give law enforcement agencies broad regulatory discretion and powers.

Referring to its General Survey of 2012 on the fundamental Conventions, the Committee recalls once again that Article 1(a) of the Convention prohibits the use of "any form" of forced or compulsory labour, including compulsory prison labour, as a punishment for holding or expressing political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system. However, the Convention does not prohibit punishment by penalties involving compulsory labour of persons who use violence, incite violence or engage in preparatory acts aimed at violence. But sanctions involving compulsory labour are not in conformity with the Convention if they enforce a prohibition of the peaceful expression of non-violent views that are critical of government policy and the established political system, whether the prohibition is imposed by law or by an administrative decision. Since opinions and views opposed to the established system may be expressed not only through the press or other communications media, but also at various kinds of meetings and assemblies, if such meetings and assemblies are subject to prior authorization granted at the discretion of the authorities and violations can be punished by sanctions involving compulsory labour, such provisions also come within the scope of the Convention (paragraphs 302–303).

The Committee therefore strongly urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that sections 31, 33, 37 and 41 of the Criminal Law Code and sections 7(5) and 8(11) of the MOPO Bill are repealed or amended in order to bring them into conformity with the Convention by ensuring that penalties involving compulsory labour, including sentences of imprisonment including compulsory prison labour, are not imposed on persons who hold or express political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system. Pending the adoption of such measures, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the application of these provisions in practice, supplying copies of the court decisions and indicating the penalties imposed.

Article 1(d). Penal sanctions involving compulsory labour as a punishment for having participated in strikes. In its earlier comments, the Committee referred to certain provisions of the Labour Act (sections 102(b), 104(2)–(3), 109(1)–(2), and 122(1)) punishing persons engaged in an unlawful collective action with sanctions of imprisonment, which involves compulsory prison labour. The Committee noted the Government's indication that these sections of the Labour Act were included in the draft Principles for the Harmonization and Review of Labour Laws in Zimbabwe. In 2011, the social partners had agreed to the principle of streamlining mechanisms to deal with collective job action and review ministerial powers and those of the Labour Court on collective job action. This principle would provide the framework to amend section 102(b) defining essential services, section 104 on balloting for strike action, sections 107, 109 and 112 on excessive penalties, including lengthy periods of imprisonment and deregistration of trade unions and dismissal of employees involved in collective job action. Although the Government indicated that the Labour Law reform was ongoing with the participation of the social partners and that it would take into consideration the comments made by the Committee of Experts, the Committee noted that the Labour Amendment Act No. 5, promulgated in August 2015 did not align the above-mentioned sections with the Convention. The Committee therefore once again urged the Government to take the necessary measures in this regard.

The Committee notes the ZCTU's observation that no amendments have been made to the above-mentioned provisions. In this regard, the Committee had noted with deep regret the lack of progress in the labour law reform in its 2019 observations made under the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (N0. 87).

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report does not contain any information on this point. The Committee strongly urges the Government to ensure that sections 102(b), 104(2)–(3), 109(1)–(2), and 112(1) of the Labour Act (Cap. 28:01) are amended so that no sanctions of imprisonment may be imposed for organizing or peacefully participating in strikes, in conformity with Article 1(d) of the Convention.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Elimination of child labour and protection of children and young persons

General observation

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182)

Following the Centenary celebrations of 2019, the ILO celebrates another landmark achievement of the historic universal ratification of one of its fundamental Conventions, the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No 182). Since the ILO's founding in 1919, child labour has been a core concern and several Conventions were adopted in this domain, including the Minimum Age Convention 1973, (No.138), another fundamental Convention aimed at the progressive elimination of child labour. The 1998 Global March against child labour, the movement that demanded renewed action against child labour, paved the way for the ILO constituents to add new urgency to develop an international instrument for tackling child labour and its worst forms. Recognizing a growing international consensus that certain forms of child labour are so dangerous and harmful to the welfare of the children that they could no longer be tolerated, the international community came together with one voice to adopt on 17 June 1999 a new instrument for the prohibition and elimination of the worst forms of child labour. Convention No.182 has today not only attained the extraordinary success of being the first ILO Convention to achieve universal ratification; it has also been instrumental in bringing the ratification rate of Convention No 138 to over 90 per cent.

The Committee welcomes this universal ratification of Convention No. 182 which is now an authoritative standard in every ILO Member State. The Committee considers that this universal ratification reflects a global consensus that the worst forms of child labour are unacceptable regardless of the level of a country's development and demonstrates the will of ILO Member States to ensure that every child, everywhere, is free from the worst forms of child labour. Universal ratification also paves the way for the universal alignment of domestic policies and laws on child labour and represents an opportunity to mainstream child labour considerations into relevant national policies and plans.

The Committee notes that the Convention focuses very specifically on the extreme forms of child labour and it encompasses penal law, labour law and programmatic components highlighting the necessity to take immediate and effective measures to prohibit in law and eliminate in practice the worst forms of child labour for all persons under the age of 18 years. The definition of the worst forms of child labour comprises: (a) slavery and forced labour, including child trafficking, debt bondage and forced recruitment of children for armed conflict; (b) child prostitution and pornography; (c) the use of children in illicit activities, in particular for the production and trafficking of drugs; and (d) work likely to harm the health, safety or morals of children. Several countries have either adopted comprehensive legislation to prohibit the worst forms of child labour or amended the existing legislative framework in order to bring it into conformity with the provisions of the Convention. The Committee has noted that given the broad scope of application of the Convention, in most cases, emphasis on explicit legal provisions is needed in order to ensure the full application of the Convention. In this regard, the Committee has underscored the importance of enacting legal provisions prohibiting the worst forms of child labour covering both boys and girls under the age of 18 years while the prohibition on the sale and trafficking of children covers internal and external trafficking for both labour and sexual exploitation.

With regard to the use, procuring or offering of a child for prostitution, the Committee has emphasized on various occasions the importance of punishing all those who use children for the purpose of prostitution by clearly distinguishing the age of sexual consent which is less than 18 years in several countries from the age of protection from commercial sexual exploitation which is 18 years. Furthermore, noting that the online sexual exploitation of children has been emerging as a serious threat in many countries, the Committee has stressed the need to address it legally.

The Committee recalls that the Convention defines hazardous work as work, which, by its nature or the circumstances in which it is carried out, is likely to harm the health, safety or morals of children. In accordance with the Convention, the types of hazardous work to be prohibited to young persons under 18 years shall be determined according to the national circumstances and after consultation with the organizations of employers and workers concerned. The Committee has on numerous occasions noted with satisfaction the adoption, by several governments, of regulations providing a list of types of hazardous work prohibited to young persons under 18 years. The Committee takes this opportunity to strongly encourage those governments who have not yet adopted regulations in this regard to intensify their efforts to ensure the adoption of such regulations, giving full consideration to the guidance provided under Paragraph 3 of the Recommendation No. 190 and in consultation with the social partners.

The Committee recalls that the Convention recognizes the importance of effective implementation and enforcement of the provisions giving effect to the Convention, including through the provision and application of appropriate and dissuasive penalties and the need to establish or designate appropriate monitoring mechanisms to monitor its implementation. The Committee wishes to acknowledge that many countries have adopted a solid legislative framework, which provides for criminal, administrative and other appropriate sanctions for engaging children in the worst forms of child labour. In this respect, the Committee has noted the important role played by the national police forces, the border and immigration officials and the special task forces or units established in several countries in combating trafficking and the commercial sexual exploitation of children. However, on several occasions, it has observed that insufficient staff and resources, corruption among law enforcement officials, or complicity with perpetrators have hindered the effective monitoring of the worst forms of child labour. Accordingly, the Committee has drawn the governments' attention to strengthen the capacities of the law enforcement bodies in identifying, investigating, prosecuting, convicting and imposing appropriate and dissuasive penalties, including complicit officials, for violations of the provisions prohibiting the worst forms of child labour. The Committee has also stressed in many instances that children trapped in the worst forms of child labour such as commercial sexual exploitation and work in illicit activities should be treated as victims, rather than criminals. With regard to the monitoring of hazardous child labour, the labour inspection systems are particularly relevant in many countries while special child labour monitoring units or child protection units are established in some other countries. Observing that in many countries children are engaged in exploitative and hazardous work in sectors outside the normal reach of the labour inspectors, such as child domestic work, work in agriculture or self-employed children, the Committee has reiterated the need to strengthen the capacity or expand the reach of the labour inspectorate or assign them with special powers in order to ensure that children working in these sectors benefit from the protection afforded by the national legislation.

In several countries, the Committee has expressed concern over serious implementation gaps vis-à-vis the Convention including over the situation of children in conflict zones who were recruited as combatants, used as human shields, sex slaves and suicide bombers. It has urged governments to protect children in situations of fragility and crisis. It has also noted with concern the situation of children falling victims to trafficking and commercial sexual exploitation, sex tourism and child domestic work and at children who are vulnerable to the worst forms of child labour, including children working on the street, children involved in begging, child orphans of HIV/AIDS, as well as an increasing number of refugee children, most of whom are unaccompanied. The Committee has requested that governments take the necessary measures to prevent the engagement of children in such worst forms of child labour, remove, rehabilitate and socially integrate them through the provision of education or vocational training. The Committee observes that many countries have adopted and implemented specific programmes of action and effective and time-bound measures to eliminate the worst forms of child labour, as required by the Convention, which have had a significant impact in preventing and withdrawing children from these worst forms. These include national plans of action to combat and eliminate the worst forms of child labour, in particular trafficking of children, the commercial sexual exploitation of children, child bonded labour, and hazardous child labour. In this regard, the Committee wishes to highlight the role played by the ILO through its International Programme on the Elimination of Child Labour (IPEC) in supporting more than 100 countries in developing and implementing projects and time-bound programmes to combat the worst forms of child labour. Now called IPEC+, this Flagship Programme operates in some 62 countries in every region and works with the ILO's constituents (governments, employers' and workers' organizations), as well as with enterprises and small producers' organizations, NGOs and civil society organizations. It is worthy to note that, while acknowledging the relevance of the role played by NGOs and civil society organizations, the Committee recalls that the ultimate responsibility lies with the Governments, and therefore they should take all measures within their power to address the situation of all children exposed to the worst forms of child labour including street children, allocating all funds available to that end.

The Committee recalls the crucial importance of access to free basic education, which is key both in preventing the engagement of children in the worst forms of child labour and in contributing to the rehabilitation and social integration of children removed from such activities. The Committee has observed that Member States have in recent years implemented various programmes to improve access to free basic education, as required by the Convention, such as conditional cash transfer programmes aimed at providing families in situations of poverty with financial allowances on the condition that their children attend school. The Committee has also taken note of scholarships for children to cover the hidden costs of education such as uniforms, books and transports, as well as school feeding programmes to provide meals for children. These measures have improved access to education in both primary and secondary education. According to the UNESCO Institute of Statistics, the number of out-of-school children of primary and secondary school age has dropped from 380 million in 1999, when the Convention was adopted, to 258 million in 2018, even as the world population of children of school age continues to grow.

The Committee recalls that under the Convention, international cooperation and mutual assistance are particularly important in prohibiting and eliminating the worst forms of child labour. The Committee encourages Member States to strengthen their efforts to enhance collaboration through multilateral, regional and bilateral cooperation agreements to supress the worst forms of child labour. In this respect, the Committee notes that international cooperation between law enforcement bodies of some countries in the field of information exchange, cross-border monitoring and training has contributed to combating the sale and trafficking and the commercial sexual exploitation of children. The Committee further wishes to emphasize the significant role of poverty reduction programmes in breaking the cycle of poverty, which is essential for the elimination of the worst forms of child labour. Given the close correlation between child labour and poverty, the Committee encourages Member States to enhance mutual assistance and support for social and economic development and poverty eradication programmes, including by integrating child labour concerns into rural development schemes, poverty alleviation plans and social protection systems to achieve an effective reduction in poverty among children.

The Committee underscores the importance of sufficient and up-to-date data on the nature, extent and trends of the worst forms of child labour for the effective application of the Convention in practice. The Committee welcomes the initiative by several countries to conduct a national survey on child labour as well as the inclusion of a child labour module in their national work force survey, which has allowed for the monitoring of child labour trends and in determining the magnitude of child labour, and its worst forms. The Committee encourages Member States to pursue their efforts to take the necessary measures to ensure the collection, processing and analysis of data on the situation of children involved in the worst forms of child labour, to the extent possible disaggregated by age and gender.

The Committee welcomes the political will manifested by governments in addressing the particular concerns and issues raised by the Committee on the implementation and practical application of the provisions giving effect to the Convention. The adoption of effective laws and policies and their implementation have resulted in a reduction of child labour and its worst forms by almost 40 per cent (over 94 million children) since 2000, according to the 2017 Global estimates on modern slavery and child labour. Given that almost 73 million children are still involved in hazardous child labour and the persistence of other worst forms of child labour in many countries, the Committee is concerned that the challenge of completely eliminating the worst forms of child labour is enormous and requires urgent and effective action. The Committee notes with concern the increased vulnerability of children to child labour and its worst forms due to the ongoing COVID-19 pandemic and the ensuing economic crisis. In this regard, the Committee observes that according to the 2020 ILO Issue Paper on COVID-19 and Fundamental Principles and Rights at Work, COVID-19 could reverse a generation of progress against child labour and its worst forms, as an estimated 42–66 million children could fall into extreme poverty in 2020. A growth in the worst forms of child labour is of particular concern with evidence indicating new cases of bonded child labour, such as domestic servitude, as well as commercial sexual exploitation, hazardous work in mining and agriculture and a range of sweatshop activities. The Committee hopes that the international community, keeping in mind all international instruments for the protection of children and in partnership with Alliance 8.7, will stand firm on its commitment in achieving the global target 8.7 of the United Nations Sustainable Development Goals (SDG) by 2025. The Committee is of the view that effective law enforcement coupled with well-designed national child labour policies, child-friendly facilities and effective child participation and programmes, including the building and extension of social protection measures, expanding access to free basic and quality education and the promotion of decent work for adults, especially through addressing informality, will make countries more resilient in eliminating the worst forms of child labour. While celebrating this historic moment, the Committee appeals to the tripartite constituents to build on the momentum of this historic achievement to redouble their efforts to deliver on the aspirations of this fundamental Convention to end the worst forms of child labour in the near future and to leave no child behind.

Chad

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2000)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments.

Article 3(a) of the Convention. All forms of slavery or practices similar to slavery. Forced recruitment of children for use in armed conflict. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, according to the report of the United Nations Secretary-General on children and armed conflict of 15 May 2013 (A/67/845–S/2013/245, paragraphs 45 and 46), despite progress in the implementation of the action plan signed between the Government and the United Nations in June 2011 concerning children associated with the armed forces and armed groups in Chad, and although the national army of Chad did not recruit children as a matter of policy, the country task force verified 34 cases of recruitment of children by the army during the reporting period. The 34 children appeared to have been enlisted in the context of a recruitment drive in February–March 2012, during which the army gained 8,000 new recruits. In this respect, the Committee noted the new roadmap of May 2013, adopted further to the review of the implementation of the action plan concerning children associated with the armed forces and armed groups in Chad and aimed at achieving full observance of the 2011 action plan by the Government of Chad and the United Nations task force. The Committee observed that, in the context of the roadmap, one of the priorities was to speed up the adoption of the preliminary draft of the Child Protection Code, which prohibits the recruitment and use of young persons under 18 years of age in the national security forces and lays down penalties to that effect. Moreover, during 2013 it was planned to establish transparent, effective and accessible complaint procedures regarding cases of recruitment and use of children, and also to adopt measures for the immediate and independent investigation of all credible allegations of recruitment or use of children, for the persecution of perpetrators and for the imposition of appropriate disciplinary sanctions.

The Committee takes note of the information contained in the United Nations Secretary-General's report of 15 May 2014 to the Security Council on children and armed conflict (A/68/878–S/2014/339). According to this report, the deployment of Chadian troops to the African-led International Support Mission in Mali (AFISMA) has prompted renewed momentum to accelerate the implementation of the action plan signed in June 2011 to end and prevent underage recruitment in the Chadian National Army, and the Chadian authorities have renewed their commitment to engage constructively with the United Nations to expedite the implementation of the action plan. The Government of Chad, in cooperation with the United Nations and other partners, has therefore taken significant steps to fulfil its obligations. For example, a presidential directive was adopted in October 2013 to confirm 18 years as the minimum age for recruitment into the armed and security forces. This directive also establishes age verification procedures and provides for penal and disciplinary sanctions to be taken against those violating the orders. The directive was disseminated among the commanders of all defence and security zones, including in the context of several training and verification missions. Furthermore, on 4 February 2014, a presidential decree explicitly criminalized the recruitment and use of children in armed conflict.

The Secretary-General states, however, that while the efforts made by the Government to meet all obligations under the action plan have resulted in significant progress, a number of challenges remain to ensure sustainability and the effective prevention of violations against children. Chad should pursue comprehensive and thorough screening and training of its armed and security forces to continue to prevent the presence of children, including in the light of Chad's growing involvement in peacekeeping operations. While no new cases of recruitment of children were documented by the United Nations in 2013 and no children were found during the joint screening exercises carried out with the Chadian authorities, interviews confirmed that soldiers had been integrated in the past into the Chadian National Army from armed groups while still under the age of 18. According to the Secretary-General, the strengthening of operating procedures, such as those for age verification, which ensure the accountability of perpetrators, should remain a priority for the Chadian authorities. Finally, the Secretary-General invited the National Assembly to proceed as soon as possible with the examination and adoption of the Child Protection Code, which should provide greater protection for the children of Chad. The Committee therefore requests the Government to intensify its efforts to end, in practice, the forced recruitment of children under 18 years of age by the armed forces and armed groups and to undertake immediately the full demobilization of all children. The Committee urges the Government to take immediate measures to ensure that the perpetrators are investigated and prosecuted and that sufficiently effective and dissuasive penalties are imposed on persons found guilty of recruiting and using children under 18 years of age in armed conflict. Finally, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the adoption of the Child Protection Code as soon as possible.

Article 7(2). Effective and time-bound measures. Clauses (b) and (c). Preventing children from being engaged in the worst forms of child labour, removing children from these forms of labour and ensuring their rehabilitation and social integration. Children who have been enlisted and used in armed conflict. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, according to the report of the United Nations Secretary-General on children and armed conflict of 15 May 2013 (A/67/845–S/2013/245, paragraph 49), the actions taken by the Government for the release, temporary care and reunification of separated children, while encouraging, were not yet in line with the commitments made in the action plan signed between the Government and the United Nations in June 2011 concerning children associated with the armed forces and armed groups in Chad. The Committee noted that one of the priorities referred to in the 2013 roadmap was to secure the release of children and support their reintegration.

The Committee notes that, according to the Secretary-General's report of 15 May 2014, a central child protection unit has been established in the Ministry of Defence, as well as in each of the eight defence and security zones, to coordinate the monitoring and protection of children's rights and to implement awareness-raising activities. Between August and October 2013, the Government and the United Nations jointly conducted screening and age verification of approximately 3,800 troops of the Chadian national army in all eight zones. The age verification standards had been previously developed during a workshop organized by the United Nations in July. In addition, between August and September 2013, a training-of-trainers programme on child protection was attended by 346 members of the Chadian National Army. As from July 2013, troops of the Chadian National Army deployed in Mali started to receive pre-deployment training on child protection and international humanitarian law; in December of the same year, 864 troops attended child protection training at the Loumia training centre. The Committee encourages the Government to intensify its efforts and continue its collaboration with the United Nations in order to prevent the enrolment of children in armed groups and improve the situation of child victims of forced recruitment for use in armed conflict. In addition, the Committee requests the Government once again to supply information on measures taken to ensure that child soldiers removed from the armed forces and groups receive adequate assistance for their rehabilitation and social integration, including reintegration into the school system or vocational training, wherever appropriate. It requests the Government to supply information on the results achieved in its next report.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2002)

The Committee notes with deep concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments. The Committee informs the Government that, if it has not supplied replies to the points raised by 1 September 2021, then it may proceed with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the information at its disposal at its next session.

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (a). All forms of slavery or similar practices. Sale and trafficking of children. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the Government's statement that there is child trafficking between Benin and the Congo for the purpose of forcing children to work in Pointe-Noire in trading and domestic work. According to the Government, the children are forced to work all day in harsh conditions by their host families, and are subjected to all kinds of hardships. The Committee noted that sections 345, 354 and 356 of the Penal Code lay down penalties for anyone found guilty of the forcible or fraudulent abduction of persons including young persons under 18 years of age. It requested the Government to indicate to what extent sections 345, 354 and 356 of the Penal Code have been implemented in practice. The Committee requests the Government once again to supply information on the application of sections 345, 354 and 356 of the Penal Code in practice, including, in particular, statistics on the number and nature of offences reported, investigations, prosecutions, convictions and penalties imposed.

Article 7(2). Effective and time-bound measures. Clause (b). Removal of children from the worst forms of child labour and ensuring their rehabilitation and social integration. Sale and trafficking of children. In its previous observations, the Committee noted the Government's statement acknowledging that the trafficking of children between Benin and Congo for the purpose of forcing children to work in Pointe-Noire in trading and domestic work is contrary to human rights. It also noted that the Government has taken certain measures to curb child trafficking, including: (a) the repatriation by the Consulate of Benin of children who have either been picked up by the national police or removed from families; and (b) the requirement at borders (airport) for minors (young person under 18 years of age) to have administrative authorization to leave the territory of Benin. The Committee asked the Government to provide information on the impact of the measures taken with regard to the rehabilitation and social integration of children following their withdrawal from labour. It noted that the Government's report does not contain any information on this subject. The Committee requests the Government once again to supply information on the time-bound measures taken to remove young persons under 18 years of age from this worst form of child labour and to ensure their rehabilitation and social integration. It also requests the Government to supply information on the impact of these measures.

Application of the Convention in practice. The Committee noted that, according to the concluding observations of the Committee on the Rights of the Child on the initial report of Congo of October 2006 (CRC/C/COG/CO/1, paragraph 85), a study of the root causes and repercussions of trafficking is due to be conducted in the country. The Committee requests the Government to supply information on the results of this study and to supply a copy of it once it has been prepared.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee expects that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 2005)

The Committee notes with deep concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments. The Committee informs the Government that, if it has not supplied replies to the points raised by 1 September 2021, then it may proceed with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the information at its disposal at its next session.

Article 1 of the Convention. National policy to ensure the effective abolition of child labour; application of the Convention in practice. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the Decent Work Country Programme (DWCP) 2008–12 for Djibouti, which prioritized, inter alia, the improvement of conditions of work by promoting national and international labour standards, with a particular focus on child labour. The Committee also noted the adoption of the National Strategic Plan for Children in Djibouti (PSNED) for the 2011–2015 period, with the goal of establishing a protective environment conducive to the observance of the fundamental rights of children. The Committee asked the Government to provide information on the implementation of the DWCP and the PSNED and on the results achieved regarding the progressive elimination of child labour. It also asked the Government to provide information on progress made in framing a national policy to combat child labour.

The Committee notes that, according to UNICEF, for the 2002–12 period, 7.7 per cent of children between five and 14 years of age in Djibouti were engaged in activities deemed to be work. The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that it is not in a position to communicate the results achieved through the PSNED since the studies conducted are still in draft form. The Government also indicates that the DWCP could not be adopted owing to a lack of agreement with the trade unions and it hopes for a resumption of social dialogue, with ILO assistance, with a view to adoption and implementation of the DWCP in the near future. The Committee also notes the "Djibouti Compendium of Statistics" attached to the Government's report and the Government's statement that the Directorate of Statistics and Demographic Studies (DISED) has not undertaken any survey in relation to child labour. The Committee firmly hopes for a resumption of social dialogue without delay and requests that the Government take the necessary steps to ensure the effective implementation of the DWCP and the PSNED. It requests that the Government provide information on the results achieved regarding the progressive elimination of child labour and on progress made in framing a national policy to combat child labour. Lastly, the Committee again requests that the Government take the necessary measures to ensure that studies on the extent and nature of child labour in Djibouti are conducted in the near future, and that the results are then communicated to the Office.

Article 2(1). Scope of application and labour inspection. The Committee previously noted that, by virtue of section 1 of Act No. 133/AN/05/5ème issuing the Labour Code (hereinafter: Labour Code), the Labour Code applies only to employment relationships. It also noted the Government's indication that the provision on the minimum age for access to work is observed in the formal sector but is not applied effectively in the informal economy. The Committee further noted that, despite new Act No. 199/AN/13/6ème, supplementing Act No. 212/AN/07/5ème establishing the National Social Security Fund, which extends health-care benefits to all self-employed workers in the informal economy, the Government recognized that the lack of structure in the informal economy prevented the identification of issues faced by young workers in the sector.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that it hopes to submit the question of informal work to the National Labour Council, with a particular focus on the Transition from the Informal to the Formal Economy Recommendation, 2015 (No. 204). The Committee recalls that the Convention applies to all branches of economic activity, whether formal or informal, and that it covers all types of employment or work, whether or not it is effected on the basis of a dependent employment relationship, and whether or not it is remunerated. The Committee therefore requests that the Government take steps to ensure that the protection afforded by the Convention is secured to children under 16 years of age working in the informal economy, particularly by adapting and strengthening the labour inspectorate in order to improve labour inspectors' capacity to identify cases of child labour. It requests that the Government provide information on this matter and also to communicate the results achieved.

Article 2(3). Age of completion of compulsory schooling. The Committee previously noted that, according to section 4 of Act No. 96/AN/00/4ème setting out the policy for Djibouti's education system, the State guarantees education for children from the age of six to 16 years. The Committee also noted that, in 2006, the net primary school enrolment rate was 66.2 per cent and at secondary level the rate was 41 per cent.

The Committee notes that, despite the improvements in school attendance, Djibouti still has a low school enrolment rate and that the goal, established in the PSNED, of achieving a 100 per cent enrolment rate for children in the 6–10 age group by 2015 was not achieved. Indeed, in 2014, according to the UNESCO Institute of Statistics, the attendance rate was 67.39 per cent in primary education and 46.35 per cent in secondary education. Recalling that compulsory education is one of the most effective means of combating child labour, the Committee requests that the Government intensify its efforts and take measures that will ensure children's participation in compulsory basic schooling, or in an equivalent setting. It requests that the Government provide information on the recent measures taken to increase the school attendance rate, at both primary and secondary levels, so as to prevent children under 16 years of age from working. It further requests that the Government provide recent statistics on the primary and secondary school enrolment rates in Djibouti.

Article 3(1). Age of admission to hazardous work. The Committee previously noted that, according to section 112 of the Labour Code, at the request of a labour inspector, women or young persons between 16 and 18 years of age may not be placed in employment recognized as being beyond their strength by an approved doctor. However, the Committee observed that the national legislation does not appear expressly to establish, as Article 3(1) of the Convention requires, a minimum age of 18 years for any type of employment or work which, by its nature or the circumstances in which it is carried out, is likely to jeopardize the health, safety or morals of young persons. Noting once again the lack of information on this matter in the Government's report, the Committee again requests that the Government take the necessary measures to ensure that no person under 18 years of age is authorized to engage in hazardous work, in accordance with Article 3(1). It requests that the Government provide information on the progress made in this regard.

Article 3(2). Determination of hazardous types of work. The Committee recalls that, according to section 110 of the Labour Code, the employment of young persons in domestic work, hotels and bars is strictly prohibited, with the exception of employment strictly in the area of catering. Furthermore, under section 111 of the Labour Code, an order adopted on the proposal of the Minister of Labour and the Minister of Health, after consultation with the National Council for Labour, Employment and Social Security (CONTESS), shall determine the nature of the work and the categories of enterprise prohibited for all women, pregnant women and young people, and the applicable minimum age. The Committee previously asked the Government to adopt such an order on jobs and enterprises prohibited for young people.

The Committee again notes the Government's indication that the order in question has been drawn up and that it has pledged to refer the adoption thereof to CONTESS. It also indicates that no controls have been undertaken to date by the labour inspectorate on hazardous types of work performed by young people. The Committee again requests that the Government take the necessary steps as a matter of urgency to ensure that the order determining the nature of the work and the categories of enterprise prohibited for young people under 18 years of age is adopted under section 111 of the Labour Code in the near future.

Noting the interest expressed by the Government in obtaining technical assistance from the Office, the Committee invites the Government to avail itself of ILO technical assistance in order to facilitate the application of the Convention.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee expects that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2005)

The Committee notes with deep concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments. The Committee informs the Government that, if it has not supplied replies to the points raised by 1 September 2021, then it may proceed with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the information at its disposal at its next session.

Articles 3(b) and 7(2) of the Convention. Use, procuring or offering of a child for prostitution or illicit activities; effective and time-bound measures. Clause (b). Assistance for removing children from the worst forms of child labour. The Committee previously noted that the Committee on the Rights of the Child (CRC) once again expressed its concern at the high number of children, particularly girls, involved in prostitution and at the lack of facilities providing services for sexually exploited children.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that it does not have up-to-date information on this matter. The Committee urges the Government to take effective and time-bound measures to remove children from prostitution, and to ensure their rehabilitation and social integration. It also requests the Government to supply information on the progress achieved in this respect.

Articles 3(d) and 4(1). Hazardous work and determination of these types of work. As regards the prohibition on employing children under 18 years of age in work which, by its nature or the circumstances in which it is carried out, is likely to harm the health, safety or morals of children, as prescribed by Article 3(d) of the Convention, and also the adoption of a list of hazardous types of work, the Committee refers to its detailed comments relating to the Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138).

Article 6. Programmes of action to eliminate the worst forms of child labour. The Committee previously noted that in the context of activities carried out under the Decent Work Country Programme (DWCP) for Djibouti for 2008–12, which prioritized, inter alia, the improvement of conditions of work through the promotion of national and international labour standards, with a particular focus on child labour, one of the objectives was that the ILO constituents and the social partners should work together to prevent and eliminate the worst forms of child labour. In this regard, it was planned to formulate and implement a national plan of action for the elimination of the worst forms of child labour.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that the DWCP has not been adopted owing to a lack of agreement between the Government and the trade unions but that it hopes that, with the help of the Office, social dialogue can resume and that the national plan of action for the elimination of the worst forms of child labour will be adopted and implemented. The Committee firmly hopes that social dialogue will resume as soon as possible. It again requests the Government to take immediate and effective measures to ensure that the national plan of action for the elimination of the worst forms of child labour is formulated, adopted and implemented as soon as possible and to provide information on the progress made in this respect.

Article 7(2)(d). Identifying children at special risk. 1. HIV/AIDS orphans. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that despite the measures taken by the Government in favour of orphans and vulnerable children (OVCs), the number of HIV/AIDS orphans had increased (to 8,800 in 2011).

The Committee notes that the Government does not supply any information on the measures taken to prevent the engagement of HIV/AIDS orphans in the worst forms of child labour. However, the Committee notes that according to the UNICEF publication The state of the world's children 2016: A fair chance for every child, a total of 6,000 children were orphaned as a result of HIV/AIDS in 2014. It also notes that the Ministry of Health has drawn up a National Health Development Plan (2013–17), which indicates that in the context of the Horn of Africa Partnership (HOAP) to address HIV vulnerability and cross-border mobility, the Government renewed its commitment to intensifying and strengthening inter-ministerial collaboration at the national and subregional levels in order to stop the spread of HIV/AIDS and reverse the current trend of this scourge. Recalling that HIV/AIDS orphans are at greater risk of involvement in the worst forms of child labour, the Committee again requests the Government to supply information on the impact of measures, policies and plans aimed at preventing the engagement of HIV/AIDS orphans in the worst forms of child labour, and on the results achieved.

2. Street children. The Committee previously noted the Government's statement that most of the children living and working on the streets were of foreign origin and often worked as beggars or shoeshine boys or girls. It also noted that the CRC continued to express concern at the very high number of children still on the streets and at the continued exposure of these children to prostitution, sexually transmissible infections, including HIV/AIDS, economic and sexual exploitation, and violence.

The Committee notes that the Government does not provide any information in this respect. However, it notes that a paper entitled Humanitarian action for children, published by UNICEF in 2016, indicates that 200 street children received social assistance through the humanitarian action of UNICEF, with the collaboration of the Government. Recalling that street children are particularly exposed to the worst forms of child labour, the Committee again urges the Government to take immediate and effective measures to protect them from the worst forms of child labour and ensure their rehabilitation and social reintegration, and also to provide information on progress made in this respect.

Application of the Convention in practice. The Committee previously noted that the CRC observed that there were gaps in the surveys that had been carried out in the areas of poverty, education and health, and that there was insufficient capacity to centralize and analyse population data. The Committee notes the Government's wish to obtain technical assistance from the Office with regard to drawing up statistics. The Committee requests the Government once again to take steps to ensure the availability of statistics on the nature, extent and trends of the worst forms of child labour, disaggregated by age and gender, and on the number of children covered by the measures giving effect to the Convention.

Noting the interest expressed by the Government in obtaining technical assistance, the Committee invites the Government to avail itself of technical assistance from the Office in order to facilitate the implementation of the Convention.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee expects that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 1983)

The Committee notes with deep concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments. The Committee informs the Government that, if it has not supplied replies to the points raised by 1 September 2021, then it may proceed with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the information at its disposal at its next session.

Article 2(2) of the Convention. Raising the initially specified age for admission to employment or work. Noting that the Government initially specified a minimum age of 15 years upon ratification, the Committee observes that the Education Act of 1997 provides for a minimum age for admission to work of 16 years of age. In this regard, the Committee takes the opportunity to draw the Government's attention to the provisions of Article 2(2) of the Convention which provides that any Member having ratified this Convention may subsequently notify the Director-General of the International Labour Office, by a new declaration, that it has raised the minimum age that it had previously specified. This allows the age fixed by the national legislation to be harmonized with that provided for at the international level. The Committee would be grateful if the Government would consider sending a declaration of this nature to the Office.

Article 3(1). Minimum age for admission to hazardous work. The Committee previously noted that, according to section 7(1) of the Employment of Women, Young Persons and Children Act, no young person (under 18) shall be employed or work during the night in any public or private industrial undertaking, other than an undertaking in which only members of the same family are employed. However, the Committee observes that there is no other provision which prohibits the employment of young persons in work which is likely to jeopardize their health, safety or morals. In this regard, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the performance of hazardous work is prohibited for all persons under 18 years of age.

Article 3(2). Determination of types of hazardous work. The Committee notes the Government's statement in its report submitted under the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182), in 2009 that the social partners will be consulted for the determination of the list of types of hazardous work. Recalling that, pursuant to Article 3(2) of the Convention, the types of hazardous employment or work shall be determined by national laws or regulations or by the competent authority, after consultation with the organizations of employers and workers concerned, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on any progress made with regard to the determination of the list of types of hazardous work to be prohibited for persons under 18 years.

Article 7(3). Determination of types of light work. The Committee notes that while section 46(3) permits children from the age of 14 to be employed during school vacations (i.e. in light work), but observes that there does not appear to be a determination of the types of light work permitted for these children. In this regard, the Committee recalls that, pursuant to Article 7(3) of the Convention, the competent authority shall determine what light work is and shall prescribe the number of hours during which, and the conditions in which, such employment or work may be undertaken. The Committee therefore requests the Government to provide information on any measures taken or envisaged to determine the hours during which and the conditions in which light work may be undertaken by children above the age of 14 during vacations from school, pursuant to Article 7(3) of the Convention.

Article 9(3). Keeping of registers. The Committee previously noted that section 8(1) of the Employment of Women, Young Persons and Children Ordinance provided for the keeping of registers or lists by the employer of all persons employed who are less than 16 years of age. In this regard, the Committee recalled that Article 9(3) of the Convention requires the keeping of such registers for all persons who are less than 18 years of age. Noting an absence of information on this point in the Government's report, the Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that registers be kept and made available by the employer in respect of all children under 18 years of age. It requests the Government to provide information on any measures taken in this regard.

Application of the Convention in practice. The Committee notes the Government's statement in its report submitted under Convention No. 182 in 2009 that measures will be taken to broaden the existing mandate of the national inspectorate in order to cover child labour issues, in consultation with the social partners. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the manner in which the Convention is applied in practice, including statistical data on the employment of children and young persons, extracts from the reports of inspections services and information on the number and nature of violations detected involving children and young persons.

The Committee encourages the Government to take into consideration the Committee's comments on discrepancies between national legislation and the Convention. The Committee invites the Government to consider technical assistance from the ILO to bring its legislation into conformity with the Convention.

The Committee expects that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Eritrea

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 2000)

Article 1 of the Convention. National policy, labour inspection and application of the Convention in practice. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the Government's indication that it had collected data and information to formulate a national policy and that an upcoming Comprehensive National Child Policy document was expected to strengthen efforts to provide sustained services to children. However, it noted that the UN Human Rights Council (A/HRC/26/L.6 and A/HRC/26/45) in its reports of 2014, continued to highlight child labour in the country, including in hazardous activities such as harvesting and construction. The Committee therefore strongly urged the Government to intensify its efforts to implement concrete measures, such as by adopting a national plan of action to abolish child labour as well as strengthening the capacity of the labour inspection system.

The Committee notes the Government's information, in its report, that considering that a holistic approach is the best solution for the elimination of child labour, the Government has adopted a Comprehensive Child Policy in 2016. It also notes the Government's information that it is in the process of developing a national action plan for the elimination of child labour. In this regard, two members of the Ministry of Labour and Social Welfare (MLSW) have participated in the National Capacity Building Workshop on Child Labour and Forced Labour Data Analysis organized by the ILO in February 2020 in Cairo, Egypt. The Committee further notes the Government's indication that labour inspection plays a critical role in preventing child labour by conducting regular inspections of workplaces and ensuring that conditions of work are respected as prescribed by law. Several efforts are being taken to improve the number and quality of labour inspections, such as providing trainings to the inspectors. The Government indicates that more than 45 labour inspectors, including new recruits are engaged in inspection throughout the six regions of the country. The Committee further notes the Government's reference to the findings of the Eritrea Labour Force Survey 2015-16 which indicated that among the 809,670 eligible children (referred to as children within the age group of 5–13 who are eligible for study), 16.4 per cent were engaged in some work activities, of whom 71.3 per cent were then currently attending school. The average age at which children start working is 7 years. The main reasons reported for working at early age were "to help in household enterprises" (53 per cent) and "supplement family income" (33.3 per cent). The survey also indicated that while 11.7 per cent of children combined work with schooling, 4.8 per cent of children were involved in child labour either by missing some classes or without going to school at all. In this regard, the Committee notes from the Technical Advisory Mission Report on the Tripartite Inter-ministerial Workshop on the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No.182) held in Asmara in March 2019, that the tripartite constituents identified that measures are required to "Strengthen the capacity of labour inspectorate to identify children engaged in child labour with a view to removing them and providing them with assistance". While noting the measures taken by the Government, the Committee urges it to intensify its efforts to progressively eliminate child labour in the country, including through the adoption and effective implementation of the National Action plan for the elimination of child labour and the Comprehensive Child Policy. In this regard, the Committee requests the Government to continue to take measures to strengthen the capacity of the labour inspection system in order to adequately monitor and detect cases of child labour in the country. It further requests the Government to provide information on the number of inspections on child labour carried out by the labour inspectors as well as on the number and nature of violations detected and penalties applied. Finally, the Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the application of the Convention in practice, in particular statistical data on the employment of children and young persons by age group.

Article 2(3) and (4). Age of completion of compulsory schooling and minimum age for admission to employment. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the Government's indication that education is compulsory for eight years (five years of elementary school and three years of middle school), which would be completed at 14 years of age. It noted the measures taken by the Government to provide free education to all school children up to the middle school level as well as its policies, in particular the Nomadic Education Policy, to make education inclusive to all children. However, the Committee noted from the draft proposal within the Strategic Partnership Cooperation Framework (SPCF) 2013–16 between the Government and the United Nations system and from the Government's fourth periodic report to the Committee on the Rights of the Child (CRC/C/ER/4, paragraph 301 and table 28), a decline in the elementary school enrolment rates. The Committee therefore requested the Government to continue to cooperate with the UN bodies to improve the functioning of, and access to, the education system so as to increase school enrolment rates and reduce school drop-out rates for children at least up to the age of completion of compulsory education, particularly with regard to girls.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that efforts are being taken as a priority to improve the compulsory basic education in the country. In order to counter the challenges and hostilities including capacity and resources, and to a limited extent the cultural obstacles affecting nomadic children and girl's education in some of the lowland areas, basic schools without any barriers are being introduced gradually throughout the country. According to the statistics provided by the Government, in 2017-2018, 654,399 students were enrolled from pre-primary up to secondary level. In the last two decades, school enrolment rates have increased by 96.4 per cent (106.3 per cent for girls), number of teachers by 131 per cent and number of schools by 178 per cent. Moreover, alternative education through Complementary Elementary Education (CEE) has been introduced for out-of-school children as well as to address the challenges in remote and rural areas. In this regard, 8,575 out of school children (46.4 per cent girls) aged 9-14 years benefitted from the CEE in 2016-17. The Committee further notes from the UNICEF Annual Report of 2016 that the ongoing measures to promote access to education resulted in 17,145 out-of-school children including (6,541 girls) from the most disadvantaged areas enrolling in primary education during the 2015-16 academic year. The Committee, however, notes that according to the UNESCO estimates for 2018, the net enrolment rates at primary and secondary level were 51.5 per cent and 41.6 per cent respectively, and the number of out-of-school children was 241,988. Considering that compulsory education is one of the most effective means of combating child labour, the Committee encourages the Government to pursue its efforts to increase school enrolment, attendance and completion rates, and reduce drop-out rates, particularly of children up to 14 years of age. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken in this regard and on the results achieved, including statistical data on the number of children enrolled at the primary and secondary schools.

Article 3(2). Determination of the types of hazardous work. The Committee recalls that the Government has been referring to the upcoming adoption of a list of hazardous activities prohibited to young employees under section 69(1) of the Labour Proclamation since 2007. The Committee urged the Government to finalize this ministerial regulation, without delay.

The Committee notes the Government's information that child labour in Eritrea does not involve hazardous work. However, the MLSW is in the process of finalizing the regulation prescribing the list of types of hazardous work that are prohibited to young persons under 18 years of age. The Committee accordingly expresses the firm hope that the ministerial regulation issuing the list of hazardous activities prohibited to persons under the age of 18 will be adopted in the near future. It requests the Government to provide a copy, once it has been adopted.

Article 9(3). Keeping of registers by employers. The Committee previously noted the Government's indication that the requirement for employers to maintain a register of persons who are employed and are under 18 years would be addressed in an upcoming regulation and studies in this regard were ongoing.

The Committee once again notes the Government's indication that the MLSW is still undertaking studies to develop this regulation. Noting that the Government has been referring to the adoption of this regulation since 2007, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the regulation concerning the registers to be kept by employers is adopted without delay. It also requests the Government to provide a copy, once it has been adopted.

The Committee encourages the Government to seek ILO technical assistance in its efforts to combat child labour.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 1999)

The Committee takes note of the supplementary information provided by the Government in light of the decision adopted by the Governing Body at its 338th Session (June 2020). The Committee proceeded with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the supplementary information received from the Government this year as well as on the basis of the information at its disposal in 2019.

The Committee notes the observations of the International Organisation of Employers (IOE), and the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) received on 29 August 2019 and 1 September 2019, respectively. It also notes the detailed discussion which took place at the 108th Session of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards (CAS) in June 2019, concerning the application by Ethiopia of the Convention.

Follow-up to the conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards (International Labour Conference, 108th Session, June 2019)

Article 1 of the Convention. National policy and application of the Convention in practice. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the various measures taken by the Government to eliminate child labour, including the Ethiopians Fighting Against Child Exploitation (E-FACE) project; the Community Care Coalition whereby in-kind and cash support is used to prevent child labour; as well as the National Action Plan (NAP 2011–17) to prevent child labour exploitation. The Committee observed that according to the 2015 Child Labour Survey results, the number of children aged 5–13 years engaged in child labour was estimated to be 13,139,991 (page 63) with 41.7 per cent aged between 5 and 11 years (page xii).

The Committee notes the Government's information in its 2019 report that within the framework of the NAP 2011–17 to eliminate child labour, several public awareness-raising programmes were conducted on child labour through conversation and media forums reaching about 1,170,904 people in child labour affected areas and 441 labour inspectors were provided with capacity-building training on prevention of child labour. The Committee also notes the Government's indication that on an average, 39,000 inspections were carried out annually in different establishments with a focus on child labour. The Government also indicates that the grassroots community organizations known as Community Care Coalition have made significant contributions through mobilizing community resources to prevent vulnerable children from entering into child labour by supporting their families and providing shelter. Moreover, a comprehensive child labour policy has been issued in consultation with the social partners and relevant stakeholders to address child labour. The Committee further notes from the document on the E-FACE project that to date this project has impacted the lives of more than 18,000 children engaged in child labour allowing them to attend school and reducing the risk of dropout.

The Committee further notes the Government's information in its supplementary report that in December 2019, the Government launched the Alliance 8.7, the global partnership for eradicating forced labour, child labour and human trafficking around the world. In addition, in response to the COVID-19 pandemic, child protection activities were provided to vulnerable children and a significant number of street children were protected from socio-economic hazards. Moreover, close monitoring and support of community-based protection activities for families and children in need have been set in place. While noting the measures taken by the Government, the Committee urges the Government to continue to take the necessary measures for the progressive elimination of child labour. It requests the Government to continue to provide specific information on the concrete measures taken in this regard as well as the results achieved. The Committee also requests the Government to provide detailed information on the manner in which the Convention is applied in practice, including, for example, statistical data on the employment of children and young persons, extracts from the reports of the inspection services, and information on the number and nature of violations detected and penalties applied involving children and young persons.

Article 2(1). Scope of application. The Committee previously noted that although section 89(2) of the Labour Law Proclamation No. 42 of 1993 prohibits the employment of persons under 14 years of age, the provisions of the Labour Law did not cover work performed outside an employment relationship. It noted the Government's indication that the Constitution provides for the right of children to be protected from any forms of exploitative labour, without any discrimination, whether employed or self-employed, working in the formal or informal sector. The Committee noted that according to the 2015 Child Labour Survey results, 89.4 per cent of the children engaged in child labour worked in the agricultural, forestry and fishing sectors and in wholesale and retail trade sector. The majority of children performing economic activities were working as unpaid family workers (95.6 per cent) (page xii). Noting with concern the high number of children working in the informal economy, the Committee requested the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that all children under 14 years of age, particularly children working on their own account or in the informal economy, benefit from the protection laid down by the Convention.

The Committee notes that the Conference Committee, in its concluding observations, urged the Government to strengthen the capacity of the labour inspectorate and competent services, including human, material and technical resources and training, particularly in the informal economy. It also notes that the IOE, in its observations, commended the Government for taking the following steps to address the gaps in the Labour Law, such as: (i) extending the labour advisory services in the informal sector; and (ii) strengthening the labour inspectorate system in the country to make it accessible to all enterprises and workplaces.

The Committee notes the Government's information in its 2019 report that measures are being taken to extend labour advisory services in the informal economy with the aim of protecting the rights of all workers, including young workers working without an employment relationship such as work on their own account or in the informal economy. The Government also indicates that efforts are being made to strengthen the labour inspectorate system in the country so as to ensure that such services are effectively accessible to all enterprises and workplaces. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that all children under 14 years of age, particularly children working on their own account or in the informal economy, benefit from the protection laid down by the Convention. In this regard, the Committee requests the Government to continue to take measures to strengthen the capacities and expand the reach of the labour inspectorate so that it can adequately monitor and detect cases of child labour, particularly involving children working in the informal economy, and on their own account. It requests the Government to provide information on any measures taken or progress made in this regard.

Article 2(3). Age of completion of compulsory schooling. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the Government's indication that it had started the process of drafting legislation which aims at making primary education compulsory. It also noted that according to the Child Labour Survey of 2015, the school attendance rate was 61.3 per cent among children aged 5–17 years. Moreover, 2,830,842 children in the 5–17 years age group (7.6 per cent of the total number of children in the country), dropped out of school with the dropout rate higher among working children (10.9 per cent) than non-working children (4.1 per cent) and among working boys (11.6 per cent) than working girls (9.8 per cent) (pages 86 and 88). The Committee further noted that the United Nations Committee on the Rights of the Child (CRC), in its 2015 concluding observations, expressed concern at: (i) the lack of national legislation on free and compulsory education; (ii) the persistent regional disparities in enrolment rates and the high number of school-aged children, particularly girls, who remained out of school; as well as (iii) the high dropout rates and the significant low enrolment rates in pre-primary education and secondary education (CRC/C/ETH/CO/4-5, paragraph 61).

The Committee notes the statement made by the Government representative of Ethiopia to the Conference Committee that the School Feeding Programme supplemented by specific interventions have significantly improved inclusiveness, participation and achievements in education. The Government representative also stated that a rural–urban Productive Safety Net Programme to improve the income of targeted poor households in the rural and urban areas and the Ethiopian Education Development Roadmap, 2018–2030 to address the gap in access to quality education has been developed. Moreover, Alternative Basic Education modalities are being implemented, such as mobile schools for children of pastoral and semi-pastoral communities. It notes that the Conference Committee, in its conclusions, urged the Government to introduce legislative measures to provide free and compulsory education up to the minimum age of admission to employment of 14 years and ensure its effective implementation as well as to improve the functioning of the educational system through measures to increase the school enrolment rates and decrease dropout rates.

The Committee notes the observations made by ITUC that there is a close link between compulsory education and the abolition of child labour and hence it is essential that Ethiopia introduce compulsory schooling at least up to the minimum age for admission to employment.

The Committee notes the Government's information in its 2019 report that it is committed to achieving universal and quality primary education for all school-aged children. Accordingly, it is implementing the Education and Training Policy and the Education Sector Development Programme (ESD) (2016–20) which has led to the achievement of the following results: (i) the number of primary schools has increased from 33,373 in 2014–15 to 36,466 in 2017–18; (ii) the net enrolment rate has increased from 94.3 per cent in 2014–15 to nearly 100 per cent in 2017–18 with a gender parity index of 0.9 per cent; and (iii) the school dropout rates have decreased from 18 per cent in 2008–09 to 9 per cent in 2013–14. The Government further indicates that the Urban Productive Safety Net Programme which has the objective of providing access to basic nutrition through the school feeding programme to over 300,000 marginalized school children is being implemented in selected urban areas.

The Committee notes, from the UNICEF Annual Report 2018 that while the enrolment rate in primary education has improved (which has tripled from 2000 to 2016), the transition from primary to secondary education remains a bottleneck, with children in rural areas predisposed to dropping out of school and only 25 per cent of secondary school-aged girls attending secondary school. Furthermore, according to the UNICEF report entitled Multidimensional Child Deprivation in Ethiopia, National Estimates, 2018, 50 per cent of children aged 5–17 years were deprived of education in 2016. The proportion of children in rural areas aged 7–17 years who are not attending school is more than double that of children residing in urban areas. The Committee finally notes that the United Nations Committee on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW) in its concluding observations of March 2019 remained concerned that primary education is still not compulsory and at the high dropout and low completion rates of girls at the primary level (CEDAW/C/ETH/CO/8, paragraph 33(a)). Recalling that compulsory education is one of the most effective means of combating child labour, the Committee once again urges the Government to take the necessary steps to make education compulsory up to the minimum age of admission to employment of 14 years in accordance with Article 2(3) of the Convention. While noting the measures taken by the Government, the Committee strongly encourages the Government to pursue its efforts to increase school enrolment rates, decrease dropout rates and ensure completion of compulsory education with a view to preventing children under 14 years of age from being engaged in child labour.

Article 3. Determination of hazardous work. The Committee previously noted that the Decree of the Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs of 2 September 1997 concerning the prohibition of work for young workers which contained a detailed list of types of hazardous work was undergoing revision. The Committee observed that, according to the Child Labour Survey, the rate of hazardous work among children aged 5–17 years was 23.3 per cent (28 per cent for boys versus 18.2 per cent for girls). The average hours of work per week performed by children engaged in hazardous work in this age group was 41.4 hours with 50 per cent of them working more than 42 hours per week. The Committee also noted that among children engaged in hazardous work, 87.5 per cent work in the agricultural sector, and 66.2 per cent are involved in other hazardous working conditions such as night work, working in an unhealthy environment or using unsafe equipment at work (page xiii). The Committee urged the Government to strengthen its efforts to ensure that, in practice, children under 18 years of age were not engaged in hazardous work. It also requested the Government to indicate whether a new list of types of hazardous work was adopted and to supply a copy.

The Committee notes the Government's information in its 2019 report that the list of activities prohibited to young persons has been revised in consultation with social partners and a directive has been issued by the Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs in 2013 in this regard. It notes the unofficial translated copy of the directive provided by the Government which contains a list of 16 activities which are harmful to the health, safety and well-being of young workers and therefore prohibited. This list includes: work in transport of passengers and goods by road, railway, air and waterways; works related to handling of heavy material; fishing at sea; underground work at mines and quarries; works connected with electric power generation plants or transmission lines; work at elevation in construction; work on production of alcoholic drinks and drugs; work in extremely hot and cold conditions; work exposed to ionizing and non-ionizing, x-rays and ultraviolet rays; work with flammable and explosive materials; work with toxic chemicals and pesticides; and all works that will have adverse effects on the physical and psychological development of young persons. The list also provides the maximum weight limits that could be carried by young persons. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the application in practice of the revised list under the directive of 2013, particularly for hazardous work in agriculture, including statistics on the number and nature of violations reported and penalties imposed. The Committee reminds the Government that it may avail itself of technical assistance from the ILO with respect to the issues raised in its present comment.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government, which reiterates the content of its previous request adopted in 2019.

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2000)

The Committee notes that the Government did not send the report requested by the Committee. It therefore reiterates its previous observation as follows.

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (a). All forms of slavery and practices similar to slavery. Sale and trafficking of children. The Committee previously noted the Government's information that an Anti-Human Trafficking Unit had been established under the Human Trafficking Act, 2005. It also noted from the written replies of the Government to the list of issues in relation to the initial report to the United Nations Human Rights Committee regarding the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights of 13 June 2016, that the Human Trafficking Legislative Instrument (L.I. 2219) was passed in November 2015 in order to aid effective implementation of the Human Trafficking Act (CCPR/C/GHA/Q/1/Add.1, paragraph 74). The Committee requested the Government to provide information on the application of the Human Trafficking Act and the Human Trafficking Legislative Instrument, 2015, in practice.

The Committee notes with regret the absence of information in the Government's report. The Committee notes from the document on the National Plan of Action (NPA) for the Elimination of Human Trafficking in Ghana 2017–21 that the Anti-Human Trafficking Unit of the Ghana Police Service conducts investigations of cases of trafficking of persons and seeks to prosecute offenders. Moreover, the Anti-Human Smuggling and Trafficking in Persons Unit of the Ghana Immigration Service investigates and arrests human trafficking and smuggling offenders while also building the capacities of immigration officials to detect such cases. However, according to this document, Ghana continues to be a source, transit and destination country for trafficking of persons, while trafficking of girls and boys for labour and sexual exploitation are more prevalent within the country than transnational trafficking. The document further indicates that children are subjected to being trafficked into street hawking, begging, portering, artisanal gold mining, quarrying, herding and agriculture. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that, in practice, thorough investigations and robust prosecutions are carried out for persons who engage in the trafficking of children, and that sufficiently effective and dissuasive sanctions are imposed. In this regard, the Committee once again requests the Government to provide information on the number of investigations, prosecutions, convictions and penal sanctions applied by the Anti-Human Trafficking Unit and the Anti-Human Smuggling and Trafficking in Persons Unit for the offence of trafficking in persons under 18 years of age, in accordance with the provisions of the Human Trafficking Act.

Clause (b). Use, procuring or offering of a child for the production of pornography or for pornographic performances. The Committee previously noted that section 101A of the Criminal Offences Act, 1960 (Act 29), as amended by the Criminal Offences (Amendment) Act of 2012 establishes penalties for the sexual exploitation of persons defined as the use of a person for sexual activity that causes or is likely to cause serious physical and emotional injury or in prostitution or pornography. The Committee observed that this provision only applies to children under 16 years of age. It therefore requested the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that its legislation is amended in order to protect all persons under the age of 18 years from the production of pornography and pornographic performances.

The Committee notes with regret that the Government has not provided any information in this respect. The Committee therefore once again recalls that, in accordance with Article 3(b) of the Convention, the use, procuring or offering of children for the production of pornography and for pornographic performance is one of the worst forms of child labour and that under the terms of Article 2, the term "child" shall apply to all persons under the age of 18. The Committee therefore urges the Government to take the necessary measures to bring its legislation into conformity with Article 3(b) of the Convention in order to ensure that all children under the age of 18 years are protected from the offences related to the use, procuring or offering of children for the production of pornography and for pornographic performances. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the application of section 101A of the Criminal Offences Act, 1960 in practice, including the number of infringements reported, investigations, prosecutions, convictions and penalties applied in this regard.

Clause (d) and Article 7(2)(a) and (b). Hazardous work in cocoa farming, and preventing children from being engaged in and removing them from such hazardous work. In its previous comments, the Committee noted with concern the significant number of children below 18 years of age engaged in hazardous conditions of work in the agricultural sector, with an estimated 10 per cent of them working in cocoa-specific hazardous activities. It urged the Government to take the necessary measures to eliminate hazardous child labour in the cocoa industry.

The Committee notes the Government's information in its report that the Government, through the Ghana Cocoa Board and in collaboration with other social partners such as the International Cocoa Initiatives, WINROCK, and the World Cocoa Foundation have carried out a number of activities aimed at preventing child labour in the cocoa sector. These measures include: sensitization of staff and farmers in the cocoa growing communities; withdrawal and rehabilitation of children found in hazardous child labour conditions; and the provision of education and health facilities to such children. The Committee also notes from the ILO publication Good Practices and Lessons Learned in Cocoa Communities in Ghana of the ILO–IPEC Cocoa Communities Project (CCP), 2015, that the project, which was implemented in 40 communities in seven districts of Ghana, focused mainly on social mobilization and community action planning, promotion of quality education, sustainable livelihoods for households, and child labour monitoring. It notes from a report by Understanding Children's Work (UCW) entitled Child Labour and the Youth Decent Work Deficit in Ghana, 2016, that under the CCP project, over 5,400 children in or at risk of child labour were provided with educational or vocational services and more than 2,200 households were reached with livelihood services. The Committee, however, notes from a UCW report of 2017, entitled Not Just Cocoa: Child Labour in the Agricultural Sector in Ghana that the incidence of children's employment in cocoa appears to have risen faster than their employment elsewhere. Almost 9 per cent of all children (about 464,000 children) in the principal cocoa growing regions are involved in child labour in cocoa, of whom 84 per cent (294,000 children) are exposed to hazardous work, resulting in injuries, including serious ones. The majority of these children are working as unpaid family workers. The Committee must express its deep concern at the high number of children engaged in hazardous types of work in cocoa farming. The Committee accordingly urges the Government to intensify its efforts to prevent children under 18 years of age from being engaged in hazardous types of work in this sector. It requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken in this regard as well as the measures taken to ensure that child victims of hazardous types of work are removed from such work and rehabilitated, particularly by ensuring their access to free basic education and vocational training.

Article 4(1) and (3). Determination and revision of the list of hazardous types of work. The Committee previously noted the Government's indication that it envisaged to review and update as necessary section 91 of the Children's Act, including the list of the types of hazardous work so as to be in compliance with the Convention. It noted that the National Steering Committee of the Child Labour Unit (CLU) had validated a list of hazardous types of work under the Hazardous Child Labour Activity Framework, entitled the Ghana Hazardous Child Labour List (GHAHCL), which had not yet been adopted as law.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that the process for comprehensive review on hazardous activities has begun and that measures are being taken to adopt and incorporate the GHAHCL into the Children's Act. Noting that the Government has been referring to the revision of the list of hazardous types of work since 2008, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures, without delay, to ensure the finalization and adoption of the GHAHCL and its incorporation into the Children's Act. It requests the Government to provide information on any progress made in this regard and to provide a copy, once it has been adopted.

Article 7(2). Effective and time-bound measures. Clauses (a) and (b). Preventing the engagement of children in the worst forms of child labour and providing the necessary and appropriate direct assistance for the removal of children from the worst forms of child labour and for their rehabilitation and social integration. 1. Trafficking in the fishing industry and domestic service. The Committee previously noted the information from a study carried out by ILO–IPEC that children are engaged in hazardous fishing activities and are confronted with poor working conditions. Among the children engaged in fishing activities, 11 per cent were aged 5–9 years and 20 per cent were aged 10–14 years. Furthermore, 47 per cent of children engaged in fishing in Lake Volta were victims of trafficking, 3 per cent were involved in bondage, 45 per cent were engaged in forced labour and 3 per cent were engaged in sexual slavery. Expressing its deep concern at the prevalence of children who have been trafficked or sold into fishing activities, or are otherwise engaged in hazardous fishing activities in the Lake Volta region, the Committee urged the Government to strengthen its efforts to ensure the removal of children from this worst form of child labour and to provide them with appropriate support services for their rehabilitation and social integration.

The Committee notes with deep regret the absence of information in the Government's report on this point. The Committee notes from the International Organization for Migration–Ghana 2018 Review that the shelter dedicated to child victims of trafficking has been renovated and opened. About 40 children who were recently removed from trafficking situations were housed in this shelter. These children were provided assistance including psychosocial counselling, family tracing and nutritional feeding. The Committee, however, notes from the document concerning the National Plan of Action (NPA) for the Elimination of Human Trafficking in Ghana 2017–21 that boys and girls are trafficked into forced labour in fishing and the domestic service, in addition to sex trafficking which is most prevalent in the Volta region and in the oil-producing western region. This document also indicates that across the 20 communities in the Volta and central regions, 35.2 per cent of households consisted of children who had been subjected to trafficking and exploitation primarily in the fishing industry and domestic servitude. The Committee deplores the significant number of children along the Volta and central regions of Ghana, who are subjected to trafficking, mainly for exploitation in the fishing industry and domestic servitude. The Committee therefore urges the Government to take effective and time-bound measures, including through the NPA for the Elimination of Human Trafficking, to prevent children from becoming victims of trafficking and to remove child victims from the worst forms of child labour and ensure their rehabilitation and social integration. It requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken in this regard and the results achieved in terms of the number of child victims of trafficking who have been removed and rehabilitated. Please provide data disaggregated by gender and age.

2. Trokosi system. The Committee previously noted that, despite the Government's efforts to withdraw children from trokosi (a ritual in which teenage girls are pledged to a period of service at a local shrine to atone for another family member's sins), the situation remained prevalent in the country. It also noted that the United Nations Human Rights Committee in its concluding observations of 9 August 2016 (CCPR/C/GHA/CO/1, paragraph 17) expressed concern about the persistence of certain harmful practices, including the trokosi system, notwithstanding their prohibition by law. The Committee strongly urged the Government to take immediate and effective measures to prevent the engagement of children into trokosi ritual servitude and to put an end to this traditional practice as a matter of urgency.

The Committee notes with deep regret the absence of any information in the Government's report on its programmatic measures to prevent and remove children from the trokosi system. The Committee therefore once again urges the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged to protect children from the practice of trokosi system as well as to withdraw child victims of such practices and to provide for their rehabilitation and social integration. It once again requests the Government to provide information on the number of children under 18 years of age who are affected by the trokosi system in the country, and on how many have been removed from this system and rehabilitated.

In light of the situation described above, the Committee must express its deep concern at the repeated failure from the Government to provide information on the action taken to address, as a matter of urgency, the situation of victims of worst forms of child labour, including children trafficked for exploitation in the fishing industry and domestic servitude, engaged in hazardous works in the cocoa farming or exploited in harmful practices such as the Trokosi system. The Committee deplores the lack of progress to remove children from these worst forms of child labour, protect them and ensure their rehabilitation.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

[The Government is asked to supply full particulars to the Conference at its 109th Session and to reply in full to the present comments in 2021.]

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 1998)

The Committee notes with concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments.

Article 1 of the Convention. National policy for the elimination of child labour. National action plan. The Committee previously noted that the Government reiterated its commitment to adopting a national policy designed to ensure the effective abolition of child labour in the country since 2001. The Committee also noted that, although the Government undertook a number of policy measures aimed at tackling child labour through education programmes, in particular under the ILO–IPEC project entitled "Tackle child labour through education" (TACKLE project), it continued to indicate that a National Plan of Action for Children (NPAC) was under development. The Committee notes that the Government's report does not contain any new information in this regard. The Committee therefore once again urges the Government to strengthen its efforts to finalize the NPAC and to provide a copy of it in the very near future. Furthermore, noting the Government's previous indication that the National Steering Committee on Child Labour – which had initiated and drafted a national action plan to eliminate and prevent child labour – is no longer functioning, the Committee requests the Government to provide updated information on the measures taken or envisaged to finalize this process.

Article 3(3). Authorization to work in hazardous employment from the age of 16 years. In its previous comments, the Committee observed that section 6(b) of Act No. 9 of 1999 on the employment of young persons and children (hereafter Act No. 9 of 1999) grants the Minister discretion to authorize, through regulations, the engagement of young persons between the ages of 16 and 18 years in hazardous work. The Committee also observed that, although sections 41 and 46 of the Occupational Safety and Health Act, 1997 (OSHA), aim to prevent young persons from undertaking employment activities that could impede their physical health or emotional development, the Government had identified difficulties in monitoring and enforcing those provisions. The Government accordingly indicated that Act No. 9 of 1999 would be amended to ensure that the protections afforded under the Act are extended to all young persons under the age of 18 years.

The Committee noted that the Government's previous report did not contain any new information and merely stated that no ministerial regulations had been issued and that the OSHA provisions ensure that young persons between 16 and 18 years who are employed in hazardous work receive adequate specific vocational training. However, the Committee noted the inadequate measures for monitoring and enforcing the OSHA provisions and that, notwithstanding the significant number of children involved in hazardous work, only three such cases had been reported to the Government's reporting mechanism.

The Committee notes with deep concern that the Government's report provides no new information concerning the process of amending Act No. 9 of 1999, despite its repeated commitment over the years to do so. It once again draws the Government's attention to paragraph 381 of the 2012 General Survey on the fundamental Conventions, which stresses that compliance with Article 3(3) of the Convention requires that any hazardous work for persons from the ages of 16 to 18 years be authorized only upon the conditions that the health, safety and morals of the young persons concerned are fully protected and that they, in practice, receive adequate specific vocational training. The Committee accordingly once again urges the Government to take measures to amend Act No. 9 of 1999 in the near future so as to ensure conformity with Article 3(3) of the Convention by providing adequate protection to young persons between the ages of 16 and 18, and to supply a copy of the amendments once they have been finalized. Moreover, recalling the Government's indication that efforts are under way with the tripartite partners to include additional areas of work on the hazardous work list, the Committee requests the Government to supply a copy of this amended list once it becomes available.

Article 9(3). Keeping of registers. Following its previous comments, the Committee notes the Government's indication that section 86(a) of the OSHA, Chapter 99:10, provides for the obligation of employers of industrial establishments to record, and keep in a register, the prescribed particulars of all employees under the age of 18 years. The Committee requests that the Government indicate which provisions establish the same obligation for the employment of young persons under 18 years of age in non-industrial undertakings.

Labour inspection and practical application of the Convention. The Committee previously noted the results of the Multiple Cluster Indicator Survey identifying a high percentage of working children in the country. The Committee also noted the indication of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) that labour inspectors fail to effectively enforce the applicable legislation and that child labour was particularly prevalent in the informal economy.

In response, the Government simply indicated that its labour inspectors routinely conduct workplace inspections and that there had been no evidence of child labour. Nevertheless, the Committee noted a three-year programme which aimed to, among others, strengthen the capacity of national and local authorities in the formulation, implementation and enforcement of the legal framework on child labour and which would include a focus on child labour in the informal economy. Noting the absence of information provided in this respect, the Committee once again requests that the Government strengthen its efforts to combat child labour, including in the informal economy, and to provide information on the results achieved in this regard. Furthermore, recalling that the Government is establishing a baseline survey on child labour, the Committee again requests the Government to provide information concerning the results of the survey.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2007)

The Committee notes with deep concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments. The Committee informs the Government that, if it has not supplied replies to the points raised by 1 September 2021, then it may proceed with the examination of the application of the Convention on the basis of the information at its disposal at its next session.

The Committee notes the observations of the Confederation of Public and Private Sector Workers (CTSP) received on 4 September 2019. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments in this respect.

The Committee notes the observations of the Confederation of Public and Private Sector Workers (CTSP) received on 30 August 2017 and 29 August 2018, concerning the weakness of the law enforcement bodies in combating trafficking in children, and the absence of rehabilitation and reintegration measures for restavèks children (child domestic workers).

The Committee notes the Government's communication received on 30 October 2018 in which it informs the Committee that, further to the conclusions of the Conference Committee, it has requested ILO technical assistance with a view to helping in the presentation of the reports due, strengthening the inspection services, consolidating social dialogue for the continuation of social reforms, and addressing the other points raised by the Conference Committee. The Government adds that it hopes to receive the requested assistance before the next session of the International Labour Conference. The Committee hopes that this technical assistance will be provided without delay.

The Committee notes with concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments initially made in 2015.

The Committee notes that the Law No. CL/2014-0010 of 2 June 2014 on the fight against trafficking in persons has been adopted.

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (a). All forms of slavery or practices similar to slavery. Sale and trafficking of children. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, according to the report of the United Nations Special Rapporteur on contemporary forms of slavery, a new trend has been observed with regard to the employment of children as domestic workers (designated by the Creole term restavèks). This consists of the emergence of persons who recruit children from rural areas to work as domestic servants in urban families and outside the home in markets. The Special Rapporteur noted that this new trend has caused many observers to describe the phenomenon as trafficking, since parents are now handing their children over to strangers, whereas previously they entrusted the children to relatives. The Committee noted the observations of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) that smuggling and trafficking in children was continuing, particularly towards the Dominican Republic. The ITUC has gathered serious eyewitness reports of sexual abuse and violence, even including murder, against young women and young girls who have been trafficked, particularly by Dominican military personnel and expressed concern at the fact that there does not appear to be a law under which those responsible for trafficking in persons can be brought to justice and that a draft legislation was to be adopted by the Parliament.

The Committee notes with interest the adoption of Law No. CL/2014-0010 of 2 June 2014 on the fight against trafficking in persons. The Law provides that trafficking in children, meaning the procuring, enlistment, transfer, transportation, accommodation or reception of a child for the purposes of exploitation constitutes an aggravating circumstance giving rise to life imprisonment (sections 11 and 21). The Committee notes, however, that, according to its 2014 concluding observations (CCPR/C/HTI/CO/1, paragraph 14), the Human Rights Committee remains concerned about the continuing exploitation of restavèks children and the lack of statistics on, and results from, the investigations into the perpetrators of trafficking. Similarly, the Committee notes that, according to the 2015 report of the independent expert on the human rights situation in Haiti (A/HRC/28/82, paragraph 65 with reference to A/HRC/25/71, paragraph 56), the restavèks phenomenon is the consequence of the weakness of the rule of law and those children are systematically unpaid, subjected to forced labour, and exposed to physical and/or verbal violence. Their number was estimated at 225,000 by UNICEF in 2012. The Committee, therefore, urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the effective implementation of Law No. CL/2014-0010, in particular in ensuring that in-depth investigations and effective prosecutions are completed with regard to perpetrators of trafficking of children under 18 years of age. The Committee also requests the Government to provide statistical data on the application of the law in practice, including the number and nature of the violations reported, investigations, prosecutions, convictions and the penal sanctions applied.

Clauses (a) and (d). Forced or compulsory labour and hazardous work. Child domestic labour. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the situation of hundreds of thousands of restavèk children who are often exploited under conditions that qualify as forced labour. It noted that in practice many of these children, some of whom are only 4 or 5 years old, are the victims of exploitation, are obliged to work long hours without pay, face all kinds of discrimination and bullying, receive poor lodging and food and are often victims of physical, psychological and sexual abuse. In addition, very few of them attend school. The Committee also noted the repeal of Chapter IX of Title V of the Labour Code, relating to children in service, by the Act of 2003 for the prohibition and elimination of all forms of abuse, violence, ill-treatment or inhumane treatment of children (the Act of 2003). It noted that the prohibition set out in section 2(1) of the Act of 2003 covers the exploitation of children, including servitude, forced or compulsory labour, forced services and work which by its nature or the circumstances in which it is carried out is likely to harm the health, safety or morals of children, without however establishing penalties for violations of its provisions. The Committee noted that the repealed provisions included section 341 of the Labour Code, under which a child from the age of 12 years could be entrusted to a family to be engaged in domestic work. The Committee nevertheless observed that section 3 of the Act of 2003 provides that a child may be entrusted to a host family in the context of a relationship of assistance and solidarity.

The Committee noted previously that the Special Rapporteur, in her report, expressed deep concern at the vagueness of the concept of assistance and solidarity and considered that the provisions of the Act of 2003 allow the practice of restavèk to be perpetuated. According to the report of the Special Rapporteur, the number of children working as restavèk is between 150,000 and 500,000 (paragraph 17), which represents about one in ten children in Haiti (paragraph 23). Following interviews with restavèk children, the Special Rapporteur ascertained that all of them were given heavy workloads by their host families, which were often incompatible with their full physical and mental development (paragraph 25). Moreover, the Special Rapporteur was told that these children are often ill-treated and subjected to physical, psychological and sexual abuse (paragraph 35). Representatives of the Government and of civil society pointed out that cases of children being beaten and burnt were routinely reported (paragraph 37). The Committee noted that, in view of these findings, the Special Rapporteur described the restavèk system as a contemporary form of slavery.

The Committee notes the ITUC's allegations that the earthquake of 12 January 2010 resulted in an abrupt deterioration in the living conditions of the population of Haiti and increasingly precarious working conditions. According to the ITUC, an increasing number of children are engaged as restavèk and it is highly probable that their conditions have deteriorated further. Many of the eyewitness accounts gathered by the ITUC refer to extremely arduous working conditions, and exploitation is often combined with degrading working conditions, very long hours of work, the absence of leave and sexual exploitation and situations of extreme violence.

The Committee notes the Government's recognition that the engagement of restavèk children in domestic work is similar to forced labour. It once again expresses deep concern at the exploitation of children under 18 years of age in domestic work performed under conditions similar to slavery and in hazardous conditions. It once again reminds the Government that, under the terms of Article 3(a) and (d) of the Convention, work or employment by children under 18 years of age under conditions that are similar to slavery or that are hazardous comprise the worst forms of child labour and, under the terms of Article 1, are to be eliminated as a matter of urgency. The Committee requests the Government to take immediate and effective measures to ensure in law and practice that children under 18 years of age are not engaged as domestic workers under conditions similar to slavery or in hazardous conditions, taking into account the special situation of girls. In this respect, it urges the Government to take the necessary measures to amend the provisions of the national legislation, and particularly section 3 of the Act of 2003, which allow the continuation of the practice of restavèk. The Committee also requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that in-depth investigations are conducted and effective prosecutions of persons subjecting children under 18 years of age to forced domestic work or to hazardous domestic labour, and that sufficiently effective and dissuasive penalties are imposed in practice.

Article 5. Monitoring mechanisms. Child protection brigade. The Committee notes the ITUC's allegation that a child protection brigade (BPM) exists in Haiti protecting the borders. However, the ITUC indicates that the corruption of officials on both sides of the border has not been eradicated and that the routes for trafficking in persons avoid the four official border posts and pass through remote locations where more serious situations of abuse against the life and integrity of migrants probably occur.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that the BPM is a specialized police unit which arrests traffickers, who are then brought to justice. However, the Government adds that, during judicial inquiries, procedural issues are often used by those charged to escape justice. The Committee is bound to express concern at the weakness of the monitoring mechanisms in preventing the phenomenon of trafficking in children for exploitation. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to strengthen the capacity of the BPM to monitor and combat trafficking in children under 18 years of age and to bring those guilty to justice. It requests the Government to provide information on the measures adopted in this respect and the results achieved.

Article 7(2). Effective and time-bound measures. Clause (b). Providing the necessary and appropriate direct assistance for the removal of children from the worst forms of child labour and for their rehabilitation and social integration. Sale and trafficking. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, according to the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime report of February 2009: Global Report on Trafficking in Persons, no system exists to provide the victims of trafficking with care or assistance, nor are there any reception centres for victims of trafficking. It also noted that the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW), in its concluding observations (CEDAW/C/HTI/CO/7, 10 February 2009, paragraph 26), expressed concern at the lack of reception centres for women and girls who are victims of trafficking.

The Committee notes the ITUC's allegations that there is a public system of care and assistance for persons who are victims of trafficking. The reports gathered by the ITUC indicate that victims are referred to the police forces, which relay them to the Social Welfare and Research Institute (IBESR), which then places them in reception centres.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that a pilot social protection programme was envisaged, but that the earthquake of 12 January 2010 undermined the implementation of the programme. The Committee urges the Government to take effective measures for the provision of the necessary and appropriate direct assistance for the removal of child victims of sale and trafficking and for their rehabilitation and social integration. In this respect, it requests the Government to provide information on the number of children under 18 years of age who are victims of trafficking and who have been placed in reception centres through the police forces and the IBESR.

Clause (d). Identifying and reaching out to children at special risk. Restavèk children. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the existence of programmes for the reintegration of restavèk children established by the IBESR in cooperation with various international and non-governmental organizations. It noted that these programmes focus on reintegration in the family setting with a view to promoting the social and psychological development of the children concerned. However, it noted that the Committee on the Rights of the Child, in its concluding observations, had expressed deep concern at the situation of restavèk children placed in domestic service and recommended that the Government take urgent steps to ensure that restavèk children are provided with physical and psychological rehabilitation and social reintegration services (CRC/C/15/Add.202, 18 March 2003, paragraphs 56 and 57).

The Committee notes the ITUC's indications that it has been informed of initiatives for the reintegration of restavèk children implemented, among others, with the support of UNICEF and the International Organization for Migration (IOM). While welcoming these initiatives, the ITUC calls on the Government to ensure that these programmes continue to be combined with measures intended to improve the living conditions of the families of origin of the children.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that cases of the ill-treatment of children in domestic service are taken up by the IBESR, which is responsible for placing them in families for the purposes of their physical and psychological rehabilitation. However, the Government recognizes that there are still only a few such cases. The Committee urges the Government to intensify its efforts to ensure that restavèk children benefit from physical and psychological rehabilitation and social integration services in the framework of programmes for the reintegration of restavèk children or through the IBESR.

Article 8. International cooperation. Sale and trafficking of children. The Committee previously noted that the Ministry of Social Affairs and Labour, in cooperation with the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, was studying the problem of the exploitation of persons in sugar cane plantations in the Dominican Republic and of children reduced to begging in that country, and intends to engage in bilateral negotiations with a view to resolving the situation. It also noted that the CEDAW, in its concluding observations (CEDAW/C/HTI/CO/7, 10 February 2009, paragraph 27), encourages the Government "to conduct research on the root causes of trafficking and to enhance bilateral and multilateral cooperation with neighbouring countries, in particular the Dominican Republic, to prevent trafficking and bring perpetrators to justice".

The Committee notes once again that the Government's report does not contain information on this subject. It once again requests the Government to provide information in its next report on the progress made in the negotiations for the adoption of a bilateral agreement with the Dominican Republic.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee expects that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Kenya

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 1979)

Article 1 of the Convention. National policy and application of the Convention in practice. The Committee previously noted the Government's indication that it had established several social support programmes, including the Cash Transfer Programmes to Orphans and Vulnerable Children (CT–OVC); Urban Food Subsidy; and several bursaries such as the Presidential Bursary Scheme for Orphans and Vulnerable Children. It further noted several activities undertaken by the ILO–IPEC, through the Global Action Programme (GAP 11) as well as the achievements made under the Support to the National Action Plan (SNAP) project. The Committee, however, noted from the SNAP project report that child labour remained a developmental challenge in Kenya that was linked to issues such as access to education, skills training and related services, social protection and the fight against poverty. The Committee therefore strongly encouraged the Government to strengthen its efforts to improve the situation of children under the age of 16 years and to ensure the progressive elimination of child labour in the country.

The Committee notes the detailed information provided by the Government in its report on the measures taken to eliminate child labour through improving the functioning of the educational system. In this regard, the Committee notes the measures taken to improve school enrolment and attendance rates and reduce drop-out rates, such as the implementation of: (i) free primary education policy; (ii) provision for primary school infrastructure improvement grants; and (iii) the implementation of feeding programmes in selected primary schools in arid and semi-arid lands (ASAL), slums and poverty-stricken areas.

The Committee further notes the information from the ILO website that in October 2016, the National Assembly of Kenya adopted a National Policy on Elimination of Child Labour (NPCL) which aims at building synergies and mainstreaming child labour interventions in national, county and sectoral policies. The National Policy focuses on strategies that are aimed at the prevention, identification, withdrawal, rehabilitation and reintegration of children involved in all forms of child labour. It also notes from the Government's report to the Human Rights Council that a National Plan of Action (NPA) for Children 2015-2022 has been adopted which proposes to implement programmes for children (A/HRC/WG.6/35/KEN/1, paragraph 16).

However, the Committee notes the Government's further indication that 17 per cent of children aged between 5-17 years are involved in child labour with the agricultural and domestic sectors being the main areas where child labour is more prevalent. The Committee further notes from the UNICEF Situation Analysis of Children and Women in Kenya, 2017 that a total of 9.5 million children in Kenya are experiencing multidimensional child poverty. While noting the measures taken by the Government, the Committee must express its concern at the significant number of children who are involved in child labour and are at risk of being engaged in child labour. The Committee therefore urges the Government to intensify its efforts to improve the situation of children under the age of 16 years and to ensure the progressive elimination of child labour in the country. It requests the Government to continue to provide specific information on the concrete measures taken in this regard, including the measures taken within the framework of the NCLP and the NPA 2015-2022 as well as the results achieved. The Committee also requests the Government to provide detailed information on the manner in which the Convention is applied in practice, including, for example, statistical data on the employment of children and young persons, extracts from the reports of the inspection services, and information on the number and nature of violations detected and penalties applied involving children and young persons.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2001)

Articles 3(a) and 7(1) of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour and penalties. Trafficking of children. The Committee notes from the Assessment Report on Human Trafficking Situation in the Coastal Region of Kenya, 2018 by the International Organization for Migration (IOM Assessment Report), that Kenya has been identified as a source, transit and destination country for men, women and children subjected to forced labour and sex trafficking. The IOM has documented that internal trafficking occurs within Kenya mainly for purposes of domestic labour and sexual exploitation, while international or cross-border trafficking occurs for purposes of forced labour, domestic servitude and sexual exploitation. Child trafficking constitutes the main category of cases reported in the country and children are trafficked to work as domestic labourers, work in farming, fisheries, begging and for sex work in the coastal region of Kenya. This report also indicates that trafficking in persons in the coastal region of Kenya has been increasing with the most prevalent forms being trafficking for labour and sexual exploitation and child trafficking. The Committee also notes that the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW) in its concluding observations of November 2017 expressed its concern that women and girls, including in refugee camps, remain at risk of trafficking for purposes of sexual exploitation or forced domestic labour and at the low level of prosecutions of traffickers, particularly under the Counter-Trafficking in Persons Act of 2010 (CEDAW/C/KEN/CO/8, paragraph 26). The Committee therefore urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the effective implementation and enforcement of the provisions of the Counter Trafficking in Persons Act by conducting thorough investigations and prosecutions against persons who engage in the trafficking of children and ensuring that sufficiently effective and dissuasive sanctions are imposed. It requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken in this regard and on the number of investigations, prosecutions, convictions and penalties imposed for the offences related to the trafficking of children under 18 years of age.

Articles 3(d), 4(1) and 7(2)(a) and (b). Hazardous work and effective and time-bound measures to prevent the engagement of children in, and to remove them from the worst forms of child labour and to provide for their rehabilitation and social integration. Child domestic work. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that section 12(3), read in conjunction with section 24(e) of the Employment (General) Rules of 2014, prohibits the employment of children under the age of 18 years in various types of hazardous work listed under fourth schedule of the Rules, including domestic work. The Committee also noted that ILO–IPEC, through the Global Action Programme (GAP 11) has supported several activities, including the carrying out of a situational analysis for child domestic workers in Kenya. According to the GAP report of 2014, the situation analysis revealed that, children over 16 years of age, some of whom started working at 12–13 years, are involved in domestic work in Kenya. Many are underpaid and work for long hours averaging 15 hours per day and are subject to physical and sexual abuse. It further noted that according to the report entitled Road Map to Protecting Child Domestic Workers in Kenya: Strengthening the Institutional and Legislative Response, April 2014, there were estimated 350,000 child domestic workers in Kenya, the majority of whom are girls between 16 and 18 years of age. The Committee requested the Government to take the necessary measures to prevent child domestic workers from engaging in hazardous work and to take effective and time bound measures to remove them from such work and to provide for their rehabilitation and social integration.

The Committee notes that the Government has not provided any information on the measures taken to remove children from hazardous domestic work nor on measures for their rehabilitation and social integration. However, it notes the Government's indication in its report that 17 per cent of children aged between 5-17 years are involved in child labour with the agricultural and domestic sectors being the main areas where child labour is more prevalent. About 82 per cent of the domestic workers are girls from rural areas working in urban centers. The Committee notes with concern the large number of children under the age of 18 years who are involved in domestic work and are subject to hazardous working conditions. The Committee therefore once again urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that its new regulation on hazardous work is effectively applied so as to prevent domestic workers under 18 years of age from engaging in hazardous work. It also requests the Government to take effective and time-bound measures to provide the necessary and appropriate direct assistance to remove children engaged in domestic work from hazardous working conditions and ensure their rehabilitation and social integration. The Committee finally requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken in this regard and on the results achieved, in terms of the number of child domestic workers removed from such situation and rehabilitated.

Article 7(2). Effective and time-bound measures. Clause (d). Identifying and reaching out to children at special risk. 1. Street children. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the Government's information that the Government, in partnership with ILO–IPEC was working to support the removal of children from street work and to enrol them in skills training programmes and entrepreneurship training. The Committee requested the Government to continue to provide information on the measures taken by the Government to protect street children from the worst forms of child labour and to provide for their rehabilitation and social integration.

The Committee notes the Government's information that it has been implementing the Street Family Rehabilitation Trust Fund and that it is in the process of developing a National Policy on Rehabilitation of Street Families. The Committee also notes that according to the UNICEF Situation Analysis of Children and Women (SITAN report) in Kenya, 2017 under the Street Family Rehabilitation Trust Fund, more than 80,200 street children and youth have been enrolled in primary and secondary schools, while 18,000 street children have been re-integrated with their families. However, SITAN report indicates that there are an estimated 50,000 to 250,000 children who are living and/or working on the streets in Kenya. While noting the measures taken by the Government the Committee must express its concern at the significant number of children working on the streets. The Committee therefore urges the Government to intensify its efforts to protect street children from the worst forms of child labour, and to ensure the rehabilitation and social integration of children actually removed from the streets. It also requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken in this regard and the results achieved in terms of the number of street children removed from such situations and socially reintegrated.

2. Orphans of HIV/AIDS and other vulnerable children (OVCs). The Committee previously noted, that according to the ILO–IPEC TACKLE project report entitled "Combating child labour in Siaya District, Kenya through sustainable home grown school feeding programme", the Government of Kenya estimated that 1.78 million children are orphans in Kenya, half of them being due to HIV/AIDS related deaths, with 40 per cent of them living with their grandparents. The Committee requested the Government to strengthen its efforts to protect child victims and orphans of HIV/AIDS from the worst forms of child labour, in particular by increasing their access to education.

The Committee notes that the Government has not provided any information in this regard. It notes from the SITAN report that currently 353,000 households are benefitting from the Cash Transfer Programme for OVCs. Moreover, the Presidential Bursary Scheme for OVCs is being provided to 50 children per constituency. The SITAN report further indicates that there are 854 registered Charitable Children's Institutions in Kenya providing care and protection to around 43,000 children. The Committee, however, notes from the SITAN report that approximately 3.6 million Kenyan children are orphans or otherwise classified as vulnerable. Of these, 646,887 children have lost both parents, while 2.6 million have lost one parent (one million of these due to AIDS). Other children are made vulnerable due to poverty, harmful cultural practices, abandonment, natural disasters, ethnic and political conflict and/or poor care arrangements. Recalling that orphans and OVCs are at a greater risk of being involved in the worst forms of child labour, the Committee urges the Government to intensify its efforts to ensure that such children are protected from the worst forms of child labour and to facilitate their access to education. It requests the Government to provide information on the effective and time bound measures taken and the results achieved in this regard.

Clause (e). Take account of the special situation of girls. Commercial sexual exploitation of girls. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that children were exploited in prostitution throughout Kenya, including in the coastal sex tourism industry, in the eastern khat cultivation areas, and near Nyanza's gold mines. Brothel-based child prostitution was reportedly increasing in Migori, Homa Bay, and Kisii counties, particularly around markets along the border with the United Republic of Tanzania. The Committee requested the Government to take effective and time bound measures to protect girls from becoming victims of commercial sexual exploitation and to provide information on such measures.

The Committee notes an absence of information in the Government's report on this point. The Committee, however, notes from the SITAN report that the sexual exploitation of children in travel and tourism is reportedly common in major tourist destinations such as Nairobi, Mombasa, Kisumu, Kakamega, Nakuru as well as in other major towns in Kenya. It also notes from the IOM Assessment Report that an estimated 10,000 to 15,000 girls between 12 and 18 years living in Diani, Kilifi, Malindi and Mombasa are involved in sex work. This report also indicates that child sex workers including beach boys, bar staff, waiters and others are often compelled to deliver sexual services and that during the low tourist season, the local market for child sex workers keeps the system going. The Committee further notes that the Committee on the Rights of the Child, in its concluding observations of 2016, expressed concern about the high level of child prostitution and child pornography, particularly in the tourism and travel sector (CRC/C/KEN/CO/3-5, paragraph 37). The Committee notes with deep concern the significant number of children who are engaged in this worst forms of child labour in Kenya. The Committee therefore urges the Government to take effective and time-bound measures to protect girls from becoming victims of commercial sexual exploitation, particularly in the coastal regions of Kenya. It requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken in this regard and the results achieved in terms of the number of children who are, in practice, removed from commercial sexual exploitation and rehabilitated.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Kiribati

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 2009)

Article 1 of the Convention. National policy for the effective abolition of child labour and application of the Convention in practice. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that a statistical database on the employment of children and young persons, based on Employment Return Forms, was being set up, and that a child labour survey and report, carried out with the ILO-IPEC, were being finalized. The Committee requested the Government to pursue its efforts to both develop a national child labour policy and ensure that sufficient data on the situation of working children in Kiribati was made available.

The Government indicates in its report that it takes note of the Committee's previous comments regarding the development of a child labour policy and that it will further discuss it with the Decent Work Advisory Board and related technical offices. The Government will provide updated information in its next report.

The Government also indicates that the statistical database on the employment of children and young persons, based on Employment Return Forms, has not been set up due to high turnover within the Ministry, particularly in the Work Relations Unit that deals specifically with the implementation and monitoring of the Employment and Industrial Relations Code, 2015 (EIRC).

The Government indicates that the rapid assessment conducted in Tarawa in 2012 with the ILO-IPEC through its TACKLE programme in Fiji confirms that there are children under the age of 14 working in the informal economy. It specifies that measures or procedures that could accurately describe the situation of children engaged in child labour in Kiribati are still being developed. The Committee notes that the rapid assessment, annexed to the Government's report, states that there is a clear indication that some children of 12 years of age and below are involved in child labour.

The Committee also notes that according to the Kiribati Social Development Indicator Survey (KSDIS) carried out in 2018–19 by the Kiribati National Statistics Office in collaboration with the Ministry of Health and other government ministries, 28.3 per cent of children aged 5 to 14 years were engaged in child labour. Given the high percentage of children under 14 years of age engaged in child labour, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to develop and adopt a national policy to ensure the progressive elimination of child labour, including in the informal economy. Furthermore, it encourages the Government to pursue its efforts to develop a statistical database including information on the number of children below the minimum age engaged in child labour, and requests the Government to continue to provide information on the number of children engaged in child labour in the country.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2009)

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (b). Use, procuring or offering of a child for prostitution. The Committee previously noted that section 118(f) of the Employment and Industrial Relations Code, 2015 (EIRC), prohibited the use, procuring or offering of a child for prostitution, and established a penalty of a fine of $5,000 or a term of imprisonment of ten years, or both, for any person contravening this provision. The Committee accordingly requested the Government to provide information on the application in practice of section 118(f) of the EIRC once it has entered into force.

The Government indicates in its report that no cases or convictions relating to section 118(f) of the EIRC have been reported. The Committee notes that the rapid assessment conducted in Tarawa in 2012 with the ILO–IPEC through its TACKLE programme in Fiji, annexed to the Government's report, identified 33 children engaged in prostitution, all of them girls between 10 and 17 years of age. This study indicated that 85 per cent of these girls first engaged in prostitution between 10 and 15 years of age and that the most common place for prostitution was on foreign boats (pages 8–9 and 18–37).

The Committee further notes that the Government stated, in its report to the Committee on the Rights of the Child of March 2020, that children are victims of commercial sexual exploitation, although cases tend to go unreported because girls are considered not to be forced and the community at large does not have a clear understanding that this is illegal and dangerous (CRC/C/KIR/2-4, paragraph 193).

The Committee also notes that the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women as well as the UN Country Team Fiji (which covers Kiribati) highlighted, in their reports of 2020, the existence of commercial sexual exploitation of children, in particular on foreign fishing vessels (CEDAW/C/KIR/CO/1-3, paragraph 31 and Joint Submission of the UN Country Team Fiji for the Universal Periodic Review, paragraph 40). The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that persons contravening section 118(f) of the EIRC are investigated and prosecuted. It requests the Government to supply information on the number of violations identified under section 118(f) of the EIRC, the persons prosecuted and convicted, and the penalties imposed.

Article 7(2). Effective and time-bound measures. Clauses (a) and (b). Preventing the engagement of children in the worst forms of child labour, removing them from these worst forms of child labour and ensuring their rehabilitation and social integration. Commercial sexual exploitation. The Committee previously noted that the Kiribati Community Police patrol carried out rounds during the night to keep children off the streets in order to prevent and remove child victims of commercial sexual exploitation. The Government stated that the Ministry of Women, Youth, Sports and Social Affairs (MWYSSA) and the Ministry of Health and Medical Services had established new divisions responsible for providing counselling and guidance in resolving problems, including for cases of worst forms of child labour. The Committee requested the Government to strengthen its efforts to prevent the commercial sexual exploitation of children in the country and to provide information on the measures taken to remove children from this worst form of child labour.

The Government indicates that the MWYSSA conducted awareness-raising activities among owners and members of kava bars who employ underage girls to work at night and that the number of girls working in these premises has consequently decreased. The MWYSSA also provides advice and counselling to these children and empowers them to integrate into the community, including through education and awareness-raising on the risks of alcohol. The Committee requests the Government to continue to take measures to prevent the engagement of children in commercial sexual exploitation. It also requests the Government to take the necessary steps to remove children from this worst form of child labour as well as to rehabilitate and socially integrate them. It requests the Government to provide information in this regard, as well as on the number of children under 18 years of age who have actually been removed from commercial sexual exploitation and provided with appropriate care and assistance.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Kyrgyzstan

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 1992)

Article 1 of the Convention. National policy and application of the Convention in practice. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that 672,000 of the 1,467,000 children aged 5–17 years in Kyrgyzstan were economically active. The Committee further noted a number of actions and initiatives undertaken under the ILO–IPEC project entitled "Combating Child Labour in Central Asia – Commitment becomes Action" (PROACT CAR Phase III), which aimed at the prevention and elimination of child labour in Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan and Tajikistan.

The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that according to the 2014-2015 national child labour survey (CLS), the number of children engaged in child labour decreased from 32.9 per cent in 2007 to 27.8 per cent (414,246 children) in 2014. The Government further highlights that the United Nations Development Assistance Framework (UNDAF) for Kyrgyzstan for the period 2018-2022 sets out a target of reduction in child labour from 27.8 per cent to 22 per cent in 2022. The Committee notes the Government's information on the adoption of the State Programme to Support Families and Protect Children for 2018–2028, which is the Government's central policy document on the protection of children, including working children. The Committee further notes the adoption of the Regulations on the Procedure for Identifying Children and Families Living in Difficult Circumstances in 2015. Section 7 of the Regulations provides for measures on the detection and protection of children involved in child labour, including workplace inspections and assessment of working conditions of children. The Government indicates the establishment of a Coordination Council for Social Protection and Children's Rights in 2015, which also examines issues relating to the prevention and elimination of child labour. The Committee notes the Government's statement that under the ILO's International Programme on the Elimination of Child Labour (ILO-IPEC), in the period 2013–19, more than 2,000 children and families received direct services assistance (including medical and legal services, food, school supplies, education and professional training) which prevented or removed over 1,000 children from being engaged in child labour. The Committee takes due note of a number of awareness-raising and educational activities undertaken by the Government with the support of ILO–IPEC to ensure prevention and protection against child labour. While noting the measures taken by the Government, the Committee requests it to pursue its efforts to ensure the reduction of the number of children working under the minimum age (16 years). The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the results achieved in terms of progressively eliminating child labour, in particular, within the framework of the State Programme to Support Families and Protect Children for 2018–2028.

Article 2(1). Scope of application and labour inspection. The Committee previously noted that the Labour Code, by virtue of its section 18, applies to the parties involved in contractual labour relations, that is the worker and the employer. The Committee noted, however, that the overwhelming majority of child labourers (96 per cent) worked in agriculture or home production, and in terms of work status, the overwhelming majority (95 per cent) were unpaid family workers. The Committee requested the Government to ensure the protection of self-employed children, children in the informal economy and children working on family farms, including by strengthening the labour inspection.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that the authorities of the Procurator-General's Office that are responsible for the implementation of labour legislation have identified during inspection visits the cases of the unlawful engagement of minors in work, including work that is harmful for their health and morals (for example, sale of alcoholic drinks, loading and unloading heavy goods, work at night-time or during school hours). The Government also indicates the positive results of the Child Labour Monitoring System (CLMS) introduced with support from the ILO-IPEC Project for Action against Child Labour in Central Asian Countries (PROACT-CAR) in three pilot districts with respect to identification and providing social support to children engaged in child labour, including those working on family farms and in the informal economy. However, the Committee notes from the Government's report to the Committee on the Rights of the Child of November 2019, that according to the Law on the Procedure for Conducting Inspections of Entrepreneurship Entities of 25 May, 2007 No. 72, labour inspectors are not entitled to carry out unannounced inspections for an employer who intends to violate the rights of working children, since an employer shall be warned in writing about the inspection at least 10 days in advance. The Committee further notes the Government's indication that the Government Decision No. 586 of 17 December 2018 has introduced a temporary prohibition (moratorium) on business inspections and that the issue on strengthening the labour inspection will be examined in 2021 within the framework of a National Tripartite Commission. The Committee further notes from the 2014-2015 CLS that 96.2 per cent of working children tend to be concentrated in agriculture, while a vast majority of children work as unpaid family workers (92.7 per cent). The Committee requests the Government to continue its efforts to ensure the protection of children in the informal economy and children working on family farms. Referring to its comments made under the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), the Committee urges the Government to strengthen the functioning of the labour inspectorate in order to enable it to effectively enforce specific legislative provisions giving effect to the Convention and to provide information in this regard. It also requests the Government to provide information on the establishment of CLMS in additional districts in the country.

Article 7. Light work. The Committee previously noted that according to section 18 of the Labour Code, pupils who have reached the age of 14 years may conclude an employment contract with the written consent of their parents, guardians or trustees to perform light work outside school hours, provided that it does not harm their health and does not interfere with their education. The Committee noted that according to sections 91 and 95 of the Labour Code, the working hours for workers aged 14–16 years shall not exceed 24 hours per week, and daily working hours shall not exceed five hours. The Committee further noted that, among non-working children aged 7–17 years, the school attendance rate was estimated to be 97.4 per cent, compared to 94.5 per cent among working children aged 7–17 years, with the difference mainly resulting from the lower school attendance of older working children.

The Committee notes from the 2014-2015 CLS that in 2014, among working children aged 7–17 years, the estimated school attendance rate was 90.4 per cent. The 2014-2015 CLS further indicates that 24.8 per cent of schoolchildren aged 6 years (9,795 children) are working children, whereas 39.5 per cent of schoolchildren aged 7-13 years (318,590 children) are in employment. In addition, according to the 2014-2015 CLS, the average working hours for children aged 14–16 years is 33.6-hour per week, which is beyond the 24-hour limit set out by section 91 of the Labour Code. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the list of the activities in which light work by children aged 14–16 years may be permitted has not been determined and that this issue will be considered by a tripartite working group on the improvement of legislation which was established by a Directive of the Ministry of Labour and Social Development in May 2019. The Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that children under 14 years of age are not engaged in work or employment. The Committee requests the Government to ensure that the working hours of children aged 14–16 years do not exceed the limits established by section 91 of the Labour Code. The Committee further requests the Government to take the necessary measures to determine light work activities permitted for children aged 14–16 and to provide information on developments in this regard.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2004)

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (a). All forms of slavery or practices similar to slavery. Sale and trafficking of children. The Committee previously noted the information from ILO–IPEC that the Ministry of Foreign Affairs was developing a National Action Plan Against Human Trafficking for 2012–15. The Committee further noted the information from the report of the UN Special Rapporteur on violence against women, its causes and consequences, that trafficking of women and children for sexual exploitation and forced labour continued to be a problem in the country (A/HRC/14/22/Add.2, paragraph 33). The Committee expressed its concern at the lack of data on the prevalence of child trafficking in Kyrgyzstan, as well as reports of the prevalence of this phenomenon in the country.

The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report regarding the adoption of the Government Programme and the Action Plan to Combat Trafficking in Persons for 2017–2020 (the Action Plan for 2017–2020) aimed at improving the regulatory and legal framework, strengthening interdepartmental and international cooperation, and prevention and protection of victims of trafficking in persons. The Government further indicates that to implement the Action Plan for 2017–2020, the Office of the Ombudsman has established a working group of representatives of relevant ministries and departments to monitor the rights of children subjected to sale and exploitation. In particular, the Government specifies that based on the results of the monitoring undertaken in July-September 2019 with support from the ILO Programme to Assist Kyrgyzstan in Ratifying and Applying International Labour Standards and Fulfilling Reporting Obligations, it is planned to develop recommendations on preventing and combating trafficking of children. The Committee further notes that the criteria for identifying child victims of trafficking and the instructions on social rehabilitation of child victims of trafficking were adopted by the Government Decree No. 493 of 19 September, 2019 with the support of the International Organization for Migration (IOM) and the ILO. The Committee notes the statistical data provided by the Government that under section 124 of the Criminal Code of 1997 (prohibition of trafficking in persons), the courts examined 15 cases which resulted in 12 convictions in 2014–2017. The Committee further notes that the new Criminal Code entered into force on 1 January 2019. Section 171(1) of the Criminal Code of 2019 prohibits trafficking in persons whereas subparagraph 2, paragraph 2 of section 171 and subparagraph 3, paragraph 3 of section 171 specify that trafficking of children is an aggravated offence. The Committee requests the Government to continue to take measures, particularly within the framework of the Action Plan for 2017–2020 to prevent and combat trafficking of children and to provide information on the results achieved. The Committee further requests the Government to supply statistical data on the application of section 171 of the Criminal Code in practice in cases of trafficking of children for the purpose of labour or sexual exploitation, including the number of infringements reported, investigations, prosecutions, convictions and penal sanctions applied.

Clause (b). Use, procuring or offering of children for prostitution. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that sections 260 and 261 of the Criminal Code of 1997 make enticement into prostitution an offence. The Committee, however, noted that the Committee on the Rights of the Child (CRC), in its concluding observations, expressed concern that in a number of cases of child prostitution, investigations and prosecutions had not been initiated, and that child victims might be held responsible, tried and placed in detention (CRC/C/OPSC/KGZ/CO/1, paragraphs 17 and 21). The Committee also noted the information in the Report of the UN Special Rapporteur on violence against women, its causes and consequences, that adolescent girls in the country are particularly vulnerable to commercial sexual exploitation in urban areas, with the majority of the girls involved coming from rural areas (A/HRC/14/22/Add.2, paragraph 35).

The Committee observes from the 2018 Analytical report on study of judicial practice regarding offences involving trafficking in persons in Kyrgyzstan carried out by the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime (UNODC), that in 2015–17, the courts examined six cases under section 260 (3) of the Criminal Code of 1997 (prohibition of enticement of a minor into prostitution) which involved six victims aged 14–18 years. Concerning section 261(3) of the Criminal Code of 1997 (prohibition of organization or maintenance of dens for prostitution with the involvement of a minor), the courts examined three cases in 2014–17. The Committee notes the Government's information that the new Criminal Code of 2019 includes section 166(2)(1) which prohibits the involvement of a minor into prostitution. The Committee further notes that section 167(2) of the Criminal Code of 2019 sets out a category VI fine or category II imprisonment for the organization or maintenance of dens for prostitution or procuring for debauchery or pimping with the involvement of persons who knowingly have not reached the age of 16 years. Recalling that all persons under the age of 18 are covered by the scope of the Convention, the Committee urges the Government to ensure that section 167(2) of the Criminal Code of 2019 covers children between the age of 16 and 18 years. Noting the absence of the legislative provisions specifically criminalizing clients who use children under 18 years of age for the purpose of prostitution, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure compliance with the Convention on this point. It further requests the Government to provide information on the application of sections 166(2)(1), and 167(2) of the Criminal Code of 2019 in practice, including the number of investigations, prosecutions, convictions and types of sanctions applied as well as the number and age of minors used for prostitution.

Clause (d) and Article 4(3). Hazardous work and revision of the list of hazardous types of work. Children working in agriculture. The Committee previously noted that the use of hazardous child labour in the agricultural sector was widespread, particularly in tobacco, rice and cotton fields, and that in rural areas, regulations prohibiting children from engaging in such work were not strictly enforced. The Committee noted the Government's statement that work in the fields was one of the forms of child labour targeted by the Programme of Action by the Social Partners for the Elimination of the Worst Forms of Child Labour. The Committee also noted the continued implementation of a project aimed at eradicating hazardous child labour in the tobacco industry, developed by a non-governmental organization and carried out by trade union workers in the agro-industrial sector. In addition, the Committee noted the information from ILO–IPEC that, through the project entitled "Combating Child Labour in Central Asia – Commitment becomes Action (PROACT CAR Phase III)", action had been taken to address hazardous child labour in agriculture.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that the draft list of hazardous work prohibited to children under the age of 18 years has been submitted to ministries, departments and social partners for agreement. The Government further indicates that the draft list includes significantly expanded types of dangerous and harmful working conditions in agriculture The Government also indicates a project "The Elimination of Child Labour in Tobacco" implemented by the NGO "Alliance for the Protection of Children's Rights", together with the Central Committee of the Trade Union of Workers in the Agro-Industrial Complex, with support from the Elimination of Child Labour in Tobacco Foundation, and the Ministry of Labour and Social Development. The Committee notes that according to the 2014-2015 national child labour survey (CLS), a majority of working children tend to be concentrated in agriculture (96.2 per cent). The Committee further notes that according to a Multi Indicator Cluster Survey conducted by the National Statistics Committee with support from the UNICEF, the number of children involved in hazardous work had fallen from 15.2 per cent in 2014 to 11.7 per cent in 2018. The Committee requests the Government to continue to take the necessary measures ensuring that persons under 18 years of age are protected against hazardous work, particularly in the cotton, tobacco and rice-growing sectors, and to provide information on the results achieved. The Committee also requests the Government to ensure that the list of types of hazardous work prohibited to children under 18 years of age is adopted in the near future.

Article 7(2). Effective and time-bound measures. Clause (b). Direct assistance for the removal of children from the worst forms of child labour and for their rehabilitation and social integration. Trafficking in children. The Committee previously noted a disparity between the number of trafficking victims identified and the number of victims receiving assistance. The Committee noted the information from the IOM that it was implementing a project entitled "Combating Trafficking in Persons in Central Asia: Prevention, Protection and Capacity Building" in the country from 2009–12, which includes awareness raising and assistance for victims. The Committee also noted the implementation in Kyrgyzstan of the Joint Programme to Combat Human Trafficking in Central Asia of the ILO, the United Nations Development Programme and the UNODC under the UN Global Initiative to Fight Human Trafficking, which includes support for the development of national referral mechanisms established between law enforcement agencies and civil society organizations.

The Government refers in its reply to the IOM data indicating that in 2002–18, the IOM identified and provided assistance to approximately 2,500 victims of trafficking in persons, including children. The Government further indicates that within the framework of ILO-IPEC support, in 2013–19, more than 2000 children and families received direct assistance services, including medical and legal services, food, school supplies, and vocational trainings. The Government further refers to the adoption of the Regulations on the Procedure for Identifying Children and Families Living in Difficult Circumstances in 2015 which include social support measures for children engaged in the worst forms of child labour (section 7). The Committee notes that the instructions on the social rehabilitation of child victims of trafficking of 2019 provide for psychological, medical, legal and rehabilitation assistance. The Committee further observes that the Government Decree of March 5, 2019 No. 101 has adopted regulations on the organization of shelters for victims of trafficking in persons for the provision of medical, psychiatric, social, and legal assistance as well as support in establishing contacts with relatives or legal representatives. The Committee requests the Government to pursue its efforts to provide the necessary direct assistance to child victims of trafficking, and to ensure their rehabilitation and social integration. It further requests the Government to provide information on the results achieved in this regard, including on the establishment and operation of specialized shelters for victims of trafficking in persons and the number of persons under the age of 18 who have benefited from rehabilitation and social integration assistance.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Lebanon

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 2003)

The Committee notes with concern that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments.

Article 2(1) of the Convention. Scope of application. In its earlier comments, the Committee noted that the Labour Code only applies to work performed under an employment relationship (by virtue of sections 1, 3 and 8 of the Code). The Committee recalled that the Convention applies to all branches of economic activity and covers all types of employment or work, whether they are carried out on the basis of an employment relationship or not, and whether they are remunerated or not. The Committee also noted that under Chapter 2, section 15, of the draft amendments to the Labour Code, it seemed that the employment or work of young persons would also include non-traditional forms of employment relationship. The Committee therefore requested that the Government provide information on the progress made in relation to the adoption of the provisions of the draft amendments to the Labour Code.

The Committee notes an absence of information in the Government's report on this point. Considering that the Government has been referring to the draft amendments to the Labour Code for a number of years, the Committee once again expresses the firm hope that the Government will take the necessary steps to ensure that the amendments to the Labour Code relating to self-employed children and children in the informal economy are adopted in the very near future. The Committee requests that the Government provide a copy of the new provisions, once adopted.

Article 2(2). Raising the minimum age for admission to employment or work. In its earlier comments, the Committee noted that, at the time of ratifying the Convention, Lebanon declared 14 years as the minimum age for admission to employment or work and that Act No. 536 of 24 July 1996, amending sections 21, 22 and 23 of the Labour Code, prohibits the employment of young persons before the age of 14. The Committee also noted the Government's intention to raise the minimum age for admission to employment or work to 15 years of age and that the draft amendments to the Labour Code would include a provision in this regard (section 19). The Committee requested that the Government provide information on the progress made in the adoption of the provisions of the draft amendments to the Labour Code on the minimum age for employment or work.

The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that the Committee's comments have been taken into account in the draft amendments to the Labour Code. The draft has also been submitted to the Council of Ministers for its examination. The Committee once again requests that the Government provide information on any progress made in the adoption of the provisions of the draft amendments to the Labour Code regarding the minimum age for employment or work.

Article 2(3). Compulsory education. In its earlier comments, the Committee noted that the age limit for compulsory education is 12 years of age (Act No. 686/1998 relating to free and compulsory education at the primary school level). The Committee also noted the Government's indication that a draft law aimed at raising the minimum age of compulsory education to 15 years had been sent to the Council of Ministers for examination. The Committee requested that the Government indicate the progress made in this regard.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that the Ministry of Labour took into account the Committee's comments which were inserted in the draft amendments to the Labour Code. Moreover, the Committee notes that in its 2016 concluding observations, the UN Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights is concerned at the number of children, especially refugee children, who are not in school or have quit school owing to the insufficient capacity of the educational infrastructure, the lack of documentation, and the pressure to work to support their families, among other reasons (E/C.12/LBN/CO/2, paragraph 62).

In this regard, the Committee recalls the necessity of linking the age of admission to employment to the age limit for compulsory education. If the two ages do not coincide, various problems may arise. If the minimum age for admission to work or employment is lower than the school leaving age, children may be encouraged to leave school as children required to attend school may also be legally authorized to work (see 2012 General
